That is the wire, and it is signed "R. Weir." Then, on January 24, I answered in these words:

Answering your wire twenty-second, no definite agenda arranged for proposed federal provincial conference on drought problem. We did not consider it proper to arrange agenda without consultation with federal representatives. General purpose is to arrange if possible for cooperation in collecting available information and formulating policies which could be supported by all governments concerned. Similarity of problems in three provinces and national importance of putting agriculture of drought stricken area on a more sound basis seemed to us to warrant common plans and concerted action.

And I had almost as concise an answer to that. The answer was given on February 2:

Re tel twenty-fourth,—

I had better read the whole wire.

Ottawa, Ont.,
Feb. 2, 1935.

Hon. J. G. Gardiner,
Premier Saskatchewan,
Regina, Sask.

Re tel twenty-fourth, regret Kirk's illness has made it impossible to set date.

R. Weir.

I assume that Mr. Kirk is one of the employees of the Department of Agriculture whom he might have sent had Mr. Kirk not been ill. But with a department of the size that he was presiding over, I would imagine there would have been someone else who could have been sent, despite the fact that Mr. Kirk had been ill. But those are the only answers we received to these proposals.

The next intimation we had that this matter was being discussed and considered in Ottawa we got through an article which appeared dated at Ottawa, setting forth what apparently was passing through the minds of at least some persons in Ottawa at that time. I would like to read certain sections of that report in order to indicate what the attitude seemed to be. This was published in the Regina Leader-Post of Regina, Wednesday, February 13, 1935, under date of Ottawa, February 12, and the heading of it is:

Provinces not included in Weir scheme. Drought area rehabilitation as proposed purely federal project.

That was just ten days after the wire that I have just read to the house.

Official information obtained from government sources is to the effect that the provincial governments will play no part in the Weir scheme of drought rehabilitation in the three prairie provinces. This scheme has been worked out by the experts of the dominion Department of Agriculture in consultation with engineers, foresters, and the members of the areas affected.

That was on February 13, 1935. And there was no advisory committee in existence at all until May, 1935, as I shall be able to show in a minute. It states:

This scheme has been worked out by the experts of the dominion Department of Agriculture in consultation with engineers, foresters and the members of the areas affected.

I do not suppose they invited Mr. John Vallance to that meeting, although he was one of the members from the area affected.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I might interject they did not invite any others.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not suppose they invited the hon. member for Swift Current or the hon. member for Weyburn of that time. I do not suppose they invited the hon. member for Assiniboia. I do not suppose they invited the hon. member for Willow Bunch to that particular meeting. There is very little of the drought area left in the province of Saskatchewan, if you leave out of consideration the constituencies I have just named, represented by the members I have indicated. It continued:

It has not yet been reduced to final form, so far as operations in 1935 are concerned, but it appears probable that the dominion will spend approximately $5,000,000 on five specially selected areas. One of these will be in Manitoba to the west of Deloraine, three will be in Saskatchewan, and one in Alberta. Each area will comprise one township or thirty-six square miles. The expenditures would be, roughly, one million dollars each.

That was the first plan mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture from Ottawa at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: I must now—I have permitted it to go just where I want it, just that far. I rise to a point of order, to a question of order—

The CHAIRMAN: A point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: It is this: The minister has read from a newspaper known to be opposed to the then government of the day, and he has now declared that that was a statement by the Minister of Agriculture of that time. It does not purport even to be that, and it is only an article from an opposing newspaper. The point of order is that the statement is absolutely untrue, and that it is not a statement of the facts.

Mr. GARDINER: On the point of order: I have made no such statement. I have had words put into my mouth by the leader of the opposition as often as I will permit him to put them into my mouth. I read this article and then I said, having read it, that the Minister of Agriculture of that day did speak to the people of Canada at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was said. I rise to a point of order. Hansard is there.

Mr. GARDINER: Hansard will show it to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: It will show what is said, now.

Mr. GARDINER: Hansard will show to-morrow morning what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: We are not going to have our rights taken from us by evasion.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Has the leader of the opposition a statement on the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The statement on the point of order is that the statement as by the minister is at variance with what he said. The minister complained about having words put in his mouth by me, and I have the right to have read what he said, the words used, on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask to have it read now. I am within my rights to know what has been said.

Mr. DUNNING: Quote the rule.

Mr. BENNETT: The rule?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not require a rule. It has been done frequently when there have been questions as to statements, and Hansard has given the words.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, when there is any question with regard to the statement of an hon. member the member has the right in this house, and in any other house in the British Empire, to say what he said and what he intended to say, as a fellow member of this house.

Mr. CAHAN: No, not when you have heard it.

Mr. GARDINER: Even when you have heard it. I have noticed this, that when on one occasion the right hon. the leader of the opposition made a speech—

Mr. BENNETT: I rise now, if we are going to talk about order, the Minister of Agriculture is talking about what the leader of the opposition did at some other time. The question of order is whether he did or did not make the statement. The statement of the Minister of Agriculture, which was heard by every hon. member, was made when he began to read from a newspaper purporting to be the Leader-Post of Regina. His statement was that the words contained in the statement were those of the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: On the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, Mr. Chairman, getting back to where we left the discussion: I was stating that the Minister of Agriculture prior to the time of the appointment of the committee had taken a certain position in relation to this particular matter. Now that the leader of the opposition has called my attention to it, I might say that this newspaper article is so much like what the minister did say in the house at a later date and is so much like the policy that was finally adopted, I have no hesitation in saying that whatever newspaper reporter put this in the press must have had official information, as he says at the beginning of the article.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not even say that. Here we have a minister with some sense of responsibility rising in his place to state that he assumes the responsibility of saying that a minister made a certain statement.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the right hon. leader of the opposition rising to another point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to be useless to raise points of order, but I am raising one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no "order" about this.

An hon. MEMBER: There should be.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is that we have a minister, even when his attention is directed to it, attributing to a former minister something which appears in the newspaper and saying that it represents that minister's official opinion.

Mr. DUNNING: On the point of order, I assume the Minister of Agriculture has a right to express an opinion as to the veracity of a newspaper article, which is what he is doing.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance should know better than that. In the British House of Commons he would not be permitted to read the article at all.

Mr. DUNNING: We are not in the British house. Many articles are read here.

Mr. BENNETT: Some Speakers have ruled that they can be read and others have ruled that they cannot; some chairmen have ruled that they can be read and others have ruled that they cannot. Is it competent, when attention is directed to it, for a minister to say that a statement which he reads from a newspaper is the statement of the Minister of Agriculture of that time?

Mr. DUNNING: He did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. GARDINER: I will say once more that I stated in my own words, not in the words of the newspaper, what I thought the Minister of Agriculture said at that time. I think I can pretty well prove what he said, not from a paper which happens to be opposed to the government of the day but from a paper just as good a supporter of the then government as the Mail and Empire in the city of Toronto, and from a number of other papers in Canada. These papers carried the same article as was seen in the western papers at that time. The article goes on to say, and I am now quoting from the article:

> It is pointed out here that nothing in this program entrenches upon provincial jurisdiction and that provincial cooperation therefore is not necessary.

That is a new theory—I am now talking in my own words and not in the words of the article—of government in the Dominion of Canada because action which is going to be taken by the dominion government does not in any way entrench upon the constitutional rights of the province, therefore there is no necessity for any cooperation. I quote again from the article:

> Efforts to cooperate with the provinces in the past, it is declared, have not been successful and the scheme, it is believed, will have greater chances for success if carried through as a purely federal venture.

That makes it exactly clear what was in the minds of at least some people at that time. There is further correspondence here which I do not intend to deal with at the moment, but which I may find it necessary to refer to later.

Coming back to the statement with regard to expenditures which was read into the record of the house a few moments ago, with the intention, I assume, of giving the impression that this was something entirely new in the Dominion of Canada, that it was an idea established in the minds of the people of Canada by the government of the day in Ottawa to be carried out by the expenditure of public moneys and that any future credit was to be given to the government of the day for having carried out that policy. All the discussion that has taken place in this committee since the second reading has been an indication, to me at least, that for some reason or other the leader of the opposition is very anxious that all the credit for everything that has been done up to date in connection with this matter shall go to the government of that time.

I have before me the list of expenditures which was read to the house a few moments ago by the leader of the opposition for the year 1935-36, and also a list of expenditures made from April 1, 1936, to January 31, 1937. Under district experiment substations there was expended $70,524 during the first year, and up to date this year there has been spent $74,468. For reclamation areas there was spent $15,875 during the first year, and $32,-213.40 up to date this year. For large scale grass seeding—it will be noted the leader of the opposition dwelt upon this for some considerable time—there was no expenditure in the year 1935-36, while there has been expended $1,212.85 in the year we are now in. Reserve for grass seed: no reserve shown for 1935-36, and an expenditure of $21,870.77 for 1936-37 up to date. For tree planting there was an expenditure of $18,600 in 1935-36 and $30,953.19 in 1936-37 up to date. Soil investigations, Swift Current laboratory: expenditure in 1935-36, $7,632, and in 1936-37 to date, $16,354.94. Publications of data: no expenditure in 1935-36, and $2,552 expended this year up to date. Water development projects, small: expenditures in 1935-36, $123,881, and in 1936-37 up to date, $191,252. Administration—this is a very interesting item, and I am pleased that the leader of the opposition has called it to my attention—expenditures in 1935-36, $31,681.15, and in 1936-37, $16,985.97. The expenditures this year are just slightly more than half as much, and it will be recalled that even last year we did not have a twelve month year in connection with this particular work. Soil surveys—this was to be very important—expenditure in 1935-36, $12,842.69, and $30,083 in 1936-37. Economic survey: expenditures of $5,832 in the first year, and $9,627 in the second year. Hydrometric survey: expenditure of $7,483 in the first year, and $3,301 in the second.

That ends the expenditures for 1935-36, but there are seven more items of expenditures made during this financial year. Apparently no expenditures were made on these items in the previous year. There was spent this year $36,193.95 for feed relief in order that farmers might have sufficient feed to feed their horses in order to dig the dugouts. The expenditure for moving settlers was $537.40. There was no expenditure last year for distribution of pure seed grain, but the expenditure on this item this year amounted to $4,030. Then for agricultural extension work, $12,100; agricultural improvement associations, $2,824.86; special soils research, $2,889.03; distribution of Morden rust resistant wheat, $1,375.55; making a total for 1935-36 of $342,424.01, and the total for this year up to January 31, 1937, is $499,631.09, or a total for the two years of $842,055.10.

In going over the record the leader of the opposition would leave the impression that this was all new work set up last year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and every member of this house will know that the first item, district experiment substations, is an item which has been in the agriculture estimates for many years. That work was carried on in the Department of Agriculture before rehabilitation was ever thought of. It was extended, it is true I did make some criticisms when I came into the department. I took the position then, and I take the position now, that ordinary agriculture work that was always charged up to the ordinary estimates of the department should not be buried in a rehabilitation vote, and I hope we shall be able to correct that as we go along.

Then, reclamation areas. It is just possible that the exepnditure of the federal government on reclamation areas is a new thing. If it is, it certainly is not a new thing so far as provincial governments are concerned, because that work has been going on for many years. For many years the seed branch of the Department of Agriculture has been promoting the production of better seed for use here and there throughout Canada, and last year they added to that particular policy the accumulation of some of such seed to be used for regrassing in the rehabilitation area. It has just been suggested to me by one hon. member that the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) started that at Manyberries many years ago.

Then, grass development. This work has been carried on by the Department of Agriculture for many years. All anyone has to do to find that out is to visit the experimental farm in Ottawa as soon as the snow goes off the ground, and walk over the grass experimental strips. The work has been going on for years, and is still proceeding. It has been in progress ever since we have had experimental farms in the Dominion of Canada.

As to tree planting, we had a place at Indian Head from which farmers could get free trees long before I became a resident of western Canada, and I imagine even before the leader of the opposition became a resident of western Canada. Almost every farmer in the prairie section of the Dominion of Canada can point to a row of trees around his buildings which he obtained from the experimental plot at Indian Head. There is nothing new about it. It is not a policy for the rehabilitation of the drought area of the western part of Canada. It is simply the carrying on of a policy that has been in existence in the western part of Canada ever since there was a western Canada and ever since we had experimental farms and plots.

Then, soil investigations. As was stated by the Minister of Finance a few moments ago, at the end of the operations of the wheat board following the war there had accumulated overages at the elevators at Fort William and other terminals. These overages belonged to someone, and it was decided, in the wisdom of the government of the day, that the amounts of money that could be obtained for these overages should be distrubted among the three western provinces which grew the greater part of the grain. I do not know what the province of Alberta did with their share of the money, nor what the province of Manitoba did with theirs, but I do know what the province of Saskatchewan did with theirs. The money was turned over to the province of Saskatchewan just about a month or two before the present finance minister ceased to be the premier of the province of Saskatchewan, and at that time he suggested that this money be set aside for the purpose of doing something that would be really worth while for all time to come for the wheat growers of Saskatchewan. To that end he suggested the setting up of a committee and the turning over to it of this money to be invested, the income from which, and the income only, to be used from year to year for some purpose that would be beneficial to all the farmers of the province. About that time he came to Ottawa and I became the premier of Saskatchewan and carried out the plan he had suggested. We chose a committee and turned over to it in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a million dollars. The committee invested the money, and from that time down to the present they have used the income from it to make soil surveys in Saskatchewan. For the leader of the opposition to get up in the house to-day and try to indicate to the house that a policy evolved in this House of Commons in 1935 under the leadership of the then government was responsible in any way either for the soil survey, or for the map of it, is to mislead this house and to mislead the people of Canada. The map which was drawn up in 1935 could not possibly have been brought into existence had it not been for the fact that from 1926 to 1935 there was a constant soil survey carried on in the province of Saskatchewan. It covered, as he indicated some sixty million acres in that province, and you can go over to my office to-day in the Confederation building and see hanging on the wall one of those maps. You can put your finger on any spot in the province of Saskatchewan, note the colour of that spot on the map, and then look at the inscription at the bottom and know the type of soil that is to be found in that section of the province. I have just been handed a copy of the map.

But the investigations did not stop there; they are still going on and will go on forever. The stage at which they have reached to-day is this: Through that committee which was set up through officials of the university and officials of the department, with some assistance—slight it may be, but still some assistance from the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, ever since the beginning of the undertaking, not in 1935, but since 1926—the government in Saskatchewan to-day is able to show you another map not only with the soil survey results indicated on it but also the rainfall over the whole province for a term of years, and related to the soil conditions. It is one of the maps that will hang in the central office at Regina, where we hope to gather all the data that will be assembled by those dealing with rehabilitation, and where it can be used for the purpose of dealing with the situation that exists in the light of crop returns, rainfall, soil conditions, and the amount of settlement there is on the land in question. That work has been going on for years and will continue whether we pass this vote or not. It does not require any money from this vote in order to continue it. As to publication of the data: the very fact that this map exists is an indication that the data has been published, and published, in many instances, with our assistance.

With regard to water development projects, as I said yesterday, that you could fly over all of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, and looking down on those provinces, you would find that the majority of people have dams that were built and dugouts that were made long before this policy was ever thought of by the government of 1935. Again, the Minister of Finance knows, as does every member from Saskatchewan or any of the prairie provinces, that before the provinces existed, in territorial days—my right hon. friend should know it, because he sat in the house at that time—

Mr. DUNNING: He voted for the appropriation.

Mr. GARDINER: He probably voted for the appropriation, yes,—the government of the Northwest Territories had a policy for the building of dams and the digging of dugouts, and for the digging of wells; and the discussion as to where the wells should be dug became so intense that they eventually had to dig some of them out on the road allowances, to stop the discussion that was going on as to who should have the well and where it should be. We went on building dams and digging dugouts. We scarcely built a road of any length in the province of Saskatchewan at any time in the last forty years without building a dam somewhere along the road and putting a spillway in the dam and supplying water to the farmers or group of farmers living alongside, in order that they might use it for threshing or the watering of their stock or something of the kind. All western Canada has been covered by policies of that kind, initiated not from Ottawa but by the provincial governments. In other words, this is not a new thing. No one sat down in the city of Ottawa, either among the staffs of the departments or in the House of Commons or among the ministers who constituted the government of the day, and evolved a policy out of thin air and brought it into this house and presented it to the people of Canada. Certainly no one in this house to-day has the right to claim credit for the expenditures that were made under these policies, further than this, that certain moneys were voted in 1935 to assist in carrying on.

We come then to the economic survey. Well, an economic survey has been going on ever since the time of the Hon. W. R. Motherwell. He set up the economic branch in the Department of Agriculture, and brought from the United States Doctor Booth, who had previously held an appointment in the economics branch of the university of Saskatchewan, to be in charge of the economics branch here and carry on the work. That work was going on during all the period that the last government was in power, and is still continuing. If I were to make any criticism of most of these items it might be that they have probably been put in the wrong place, in that they represent work that has been carried on right along, and while we have been spending money in that direction to a considerable extent we have been leaving undone things that would rehabilitate that section of the country.

As to the hydrometric survey: there was a hydrometric survey under the Department of the Interior right down to the time that the natural resources were turned over to western Canada. It was dropped because the resources were turned over, and the same activity has not been carried on so extensively by the provinces. There is need for further development of the hydrometric survey over that area that has been dried out. As to the other matters on which we have spent money this year but upon which little if anything was spent last year, they are only a repetition or an extension of what I have been dealing with up to the moment. I recite these facts to indicate to the house that there is not one item in the expenditures that were arranged for in 1935 which constitutes a new activity in the prairie country of western Canada.

Having made that claim, may I go back to the question of the committee that seems to have so much disturbed the leader of the opposition?

I have before me the document that was prepared when this legislation was introduced into this house in 1935. It is marked "First reading, April, 1935," and is dated April 4, 1935. Let me repeat that there never was a meeting of this committee until May 3, 1935. As a matter of fact at the time this document was prepared the committee could not have existed because the legislation had not then been passed: I refer to April 4, 1935. First, you have the act. Then you have committees, and note that it is not headed "committee," it is "committees,"—advisory committee, and the drainage or water development committee. The present bill proposes by an amendment to the section to make provision in a proper way for these committees and the organization of work.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, you realize, of course, that this is a document which has not been presented to parliament, it being a minister's memorandum upon which he introduced legislation into this house. I ask to have it tabled.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall table it immediately I have finished.

Mr. BENNETT: It has never been done—that documents ministers have used and left behind them should be read by their successors for the purpose of indicating what they may have had in their mind with respect to legislation subsequently brought into the house. I direct attention to that.

Mr. GARDINER: If there is any objection to my reading from it, I shall not do so.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a question of objection. So far as I am concerned I have none. It is my duty as a member of the committee to direct attention to what has been done. I am content with whatever this committee does, because it is the judge of its own conduct and its own procedure with respect to this matter, but it must be remembered that the rules provide that a public document which is referred to shall be tabled in order that all hon. members may see the whole of it.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be delighted to table the document, because I certainly do not want to read all of it to the committee, and it will be news to the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it a confidential document?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it is, I presume, in that case. But it is a new experience for me to find that the matter of a discussion of the legislation presented to this house by a minister is a confidential document. It might have been confidential before he brought it here, but after he has brought it here and discussed it in the house and had legislation based on it—

Mr. BENNETT: He never brought it here.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, legislation in these exact terms is on the statute book.

Mr. BENNETT: One minute ago the minister said it is not in the exact terms, that he is trying to amend the legislation to bring it within the terms.

Mr. GARDINER: My right hon. friend may have that impression from what I said, but I certainly did not say it.

Mr. BENNETT: I understood the minister to say it.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall not read the document, but I will read the headlines of what was going to be considered under this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I point out that there is an elementary rule with respect to these matters that it may be important for this committee to keep in mind. We are now creating a precedent. The legislation speaks for itself. It is what this house passed. What the minister had in his possession at the time the legislation was drafted and passed must be tabled if it is to be made part of the record here, and the minister, in my opinion, may not read a portion of it. It came from his files, not from the public files of this country. It is a new departure, but if you, Mr. Chairman, think it is the proper course to pursue with reference to the business of this house, well and good.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a general rule, I think, that memoranda passing between a minister and his officers with respect to the preparation of anything that subsequently comes to the house are privileged and are not produced in the house.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: It remains to be seen whether or not this document falls within that category.

Mr. BENNETT: He said what it was.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, at the moment I was not listening.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say he was going to table the document.

Mr. GARDINER: I am prepared to table it and I am prepared not to read from it—either one or the other.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like, if the minister will allow me, to make one objection. Anyone who has been four or five years a minister of the crown has found in his department a great number of private memoranda, prepared by the previous ministers or their deputies, and they are regarded in the department as private. I think during the five years I was minister I could have produced, had I been prepared to do so, some private memoranda that would have astonished this parliament. It is not proper; it has never been done, and I think it is unwise to establish a precedent at this time.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a question of what it is.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said what it was.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to refraining from reading this, but I will just say that it is the whole file on the drought work.

An hon. MEMBER: It is public.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not public. That is the point.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact the minutes of this meeting would have to be quoted from this file; I do not think anyone would object to my quoting them. The minutes of the meeting of the committee are contained in this file. These letters are the deputy minister's letters. This appears to be the deputy's file, not the minister's. I presume that this particular document may be one that was sent to the deputy by the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you realize, Mr. Chairman, the purport of that observation? "I presume this is a document sent by the minister to the deputy"; on that statement of facts the allegation was made that that was the minister's memorandum.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the position which the leader of the opposition takes—that this is not the minister's memorandum?

Mr. CAHAN: The objection is that it is the minister's memoranda to his deputy. It is a breach of good political morals for the minister to attempt to read from or to produce it to this house. There are certain rules of decency that succeeding ministers have always complied with in relation to their predecessors and the correspondence of their predecessors, especially that of their own deputies and clerks.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is that kind of document, what my hon. friend says is correct; but the only question in my mind is whether it is or not.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume it is a memorandum submitted by the minister to the deputy. I have never heard at any time that memoranda placed on files by ministers were confidential.

An hon. MEMBER: And deputy ministers.

Mr. GARDINER: Or deputy ministers either.

Mr. CAHAN: You will discover it.

Mr. GARDINER: I have seen them presented before public accounts committees at every session and no question has ever been raised. They are presented almost every day on orders for returns—memoranda prepared by ministers and by deputies.

Mr. CAHAN: That is a different thing.

Mr. BENNETT: A different thing altogether.

Mr. GARDINER: In any case I may refer to this file, and I can place the file on the table without reading that document. And in referring to the file I can say this. This file indicates that every matter which was eventually referred to the committee, and which has been spoken of by the leader of the opposition, was discussed prior to the committee being in existence, was to all intents and purposes decided upon before that committee was in existence, and was submitted to the committee for its consideration and consent. And I presume the committee consented to these things being done.

Mr. CAHAN: There are too many presumptions.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not need to presume, because the document is on the file indicating that these matters were discussed in Regina on May 3 and 4 before a meeting of this committee and that it was there determined that it would be a proper thing to proceed to spend moneys on these particular works. May I say in passing that a note has been placed on my desk by someone to the effect that this is a departmental file and is a public record. In order to avoid any further discussion with regard to it I have made the statement which I desired to make.

Coming back to the remarks made with respect to the appointment of Mr. Vallance, I did not expect on coming into this house, and more particularly when the leadership of the opposition is in the hands of the present incumbent of that office, to hear, with regard to a previous member of this house, a criticism of the kind that was made at the beginning of the right hon. gentleman's remarks. I am quite aware of the fact that Mr. Vallance, while a member of the House of Commons, spoke his mind with regard to public questions, irrespective of whose feelings might be hurt by the speaking of his mind. I am aware, also that during all the time he was a member of this house he spoke without fear in the interests of the people of the section of the province of Saskatchewan which he represented. And may I say, in spite of the remarks that were made by the leader of the opposition, that the part of Saskatchewan which Mr. Vallance represented previous to the last election is entirely within what I defined yesterday as a part of the drought area. Had it not been for the fine hand of those who took part in the gerrymander prior to the last election, all of the constituency in which Mr. Vallance ran during the last election would have been in the drought area, because all of the constituency he represented in this house prior to the last election was in that drought area. If part of the constituency is not now in that area it was not because of any choice on the part of Mr. Vallance, and that possibly had something to do with the fact that he is not here to speak for himself on this occasion; and when the leader of the opposition, in the light of these facts, makes an attack of the kind he made on Mr. Vallance, I am led to make this statement—that if he will go into western Canada to-day and follow Mr. Vallance over the road he has taken ever since he was placed in charge of this work, and if he will discuss his work with individuals with whom Mr. Vallance has discussed public matters with regard to the work in hand, the right hon. gentleman will find that without any regard whatever to politics, individuals throughout the length and breadth of that area will vouch for it that Mr. Vallance is one of the most energetic and enthusiastic exponents of the work that is being done under this act to be found anywhere in western or eastern Canada.

I have on my file letters which, if he so desired, I could bring to the attention of the leader of the opposition, from some of his best supporters in the southern part of Saskatchewan, telling me of the services that have been given, through organizations over which they preside, by Mr. Vallance since he took charge of this work. I may say that if there is any one in the employ of the department to-day reporting to me who is more careful than Mr. Vallance to safeguard the interests of all groups in the area of which he has charge, and this irrespective of political considerations, I have yet to find him or any record of him on our files. Those who are in charge have been in charge from the beginning, because after all the superintendent of the farm at Swift Current was not actually in charge of this work. The man who has been in charge of this work from the beginning is Doctor Archibald, and Doctor Archibald is still in charge of the work; and after his last trip to the west he reported to me on the very fine work that Mr. Vallance was doing over the whole area. I am sure that he would be prepared to make that report to this house or anywhere else.

But the thing that surprised me more than the fact that an attack was made on Mr. Vallance, was the source from which it came. I have not a very long memory in political matters, because I try to forget the things that my opponents say about me and do to me, but I have a sufficiently long memory to take me back to the few months preceding the last federal election. I remember that just before the right hon. gentleman himself called the dominion election he appointed some seventeen persons across this country to positions far more important than that in question here, some judicial in their nature, and these men had not only run elections but some of them had not even been defeated and were still members of the house up to the time they were appointed. Also he selected men all across Canada who had been defeated just previously in provincial elections and along with the others filled judicial positions, senatorships, positions from one end of the country to the other. And may I say that so far as I am aware only one or two of them, and those for very good reasons, have been removed by the present government from the positions to which they were appointed.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. GARDINER: May I go further than that? After the discussion we have heard today with regard to Mr. Vallance, simply because he was a member of the House of Commons—a Liberal member, someone says; I would say a member—is any self-respecting man who has any regard for the leader of the opposition going to seek election to this house in the future? If to be elected to this house as a supporter of any political party is to be branded forever as a man who cannot give service to his country without being accused of being influenced by partisan and political considerations, if that is to be the criterion by which public men are to be judged, I am afraid there will not be very many running for public office in Canada.

During the last election the right hon. gentleman had put out on behalf of his party a picture. That picture was on the back of much of the party's literature. On the top of the picture it said, "Stand by Canada." At the wheel of the ship of state stood the leader of the opposition, with a rubber coat, a rubber hat pulled down about his shoulders, holding the ship true to its course. The inscription was, "Stand by Canada and the captain who has weathered the storm." But when you looked about the deck of the ship there was no one there but the captain. All the others had taken refuge in these positions that he had opened up here and there across the country. The right hon. gentleman ran his election all alone; we see the results of that kind of campaigning in the house to-day, and in elections to come we shall see the results of the kind of campaigning the right hon. gentleman has been doing here this afternoon.

Not only did the right hon. gentleman make these appointments of which I have spoken, but he made other appointments. He made an appointment to the body which selects civil servants for the Dominion of Canada, and he took for that purpose a member of this house. Hon. members in the house to-day have to take it for granted, whether they like it or not, that a former Conservative member of this house forgets his politics when he is administering an office of that kind. All I would ask of the leader of the opposition is that he be as magnanimous as he expects other people to be, and that when a man who has given good service to this country is appointed to an important public position, and is carrying on his work in the best interests of the people, he should be given credit for the work he is doing and not be attacked on the floor of this house with the protection that it gives. I do not mean to suggest that the leader of the opposition would not make the same kind of attack outside the house; I have no doubt he would, but I am prepared to say that this act is being administered under Mr. Vallance in as effective a way, at as little cost and with as great service to the people for whose benefit it was intended, as it could be under any other officer whom any government in Canada might appoint. I think that amount of defence is due to Mr. Vallance. In addition it is recalled that he is a Scotsman. He came direct from Scotland to this country; he went on a homestead in western Canada; he occupied that homestead and made a living on it long before he came to this house, in spite of the difficult weather conditions that prevailed in that section of the province from time to time. Such was the man who was appointed, a man with that kind of experience, a man who has been a leading official of one of the chief farmers' organizations of western Canada, a man who never was an extreme partisan before he came to this house—if he was one when he left it must have been because of the kind of attacks he heard when he was sitting here. Mr. Vallance was one of the most independent political minds in Saskatchewan before he ran his first election, and he has remained one of the most independent political minds in the conduct of his campaigns and everything he does. He has taken on this work and is doing it well, and I suggest to the leader of the opposition that the committee provided for in the act has nothing whatever to do with either of those matters. The right hon. gentleman has taken advantage of a proposal to amend a section relating to a committee, so as to permit the setting up of more than one advisory committee, to make an attack on the management and the work that is being done under the direction of Doctor Archibald, who is the head of the experimental farms of Canada. I suggest that the committee pass the section under discussion with the amendment that I proposed at the beginning of this discussion to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that one who occupies the responsible position of Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should have seen fit to depart from the consideration of the bill which is before the committee and indulge in a political tirade.

An hon. MEMBER: Who started it?

Mr. BENNETT: I desire only to point out that in the reference to expenditures and to what had been done under the act I realized that the late government had very little to do with it at all. That government went out of office in August, 1935, and the statute was assented to in May, 1935; therefore they had nothing to do with the major part of the expenditures. All this discussion which has been going on to show that the new government spent more money in 1936 than in 1935 showed no more than that the government of the day spent in 1936 more than it did in 1935. I did not for a moment suggest that the late government had done more than introduce the legislation into the house. I regarded it as my duty to point out that it had worked successfully, and to do so I quoted from the report made to this house by the Minister of Agriculture, as required by the statute in question. And I did more; I read what he said with respect to these operations, not what I myself thought. In every respect in what I have stated as to the operations under the act I have been quoting from the document which was lodged in this house by the Minister of Agriculture. I know only this, for instance, that with respect to reclamations the minister makes this statement, filing it as a serious one.

> Investigations on the reclamation of land for farming purposes were started during 1935 at Melita, Manitoba, and Mortlach, Saskatchewan. Regrassing reclamation, with the object of restoring abandoned farm land for grazing is under way at several points in Alberta, and for hay production at Kerrobert, Saskatchewan.

That is a statement made by the minister, not by me. What I read this afternoon was not statements made in the heat of debate, but a solemn document the minister presented as a report of the operations of the reclamation body under the act. There it is.

I do not intend to do more than to point out that if these statements are accurate—and I assume they are—they indicate that the government has been carrying on these expenditures—not some other government; his own government. I did not suggest that the late government had made these expenditures. I was pointing out what had been spent, and how successfully it had been found the act operated. I had pointed out how ample were the provisions to enable expenditures to be made.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: How many dams could be built after November 1, 1935; how many dug-outs could be dug after November 1, 1935?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting anything about that. I am merely citing what the report indicates has been done, and the bills have been paid by the government of the day, the government in which the hon. member who has just spoken is Minister of Agriculture. That is all I have been endeavouring to say. That is all I say now.

But what I did say—and I think it is a matter of great moment to the committee—is that when there are brought into this chamber documents which indicate that they are memoranda upon which ministers prepare their bills, and when such documents are to be treated as part of the record—well, it is going a very much greater distance than I have ever gone in this chamber.

An hon. MEMBER: Public.

Mr. BENNETT: . They are not public documents. In connection with public documents, successive administrations since 1867 have taken the view that when documents are asked for, the minister must always exercise his discretion as to whether or not he will produce them. If they are communications between the Minister and his deputy, they may be documents containing the suggestion, "Why should we not change section so and so to read so and so?"—and so on. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another matter far more important than that, and it is this, that when a bill has become crystallized into a statute, what may have been discussed between various parties before the bill became a statute can never be any part of the record. It has been a fundamental rule, in Great Britain at least, and in the high court of parliament as well, that what have been described as preliminary discussions are no part of the ultimate end. We have a statute in existence, and I am not concerned, nor is any hon. member concerned, with what took place leading up to the statute. The fact that the statute is in the form in which it is, in itself is conclusive as to what the statute is. To state what took place between the minister and his deputy, about which no one but the minister and his deputy have knowledge, and which is contained in papers that only my hon. friend can bring into the house, has never been done by any responsible, reputable minister in the history of this house, and I think such action violates every canon of decency, so far as public life is concerned. That sort of thing I do resent. I do resent it, not so far as it affects myself—I have very few years before me—but there is a House of Commons here; there is a tradition here, and for a minister to go into his room, call for the deputy's file, find there the records which successive ministers have made, saying that it would be desirable to do this or desirable to do that, and then produce them in the house, is like a man sitting at a table and retelling the conversation of other people.

Mr. GARDINER: Just a minute; on a point of order—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order: The right hon. gentleman is citing words which were not used by me at all. This is not that kind of document, at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I repeat: The document was asserted by the minister himself to be a document which he presumed the minister had sent to the deputy—which he "presumed" the minister had sent to the deputy. And he had made a statement before that, asserting boldly that it was the minister. Sir, there are decencies in public life—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, again: I think the right hon. gentleman, if he recalls properly what I said, will remember that I stated "either sent by the minister to the deputy or by the deputy to the minister."

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the minister said, "presumed to be sent by the minister to the deputy"; it was heard by every hon. member in the house—"presumed to be sent by the minister to the deputy." And upon that statement there has been dragged out of the archives of a department a file containing all the memoranda leading up to the passing of the legislation, which file is now becoming a record on that table. The file has no value. But for purely political reasons my hon. friend has endeavoured to do something to discredit the minister responsible for the legislation. I thought parliament had not fallen to that low level. Apparently, however, it has. Why, Mr. Chairman, is there any hope for a country which could have a discussion such as we have heard, take place?

I submit it was in good order this afternoon to point out not anything against Mr. Vallance—I was careful not to say anything against him; what I did say was that a bill of this kind should be so free from any possible suspicion of political bent that it would be desirable that the man charged with the responsibility of carrying out the legislation should not be a man whose violent and known political views would make it the subject matter of suspicion. That is the question, and I repeat it, as anyone would repeat it who knew Mr. Vallance. His own friends would say so. As I say, I have for him a very warm liking, and have always had it. But I am not deterred from doing my public duty simply because I have a personal liking for him.

This is something which is not political. It is an issue which far transcends politics. It is an issue affecting the economic structure, one might say, of the whole dominion. And in an effort to ensure that there will be freedom from political bias, the minute one suggests a criticism one is attacked for having violent partisan views. I am not concerned personally about the matter, but I am concerned about some of the statements which were made with respect to the matter. The minister read from a statement made in the Regina Leader-Post long before this legislation was introduced. He says that statement embodies an official view because, he said, it agrees with what subsequently occurred. If that is to be the type of debate which is to characterize this chamber, and be in order, where will it lead? There are rules prohibiting reading from papers, but we shall leave that aside for the moment, because there have been many rulings in this chamber and in others as well.

The article was from the Regina Leader-Post, one of the Sifton press, supporting the hon. gentleman when he was premier of Saskatchewan, supporting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and the Liberal government of the day. In it there is an article headed, "Ottawa," with a date on it, and it is read to the house, You, sir, cannot fail to have heard the conclusions that were based upon it, attributing motives to the former Minister of Agriculture, and then supporting them by dragging out a file from the deputy minister's office and reading from it all the communications which took place as to the preparation of the legislation.

Mr. DUPUIS: Well done.

Mr. BENNETT: Where does that lead? Where does it lead? I submit that what we have heard this afternoon has been a political discussion, pure and simple, endeavouring to suggest that because observations, by way of criticism of certain conduct in connection with the legislation, were made, as to the appointment of Mr. Vallance, therefore I was endeavouring to have it appear that the late government was entitled to all the credit. I made no statement of that kind, nor did I suggest it. I repeat that what I did point out was what this report filed by the minister says. I was conscious of the fact that the new government had control of this matter, that the old government barely organized it and then left it for its successors. If the genesis of the idea was somebody else's, do I regret it? Am I endeavouring to lessen their prestige or their authority for having done what they have? Am I criticizing the fact that Mr. John Bracken called a meeting and came and addressed some clubs in eastern Canada? Did I suggest that because the present Minister of Agriculture, who was then premier of Saskatchewan, called a meeting at Saskatoon, he should be denied credit? Have I suggested anything about that? Have I suggested anything about what Mr. Reid or Mr. Bracken had to do with it, or that the three of them sent telegrams to the Minister of Agriculture? Am I concerned about that? I am not. Why drag that into this issue? Did I suggest that anybody had a copyright on this idea? Did I suggest that anyone had a monopoly of thought with respect to it? Efforts were made in 1935 to have a united house with respect to this matter. We endeavoured to have a united front and the reason why we chose the chairman who was chosen was to try to get this matter out of politics.

I leave it to anyone to traverse the record of this afternoon and read the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. It commences with an effort to magnify the importance of himself and Mr. Bracken and Mr. Reid with respect to this legislation. Telegrams—mark you, these are not public documents—which have never been brought before this house were taken off the files—

Mr. GARDINER—What are files for?

Mr. BENNETT: To lay before the public and not to be used by a minister for his own credit and benefit.

Mr. GARDINER: They are being laid before the public.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position. They are dragged in for the purpose of magnifying the importance of these three persons. I have not said anything to minimize their importance and I have not said anything to indicate that the idea was trade-marked, far from it. Had I challenged the fact that we had a hydrometric survey in this country? Had I challenged the fact that reclamation work had been carried on prior to the time that the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) had anything to do with the west? Had I challenged the fact that from the very start of western Canada, from the days when Sir William Van Horne had to offer a price for wheat in order to get reasonable competition for the farmers, successive governments have been making efforts to improve the conditions of those who are in that part of the country? To place blame or to attach merit was not my purpose. I defy anyone who reads what I said to find therein any indication that I endeavoured to blame this government. On the other hand, I had in my poor, feeble way endeavoured to approve what they had done under this act, and to show that the act was ample for the purpose. I endeavoured to show that they had made these expenditures and I did not suggest by word or thought that the expenditures had been made by anyone else. I suggested that they had found the act satisfactory for the purpose. I think this disposes of the early part of the speech.

What was the next part? An effort was made to show that in the preparation of the legislation there were many thoughts in the mind of the minister and the allegation is made that the minister was responsible for the memorandum. First of all, there is the presumption, and finally the statement was made that it was either one way or the other, either the deputy to the minister or the minister to the deputy. One who has any knowledge of the preparation of legislation should know that usually the deputy minister and his expert opinion are there for the purpose of indicating to the minister just how what he has in his mind may best be made effective by legislation. We are not concerned about what may have been in his mind. This is the legislation assented to on April 17, 1935, being chapter 23. Section 7 reads:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

Section 9 reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

Relying upon the regulations as being ample to meet the objects he had in mind, relying upon the report as being within the act, I have, in terms of approval rather than censure, merely indicated what it has been possible to accomplish. That disposes of that.

I claim the right, which every member of this house has, to criticize the appointment of any person to the public service. The minister attacked the appointments made by the late administration and he was within his rights in so doing. But he was not dealing with the specific case of a man appointed for a specific purpose. I pointed out that efforts had been made to remove from politics this matter of such great importance to the whole of Canada, the rehabilitation of the devastated areas, if I may use that term. I have nothing to withdraw in having stated that I thought it was a capital mistake to have appointed Mr. Vallance to that position. I have not complained that defeated candidates have been appointed to positions. I have not complained when it was thought necessary to appoint Mr. Young of Weyburn or Mr. McKenzie or Mr. Somebody Else. What I have pointed out is that the nature of the observations made in times past in this house by Mr. Vallance with respect to his political opponents would tend to create a lack of confidence in his administration of the act. His disposition was genial, friendly and humorous; he was always ready to discuss politics with those with whom he came into contact, to belittle, usually in reasonable terms, those opposed to him and to support by every means in his power his own political views. That he is capable of much exertion, no one has denied, for most of us have heard him sing in this chamber. That he is capable of much effort, there has never been any question, but that his efforts should be directed to this particular point is a question about which I think differences of opinion might exist. I have expressed myself with great freedom without in any sense attacking Mr. Vallance, for whom I have a very warm regard, and whose relations with me personally have always been friendly. I say that with great frankness, but I repeat that he is not the man to rouse public confidence in connection with the administration of an act which covers so wide an area and which affects so many people.

There is one more point to which I desire to refer. The minister read a statement from the Leader-Post to the effect that it was proposed to carry on these operations in a federal way and that that was the first time it had been suggested that cooperation between the provinces and the dominion was unnecessary. The correspondent of the Leader-Post may or may not have been the gentleman who usually did his work from the press gallery. That gentleman had been correspondent for the Winnipeg Free Press. He has since been transferred to London, and if you read some of his dispatches you will see that they have the same political colour as those he sent from Ottawa. I only desire to say that his statement that cooperation between the dominion and the provinces was undesirable or unnecessary cannot be answered better than by the legislation itself. The whole purpose was that the provinces should be represented and it was provided that the advisory committee should contain representatives from the three provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Those three provinces were represented on that advisory committee.

The minister has said that the advisory committee had a meeting in May and that the minutes of their meeting are available. I expect to get the names of that committee on Hansard before we get very much further. At the moment I only point out that the work which was done was work done with, on the one hand, representatives of the provinces and, on the other, with representatives of various enterprises which were provincial in character—representatives of the farming interests and of the ranching interests and so on, from each of the three western provinces —and two representatives of the Department of Agriculture. Now, is it quite right, Mr. Chairman, to leave the impression that ministers who may never have seen the dispatch in question and who were offering to this house legislation providing for the most careful cooperation, should be charged with having said that the work was to be federal without provincial cooperation? There is no doubt that this house, in 1935 and in the years preceding that, regarded the situation in western Canada as being of a national matter. It was felt that the provinces themselves could not carry the work through, and the dominion undertook the sole responsibility of providing relief for them, for Saskatchewan in 1930-31. And the house generally on all sides, without regard to politics, expressed approval of a statement which I made from my place yonder that we must regard this as a national calamity and a national emergency. When we undertook, as we did by the statute in question, to assume the responsibility in its entirety we did so with a clear understanding that any action which was taken should be supported by an advisory committee upon which the provinces had a preponderant position, for they were provincial organizations, and the provinces themselves had control.

The minister closed his observations by saying: Some people thought thus. And he read from the Leader-Post, to prove that some people thought thus. The correspondent of the Leader-Post, who was an exponent of doctrines opposed to the government of the day; the Saskatoon paper, the Regina paper, and the Winnipeg Free Press expressed opinions that "some people thought thus." Well, it got down to one man, and that is the correspondent. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that is not the sort of observation which makes any advance in the carrying forward of legislation of this kind. Was it serving any purpose to drag into the discussion these matters? I think not.

There is one matter further I desire to mention, and that is this. I have not personally any interest in the fact that members here may, the minute the minister rises in his place, cheer him on the assumption that I am dealing with a purely political matter. I have said in this house, and I have said out of it, that I am impressed more than I have ever before been in my life with the seriousness of the problems which confront Canada, and to the extent of my ability I endeavour to give what service I can by attending in this chamber day after day. I am paid for that, and I endeavour to earn my pay. But when I do that, I do not thereby in any sense limit my right to make certain criticisms which I believe to be in the public interest, and I have not descended to the personal in the criticisms which I have offered. If I have to say that I believe the appointment of Mr. Vallance was a bad one, I gave the reasons for saying so, and they were not personal, not at all.

The fact that I was head of a party which ran in the election and was not successful is patent to all. The fact that we are few in numbers is patent to all. But the fact that the government of the day did not have a majority of the electors is known to all.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it possible that there is someone who did not know that. I would hardly have thought it possible.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are quite satisfied with the result.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, quite; I can appreciate that. The hon. gentleman would be very hard to please if he were not satisfied.

Our institutions, Mr. Chairman, can survive only if there is free criticism, if the checks and balances belonging to the party system are used by which the conduct and actions of the government of the day are subject to the closest scrutiny and criticism of those who do not view them in the same way as the government do. But if hon. gentlemen opposite, with the approval of a great majority, think they are advancing the cause of democracy by personal attacks and by endeavouring to hold up to ridicule particular individuals, all I can say is that they do not get far that way in the end.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: And the last man that should do that sort of thing is the man who just says, "Hear, hear." I challenge any member of this house who will take the trouble to read the discussion this afternoon to point to a single observation I have made that was not wholly within the right and duty of anyone whose business it is to subject to scrutiny and analysis the measures submitted by the government and the operations carried on under the measures which are on the statute books. Mere criticism of a man who holds a job is now taken to be a reflection on the House of Commons. If I took the trouble to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite the debates of this house in days past with respect to appointments, I could show a record on the part of my friends opposite that would indeed, applying the standard just mentioned by the minister, leave them in a sorry plight. But to point out that we are dealing here with a vast expenditure and operation, the success of which depends upon a fair administration, and to say that a strong partisan is not the best man to appoint as administrator, without in any sense detracting from his qualities or fitness except to say that it is not for the benefit of the country that that appointment should be made—that is not unfair criticism. I think it is fair and proper criticism, and such as has been indulged in in this house by great leaders in days past. I do not pretend to be one of them, but if one reads the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other great leaders then one will have a clear appreciation of what I mean. One may have the warmest personal regard for people, but that cannot take from one the responsibility and duty to point out that it is not in the public interest that they should get a particular position where their appointment would affect adversely the successful operation of a statute.

I repeat again, Mr. Chairman, that the minister has not explained why he is dispensing with this advisory committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I have repeated so often that I am not dispensing with it that I do not think it is necessary to repeat it again.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has repealed the provision providing for their appointment and operation under the statute. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is present. I challenge him to say that under this statute the advisory committee does not go out of existence the minute the bill is assented to.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, the legislation provides that I may appoint any committee, and surely under that provision I can appoint this committee if I desire to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, is it quite as bad as that? I asserted a moment ago that this statute beheads the committee. The minister rises and says: I have said so often that it does not do so that I do not desire to say it again. I challenged the Minister of Justice to say that the statute does not wipe out the committee. And then the Minister of Agriculture rises in his place and says: Well, I can appoint them. Of course he can, but they are gone when this measure is assented to. Why do you destroy this advisory committee? There has been no answer to that yet.

Mr. GARDINER: Why have a discussion of two or three hours over the fact that this committee may be out of existence for twenty-four hours and then be put back in again.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, can you conceive any reputable minister suggesting that he is going to destroy a committee, and twenty-four hours later put it back again? I put that to this committee. The minister says: Why have a discussion, because I may put the committee back in again? Now he admits it is gone; a few minutes ago it was not.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: I have not time to quibble about such small points.

Mr. BENNETT: There again you see, when you have put a question, it is quibbling. It is quibbling because I say the committee is gone. The minister says it is not. Later he says he can reappoint it. I ask, why is it being destroyed? I cannot get an answer, although it is not an unreasonable question to ask.

Mr. GARDINER: Because it is not being destroyed.

Mr. BENNETT: Now it has got back to the point that the committee has not been destroyed. I should like to see that on Hansard, because—

Mr. GARDINER: It will look well on Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly will, when the minister says it has not been destroyed, and then says, "I have not time to waste on it, because I can put it back in twenty-four hours." Take the section and tell the chamber whether or not the result of that section is not to destroy the advisory board, wipe it out. Why should it be destroyed? That is the question. I want an answer and I cannot get an answer. The minister says it is not destroyed. When I say the Minister of Justice or anyone else who can read the English language will tell him that it has been, he says, "I can put it back in twenty-four hours." After the speech to which we have listened this afternoon, I think it is more important than ever that we should have an answer. If this was a body of men not governed by political considerations, would they not want an answer? If they were shareholders in an organization, would they not want an answer if their board of directors came forward and said, "We want to do this"?

Mr. GARDINER: It would not even be discussed in a directors' meeting.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it depends entirely upon the kind of business of which a man is director and his conception of his duties as such. I ask again, why has this committee been destroyed, and I have no answer beyond the statement that it has not been, and then the statement that it has been and that they can replace it in twenty-four hours. Do we want to make legislation ridiculous by wiping out the committee with one hand and putting it back with the other? That is the question.

Mr. YOUNG: It had not been my intention to say anything in the discussion of this bill, until this afternoon, when we heard what I consider to be an unwarranted attack on a gentleman who was formerly a member of this house, a man with whom I had the privilege of sitting in this chamber for many years, and who sat afterwards for five years later than I did. Mr. Vallance is a farmer. He was a homesteader. He was living in an area of the country affected by this legislation. He is a man probably as well acquainted with the work that is being undertaken as any man in the area who could be selected. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) professes great personal regard for him; one might say, "greater love hath no man" than he expressed for Mr. Vallance. But apparently there was some other reason why Mr. Vallance would not be a fit and proper person to occupy that position, and that reason was given by the leader of the opposition, because he stated that Mr. Vallance was really a partisan. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated this afternoon, there is no man in Saskatchewan who has been more independent than Mr. Vallance in stating his views on all questions, whether within or without the house.

But let us assume that the reason given by the leader of the opposition is why he thinks that Mr. Vallance should not be chairman. I ask the leader of the opposition this question, has he been informed during this year by people in the area which Mr. Vallance has endeavoured to serve that they have found him to be an active political partisan, or has he been doing the work that is entrusted to him? I have been over that area; I have travelled hundreds of miles through that country, and I have yet to hear anyone make a suggestion that Mr. Vallance is playing politics in even the remotest way. On the other hand, I have heard from many that he is doing the job in the best way that it could be done. Is that the reason it has been suggested that he is not a suitable man for the work? Because a man sits in this house, is he thereby unfitted to occupy thereafter any position in the service of the government?

Let us look at the situation. I sat in this house with another gentleman, of whom I wish to say nothing but the most kindly things; he sat on the other side, and he was made deputy minister of Marine and Fisheries. I say nothing more than that.

An hon. MEMBER: Was he a fisherman?

Mr. YOUNG: I am not saying whether he was qualified or not qualified. I merely make that statement. During the last five years an hon. member occupied a seat on the Conservative side as a supporter of the leader of the opposition. Where is he to-day? If there is one appointment in the service of the dominion whose incumbent should be above political partisanship, it is that of a member of the civil service commission. The man to whom I have referred is a member of that commission. I am not stating that he is fair or unfair. I merely say that he holds that position and that he is a former Conservative member of this house.

A few nights ago, when the estimates of one of the departments were brought down, the leader of the opposition saw fit to remark that there was one official who apparently was not very well known to his minister. At that time the Postmaster General's estimates were before the committee. Every hon. member saw that the assistant deputy postmaster general was seated in front of his minister, and I think those who have been here for a number of years will recognize that we had in the person of that official one of the ablest men in the public service of Canada. I want to ask who appointed the deputy postmaster general, another gentleman who sat in this house on the Conservative side during the last five years as a follower of the leader of the opposition. Is the post office service in Canada an important service? I suppose there is no hon. member who will deny that it is one of the most important services carried on in the dominion. More than that, I believe every hon. member and every person outside the house will agree that one cannot become, without a great deal of experience, an efficient servant in a very important branch of the service. Yet we find that a former Conservative member of this house was placed, without having had any previous experience, in the important position of deputy postmaster general.

I come now to the tariff board, which is supposed to be of some service to this country, and what do we find there ? Another gentleman who sat in this house when I was a member. If I were to refer to him as a political chameleon, I believe I should be pretty accurate. No man knew where he stood. He was all things to all men.

An hon. MEMBER: Until the vote came.

Mr. YOUNG: Until the vote came. If one goes over the records of this house and parliamentary guide, one can find, as far as I have been able to discover, no other instance where a man represented himself to be a Progressive and added the words, "previously Liberal." Everyone knows that the hon. gentleman never was a Liberal, and had it been known in his constituency that he had been a Conservative all the time, he could never have represented it in this house. To what position was he appointed? To the tariff board. I say to this government that if there is anything more ridiculous that I can think of than their keeping a man of that type on the tariff board, I do not know what it is.

I am inclined to think the leader of the opposition does not really like Liberals. Before this house organized itself, there were a number of members who sat here for many years, and some of them occupied very important positions. They were known to have taken part in public life, and the very first thing we had, something I regretted very much and I have no doubt the right hon. gentleman regrets it to-day, was a serious reflection on the hon. gentleman who is Speaker of the house. The same thing is true with regard to yourself, Mr. Chairman, and now we find it true of our friend Mr. Vallance. I am not saying some of the gentlemen appointed by the right hon. gentleman were not honourable men, but it ill becomes the leader of the opposition to single out Mr. Vallance and hold him up to scorn because he once happened to be a Liberal, when the right hon. gentleman himself, if it was a crime to make such an appointment, was guilty of the same thing time and again. The discussion this afternoon has been unfortunate in some respects, but there is only one hon. gentleman in this house who is responsible for initiating that discussion and that is the leader of the opposition.

Mr. COLDWELL: Might we have repeated now the suggestions made by the Minister of Agriculture about two and a quarter hours ago? We ought to get back to the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: My suggestion was that we revert to section one of the bill, the new section 3 of the act, subsection one. I propose that it should read:

> The governor in council may establish one or more advisory committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

And the next subsection should read:

> One of the members of each advisory committee shall be appointed chairman thereof by the minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will there be one central committee? Will the chairman of the several advisory committees constitute a central committee? It seems to me it is important that there should be one committee responsible to the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There will be one central committee, but it may not necessarily be exactly the same personnel as the present one. There are obvious reasons for that. That committee saw fit to agree to there being at least two other committees, one being a committee to deal with water and another to deal with re-grassing. We desire to have that sort of committee appointed in the same way as the central committee is appointed to act. There is another committee that has been in existence. On this committee the three western provinces are represented. Only one exception could be taken to the appointment, following the remarks made this afternoon, and that is that Mr. Vallance was chairman of that committee. The provincial governments of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan have each a representative on that committee, and that committee is a much smaller one and can be got together more easily than a committee spread all over Canada. If there is any objection at all, it can be only with regard to that one committee. I believe all the members of that committee are employees either of the dominion government or of one of the provincial governments. Mr. Charlesworth of Alberta, Mr. M'Gavin of Saskatchewan and Mr. Attwood of Manitoba I think are on that committee, and these men were all originally members of the staff of the Interior department at Ottawa. Mr. Vallance simply sits as chairman at meetings which are held for the purpose of discussing the activities of the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these to be regional committees or will they have charge of various phases of the work? The minister mentioned the question of water, for example.

Mr. GARDINER: In checking the matter up since last evening and discussing it with officials who have been more closely connected with the administration than I am personally, I am informed that what was said a few moments ago by the leader of the opposition is correct, that so far as the voluntary committees in the country are concerned, no legislation is required, and we do not desire to have the authority to name the chairmen of these committees. They are named by the farmers themselves.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it that the amendment is that the word "advisory" shall be inserted before the word "committees" in the eighth and eleventh lines.

Mr. LAWSON: Listening to the amendment proposed by the minister, I suggest that all it accomplishes is to change the name of the committee. It makes no change in the principle of this section of the present bill as originally introduced by the minister. Does the minister agree with me?

Mr. GARDINER: It changes it to this extent, that we cannot appoint an administrative committee under this section. I take it that one of the objections of the leader of the opposition was that we should not have administrative committees appointed in this way.

Mr. STEWART: I listened with a good deal of interest to the minister this afternoon, and, when he finished, the situation seemed to me to be very much confused. One part of his argument seemed to me to prove that all that was being done under this act had been undertaken, was initiated, or was under way, and that this act was unnecessary to accomplish what was being done under it. He went away back into history, starting at the beginning, to tell what had been done by the provinces and the organizations they had set up, and in my opinion he minimized the value of this act. In fact, he almost led me to conclude that he ought to be asking for the repeal rather than for the amendment of the act.

This act was drafted with great care and a special advisory committee was set up. We have asked the minister on different occasions to give us the names of those who were appointed to this committee. We have not received that information and I repeat the request. On the other hand, when we make reference to the report of this advisory committee, we find that a great deal has been accomplished, that it has really done wonderfully well in the short time of its existence. The act was not passed until April, 1935. Evidently some things that were done in 1936 could not have been undertaken in 1935 owing to the lateness of the season—seeding and that sort of thing. Then again it was necessary to have the committee organized. All that had to be done in 1935. Really I think the committee has accomplished a very satisfactory result. Its activities were based upon this act and upon the provisions of the Supplementary Public Works Construction Act of 1935. So, on the whole, I think this committee of the whole must come to the inevitable conclusion that the results of the legislation have been very creditable, very satisfactory indeed. Then the question naturally arises, why make any change when so much has been accomplished by the machinery which has been set up. It is not suggested that two committees can do more than one. In fact, there is likely to be confusion, conflict and division of responsibility. Under the act as it at present exists, there is no difficulty in subdividing the advisory committee by regulation or otherwise, and having the members undertake special studies of any particular subject. I should like the minister to give the names of those who are on the advisory committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Doctor E. S. Archibald, Ottawa, chairman, Dominion Department of Agriculture; James H. Girvin, Medora, Manitoba grain growing farmers; Olaf Nyland, Shaunavon, Sask., Saskatchewan grain growing farmers; P. C. Colquhoun, Maple Creek, Sask., Saskatchewan live stock farmers; Leonard Koole, Monarch, Alberta, Alberta grain growing farmers; R. P. Gilchrist, Wild Horse, Alberta, Alberta range farmers; Professor J. H. Ellis, Winnipeg, government of Manitoba; Dean A. M. Shaw, Saskatoon, government of Saskatchewan; O. S. Longman, Edmonton, government of Alberta; E. W. Jones, Calgary, Canadian Pacific Railway Company; Doctor W. J. Black, Montreal, Canadian National Railways; F. J. Freer, Winnipeg, mortgage companies of Canada; Doctor E. S. Hopkins, Ottawa, Dominion Department of Agriculture; B. P. Alley, Toronto, Canadian Bankers' Association.

Mr. Alley was the only member of the advisory committee unable to be present. There were others present at the meeting, but those are the members of the committee.

Mr. STEWART: I think the reading of that list of names is sufficient to convince the committee that it is a thoroughly representative, non-political, efficient and capable committee. I do not think the minister for a moment contends that he can improve upon the personnel or nature of the committee. He has given no good reason why this committee which has accomplished so much should be set aside. The minister says, "I may reappoint them." But why set them aside if he intends to reappoint them?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I stated more than once yesterday that I have no present intention of having any different central committee from the committee named. But there is the possibility that I may have to appoint someone else because of the wishes of some members of this committee, in view of the work which is to be done this spring.

Mr. STEWART: Does the minister contend that under the legislation as it exists, he has not the power to fill any vacancy?

Mr. GARDINER: No, but I contend that this summer we may be doing something so related to some of these organizations as to make their representatives desire not to be on an advisory committee in connection with it.

Mr. STEWART: The minister is crossing a bridge long before he comes to it.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, I shall come to it.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, I think the minister is anxious to get to the bridge, but his statement indicates that he is setting out to cross it before he arrives. He suggests that possibly some of these men may not be willing to act, but surely it would be time enough—

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it may be the other way around; I may not wish them to act. I am sure if those conditions arose, they would not wish to act. The railway companies still have considerable interest in lands all over that country; the banks have an interest in lands all over that country, and so have the loan companies. Surely it is not contended that if we should be dealing with the resettlement of people on lands in which the banks and railways and loan companies have an interest, their representative should be on the advisory committee in connection with those activities. There is the possibility that we may not wish them to be on it, and the possibility that they would not wish to be on it. We wish to have power to change if we desire.

Mr. STEWART: The minister has it now. Can the minister suggest any gentleman more capable of giving good advice than say Doctor W. J. Black—

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. STEWART: —who is familiar with the development and has long been associated with settlement work. Surely the magnitude of the interests of these corporations justifies their being represented on the committee. And the basis upon which I take it other members are appointed to this committee is that they are interested in and affected by the work of the committee. Why should not the railways and the mortgage companies, which have a very substantial interest, be represented on the committee in common with those who have equal interests and must be just as much concerned in the proper development of that part of Canada as any citizens? They have a special interest and a general interest.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no objection to any of these men individually. For such work as I have been speaking of, there would, I think, be no desire whatever on the part of either the individuals concerned or myself for any change. But if we do start the kind of work I outlined a moment ago, I think both those organizations and the department would desire to have a different type of advisory committee. We might want to have represented on that committee the municipal organizations, if we are going to ask such organizations to cooperate with us. If dealing with lands which really belong to the people named here, I think it would be advisable to have on the committee, say the representatives of the municipalities rather than the representatives of these companies. We would be sitting around a common table discussing what we are going to do; when we get to a certain point we may want to discuss the matter with the advisory committee, and you have on the committee the same individuals as you have represented in your discussions. That condition might easily arise under the arrangement in the present act.

Mr. LAWSON: I want to come back to the question I raised with the minister before in respect to the proposed amendment. He pointed out that his amendment would have the effect of confining the activities of the committee to be appointed to those of an advisory nature. I sent for the act, and I direct the attention of the minister to section 7, which provides that:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

That is a very broad omnibus section which, I submit, would entitle the government, by order in council, to vest in the committee any power which it desired within the ambit of the statute. Merely changing the name of the committee by inserting the word "advisory" will not accomplish the purpose which he ostensibly desires to accomplish, and which he says he desires because of a defect in the amending statute, as pointed out originally by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, there is section 5, which pretty well takes care of what the hon. member has in mind. It states:

> No member of the committee shall receive any payment or emolument for his services, but he shall be repaid all actual reasonable travelling or other expenses in connection with the work of the committee.

Mr. LAWSON: No, no; I have not anything of that kind in mind. I have in mind what the minister said he wanted to accomplish.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not my suggestion, at all.

Mr. LAWSON: May I make myself clear, because I think the minister misunderstands me. I shall try to do it briefly. The minister proposed an amendment to the bill—

Mr. GARDINER: No, I did not; it is proposed from the other side of the house, and I am trying to amend the bill to suit them.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; that is not what I proposed, at all.

Mr. LAWSON: I shall have to go over the subject in greater detail. Yesterday the leader of the official opposition suggested to the minister that his bill, now before the committee, should be constructed and worded so as to accomplish a certain purpose. The purpose was that the committees to be appointed should be limited to being advisory committees. To-day the minister says he will do this by amending the name of the committees, by calling them "advisory committees." The point I am trying to make is that the amendment will not accomplish the purpose the minister himself says he desires to accomplish, in order to meet the point raised by the leader of the opposition.

I do not believe section 5 touches the point at all. I am not considering whether they can or can not be paid, or whether or not they receive travelling expenses. That is not the point. The point is this: Is it to be limited to an advisory committee, or is it to be a committee not limited to act in that capacity? I do not think the amendment accomplishes the purpose.

Mr. GARDINER: As I understand the discussion, advisory committees would be committees which we could call together from time to time, and from which we would get advice on policies we may have under consideration.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The principle of the bill as I understand it, as it was originally provided and finally became law, is that no member of the committee shall receive payment or emolument. I believe the intention was to get the type of individual who would give service of this kind without consideration. If the act is amended, as now suggested, and the committees are all made advisory committees, then each of them would be of that nature. That is the only change I see which would be made by adding the word. That is, we would be compelled to appoint men who would not receive pay for their positions, and would be called in merely for the purpose of giving advice.

Section 7 reads:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

That would apply to all the actual administration under the act. Under the act as it was originally passed, we are not bound even by the advice we get from these committees.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister, in the statement he has just made, has supported the very contention I am making. He said the regulations they could pass under section 7 would deal with the administration of the act. All right. Now that, he says, is something which he does not want the committees to have power to do, namely to perform administrative functions. He wants them limited to being merely advisory.

Mr. GARDINER: No, not—

Mr. LAWSON: And I say that because section 7 gives power by order in council to confer upon them administrative functions, he is not accomplishing the purpose his amendment is intended to accomplish. That is the only point I am trying to make.

Mr. GARDINER: I would prefer to have the bill as I introduced it yesterday. I do not think it has the weaknesses which have been pointed out. But in order to try to meet those who have been criticizing, I am prepared to insert the word "advisory," and to confine those sections of the act to an advisory committee. I do not think anyone would suggest that we could carry on the whole administration of the act under a committee of that kind, and ask them to do all the work in connection with it. The proviso would have to be in any act. I do not know how we would proceed if we took out section 7 and made the whole thing advisory. I do not see any difficulty about leaving section 7 in, and having these advisory committees to call in at any time so that we may discuss with them whether or not we are proceeding in the right direction.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not suggesting that the minister should take out section 7. I wish merely to put myself clearly on record to the effect that the amendment now proposed by the minister will not accomplish the purpose he would like to accomplish to please this side of the house, or to please anybody. I feel it my duty to call that to his attention.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will be good enough to look at his initial statement, he will observe that he said he desired to provide for the appointment of committees, other than advisory committees.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but my right hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the minister said.

Mr. GARDINER: But my right hon. friend has been trying ever since to convince me that that was wrong. Is he now going to condemn me for changing my mind on it, after three or four days of discussion?

Mr. BENNETT: I pointed out that section 7 was employed for that purpose, namely to appoint administrative committees, because section 7 provides for the appointment of committees to administer the act. This afternoon the minister takes that view, but he suggests that I was anxious to support the appointment of another advisory committee.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not my intention, at all. I would only have to point out that if the word "advisory" is put before the word "committee," it does not follow my suggestion. The effect of it would be to give a provincial bent to the operation of the committee, because if you are going to have more than one committee they may not agree on their advice. The whole theory was for one advisory committee, and to call all other committees you may like under section 7. The effect of the bill is to repeal section 3. It states, precisely:

Section 3 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, chapter 23 of the statutes of 1935, is repealed, and the following substituted therefor.

That is the position. The minister states he is trying to meet our views, but I am sure he is mistaken as to that because I never have suggested at any time that there should be two advisory committees.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not suggest that I am going so far as to cut it down to one committee, but I am prepared to make all committees advisory in the sense that the first one was advisory, and to have it controlled by the fact that we cannot pay them emoluments of office.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty I pointed out yesterday was that if you have more than one advisory committee your advice may not be the same. You have too much advice, because you have advice from several committees.

Mr. GARDINER: If I had been permitted this afternoon to read from the files I could have cleaned up that point. One of the first things the committee did was to recommend that two other committees be appointed.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is quite within his rights to read the minutes of the meeting. The fact that they are on the file has nothing to do with it; they are supposed to be somewhere else. But he should read the minutes of the meeting, if he so desires.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The business under private and public bills having been disposed of, the house will resume consideration in committee of Bill No. 18.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 18, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Duties of committees.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand that this clause is amended to read, "The advisory committees shall consider and advise"? Is that what is proposed?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the intention, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that that does something which I did not contemplate would be done, and which I hardly think anyone contemplated being done. This creates more than one committee of the same kind which may or may not give similar advice with respect to the problems to be considered. This creates a situation which I do not think the minister had in his mind and which I certainly did not have in mine. Will the word "advisory" be added before the word "committees" in the last line?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be added in each line where the word "committees" appears.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Committees.

Mr. STEWART: Is there an amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN: The word "advisory" is to be added before the word "committees" in the second line.

Mr. GARDINER: The word "advisory" is added before the word "committees" wherever it appears.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Appropriations.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition in connection with section 4 is that it should read in this way:

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure in each of the fiscal years from and including 1937-38, up to and including the fiscal year 1939-40 for the purposes of this act, such sum or sums as may be appropriated by parliament in each of the said fiscal years respectively, for said purposes.

That is, the words "from time to time" are to be added after the word "may" in the first line.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not quite sure that is the way in which the minister would desire to have it. I would think the proper phrasing would be:

> The governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure for the purposes of this act in each of the fiscal years—

That is, the expenditure would be authorized for the purposes of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no objection to that.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman's amendment is intended to make plain the normal procedure in such cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite. While the amendment is being prepared, I should like to make one observation with respect to the statements made to this committee this afternoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) with reference to a member of the tariff board. Mr. Campbell came into this house in 1921 as a supporter of the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). Mr. Campbell was then a Progressive and continued as such, so far as I know. I mention this merely because the records in the journals of the house do not indicate what has been said here. I understand the Minister of Mines and Resources is regarded as a Liberal and Mr. Campbell came into this house in 1921 as one of his ardent supporters and continued as such, so far as I know, until he was appointed to the position which he now occupies.

I may say that the attack which was made upon the deputy postmaster general could have been made with equal force upon the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier who appointed Doctor Coulter to the position of deputy postmaster general. Doctor Coulter was regarded as being a most efficient officer, although the same conditions as those to which reference has been made prevailed at that time.

So far as the civil service commission is concerned, it consists of three members and not one. I do not think the party predilections of the member who was appointed need be dwelt upon too strongly in the light of his speeches during the time he was in parliament. It was because he possessed certain academic qualifications and a certain independence of mind that it was thought he would make an admirable appointee, a belief which I think is shared by all who have any knowledge of the operations of the commission. In any event, this is not similar to the case which I was discussing, as would be apparent on the face of it.

I regret greatly the observations made with respect to the Speaker, but if similar circumstances arose again, as a matter of public duty I would have regretfully to follow the same course as I then pursued. I have no sorrow or regret for having done what public duty necessitated my doing on that occasion.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is trying to prove with respect to Mr. Campbell, now a member of the tariff board. If I did not make myself clear this afternoon. I should like to make another attempt this evening. Mr. Campbell came into this house as a Progressive from a constituency which had never elected a Tory. In the parliamentary guide it will be found that he states he was a Progressive and he then adds something that no other member of this house has ever added, namely, that he was previously a Liberal. Those of us who sat in this house during those thin years when we had not the majority we have to-day, have no doubt as to what his politics were when it came down to a close vote. No one knows that better than the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I dispute that and the journals show quite the opposite.

Mr. YOUNG: If the right hon. leader of the opposition does not know that, I think he is the only member who does not.

Mr. HEAPS: What has all this to do with the dry areas?

Mr. BENNETT: I was not in the house in 1921.

Mr. YOUNG: Further, Mr. Campbell was never opposed by a Tory at any time. With regard to the deputy postmaster general, may I say that I merely called attention to the fact that he had been a Conservative member of this house during the last parliament. Mr. Sullivan was appointed to a position which, in my judgment, calls for training in a particular work. I have yet to find one man either in or outside this house, unless it be the leader of the opposition, who approves that appointment. If the right hon. gentleman wants to know what the members of the Post Office Department from coast to coast think about it, he could make the same inquiries as he did about my friend Mr. Vallance.

I want to say one thing more about Mr. Vallance. I do not think I made any objection to the leader of the opposition attacking Liberals. He is well known for doing that at all times. But had he shown us that Mr. Vallance had been inefficient in his duty since being appointed; had he shown that he had been partisan in the performance of his duty since his appointment, then I could see some purpose in the right hon. gentleman's reference to this gentleman. As I listened, Mr. Chairman, I could not help recalling the saying about "Satan rebuking sin," and if there is one hon. gentleman in this house who should not bring up such matters it is the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. STEWART: What about the hon. member himself?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am going to make just one observation in reply. I was not discussing Mr. Vallance except to point out the effect on public opinion of such an appointment, in view of the fact that his predecessor was the manager of the demonstration farm at Swift Current and was doing this work as part of his ordinary duties. This position now carries $4,000 per year, which, compared with the salary paid to Doctor Archibald, gives some indication of what the general situation is.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand that the minister is going to set up a number of committees. I should like to ask him to what extent the expenses of these committees will prevent them from reaching the proposed objective. Of course, certain sums of money will be devoted by parliament for certain projects, and these committees will entail a certain amount of expenditure. Would the minister give us some estimate of what that will be?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: The original committee met only twice, and the expenses were for railway fares to the point of meeting and hotel expenses. The expenses, I imagine, would be very small, but I believe these committees will be called oftener if set up in the way we suggest. The expenses might be a little more, although in all probability they would not, because the distance the members would have to travel would be much less.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I was going to wait until the amendment was put, but as the discussion may get off on another tangent there are one or two things I should like to say now. First, I should like to associate myself with those who complimented the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) yesterday upon his presentation. I felt, however, that perhaps the financial commitments for which money would have to be appropriated by parliament had not been sufficiently emphasized in his presentation. I believe that the problem which we face in western Canada is much greater than most of even the members of the House of Commons realize, and that it will entail the expenditure of a great deal more money than many expect.

I have in my hand a copy of the report which was made by those who conducted the soil survey in the province of Saskatchewan, and to which reference has frequently been made since this legislation was introduced. They state, and quite accurately, that even a casual view of the land situation in western Canada will show that not all the land settled is fit for the plough. The minister made that very clear yesterday.

I should also like to put before the house, and on record, the classification that is made in this soil survey of the lands largely in the area to which the minister referred yesterday, although this area takes in a little more land as the line runs horizontally through Prince Albert and then south to the international boundary. The surveyors divide the soil into six groups, and give the percentages in each area. They classify as superior soil 7·1 per cent of that area, and included in that superior soil area is the district which I have the honour to represent and the district around Regina, Melfort and one or two other areas. The next classification is: (2) Very good, 5·9 per cent; (3) moderately good, 16·9 per cent; (4) fair, 25·4 per cent. The point I am making is this, that fair land, and land better than fair amount to 55·3 per cent of that area, while land that is poor or very poor amounts to 44·7 per cent of the area. Of course, not all that poor land or very poor land is settled, but a great deal of it is.

I am going to ask the minister what responsibility the department is going to assume for the continuance of these soil surveys and for making the chemical analysis which I think ought to be made, because, as all of us who come from this area know, you cannot say that any particular area is all bad, since there are variations within any given area.

I am disturbed, too, by the fact that a number of new settlers have gone into the north country and settled on land which is deficient in certain chemical constituents. There is that deficient whitish soil, for instance, that we see in that north country. It seems to me that we have to face this problem in a larger way than we are inclined to do at the present time.

There is one other table which I should like to place before the committee, and that is a summary of the surveys made of farm income on this land, with its varying types of soil. According to the farm management department of the university of Saskatchewan, a farmer on the superior soil operating a half section of land could have in an average year a net income of between $307 and $516, and on a section a net income of from $1,280 to $1,588. On the moderately good soil his income would range from as low as $4 on a half section to as high as $262, and on a section from $547 to $859. On the poor soils at the end of the year the farmer would find himself with a net loss of $10 on a half section and an income of $523 on a section. But on the very poor soils the farmer simply cannot live on a half section.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Are those figures after all living expenses, clothing, food, and so forth, and wages are taken out?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not wages.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Wages for his help?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not wages for hired help, and not wages for any member of the family, but the figures include living expenses, which run roughly—I have not the exact figures before me—from seven to eight hundred dollars a year, according to the locality.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Did not the hon. member say that it was net income?

Mr. COLDWELL: This is net income after living expenses only have been taken out. There is no allowance in these figures for interest, no allowance for wages for the family or for the hired man, and nothing for replacements. I think these figures will be found in bulletin No. 64 of the university of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it not presupposed that the family is large enough to require no hired help?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would not say that, but it is anticipated that the farmer would be able to get along with the help he had around him; that is true. On the other hand, I am pointing out that nothing is allowed for wages for that family, and the living expenses figure out at about $700 or $800 a year, as the case may be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): May I ask the hon. member whether these figures represent an average over a period of years or are they for one year?

Mr. COLDWELL: A period of years.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): For what period?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the surveys were made at different periods.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it was ten years.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe that 1910 to 1914 was taken as the basic period and—the minister can correct me if I am wrong—that 76 cents per bushel for No. 1 Northern on the farm was the basis of the wheat price that the university used.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Seventy-seven cents.

Mr. COLDWELL: Seventy-seven cents. Thank you. Seventy-seven cents was the basic farm price of wheat. What I am pointing out is that on poorer lands the farmers cannot make a living, and something will have to be done in order to enable them to make that living.

The other afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) mentioned the success achieved at the Matador ranch. That ranch happens to be in my constituency, and it is performing a very useful function for the farmers of that locality. But let me point this out, that the Matador ranch has not been broken up. It still retains the original prairie sod, and many of the lands which we have been discussing and are stating might be used for pasturage in the future, will take a long time—

Mr. DUNNING: Much of the Matador has no sod at all. I have been over it many times.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is quite right. Quite a bit of it is stony.

Mr. DUNNING: And sandy.

Mr. COLDWELL: And sandy, yes. I think it requires about forty-six acres to maintain a single animal on that piece of land. Nevertheless the ranch performs a very useful service to the community. In the rehabilitation of much of this land the problem will be to grow grass again, and in my opinion that will take a considerable length of time. It may come naturally, by the weeds holding the soil together and forming something of a cover for the growth of grass later. But the point I am making is this, that I think this committee should support the minister in any reasonable request he may make for funds for this particular purpose. I do not believe the condition can be exaggerated, and unless we are prepared to rehabilitate this area, the entire economic life of this dominion will suffer. As was said the other afternoon, it is not a local but a national problem.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, just a word with respect to the use of figures which are so discouraging as those quoted by the hon. member. Without at all disputing their accuracy in portraying what they purport to portray, I am always a little doubtful about the value of such generalizations as they represent. I might illustrate by saying that the soil report to which my hon. friend referred, and referred quite properly and accurately, relates to all of the area in Saskatchewan south of Prince Albert. May I suggest to him and to any practical farmer in the house that what is poor land in northeastern Saskatchewan, will have, by reason of the extra rainfall which that part of the province gets, a greater productive capacity than very good land in a district which does not receive sufficient rainfall.

Mr. GARDINER: And lower evaporation.

Mr. DUNNING: And the advantage of lower evaporation. It happens that my farm is shown on this soil survey map as consisting to almost half its extent of what would be called good land, and of almost half of only very fair to poor land. I know that the poor land on my farm, were it located in southwestern Saskatchewan, by reason of the difference in the rainfall would not produce what it produces in the Yorkton district of Saskatchewan. It is just an illustration I am endeavouring to give of how easy it is to go wrong when basing one's ideas upon the necessarily rather broad generalizations of an examination of that kind. I think the same may be said with respect to the economic survey. We all are familiar with farmers in poor districts who have good incomes, and we are all familiar with farmers in good districts who have poor incomes. We must allow for the wide variation in the human factor. Personally I am one of those who believe that while governments can cooperate, as we are now proposing still further to cooperate, in the solution of these problems, the real working out of them will be based upon the intelligent application by the individual farmer on his own farm of the information which is made available to him either through this source or through the agricultural colleges or other scientific institutions which are working on the problem. More of our western problems have been solved during the last forty years by intelligent work by individual farmers on their own farms, the knowledge of which work gradually extends through the community and by and by throughout the whole west, than by any other means. I take it that this rehabilitation proposal in so far as it relates to that phase of the problem is intended to make available the practical knowledge to the greatest possible number of farmers in order that they may work out their problems intelligently on their own farms. And may I say that I know of no better man as the active head of that sort of work than a practical farmer like John Vallance, who knows the men, who knows the soil, who knows the conditions, and who is in the work with his whole heart.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I agree absolutely with what the Minister of Finance has said, and I do not take issue with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, because he did not have in front of him the document about which he was speaking. I have in my hand the document issued by the department of farm management for Saskatchewan, covering a survey of several years. The years 1910 to 1914 were taken as the base years for price. In central Saskatchewan the average price of No. 2 northern wheat during the five years was about 77 cents per bushel. But in referring to the figures on income and otherwise of farms, I do not think it would be fair to let the impression go out to members of this chamber or to other parts of Canada that this is a hopeless proposition, because everything depends upon weather conditions in this territory and economic conditions elsewhere.

Table 1A, which is the first table given in the management book, refers to inferior prairie soil, and the figures provided therein are cash figures. Farm living expenses in cash are allowed on behalf of the farmer and his family for groceries, meat, light and fuel, furnishings, clothing, health and miscellaneous, a total of $708. Everyone knows that on any farm in Canada—I think I am safe in saying on any—many items are available for living purposes that do not have to be paid for or accounted for in cash. But these are farm living expenses in cash on one-half section lands, chiefly sandy and gravelly, with rolling topography, and subject to frequent loss of crops, particularly from drought. These are the poorest lands dealt with, and the sort of lands, I take it, as to which the minister would like to see a change in the location of the farmers living on them. These lands would not carry any principal or capital debt at all on the crops that the farmers were getting at the price I mentioned. In addition to the farmers' living expenses, paid in cash or allowed for, farm expenses in cash cover items such as the following: machinery repairs; gas and oil and grease; blacksmithing; building repairs, 1 per cent of value; paint and painting; fences new and repairs; small hardware; fire insurance; threshing; twine; telephone; breeding fees; taxes and miscellaneous expenses. No car expenses, but horse expenses have been provided for conveyance, and no labour expenses have been provided because these costs are on a basis of a family of four adults to the half section farm and it was not considered that on a farm of that type much hired help would be needed outside threshing.

The same type of land on a section farm would carry a debt, amortized in a period of twenty years, at six per cent, of $3,062, which would amount to $10.07 per acre of crop land or $4.78 on land per acre over the whole of the section. It is not anticipated that on land of this kind a very large percentage will be under cultivation, and that is why its debt carrying capacity is so low.

Coming to the next type of land, mixed soils with "burn-outs" or clay spots frequent, and on which wheat production is generally problematical, after allowing for living expenses totalling $708 and farm expenses, cash, amounting to $348, we find there is a deficit in the cash requirements. But even on a section farm there would be a deficit. This is poor soil. Taking average prairie soil, mixed textured soils, principally loams, undulating to rolling, with varying amounts of stones, sloughs and waste, and subject to considerable variation in crop yields, we find an allowance of $719 for farm living expenses, cash, and $489 for farm expenses in cash, leaving a net cash income of $228, and a net income of $42, after taking into account many charges in addition to those I have given. This land would carry a principal debt of $482 per half section, according to this calculation. On a section of such land, however, because of the larger income and the relatively lower expenses the debt capable of being amortized in twenty years at six per cent would be $8,086.

As we get into the better lands, though still very much in the drought area, fair to good southern park lands, we find that on a half section, using these figures as the basis of calculation, there could be carried a principal debt of $1,208 amortized in twenty years at six per cent, and on a section of such land it is calculated that a principal debt of $9,130 could be carried. In all the section farm figures there is provision for labour, but on the half section farms there is not.

As regards fair to good eastern park lands, average northern park lands, mixed textured soils, and silty clay loams, moderately free from obstructions, producing high yields of wheat and other crops, and heavy clay land which is the choicest wheat land of Saskatchewan, the figures are all set out in this pamphlet. But even on the poorest types of land, according to this survey, in reasonable years under reasonable weather conditions and at prices we regard as very moderate—77 cents for No. 2 northern wheat—there was at that time a possibility of the average farmer having $700 to spend in living expenses in addition to what he took off the farm in kind, besides maintaining machinery, buildings and so on.

It is well known that much land has been settled which should not have been settled had we known then what we know now, and I am satisfied that it is one of the objects of the rehabilitation board, as the minister said the other day, to get some of this land out of cultivation. The area under the plough in many of these lands was small in comparison with the total area of the farm, and on the poorer lands there is a possibility, indeed a probability, that many farmers would not have a half section but a section. As men have moved away, naturally more land is left to be divided among those remaining, and where land will not carry a heavy capital debt or, in some cases, any debt at all, it is comparatively easy for those who remain in the district either to obtain ownership of the land surrounding them and now vacant, or, if they cannot get the ownership, to get the use of it.

I would say one word about the poorer white clay soils of northern Saskatchewan. I know they are not so good in some respects as the lands around them. But they are not as poor as a stranger might imagine by looking at them. They have been under bush for a long time and snow and water have lain there much longer than on the surrounding lands, with the result that more of the mineral content has leached out. But if I were to tell the committee that in northeastern Saskatchewan some of these white clay lands produced last year cash incomes of around $100 an acre, the statement might be received with some incredulity, or I might be asked to give further explanation. The explanation is simple. It may be that these lands will not produce heavy crops of wheat or coarse grains, but they are suitable for alfalfa, which is now grown to a considerable extent in northeastern Saskatchewan. The farmers there began growing this crop only a few years ago and last year the yield was from 400 to 800 pounds per acre and sometimes more than that. At 23 cents per pound for No. 1 registered seed, with two cents allowance for handling by the cooperative selling agency, leaving a balance of 21 cents net, it will be seen that a crop yield of four, five, six, or seven hundred pounds and sometimes more than that makes it possible to secure $100 per acre income off these alfalfa lands. I do not say that this would cover the acreage of these farms, because not many acres are yet under cultivation. But it is probable that in that section are the best alfalfa seed lands to be found on this continent. How long that will continue I do not know. Many of the lands that have been under cultivation for some time and that are being put under cultivation now have not always been used to the best advantage. New uses are to be found for them, and I commend this to the attention of the rehabilitation board. I suggest that they should pay particular attention to getting these lands under some type of crop, whether grass or grain or legume, that will be more suitable to the land itself, to the climatic conditions and to the other needs of the district. I believe the rehabilitation board can do important work in that regard. Experiments have been going on for a good many years with crested wheat grass. The former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) began using crested wheat grass in an effort to restore prairie soil and before his time his predecessor the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) was engaged in similar work.

Let me say one last word. In my opinion the rehabilitation board might well devote some time and money to trying out seeds from other parts of the world which seeds have been found to be successful under conditions at least as unfavourable as we have in western Canada. There are parts of northern Russia and Siberia, possibly in South America and high Asia, that have made possible a reasonably prosperous type of agriculture. The Department of Agriculture of the United States has been importing some of these seed grasses, legumes and other farm products for many years, but much of the work they have done has been lost because these things have been pigeonholed. Every once in a while some new scientist, on the principle that a new broom sweeps clean, takes the packages out of these pigeonholes and makes use of them. Crested wheat grass was introduced in the United States forty years before it was tried out in Canada.

I might mention something I saw last year. I saw trucks coming from Minot, North Dakota, running day and night, hauling seed of crested wheat grass, sweet clover and alfalfa and other seeds from northern Saskatchewan back to the Dakotas and probably Montana where crested wheat grass had been left lying idle for so long.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quite agree with the hon. member for Melfort in his description of the district he represents. The figures I was using were for the poorer types of land, and speaking from memory I think he pretty well substantiated the figures I used. I think it is true that we in western Canada have in days gone by drawn a picture which was a bit optimistic, and at present perhaps we are inclined to be too pessimistic. We have to try to strike a happy mean. But it is of no use, however, closing our eyes to the tremendous difficulties facing the Department of Agriculture in the southern part of the province. In the northeast it is a different story on account of the rainfall, but in the southwest and the extreme south the outline given of conditions by the hon. member and myself is, I think, substantially correct. If one looks over the income tax returns which were quoted yesterday, it will be seen, for example, that for the year 1932-33 only thirty-two Saskatchewan farmers paid income tax; in the following year twenty-nine; the next year, thirty-eight, and last year, ninety-six. That gives a pretty fair picture of conditions. The same thing is shown by the number of lapsed life insurance policies. The point I am trying to make is that this is a big problem, and any expenditures made by this government will be approved by the people of western Canada.

Mr. FAIR: Having listened to the debate to-day, I have been wondering whether there is any province in western Canada but Saskatchewan. We must remember that either east or west of Saskatchewan there is a province with practically the same conditions existing. So I ask that those two provinces be not forgotten. While I do not agree with the minister in everything he says and does, I have to compliment him very highly upon the comprehensive and able report which he gave on this matter yesterday. I do not think anyone could make a much better job of it, and if he goes through to the end as he has started I think members of all parties will praise and congratulate him and the government of which he is a member.

I do not live in the dry belt, but a considerable portion of Battle River constituency is in that belt. So far we in the northern end of the constituency have been fortunate enough to have a little moisture. Last year our average crop in the northern end ran eight or nine bushels of wheat and ten bushels of oats to the acre. That, as hon. members will admit, is not very high, and even with good prices farming is not a paying venture. And this, I may say, is a pretty high estimate for the average in the northern part of the constituency, while in the southern part I know of thousands of acres where a binder has not been taken this year. In other parts they got one or two bushels, and where I live we got around eight bushels. Several problems have to be dealt with there. One is the feed situation during the winter. In the early part of the winter we felt that matters were going to be all right because we had a late open fall. But since then the west has experienced a lot of cold, and heavy snowfalls. This has brought about a serious condition for those who are short of feed, which means practically everyone in that dried-out district. How to put in a crop in the spring is one of their problems now, and I wonder whether it is not possible under this scheme to supply fuel oil so that tractors may be used instead of horses. I make this suggestion so that the minister, following the good start he has made, may consider it. I am not making it for myself; I was lucky enough—if I may put it in that way—to have enough frozen grain in 1935 stacked up to carry me over last year too. Otherwise, as far as oats are concerned, I would be in exactly the same position as those in the southern part of the constituency.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Following the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in which he said that we have perhaps been too optimistic in the past and now are getting pessimistic, I should like to say the same is true as far as what is known as the drought area is concerned. I think many people in Canada, and probably many members of the committee, have not a proper idea of that section of the country. There is plenty of good land in that area, although much land has been settled there which should not have been settled for grain growing. The governments of this country were responsible for that. But in that part known as the drought area we must remember that there has been settlement for only a short time, and that many people who went there to settle went with very little capital. Some of them were not farmers. When they first settled in there, they were able to break only a very small part of their land, on which they had a good crop at that time. The next year they would have a little more broken, and again they had a good crop. They went on breaking more and more of their land, and people who were selling lumber for buildings, selling machinery and all those things that farmers there needed, believing that it was a good part of the country, allowed considerable credit to the farmers there. These farmers went on to break up their whole farm and put up buildings and buy machinery on credit, and then a drought period hit them before they had a chance to take a good crop off the whole farm or a large proportion of it. Had they been able to get a good crop on a large acreage for some years prior to the drought period they would have been able to come through some bad years, perhaps not six years, but the larger part of it, without a great deal of help from the government. The government has tried to help these people through this time of stress.

Conditions will not always be what they have been recently in that part of the country. There have been droughts there before, extending over a period of five or six years, but that was at a time when that part was not settled, and therefore no one was greatly hurt by it. But if the people on the good lands in the drought area are held there and assisted by the government under this rehabilitation scheme to carry on, they will no doubt come to a period in which there will be sufficient rainfall, and with sufficient rainfall, that portion called the drought area will produce large yields of grain of the very best quality. If these people are helped through this period, we shall probably find that ten years from now in that part of the country they will be producing many, many millions of dollars worth of purchasing power for the benefit of eastern as well as western Canada. We shall find that although we have spent a considerable sum of money in endeavouring to help the people in that part of the country, the dominion as a whole will be well repaid for the money spent.

Mr. EVANS: I have sat patiently for two days listening to the discussion of the rehabilitation measure. Fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be, I happen to be the representative of a large portion of the district which has been under discussion, and in which the rehabilitation plan is working.

About thirty years ago as a young man I went into the district, at a time when the early settlers were coming in. At that time I remember the criticism of the old timer was that the federal government of that day had allowed such a great portion of the land to be settled by farmers. I remember, too, that the then provincial member for the constituency of Maple Creek, known in those days as Fighting Joe Wiley, did make representations to the federal government in which he pointed out that a mistake was being made in permitting the settlement of large areas in the southwest section of the country.

Possibly at this time it might be well to give a bird's-eye view of what our southwestern country looks like. As the minister so ably pointed out yesterday, the southwest is a plains area down the centre of which is a row of hills extending from the Rocky mountains, in an easterly direction. These are known as the Cypress hills, and to a certain extent they are wooded. In the hills there are numerous small lakes and springs which are the sources of creeks and small rivers. These are being rapidly developed as irrigation projects by the water conservation and rehabilitation committee.

Irrigation is not unknown in the great southwest. For more than thirty years there have been small privately owned and operated irrigation plants. Just south of the old town of Maple Creek, which is so well known in the southwest, is a rancher who has had irrigation over his land for a number of years. In 1936, despite the dryness of the season, he had 200 acres of alfalfa under irrigation, and from that land he cut 750 tons of good alfalfa hay. I maintain that in the development of our irrigation projects in the southwest, if we do nothing more than make sure that we supply our ranchers, stock growers and small farmers with a supply of fodder sufficient to carry their cattle over the winter, the expenditure would be warranted.

Yesterday an hon. member from Alberta asked the Minister of Agriculture a question regarding feed. In the last ten days I have received several letters and telegrams from southwest Saskatchewan on this subject. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Agriculture, and he informs me that everything possible is being done to have feed shipped into that area. If each year we have to spend millions of dollars in shipping feed to that part of the country in order to keep the farmers' and ranchers' live stock through the winter, would it not be better business to spend an equal amount of money each year in the development of the great irrigation projects out there waiting to be developed. If people in eastern Canada would visit our great southwest and see the great developments which could be opened up, there would be no question about the house spending the the required amount of money each year.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post Office—Outside Service

Salaries and allowances, $16,713,338.50.

Mail services, including mail services by air, $14,520,000.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,004,600.

Mr. THOMPSON: I notice a large number of items appearing under this item, and I assume they are all under discussion. May I call the attention of the minister to the very unsatisfactory method of engaging rural mail carriers. It is well known that mail carriers in the cities and towns are paid salaries, and that the civil service commission make the appointments, selecting from the applications they receive those which, in their judgment, are the most suitable. I can never understand why in the country men are allowed to bid against each other, and why invariably the contract is given to the lowest bidder. In that way we get the man who places the lowest value upon his own labour. In these days, when a great many people are hard up, men are bidding against each other for these jobs until the point has been reached where bids are made away below proper values. I know of one rural mail route seven miles long now being operated for 87 cents per trip. I know of another one where $1,000 was being paid for a route twenty-two miles long. It was put up at auction some time ago and bid down for $480. Men cannot live on such wages.

Our government is making investigations into certain industrial plants, showing that great profits have been made and small wages paid. I do not think there is a more flagrant example of underpayment of officials than is to be found in the Post Office Department in connection with the rural mail carriers. There should be a minimum rate per mile for these rural mail routes. I admit that it may cost less to operate routes which lie along highways or in sections of the country where the roads are kept free of snow and where there are very good roads than it does to operate routes where the snow is not cleared and where the roads are not in good condition even during the summer time. I do not think any rural mail carrier in Canada should be asked to supply a horse and buggy and harness or a car for the delivery of mail at less than $50 a mile per year.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the hon. member mean the round trip?

Mr. THOMPSON: Yes, on the round trip. I know of instances where men have not been able to buy feed for their horses and keep them in condition to do this work. Quite often this job is looked upon as a sort of side line. I asked one man the other day why he had taken the contract at the rate he had and he told me that he was hard up, that he had had poor crops and was able to put a boy just out of school on the route where he could earn a little. These conditions should not exist and it is manifestly unfair to treat the rural mail carriers any differently from the carriers in the towns and cities. The men delivering mail are performing a very important duty in the community and they should receive at least a reasonable compensation.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, the matter that my hon. friend has brought up is not new by any means. It has been discussed for some years and was discussed at considerable length the other evening. I do not think I can add anything to what I said at that time. I assure him that I have as much sympathy for the rural mail carriers as has he or any other member of this committee. For years the law has been that contracts for over $200 shall be let by public tender after having been advertised. I do not know how any man can complain when he gets a contract at the rate at which he tendered for it. As I mentioned the other evening, there have been very few contracts let in the time that I have had something to do with the Post Office Department, without at least half a dozen men, either by correspondence or by requests through their members, seeking to obtain the contract at the same rate at which the lowest tenderer obtained it.

The hon. member speaks of $50 per mile, but that would be very much in excess of the present rate. Just the other day I had a most interesting interview with some representatives of the rural mail carriers' association. Some hon. members also attended that meeting. These men, all mail carriers, were a very fine type. Nearly all had been engaged in some other occupation before becoming rural carriers, some of them having been in two or three different occupations. Some of them had started out carrying mail by filling out a contract taken by someone else. In not one case that I know of has the contract holder been anxious to throw up his contract and go back to the job he had previously.

I say to my hon. friend, what I do not think I need to say to him, that for the past few years the men whose mail has been carried by these carriers have been working on their farms for less money, or at least not much more money than the carriers received. No doubt some of these mail carriers are fulfilling their contract at very low rates, but they have not been in nearly the unhappy position of some of the farmers to whom they are delivering mail. I am not attempting to say that we are paying the price which I think will be paid when times improve, because conditions always change when times get better. As farmers are able to make more on their farms, fewer of them will tender for these mail routes. Perhaps that condition will bring the remedy which, after all, would be the best remedy.

My hon. friend is too good a business man to argue for one moment that one could fix a minimum price which would be fair all over Canada. This is a country of varying climates and conditions. In some parts of it there is very little snow and that for only a short period of the year, while in other parts there is very deep snow for much longer periods. The only solution would be to attempt to fix a minimum rate for each district, and that would be almost impossible to do. I agree with what my hon. friend has said with regard to these men working for lower wages than are received in the cities, but the remedy which he suggests of a minimum price per mile would bring up the very question to which other hon. members would object, namely, to whom would the contract be given when half a dozen bid the minimum price?

Mr. THOMPSON The civil service commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It would be quite interesting to see the civil service commission sitting in Ottawa deciding as to who would get a route up in northern Alberta or away down in the county of Essex. I have nothing more to say. I do not think the plan my hon. friend suggests is at all feasible because there is as much difference between the various miles that a rural mail carrier travels as there is between the horses that cover the ground. There are no two miles the same, and each man, when he is tendering, has to judge for himself what price he considers will be of advantage to him if he should be so fortunate as to have his tender accepted.

[Mr. J. C. Elliott.]

Mr. THOMPSON: I cannot agree with what the minister says, and I think I made that clear when I said that each route should be judged on its own merits. I said that the cost of delivering the mail would not be as much on some roads as on others, for instance, on a highway that is kept ploughed in the winter time.

I can remember quite well when rural mail delivery was first started. When an application was made, a man was sent out from the department to go over the route before it was decided to start the service. I remember our good friend Mr. Coolican coming out to Almonte, and I drove him with a horse and buggy over the first rural mail route that was let. He examined the route very thoroughly, and I say that it would be quite easy to have every rural mail route examined and a price set for that route.

The minister also stated that the men could not be appointed by the civil service commission. I want to say that the appointments are made now right here in Ottawa. The applications are sent in here; the department decides who is to get the route, and it would be just as easy for the civil service commission to make the appointment. The lowest tenderer almost always gets the contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. THOMPSON: I have never yet known a mail route where the lowest tenderer did not get the contract. The appointment is made from Ottawa, and the department give the contract to the lowest tenderer. It would be just as easy for the civil service commission to do this, and I think these appointments should be made by the commission. I am not in favour of patronage, and I do not approve the manner in which these appointments are made now. I know that in the five years from 1930 to 1935, when the government I supported was in office, I was written to in every case when a rural mail contract expired, and asked whether I would recommend that it be renewed or new tenders invited. I shall tell the committee what I did. In those five years I never put one route up for tender. I did not care who the man was who had the contract, so long as he was doing his duty. I renewed them all because I am not in favour of a man putting up a mail route for tender simply because the present man on the route voted against him. I always felt that if the man was doing his duty and was being a good public servant, he had no right to be interfered with. But under the present system these men are at the mercy of the man who holds the patronage for the riding.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): My hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Mr. THOMPSON: I am not asked about these rural routes any more, but my opponent is, and he has stated that he has been tormented about them. He makes recommendations to the department that the same man have his contract renewed or that the route be put up for tender, but he has no say as to who shall get the route if opened up, because the department gives it to the lowest tenderer. He has the say as to whether the man who is already performing the service shall have his contract renewed. I think this is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. I say that $50 per mile even as a minimum would not be too much to pay for delivering mail on many of our country roads, and it would be quite easy to have each route considered on its merits.

Mr. BARBER: As the minister has said, this is a matter which has been before parliament for a number of years. The subject comes up almost every year. I agree that the ideal way would be to pay the men on a salary basis, but as the minister has pointed out, there are great difficulties in arranging that. It has also been suggested that we follow the United States system, where the postman is given a uniform and so much per mile per year for carrying the mail. This is, of course, something that we may look forward to having some day in Canada.

The last speaker (Mr. Thompson) brought to the attention of the committee a matter on which I had intended to say something, and that was the question of patronage. I noticed that when he made his statement about patronage, we heard "No, no" from a number of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I know that at present, some weeks before a contract is about to expire, a notice is sent to the member of parliament supporting the government or to the defeated candidate supporting the government. I received these letters myself for five years, and I have in my hand a copy of a letter which I have taken from my file, and which I think it would be just as well to put on record. The form is a long one. It winds up with No. 37. The letter is headed "Post Office Department, Canada," and there is a line for the date. The letter reads:

Dear Sir,—

Re,—

The contract for the above-mentioned mail service will expire on the (date) . The contractor is and the rate $ per annum.

Now listen to this:

The department considers the rate paid as reasonable and is prepared to renew the contract.

I should be glad of your advice as to whether it would be in the public interest to allow this service to remain with the present contractor, whose name is given, or whether you consider it would be in the interest of the department to invite tenders for a new contract.

I should appreciate your prompt reply.

Yours sincerely,
Chief Superintendent,
Air and Land Mail Services.

This is followed up after a certain length of time with another letter:

On the (date) you were advised that the contract for the above mentioned mail service would expire on the (date) . The contractor is and the rate $ per annum.

The department considers the rate paid as reasonable and is prepared to renew the contract.

I should be glad of your advice as to whether it would be in the public interest to allow this service to remain with the present contractor, whose name is given, or whether you consider it would be in the interest of the department to invite tenders for a new contract.

If I do not hear from you by (date) the department will take whatever action it may deem advisable.

During five years I received these letters, and I opened only one contract. The reason for opening that contract was that there had been complaints from patrons of the route. I went to the department and consulted with the officials, and they also had received complaints. I thought that the best thing to do was to open the contract, and we opened it. There were twenty-two who tendered for it; it was an important route. Twelve wrote to me and said they were personal friends of mine and expected me to get them the job. Of course I explained that under the act and regulations this was impossible, that the contract must go to the lowest tenderer. Since the election of 1935, my Liberal opponent has been opening every contract.

There was a contract in my town for carrying the mail from the railway to the post office, involving, I think, three trips a day. A returned soldier with a truck had been doing the work for about fifty cents a trip over a period of ten years. His contract expired each year. I received notice of this, and on each and every occasion I recommended renewal and it was renewed. But as soon as the government changed, my opponent opened the contract. Another man tendered at about thirty-five cents; secured the contract; the mail is carried to-day from the station to the post office and from the post office to the station in a one-horse conveyance commonly termed in my community "the Black Maria."

That is not all. In the case of another rural route service contract the courier who had had it for a number of years was backed by a petition signed, I believe, to the extent of one hundred per cent. The department had declared that it was satisfactory, but the defeated Liberal candidate recommended that it be opened, and it was opened. The result was that another man got the job. I think that has happened in connection with every contract which has expired since the 1935 election. The trouble is that under present conditions men are so anxious to get something in order to keep off relief that they will take a contract at almost any price, and the result is that by the time they have paid for their gas and oil, they have very little left with which to keep their families.

So I should like to suggest, since we criticize the department and the minister, that members of parliament and defeated candidates must take some of the blame for the conditions which exist in respect to the rural routes. That is only fair, because it is the practice of the department to send out these letters, and unfortunately it has also been the practice of certain men, either the representatives of the district or the defeated candidates, to take advantage of that system with the idea of placing in these positions some of their friends. I notice that on almost every occasion, however, they are just as badly disappointed as the other fellow, because it happens frequently that the friend does not get it. I suggest to hon. members that they could help materially in improving conditions if they would consent that where holders of contracts are giving satisfaction and the price is considered reasonable, the contract should be renewed direct by the department.

Mr. FURNISS: I should like to add a word to this discussion about mail routes. Since I have been elected I have had some experience with the establishment of several mail routes. I have also been approached by representatives of the rural mail carriers' association, and I intend to express myself in this chamber to the same effect as I did to them. They said that when a contract was thrown open, some person who knew nothing about the expense of carrying the mail bid the price down so low that there was nothing in it for any person. But this has been my experience. One contract was held for about twenty years at $948 per year, and the same man bid again at $480. If he was ignorant of the expense of carrying the mail on that route, it was his own fault if he bid too low.

I was also interviewed about this rate of $55 per mile that the association asked should be fixed for carrying the mail. The hon. member who has just spoken mentioned $50. I know I have succeeded in establishing several routes which would not have been established if the price had been even $40 per mile. In the back parts of the riding of Muskoka, where the roads are not good and travelling is difficult, I have had routes established and patrons all along the route have enjoyed the privilege of having their mail delivered close to their doors, which would not have been possible if the rate had been $40 per mile, and the person who got the contract at whatever price it was let was very glad to have that much ready cash coming in. The majority of the contracts that have been thrown open have been held for a long term of years. They were obtained when times were good and work plentiful and few people bid on contracts. Conditions have now altogether changed. Many men would like the opportunity to bid on contracts of long standing, and I think it is quite right that opportunity should be given them. I do not believe the fact that a man has held a contract for a long term of years at a remunerative price is any reason why he should retain the right to carry that mail all the days of his life.

Mr. TOMLINSON: The two hon. members on my left to whom I have just been listening are, certainly, innocence personified. During the last five years contracts were changed by the former government. Now that the government has changed, we are not allowed to alter contracts but the lowest tenderer must receive the contract. I know that some rural mail carriers are receiving but little and are working under conditions of hardship. But if an attempt were made to establish a minimum or to set a price per mile, I should have to ask that the contracts for some of the routes in Bruce, which I represent, should be let at a higher figure than for some of the other routes in the southern part of the province, and I agree with the Postmaster General that it would be impossible to classify these different mail routes to the satisfaction of the members of this house. If you classify them 1, 2, 3, and 4, how would you arrive at that classification? How would you satisfy the people concerned? One mail carrier would complain that so-and-so is getting more than I am, and therefore it is unfair. When we are asked to listen to talk about patronage and the opening of contracts, and when under this administration we must carry out the law, which the former administration did not do, I think it is time that those hon. members looked into their own party's record and found out their own guilt.

Mr. THOMPSON: I am surprised at the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I know as a fact that every man who held the patronage of my riding, under the late government and under the present government, is notified. I am not finding any fault with that, but I have not had a notice since the government changed; in every case it goes to my opponent. That is perfectly right. He gets the notices as to these contracts. The letter that was read by an hon. member a short time ago is the form of letter which is sent out, and the person is asked to recommend whether the rural mail route in question should be renewed or whether it should be put up for tender; it cannot be given to anybody. I have talked with officials of the department, and they told me that in no case did they give a contract to any person except the lowest tenderer, who must supply them with two sureties whom they approve. That is a mode of engaging mail carriers to which I very much object.

If the competitive system is such a splendid one and has as much merit as the minister suggests, why does he not apply it to other parts of the department? Why is it not applied to the whole civil service? I venture to say that if the duties now performed by civil servants were made a matter of tender you would have the work done for one-half of what it is done to-day, but you would not have efficiency. I am not in favour of it. I say, you would not have efficiency, but the salaries of civil servants would be cut down. In my opinion, it is unpardonable that the men who carry the mails in the country should be treated differently from those who carry them in the city. A salary should be set and the department should then select the carriers, taking the best men from among the applicants and not those who put the lowest value upon their services. This is an injustice to the people in the rural parts of Canada. I may say that I brought the matter to the attention of the late government of which I was a supporter and I was informed that they were willing to rectify it, because they saw it was wrong, but that the finances would not allow them to do this. That was the answer I received. Nevertheless it is an evil; it is a wrong that must be rectified in the near future.

Mr. HEAPS: Governments come and governments go, but I seem never to get any of these little notifications from the Post Office Department. Let me say I am extremely thankful that I do not get them. A good many other members have also something to be thankful for in the fact that they do not receive these notifications.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Has the hon. member any rural mail carriers in his riding?

Mr. HEAPS: There is a little rural section to it somewhere, but I do not know whether there are rural carriers there or not. I know that government is a difficult matter, but I wonder why there are different rules as between one department and another. In the Department of National Revenue contracts are let for the carrying of goods but no tenders are called for. The moment a Liberal government goes out and a Conservative government comes in, the Liberal who has been doing the job goes out and is replaced by a Conservative appointee. And when a Conservative government goes out and a Liberal government comes in, the Conservative contractor goes out and the Liberal comes in.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. member show me how he works that?

Mr. HEAPS: I suggest to the minister that he talk this over with the Minister of National Revenue, and I shall give him the facts and figures.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with rural mail?

Mr. HEAPS: No; I am speaking of contracts for the carrying of goods, exactly in the same way as there are contracts for carrying mails. The minister must not shake his head because I know the facts. I know the people who were let out last year and the people who came in, and they have been here to see about it. It was not many days after the new government took office before the good followers of the present administration came here to obtain contracts. I want to know why there is one method of doing business in one department and another method in a different department. The only thing I object to in the letting of contracts in the way I have mentioned, so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, is the patronage that goes with it. I do not like the patronage business, and I do not think there are many members who really care for it. In my opinion, it does not make many friends; it creates more enemies than friends, and those who are fortunate enough not to have patronage at their disposal are better off. What I am afraid of in connection with the Post Office Department is that if the work were done on the basis of so much for the job, putting it at a fair basis, there would happen in that department what has taken place in the National Revenue department. The moment one party went out of power the persons who had the contract would go out with the government and another lot would take their place.

The rural mail carriers are deserving of consideration, and it is not beyond the power of the Post Office Department to see that the persons who have these contracts for carrying rural mail receive something approaching decent remuneration for their services. If the Postmaster General believes that the tender system is the best one which can be devised for carrying mail, then I suggest that he use his influence with all other departments of the government and see that for similar classes of work similar tenders are called for.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I know my hon. friend does not intend to criticize this department for the sins, if any, of the other departments. We do pretty well if we defend ourselves. I want to point out, however, with regard to the difference between the rural mail carrier and the carrier in the city and the civil servant, that we have acts governing the manner in which these contracts shall be let, the Civil Service Act governing the way in which civil servants shall be appointed, and the regulations by which the civil service commission shall fix the salaries to be paid to the persons who fill various positions. On the other hand, Postmasters General under various governments, including the Postmasters General ever since we have had rural mail routes, have not found it possible to devise a plan that would better answer the requirements of the public and give fairer treatment to the people who tender than the present system as laid down in section 66 of the act, which provides that the contract must be given to the lower tenderer. And until the act is changed we have to follow that law. I am frank in saying that I do not see how you are going to make it any fairer. The same applies to various other contracts. It is not limited to rural mail contracts. The rural mail contracts are perhaps in a different category, and if there is anything in the tender system—and I believe there is a great deal in it—I think it is much easier to let contracts to the lowest tenderers than to start fixing a price and selecting, among a number of people who tender, the ones who shall do the work and the price at which they shall do it. But a great many of these rural mail contracts are performed by people who have little farms or garden plots or something of the kind, and the work does not take all their time.

To the gentleman who suggests a uniform rate per mile for all the contracts, let me point out that not only are there wide differences in the roads, whether they are paved or of mud, whether they are hilly or level, whether they are covered with snow for much of the year or open most of the year, but many of these are only ten mile contracts.

Mr. STEWART: And another factor is the train hours.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes. Are you going to fix the same rate for a ten mile contract as for a thirty-three mile contract? All these factors enter in. I am quite frank in saying that conditions among the rural people in recent years have been such that I think nobody has been getting proper pay for what he has been doing.

Mr. DUNNING: For anything.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. The farmer working on the land has not been getting anything like proper remuneration. He was a little better off than the poor fellow in the city who had to go on relief. But when men tender at the prices they do, it shows that they believe that is a little better than anything else they know of at that particular time.

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) commented on the fact that he used to get notices asking him, I assume, whether he would like to have such a rural route contract, and while he said he was not complaining that he no longer got such notices and invitations, I could not help thinking he would be better pleased if requests of that sort were sent to him from time to time. In view of the fact that I am in favour of as much harmony as possible, I should like to make a suggestion to the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) that hereafter he should send these notices to the hon. member or any other hon. gentleman who applies, the same as he sends them to those, we might say, on his own side of the house. In connection with that, however, I should like to tell briefly a story which harks back to the time when the women were demanding the franchise. One rather hard-boiled old fellow surprised everyone by insisting that he was in favour of giving women the vote. He said he could not see where it would do any harm; it would please them and he thought the government should give it to them. But, he said, the government do not need to count it. I think the Postmaster General could send out these notices, but he need not pay any attention to the replies.

To speak more seriously, and with particular reference to what has been raised here by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, he and I probably have quite a large number of acquaintances and friends in common, even though not voters in common. I do not think he was altogether fair in the statement he made, at any rate so far as it applies to his home area. I have watched very closely this matter of patronage and its operation in and about Winnipeg, and I must say that the changes which have been made there are very few. At the moment I cannot recall any, but I am confident that the total number could be counted on the fingers of my two hands, and in practically every case a reason entirely apart from politics could be assigned. I feel certain that is so, because while he is on one side of the political teeter, I am on the other, and I do not believe the changes that he is suggesting could have occurred without my knowing about it. When this argument developed this evening my colleague from Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) was sitting beside me and he asked me, "How many changes do you know about?" And I told him what I have just said. He replied that it was the same with him, and I hope he will not mind my reporting just what he said, as he lapsed into the vernacular. He said, "As far as our area is concerned it is a lot of hooey, and you know it as well as I do." That is just what it is as far as changes in and about the area from which he and I come are concerned. I am very glad that is the case. I do not want to get mixed up in patronage; I do not want to have anything to do with it; I would prefer to have all this sort of thing handled in some other way. When I am asked for advice—

An hon. MEMBER: You charge for it.

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, unfortunately we cannot do that with the government. As the hon. member who interjected that remark very well knows, as far as a lawyer is concerned charging for advice is a different thing from getting paid for it. However, when I am asked for advice on matters of this sort, I always think of the people behind the man who holds the job at the present time, his wife, his family; I am not concerned with switching work from one satisfactory person to another; I am concerned only with trying to see things worked out in such a way that all have work. I think the complaints in regard to patronage—I speak with reference to my own area—are greatly overdone. I am not advertising my own community as being purer than others, I fancy complaints about it all over the country are overdone.

I should like to obtain from the minister certain information with reference to this item 275. I notice that on the second page of this estimate there is the sum of $898,620 for the Winnipeg post office. Could the minister give the committee some break-down of that amount? Does it include the leases of various sub-post offices? Does it cover wages of all the employees in the post office there? Does it include the post office of St. Boniface, which is a separate city across the river, occupying about the same position in reference to Winnipeg that Hull does to Ottawa? Not in too great detail, but generally, what does this sum comprise?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Those amounts which appear the same for the coming year as they were for the last year, as this amount of $898,620, are for salaries and allowances for all of the staff. It does not include St. Boniface post office or any post office other than Winnipeg.

Mr. MAYBANK: What about the various leases of sub-post offices?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I take it the leases of sub-post offices are paid for by public works, entirely.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have been interested in listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), because I come from that locality, and should like to know all the particulars. If possible, I should like to learn from the hon. member the names of the parties to whom he referred, so that I might get the details.

We have heard a great deal about patronage. Undoubtedly patronage exists, and will continue to exist until the millennium. But if we must have patronage, I believe a well ordered and well organized political patronage is the least of the evil. We might have blood patronage, fraternal patronage, religious patronage or some other type which would be infinitely worse. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) referred to the merit system. Any labour man must know that the merit system did not work out to the satisfaction of the labourer, because we had not the right to pick the man who was going to say who had the merit. It all depends upon the point of view. In the discussion which took place this afternoon, different points of view were expressed as to whether or not a man had merit. In referring to the merit system, it is the point of view which rules. In order to do away with the merit system, labour men had to put in a seniority rule, because unscrupulous employers would place certain men at the top of the list, regardless of their merit. Doubless they had merit in the eyes of the men who put them there.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give a statement as to the present position of the trans-Canada air mail? I believe every hon. member is interested in the trans-Canada service. This service will be of vital importance to the nation, because most certainly it will draw the different parts of the country closer together. I should like to know when it is expected that part of the route from Vancouver to Winnipeg will be open, and also those parts from Winnipeg to Montreal and from Montreal to Halifax. In addition, would the minister give us some idea of the schedules, indicating the times which will be taken in flying the mail, and whether or not it will be a daily service.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): First of all, the trans-Canada air route is within the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). The question as to the arrangements made with the Post Office Department for the carrying of mail is a matter which has to be determined between the two departments. As yet, no arrangements have been completed. I believe the landing fields are fairly well completed. It is expected that when the service is under way, the mails will probably leave Montreal at the close of business in the evening and be in Vancouver the following morning for afternoon delivery. Of course, the matter is unsettled because the details are not yet completed. These are matters of government policy concerning which I know the hon. member would not expect me to make a statement, prior to official announcement. I believe an announcement would not be expected under such circumstances, even if the matter were confined to my own department, and in this instance to a great extent it comes under the Department of Transport. It is hoped that the service will be under way as soon as arrangements can be completed for carrying out the service in a way that the finances of the country will permit.

Mr. GREEN: Will part of the air route be opened this year. I understand the western portion is to be opened first, and different announcements have been made in the press. I was told last year in the house that the western portion would be opened by July of this year. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If the hon. member were told that—and I do not question it for a moment—it illustrates the danger of making prophecies far in advance in connection with matters of this kind. I am not in a position either to confirm or to deny the report. A number of questions of policy have to be settled before an announcement can be made as to the actual time of opening.

Mr. GREEN: Is any portion of this vote to be spent on the trans-Canada air mail service?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, $390,500. The total amount is $705,000. For 1936-37 the amount was $314,500, and in the present estimates it is increased by $390,500.

Mr. GREEN: For the trans-Canada air mail service?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): To help take care of it, yes.

Mr. GREEN: What air mail routes are now being operated?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I was asked that information by the hon. member for Yale, and I have in my hand a list of all the contracts. Unless the hon. member or any

hon. members of the committee are interested in a particular route, perhaps the best way would be to put it on Hansard, as I did last year.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes; that is the best way.

Mr. GREEN: Have any new routes been opened since last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: How many?

Mr. STIRLING: It will be helpful if the minister would do as he suggested, put the whole list on Hansard.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Does the hon. member wish merely to have it placed on Hansard, or does he wish it read?

Mr. STIRLING: Just put it on Hansard, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I believe the purpose would be served if we do as we did last year, namely, put the whole list on Hansard. The hon. member will then be able to see it and if there are any questions to be asked concerning it they may be asked on the supplementary estimates or on these estimates, if we do not finish to-night. The information is as follows:

Mr. GREEN: Last year most of the routes were in northern Canada. Can the minister state whether there has been an increase in the mail flown in the more thickly settled parts of the country?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The increase is to a great extent in territories which were otherwise inaccessible. I refer to mining areas, and districts of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: How much air mail goes out of Vancouver each day? I believe there is a very heavy air mail going out of that city.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Just a little over 32,000 pounds of mail goes out on the Vancouver-Seattle line.

Mr. GREEN: Is that per day?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is for the calendar year. There were 1,912 pounds carried on the Vancouver-Victoria route.

Mr. GREEN: Last year the statement was made that this air mail was carried at a profit to the post office; is that still the case?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not think that was the case with regard to inter-city services, but it is the case with regard to some of the new services.

Mr. GREEN: What about the air mail as a whole?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The outlay for air mail is included in our total outlay. New air mail services have been inaugurated to some places which otherwise would not have any mail service. The mail may be carried by air only a small part of the trip. The total amount expended was $274,183 and the value to the department of the mail carried was something like $605,000. I repeat again that in many instances the mail is carried by air for only part of the trip and that is the value of the postage which we receive.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose air mail service is much cheaper in the north than mail service by dog team.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Where there is a fairly large quantity of air mail being carried, such as into the newer places, it is pretty profitable. However, I would not say that it is cheaper than the service by dog team. The cost varies with every route, but as a rule, except for first class mail, we charge an accordingly higher rate on account of the extra cost of the service.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give the total amount of mail carried by air in 1936, 1935, 1934, 1933 and possibly 1931?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The mileage for the last calendar year was 884,263 and 1,153,812 pounds were carried at a total cost of $274,803.

Mr. GREEN: What are the figures for 1933?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In 1933-34 the vote was $300,000, of which $270,600 was expended. In 1934-35 the vote was $300,000, of which $275,386 was expended. In 1935-36 the vote was $323,650, of which $266,382 was expended. In 1936-37 the vote was $290,000 and the estimated expenditure is $284,000.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the figures of the mail carried in 1933, 1934 and 1935?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In 1932-33 there were 454,303 pounds carried; in 1933-34, 592,758 pounds; in 1934-35, 691,767 pounds, and in 1935-36, 1,189,982 pounds.

Mr. GREEN: How much mail would have to be carried on the trans-Canada air route in order to make it profitable?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not think anyone could make a very accurate estimate of what it is going to cost.

Mr. GREEN: I understand a fairly close figure has been arrived at.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The information has not reached me.

Mr. GREEN: What is the position with respect to the transatlantic air mail service?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Negotiations are going on among various governments to complete arrangements for an air mail service across the Atlantic, but it is not expected that that will commence this year. I think the expectation last year was that it would commence in 1938.

Mr. GREEN: What is the estimated time for bringing mail from Great Britain to Canada?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I cannot give anything like an accurate estimate.

Mr. GREEN: Just approximately.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I would prefer not to say. The machines which are expected to carry the mail have not yet been built.

Mr. GREEN: Similar machines are in use in other parts of the empire by the Imperial Airways. Surely this could be determined within a few hours.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There is no reliable information available.

Mr. GREEN: Have negotiations been commenced for a transpacific air mail service?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No; there has been nothing with regard to that.

Mr. FAIR: Have any requests been received from small towns and rural districts to have the post offices remain open for four hours on holidays? In small towns where there are only two mails per week, it does not seem reasonable to have the post office kept open for four hours on holidays when the elevators and stores and everything else in the town are closed. There seems to be some objection to this in the section of the country from which I come, and I was wondering whether any requests had been made along these lines or whether it is just the general policy of the department. Generally, when the mail comes in, the people are there to receive it and the mail is handed out almost immediately. There is absolutely nothing for a postmaster or his helper to stay in the post office for and it seems to be a penalty placed on rural and small town post offices that is not at all necessary.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The rule with regard to the small post office is that it must be opened on holidays as well as other days to receive the incoming and to dispatch the outgoing mails. As for the rest of the day, in some of the offices there is a wicket service. If my hon. friend will give me the names of the particular place or places he has in mind, I can probably tell him fairly accurately just what the position is.

Mr. McIVOR: Why is it that there is an increase of $2,400 in the expenditure this year over last for the Fort William post office? Is it because Fort William is a growing city, or because of having to staff the new post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The increase of $2,400 is made up as follows: two statutory increases of $120 each, two statutory increases of $60 each, and $2,200 to provide for the reestablishment of an assistant postmastership, making a total of $2,580, from which there is a deduction of $180, being the difference between the salary of an employee who left the service and the salary of the employee who replaced him.

Mr. TUCKER: Various members of the official opposition have indicated very strongly to-night that during the last administration contracts were always awarded to the lowest tenderer. I should like to refer to sessional paper No. 126 of the first session of this parliament, which was brought down as a return to an order of the house, and in which the first question asked was this:

> According to the records of the Post Office Department, from August 7, 1930, to October 29, 1935, how many times the Postmaster General exercised the discretionary powers vested in him under section 67 of the Post Office Act, whereby mail contracts are not always awarded to the lowest tenderer.

And the answer to that was 829, so that hon. members who are contending that the last administration always awarded the contract to the lowest tenderer were out just 829 times. The next question was this:

> According to the records of the Post Office Department, from August 7, 1930, to October 29, 1935, how many mail contracts were awarded to persons who, not being originally the lowest tenderers, were allowed to reconsider their tender and reduce the figure thereof.

I venture to say that hon. members will be surprised that the number of cases where people were permitted to get the contract under those circumstances was 323. In view of these figures, I would ask the Postmaster General if he has been able to find out from his investigation of the records of the last administration, upon what basis they awarded mail contracts; further, if he thinks this system of allowing people who did not submit the lowest tender to re-tender at the amount of the lowest tender and take the contract away from the lowest tenderer was in accord with the Post Office Act, and whether, in accordance with the Post Office Act, when the lowest tenderer did not get the contract, a return was made to parliament by the Postmaster General indicating why the lowest tenderer in each case did not receive the contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): During the time I have been in the department I have found my time fairly well occupied with matters that arise from day to day, and I have not the information which my hon. friend asks for, but I suppose it could be obtained. I would suggest to him, however, that I doubt if it would facilitate the passing of the estimates which we have been considering now for some time for us to enter into such a discussion at the moment. I should be glad to obtain any information which the hon. gentleman desires, although he already seems to have provided himself with a considerable amount. I do not think, however, it properly comes under the item under discussion.

Mr. STEWART: If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on this subject (Mr. Tucker) wished to complete the record, I think he ought to ask the minister how many contracts since he came into office have not gone to the lowest tenderer, and how many instances there have been similar to those mentioned in the return. The explanation in regard to some of these within my own knowledge is perfectly simple. Occasionally the man who has submitted the lowest tender reconsiders it and refuses to enter into the contract when it is offered to him. I am sure the minister has had experiences of that kind. I know I have in the constituency I represent. When the man was asked to take the contract at the amount of his tender, he refused because he had reconsidered the matter and found out that it was not profitable to him to complete the contract. That occurs from time to time.

Now that we have returned to the subject, I should like to place before the minister one or two representations in connection with rural mail contracts. These contracts contain a clause which permits cancellation of the contract upon, I think, two months' notice. Still, I think a contract ought to be a contract. I know of cases where representations have been made to rearrange routes with a view, upon some pretext or another, to terminating the contract and having new tenders called for. I have called one or two such instances to the attention of the minister and he has looked into them. All I ask is that in other instances of this kind where the contract has been entered into in good faith, where good service is being rendered, and where petitions are presented for a continuance of the service on the lines that have been established, these contracts shall not lightly be set aside simply on a patronage basis or because it is the desire to put up the contract for tender in order to give some other person a chance to tender upon the route. That is all I wish to bring to the minister's attention in connection with these contracts in the constituency which I represent.

As to the other class of cases, where a man was allowed to reduce his tender to the amount of the lowest tender, I do not know of anything of that kind in my constituency. I do not know what the reason might be, but there must be some. Possibly it might occur where a man has a contract and has been giving good service, and somebody has underbid him. Petitions come in asking for the service to be continued under the former contractor at the lower rate. I am sure the minister, if he investigated, would find some special circumstances in these instances. There is a danger, as the minister knows, in accepting statements of this kind of a rough and general nature, without going into the details. I am sure the hon. gentleman would find out before very long that there are instances where an action of this kind is justified.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): First of all, with regard to the notice, there is a clause providing for notice. I recall no instance, in recent years at any rate, where a contract that was being performed well was terminated by exercising the notice in the contract, unless there was a change to be made in the route or the system of routes of which that route was a part. Then, as to contracts not going to the lowest tenderer, the act is imperative that they shall go to the lowest tenderer unless the Postmaster General knows of some reason why it is not in the public interest that they should go to him. The Department of Justice has given a ruling defining what are the instances when the authority under that clause should be exercised. Unsatisfactory service is one.

Mr. STEWART: The character of the applicant is another.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The character of the applicant is another. If he has been convicted of a crime. In certain instances, if he is not a British subject and British subjects are available for the service. Also of course, drunkenness on the route. I think these exhaust the list set out by the department as being within the exception mentioned in section 67 of the act.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I desire to add a word, in answer to an hon. member, as to the alteration of figures in contracts by the former administration. They did give this particular contract to the tenderer at $480. One year afterwards they raised the amount by $10 a month. The following year, without tender, they increased it a further $10 a month. I should like to know who authorized the payment of that extra money.

Mr. LENNARD: Did I understand the minister to say the other evening that he had had no complaints from postal or labour organizations about letter carriers having to work on statutory holidays and Saturday afternoons?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): My statement was that the trades and labour council, which meets the government annually, interviewed the government some weeks after these changes were made, and there was not one mention, by way of protest, of the men working on statutory holidays.

Mr. LENNARD: Has the minister received protests from different branches of the Federated Association of Letter Carriers?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, some protests have been received. Perhaps I should say that some reference was made the other evening, I think by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) as to who were the officials of the various services who waited on the government and discussed with them these changes before they were actually put into effect. I have the list of those officials. The organizations included the Amalgamated Civil Servants and the Union of Postal Employees. They came to see me a day or two after the announcement was made, which I think was about November 24. As I recollect, we had a meeting on November 27 and discussed the matter most of the morning. The position taken was that if the service were deemed necessary, the employees should be paid for the overtime, and that the forty-four hour week should not be exceeded. There was a further request that the arrangement should not be put into effect for a week later. At that time, I believe, we intended to put it into effect on November 28. They requested that it be deferred one week. That request was granted. I think the object was to enable them to have some consultation with those whom they represented. A matter of a day or two days was spent in consultation with the officials as to how best the plan could be worked out. It was pointed out to them that the time which would be most useful by way of relieving the difficult unemployment situation in the winter time would be prior to March 1, and while some of them felt that they would prefer to be able to take their week off at some other time, it was generally agreed, I think, that that was the most reasonable proposition, for the half day off each Saturday meant, of course, practically twenty-six days in the year. They were given one week off for every eleven Saturday afternoons that they put in. While, probably, they still would have preferred to be paid for the extra time rather than receive time off, the arrangement was fairly well received by those officials. I can give the list of officials if my hon. friend wishes to hear it. I have it before me.

Mr. LENNARD: No; I do not wish that.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am pleased, in a way, that this subject has been raised. I must also say that, in a way, I regret it, because I feel that it falls on me to state frankly my strong and emphatic dissent from the policy of administration in regard to this change in post office deliveries. To me the sudden taking away—as I have thought, without any consultation at all—of holiday time and Saturday half holiday time from postal employees after they had enjoyed it for years, amounts really to a turning back of the hands of the clock. In industry the half holiday has become practically a world-wide institution; indeed, there is a considerable tendency toward what is called the five day week. Labour, both organized and unorganized, has had a long and hard struggle to get to the point of having a half holiday and statutory holidays recognized as an almost inalienable right. Indeed, I was confident that it had come to be recognized as inalienable. However, that turns out not to be the case.

I wonder what possible representations could have been made in favour of this change. I have placed a series of questions on the order paper asking for that information. I feel sure there must have been representations in favour of it; yet I wonder what survey was made first with reference to it. I say that because, after the institution of this change making for greater frequency, all manner of friends and acquaintances in business asked me what the dickens was the idea of delivering mail around to empty offices on Saturday afternoons and Christmas day as well as on New Year's day and other statutory holidays. On a Saturday afternoon and again on Christmas day—and this last Christmas period was a long week-end—people went to their offices and found their floors piled with a litter of mail of one kind and another. So far as people in the residences were concerned, the only kind of mail that was delivered to them consisted of belated Christmas cards, which surely, in all conscience they could have waited for until a day or two after Christmas. The good wishes of their friends would have been equally acceptable to them after Christmas as on Christmas day, morning and afternoon. I remember when the mail was formerly delivered on Christmas, and I can remember the change, and recall there was universal satisfaction over that change and the fact that the postie could stay at home with his wife and kiddies the same as other men.

I look at the position of the postman pretty much the same as I do with relation to myself. I was in Ottawa prior to Christmas and was afraid that I should have to stay over; I made every possible effort to catch a train, and if necessary I was thinking of taking an aeroplane to get home in time for Christmas. Why? Because, like every other man, I wanted to lie on the floor with the kiddies and play with them all day and do nothing in the way of the ordinary duties of life. And I regard myself in that respect as no different from any postman. In my opinion, the proper place for him on Christmas day is at home with his family.

I understand it was suggested that it was desirable to make certain the delivery of air mail. If that is the case, this could be effected without this very radical change which has been made. I also understand, though I speak subject to correction, that this scheme was not carried out in all cities of the dominion. I am not sure of that, but I have been so informed. I have put on the order paper a question in that regard. I want to say this as a Canadian of Anglo-Saxon lineage and not of French lineage. If the Canadians of French lineage were able by pressure or influence to obtain any special consideration for themselves and their postmen in this respect, more power to them. Any pressure or influence which was used in that regard was brought to bear, in my opinion, in the service, shall we say, of a humane institution in our life, and if they did succeed they certainly have my admiration.

I cannot believe that the action taken would make for any great improvement in the unemployment situation. A return was brought down in the house to some questions of mine a few days ago as to the number of persons it was estimated would be employed as a result of the change, and the information is, 478 throughout the dominion and 33 in the province from which I come. I doubt very much whether that will turn out to be the case because mail delivered Saturday afternoon will lie unopened until Monday and there will be a slackening at the beginning of the week and a slackening after the holidays, which there would not have been if it had not been for this unusual delivery.

Some reference has been made to organized labour and the representations it has made, and I wish to place on record the statement of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada made to me with reference to this question of extra employment or assistance in solving the unemployment problem. The letter addressed to me is dated January 25, and is from the president of that organization. I quote:

> Extra employment can well be given to government employees who do not now enjoy the forty-four hour week. Here are some examples: Firemen in the Department of Defence work a seven-day week, eight hours per day; hospital orderlies in some parts of Canada work a six-day week, twelve hours per day; inspectors in the Department of Agriculture work a six-day week, nine hours per day; canal employees work seven days per week, eight hours per day and yet some people on the outskirts of cities receive only one mail per day while formerly they had two deliveries a day.

The letter goes on to state that extra staffs have been requested in various departments, but without success. I am also impressed with what they told me about other grievances they have. I was surprised and pleased as well to learn from the Postmaster General that a conference had been held with the employees. In the same letter they say:

> It is felt that the principle of collective bargaining has been set aside in this case and many others. The organization are of the opinion that the officials of the P.O. Department and the representatives of the organizations should have been consulted before the order was issued and it is reasonable to suppose that had this been done, in all probability the order would have been a great deal more acceptable to the staff.

In my opinion the only satisfactory way for an employer to deal with a large number of employees is to deal with them, in all important matters, in advance of decisions affecting them. That is to say, the principle of collective bargaining should be applied. I do not suggest that it should be carried to the nth degree, but it should be recognized in the normal acceptation of the term. We have on our statutes, affecting other industry, what is known as the Conciliation and Labour Act. I cannot quote the section, but it is one of the principles of that act that changes in hours of labour and working conditions shall not be made by an employer until he has given notice to his employees and given them an opportunity of protesting. That is the policy we ought to follow. The government of this country is one of the largest employers of labour in the country, if not the largest. Canada should follow that principle in dealing with its employees. We ought to be the model employer of this country and not lag behind the principles in our own statutes. We ought to be at all times on the qui vive to discover abuses in respect to employment in the various departments of the civil service and to rectify them without waiting until there is widespread complaint. Just this word further with reference to these complaints. Since this new plan went into force, I have not met one citizen in my city who is particularly in favour of it, and every person to whom I have spoken has expressed his disapproval, particularly in regard to the removal of statutory holidays. In addition, a large number, of their own volition, have come to me protesting about it. It is my hope that the government will reconsider this edict with reference to frequency of delivery, which affects these men in the way I have suggested, and make some change in it.

Mr. LENNARD: Supplementing what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) has just said, I may say, in reference to the business men of Hamilton, Ontario, that I have myself circularized a good many of them and I have not found one who is in favour of this holiday and Saturday afternoon delivery. Furthermore, not one of the letter carriers or the staff of the Hamilton post office is in favour of this change. I therefore urge that this regulation be rescinded.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is there any air mail service between Victoria and Seattle?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. There is between Vancouver and Seattle and between Vancouver and Victoria, but I understand there is not one between Victoria and Seattle.

Mr. TOLMIE: Do they still carry the mails arriving by transpacific steamers at Victoria, from there to Seattle by air? If so, who pays for that?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No; I am advised that that has been discontinued? It is not a Canadian service.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), if I heard him aright, said that there was no mail delivery in certain cities on Christmas day. Would the Postmaster General tell the committee whether that is the case, and if so, what were the cities in which there were no deliveries on that day?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There were protests from some cities, one in particular. In the city of Quebec objections were made on religious grounds, and the matter was left in the hands of the postmaster with authority to exercise his discretion. That, in fact, is nothing new in postal administration. In the offices where there is fairly large business the postmaster is now the district superintendent as well, and he is authorized to exercise a certain amount of discretion with regard to delivery on religious holidays, so long as the mail is cleared. I am told that the mail was cleared on Christmas eve; everything was out, so that there was no danger of a glut the following day.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was Quebec the only city?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think it was the only city. In Montreal and Sherbrooke, for instance, the population is more mixed; the volume of mail did not permit of closing on the holidays, and the employees worked on the holidays where it was necessary to get the mail out.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not yet clear to me from the Postmaster General's answer whether there was mail delivery in Montreal on Christmas day or not. That could be answered yes or no.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, there was delivery in Montreal.

Mr. NEILL: Without going into the main question of the government's policy in this regard, I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he could not see his way to allow some discretion, say to the district superintendent in dealing with small country post offices. I shall take an extreme case—but it goes all the way from there up—where the mail comes once a week by boat, very often on a Sunday. The post office is open on that Sunday; that is the regular custom in the country. The boat does not come back until the following Sunday. The postmaster or postmistress gets $100 a year—not a month. Along about Thursday she may take a notion to go out and pick berries or see some old friend down the bay; then someone writes in and complains and asks that she be fired because she is not adhering to the rules and keeping the post office open six days a week, although she kept it open on Sunday. In cases like that no good is done by maintaining the strict letter of the law, and I am sure it would not be abused if the minister would allow the district superintendent some discretion in dealing with such cases. These cases exist to my knowledge in little country places where for an afternoon the office could be closed and never be missed by the bulk of the people.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That was the practice in the old days when we had service on these holidays, the practice followed in Quebec and it may be in one or two other places, but I am not aware of it. I know it was asked for in a couple of other places where the postmasters reported that the mail was so heavy that they would have congestion on the day following Christmas if the holiday were observed. In those places it was cleared. It might be interesting to my hon. friend to refer to what took place in the old days when we had service on Christmas day and New Year's day, as well as Saturday afternoons.

That is not very long ago. Gradually we got away from those services, a day or half a day at a time. But in those instances, even in the old days, the district director, or the postmaster, in the large post offices, who exercised the same authority as the district director, was given a certain amount of discretion.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has not got my point at all. I was not talking about cities or about statutory holidays, I was asking about a weekly half day closing in small country post offices where you could put the mail in your two pockets, and where it comes in perhaps once a week. I was suggesting that he allow the district superintendent, of whom he talks, to exercise discretion to give permission in those small remote country places, which sometimes keep their offices open on Sunday, to take a half day off on some other day of the week. That could be done, when mail comes in only once or twice a week. That is the situation to which I should like to call his attention.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I assume my hon. friend would take it for granted that if we were doing it in the larger places, we would give the district director power to exercise discretion in the smaller places.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister give that discretion?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, we do.

Mr. RYAN: Do I understand the minister to say that the policy will be to give the district superintendents jurisdiction to exercise discretion in cities, as to the delivery of mails on Saturday afternoons and holidays?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): This is only in cities where the bulk of the mail is not so large that it cannot be cleared on the following day. In a city like Toronto or Montreal it will be impossible, with mails like we had this Christmas. No persons would be more in favour of getting the mail out on Christmas day than district directors, who know what it means to allow a congestion on that day. But in the cities such as I have mentioned, and in the instance mentioned by the hon. member, there will be a discretion similar to that exercised in the old days. The district directors will exercise reasonable judgment, so long as they can get the service and get the mail out on the following day.

Mr. RYAN: I thank the Postmaster General for that explanation, and would ask that he consider the city of Saint John. I join with some other hon. members in protesting against the deliveries. I do that not in an idle way but because I have had many protests concerning them. In the summer months Saturday afternoons are half holidays, and many people go to their summer residences. As a result, it is next to impossible on such days for the postmen to deliver mail. The same applies equally in cities of about 60,000 population, such as Saint John. I put the matter seriously, and I am pleased to hear the Postmaster General say that discretion is to be left with the district superintendent. I am satisfied, if the district superintendent is given the opportunity to canvass, and makes a report back to the Postmaster General, he will bring some beneficial information and will help to solve some of the difficulties.

I make these observations to-night because I have been waited upon not only by those engaged in the postal service but also by residents who have brought to my attention what they considered to be more or less of a hardship and an injustice upon employees. I am pleased to hear the Postmaster General give us the assurance that to a certain extent discretion will be given the superintendent.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question concerning the attitude of the department in connection with the appointment and dismissal of returned men. Lately we have heard a great deal about the employment of these men. A commission has been appointed to look after the providing of employment for them. My attention has been called to a great many dismissals of returned men recently from the postal service. Also, I have been informed that returned men who were qualified for the work have not been obtaining the preference.

Mr. FINN: Where?

Mr. BROOKS: One instance was called to my attention recently. It had reference to the town of Woodstock, New Brunswick, a town of over 3,000 people. The vacancy occurred following the death of the former postmaster, and some four or five returned men applied. However, when the appointment was made, it was given to a man sixty-five years of age, a Mr. Creighton from that town, who had been chairman of the Liberal organization for the town of Woodstock. Protest was made by the different returned men's organizations in the town and in the province of New Brunswick.

While discussing the matter, I should like to call attention to certain dismissals. I am not going to mention all of them, because there have been quite a number, but would draw the minister's attention particularly to one which occurred last year at Canterbury Station in the county of York, New Brunswick. The postmaster was a returned man. A complaint went to the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Clark) and he, in turn, wrote the department stating a complaint had come to him that this man had been partisan, and that during the election he had taken an active part. The Postmaster General, or his department, wrote the member explaining the necessary procedure to have investigation and a commission appointed. One of the requisites was that affidavits be forwarded to the department, and that certain persons agree that they would furnish information when the commission was formed. I have a sessional paper before me containing correspondence in connection with the matter. A very weak affidavit, which meant almost nothing, was made. After receiving the affidavit and other information, the department evidently decided there was not sufficient information upon which to base a commission. So, no doubt through his advisers from that section, the hon. member for York-Sunbury decided to try another scheme. He then stated that the people were not satisfied, and that the location was not central. Any person who knows the village of Canterbury Station knows that it is a small one.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I assume the committee does not intend to pass the item.

Mr. BROOKS: It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 15, 1937

THE LATE MATTHEW McKAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have observed from this morning's press that since the house adjourned on Friday evening last another hon. member has been taken from our midst by the hand of death, the member for Renfrew North, Doctor Matthew McKay. Doctor McKay's death is the fifth since its last session, that has taken place in the membership of this house; he is the fourth hon. member to have been taken from this side of the house.

Doctor McKay was one of the oldest members of parliament. There seems to have been some doubt as to whether he was the oldest member of this house. I believe it is a fact that Doctor McKay was born in Simcoe county, Ontario, on October 5, 1855. In terms of actual years, therefore, it would appear that he was the oldest member of the House of Commons. Be that as it may, his appearance certainly belied his years; few men of advanced years have appeared keener or more active than did Doctor McKay. His vivid personality and his energetic ways would have led one to believe that he was nearer sixty than eighty.

It is a little difficult for those who were not in the house with Doctor McKay from 1921 to 1925 to appreciate, what his life meant to this House of Commons and to the country. Indeed, it is difficult to judge from the doctor's years in parliament how continuous, how keen and persistent was his interest in public affairs. He was in point of fact, a member of this House of Commons only during the present parliament and the parliament of 1921 to 1925, though he was a candidate in the general elections of 1926 and of 1930. He took in the house very little part in debate; singularly enough, while he was fearless and outspoken on the public platform, owing to a certain timidity of nature or reserve he hesitated to speak to any extent in the House of Commons. The number of his speeches was very few indeed. It would be a mistake, however, to attempt to measure, simply by his achievements in the House of Commons, the influence in public life of one who has played an important part in public affairs. It would be indeed unfortunate for public life itself if the most useful public activities were necessarily restricted to membership in parliament. Doctor McKay all through his life had been deeply interested not only in municipal affairs of the community in which he lived, but also in provincial politics and federal politics. He was one who believed it was possible to render great service to his country through serving well the political party whose interests he believed it was best for him to serve. He looked upon a party not as an end in itself, but as a means to an end, a means whereby men and women who feel and think alike on great problems are able to unite their efforts to ensure the putting into effect of principles and policies in which they believe. It is difficult to express how much a political party owes to men of Doctor McKay's type.

Their politics are based upon principle, and for principle they are prepared to make almost any sacrifice, no matter how great. They never know the meaning of defeat. To them the justice of the cause is everything.

Doctor McKay had deep convictions with respect to Liberal principals and policies. As regards old country politics, he was very much of the school of Mr. Gladstone. In federal politics he was a loyal, ardent and uncompromising follower of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; in provincial affairs he was one of the school of Oliver Mowat. Doctor McKay was familiar in all their details with the politics of the part of the country in which he lived. He was one to whom leaders went to seek counsel and advice with respect to policies and as regards the conditions governing in their respective communities. His name and his interests had an immediate association with what we speak of as the Ottawa valley. It might almost be said that there has not been a political battle, either provincial or federal, of any significance fought in the Ottawa valley in the last fifty years in which Doctor McKay did not participate or with respect to which in some capacity his political services were not sought on behalf of the party to which he belonged. I imagine he rather liked to be thought of as a political war-horse, and indeed he was that in every sense of the word. I can think of no one in our public life more deserving of the term "old reliable." For these reasons he played the all-important part which he did over a period, as I have said, of fifty years.

It would be a great mistake, reflecting on a life of service as long as that which the doctor enjoyed, realizing the extent of his achievements, of the honours which crowned his efforts towards the end, to think at this time only, or mostly, of the loss which we of this House of Commons have sustained. Rather may we rejoice at what has been given by way of inspiration, by such a life and such an example, to the young people of our country who have a desire for community and public service and who hope to play a part in public affairs.

Within a few months, Doctor and Mrs. McKay would have celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. This morning, as I was writing a line of sympathy to Mrs. McKay, there came suddenly to my mind those lines of Robert Browning:

> Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life, for which the first was made;

"for which the first was made." I could not but think that when fifty years ago Doctor and Mrs. McKay began life together in Pembroke, his public as well as his married and professional life was then just having its beginnings. He brought to his profession and to the community a mind well trained and stored with information gathered at the public school, at the normal school and at Queen's university. He brought habits of industry as well as habits of thought, and these he sought to turn not alone to his individual and personal advantage, and to the furtherance of the work of his profession, but also to the good of the community in which he lived. He there began the bringing up of a young family, seeking to give to his children educational advantages greater even than those which, as a lad, he himself had been privileged to enjoy. He began to interest himself in community activities and public work, serving at one time on the school board, at another in municipal affairs, and offering himself on different occasions as a candidate for parliament. He became president of the political association of his party and, increasingly the moving spirit in its affairs.

Such were the beginnings of his life. Let us look for a moment at "the last of life, for which the first was made." We see him at the close of life occupying a foremost position in his profession, and looked to by the community generally for guidance and direction in its different activities. We see him with children grown up, themselves taking an honourable part in affairs, and surrounded by grandchildren, bringing their comfort and their cheer to his advancing years. We see him when nearly eighty years of age, signally honoured by his fellow citizens as mayor of the town in which for fifty years he had lived and carried on his work. We see him at the same great age returned a second time, and with a large majority to the parliament of Canada as a member for the constituency in which he had lived throughout that half century of time. More than that, we see him, as his life draws to its close, a national figure much respected by members of parliament of all political parties, and greatly beloved by those of the party to whom he belonged.

For such a life we have reason to be deeply thankful. It is true that we shall miss him keenly, particularly those of us on this side; our loss is very great indeed. I am sure that to every one of us, as I know it is to myself, the doctor's sudden passing has brought a sense of personal loss which it would be difficult to describe. We shall miss him about these halls. We shall miss him in our political gatherings. We shall miss him in our campaigns. But we shall be grateful always, I believe, that one who was spared to serve his country up to eighty years of age and beyond has left behind a career so honourable and a name so greatly honoured.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the leader of the house in his expression of the loss which the house has suffered through the death of one of its number—which reminds me that the sickle of the grim reaper has been very busy of late in this chamber. I should like also to join in offering my sympathy to the right hon. gentleman and his party in the loss they have sustained through the passing of an experienced supporter of their cause and their principles. Doctor McKay was not personally well known to me, but I knew him as a doughty warrior, as one who had firm convictions as to the policies of his party and a robust and vigorous manner of expressing them. That he occupied a very important place in the councils of his party was apparent, I think, to us all.

It is somewhat difficult to look back upon a life that extended over so many years. He was a boy of twelve when confederation was accomplished, and, if my information is correct, he participated in every general election from 1873 to 1935. He was familiar with the giants of the Liberal party in its early days, and he might be regarded as a cross-section of that fine type of Scotsman that came into Canada in the early days and made so great a contribution to the laying of our foundations, legislatively and otherwise. The firmness of his convictions reminds one of Morley's observation that fidelity to conviction is one of the mainsprings of human progress. There are those who would seriously differ from that view, but I think that Doctor McKay's life, his work and his experience, were eminent justification of its soundness.

In this Ottawa valley, and particularly in the community in which he lived, Doctor McKay played a noble part. He was known to almost everyone of importance in his riding and many who were not of his party, and, as the leader of the house has said, his contribution to the public life of this country may be measured, not by his presence or absence from this house, but rather by the influence of an example in public and private life that cannot but be of the utmost value in the years that are before us. For it has well been said by one whose name escapes me, that if a star were quenched on high, its light still travelling on would influence men for many years.

> So, when a great man dies,
> For years beyond our ken,
> The light he leaves behind him lies
> Upon the paths of men.

It may be said of Doctor McKay, not that he was a great parliamentarian, not that he participated actively in the legislation of the house, but rather that, by the influence of his example in his profession, in his public service to his community, in his service through small organizations that are so vital to the creation of sound public opinion, in the councils of his party, on the hustings, and, if I may use the term, in the organization work of his party—believing that party was intended to serve the public and existed for the state and not the individual—his life was indeed one of great usefulness to this country.

It is a tribute to him that after nearly fourscore years of life in the community he was elected to the House of Commons in 1935, when he was about eighty years of age. That in itself is a striking tribute to his qualities of heart and of mind and to the influence of his life upon his fellow citizens; for it does not often happen thus, especially in view of the fact that he had had but one term in this house during all those years.

I can only say how sincerely we on this side of the house regret his passing; for it is the severing of one of the links that join the present to the remote past—the passing of one who was able to speak intimately and with knowledge of the men who in days gone by, in the chamber of the Commons House of Parliament, did much to lay the foundations of the dominion as we now know it. It may well be said of him that he has passed to his fathers having lived a life full of good works; and those who are left behind him can say of him:

> Life's race well run,
> Life's work well done,
> Life's victory won,
> Now cometh rest.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Those of us who have been for any number of years in the house will recognize, I believe, Doctor McKay's keen interest in public affairs and in people. Undoubtedly he was a strong party man, but I think we all came to realize that he was also a friendly man, and perhaps now that he has gone we think particularly of his friendliness. I desire to express on behalf of the members of this group our appreciation of his work in the house and to extend our sympathy to those whom he leaves behind.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I join my voice in honouring Doctor McKay? I might tell a little incident from his life which, I believe, will be to his credit in times like these. Last year he arranged, entirely without my previous knowledge, to have me invited to speak upon the new economics in one of the important cities in his riding. In telling me about it just before I went he said, "I wanted those leading men to know what reformers to-day are thinking and their reasons for so thinking." A man of eighty who is as open-minded as that has merited the esteem of all men, and to Doctor McKay the group which I represent accords that tribute.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a private member from the province of Quebec may I pay my humble tribute to the memory of a very dear friend who has just passed. Doctor McKay belonged to the old traditionalists of the province of Ontario. He was of Scotch and Irish extraction. He was a man of very deep convictions and as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just said, he had taken part in every campaign in his constituency and as well in other parts of the good old province of Ontario. Did you notice, Mr. Speaker, that he was sixty-three in 1921 when he ran for the first time? He was elected on that occasion and up to last week was one of the very few members then in this chamber who were in this house when I came here in 1924. In 1926 he was sixty-eight and he ran again in the elections though he was defeated. But he was not downhearted, for in 1930 he ran again. He was again defeated, and at that time he was seventy-two. But in 1935, when he was seventy-seven, he had the joy of his life; for then he had the satisfaction of knowing that his principles and his views were again accepted by his own electors who were his friends. On many occasions I went to him for advice, and I never regretted having done so. I shall honour his memory for a long time, and I may say that in his departure I have suffered the loss of a very dear friend. The life of a man of such deep convictions is a lesson to all of us and especially to the young. If they will cherish their convictions as Doctor McKay did his, they will enjoy the same respect from their fellow citizens.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to pay my tribute to Doctor McKay in recalling the last word he spoke. Last week he invited some of us to attend the play-offs in the junior hockey league when the Pembroke junior team got into the finals, and he said to me, "It is our duty to encourage our youth in clean sport, and I hope you will have time to attend the game."

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BOULANGER: The object of the bill is to amend the Railway Act in order to give jurisdiction to the board of railway commissioners instead of following the ordinary course, in cases of damages caused by the erection of snow fences.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Government Railways Act.

He said: The object is the same as that of the bill I have just presented.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—CARRY-OVER

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was surplus wheat held by the wheat board at July 31 last, from the 1935 crop of wheat, from previous crops or both?

2. How was the unsold surplus divided between crops of various years?

3. Does the government consider that the farmers have any share or interest in such surpluses?

4. Can the farmers expect any further payments from such surpluses?

5. If so, when, approximately, will the cheques be issued?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes, from the 1935 crop also from wheat purchased by the Canadian Wheat Board from the Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited.

2. 2,030,761 bushels of 1935 crop, 82,667,891 bushels of wheat purchased from Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Ltd.

3. The report of the wheat board indicates that there is no surplus profit on the crop of 1935 to be distributed.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Answered by No. 3.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' PENSIONS AND MEDICAL TREATMENT

Mr. MacNEIL:

3. Yes. The findings of the Board of Psychiatrists and Neurologists were laid on the table of the house to-day.

VICTORIA, B.C., MARINE HOSPITAL

Mr. TOLMIE:

1. By clause G of section 5 of the terms of union between the Dominion of Canada and the crown colony of British Columbia, did the Dominion of Canada agree to defray the charges of a marine hospital at Victoria?

2. Did the Dominion of Canada cease to defray the charges of such marine hospital at Victoria? If so, when?

3. If the Dominion of Canada does not now defray such charges for a marine hospital at Victoria, does the Dominion of Canada make any provisions for hospitalization for such patients as were contemplated when the act of union was entered upon?

4. Has the Dominion of Canada made any agreements for the care of such patients in the Royal Jubilee hospital at the city of Victoria?

5. Does the dominion government make any annual donation to the Royal Jubilee hospital at Victoria in lieu of the maintenance at Victoria of a marine hospital?

6. Has the dominion government considered making an annual donation to the Royal Jubilee hospital at Victoria in lieu of maintaining a marine hospital at Victoria?

Mr. POWER:

1. Yes.

2. The following resolution of the legislature of British Columbia was passed on the 28th February, 1911:

Whereas by an agreement bearing date the twenty-fifth day of October, 1910, made by and between His Majesty King George V, in right of his province of British Columbia, represented by the Honourable Richard McBride as his trustee, of the one part, and that band of Indians known as the "Songhees tribe," of the other part, it was agreed that, upon the terms and conditions therein mentioned the said tribe of Indians would remove from the tract of land on which they resided within the confines of the city of Victoria, British Columbia, and commonly known as the "Songhees Reserve," and would transfer to his said majesty, in right of this province, all their claims for rights in and improvements on the lands within the boundaries of the said "Songhees Reserve":

And whereas by the terms of union under which British Columbia was admitted into the Dominion of Canada, Canada agreed to assume and defray the charges for a Marine hospital at said city of Victoria; and which marine hospital has been erected and maintained on land within the boundaries of said Songhees Reserve:

And whereas it is necessary, for the carrying-out of the purposes for which such Indian reserve is being acquired as aforesaid, that the lands and premises now occupied by or held in connection with such marine hospital should be rendered available forthwith to his said majesty, in right of this province.

And whereas there are two public hospitals in or near said city of Victoria, both of which are available to take care of any patients whom it has been customary to send to such marine hospital:

Therefore, be it resolved, That this house deems it to be in the public interests of this province that the said marine hospital should be closed, and that the lands and premises occupied thereby or used or held in connection therewith should be transferred by the dominion government to his majesty the king, in right of this province; and that this house will consider it a satisfactory performance of the terms of union, in so far as the maintenance of said marine hospital is concerned, if the said Dominion of Canada arranges for the erection of a marine hospital elsewhere within the city of Victoria, or, in the alternative, for the work now being carried on at the present marine hospital to be carried on in either or both of such other existing hospitals:

[Mr. Power.]

And that an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, praying him that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

The foregoing resolution was approved by order in council P.C. 590, of the government of British Columbia, on the 8th March, 1911, and was confirmed by federal order in council P.C. 2579, dated 14th November, 1911. The last named order in council reported that arrangements had been made with the St. Joseph's hospital, Victoria, for the treatment care of all sick seamen arrived at Victoria, entitled to relief under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. The actual transfer of patients was effected on the 24th April, 1911.

3. Yes.

4. Yes, also with St. Joseph's hospital, Victoria.

5. No. Payment is made at a per diem rate.

6. No.

COST OF SEARCH FOR FLIGHT-LIEUTENANT COLEMAN

Mr. MUTCH:

1. How much did the search for Flight-Lieutenant Coleman cost the Dominion of Canada?

2. How much gasoline was used?

3. How much would it cost to equip all the commercial aircraft, on schedule runs, with two-way radio?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. $52,384.74.

2. Approximately 14,000 gallons.

3. The cost of equipping an aircraft with two-way wireless communication varies from $500 to $3,000, depending on the type of installation required. The number of aeroplanes on "schedule" services depends on the definition of "schedule." The only services which run on exact schedule are inter-city services. All planes on such services are now equipped with two-way communication.

VIMY PILGRIMAGE—CANADIAN LEGION

Sir EUGENE FISET:

1. Did the government make any grant of money to the Canadian Legion for the purpose of organizing and carrying out the pilgrimage to Vimy and the battlefields in July, 1936?

2. Did the Canadian Legion make application for any such grant?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. No.

2. No.

TYVAN, SASK., CENSUS

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What amount of money was paid to one Roath for the taking of the census in the village of Tyvan, and other services rendered?
2. What amount was paid to the young lady who assisted him in the work of census enumeration?
3. What was the name of this young lady?

Mr. ROGERS:

1, 2 and 3. Mr. Roath did not enumerate the village of Tyvan.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What is the personnel of the board of review operating under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, in the province of Saskatchewan?
2. What amounts have been paid to each, (a) in salaries; (b) living and travelling expenses?
3. What was the date of appointment of the present personnel of this board?
4. How many cases have been reviewed by the present board?
5. How many cases were reviewed by the previous board under the chairmanship of Justice MacLean?
6. What is the number of cases settled, (a) under present board; (b) under the previous board?
7. What is the prevalent rate of interest on debts adjusted, (a) under the present board; (b) under the previous board?
8. What was the percentage of reduction in debts, (a) under the present board; (b) under the previous board?
9. What is the total amount of, (a) cases reviewed; (b) settled by the board of review since its inception under the act?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Chief Justice J. T. Brown; R. W. Hugg, K.C.; Charles Wilson.

	(a) Fees	(b)
2. Chief Justice Brown.	None	$2,608 05
R. W. Hugg, K.C.. ..	$2,875 00	941 21
Charles Wilson.. ..	2,912 50	1,529 41

3. Chief Justice Brown, July 9, 1936; R. W. Hugg, K.C., August 17, 1936; Charles Wilson, August 17, 1936.
4. 422
5. 1,401.
6. (a) 351; (b) 1,401.
7. None. Rate based on merits of each individual case.
8. (a) 43·9 per cent; (b) 27·8 per cent.
9. Of 2,408 cases referred to the board of review to January 31, 1937, (a) 1,823; (b) 1,752.

SHEDIAC, N.B., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has Alyre Hebert the contract for carrying mail from the Canadian National Railways station, Shediac, to Shediac post office?
2. If so, when does his contract expire?
3. Has the department called for tenders for this service?
4. If so, who was the lowest tenderer?
5. If no tenders were called, who got the contract, and under what terms?
6. Was a recommendation made for a change?
7. If so, by whom?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.
2. March 31, 1937.
3. No.
4. See answer to No. 3.
5. New contract completed with Alexander Landry at $160 per annum under authority contained in section 73 of the Post Office Act.
6 Yes.
7. H. R. Emmerson, M.P.

CANADIAN MILITIA—HONORARY COLONELS

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the second statement of the honourable Minister of National Defence in the first column of page 508 of Hansard of February 3, who are the two colonels, and what are the regiments mentioned therein?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

Colonel A. T. Howard, V.D., The Black Watch (Royal Highland Regiment) of Canada. Colonel D. R. Sargent, The Canadian Scottish Regiment.

HAMILTON GAULT FUND

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is E. H. Scammell, secretary of the Pension and National Health department, also administrator of the Hamilton Gault fund?
2. If so, (a) what is that fund; (b) what does it amount to; (c) to whom does it belong, and (d) what is the purpose of it?
3. Is Scammell the only administrator of that fund?
4. If so, when and by whom was he appointed, and, if not, who are the other administrators?
5. In the calendar years 1935 and 1936, were there: (a) any returned soldiers, and (b) any civilians who received money in any shape, way, or form, from that fund?
6. If so, how many: (a) returned soldiers; (b) civilians; who were the civilians, and for what purpose did each one receive any money?
7. Did a Lieutenant-Colonel Walker, of Ottawa, receive any money at different intervals from that fund, and if so, when and how much each time?
8. Does he receive a pension? If so, how much?
9. How many returned soldiers' requests for borrowing money from that fund were turned down in calendar years, (a) 1934; (b) 1935, and (c) 1936?
10. Does the administrator or do the administrators receive anything for administrating that fund, and, if so, how much?

Mr. POWER: Stand.

Mr. POULIOT: May I draw attention to the fact that paragraph 1 of this question in the French version should be in conformity with the English text.

CANADIAN RADIO BROADCASTING COMMISSION

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Have the services of Mr. Hector Charlesworth, Colonel C. A. Chauveau, K.C., and Lieutenant-Colonel W. Arthur Steel, M.C., members of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, been dispensed with?
2. If so, when, how, and on what terms and conditions?

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. This question is exactly the same as question No. 21 standing in my name, and I object very much to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) becoming my new disciple in this matter. Question No. 21 appeared in the votes and proceedings of Thursday last, so I do not see why the question of my hon. disciple from Calgary West should have been put on the votes and proceedings on Friday.

MAIL DELIVERY ON HOLIDAYS

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Were any representations made to the government by any person or persons or organizations urging the delivery of mail on statutory holidays and Saturday afternoons?
2. If so, were such representations made verbally or in writing?
3. How many such representations were made?
4. When were they made?
5. Who made them?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.

2. Representations were made verbally, in writing and through the press.

3, 4 and 5. See sessional paper No. 145 of 1937 session which was tabled on the 5th February, 1937. No record kept of verbal representations.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE—ELIGIBLE LIST

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Did the Civil Service Commission recently establish an eligible list of postal helpers for the Winnipeg post office, and, if so, when?
2. How many names were upon said list?
3. Have any persons from said list been given employment as a result of recent changes by the government in the frequency of mail delivery in the area of greater Winnipeg?
4. How many from said eligible list have been thus employed, and what is the total number of hours of employment thus given?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

GRAIN HANDLED BY GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS

Mr. MARTIN:

1. What quantities of grain passed through the government elevators at Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Lethbridge and Edmonton during the past five years?
2. What has been the record of business through these elevators in comparison with the business through privately owned terminals at Port Arthur, Fort William and Vancouver?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. In each of the following branches of the Department of National Defence, (1) administration, (2) treasury office, (3) central registry, (4) contracts branch, (5) printing and stationery, (6) naval service, (7) chief of the general staff, (8) signals, (9) historical section, (10) adjutant general, (11) medicals, (12) records, (13) quartermaster general, (14) master general of the ordnance, (15) Royal Canadian Air Force, (16) No. 1 Aircraft depot, (17) Royal Canadian Air Force Station, Ottawa, (18) Connaught Rifle Range, (19) drill halls—how many non-commissioned officers are (1) older, and (2) younger than thirty-seven (37) years?
2. In each of the above-mentioned branches, how many non-commissioned officers who are thirty-seven (37) years old and older have been in the line of an actual theatre of war?
3. Referring to the previous paragraph, how many in each branch have been stationed, (a) farther than twenty miles behind the fighting line, (b) in England?
4. Referring to paragraph 2, how many in each branch did not leave Canada on active service overseas?
5. How many of such non-commissioned officers in each branch were born in Canada and how many were not?

MAIL DELIVERY ON HOLIDAYS

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Was regular delivery of mail made in the cities of Canada on Christmas day, 1936, and on New Year's day, 1937?
2. Was such delivery made in all Canadian cities?
3. If such delivery was not made in all Canadian cities, in which city or cities was such delivery not made?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for Mr. Bennett):

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, documents and papers dealing with the retirement from the public service of (a) Mr. Hector Charlesworth; (b) Colonel C. A. Chauveau, K.C.; and (c) Lieutenant-Colonel W. Arthur Steel, M.C.

LABOUR DISPUTES

CANADIAN PACIFIC AND CANADIAN NATIONAL EMPLOYEES—REPORT OF BOARD OF CONCILIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) if he is prepared to make a statement with regard to the dispute between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways and their employees.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. The procedure followed under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in dealing with reports made by boards of conciliation has been to send to both parties to the dispute copies of the report and ask them to state whether or not they are willing to accept the recommendation of the board. This was done in the present instance. A reply was received from the representatives of the employees advising the department that the report was not acceptable, and further stating that a strike ballot was being prepared for submission to the employees. This reply from the employees was immediately communicated to the presidents of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways. On February 4 Sir Edward Beatty and Mr. Hungerford acknowledged receipt of the report of the board of conciliation and indicated their attitude toward it in the following paragraph:

> The railways are prepared to accept the recommendation of the board as a basis for an agreement between the railways and the employees for the adjustment of the dispute.
> The railways in the conciliation conferences having offered, as stated in the board's report, to reduce the rate of deduction from compensation from 10 per cent to 9 per cent as from February 1, 1937, they will immediately take the necessary steps to put into effect that part of the board's recommendation.

I may say that I have had informal discussions with representatives of both parties to the dispute, since the conciliation board made its report. I cannot usefully add anything further to this statement at the present time, except to say that we are keeping in constant touch with the situation.

BURNS PACKING PLANT AT VANCOUVER—DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES AND ENSUING STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). It has been drawn to my attention by wire from Vancouver over the week end that there has been trouble between the management of the Burns packing plant in Vancouver and the employees; whether it is a strike or a lockout I do not know at the moment, but it has been going on for the last seven weeks. I should like to know whether a dispute of this kind comes under the activities of the Federal Department of Labour, and if so, what action if any has been taken.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon member was good enough to inform me that he would ask this question to-day. Our information indicates that on December 29, 1936, nineteen employees of the Burns plant were dismissed. These were mostly employees who had been in the service of the company for many years, and seven of them composed the entire executive of the union formed in April, 1936. A strike followed immediately.

The western representative of the Department of Labour, Mr. Harrison, at once interviewed the company's manager with a view to settlement by conciliation. On a number of occasions subsequently both Mr. Harrison and Mr. Bell, Deputy Minister of Labour for British Columbia, conferred with the company manager and union officials in an effort to bring about a conference between the parties. They were not successful. The company manager refused to meet the dismissed strikers and employees jointly, and the employees refused to meet the management unless the dismissed employees were also present. Mr. Harrison, the representative of the dominion Department of Labour, went to Calgary in an endeavour to secure the consent of the president of the company to allow the dispute to be dealt with by a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, but has been unsuccessful up to this time. The employees have agreed to a board being established. For this type of industry a board can be set up only by joint consent of the parties involved in the dispute.

I might say that I have been in touch with the Minister of Labour for British Columbia, and it seems probable that an inquiry will be instituted under provincial legislation.

CANADA—UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to the Canadian Press, Sir Francis Floud, High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, speaking in Montreal on Saturday, made reference to the proposed new trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, saying:

> We have reached a conclusion, and I hope the new agreement will be presented to the Canadian parliament very shortly.

I should like to know whether the government can give us any indication as to when parliament will be informed as to the terms of this agreement.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it was on Friday that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked me a question along these lines, the answer to which doubtless escaped the hon. member who has just spoken. I indicated then that while conclusions have been reached, a great deal of what might be called tidying up requires to be done in putting into words all the details of such an important document. That work is proceeding, and I hope to be able to indicate to the house within a week as to when we can deal with it.

SUPPLY—NATIONAL DEFENCE

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty at this time to invite discussion of a subject which has caused widespread interest throughout the dominion and great concern and misgivings in many quarters. I refer to the proposed increases in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. I consider that these increases present an issue of vital importance to the people of Canada at this time, and I think it would be advantageous if in this house we could discuss the matter along broad lines of policy rather than wait until the estimates are brought down and voted upon item by item. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell):

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people."

I present this amendment, Mr. Speaker, because of my conviction that the increased appropriations proposed this year, which double the increases of last year, constitute a declaration on the part of the government that Canada must now prepare for war. It is not unfair to assume that there will be further increases this session, and that all these increases simply form part of a program of naval and military preparation of increasing proportions within the next few years. The indications are that, step by step, we are to be placed on a war footing. Apparently we are abandoning the policy followed for eighteen years and replacing our peace time military and naval establishment with a war time establishment. I know it is called defence, but we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that it means nothing more or less than that we must get ready for war. We know very well that guns, destroyers and bombing planes are not purchased for playthings or merely for show; they are intended for use in war, war in which Canadians will kill and be killed.

This is no longer a hypothetical issue, as was suggested in the house only recently by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). It is a very real and menacing issue, and it has been made such an issue by the action of the government with respect to these estimates. We are warned that we are menaced by dangers from abroad; that the powers of evil may prevail over the powers of light; that we may be exposed to invasion, our shores ravaged and laid waste by madmen from Europe, and that therefore we must now arm ourselves so as to be able to meet all comers. Under the plans as outlined no man can distinguish between weapons of defence and weapons of offence. I know it may be alleged that I am confusing the issue of military defence with that of participation in war, but when military and naval preparations are advanced to the stage now contemplated we are faced inevitably with the thought of participation in war. I submit that this conclusion cannot be lightly brushed aside. I am reminded of the words used on one occasion by General Sir Maurice Wilson, who said:

> I entered the British army believing that in order to avoid war we must prepare for war. I now know that when we prepare for war we get war.

Apparently now in Canada we must abandon all hope of organizing for peace and prepare for war, with the very grave likelihood that we will get war, for certainly warlike preparations breed a warlike attitude.

If this be the case we must assess not only the expenditures involved but also the probable consequences of the policy upon which Canada is about to embark. Now, and only now—not at some future, indefinite time—we should arrive at a clear-cut understanding of all that is involved in this policy. Not only will the Canadian people be asked to bear the additional burden of taxation proposed; they will be brought just that much closer to participation in war. When the hour strikes they may have little voice in the question of our participation in hostilities. Certainly now is the only time we can approach the problem in such a way as to secure a cool, calm appraisal of our national policy. As many of us know from bitter experience, when we reach the stage of war-time hysteria, all reason will have fled.

I submit that by reason of the action of the ministry Canada stands at the cross-roads. Now we must either become a highly militarized nation or we may adopt a rational, sensible approach to the problem of defence, an approach consistent with our resources, with our geographical position and with our alliances with other nations of the world. We have two alternatives. Either we take the road to war, or as a Canadian nation we build for ourselves a road to peace. In the past it has been held by prominent statesmen that an armament policy is determined first of all by commitments under foreign policy, by the existence of potential dangers, and by the capability of the nation as determined by its resources. As matters now stand, as far as our policy has been disclosed by the government, we have most indefinite knowledge as to our commitments under foreign policy, particularly with regard to the issues of war and peace. Our potential dangers are outlined in terms quite as vague, and in my opinion it is going quite beyond the bounds of common sense to impose further sacrifices upon the Canadian people for a purpose which is at best indefinite if not entirely futile.

I do not accuse the government of conscious intention to participate in a war of aggression. Here, as in Great Britain, we have nothing to gain and everything to lose by entering into another war. The real danger is that we may assist in setting the stage; in erecting, as it were, a scenario of fireworks which may be set off at any moment by a madman or a fool. We ourselves may stumble into the outbreak rather than consciously plan for disaster.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, we should know now whether we are planning defence for Canada alone or whether we are planning a contribution to empire defence. Recent statements of British statesmen cast very grave doubt upon this matter, despite the assurances which have been given in this chamber by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Are we to infer from the statement recently made by Sir Samuel Hoare, first lord of the admiralty, that the question of a contribution to empire defence is linked up with the question of empire trade development or an imperialistic economic plan? Are we about to bargain for economic concessions with a blank cheque which may later be filled in with the lives of young Canadians? Will parliament have anything to say with regard to commitments of this kind which may be made at the approaching imperial conference? Is there any good reason why we should not know right now just where Canada stands in this matter? If the theory that Canada is at war when Great Britain is at war is accepted, where will our front line be? Will it be on Canadian soil, or will it be on some of the many lines of communication vital to the empire, and as may be determined by a supreme war council at Westminster? If the government sincerely desires the exercise of Canadian autonomy, in the event of an outbreak of hostilities why cannot such action now be taken as was taken in South Africa; why cannot such autonomous action be our right as a self-governing nation?

The proposed policy of the government with regard to the defence estimates brings all these questions to the fore. We may rightly demand an answer, in unequivocal terms. Any evasion of the issue now may be held as a betrayal of the democratic traditions to which Canadian people give their allegiance. The story is told that when the late President Wilson read his message to the congress of the United States declaring the nation at war with Germany, many of those present applauded. As he walked slowly back to the White House in the company of his secretary he remarked, "That message meant death to our young men, and they applauded. Strange; very strange!" As he reached the White House it is said he laid his head on his desk and wept—a tragic figure.

I suggest that at this time we must take care not to applaud action which may disguise a message of death for Canadian young men. I know it has been very popular to question the patriotism of anyone who may speak frankly or plainly with regard to these matters. It may be suggested, as was suggested last year by the Minister of National Defence, that in criticizing national defence estimates I am stabbing this nation in the back. I will answer for my patriotism with my actions, and let every man do the same. The true test of one's patriotism, I submit, is found in one's willingness to serve the common good. As I conceive it, patriotism does not demand blind allegiance to outworn traditions. I do not propose to worship at empty shrines.

The Prime Minister referred to dangerous decisions which had been reached during what he described as a period of post-war mentality. He was quite right. A prominent writer has said that the treaty of Versailles was simply a bridge of tinder built over hell. Even more dangerous is a pre-war mentality, and the decisions reached in an atmosphere which usually precedes the outbreak of a war. We have been perilously close to that atmosphere, when we consider some of the remarks made in recent debates. We are reminded much of the atmosphere which prevailed in 1914 and 1915. I have heard echoes of the same old appeals, the same old slogans, and the same old phrases, such as national honour, national prestige, the good old British spirit, the dear old union jack. I have heard these phrases used over and over again for the same purpose, to whip people into a frenzy of war-like preparation. They are meaningless to me unless I know their exact content, and unless I am convinced of the sincerity of purpose behind them. These phrases rolled glibly off the tongues of many of the older men who in 1914 cheered the boys off to the front. Many of those older men remained in security and in comfort and lined their pockets profitably. Furthermore, the record now shows that many of them did not hesitate to accept profits from trading with the enemy, either directly or indirectly, yes, while they boasted eloquently of their patriotism. Unquestionably the war was prolonged and many thousands of lives were needlessly lost because the enemy was able to secure important war material from sources within the British Empire. In the light of our experience we have every right to question the use of such phrases, if they are used carelessly. We demand a rigid scrutiny of all war preparations. I am skeptical, perhaps a little hard-boiled, when the folds of the union jack are draped over our national policies in such a way as to conceal their true purpose.

The only sentiment I admit in this matter is that inspired by the memory of thousands of comrades who made the supreme sacrifice in the last war and the thought that upon the outbreak of another war thousands of our young men will again be asked to lay down their lives, unless we pursue a sane policy in the midst of an insane world.

Possibly very few of us may be called to active service in another war. I do not intend at this time of life to take my seat among older men and forget the interests of the young men of to-day. I shall not forget the terms of the birthright which we should make secure for our younger men, a birthright which can be made secure on this continent only under conditions of peace and equity. After what I have witnessed of the suffering which followed in the wake of the last war, God forbid that I may have any part in preparing our young men for slaughter without first making a desperate stand for peace. I cannot close my eyes to the disclosures which point to the fact that the last war was simply the result of fifty years of miserable intrigue on the part of European statesmen, madly gambling for profit and power, and it led to nothing but a wilderness of cemeteries—yes, the forests of crosses over the graves of young Canadians,—nothing but shattered hopes and happiness in thousands of Canadian homes. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that war will come in the world to-day as a result of a struggle between powers which seek to seize or to retain spoils.

In such circumstances and in such a cause we are asked to prepare again for war. We are asked again to put our faith in guns. We are advised to seek a way to peace through the use of armed force. If we rely on guns, if we rely only on armed force, we will take the way we took in 1914-1918 and achieve results even more ghastly than those realized by the Canadian people during that period.

I may be accused of exaggerating, and of being unduly alarmed; but how can anyone regard the situation with anything but alarm when he considers the policy revealed in the increased estimates for military and naval preparation, last year as well as during the present session? I am concerned not only with the increases actually proposed, but with the direction in which steadily increasing military and naval preparation may lead us.

According to my calculation, the estimates of the Department of National Defence, for all purposes, this year total $37,081,871.42. This includes items under the Department of Public Works for military and naval purposes, and an item of $2,000,000 for the purchase of destroyers, which, I understand, is yet to be tabled. If we deduct from the total the votes which are not strictly for military purposes we find that $36,595,135 may be held as the amount of our armaments bill for the coming fiscal year. Over the estimates of last year this represents an increase of $13,530,815. Last year, on a similar basis of comparison, the votes for military purposes amounted to $23,064,320. This represents an increase over the previous year of $7,181,400 for military and naval expenditures. In two sessions the increase amounts to $20,712,215, or approximately 130 per cent.

The estimates for naval services this year are increased from $3,072,000 to $6,635,210, if we include the figure for the new destroyers. This indicates an increase of 116 per cent for naval services. The estimate for the air force has been increased from $5,465,028 to $11,391,650, an increase of 108 per cent. The total estimates have been increased this year over last year by 58 per cent. We cannot overlook the fact that the estimates for these purposes were increased last year by supplementary estimates to the amount of $4,659,139. If the same ratio of increase is to be followed this year the country may yet be required to foot an armament bill of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $45,000,000, and I have reason to believe that if our military and naval experts had their way the bill might be closer to $75,000,000. In any event, I think it is not unreasonable to assume that at the close of the second session of this parliament we shall have increased our armament budget from 150 to 160 per cent, and in the light of these increases I submit that I have a perfect right to ask, do we know where we are going?

I am utterly amazed, Mr. Speaker, at the readiness with which funds are provided for this purpose while at the same time they are withheld or grudgingly doled out for desirable and necessary social services, on the plea that we must maintain national solvency and, in the words of the Minister of Finance, "end an era of recurring deficits."

Last session this house unanimously approved of a resolution proposing to extend the benefits of old age pensions to the blind over the age of forty years. It was reliably estimated by the sponsor of the resolution that it might cost the federal treasury the sum of half a million dollars a year. The Minister of Finance rose in his place and said that it would be impossible to find the money last session, and he reminded us of what he described as a repetition of the process of taking from all of us to pay to some of us. He could not provide a half million dollars for the blind but we can now provide over $13,000,000 for extra armaments this year. The Minister of Finance made similar replies when we pressed for the consideration of certain social requirements. But apparently now he has abandoned his opposition to the procedure of taking from all of us to pay to some of us, and is preparing to take from all of us to profit a few of us, with no real increased security for any of us.

I remember reading with interest a speech made during the session of 1935 by the present Minister of National Defence, when on a motion of no confidence he made a scathing attack on the government of the day on the ground that at that time over one million people were on relief in Canada, and that the government had not provided an adequate employment policy to deal with their serious needs. May I remind him that there are still over one million people on relief in Canada, people so destitute of this world's goods that they must rely for aid from the public treasury. The unemployment situation has not improved substantially, and nowhere in Canada is this distress more acute or more apparent than in the constituency represented in this house by the Minister of National Defence. Only in recent months, as he knows full well, there was dramatized the result of what is happening to our young men in Canada, when over 150 young men were sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment for no other reason, for no other crime, than that they were without food and shelter and an opportunity of securing employment, and dared to state their needs in a public place. I am puzzled to know just how the minister can reconcile his statement in the 1935 session with his recommendation to the house this year that we should divert to our armament budget millions of dollars so urgently needed for purposes of social reconstruction. Just how does he propose to appeal to the young men in the days to come to answer the call of king and country, when to-day these same young men are denied their rightful place in our national enterprises?

I need not remind the minister of the appalling state of affairs among ex-service men in Canada at the present time. The Hyndman commission a number of years ago described the men who appeared before them as obviously undernourished to the point where many would be unable to undertake manual labour even were it available. Again speaking of ex-service men in Canada, who are still bearing the brunt of the suffering from the last war, many of them unemployed, many suffering serious physical handicaps by reason of their war service, the Hyndman commission said:

> In conclusion, we wish to emphasize the spirit of steadfastness, fortitude and loyalty which we found to prevail amongst the vast majority of the many veterans with whom we came in contact in the course of our investigation, and this in spite of dire poverty and distress in all too many instances. It is our firm conviction that, in regard to those who left Canada, such assistance should be given as may be required to alleviate the actual distress under which many of them are suffering and to enable them and their families to exist in decency.

These men who survived the last war are living under the conditions so vividly described by Mr. Justice Hyndman and his fellow members on that commission.

I cannot anticipate the findings of the Veterans Assistance Commission, which recently reviewed conditions existing among ex-service men in Canada. From my personal knowledge I cannot believe that conditions have substantially improved as affecting the men whose average age is 47, and who served in the last war. I fully anticipate that urgent demands will be made upon parliament to make more generous and adequate provisions for their needs. How then can we say that we have millions more, $13,000,000 extra for armaments this year, and not enough to make substantial and necessary provision for those who are suffering as a result of the last war?

We cannot disregard the fact that expenditures on armaments are made at the sacrifice of activities of vastly greater importance. Since the armistice we have spent on armaments the sum of approximately $284,000,000. During this same period we have spent for all purposes of the League of Nations only $4,235,987. We have already spent 67 times as much for armaments as we have spent to assist in the organization of international peace, and if we include the estimates of this session, our armament budget will be 150 times as much as all expenditures for relief purposes. In the present year we propose to spend 8½ times as much for armaments as we have spent in the whole eighteen years since the war for purposes of international peace. Our military appropriations this year will exceed the appropriations for old age pensions by a very considerable sum.

In the midst of this discussion we find our prominent news organs joining in the general chorus and complaining of the crushing burden of relief. They have said on numerous occasions: We must now purge our relief lists of the racketeers; we must now take steps looking to a drastic reduction of our expenditures on direct relief. According to the latest figures available, direct relief cost the federal treasury approximately $27,000,000 in 1935-36, and direct relief to the farmers about $4,000,000. The same journals that have been crying that we call a halt on relief expenditures have been pointing to the national debt, direct and indirect, which is now computed to be something over $4,000,000,000, and to the fact that our budget deficit last year was over $160,000,000. The last war increased our national debt by $1,900,000,000, for which we are still paying at the rate of $158,000,000 per annum. Yet the same publications welcome this increase in our armament expenditures, and many of them have described these increases as "a good beginning," "a satisfactory start." I would like to ask: a good beginning to what?

The Department of National Defence now advances to the position of the fourth highest spending department in the government. In the leading position we have the Department of Finance, paying mainly the interest on our debt, much of which is the result of the last war; second, war pensions; third, the Post Office Department, which is of course a revenue producing department; fourth on the list, National Defence. At the rate we are proceeding, the latter department may soon absorb at least one third of our total national revenue, and we shall be lashing the backs of Canadian taxpayers to carry a burden almost as intolerable as that endured by the citizens of fear-ridden Europe.

In making these comparisons I am prompted to refer to the remark attributed to the Minister of National Defence, who is reported in the Ottawa Journal of February 10, 1935, as saying:

> In my view there are two guiding principles to be borne in mind in establishing a system of defence. First, we must have a defence force sufficient to control subversive elements from within, and sufficient also, secondly, to repel attacks from without.

At that time, apparently, defence was a secondary consideration. His remarks have been supplemented by numerous public statements by prominent officers in his department. They have said that—

> Discontent is so rampant in Canada that military assistance will soon be needed.

Those are the very words used by Brigadier General Alexander, one of the district officers commanding. It is claimed by these officers that we must have a strong military force at hand at all points in Canada, as military assistance will be needed to quell discontent. For this purpose we also have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for which body we are asked this year to pay over six millions of dollars. If the primary purpose of the military establishment is that of an auxiliary police reserve, as suggested by the minister, we find that we are spending this year something like $42,000,000 for the purpose of policing ourselves. If we are committed to a policy of diverting increasing sums from social security measures to armaments, we are committed to the policy of suppressing discontent instead of removing the causes of discontent. We are simply paving the way for a crisis similar to that which has overtaken many of the countries of Europe and which may destroy our boasted freedom under democracy.

If I understand anything of the temper of the Canadian people, if I have been taught anything by the experiences through which I have passed in recent months, it is that no government need resort to such elaborate measures to deal with subversive elements if it makes an honest attempt to administer simple justice—just simple, plain justice. Nothing could be more subversive of peace, order or good government than to seek to suppress legitimate discontent with the iron heel instead of by measures designed to correct abuses and to right social injustices. Our people in the main recognize a strongly rooted democratic tradition, but nothing could be more calculated to arouse a rebellious mood than the suggested dominance of a military class or the maintenance of the authority of government by force instead of by reasonable persuasion.

In giving consideration to our proposed commitments for the future, we cannot overlook the fact, as I have previously mentioned, that we have already spent since the armistice over $284,000,000 on military preparations. Yet we are brought to the point where it is admitted that we are wholly without defence. We must ignore all this vast expenditure and activity and adopt an entirely new program of defence. This compels us in this house to question the competency of the organization to which in the past these sums have been entrusted. Year after year parliament has voted millions to be expended under the advice of so-called military and naval experts, and without very much examination of the manner in which the money was expended. We have developed a curious reverence for military authority. We have placed our military experts on a sort of pedestal without attempting to question their judgment. It has been accepted that the officers and gentlemen who form the little oligarchy actually in control of the military policy of the National Defence department know all there is to be known with regard to national defence, but we now find, on their own admission, that all their knowledge and all their activity in past years amount to exactly nothing.

This fact alone demands that parliament should insist upon an open and frank discussion in this house of the policies of the department, to discover whether those to whom we entrust our defence are capable of devising effective defence within our resources. I am particularly interested in this matter, for I clearly perceive that upon an outbreak of war we shall be virtually under a military dictatorship, and I want to know if I have to submit to it, that there is reasonable hope that such a dictatorship can efficiently achieve the purpose it is supposed to achieve. I have certainly no desire to live in a country where a man has to step off the sidewalk to make room for a sword-clanking officer, or where in a restaurant one must spring to attention when an officer enters. If the work and expenditure of the past amount to nothing more than a hollow pretence, what are we to expect in the future from expenditures entrusted to the same organization? I suggest that under the circumstances what we need on our general staff is not so much access to additional millions for them to play around with, but just more brains. They have humbugged us about long enough, and the reason for the farce in years past that has been called national defence is not, as they allege, lack of money, but the fact that these millions have been expended for activities that bear no real relation to the problem of defence. They have been fully aware of the imminence of war as it has been developing in the world of late years, yet they have continued to follow the same old customs and traditions of a bygone day, without showing any ability to adapt those traditions to the new technical requirements of to-day. I suggest that they have known, as we now realize, that we can never provide Canada with adequate defence against all comers, and that for that reason they have been merely, I would say, promoting pageants.

I know it will be said that they are a fine body of men, the finest in the land. I know there are many men of ability, integrity and character attached to the department. Nevertheless I submit it is clear that the whole atmosphere of their work and their approach to this problem has been without a commonsense appreciation of realities as we find them in Canada. They have not shown any real grasp of the situation. Too much effort has been expended on training that has nothing whatever to do with defence, but is designed merely for show or perhaps preparation for an overseas contingent in the event of war. They have been vaguely thinking of the next war in the terms of the last one. We can see that. Hon. members have stood in front of these buildings from time to time and witnessed very interesting and colourful military displays. These displays represent real effort and zeal on the part of the officers and men participating—of that there can be no doubt; but what particular value can these displays have with regard to the defence of our shores against invasion by a first-class power? To many it may bring up the memory of bitter moments in the last war, of the stupid and ghastly blunders that were made at the outbreak of war by the general staff. The effective military strategy that later developed came from Britain's amateur soldiers. Thousands of lives were lost as a result of these ghastly and stupid blunders, because professional soldiers without vision were entrusted with great responsibilities and could not readily adapt their ideas to the changes in the requirements of modern warfare. Apparently it has always been so in the British Empire. We are about in the same position in Canada.

If any of us make an earnest endeavour to face this question of defence, we are asked to place blind trust in the advice of an organization in which, because of our experience in the last eighteen years, we have no reason to have confidence. As evidence of this I suggest it is an open secret that the powerfully entrenched clique or national union of generals, colonels and majors who actually control the military policy of Canada offered definite opposition to the very modest plan of reorganization of the department which was recently attempted by the minister. Here I think I should make a few suggestions to the minister. I would suggest that he issue an order forbidding the use of dress uniforms in Canada and the use of uniforms at any time except when a man is actually on duty. We might thus discourage the time and money-wasting activities of individuals whose only apparent function is to strut like peacocks in their gorgeous plumage on ceremonial occasions. If the danger is as great as suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in his recent remarks in this house, and if our main consideration is to resist invaders who may land on our coast, why not more thoroughly overhaul this department? Why not wipe out the unnecessary administrative headquarters of thirteen military districts and establish coastal and defence headquarters on the Atlantic and Pacific with central administrative control at some central point. Eliminate parades and ceremonies that have no other purpose than that of training? If we pay for technical services at rates even higher than those sometimes demanded in industry, why can not the minister demand the same standard of efficiency and the same attention to duty as we find demanded in all branches of competitive industry at this time? Let us have more attention to duty and less attention to the social round; that would make for much greater efficiency. Why should general orders—as we find them in sessional papers—be cluttered up with instructions to officers as to how many buttons there should be here and there, what the width of a dress tie should be, and all that sort of thing, in order that men may appear in their authorized regalia on ceremonial occasions?

I submit that one of the first and most necessary contributions to national defence, and one that should be made before we pay over additional millions, is so to purge the present establishment as to place it on a businesslike and sensible basis. Eliminate patronage, social nonsense and obsolete military routine, and there might be some opportunity for men in that department to do something, men who have some technical knowledge and grasp of the requirements of national defence. If the country wants defence, there might then be some hope of its getting value for its money.

I have followed attentively the debates of this house and particularly the remarks of the ministers of the crown on this subject in a personal effort to make a conscientious approach to this matter, which I consider of vital consequence to our people at this time. I have been trying to reason my way through to a rational approach free from the prejudice, fear and hysteria that usually characterize the consideration of matters of this sort. I find that many people have been made aware, by the remarks of ministers, of some vague external danger, and they have a hazy idea that something should be done about it; but very few have reasoned their way through to a conception of what would constitute an adequate or first-class defence program in Canada. I cannot, for instance, accept the suggestions made in this house recently by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) when he said on the fourth instant that we should have the world's best fleet in our waters, the world's best army in our land, and the world's best air fleet in our own country. I hope I am not doing him an injustice when I quote his remarks apart from the context. I mention this because it illustrates a sentiment that is expressed by some people at this time without any very clear conception of where such reasoning leads them, and the rather preposterous and absurd conclusions that follow from suggestions of that kind. If we are to have the world's finest navy in our waters we shall require one that surpasses the British navy, which has now a naval tonnage of 1,161,000, with something like 200,000 additional tonnage under construction, and a personnel of something like 90,000 seamen. If we were to have the world's finest army we should need an army greater than Germany's or the Soviet union's, 1,300,000 men under arms. And if we were to have the world's greatest air force we should have to have a fleet greater than that of the Soviet union or that of Germany, in excess of 4,000 aircraft. To establish and maintain such an organization would require almost three times the available man power in Canada and it would be necessary for us to conscript women and children to man our industries. It would require at least four times our present total national revenue, reported by the Minister of Finance last year to be something like $372,000,000. As a matter of fact, if we continued along these lines we should so disorganize industry and bankrupt the country that it would not be worth defending. A little sober reflection will convince us that we cannot prepare to shoot it out with all comers.

Nothing would be more dangerous than to create the impression that Canada can rely solely on armaments for defence. Even to attempt anything of the sort would be like a small boy brandishing a toy pistol in the face of a dangerous and well-armed bandit.

I was impressed by the recent remarks of the Minister of Justice on this subject. He spoke feelingly of the necessity of protecting our women and children. Every red-blooded man in this chamber will applaud that sentiment. But from what shall we protect them? Should we not know? As I listened to his remarks I wished that he had spoken with the same tender solicitude for the protection of women and children to-day who are being exposed to, and, if I may use the expression, destroyed by foes even more deadly than those we may have to meet from abroad—poverty, malnutrition and social insecurity. Many thousands of our homes are being laid waste to-day, and we might well consider the advisability of using our knowledge of science at this stage to benefit our people rather than to plot the destruction of our fellow beings.

But what actually are the potential dangers from which we must defend our homes? The minister suggested that the madmen of Europe might break loose and descend upon our shores. He evidently contemplated a combination of either fascist or communist powers that might find it possible to dispatch an expeditionary force with sufficient striking power to seize and occupy Canadian territory. In order that I might explore thoroughly the possibilities of such a menace I took counsel with some of the arm-chair strategists or fireside generals who are so actively engaged in propaganda for bigger and better military preparations, to see just where I stood and to try to strike a definite balance of thought on this matter. I asked them: Do we require defence against the United States? They agreed with me that it is inconceivable that the United States would suddenly develop warlike intentions toward Canada; and if they did, no protection that we might provide would be of avail. Apart from all sentimental considerations, however, the American people would hardly undertake to blow up an enterprise in which they have such a large investment. And what are the potential dangers from across the Atlantic? Are there any powers that are looking longingly at Canada and that could afford to risk the enmity of the United States by attacking Canada? Could any great power or combination of powers develop a striking force that could actually seize and occupy Canadian territory? These strategists suggest that Germany or Italy might mobilize a fleet which would endanger Canada, or that Russia and France might combine on such a venture, or the social democratic governments of Scandinavia, using Ireland or Greenland or Newfoundland as bases from which to direct operations against our shores. But they were not prepared to say what might happen while such enterprises were under way. Could any of these powers, while engaged in striking a blow at Canada, effectively protect their own frontiers, or deal with other obstacles which would certainly arise in their path? Any such development would presuppose the total collapse of Great Britain, in which case we would be very definitely in alliance with the United States. Or, looking across the Pacific, could we reasonably anticipate that Japan might successfully plot the conquest of Canada? Here again they would definitely have to reckon with the United States. Perhaps the forces of the Soviet union might cross the Behring straits and descend upon us from the north on skis.

Every possibility was canvassed, but after exploring every angle of the situation as presented in the world to-day it could not be shown that there was even a remote possibility that any power could seriously consider an attempt to seize and occupy Canadian territory, unless they were crystal gazing. Crystal gazing just about describes many of the statements made by our militaristic friends.

Let us go one step further. Assume that it is within the range of possibility that some first-class power might descend in force on our shores and seize our territory; what would we require in the way of defence? It is estimated by those who have some knowledge of the subject that successfully to resist any such invasion we should require first of all naval squadrons on either coast of at least 250,000 tons with a personnel of 15,000 men. We should require mines, mine-sweepers and mine-layers. We should require fortifications along the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and right down the St. Lawrence to Montreal as formidable as those on the Franco-German frontier, not to overlook the fortifications that would be necessary on Vancouver Island and the lower mainland of British Columbia—yes, and someone suggests Hudson bay. We would require strong mobile forces behind such fortifications. And as transportation systems are vital in a scheme of defence we should practically have to rebuild our railway systems in those areas. In addition we should require at least half a million men under arms, with all the equipment of modern warfare.

Our resources in wealth and man power do not permit us even to start on such a program of defence, in order to be equal to any emergency which we might have to face if Canada were to attempt defence alone, without the friendly intervention of the United States. If we should attempt to proceed too far in that direction we most certainly would be inviting aggression rather than depending on our alliances to remain at peace. If there should be any general outbreak of hostilities the worst we might anticipate, in my opinion, would be sporadic visits of raiders attempting to molest shipping in our harbours, hit and run squadrons or submarines or possibly aircraft. For defence against these raids we do not require any additional expenditure. if we accomplish reasonable concentration on coastal defences so as to make it hazardous for raiders, and so thus effectually ward them off. It does not follow that by providing more costly armaments and more elaborate defences we shall enjoy any greater security or be able to sleep more soundly at night.

After all, when we examine our military and naval preparations we find that we are not simply planning for defence of Canadian shores. It is hypocritical to pretend that such is the case. As I view it, we are planning to intervene on the side of Great Britain in a European struggle. The plans disclosed point clearly to preparations for the training and equipment of an overseas expeditionary force. From every side we read inspired editorials and articles preparing public sentiment for this contingency. An emergency will be declared, the declaration of war in Great Britain will be given effect in Canada, whatever procedure may be followed. Sentiment will run at fever pitch, and little consideration will be given to the causes leading to the outbreak of war. Our military caste, to which we have given so much power, will attempt to move our boys into the appointed place in the line of empire defence. Why else have we ten or twelve imperial officers at present on exchange in Canada? Because the drift of policy is in this direction, it is necessary to point out the danger of costly blunders into which we may be led by over-zealous professional war maniacs.

It may be a magnificent gesture to rush to the assistance of the motherland, but it may not be sound military strategy. Here we are in grave danger of thinking in terms of the last war. Many military strategists agree that in the next war Great Britain may be fighting on three or four fronts, and it may not be feasible to divert sufficient naval strength to convoy troops across the Atlantic, or supplies for the maintenance of such an expeditionary force. It may easily be that we may squander not only our millions, but the lives of thousands of Canadians in vain by considering defence plans on that basis. If we participate in such a war it may prove the better strategy merely to protect our harbours, using our man power in the production of essential war materials. Apart from these considerations we might play a far greater part by interpreting the peaceful intentions and good will of the British people to our great neighbour to the south. The more warlike our intentions, the more we disqualify ourselves for such an important mission.

It has been well said that Canada has no enemies. If we are attacked it will be because of our relationship with Great Britain or of our proximity to the United States. If either of these powers gets us into trouble we have no choice but to rely on it for defence against invasion from a first class enemy power. It is not a question of sponging on the motherland or hiding behind the skirts of the United States, as is so often said in derision. It is vain for us to rely on armaments that we ourselves can provide. There is no point in ruining ourselves merely to satisfy false national pride. In the final analysis the question will be settled, not on a basis of sentiment, but as a matter of good business. Canada will find its defence, in the event of a major outbreak of war, in those alliances made possible because Canada is an important source of essential raw materials, and a source of these materials which will be far removed from the scene of conflict.

It is incredible that we should place our sole reliance for defence on armaments. It has been demonstrated that in modern warfare one of the most important factors is the organization of war industries. Armaments and armies are of little use unless industry is organized to maintain them in action. This organization cannot be accomplished over night. There must be an immediate and continuous supply of goods and munitions. Such a plan cannot be left to chance, as was shown during the last war. If therefore we are asked to make additional sacrifices in order to support the burden of armaments, and if the danger is as great as has been suggested, why has no mention been made of the part that Canadian industry must play in such a program? The planlessness of modern competitive methods will not effectively serve the national interest in a time of grave danger. The authority of the government must be exercised or extended in some degree to assure the efficient maintenance of a national plan which will bring into play the maximum industrial effort. I do not suggest that it should be put into operation now, but our industrial leaders should be warned, and our people should know it, that they must serve the national interest in time of danger, according to plan, as may be determined by the exigencies of the situation.

There is general agreement, I find, that war profiteering activities should be restricted not only during war but in advance of war. There are few who served in the last war who do not remember with some bitterness the inequalities of sacrifice and duty imposed on the Canadian people at that time. The results of those inequalities are still painfully apparent. We may not be able to equalize the sacrifices of war, but at least we can plan to demand the same level of patriotism on the economic plane as may be demanded in the field. We do not agree, as was suggested by the Prime Minister, that we should await the outbreak of war to face this issue, or that men should lay down their lives with the incentive only of patriotism while others should engage in war production in comparative security with the incentive of profit. Such measures to be effective in order to restrain war profiteering should be introduced now. The issue has been faced already in the United States, and plans have been prepared. There is no valid reason why, if we are truly interested in an effective defence program, we should not now introduce similar measures in Canada.

Such measures would serve a twofold purpose. They would provide for more adequate defence and at the same time would act as a deterrent to unwise and reckless war sentiment. I do not suggest for a moment that our business men are consciously conspiring to provoke war, but I do know that there are branches of the armament industry in Canada. As has been suggested already by the Prime Minister, these people manufacture armaments for profit and only for profit, and their greatest profit is found in a time such as this, when fears are aroused and armament competition is keen. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the anticipation of war profits, as we find it existing at present in Canada, has the effect of arousing a dangerous pre-war psychology. I ask hon. members to consider the situation as it exists in Canada to-day, to examine the stock market quotations, particularly with regard to the stocks of firms engaged in the manufacture of armaments. Go down the list one by one and you will find that there has been an increase of one hundred per cent in capital profit in the last six months. The profiteers are now casting in on the profits of the next war.

The danger of the situation is that Canadian industry is finding too great an investment in the making of war. Canadian industry is being offered too great an incentive, a dangerous temptation, to inspire a pre-war pyschology. In Great Britain they are well aware of this danger. They have instituted measures to audit, to restrict and in some measure to control profits made on the manufacture of munitions and war equipment. They have instituted measures to license the export of war materials. We have taken no such steps in Canada. We apparently prefer to close our eyes to the situation which exists and to go on our way. I direct the attention of members to the increase in our shipments to Morocco, as follows:

September	$ 1,929
October	16,461
November	4,392
December	4,836
1936
September	$296,752
October	291,135
November	678,101
December	505,809

It will be seen that in the last two months of 1936 our exports increased by over half a million dollars per month. Unquestionably large profits are being made on material exported to Morocco for the assistance of the fascist insurgents in Spain. Already we have a large investment in the making of war.

It is generally recognized by financial experts that if we should face another war emergency the government could not possibly finance along orthodox lines. Financial writers generally agree with that conclusion. In this connection I would refer to the findings brought down by a committee of the senate of the United States, after an exhaustive study of various aspects of this question. I need not detain the house by reading the report at length, but it points out that immediately upon the outbreak of war the country is overtaken by dangerous inflation, and that unless preparation is made in advance no steps can be taken then to defend a country against what is described as a very subtle foe.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government is not justified in asking for greater expenditures on armaments until a defence program has been brought down which also includes measures to provide for:

1. Heavy and sharply graduated taxes on incomes in the higher brackets, with fewer exemptions and heavier penalties.

2. Provision whereby the government may draft "useful" industrial management into the military service at military rates of pay.

3. A system for control of commodities and commodity exchange.

4. A system for control of securities and securities exchange, and supervision of new issues.

5. Provision for the government to fix and regulate prices, establish priorities and conscript the use of necessary property and equipment.

If the government intends to assume authority to demand the lives of our young men can it in all justice refuse to exercise some authority over the property of individuals? If this were done there would be a great deal less enthusiasm for war preparations on the part of those who now hope to escape sacrifice.

A defence program is not a defence program in the strict sense of the term unless it incorporates such provisions as I have suggested. Since no such provisions are now incorporated in our proposed defence program I can very well understand why business leaders everywhere are giving it their approval. They quite openly state in their public remarks that it will afford a very satisfactory and profitable stimulus to business at this time. We hear these words from the same men who have been actively advocating a reduction in our relief expenditure and the elimination from the relief lists of so called racketeers. When we consider how in the past contracts have been made and orders for supplies have been placed with various firms in Canada we can readily understand why their mouths are now watering at the prospect of a generous cut from this juicy melon. Unless some control is exercised in the public interest I predict that this expenditure will become nothing more or less than a camouflaged pork barrel, and the painful part is that it will be artfully draped with the folds of the familiar red, white and blue of our ensign.

Another thing that apparently has been overlooked is the fact that we will require men to man our guns, men who are physically fit and technically trained. If we are to expand our armament preparation we must face the issue of compulsory military service in Canada, even as they are facing that issue in Great Britain at the present time. I have no hesitation in saying that compulsory military service in time of peace is repugnant to Canadian traditions. Nevertheless we must take it for granted that compulsory military service must come sooner or later if we are to prepare for war. Whether or not we rely upon voluntary enlistment in the meantime we must face this problem, as they had to face it in Great Britain, that a large percentage of our young men at this time are below the physical standards usually set for military service. It has been admitted that our military organization does not intend to assume any particular responsibility with regard to the physical fitness of our young men or their technical training. Apparently they are regarded simply as another crop of cannon fodder. One point was stressed over and over again by our late corps commander, General Sir Arthur Currie. I believe I may not with propriety quote his words concerning national defence, but I may observe that on this one point he had vision. He said, that given the right leadership, if we had in Canada physically fit young men we might cheerfully face any emergency of defence. He added however that one of the most important factors is that we should have available for military service men who are physically fit.

Men cannot be made fit in any brief space of time. I suggest that if we are in earnest about the problem of national defence we cannot overlook the serious and tragic position of our young men of to-day. It has been officially reported that approximately 150,000 men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five are without gainful employment, which means that they are without the opportunity to make themselves fit and without opportunities to acquire any form of technical knowledge. We now propose to divert millions of dollars for armament and thereby still further deprive them of opportunities they have a right to expect. Certainly increased armaments spell lowered living standards for the workers of Canada.

I have found that many of these young men are now reaching manhood without the slightest chance of even having the necessary diet with which to build up physical stamina necessary to meet the struggle of life, let alone the more severe tests of warfare. We cannot justify the purchase of naval vessels and war equipment until we give these young men in the pursuits of peace an opportunity to realize more fully the rights of their manhood. If we are sincere about the defence of our women and children we should realize that our greatest bulwark and protection is a young Canadian manhood, physically fit, technically trained and with a stake in the country they are asked to defend. If they are made ready and given an opportunity to play their part in the development of our country in peaceful endeavour, they will not fail it in any defence emergency.

I submit we are being asked to support measures of defence which offer no defence. We are being asked to jeopardize our social security and to perpetuate social inequalities without the assurance that there will be additional security against danger from war. In the name of national defence we are facing commitments which mean anything but the defence of Canadian soil or Canadian homes. We desire peace, and we are taking the road to war. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the situation demands a straightforward statement from the government as to its intentions for the future.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, It is with some hesitation that I rise to follow the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) who has just placed before the house a complete analysis both of the estimates for the Department of National Defence and of the situation surrounding the entire defence problem.

At the outset I am going to ask the government to give the house an answer to the question which has been asked again and again this session with respect to foreign policy, and to present to us an outline of the policy which Canada is at present pursuing. For we insist that not a dollar should be expended for national defence, so-called, until we in this country know precisely the policy which makes that defence necessary.

Students of foreign affairs know well that invariably parliaments base their defence programs upon their foreign policies. I believe that is particularly true of Great Britain. Her naval, military and air force estimates are framed by experts on the basis of the policy laid down by the foreign office. In this chamber we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the person of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and we are asking that before we are called upon to vote the estimates he lay before the house the precise policy which undoubtedly he has placed before the Department of National Defence and upon which these increased estimates are based. We cannot discuss the estimates intelligently without such outline. I believe it is the right and duty of parliament to receive the statement and to consider the advice given.

Up to two years ago estimates in Great Britain were based upon what was known as the ten-year rule—that is, that there would be no major outbreak of war within a period of ten years. But obviously in the past year or two that basis has been abandoned, and it seems to me that the present estimates for Canadian defence are also based upon an abandonment of the idea that there will be no major war in the near future. What, may I ask, has made the change in imperial policy necessary? Was it not the determination of great imperial interests to disregard their league responsibilities and at all costs to defend the economic imperialism they had established over regions in Africa and Asia, and over which they still wished to continue undisputed mandate or control? We find that simultaneously with the resultant breakdown in the ideal of collective security, Canada is faced with an increase in her national defence estimates. Is there a connection between the imperial policy and the increase in our estimates?

We are told by the Prime Minister that if war should come, Canada would decide. But, taking these estimates at their face value, it seems to me that some sort of decision has already been made. We contend that information regarding any such decision should be given to parliament. Apparently, that some understanding exists, is the point of view of Sir Samuel Hoare, whose policies were repudiated a little more than a year ago by the British people, and the statesman upon whose shoulders probably more than upon those of any other rests the responsibility for the overthrow of what we might call the collective system of security. A few days ago, on February 6, Sir Samuel Hoare was reported in the Montreal Gazette as follows:

> Sir Samuel referred to the empire's unity in the major developments of the last twenty years—the outbreak of the war in 1914, the illness of George V in 1928, the silver jubilee in 1935, King George's death and the abdication crisis.
> He urged expansion and development of a common outlook iln the empire through economic development and the study of imperial defence problems.
> "I believe these two fields are closely connected. For unless we do our utmost to foster the economic development of the empire the units that compose it will not be economically right enough to take their full share of empire responsibilities."

In these words, it seems to me we find the fundamental basis of those vested financial and economic interests which have from time to time crippled the League of Nations because their policies, to use Sir Samuel Hoare's own words, have been based "upon the expansion and development of a common outlook in the empire through economic development and the study of imperial defence." Obviously in his mind economic interests and armaments were closely related, and a league of nations which did not serve those eternal interests, as they have been called, had to be disregarded from time to time. If it is not for such interests that we are asked to vote millions to prepare our sons for the slaughter, let the government answer the question by telling us upon what other policy this demand for increased armaments is based; and until that has been done clearly, I maintain that we should unanimously oppose the increase in these estimates. If, then, the government can justify a war preparedness program, let us immediately prepare for war, as was suggested by my friend from Vancouver North, by organizing our potential war industries for national defence, and let us make them perform their service, not without recompense, but for the equivalent of the $1.10 a day which this country gave its soldiers in the last war.

In spite of the defence of the International Nickel Company, for example, which was made by one of our Liberal friends from the other side of the house the other evening, with its profit of $23,000,000 in the first nine months of last year, I say that under these conditions, with the people fearing war, no corporation should be allowed to make that amount of profit in an industry which is in large measure an industry based on preparation for war. If we are to call upon the Canadian people to make sacrifices, let these great war industries set the example of sacrifice first, and now. That is our suggestion. Otherwise we should not vote an additional dollar for preparedness.

In an interview given a few days ago at Jamaica, the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, speaking of the tremendous so-called defence expenditures, had this to say:

> The world is going mad. At the present moment we are spending $1,500,000,000 for armaments.

That, may I add, was before the announcement the other evening of the additional war loan for $2,000,000,000 that is proposed in Great Britain. Mr. Lloyd George continued:

> Ten years ago the entire world spent $3,500,000,000 for armaments, and now it is spending $12,500,000,000. They have almost quadrupled it in the past ten years, and it is still going up.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

The report continues:

> The veteran British Liberal leader was bitter about the huge sums the mother country was spending on rearmament while "we have found it very difficult to get a few millions for the relief of suffering in the distressed areas.
> For a very small proportion of that sum of money we could have had unbelievable empire development; but no, the whole money is to go to the dogs of war."

Now the question we are asking is this: Are we in Canada going to join in this mad race without knowing precisely the policy that underlies the increased estimates upon which we shall shortly have to vote? Our answer in this little group is, of course, no, because we believe that such defence preparations only breed fear, and that hate, which, in turn, is the child of fear.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), speaking in the house this session, devoted a good deal of attention to the relationship between armaments and Canadian neutrality. He argued that increased armaments and neutrality go together, that if we want to remain outside of an impending conflict we must see to it that we shall be able to defend the women and children of our country if madmen should attack us. Does he really believe that our women and children are in any danger of attack from without? Have they not endured great suffering and an attack upon their standards of living from within for the last few years? And have they not needed even greater expenditures for their protection during those years than they have enjoyed? Is not this the attack that we should have been considering, rather than endeavouring to justify preparations for the slaughter of the grown-up children of the very women in whose names attempts are made to justify these defence estimates?

Writing in 1914, shortly after the outbreak of the great war, Lord Grey had this to say of such preparedness:

> The increase of armaments that is intended in each nation to produce consciousness of strength and a sense of security does not produce these effects.
> On the contrary, it produces the consciousness of strength of other nations and a sense of fear. The enormous growth of armaments in Europe, the sense of insecurity and fear caused by them—it was these that made war inevitable.

And yet in the face of such opinions we who are separated from the volcanoes of Europe and Asia by mighty oceans, we who live in peace and amity beside a great people to the south, are being called upon to make preparations for war and to join in what I might term potential international suicide, which, unless checked, will become a reality.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) the other evening ridiculed the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and his plea for neutrality, by asking of what use his neutrality resolution would be in the face of an invader approaching our shores. May I ask the Secretary of State of what use two second-hand destroyers would be in the case of an invader coming to our shores? May I also ask him if he really thinks a neutral Canada could or would be invaded by a European or an Asiatic foe? Any nation embarking on such a mad adventure would have to come across a minimum of 3,000 miles of water. Apart from the Monroe doctrine and the statement of President Roosevelt made at Buenos Aires a short time ago, the feat is a military impossibility, and intelligent naval and military men know it. Mussolini, for example, did not begin his Ethiopian war until he had assembled some four hundred thousand troops in Africa. These he required to subdue ten million primitive Abyssinians. I venture to say that to subdue ten million Canadians equipped with our present defences and industrial development would require the transportation of at least as many men, and there is not a single nation in the world, including Great Britain which has sufficient ships to do this effectively, even if we had no friends and no allies. For public men to frighten timid and ill-informed folk with threats of overseas invasion is, if I might use the term employed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) the other evening, to do violence to their own intelligence and the intelligence of this nation. Moreover, an invading force must always reckon on a possible retreat. That is a fundamental of military strategy. The great Prussian general Blücher was asked by his emperor if he could land an army in England. He answered, "Yes, your majesty, but how would we get back?" That is the problem which an invader must always face.

I say, then, that these estimates cannot be construed as defence estimates, but that in reality they provide for the training and equipping of a potential expeditionary force to send abroad. The government may not consciously believe that that is the interpretation we should put upon them, but in view of the fact that we do not need these defence forces for the defence of our own shores, or an increase in that defence, what other interpretation is possible? Or again the government may say, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that when the time comes Canada will decide. But we know that when war hysteria comes, the people will be governed by newspaper, radio and other propaganda. We know that to our sorrow. Even under conditions such as we now have, newspapers at any time are liable to tell their writers that they must put the soft pedal on criticisms of national defence. Those of us who have been reading the editorials in some papers friendly to the government now in office know that there has been a change of attitude during the past few months. To-day sedulously they are saying that the people must decide this, that and the other thing, but all the time they are endeavouring to show the people that we must prepare for war. We also know this, that upon the declaration of war the people will not know the truth of the situation. Somebody once said that in war truth is the first casualty, and when we look back on the great war and we realize the preposterous things that we were told in order to drive men at each others' throats—told in English, in German, in French, in Italian—we know beyond doubt that truth was the first casualty of the great war. That war taught us that lying is a necessary military device, and if propaganda is artfully and carefully placed before them, war lies will take into war even a peace-loving and generous people; even the Canadian people.

Some people have said that in part our opposition to the defence estimates is due to our distrust of the policies of the national government of Great Britain. I think that is partly true. Moreover, the judgment recently rendered by the privy council makes me all the more careful in dealing with these estimates. I am looking forward with a good deal of interest to the interpretation to this house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) of the meaning of the references to, for example, Canada's power to make treaties, and references to Canada's legal subservience, to a degree at least, to the will of the imperial parliament. To some extent in the light of those utterances I am anxious that we shall carefully consider the problem before us. Unfortunately no government has done more than has the present national government of Great Britain to undermine faith in the League of Nations.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was one of those who hoped when the great war ended that the British commonwealth of nations would form within the league a nucleus around which collective security for all the world might ultimately be achieved. I confess that to-day I am sadly disillusioned in that regard. Though I believe that the league offered a great ideal to our people and that we must rebuild the League of Nations, I recognize that the British national government quite lately undermined the league. Let me point out one or two incidents that, I think, make that clear. Speaking at Glasgow on November 22, 1934, Mr. Baldwin said:

> It is curious that there is growing among the Labour party support for what is called a collective peace system. Well now, a collective peace system in my view is perfectly impracticable.

Mr. Baldwin proceeded to state his reasons for his conclusion that the collective peace system under the League of Nations was "hardly worth considering." Yet less than six months later we find Mr. Anthony Eden, one of the members of his cabinet, stating:

> It is clear that our part should be to pursue a foreign policy that is frank, stalwart and above all firm in support of the League of Nations and of the collective peace system.

Less than two weeks after that Mr. Baldwin himself stated:

> The League of Nations is the sheet anchor of British foreign policy.

Why this extraordinary example of blowing cold and blowing hot in relation to the league? This is an example of the attitude that has undermined confidence in the league. In my opinion it was not unrelated to the fact that during the intervening six months a peace ballot had been taken in Great Britain and overwhelmingly the British people had shown their faith in the league and in some measure of collective security within the league.

The dictatorships that threaten the world are made, perhaps, more real by the approach of a war. Most of us in this house realize, I believe, that if through our defence preparedness, through our military commitments, we plunge into war, we too may lose, as other nations undoubtedly will lose, democratic institutions upon entry into war. I desire to see no form of dictatorship.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman used the phrase "military commitments." Is he suggesting that this country has any military commitments?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not catch the question.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman used the phrase "military commitments." The question is, is he suggesting that this country has at the moment any military commitments?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am suggesting that these estimates and the large increase in the amount appropriated imply that we have in effect understandings which may be interpreted as commitments. That is my interpretation, because, as I said a few moments ago, I cannot see any reason for these increases unless we contemplate the use of our military machine in a war, and as far as we in Canada are concerned, I can see no possibility of such a war in the immediate future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must deny categorically and immediately what my hon. friend has said. There are no commitments and no understandings in the nature of commitments between this government and the government of Great Britain or any other government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to hear that; but may I say that with the increased estimates, with the presence of ten British military gentlemen in our militia department, the inference which I drew from these two facts was, I think, warranted under the circumstances. I am glad to get the Prime Minister's denial, which, of course, I accept.

Mr. DUNNING: But the hon. member keeps on repeating the statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Finance says that I have repeated the statement. I have repeated it, and I have repeated it designedly because up to this time I, at least, have heard no denial of the particular statement.

Mr. DUNNING: In the plainest of terms this session.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are opposed to the estimates because they move in the direction of war, because they deny to our people the social services which they need. You cannot under present conditions spend millions in armaments and provide the people with the social services which they lack. And when we hear the statement made that these appropriations are necessary to cope with the possibilities of subversive elements within our own country, I would observe that there is only one way to deal with subversive elements and that is to make conditions such that subversive elements will not appear and expand. That is the only way. Repression breeds revolt.

Surely our generation, at least, should have learned our lesson from the last war. Let me point out that had we spent for the good of humanity the billions which were spent in that war, the world would not now be faced with the types of dictatorship that prevail in many countries. The Manchester Guardian summarized the physical loss to the world very well when, in February, 1931, it made this very careful appraisal of the war expenditures:

> With the war costs it would have been possible to provide every family in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia, Belgium, Germany, and Russia with a home costing $2,500 standing on a five acre plot, equipped with furniture worth $1,250 and to provide each group of 20,000 families with hospitals and educational institutions and pay the salaries of teachers, doctors, professors and nurses to operate these social services.

I am convinced, therefore, that if we in Canada are to progress we must stand clear of this mad race for armaments which can lead only to war. On the other hand, if this house decides that we are going to prepare for war, then I submit that those who believe we should prepare, should bring down proposals which are in line with that preparedness. I would not support them, but I maintain that the next war will be a chemical war, a war of scientists, and under the conditions which are likely to exist, our government, if it is going to prepare for war at all, should do it as economically and as efficiently as possible. Call in the best scientists you have in the country, chemists and others, and let them prepare the most horrible gases they can think of. Let them assemble the most terrible germs of the type the nations will use, and let them prepare adequately for the real war that they foreshadow in the future. And as for our young men, as my colleague from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has said, we should care for their physique and health for, after all, in any form of defence we need well-nurtured, well-developed bodies. As far as I am concerned, however, I oppose such war preparations. I oppose war because I do not believe in war, and I conscientiously object to it. But there is another thing that I believe, and it is this: that when people talk about the inevitability of war, at any rate let them not say that participation in war is a Christian duty.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I desire to speak to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The amendment reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people."

I do not at present intend to raise a question of order or procedure with reference to this amendment, although that could be done. I intend at the moment to point out the absolute inconsistency of this double-barrelled amendment. If the two hon. gentlemen, the mover and the seconder of the amendment, had been content this afternoon merely to express their disapproval of the increase in the estimates for the Department of National Defence, they could very well have concluded the phraseology of their amendment with the words "national armament," and that would have been a vote of want of confidence in this administration with respect to the estimates submitted to this house and to the committee afterwards for its approval.

What have they done? They have built up an alternative program, and thereby they are inviting every hon. member when he comes to record his vote, which if it were in support of this resolution would be a vote of no confidence in this administration, not only to express his disapproval of the extension of the estimates of the Departmental of National Defence, but to express approbation of the measures of social security which would be adopted under the political philosophy with which my friends are identified. In other words, they are asking this House of Commons not only to express disapproval of the essential measures which have been proposed, not for purposes of war but for the security of this dominion at this time, but to endorse the political philosophy which my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has been preaching in this house and outside for many years.

Now, may I recall the occasion in February 1933, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved a resolution which concluded with these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should immediately take measures looking to the setting up of a cooperative commonwealth in which all natural resources and the socially necessary machinery of production will be used in the interests of the people and not for the benefit of the few.

What took place? Speaking in the debate which followed the introduction of that resolution, the right hon. leader of the opposition at that time, now the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) outlined to the house and to the country an alternative program of social reconstruction and for social security throughout Canada, and that program consisted of the fourteen points and principles upon which the Liberal party went to the country in 1935, and which were endorsed by the biggest majority that any government has had in this house since confederation. So, I say, if they merely disapprove the estimates for national defence, why not say so boldly and bluntly, without intriguing through their amendment for some approbation of the political philosophy embodied in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation program?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Or the Liberal program.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the hon. gentleman intend to imply that the political philosophy of this group alone represents a program of social security for the Canadian people?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I implied the very opposite. His leader definitely specified in that resolution the remedies he proposed for providing social security for the Canadian people, and that policy was completely repudiated and rejected by the Canadian people in 1935.

I desire now very briefly to deal with some of the submissions made by the hon. member for Vancouver North. In the first place he says this is a declaration that Canada must now prepare for war. With all the knowledge I have of the preparation of these estimates I contend that they could not, by the wildest flight of imagination, be said to be designed to prepare Canada for war. These estimates—every cent of them—are intended only for the security of the Canadian people. The hon. member speaks of social security. I ask him this question: If he and I worked all our lives for the promotion by legislation and otherwise of social security for the Canadian people within this dominion, could that security be safeguarded if our national security were imperilled by a wanton assault from an enemy without? National security at all times must come first. I am sure that every hon. member, according to his particular political and economic philosophy, is glad and proud to do all he can to build up the fabric of social security within the confines of our territory. But national security, national defence, the direct defence of Canada, of our coastal areas, our ports, our shipping terminals, our territorial waters, the focal areas of our trade routes adjacent to our harbour mouths—there are the matters dealt with in these estimates. May I tell my hon. friend there is no new defence policy embodied in these estimates. There is no new policy here at all. These estimates represent only an honest attempt by those who for the time being are charged with responsibility for the national well-being, to see to it that we have something effective and efficient for the purposes of direct defence of Canada or for defending our neutrality should it be assailed by anyone outside.

I intend to deal with this further in detail after the recess, but the hon. member for Vancouver North said we are replacing the peace establishment with a war establishment. That is utter nonsense. We are not only not replacing the peace establishment with a war establishment, but during the short time I have been in charge of the Department of National Defence, we have reduced the military establishment of this country from 135,000 to 90,000; in fact we have done that within twelve months. All we are doing now is to see to it that this small force shall be properly equipped. The hon. member quoted General Currie, saying that we had men in Canada who can defend Canada. Yes, sir, we have, I believe, the finest men in the whole world. But is he going to send his comrades, our Canadian citizens, to the coastal areas of Canada to defend our shores without guns, without equipment, or with equipment that the enemy can outrange by hundreds of thousands of yards? Is he going to send them with obsolete equipment, some of it twenty years old? When he says we have men to defend our shores, I say, yes, we have, and they will defend them; the men of every province are ready and willing to defend Canada's shores. But it is the duty of this government, it would be the duty of any government entrusted with the responsibility of office at the present time, to see to it that our Canadian boys, if they have to defend our shores, are armed and equipped with the most modern and efficient machinery of defence that the resources of this country can provide. That is the entire policy of this administration with reference to this question of defence.

The hon. member said that warlike preparations bring a warlike attitude. I have not seen any warlike preparations. I have heard much discussion about the expansion of our naval program. Let us see what it amounts to. The entire increase of the Canadian navy is one little training ship in Nova Scotia. Yet I have heard people hush-hushing around about the great new naval policy of this administration. My hon. friend talked about cruisers. Unfortunately we have no cruisers in this country. When we took office last year we had two efficient modern destroyers, and two old and obsolete destroyers, which did not even belong to us, which are with us on loan from the British admiralty. The only change is that we have purchased from the British admiralty two practically new efficient destroyers—four years old—of the same type that we built in 1931, and in two or three months' time we shall have four destroyers, just as we have had for several years. That is all, except that the two we have acquired from the British admiralty are more modern and better equipped and more serviceable for the essential services of the defence of our Canadian coast line and harbours than the two which were demilitarized recently.

Then there is provision for four mine sweepers. I think the item in the estimates is about $750,000; the total cost will be around $1,000,000. These will be built in Canadian yards. There is nothing new in that. We had four mine sweepers ever since 1920 until they became obsolete; we have one still which is very nearly obsolete, hardly fit for active service. So, in regard to the $1,000,000 proposed to be expended upon mine sweepers, there is no new policy there. We are trying, sir, to repair the gaps; we are trying to maintain the modest naval force we have had in this country for years.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They cannot be sent to the battlefields of Europe.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They certainly cannot. I think my hon. friend himself proved that; they could not possibly cross those 3,000 miles of which he has spoken.

One of the hon. gentlemen spoke of the impossibility of attack by air. I wonder whether he recalls the great flight of General Balbo's squadron from Italy, over Montreal and on to Chicago, a few years ago. I wonder whether he saw in the press about ten days ago a description of the flight of a squadron of United States battle planes to Honolulu. I wonder whether he read a description which appeared in the press the other day of the manoeuvres at Singapore, with combined operations of the British fleet, the British air force and some other forces. I wonder whether my hon. friend has studied the bill passed by the United States in 1935, which bill particularly provided for the defence of that great republic against air attacks by nations three thousand miles and more distant. So, when my hon. friend pits his marvellous, strategic brain against wise counsel and wise influences, in reference to these matters, I think he is going a little too far.

Then the hon. gentleman said we wanted a calm, cool appraisal of this problem. I think by the time this discussion has been concluded it will be found to be very complete from his point of view. We have nothing to hide; we are only too glad to explain every single item with reference to the expenditures on national defence. As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, there is no idea whatever of sending a single Canadian soldier overseas in any expeditionary force, and there is not a single cent providing for that in the estimates this house will be asked to vote. I say again to my hon. friend, with reference to our friendly relations with the great republic to the south, that there is no idea of any possible conflict with that country, and not one cent is provided for that purpose. We have an appreciation of our happy relationship with the United States extending over one hundred years, during which we have had peace, harmony and accord with that great republic, and under these estimates not a single cent is to be expended for the purpose of protection against that country. We believe, we know, protection is not necessary in that direction.

We have in this dominion, sir, a tremendous territory with two ocean flanks. Under modern conditions of warfare, which have changed so drastically in the last few years, it is the opinion of many of those who advise us that our flanks may be vulnerable. When the hon. member for Vancouver North referred to these estimates, he spoke of Canada becoming a highly militarized nation. I wonder whether I would shock hon. members if I told the house the truth. Later on this evening I am going to place upon Hansard the per capita expenditures upon armaments of every nation in Europe and every nation on the South American continent, as compared with Canada, as well as the per capita expenditure of those nations which my hon. friends visited and from which they returned with such evidence of admiration. I refer to Sweden, Norway and Denmark, and also that great nation of permanent neutrality, Switzerland. What is the comparison? As against our per capita expenditure last year of $1.77; as against Australian per capita expenditure last year of $5.28, we have the per capita expenditure of Switzerland upon armaments soaring to $19.50. Yet it is said that because of an increase of eleven and a half million dollars in the defence estimates we are becoming a highly militarized nation. The neutrality of Switzerland is guaranteed, but despite that fact—or possibly because of it—her per capita expenditures have mounted sky-high so that to-day they stand at $19.50. And the expenditures of Sweden, to which my hon. friend referred so eloquently, socialist Sweden—and I do not say that with disrespect—are very much higher per capita than are those of Canada. I admit that there are two obscure nations on the South American continent whose per capita expenditures for defence are slightly lower than the Canadian figure, but those are the only two countries I can find in that category.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with this fact and all this talk of war on the part of my hon. friends does not touch the essential problem: Can we afford to neglect altogether the question of national security? That is the question. With reference to the Department of National Defence, I listened to the criticism of the hon. member for Vancouver North. Certainly what he said is not in accordance with the facts; but even assuming that it might be true, the two alternatives confronting this or any other government worthy of the name would be these: Either abolish the Department of National Defence altogether or try to make that department efficient, and that is all we are trying to do at this time. We are making a definite effort to provide an efficient defence department in the Dominion of Canada; it is becoming efficient, and next year it will be more efficient than it is at the present time.

The hon. member for Vancouver North seems to have a particular dislike for some of the higher officers of the department. I wish to say to him at this time that most of those officers served Canada in the great war. Many of them served, as my hon. friend himself did, in the very honourable capacity of private soldiers. Many of them were seriously wounded and disabled in the great war. To-day, sir, in the competitions in which they take part with officers from other nations, I believe they are as well possessed of initiative and as well qualified to advise on questions of strategy as are the officers of any country in the world. As proof of that, let me cite this instance. A few days ago, in one of the colleges overseas, two of our Canadian boys, taking a course of training there, were placed first and second among those attending that school.

Does it do us any good as Canadians to have the quality and calibre of those who are doing all they can for their country, those who have great records as Canadians, maligned and impugned in this House of Commons? I do not think it does. I know these men and I know they are striving to do their very best for the protection and the defence of this dominion. The best proof which can be given of that is the fact that they are the first to be called upon if Canadian defence becomes an actuality. So I do not think we should criticize these men unduly. I have great admiration for their ability in the naval services, limited as they are; in the air services, limited as they are, and in the militia services. We have at the head of our militia training in this dominion men who have won the highest decorations in the whole empire practically; yet my hon. friend says they are unable to give us proper and expert advice. Then, to show his wonderful consistency, he proceeds to say that he has consulted with some of them—I gathered that it was in a clandestine way, not officially—and they told him that there was no danger of attack by a country 3,000 miles away. The best opinions to-day indicate that we are not invulnerable to such attacks.

Then my hon. friend went on to speak about social conditions in my own city, and I want to tell him this: Just as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said in this house the other day that those who believe in increasing the estimates for defence have no monopoly of patriotism, so I say to the hon. member for Vancouver North, to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in this house or in the country have no monopoly of a real desire to help the struggling masses in the Dominion of Canada.

Then my hon. friend spoke of this "farce called national defence." I suggest that that was hardly worthy of a member of this house, because it reflects upon our Canadian citizens. There is nothing militaristic about any of the plans which are before the house at the present time. I have described what was done in regard to the navy, and this is only a humble attempt to repair the deficiencies in equipment that resulted from the years of depression in Canada. What was the result of those years of depression? There was no equipment for the training of our military service in Canada. I shall tell, later on, what we have done during the last year. We have taken some effective action, and this year we intend to pursue that course and to take further action along those lines.

The point I wish to establish is this: There is no expansion, no extension, no increase—we have only been making effective and efficient what we have at the present time. I concede that there is some increase in the air force. If hon. members will look back through the estimates of former years when this party was in power, they will find that about seven and a half million dollars were expended, and that probably through the necessities which arose during years of depression that amount was reduced to one and a quarter million dollars. Sixty-nine officers and two hundred air men were discharged from their duties. Some of those men were of the finest trained air men we had in Canada.

Once again I say we are trying to make good what was lost to Canada through policies which had to be pursued during years of depression. This year we are, I concede, increasing the personnel of our air force. We are to build more aeroplanes in Canada. May I tell the house that when this government took office in October, 1935, there was not a single fighting aeroplane in Canada; there was not a single bomb to be dropped by an aeroplane; there was scarcely any amount of ammunition for guns. If I were to hold office without looking after these details, I could be accused of treason to the high office I now have the honour to occupy. It was my duty to protect our Canadian people, knowing the conditions which prevailed in Canada at that time.

The policy of the present government is not one of seeking war; it is not a policy of affronting enemies. It is a peace loving policy, and every hon. member of the government and all private members in the house, including those who have expressed themselves, have no desire for war. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said a few days ago, we detest war. We love peace, and will do all we can to preserve it. There are no commitments, no understandings, no agreements, open or secret, of any kind. The hon. member for Vancouver North seems to think there are. He said something about a blank cheque to be written in blood, or used some fearsome phrase such as that. I wish to say that I was in London for five or six days in connection with the great Vimy pilgrimage. At that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) was engaged in connection with the continuance of the trade treaty between the United Kingdom and Canada. Never was any suggestion made to me—and I am sure there was never one made to him—with reference to an agreement, blank or otherwise.

It is important that the country and the house should know these things. It is well that this talk, bludgeoning the house into fearsome fright with reference to war, which was indulged in by the hon. member for Vancouver North, should be discouraged. The house should know, without further discussion, for what purpose the estimates are intended. As I said before, they are entirely for the protection of Canadian shores, the protection of Canadian homes, the protection of Canadian shipping terminals and harbours. A few days ago someone said in the house that parliament might have power to regulate Canadian neutrality. May I say that any student of the law of neutrality knows that any other belligerent, without consulting this parliament, may declare us to be belligerents, and that we have not the power to protect our own neutrality.

So, Mr. Speaker, up to this point I have dealt only with the remarks of the mover and seconder of the amendment. After recess, I intend to explain exactly what these estimates are for, and to show that they are for the direct defence of Canada and for the defence of Canadian neutrality.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to reply to some of the points which were raised in the course of the discussion on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North and seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Since then I have examined certain notes which I took in the course of their remarks, and I should like now to deal with one or two of their observations before I proceed to a considered analysis of the present situation.

The hon. member for Vancouver North referred, during his remarks on the estimates for national defence, to conditions existing among ex-service men in the Dominion of Canada. Seeing that he and I have had the pleasure for many years, some twenty years now, of working together on many committees, both doing the best we could for the cause of ex-service men in this country, and seeing that there has been in this house for the last twenty years almost, ever since the armistice, a well-defined tradition that any legislation affecting ex-service men should not be interjected into any contentious or acrimonious debate, I was indeed surprised at the remarks made by my hon. friend. But when he referred to the Hyndman report and to the attitude of ex-service men, I think I am entitled to quote at this time a declaration of policy in regard to these very estimates which was made recently in the capital city of Canada by the Canadian Legion, of which my hon. friend as well as I are old members. This was the Canadian Legion's declaration of policy:

(1) That the Canadian Legion believes that the first essential toward the promotion of world peace is universal disarmament to a point consistent with preservation of order within national territorial limits, and the efficient policing of the seas.

(2) But in view of the fact that efforts made since the war toward procuring universal disarmament have, thus far, been unsuccessful, and that as a result the nations of the world are now rearming to a greater degree than ever before and, in view of the fact that certain of the great powers do not adhere to the League of Nations, and that others, on occasion, have flaunted its decisions, the Canadian Legion believes that the time has now come when the people of Canada should give consideration to the problem of national defence.

(3) That in view of the fact that since the passage of the Statute of Westminster Canada is now an independent nation within the commonwealth of the British Empire, it is necessary that Canada should assume the responsibilities of nationhood, and that we should not rely upon the United Kingdom for our defence by sea or land.

(4) That we, therefore, believe that it is essential that Canada should, forthwith, develop a defence policy which, in the first place, would be designed to enable us to effectively defend our neutrality in case of war and protect our trade and commerce, and ultimately enable us to defend our eastern and western coasts from aggression by enemy forces.

(5) That in so declaring we definitely exclude a policy of arming for purposes of aggression; that we regard our frontier with the United States as one which does not require protection, but we feel that if Canada is to retain her place as an independent nation in the world, she must be able to defend herself from threats of aggression from overseas, which in the present state of world politics cannot be regarded as idle.

(6) That accordingly—

This, Mr. Speaker, is the major organization representing the ex-service men in the Dominion of Canada, speaking within the last two weeks in the capital city of Canada:

(6) That accordingly, we endorse the proposals of the government to increase our national defences and trust that such defences may be developed along the lines suggested, to make our coast secure from attack by sea, land and air, and to preserve our position as an independent nation which does not seek to interfere with the rights of any other nation but only to develop its national life in a world where peace should prevail.

So I submit that when in a debate concerning an increase or extension in the estimates of the National Defence department, the hon. member for Vancouver North raises the issue of the Hyndman report, he is hardly doing justice to himself or to his splendid record of service over many years in the cause of the ex-service men in this dominion.

My hon. friend also said in the course of his remarks that instead of suppressing discontent we should try to remove the causes of discontent. I thoroughly agree with that sentiment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, "Hear, hear." I want to tell my hon. friends once again that in the removal of the causes of discontent in Canada they have no monopoly of intent or of idealism or of action.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But may I suggest that the government has the power.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member for Vancouver North by his amendment is seeking to obtain power, because the carrying of his amendment would mean the defeat of this government; a socialist government would then be in control in this dominion, and we would have the establishment of a socialist state. That is what the amendment means, and nothing else.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member for Vancouver North spoke of vessels making sporadic raids on our Canadian shores, and asked: Does that require any additional defence? Well, Mr. Speaker, the whole theory of national defence to-day, with reference to coastal defence, deals with that specific problem, and it is for meeting these sporadic raiders or aircraft carriers that these estimates are compiled. If my hon. friend has read, as he probably has, the most recent pronouncement of those who are competent to make proper observations upon the subject, he would find that the entire conception of Canadian naval, military and aerial defence is based upon the action of sporadic raiders, or upon aircraft carriers. I want to tell my hon. friends this: We are prepared to build a hundred aeroplanes in the country. These, sir, are not necessarily finally localized in any portion of this dominion. They would be machines of high velocity, capable of being moved within a few hours for the defence of any portion of Canada—available for the protection of the great St. Lawrence river, available for the protection of Montreal, available for the protection of Quebec, available for protection against any raid that might be made on the grain elevators of this country. In this day of aircraft carriers it is quite conceivable that enemy nations might raid this nation, supplying food as a neutral amongst belligerents. Our elevators and our food supplies might be raided, and apart from our essential coast defence our food supplies must be protected in the case of any hostilities.

The hon. member for Vancouver North also mentioned the organization of war industries, and I intend to deal with that very briefly before I conclude. He also dealt with the question of profiteering. I desire, before I go any further, to say at this moment that ever since this government has been in power it has been giving very serious attention to this whole question. It has been dealing with the question of profits in peace time, dealing with the export of munitions in peace time and dealing with the provision of supplies in war time. I want to tell my hon. friend that all these matters of which he has been advocating a vigorous and relentless supervision, have been anxiously considered by the government with a view to meeting the situation. So it is purely academic for him to bring up the question at the present time.

I should like to deal briefly with some of the remarks made by the seconder of the resolution. He wanted an outline of government policy in relation to foreign affairs. I thought the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice had already given, during the present session, a concise and comprehensive review of the position of Canada with relation to foreign affairs, and I doubt not that before this debate is concluded a further contribution may be made in this regard. My hon. friend also spoke of the organization of potential war industries, and he said that these estimates connot be construed as defence estimates but must be taken as estimates for an expeditionary force. I dealt with that before six o'clock.

My hon. friend also referred to imperial officers on exchange in this dominion. There is nothing new about that; it has been going on in Canada for a score or more of years. Officers have been on exchange from Canada to England, and from England to Canada, just the same as they have been on exchange with other portions of the commonwealth. That has absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with questions of policy. It is purely for the purpose of a better understanding of training systems, systems of organization, and systems of equipment of the various nations. It has nothing whatever to do with the increase in the present estimates or with the policy of the nation in connection with these estimates.

I should like now to review briefly the world situation at the present time to indicate why it is necessary for us to repair the deficiencies that exist in our equipment and in our facilities in Canada if we are to provide reasonable security and reasonable defence.

Look at Spain torn with ruthless civil war, with class passions threatening any moment to engulf the whole group of European nations. Italy having just completed a successful defiance of the League of Nations, is continuing to arm at a furious pace. Germany is spending $4,000,000,000 on armaments this year. Russia, armed and disciplined as she has never been before since the days of the czars, possesses the greatest air force in the world, and maintains constant vigilance on her coasts both east and west. Her defence appropriation last year, according to the estimates received, was $3,000,000,000. Czechoslovakia, the most perilously situate of all the mid-European states, has just enacted the most drastic law in history, appropriating to the state every soul between the ages of sixteen and sixty, and the use of any and all property, private and individual. The Popular Front government in France, dominated by socialist philosophy, has just put through a new three-year defence program. The Maginot line, costing $2,000,000 a mile, is to be extended from the Mediterranean to the North Sea. France is expending forty per cent of her budget upon her national defence. Poland likewise has set about erecting a maginot line of her own on her German frontier. What Great Britain is doing is, I think, known to every hon. member. Then let us cast our eyes to the far east, where China is torn with civil faction, and Japan seems to be restlessly seeking continental expansion. Clashes are in evidence every day. In Australia all parties, including the commonwealth Labour party, are joining together for an adequate plan of national defence. The other day we witnessed, as I mentioned before this afternoon, the British manoeuvres at Singapore, and last year, very near the Canadian shores, off the coast of Alaska, we saw the greatest war manoeuvres in the history of this great peace loving neighbour of ours, the United States.

So let us face realities. Look at Europe; witness what has happened there—the conflict between force and reason, the repudiation of treaties, the destruction of dynasties, the violation of the cardinal principles of the League of Nations, and to-day the ugly menace of civil war. In the orient, I regret to say, conditions are scarcely better, and the United States is spending the greatest sums in her history upon the coastal defence of the Pacific ocean. Let us remember that many nations to-day are ruled not by parliaments but by individuals and dictators. We in Canada are very happily placed in that parliament still governs, democracy is still in the saddle, and autocracy has not yet obtained the supremacy. We are, as has been said, a fortunate nation, fortunate in our great institutions of liberty, fortunate in the contributions which all the various races have made toward the development and the upbuilding of this Canadian land. And that race, sir, of which you are such a distinguished representative, has made to this nation a contribution which is abiding and beyond price.

Let us look at our situation to-day. As my leader has said, I believe, the house in which we dwell, this Canada of ours, has its front door open with no one to watch it, and its back door open with scarcely anyone to guard it. We in this country, in this parliament, in this government, are not concerned with any policy of aggression; we are concerned purely and simply and entirely with the defence of Canada. As I said before, there is no need of defence against our great neighbour to the south. The possibility of conflict there has been entirely discounted. As I said before six o'clock, there is in the estimates nothing for any expeditionary force, but provision only for the defence of Canada against those who might assail us or violate our neutrality. I cannot repeat too often that the defence of our shores and the preservation of our neutrality are the cardinal principles of the defence policy of the Dominion of Canada.

This afternoon I heard an hon. member refer to protection from two other countries. May I say in reply that we cannot afford nor do we wish to lean too much upon any nation. Let us put our own house in order so that we shall not be dependent or a burden upon either the great republic adjoining us or the commonwealth of British nations to which we are so intensely proud to belong. Some in this house and in the country would have us do more than we are doing. Some in this house and in the country would have us do nothing at all. I desire to suggest that the safe policy is to preserve the unity of the Canadian people, to avoid, on the one hand, extremes of inaction as suggested here this afternoon, or, on the other, extremes of excessive action as may be suggested before this debate is concluded, and to preserve a prudent, moderate and safe course, in other words a rational policy of domestic defence for the Dominion of Canada.

Someone—I think it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—referred this afternoon to our foreign policy. In my judgment, looking over the field in possibly an academic way, we should have a home policy and a foreign policy. In that I agree with my hon. friend. In my judgment our home policy is to preserve at all costs the unity of Canada and our Canadian people upon this and all other problems. In regard to foreign policy I think the finest guiding maxim that we ever had was given us by our leader the other day when he quoted from Holy Writ these words, "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you live peaceably with all men." According to the practice of the Scottish Presbyterians I should like to divide that into three parts: in the first place, "if it be possible." In other words, we may not be the masters of our fate or the captains of our souls. But if it be possible, we are pledged to the great cause of world peace. The second part is, "as much as lieth in you." We may not be free agents eventually or finally in the settlement of this great problem. Other nations, unfriendly nations, may settle it against our judgment and against our will. But if the first two conditions are fulfilled, "if it be possible" and "as much as lieth in you," then what is the great ideal? "Live peaceably with all men." In other words, the ideal of this government and its supporters, and I believe the ideal of all hon. members of this house, is to do all we can for the preservation of world peace, in our nation, with other nations, and in our time.

That brings us to the inherent obligation of our dominion or its own primary responsibility, which is its own defence. The obvious responsibilities of Canada might be regarded as fourfold: the responsibilities of Canada to Canada itself; the responsibilities which might eventuate to Canada as a member of the British commonwealth; the responsibilities of Canada as a member of the League of Nations, and the responsibilities of Canada as one of the great and growing nations of the world. To sum it up again, may I say that these are threefold: the maintenance of internal security in our dominion; the preservation of strict neutrality, law and order within our territorial waters in time of peace, and the protection of our coasts and focal areas in case there may be conflict. In other words, as I have already mentioned, our duty is the direct defence of Canada and the defence of Canadian neutrality, and the latter is of significance with respect to Canada's responsibilities along her seaboard, and perhaps particularly along her western seaboard. At the present time, I must state, Canada's existing naval, military and air forces are incapable of ensuring anything approaching adequate supervision of her harbours, her coasts, and her great shipping ports. If we have this mad race of armaments to which reference has been made, that is the extreme in one direction. On the other hand, Canada has been neglecting the matter of essential armaments even to the point of endangering her national security, and that is the extreme in the other direction. It cannot be too strongly emphasized in connection with the estimates now before the house that the two essential principles have been observed in our action with reference to the friendly republic to the south and in the fact that there is not a single cent in the estimates for sending a mobile or expeditionary force overseas.

Now I should like, with the consent of the house, to place on Hansard the record of the per capita expenditures of Canada as compared with those of the other nations of the world. First, there is a comparison between Canada and the other nations of the commonwealth with reference to per capita expenditures on armaments; second, a comparison between Canada and other nations on the American continent, and third, comparison between Canada and the other world nations with respect to the same expenditures:

Coming now to a discussion of the question of neutrality, let me envision the situation with Canada out of a prevailing conflict and with Canada being faced with the necessity of protecting her own neutrality. In other words, she must be able to defend her territory from being utilized by combatants for belligerent purposes. As a rule I do not like using quotations, but I should like to quote in this connection from an address delivered at the Canadian Institute of Economics and Politics last year by Professor Lower. He contemplates the situation and names the combatants. I would not do that, but I think I am entitled to quote from his remarks. He says:

> If a war should break out between Japan and the United States, we should be affected at once. The question would immediately arise as to whether we would maintain our neutrality.
> There are a number of factors which might render it difficult for us to do so. We would have to keep the warships of both belligerents out of our ports and prevent either one of them using any part of our coastline against the other.
> The Americans might wish us to give them the right to fly across our territory to Alaska. . . . But we could not give privileges to one of the belligerents that we would not give to the other. . . .
> It would seem to be only good judgment for us to prepare our western coast so that we would maintain our neutrality as against both combatants. . . .
> If the coast continues defenceless, Japan might try to make use of its islands and inlets as bases for operations against American ships.
> If that were to occur, the Americans would at once demand the right to put the Japanese out. . . .
> Once allowing that, we would have virtually abandoned neutrality, and we would be in great danger both of being drawn into the war and of losing control of our own territory. . . .
> Measures of coastal defence on this sector would appear to be both wise and self-respecting.

I suggest, therefore, without referring to what I might term the alleged obligations of Canada as a result of various conferences, but only the obligation of Canada in relation to Canadian defence, that problem is no longer the traditional obligation of local defence but the complete responsibility for defence in consequence of Canada's new sovereign status. And I would direct that remark particularly to those in this dominion who very properly have strong nationalist ideals. The more you believe in, the more you subscribe to doctrines of Canadian nationalism, the more must you provide for the defence of the Dominion of Canada. You cannot any longer lean upon the alliances or the implied alliances of the past; you can no longer lean upon the implications of the Monroe doctrine. If you are going to profess the virtues and the pride of nationalism, you must face your responsibilities and meet your obligations in accordance with the status of sovereignty.

As I said before, the present policy is not new. It was formulated by Canada and it is limited to the defence of our shores, our homes, our territorial waters and our neutrality. And I desire to say very definitely that the development of any policy of defence is not greatly assisted, at the present time especially, by the declarations of those who speak in other places with reference to a compulsory coordinated defence policy in which Canada would assume automatic responsibilities. In maintaining the essential principles of Canadian unity it is necessary to observe that the prevailing sentiment of public opinion in Canada to-day would not be in favour of committing the Canadian people to automatic responsibility in regard to any centralized or coordinated scheme or plan of defence, and just as we in Canada are not inclined to assume any automatic obligations or any automatic responsibility, so also, as was definitely proved by recent discussions in this house, Canada is opposed to any precarious policy of automatic neutrality. The reason for that is that so long as we have international brigandage as at the present time, so long as the swash-buckling international gangster is stalking about the world, so long as we have dictatorships in power, swayed by ambitions of conquest and the passion for personal power, so long will it be necessary for the smaller nations of the world, lovers of liberty, to be prepared to defend their liberties against licence and their freedom against aggression. That is why a policy of precarious permanent neutrality spells the death knell of democracy throughout the world.

It has been said many a time in this parliament, from 1923 when the Prime Minister made his declaration down until a week ago, that parliament will decide in so far as the initiative may rest with Canada and the Canadian people. But if we were unable to protect our own neutrality we might be declared a belligerent, and some foreign power might decide that we were involved. Therefore we must be equipped successfully to protect our own shores, our seaports and the focal areas of trade routes adjacent to the coasts of Canada. If parliament decides we are neutral we must be able to protect our neutrality; otherwise we may be dragged in by causes over which we have no control.

I therefore approach the keynote of the present increase, or extension, or expansion in the estimates, and its purpose is fourfold. In the first place, we must provide for additional aircraft together with supplies and accommodation and personnel for patrolling our coasts and shipping terminals and for defending ourselves against the attacks of those who may violate our neutrality. In the second place, there is in addition to supply and shore structures a very slight and unpretentious addition to our naval strength, to patrol our coasts and shipping terminals, to keep our harbour mouths free of mines and to challenge any suspicious craft. In the third place, there is provision for additional coastal batteries, including anti-aircraft defence equipment to engage hostile craft and defend the entrances to our ports and inland waters. And lastly there is additional training for the militia, especially coastal artillery and services likely to be called upon in various emergencies.

May I sum up this part of my explanation by referring to the cardinal principles of the present defence program as submitted to the house about a week ago by the leader of the government. In the first place, our enlarged defence estimates are submitted only for the defence of Canada. In the second place, they were not arranged between Canada and any other nation. In the third place, there has not been in connection with a single item of the estimates so submitted any request from any government in any other place whatsoever. In the fourth place, parliament itself must be the final judge as to Canada's participation in any future war, and in the last place, with reference to the League of Nations, only a universal league would be an absolute guarantee of peace.

I should like to approach the third aspect, in regard to the conditions which prevailed in the defence situation in Canada in 1935. Certain matters were brought to my attention in 1935 and I want to explain to the house frankly the position and what was done. In regard to our naval forces it was reported that even assuming an effective air force and militia cooperation, Canada did not possess adequate naval forces to guarantee her neutrality in a war in which she did not wish to be a belligerent. In October, 1935, Canada possessed two effective torpedo boat destroyers, two torpedo boat destroyers due for retirement or demilitarization, and one inefficient mine sweeper. The action already taken has been as follows: The two old destroyers have been demilitarized; two new destroyers—four years old—have been purchased; a small training schooner is under construction in Nova Scotia; the outfit of ammunition for ships in commission has been virtually completed, and gunnery and other equipment of ships in commission have been modernized. That is all that has been done, and the estimates this year are just by way of continuing and carrying on that work.

In reference to shore facilities—the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) knows about and will appreciate the situation there—it was reported that the barracks, dockyards and other shore facilities were inadequate. Immediate action was taken to remedy this condition. It was further reported that the naval magazine at Esquimalt harbour was condemned in 1905 and was a positive menace to the surrounding community. Immediate action was taken in this regard. It was also reported that the wireless equipment at both Halifax and Esquimalt was inadequate; immediate action was also taken in this regard.

Then, to come to the militia services, it was reported that there was not a single modern anti-aircraft gun in the whole Dominion of Canada. What a splendid condition for a great and wealthy nation like Canada! In justice to my hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), I want to say that he took action with reference to that before I stepped into office as Minister of Defence. He commenced a program which I am endeavouring to carry out in reference to anti-aircraft guns. It was also reported that the stock of field gun ammunition was precariously low. It was reported that coast defence armaments were in many cases defective. It was reported that beyond a few batteries no provision had been made for mechanical transport. Action was taken in these matters. It was reported that there was an insufficient supply of respirators even for the permanent force, and action was taken in this regard. It was reported in regard to manufacturing facilities that none existed in Canada for the production of rifles, machine guns and artillery weapons. Action has been taken to a certain extent in this regard, and more is to be taken under the estimate now under consideration.

In regard to reorganization, it was reported that reorganization of the militia had been recommended in 1932, approved in principle but no further action taken. May I say that the post-war establishment consisting of eleven infantry and four cavalry divisions has been reduced to six infantry divisions and one cavalry. The form of militia organization had to be adapted to modern types of arms and equipment. A few inactive units have been disbanded; thirty-six regiments of cavalry have been reduced to sixteen, plus four armoured car regiments, and in regard to infantry and machine gun battalions, one hundred and thirty-five units have been reduced to ninety-one. It is true there has been an increase in artillery units and Royal Canadian Engineers. In the Royal Army Medical Corps thirteen surplus units have been disbanded. That means that the paper strength of 135,000 has been reduced to 90,000. All have been made ready for the process of reorganization and mechanization, and the duty of this parliament at the present time as I see it is to provide equipment for the small militia force which we have to-day in Canada. When we come to discuss the estimates, hon. members will find that the main increase is to provide stores and equipment in order to provide a more efficient and effective force.

With reference to the air force, it was reported that only twenty-three aircraft of a service type were available in Canada. Not one plane was suitable for active service under present day conditions. Orders were placed last year, some by my predecessor, for eighteen aircraft, and under the present estimates steps are being taken to increase this number. Now let me deal with what happened to the air force of Canada. I find that the appropriations were as follows:

Air Services

1932-33..	1,750,000

Or a total reduction in two years of $5,725,700 or 75 per cent.

Then the Royal Canadian Air Force:

1931-32..	2,266,000
1932-33..	1,555,000

Or a total reduction of 36 per cent.

Then we have the most disastrous reduction of all. In 1931-32 flying hours were increased by 5,000. But in 1932-33 flying hours were reduced by 27,095 hours, from 32,095 hours to a total of 5,000 flying hours. In the following year a further reduction of 3,800 hours was made so that the total hours of flying in this dominion were reduced in three years from 32,095 to 1,200. In other words, flying was discontinued in Canada during the years of the depression. This will explain the reason for the present increase in the air force estimates.

For the purpose of my argument I am not going to refer to the personnel of these forces. But I wish to drive home as strongly as I can that the increase of $6,706,000 in the air force vote is to repair what was done during the years of the depression.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Next I come to the question of industrial organization. I think both the mover and seconder of the resolution said that nothing had been done by this administration with reference to industrial organization or industrial mobilization in Canada. But I want to tell my hon. friends that for the last eight or nine months the Department of National Defence in cooperation with other departments of the government has been engaged upon the most comprehensive industrial survey of Canada that was ever made in her history. This has been done in other nations. Australia has been carrying out such a survey for the last fifteen years; England has been doing so for the last eight years; we are endeavouring to do in two years what should have been done many years ago, and inside two years we shall have a comprehensive industrial survey covering every industry in Canada so as to enable it to be mobilized for this nation in case it should be assailed or in case of any national emergency. What has been done? We have obtained information as to the availability in Canada of facilities for the production of shells, fuses, explosives and propellants, guns and gun cartridges, motor vehicles, aircraft, aircraft engines and accessories, and we have received the most loyal cooperation from other departments of government, notably the Department of Labour, the Department of Mines and Resources, the Department of Transport, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce.

May I repeat once again that this is not in any way to develop, in regard to the equipment required for our militia service, a policy of centralization, or for any other extraneous purpose. The reason for the increase in the militia service vote, which possibly is not as popular as the increase in the vote for the air force or the small increase in the naval vote, is twofold. In the first place, it is to provide new, modern and up to date equipment for our militia services and, in the second place, to give us a small force to cooperate with our air force and our naval force for the protection of Canada, within Canada only. I hope that is quite precise, definite and clear to every hon. member.

I think, sir, I have dealt with the question of industrial mobilization. Now I wish to deal with the question of profits, raised in a previous debate, and mentioned by both speakers this afternoon. This question divides itself into three categories. The first is the supply of defence equipment in peace time; the second is the export of munitions or supplies beyond the country, and the third is the supply of munitions and equipment in war time. With reference to the second and third, these can and will be controlled, and measures of the most vigorous and relentless nature already are under preparation for this purpose. With reference to the first of these categories, having to do with the supply of defence equipment in peace time, government policies were formulated some time ago. They are very similar to those recommended by the commission in Great Britain and by the senate commission of investigation of the United States, to which reference was made this afternoon. They are designed to safeguard the public interest as far as possible by competition, where competition is possible. Where this cannot be done; where competition is not possible, they are designed to establish rigid principles of reasonable remuneration, to make unfair profits impossible and to provide for a thorough system of inspection and audit. So I trust my hon. friends will realize that when they raised this question they discussed a matter which was decided and acted upon by the present administration many months ago.

Now I come to an analysis of the estimates for 1937-38. Before going on with this, however, I desire to make one or two references to the change in conditions of warfare, as they affect our air forces in particular. This afternoon I referred to the air defence bases bill of 1935, adopted by the United States, which proved that the great republic to the south does not consider itself unexposed to air attack from Europe and Asia. It is taking defensive measures in consequence of that view. As the eastern and western portions of Canada lie in the great circle routes from Europe and eastern Asia to the United States respectively, it is clear that Canada is still exposed to air attack from overseas. Consequently the question of air defence is becoming one of increasing importance to this country.

With reference to the militia situation of a year ago, I desire to repeat that the militia possessed then, and to-day possesses, little of armoured fighting vehicles, of supplies of mechanized transport of approved design or of modern weapons. To revert to the air forces of Canada, while it is not contended that Canada's requirements are comparable with those of the great powers, perhaps at this time it is pertinent to remind hon. members that Canada's air force is entirely inadequate to meet her modest defence requirements; further, that at the present moment this country does not possess an aircraft industry worthy of the name and that all our airplane engines are being imported. With reference to coastal defence, at both Esquimalt and Halifax it was necessary to embark upon the modernization of equipment.

The immediate requirements in our air force are modern aircraft bases; advanced and intermediate operating stations; repair and supply depots and training centres. The requirements of our air defence on both east and west coasts necessitate provision for the reconnaissance of vast sea areas and lengthy coast lines, and the defence of our ports from hostile aircraft carriers or overseas borne aircraft. As I said before, under modern conditions, with aircraft carriers the enemy could attack our coastal cities and smash up our elevators and other places used for the storage of foodstuffs

I have before me an actual analysis of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Taking first of all our naval forces, the increase in the present year over last year is $1,832,310. The increase in personnel is: Royal Canadian navy, 373, by reason of the larger size of the newer vessels, and Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, 161, making a total, after these estimates are adopted, of 2,771 in the navy. The details of the increase are:

Pay and allowances	$359,325
Stores and allowances—
Ammunition and stores	350,760
Four minesweepers	750,000
Repairs—maintenance	128,000
Works—lands and buildings—
Joint service magazine	200,000

In regard to the air force, the increase amounts to $6,706,622, which can be divided into permanent, $6,176,692 and non-permanent, $529,930. Those amounts can be again subdivided into:

Permanent—
Administration—
Training and maintenance	$ 629,749
Stores and equipment	4,524,847
Engineer services	1,022,096
Non-permanent—
Administration and maintenance	107,715
Stores and equipment	413,215
Engineer services	9,000

In other words, stores and equipment take up over $5,000,000 of the total increase of $6,706,622. I should like to make that very clear. The increase in personnel of the air force, made necessary by the modest program of expansion being undertaken, is forty officers and 519 airmen. In regard to stores and equipment, the subdivisions are as follows in part:

Aircraft stores	$ 345,924
Ammunition	113,934
Stores	1,499,763
Aircraft	2,019,263
Engines	187,500

This makes a total of nearly $5,000,000. The new aircraft proposed will include twelve two-seater fighters; seven Stranraer flying boats; eighteen coastal reconnaissance ships; eleven torpedo bombers; twenty-seven (ab initio) training planes and twenty-four bombers and three army co-operation, or a total of 102 airplanes costing in round figures $3,000,000, with engines costing $237,000. The engineer services in connection with the air force provide for an increase of $1,000,000, of which the central depot at Trenton takes $747,000; the Pacific coast, $450,000, and the Atlantic coast, $435,000. These, together with some smaller items, account for the total air force increase of approximately $6,700,000.

In regard to the militia services, the total increase is $5,831,502. That amount is broken up as follows:

Engineer services and works....	$1,867,850
General stores and equipment..	3,509,499
Permanent force..	234,713
R.M.C.	8,800

The amount of $1,867,850 for engineer services and works is for works at Ottawa, Petawawa, London, Barriefield, St. John's, P.Q., Valcartier, Halifax, Winnipeg and Shilo, with about $1,000,000 to be expended on the Pacific coast for emplacements, gun positions and technical equipment, and small amounts for Dundurn and Calgary. Of the increase of $3,509,499 in general stores and equipment, artillery stores take up $2,858,616 and the dominion arsenal at Quebec about $450,000. The artillery stores include ammunition, shells, cartridges, fuses of various sizes and descriptions, as well as tractors, training equipment, machine guns, anti-aircraft searchlight equipment and anti-aircraft guns, together with batteries of coast defence guns as well as a substantial number of the new light Bren machine guns.

In the non-permanent militia service the increase is $220,640, and this increase is in order to give additional days of training to the small, compact force we have now established in the Dominion of Canada. In the permanent force the increase of $234,000 is caused by an increase in the personnel of twenty-two officers and 173 other ranks, including nine officers and eighty other ranks previously under civil aviation vote, largely the result of new instructors being required consequent upon the reorganization and mechanization of the militia.

To sum up all these figures, the militia service is increased $5,832,000; the naval service is increased $1,832,000 and the air service is increased $6,552,635, deducting the items in last year's estimates not repeated this year in connection with projects generally, $2,601,332, making a net increase of $11,615,000 in this year's estimates. These are the actual details of the estimates. They are all for the purpose of coastal defence, and for increased equipment and for cooperation of militia services of Canada with the air force and naval forces for the protection of Canada, within our own borders. I cannot make that sufficiently clear to hon. members of the house.

I desire to deal once more with the amendment of the hon. member. It is strange that in Canada, which is probably potentially one of the richest countries in the world, that we do not find the same cooperation between members of the Labour party and the government of the day with reference to the question of defence as we do in other countries. Canadian socialists oppose even these modest provisions for defence in Canada. That is not the policy of the Labour or Socialist party in Great Britain. It is not the policy of socialists in France. It is not the policy of the Australian Labour party.

I desire to read with emphasis a motion carried at the recent labour conference held in Edinburgh in October of last year. On motion of Mr. Dalton, the Labour party conference adopted by a majority of 1,081,000 the following resolution:

> That in view of the threatening attitude of dictatorships which are increasing their armaments at an unprecedented rate, flouting international law, and refusing to cooperate in the work of organizing peace—

Listen to this:

> —this conference declares that the armed strength of the countries loyal to the league of nations must be conditioned by the armed strength of the potential aggressors.
> The conference therefore reaffirms the policy of the Labour party, to maintain such defence forces as are consistent with our country's responsibility as a member of the league of nations—

And now I desire to emphasize these three points:

> (a) the preservation of the people's rights and liberties, (b) the continuance of democratic institutions, and (c) the observance of international law.

I suggest that all three of these points apply to the Dominion of Canada to-day. Here we have members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation whose political philosophy is based essentially upon the doctrine of socialism. Here we have hon. members of that party moving a vote of want of confidence in this administration, with two points in mind: (1) a disapproval of the modest expansion of our defence system, and (2) a spurious laudation of their own political philosophy of socialism.

May I now quote the final words from Major Attlee's speech, leader of the Labour party in Great Britain. He said: The Labour party believed that they must take every step to deal with the curse of war, and on the other hand, they were not prepared to bow down to fascism or to be conquered by fascism from without or from within. "The level of British armaments," he said, "must be fixed with regard to our position in relation to collective security."

In the Australian Labour party which follows a policy similar to that of hon. members in this chamber, there has recently been a complete change—due to what? The change has been due to recent world developments and the present menace. The Australian Labour party has now adopted a defence program of its own providing: (1) for the defensive organization of industry; (2) for training and equipment of a substantial nucleus of effective field forces, capable of speedy expansion; (3) for a strong air force, and (4) for development of the country's capacity to provide adequate munitions.

As hon. members know, South Africa has followed the same course. In this connection may I quote from the observations of Mr. Pirow, Minister of National Defence in that country. A press dispatch states:

> Pirow emphasized that South Africa was not preparing for war in the near future but merely taking elementary precautions "which every nation must bear in mind if it values freedom and independence."
> He also disclosed to parliament that his technical department was exploring the possibility of manufacturing in South Africa various military necessities hitherto imported. . . . A survey is also being made Pirow announced of industrial possibilities for war purposes which he said would ensure supply of the necessary stores without dislocating civil requirements and without profiteering.

I now come to that section of my remarks dealing with the estimates. I suggest, first, it is very regrettable indeed that unanimity of opinion in Canada seems to be impossible with reference to a question as non contentious as the requirements of Canadian defence. The most important contribution we can render at this time, when shadows of impending disaster seem to be hovering so darkly over a doubt-torn and tempest-tossed world is, so far as possible, to resist all suggestions of partisan controversy, and to respect the heartfelt opinions and profound convictions of those who may differ from the defence policies of the government of the day. It is not for us at this time to say that those who are opposed to us are of necessity wrong, but we should endeavour to prove that what we are trying to do is the right thing and in the interest of the nation.

While we adopt the attitude of not being too critical of one another, we on this side of the house are convinced that the policy presented at this time by the present administration is one which, by reason of its studied moderation and its avoidance of and severance from any extraneous commitments, should commend itself to the free and unfettered judgment of the Canadian people.

Some may criticize us as pursuing a purely national policy; some may say that we are evading our empire responsibilities. May I say just a personal word in that connection. I have the greatest veneration for the contribution that has been made by the British Empire, especially in recent years, toward the preservation of the peace of the world. When I think of the great contribution made by our great empire, I think of Gladstone's great words when he referred to "the noble fabric of the British Empire." I recall the words of the great intellectual statesman Mr. Herbert Asquith, when he referred to the empire as "the greatest and most fruitful experiment that the world has ever seen in the cooperative union of free and self-governing communities."

I recall the words of Lord Rosebery when he referred to the empire "as the noblest example yet known of free, just and adaptable government." I recall the words of a great Canadian Doctor Macdonald, once of the Toronto Globe, who said:

> It would indeed be a calamity beyond compare were that world empire broken and its dismembered fragments scattered abroad.

I recall the words of Burke who said: "Ties of the empire are light as air but strong as links of iron."

Yet, sir, our duty is to the dominion and the Canadian people; this defence policy is a Canadian defence policy for the direct defence of our Canadian shores and our Canadian homes.

Finally, may I say that with great veneration for empire idealism we in Canada to-day are looking to the future of this great dominion of ours, preserving so far as we can the unity of our people, with reference to all policies. In the great words of Sir George Foster, quoting Rudyard Kipling, "We are daughter in our mother's house, and mistress in our own."

While some hon. members may call to their support the Monroe doctrine of the southland and others may look for support to the forces of empire in other directions without doing anything to bear our own burden, may I conclude with the words used by Sir George W. Ross in Toronto thirty years ago:

> Oh! This may love the southland,
> And this may cross the sea
> But this Land is our Land
> And Canada for me.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, speaking to this motion of want of confidence in the government, I must say at the outset that I am not in full agreement with it. I have not confidence in some of the policies of this government; its financial policy and its unemployment policy are examples. But I do agree with the defence policy of this government, and I wish now through you, sir, to compliment the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) upon giving to the house a clear and what I believe to be a true statement of the national and international situations as they see them. I have listened to them on each occasion they have spoken on this subject, and I very much appreciate the statements they have made from time to time.

The amendment which was moved to the motion for supply does not state that these defence estimates are to appropriate money for defence at the expense of social security. Although the amendment infers this to be true, it does not say so. Accordingly it leaves the way wide open for myself and for those around me who wish to do so to continue their struggle for social security without in any way interfering with our desire for national safety in times like these.

I think it is very timely just at this stage for me to point out on behalf of my colleagues and myself how much easier apparently it is to finance war than to finance peace. That was true in the last war. There was a condition of emergency which came upon us overnight, and that emergency was financed to the last dollar. But peace, Mr. Speaker, and the emergencies arising out of conditions of peace—these apparently are very difficult to finance. That is one of the paradoxes of this age, and one of the grave indictments of our present economic system.

This is a very practical world in which we live, and as a practical man I do not hesitate to suggest to this House of Commons that the ultimate security of nations does not lie in armaments, as was demonstrated by the last war. Security, in the well known language of the Oxford Group, lies in God control, God controlled individuals, God controlled homes, industries and nations, and may I say to my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and to socialists everywhere and other reformers, that the same thing is true of all our suggested systems. However, the ideal state of affairs that men envision is not here; we are not yet living in times like those. Around us everywhere it is a fact that Canada is not providing adequately, to use the language of the amendment, for "social security of all sections of the Canadian people."

It is also a fact that the nations are rearming on every hand; that millions of dollars and millions of pounds and millions of various other moneys are being voted and appropriated in every country for armaments, and that millions of men are training at this time for war. No matter how idealistic we may be, we cannot hide the fact that what I have just said is true, no more than we can escape the fact that every last one of the leaders of all these arming countries proclaims loudly now and again that the armament campaign which is going on in his country is not intended for offensive purposes, that it is only for defence. I wonder if that might not cause some of us to stop and see whether Canada's danger and the world danger to-day is not only international but intra-national. I wonder if the attacks which we fear are altogether external attacks. I wonder if there is not perhaps a force at work internally, not only in Europe but in America as well, including Canada, for which we must be prepared, and of which we have every reason to have grave fear. That, Mr. Speaker, is not necessarily a bogeyman. So far as the invader coming across the ocean to Canada is concerned, goodness knows why they would come to Canada to attack our shores. That, as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has suggested, may very easily be a bogeyman. But if the danger is more local than that, if it exists within our own nation and not outside our nation altogether, then I believe that all possible steps ought to be and must be taken to give Canada at least an ordinary fighting chance to protect herself. In saying that, I feel that I am doing only what is my duty, and in doing so I am not giving the government blanket approval in regard to all its policies. I feel now, although it might better come upon the discussion of the defence estimates themselves, like describing to the house the pitiful equipment and the terrible uniforms and materials that our men are expected to use in some of the armouries west of the great lakes. However, I might better wait for the discussion of the estimates.

I conclude with the thought with which I started, that we are living in a world where there is actual danger, and while certain ideals may be very desirable, and will eventually become realities, yet the real and present fact is that grave danger confronts us, not alone externally, but internally.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I think that the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) was about to ask for the appropriations which he deems necessary for his department, is of the utmost importance, first of all on account of the increase of these estimates over last year, due to war preparations in Europe and following the rather ill-timed statements of some foreign or semi-foreign individuals, some of whom have no right to interfere in our political discussions and for whom past experience should have been a lesson.

I wish to avail myself of this opportunity briefly to state my views and those of the people I represent on this question of national defence, and I shall do it, to use the expression of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) "with a feeling of doing as my conscience bids me."

During the last few months we have had the visit of imperialist pilgrims—that is how they were called by the Minister of National Defence—who came here to show us our duty. We were able to read out the suggestions that were made by outstanding men in British politics, when some of them told us how many military aircraft we should have and others warned us that at the coming imperial conference the dominions would be called to decide as to their partaking in the defence of the empire. We have also read suggestive articles both in the British and Canadian press, and about war scares in Europe and to crown it all we now see that the estimates for military purposes are being substantially increased. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that we have reason to wonder whither we are going.

In justice to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I wish to recall right now the firm view which he took on September 29 last, when speaking at Geneva, before the Assembly of the League of Nations, he thus asserted our sovereign status:

> We will not necessarily become involved in any war into which other parts of the British Empire may enter, simply because we are part of the British Empire.

And further:

> Any decision on the part of Canada to participate in war will have to be taken by the parliament or people of Canada.

Speaking right here in this house on January 25 last, he stated:

> That, on questions of defence or foreign policy Canada's attitude shall be guided by its own interest.

These are statements of principles with which I am fully in accord. They differ absolutely from the old formula according to which Canada was necessarily at war when England was at war.

However, there are facts which we cannot ignore, and it is these facts about which we are concerned and which require some explanations from the government.

This year, the estimates amount to about $34,000,000 compared to about $20,000,000 last year. Why this increase?

The right hon. the Prime Minister, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said:

> As far as the estimates presented to parliament at this session are concerned, any increase placed there has been only and solely because of what the government believe to be necessary for the defence of Canada and of Canada alone. The estimates have not been framed with any thought of participation in European wars.

That statement was repeated this evening by the hon. Minister of National Defence. Without expressing any doubt as to the judgment of the government, it seems to me that some further explanations are called for.

Defence of Canada! against whom and against what?

Where lies this sudden threat which requires such a considerable expenditure for defence purposes? Abroad or at home? Let us consider the facts. The defence estimates, including those for air services, amounted, last year, to about $20,000,000, after the last appropriations were voted on June 22, 1936.

I have every good reason to believe that the Minister of National Defence, advised undoubtedly by his military experts, had then asked the house the necessary appropriations to maintain the efficient defence of Canada and that nothing had been neglected. Then, barely seven months after, he comes here and asks for an increase of $14,000,000. What did happen during this short period to justify such a substantial increase, apart from the visit of Lord Elibank, following the warning of Sir Samuel Hoare?

Our boundaries are the same. Our neighbours are the same and are just as peaceful as they were. Our geographical position has not changed and we are still separated from Europe and Asia by oceans, that mean almost an absolute security. We have no enemies that we know of. Moreover, the friction that existed by reason of the sanctions against Italy has disappeared since these sanctions have been removed.

Did the conditions in Europe grow worse? There is not any more talk about war than there was last June, when the estimates were voted; as a matter of fact, there is less talk about it since the Italo-Ethiopian conflict is over. At any rate, our frontiers are not in Europe.

Then where did this danger of aggression from outside spring up since the end of June, 1936, that compels the Minister of National Defence to come up before parliament and ask such a substantial increase in his estimates, being a further charge for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who still needs every dollar for our most essential expenditures. This is the question I am putting to the Minister of National Defence, and I do not intend to prejudice his answer. However, you will admit that there are coincidences and facts that are liable to throw some anxiety in the minds of those who believe in the defence of Canada within the limits of her needs and resources, but who are against any military preparations for other purposes.

Will the menace come from within? Some people say so. On January 14 last, L'Action Catholique reminded the governments that their duty was to preserve order in this country, be it even by force, and it drew attention to possible troubles. We all know what is happening in Russia, in Spain and even among our neighbours, the United States. Quite recently, speaking about the strike in the General Motors' plants, Father Coughlin pointed out the influence of communism in that strike, and he brought to the attention of the authorities, before it might be too late, the threat of a revolution. During that strike, the civil and judicial authorities were flouted.

In our own country, in Canada, volunteers have sailed in order to enlist in the red army of Spain. This, I admit, does not give me any sorrow; it will rid us of these undesirable people, provided they do not return here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. RAYMOND: But it shows that there are some of them in our country. Besides, well informed people tell us that communism is a real threat which must be faced. This being so, let us guard against unpreparedness. If, in order to face such a contingency, an increase in our forces is necessary, let us not hesitate to bring it about, for we need an adequate organization to maintain order within our country and to protect our institutions. Such is the essential duty of the state.

We must guard, protect and defend ourselves not, as I take it, against any invading army, but against the overrunning of our country by these professional agitators, these fomenters of trouble who are at work elsewhere, and who have already begun to make their presence felt here.

In this connection, I was recently reading a pamphlet in which the federal authorities were criticized for having done nothing to thwart communism, and where they were being rebuked for having repealed section 98 of the Criminal Code. I do not doubt the good faith of those who write such things, but if they really wish to educate the public, let them first read or study the act by which section 98 of the Criminal Code was repealed. They will find that by the same act section 133 of the Criminal Code was amended, through the addition of paragraph 4, which goes further in its import than section 98; that is why the Right Hon. Senator Meighen said in the Senate:

> This bill repeals section 98, it is true, but in another section it restores section 98, or the full effect of it, after the repeal.

Then, on the subject of unlawful association, he said:

> Under this bill, if it passes, and under the law as it then will be, nobody can be a member of such an association, for such membership is sedition and sedition at common law is forbidden. So there is no change there. The law said there was a presumption a man was a member, not if he attended a public meeting, but if he attended a meeting of the association. If it was not a member it was not very hard for him to discharge the onus. All he had to do was to swear he was not a member. That is no great hardship. That presumption in similar cases runs through the Code almost from cover to cover. But to be a member of such an association will be an offence after this bill passes. (Debates of the Senate, session of 1936, p. 619.)

And Hon. Senator Côté, appointed by the Bennett government, gave a similar opinion about paragraph 4 added to section 133 of the Criminal Code.

> In this section 4 is involved a point of law which is interesting not only to lawyers, but to every citizen who concerns himself with matters affecting the safety of the state. Under this amendment it will be easier to obtain a conviction, for the crown will not have to establish that the actions of the accused amount to an intention to bring about governmental changes by force. If the accused is a person who "publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates the use, without the authority of law, or force, as means of accomplishing any governmental change within Canada," he shall be presumed guilty. I am perfectly satisfied with this amendment. It goes farther than section 98 and justifies me in voting for the repeal of that section. (Debates of the Senate, session of 1936, page 622.)

I may now add that it devolves upon the attorney general in each province to prosecute those who transgress this law.

Whether the threat may come from the outside or arise within our own borders, I frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that I find it hard to get a clear idea as to the extent or the limit of our requirements as regards national defence. We do not know what the future has in store for us, although we try to foresee it. Besides, we scarcely know about the present. And unforeseen events may always alter the most reasonable expectations.

The minister has given us some explanations,—and I believe in his sincerity—but they are open to question. He told us, in brief, that on the advice of his experts he asks but the minimum that is required to ensure our security. A perusal of the debates that have taken place in this house, will show that in the past cases have occurred where the minister of militia, after bringing down his estimates, had to alter them, in spite of the advice of his experts. As an instance, I may refer to the House of Commons debates, session of 1922, volume 2, page 1135. Here is what the Minister of Militia, Hon. Mr. Graham, had to say in submitting his estimates:

> The militia estimates, I might say, have been pared down to a point as low as is compatible with national safety; in fact, I have been criticized quite severely for some of the reductions.

Nevertheless, in spite of that statement by the minister and notwithstanding the opinion of military experts, a few Liberal members, and among them our Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), our Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), availing themselves of their right to question the need of these estimates for the purpose of ensuring our national security, did not take the same view as the then Minister of Militia upon different items, especially the vote for $1,400,000 for "annual drill." And Mr. Power, who is now the Minister of Pensions and National Health, moved, seconded by Mr. Lanctôt, member for Laprairie-Napierville, an amendment calling for the reduction of this vote by $1,100,000 because they could not see the necessity of it. (House of Commons Debates, session of 1922, pages 1173-1174).

It is true that the amendment was negatived, but the amendment to the amendment brought by the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, then Minister of Marine, with a view to reducing the vote by $400,000 was agreed to (Debates of the House of Commons, session of 1922, at page 1578). On that occasion, the Minister of Militia said:

> It is the desire of the government, of course, to meet the wishes of parliament, for parliament is supreme.

In fact, reductions totalling $700,000 were made in the militia estimates amounting approximately to $10,000,000 brought down by the Minister of Militia.

Now, if you recall the words of the Minister of Militia which I quoted a moment ago on the absolute necessity of these minimum expenditures to ensure national security, you will realize that predictions made by experts do not always come true, as despite their prophecies, no catastrophe has befallen us after 1922 and our country has enjoyed complete security, notwithstanding the reduction of $700,000 made in the militia estimates then proposed.

This shows that bona fide opinions may differ on a question of appreciation, and that it may be advisable to revise the proposed figures when the various items are considered, without in any way affecting the security of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize my views on these defence estimates. I cannot vote in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North, be it for the sole reason that he wants this house to pass sentence before having heard the evidence. But I am not prepared to vote for those increased expenditures, unless it is clearly shown to me that they are warranted.

We are told that these estimates are necessary for the defence of Canada, and for Canada alone, and we are asked to have confidence in the government. I am quite willing to do so, but we should not be asked to vote blindly. Too many happenings of late have aroused our attention. Too many people from abroad have taken upon them to advise us. We have heard of national defence estimates amounting to $70,000,000, of 1,000 military planes for Canada, and so forth. Could it be that these present expenditures are but the beginning of the carrying out of a more extensive program? We are fully aware of the purposes of certain advisers from abroad, but we should rather like to know the present and future intentions of the government.

My duty to my electors is to oppose Canada's participation in any war outside of her own territory—the horrors of the last war are still too vivid,—and I will not vote a single dollar increase that will not be spent "wholly and exclusively" for the defence of Canada, and in Canada only.

Since our dominion is now a sovereign state, the obligation rests upon us to see to our own national defence, and we must protect ourselves against dangers from within and without. For that reason, I am prepared to vote any amount shown to be necessary to make this country safe.

But again, I say that our army, our air force and our navy must be called out only in defence of Canada and solely within her territory.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Interest guides all nations. Our interest tells us not to participate in any foreign war and consequently, not to prepare therefor. Our policy should be essentially a Canadian policy.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I listened with a great deal of attention this afternoon to the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) when he introduced this want of confidence motion as the house was about to go into committee of supply on the estimates for defence, and before proceeding with what I have to say on the motion I think it incumbent upon me to make a few remarks with regard to some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman. Let me say at the outset that if any opinion goes abroad in this country after to-day to the effect that Canada is preparing for war, it will have been started by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group across the floor, one member of whom, the hon. member for Vancouver North, this afternoon, on beginning to speak, said it appeared that Canada was now preparing for war. This was the first intimation on the part of any hon. member that the defence estimates about to be introduced represented the beginning of Canada's participation in any war preparations.

As I say, I followed very closely the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and before I go further there are one or two other matters to which I wish also to refer. The hon. member spoke about the pre-war mental attitude. Well, if there is any pre-war mental attitude, it certainly is not very manifest in this country. Looking around the world and seeing what is happening in various countries, one cannot help realizing that this is the last country in the world where one would expect to find that spirit. The hon. member spoke also about the rush of armaments throughout the world, suggesting that perhaps it was the beginning of the destruction of democracy. Need I point out that democracy's greatest bulwark is Great Britain? Linked with the dominions and the colonies she is the greatest factor in the world to-day in the safeguarding of democracy. But what is Great Britain doing along these lines? For quite a number of years she went about preaching peace and suddenly woke up to the fact that she was in great and grave danger, and in what is now taking place there is evidence of the fact that Great Britain is alive to the mistakes of the past years. It is said on reliable authority that at Christmas she gave every one of some forty million citizens a gas mask, free. Evidently she is alive to the danger from the air through poison gas.

The question of defence, Mr. Speaker, like that of neutrality, is different from the question of Canada's participation in any European war or the question of joining with or assisting Great Britain in any conflict in which she may participate either as aggressor or in self-defence. It is easy to understand the wide divergence of views with regard to the sending of troops across the seas to take part in conflicts in regard to which we in Canada have never been consulted and with which we may be or may believe ourselves to be remotely concerned. But the question of military equipment becomes an entirely different one when we come to the simple question of the defence of our own shore and country. Generally speaking, it is safe to say that there might be numbers of Canadians who would be hesitant about Canada participating in wars abroad, but who would never for a moment hesitate when it came to a question of defending Canada against attack. I noticed in the press, only this afternoon, a statement by the seconder of the resolution when, speaking at a gathering, he said he had been educating a boy of his not to participate in any foreign wars, telling him that it would be better for him to become a convict than a soldier. But I noted in the account that it was stated the boy said, "With the exception of the defence of Canada." And that question is the great one confronting this country.

It is hardly necessary to take up the time of the house in explaining what the various countries of the world are doing at the present moment? This was ably done this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), but I am going to touch for one moment on the great armament race which is taking place, and to point out that what we are doing in Canada is comparatively speaking nothing. Our proposed expenditure this year is something like one-half of one per cent of our total budget, as compared with budgets in countries like Japan where it is 46 per cent, Russia where it is 20 per cent, Jugoslavia where it is 21 per cent, and so on. Great Britain has likewise embarked upon a large program; her armaments budget for this year is close to 20 per cent of the total budget for the nation. And need I point out that we are no longer dealing with nations as nations? Contrast the statements recently made by Premier Mussolini of Italy and Herr Goebbels of Germany with that to which we have listened, made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). Mussolini said:

> I hold out a great olive branch to the world. This olive branch springs from an immense forest of eight million bayonets, well sharpened and thrust from intrepid young hearts.

There is Italy's olive branch. Contrast it with the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who I think should be sent over there as an emissary to see if he could do anything with that dictator.

And echoing through the world we hear the same sentiment. Herr Goebbels said:

> We took precautions on the principle that the League of Nations is good, but air squadrons and army corps are still better.

So one could go from one nation to another telling what each is doing, arming and re-arming in a feverish, mad rush.

But we come to the question of defence. That is the question confronting this house, the defence of our own land. I realize that it is a serious question, one in regard to which there are many schools of thought. The hon. member for Vancouver North, who introduced the resolution, referred, I think correctly, to the impossibility of effectively arming ourselves against modern warlike nations. I do not think there is an hon. member who seriously believes that eleven million people could adequately arm to protect themselves to-day against any of the major nations of the world who are now armed to the teeth. But may I say to the hon. member that I was painfully surprised by his remarks in which he seemed to express a little slurring sarcasm as to the efficiency of British professional troops. It will be remembered that at the outbreak of the great war, no one would care to think of what might have happened, but for that little band of professional troops which went over to France and stemmed the tide of the great German rush.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I remind the hon. member that I referred only to the general staff.

Mr. REID: Well, the hon. member makes that explanation now but he did not make it clear in his speech this afternoon, and that is what I am dealing with.

Then the hon. member said something to the effect that if Canada did get into trouble, perhaps the United States or even Great Britain would not stand by and see us put to the wall; but later he denied that it was a sponging policy. I cannot quite understand what he meant, because if we are going to depend forever upon the might of Great Britain and the United States, it certainly is a sponging policy and cannot be anything else.

We come, then, to the courses open to Canada. The first is that we can do nothing, nothing at all. Now that is very simple. Second, we could cooperate within the empire. But I know there are those in this country who will have no truck or trade with the old country. May I say this in kindness to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group; I have sat for six years in this house and never heard him say one kindly word regarding Great Britain. Of course I may have missed it. Then a third course proposed is to separate entirely from the empire, and that course involves one of two things, namely, make alliances, or arm. Those are the three courses which I see open to this country.

That brings us to the question of neutrality, which was briefly touched upon by the Minister of National Defence this afternoon, and which I am going to take a little time to elaborate. First, I should like to draw this fact to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the leader of the group. We are dealing with realities; we are not dealing with theories. I could liken him to a labour leader in the old country who later became Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who talked about peace, peace, and who at one time almost gave away Singapore. Had it not been for the Lords of the British Admiralty, that naval base, so much needed to-day, would have been given away by the then Labour Prime Minister of Great Britain. He kept talking peace, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has talked since I came into the house. It seems to me to be time partly wasted; it is on the European continent these things should be preached, not here, because we are a peaceable nation. Ramsay MacDonald talked peace in Great Britain, yes, and started to practise it while he was Prime Minister. But did any country in the world follow his lead? No, not one. In fact, the reverse was the case. Almost every country was quietly and secretly arming, until last year it was brought forcibly home to the British people how dangerous and futile that policy had been. Whether we like it or not, for the first time in the history of the British nation she had to take backwater and could not give world leadership when that leadership was required, as instanced during the time of the Ethiopian trouble. I say again, if anything happened to the British Empire, heaven help democracy! It surprises me that I have not heard one word of commendation from that group about the great struggle for democracy and the bulwark that Great Britain has been. I think some meed of praise is due Britain for that. But let us look seriously at Great Britain for a moment. Will anyone seriously dispute the statement that Great Britain has been and still is the greatest factor in the world for peace, or the greatest bulwark of democracy in the world? Would any hon. member seriously dispute that statement? I think not. Consider, then, her position to-day and just what she is doing in the way of war preparation. Among other things, as I have pointed out, she is presenting every citizen with a gas mask, and her latest program is running into a cost of billions of dollars.

That gives me a thought, Mr. Speaker. The other day I was just wondering what the two great labour leaders of Great Britain, Ramsay MacDonald and Philip Snowden, who is to-day in the House of Lords, would think now in view of the fact that in 1931 they went around the country preaching ruin if certain economies were not effected. And be it remembered those economies were effected by cutting the rates of unemployment relief, by cutting teachers' salaries, and by reducing other social services. I wonder what they would think now that this latest program has been commenced, because it certainly makes their total budget of 1931 look very small indeed. As a rule, the British people are lovers of peace, and during the years of Arthur Henderson and Ramsay MacDonald Great Britain went further than any other nation in an effort to induce all other countries to beat their swords into ploughshares. But the British people realize now that they went too far in that direction. Not only did it do no good at all; it was a dangerous experiment. It was laudable, I admit, to endeavour to practise the principles which were laid down by Ramsay MacDonald when he was Prime Minister, but theorist as he was, he failed to discern that he was dealing not with theories but with realities.

I am inclined to think the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in this house is somewhat that same type of theorist. It could be said also, perhaps, that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party stands in almost the same position in Canada as the party formerly headed by Ramsay MacDonald occupies in Great Britain. It is well known that Ramsay MacDonald ruined the socialist cause in Great Britain for many, many years to come. That is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to have done for his party in Canada. He endeavoured to form a new political group in this country; he attempted to join farmers and labour under one political head, and designated the party the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, with the theoretical doctrine of state socialism for labour on the one hand and private ownership of land for the farmers on the other. That was a beautiful theory, but just the same it was a theory which was doomed to failure from the start. Those who have given any thought at all to the subject know full well that state ownership was abandoned long ago as an obsolete doctrine and a socialist idea, and if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had been a little more practical he never would have attempted such a political union in this country. It was unfortunate for his party, and like Ramsay MacDonald he must accept some responsibility for the unfortunate experiment. It is little wonder that in British Columbia the party is split in two.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I should like to deal with the question of neutrality, but I want to deal with it in a practical way in order to show this house how real the question is and just how it will and does affect Canada. To maintain neutrality Canada must become a full-fledged nation supporting international law and able to play its part. But we heard nothing like that from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he spoke of neutrality. He just waved his arms and said "neutrality" as if there were nothing to it. If we in Canada are going to have neutrality, we must be able to enforce international law and to play our part as a full-fledged nation. But when we endeavour to make a beginning in playing our part as a full-fledged nation; when we endeavour to put ourselves in a position to respect and enforce international law, we are met by a want of confidence motion introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). I should like to quote Lord Birkenhead on international law, but I do not intend to quote very extensively because the lawyers in this house might be tempted to object if I did so. At page 325 of his book on International Law, Lord Birkenhead says that when a neutral government does not or cannot expel an enemy or an enemy ship, the other belligerent is justified in taking complete charge of the situation, and according to the Hague Convention of 1907 failure to enforce neutrality is a breach of neutrality. Then, with respect to international law, Lord Birkenhead says further, that a country guilty of a breach of neutrality must pay damages, et cetera.

According to international law which is in effect to-day, no belligerent ship may remain in any neutral port longer than twenty-four hours. Just consider for a moment what would happen if, say the United States and Japan were at war and a Japanese submarine or battleship endeavoured to enter or to remain in one of our Pacific ports. If we did not take action, we certainly would be in trouble. I am going to visualize for a moment what might take place as far as the Pacific coast of British Columbia is concerned. The coast line of British Columbia is some 750 miles in length, and in that distance there are numerous islands and bays. There would be nothing to hinder the Japanese, we shall say for the sake of argument, from hiding large quantities of oil and gasoline on one of these islands. Then, in case of war, a Japanese submarine or some other Japanese ship could, if required refuel at that point. What would be our position if we took no action in connection with that ship while it was in our territory? Do you think we could just say "We are neutral and will do nothing?" Would that be the end of it? I do not think so, nor would it.

I am going to cite actual cases. One of them may be rather ancient, but one is a very recent case. I do so in order to draw to the attention of the house just what could and would happen in the event of our neglect or inability to chase out one of the belligerents. The first case I have in mind is that of Alabama, which is a historical case. Great Britain allowed that ship to escape. The United States filed a claim against Great Britain for $15,000,000, part of which has been paid, and I understand the rest would have been paid if it had been possible to locate the owners of goods which were damaged. Then, during the Russo-Japanese war of 1905, a Russian destroyer took refuge in a Chinese port. China was a neutral country and could not either order the destroyer out or put it out. Well, the Japanese just went in there and blew up the ship. We all remember the case of the German cruiser Dresden during the last war. Oh, yes, the cruiser was a long way from home, but still this happened out in the Pacific. The Dresden escaped after the battle of the Falkland islands. The British warships hunted the Dresden for three months and finally located it in Chilean territory at Juan Fernandez island. Rather than surrender the ship the commander had the crew taken off and then he blew up and sank the cruiser.

I know there are some who say that war between the United States and Japan is unthinkable. Pray heaven it never comes! But if one believes the statements we have heard in this house recently that preparation for war brings war, there is then certainly a grave possibility of war between those two nations, because they are arming at an unprecedented rate. If war ever takes place, let me warn the house and the country that we cannot stay out of it. It is no idle boast of the Japanese on our coast that if war ever occurs, she intends to use the territory of British Columbia as a base for operations. Whether we like it or not, we are not going to escape the responsibility of lack of enforcement of neutrality in the event of hostilities between two other nations. If American trade were interfered with on our Pacific coast and if it were known that a Japanese submarine or destroyer were harboured in any of our ports, the United States would not hesitate for a moment, and rightly so, to come in and take complete charge of the territory.

Yet there are those who say that our remaining neutral does not imperil us. I say again to the hon. member for Vancouver North, when he speaks of being neutral, to look at the matter from a practical viewpoint, from the standpoint of realities. If he does he will come to the viewpoint to which I have come, that we cannot remain neutral unless we are prepared to do more not only toward chasing out an enemy ship but toward protecting our own.

I had not intended speaking as long as this, but I thought it incumbent upon me to rise in my place and say that I for one could not and would not support the want of confidence motion, believing as I do that it is the duty of a nation to defend herself. I realize the truth of what the hon. member said, that perhaps more should be done for social purposes and by way of alleviating distress. I am all for this, but I agree with Adam Smith who many years ago said that defence is greater than opulence. In this country opulence means trade and commerce. If we are going to take our part as a nation, it is high time we began looking after our own defence.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the impassioned speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) as it was delivered both before and after recess. It was almost as forceful as some of his speeches I read regarding proposals for credit and currency in terms of public need. However, since he made those speeches he has become Minister of National Defence, and his slogan seems to have been altered to guns and battleships, in terms of military demand.

He spoke about lack of consistency in the amendment, as well he should; he himself is so consistent that he must deplore inconsistency in anyone else. I would ask hon. members to note how strikingly similar both slogans are; both demand something for someone. Of course, it is not the same "someone," but one must remember that the minister is not now occupying the same position as he did at another time. This may account for the slight change of wording.

However, at this session of parliament he is about to ask for a vote of some millions of dollars to be expended, as he explains, for national defence purposes. May I state clearly at this point that this afternoon the minister stated that this is not in any way to be considered as helping in, or part of the British Empire defence plan. A short time ago the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) stated that we should speak about the glorious part Great Britain has taken in order to preserve world peace. I do not for one moment doubt that all the glory coming to her should be given her. She should be given credit for it, but in view of the declaration of policy of the Minister of National Defence, I fail to see that in these defence estimates we are called upon to make any decision on that particular point. Apparently he does not wish to associate himself with any empire defence plan. On the other hand, he does not like to prepare for war, and would have us believe that these expenditures are merely for the defence of Canada, and of Canada alone.

In view of the fact that last year we spent millions of dollars for the same purpose and that this year we are called upon to spend more millions of dollars, it seems to me the question of defence is one which should be defined. I wonder where the limit is going to be, so far as defence is concerned. That is one thing the minister has not told us. For example, he told us about the efficiency of his department. His department had pointed out to him what was needed in Canada. They wanted some battle ships, some anti-aircraft guns, new equipment, and so on. I find in a return tabled at this session that some $45,807,928 was spent strictly for military requirements since 1920. Yet we find the Minister of National Defence telling the house that we have nothing by way of defence in Canada. He tells us we have not a gun worth while keeping; he says we have no machine guns, no anti-aircraft guns, despite an expenditure of over $45,000,000. I am wondering where the money went.

This afternoon he pointed out the necessity for the defence of Canada, should anyone attack us. But, like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), he failed to mention who the supposed enemy might be. The Minister of Justice at least said that there were three or four dogs, allegedly mad, running around Europe. They have not yet snarled at the Minister of Justice, because he did not name them. Undoubtedly a local disturbance of such a nature as to demand all the hearing powers of the Minister of National Defence must surround him, and prevent him from hearing the same noises as does the Minister of Justice. We are told by the Minister of National Defence that these are armaments for defence purposes. What do other nations say? Germany is arming, and Hitler says:

> It must be thoroughly understood that the lost lands will never be won back by solemn appeals to the good God, nor by pious hopes in any league of nations, but only by force of arms.

Italy is also arming, and Mussolini says:

> We reject the absurdity of eternal peace, which is foreign to our creed and our temperament. We must be strong; we must be always stronger; we must be so strong that we can face any eventuality.

Russia is also arming, and Stalin says:

> The trend towards disarmament is openly being replaced by a trend toward arming and rearming. The people of the U.S.S.R. would fight to the very death to preserve the gains of the revolution.

France, too, is arming. Premier Leon Blum says:

> The Europe of 1914 has been reconstituted not only in its material but in its moral elements. Faith in peace is shaken and dislocated. The final catastrophe seems to be preferred to the worry.

Great Britain is arming, too. My point is that exactly the same situation prevailed in the years prior to the last war. This is something which should cause alarm. I have in my hand the speeches delivered in the Imperial House of Commons in August, 1914, relative to Great Britain and to European powers. I ask hon. members to note how similar are the pronouncements of the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice at this session of parliament, in these times, to those spoken in 1914 in the British House of Commons. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey, said this:

Last week I stated we were working for peace—

The Minister of National Defence said exactly the same thing to-day. Sir Edward Grey continues:

—not only for this country—

The minister would have some of us believe that it is only for this country.

—but to preserve the peace of Europe. To-day events move so rapidly that it is exceedingly difficult to state with technical accuracy the actual state of affairs.

The Minister of National Defence no doubt realizes that the world is faced with exactly the same eventualities to-day. We have the same pronouncements about the building up of armaments in order to defend the integrity of one's country or to bring about world peace, but let us see what the result has been of all these cries about saving democracy for posterity, fighting in defence of freedom, and so on, because in the final analysis it is results that count.

Apparently a large number of people have been forgotten, and perhaps it is right to forget them because they are dead. They are the eight million people who gave up their lives in the last war. There died in the last war 1,611,014 Germans; 1,427,800 Frenchmen; 2,672,064 Russians; 911,000 Austrians; 807,451 Englishmen; 507,160 Italians. Those were the soldiers who died in the last war. This number does not include many others of other nations who met their deaths in the last war, and all this was done after we had been told by the great statesmen of the world that they were arming in order to keep democracy safe for posterity.

Now let us see how many were wounded in the last war. The number was 20,297,551 soldiers wounded. Even to-day in this Canada of ours we can go about the country and in all parts we find soldiers who are still lying on their beds of agony as a result of the wounds they received in the last war. In addition, there were 9,000,000 war orphans, and 5,000,000 war widows. The total capitalized value of the civilian lives lost has been estimated to be $33,551,276,280, and I give it to the very last dollar because it is so many dollars' worth of civilian lives. The property loss on land was figured at $29,960,000,000; property loss on sea, $6,800,000,000; loss to neutrals, $2,000,000,000, and loss to the world, $337,846,189,667.

The hon. member behind me asks, where does the money come from? I wonder. It is something that cannot be explained by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when we require certain moneys for social purposes. It is something that cannot be explained by any of the governments under the present existing financial system. They do not know where the money is to come from for social services, but when it is to be used for purposes of destruction, to snuff out the lives of brother human beings, to build up armaments with which they can fight and kill each other, then there is no difficulty about finding all the money that is necessary, and in destroying all the goods that we could put to better use.

I have no doubt it is quite easy for the Minister of National Defence to make such an impassioned plea as he did to-night, because he is surrounded by many of his colleagues who are honoured and happy to applaud him every once in a while. That gives him a great deal of courage, and undoubtedly pushed him to extremes so far as his oration to-night was concerned. When I saw his colleagues pounding their desks to-night, and saw the minister of National Defence himself pounding his own desk this afternoon, I felt they were pounding upon the hearts of those who are always the losers in any war, and that is the mothers in all countries. They are always the losers, and have been in every war since man first lifted his hand against his brother. Millions of them are now the mothers of spirits whom once they called their sons.

So, I cannot find it within myself to support increased armaments for Canada because I do not believe these armaments are really and truly only for purposes of national defence. The Prime Minister this afternoon—and I think I heard him correctly—denied that any sort of agreement either implied or otherwise existed between any country and Canada in connection with these millions of dollars which Canada is asked to expend on armaments. I would point out, however, that before the last great war broke out, an agreement or at least an understanding existed between the general staffs of Great Britain and Belgium that was not recorded at the time but was eventually found to have been in existence, and when we read statements such as were made by outstanding men like Sir Samuel Hoare recently in England, I cannot see much consistency in the statement of the Minister of National Defence that these armaments are not for empire defence. It is almost impossible to know what the true position is. The government persistently refuse to give us their policy. They tell us they do not want to have anything to do with the British Empire, that these moneys are not for empire defence. They have repeated that time and time again. The member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) feels he can support these estimates because he believes they are not for the purpose of empire defence, but in the next breath he would like to have us contribute something to Great Britain. It is most difficult to know the true position, and until such time as we have a definite statement from the government as to what these armaments are really for, I cannot find myself able to vote for these increased armaments.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this question is very important, first, on account of the amount involved, and second, on account of the principle involved.

If we consider the amount involved, and compare it with what was expended in previous years, it is rather a large amount; but if we compare this amount with what has been voted in countries like the Argentine Republic, Chile, Switzerland or the Irish Free State, it is not a large amount. The South American countries have no more reason to arm than we have. If the Monroe doctrine means anything, they are protected by it just as much as we are. They are further away from Europe and Asia, and yet they spend larger amounts on armaments than we are asked to spend. If the amount is considered in relation to the armaments that we had here, it is not a large amount because we had nothing at all before, as was so well said by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

But I feel that the question is rather one of principle, and the principle involved is that of contribution to the future wars of Europe. If national defence meant contribution to the future wars of Europe, then I say undoubtedly I would have to be against national defence. If it meant contribution to European wars, I am sure that the people of my own province would soon ask themselves the question: Is it worth while to stay within the British Empire if we have to go to war because South Africa wants its independence recognized, because Germany wants its colonies back, or for any other reason?

But if we have to defend Canadian territory and if it means only the defence of our territory, I am going to vote heartily for this measure of defence. It is true, in my opinion, that, legally speaking, we are just as independent as we can be. The Statute of Westminster is not, unfortunately, a title that we can take and register in the book of independence as a proprietor would register title to his own property. Perhaps because we have not gained this statute at the price of bloodshed, we do not accord it as much importance as we should. On the other hand, we bear the earmark of a British country; we have the same flag; we have the same king, and if England or some other part of the British Empire were attacked, we would have to defend ourselves. I say gladly that I am ready to stay a long time within the British Empire at the price of defending my own country against any attack. It is true that Canada is further removed than any other part of the empire from any conflict which we to-day can foresee. But the high seas are not so far away nowadays as they were many years ago. True, we cannot argue away the Atlantic or the Pacific ocean, but it must be remembered that Washington is nearer to London than it is to Mexico.

We hear a lot about the Monroe doctrine. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might give this house the benefit of some studies I have made recently with regard to that doctrine. It was formulated in 1823 as a defence against the Holy Alliance, reactionary powers of Europe that wanted to bring the Spanish colonies of South America into submission to Spain. It was directed against England, against France, and against Russia, but it was formulated without any request on the part of the South American colonies. It has been interpreted by the United States in fifty different ways, and its only meaning as far as that nation is concerned is that the United States shall intervene whenever they want to intervene and that they will not intervene if they feel it is in their interests not to do so. Very often its effect has been to stop other countries from interfering with the states of South America, not only from armed intervention but from purchasing land or territory when they wanted to acquire such lands or territories for themselves. We know what happened as far as Texas, New Mexico, upper California and Cuba are concerned. The Monroe doctrine is a doctrine of "no colonization." We are apt to forget that confederation itself was passed as an answer to that doctrine. I have before me a book written by Professor Reddaway, of Cambridge university, and he quotes the words of President Adams, some time in 1827, that "the union must soon include all North America." In 1866, not only the president of the United States but the house of representatives considered a bill to annex the colonies north of their northern frontier, and Mr. Reddaway says:

These feelings found utterance when, in 1866, the house of representatives considered a bill for the eventual annexation of the continent north of their own borders. They were answered by the British North America Act, which united Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick into a single dominion. This constituted the sharpest check which the development of the Monroe doctrine had received.

There are numerous quotations similar to this in the book to which I have referred and in another book written in 1897 by a French professor, M. Delarue de Beaumarchais. The South Americans did not like the Monroe doctrine. It is said in Mr. Reddaway's book that they never called for it and they never recognized it. As I said a few minutes ago, the United States have interpreted it to suit their own interests of the moment. With regard to Cuba, Mr. Reddaway states:

The question of Cuba, however, interwoven as it was with the question of slavery, continued to occupy the attention of the United States. The succeeding president, aiming at preventing emancipation by annexing the island, endorsed the Monroe doctrine in his message of 1853.

This is what I want to come to:

In 1854.

. . . the ambassadors of the United States to London, Paris and Madrid met at Ostend, and astounded Europe by a manifesto. If Spain refused to sell Cuba to the republic, they declared, all laws divine and human would justify the republic in taking it by force.

Well, I say that this is not a doctrine to protect the neighbours of the United States. Even if we were independent to-day we should have to spend more than we shall spend under the present program of the government. In 1895, war was almost brought about between the United States and Great Britain, by virtue of the Monroe doctrine, in connection with the borders between Guiana and Venezuela. But where the effect of the doctrine clearly showed itself is with relation to Cuba. I am not going to relate the more recent history of Cuba, for I think it is known to everybody, but I suggest it indicates that we should protect ourselves without having too much recourse to the Monroe doctrine. It indicates that if we depend upon the United States for our defence, we must pay for it. In the history of the United States we cannot find anywhere that the American government has sacrificed money and men without receiving due return. We are all thankful for the part the United States took in the great war, and the words of General Pershing when he arrived in France, "Lafayette, we are here," will go down in history. But we must also remember that four or five years afterwards congress said to the allies, and especially to France, "Lafayette, here is the bill." And they are still pressing for it.

So far as my province is concerned, the question is one of national defence, but our opponents in that province are trying to induce the people to believe that national defence means participation. Allow me to quote from a newspaper which is not particularly sympathetic to the Liberals in the province of Quebec; I refer to Le Devoir. I believe the editors of Le Devoir are sincere, but they forget what they wrote in 1914. I find in Le Devoir of August 3, 1914, the editor-in-chief, Mr. Heroux, writing the following words:

On annonce que la Commission du Port et la compagnie du Grand-Tronc font particulièrement surveiller les élévateurs à grain et leur matériel, et que le Commission du Port a demandé au gouvernement d'exercer une surveillance spéciale sur les canaux et les ports. Tout cela est de première nécessité et utile au premier chef au gouvernement canadien, comme la mise en défense de nos côtes et le maintien de la paix intérieure.

Let me translate the principal words: "All that is of the greatest necessity and of vital importance to the Canadian government, and so is the proper defence of our shores and the maintenance of internal peace." But that is not all. Again, on August 3, 1914, Mr. Armand LaVergne made a speech which was reported in Le Devoir: He said:

M. Armand Lavergne, le jeune député nationaliste, que l'on a interrogé sur la participation du Canada à la guerre européenne et sur la rumeur de son départ pour la guerre, a déclaré: "Il n'est pas vrai que je pars pour la guerre car j'ai toujours désapprouvé la participation du Canada aux guerres à l'étranger, que ce soit avec la France ou l'Angleterre. Si les troupes sont mobilisées pour la défense du Canada, j'obéirai aux ordres. Je considère que les Canadiens rendraient un meilleur service à l'Angleterre en protégeant Sydney, Halifax et Québec, plutôt que d'envoyer des troupes se battre en Europe.

Let me translate this again: "If mobilization is ordered for the defence of Canada I shall obey orders. I consider that Canadians will render a greater service to England in protecting Sydney, Halifax and Quebec, than in sending troops to fight in Europe." Well, to protect any of these ports or the port of Vancouver from a raid, we need anti-aircraft guns and boats to sweep the St. Lawrence clear of mines. We cannot defend these towns with water pistols or pea-shooters. On August 5, 1914, Le Devoir said:

Chaque heure rend plus claire la gravité et l'étendue des mesures que nous impose la défense du Canada proprement dit—notre devoir particulier, où personne ne nous suppléera et pour l'accomplissement duquel nous ne devons rien épargner.

This is important and I want to translate it: "Every moment shows more clearly the gravity and the extensiveness of the measures which the defence of Canada is imposing upon us, which is our duty where anybody may attack us, and for which we shall neglect nothing." I am not going to quote many more, though I could if I wanted to go through the files; but on August 5, 1914, Mr. Armand LaVergne also said:

En face de la situation qui nous est faite, nous devons nous demander, dit M. Lavergne, quels sont nos devoirs? Je considère que nous avons pour premier devoir de défendre notre territoire. Le danger que court l'Angleterre n'est pas dans l'armée autrichienne ni dans la flotte allemande. L'Angleterre peut être affamée dans tous sens et nous devons protéger les ports de Sydney et de Halifax et garder libre la route du Saint-Laurent, afin de pouvoir lui offrir un grenier où elle trouvera ses vivres.

I think this deserves to be translated at length: "Confronting the situation which is facing us we must ask ourselves what our duty is. I consider that our first duty is to defend our territory. The danger to England is not from the Austrian army or the German navy. England will be needing foodstuffs and we must protect our ports of Sydney and Halifax and keep free the St. Lawrence route so that she may have access to our granaries from which to secure her bread."

On August 17, Mr. Heroux of Le Devoir, wrote words that are still more in our favour to-day. He said:

Nous estimons avec la vieille tradition canadienne, que les obligations militaires du Canada se limitent à la défense du territoire: ce devoir, il est absolu et nous devons l'accomplir, quelle que soit l'attitude du gouvernement ontarien. Si nous croyions que notre devoir va au delà, nous dirions encore à nos compatriotes: Accomplissons ce devoir, quoi que fasse le gouvernement. On ne marchande pas dans ce domaine.

I translate: "We feel with the old Canadian tradition that the military obligations of Canada are limited to the national defence of our territory. This duty is absolute, and we must perform it whatever may be the attitude of the Ontario government to the school question. If we thought our duty went further we would so inform our compatriots. Let us discharge this duty, whatever may be done by the government of Ontario. We must not bargain in this domain." He was referring to the Ontario government of that time. These are words that are true to our best traditions and I am proud to-day to defend these preparations for national defence. I am proud to-day to support these proposals for national defence. I am proud to think that the minister who first proposed in this house the act to set up the Canadian militia was a French-Canadian from Quebec, who sat among the Conservatives.

On July 9, 1914, before the war broke out Mr. Bourassa was in London, and, speaking before the Liberal Colonial Club, he is reported by the newspapers to have said:

Il a déclaré qu'il appartenait à la Grande-Bretagne de garder les mers tandis que le Canada ferait sa part en défendant son territoire. M. Bourassa a très bien résumé la situation canadienne en montrant plusieurs partis occupés à fortifier les liens impérialistes, pendant que les seuls nationalistes travaillaient sur des bases logiques au développement de la défense nationale.

This means: He declared that the safekeeping of the high seas belonged to Great Britain, while Canada would do her share in defending her territory.

Mr. Bourassa summed up the Canadian situation by showing that other political parties were working for the imperial link, while the nationalists were working on a logical basis for the development of national defence.

Again, on February 24, 1917, speaking of Canadian statesmen, he said:

S'ils étaient restés fidèles à la tradition canadienne et aux accords arrêtés avec la Grande-Bretagne, ils se seraient bornés à préparer la défense du territoire canadien.

Which means that if the government had restricted itself to the motives governing all other statements, if it had remained true to Canadian tradition and to accords made with Great Britain, our statesmen would have restricted themselves to providing for the defence of Canadian territory.

Then, another question which is asked in the province of Quebec is: Where is the enemy? This question we can read in many newspapers, including Le Devoir. To-day with the airplane enemies may come from afar. But if there is a man who should not ask this question, it is the ex-director of Le Devoir. In 1914, Mr. Bourassa was in Europe; on July 30 he was in Strassbourg; on July 31 he was in Cologne, and on August 2 he was in Cologne. Coming back to this continent, on August 22 he gave to the newspapers an interview in which he said that he even had to walk to the German frontier, the train service being completely disorganized by the state of war, and that he had to leave his trunks in Germany.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the reasons why I intend to vote with the government and to vote against the motion. As a Canadian speaking the French language, I feel that I would be belittling my country if we did not make provision to defend ourselves properly. I should be belittling my province and my own race. To conclude, let me quote a word of Mr. Reddaway, written in 1898. Speaking of the southern nations of America, he said:

> The nations of South America would no doubt sacrifice much to gain the United States as an ally. They would be untrue to their Spanish ancestors, on the other hand, if they accepted her protection at the price of any portion of their political independence.

If we rely solely on the Monroe doctrine for our defence, we are absolutely abandoning our independence, or at any rate a great part of it. I am sure that in my own province the leader of the government, whose ancestors suffered for the autonomy of Canada, is going to be looked upon as a true Canadian; the province of Quebec will have faith in him and will not have any trouble in voting for these appropriations.

On motion of Mr. Thorson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 16, 1937

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BANK OF CANADA

Report made by the Bank of Canada on the financial position of the province of Manitoba.—Mr. Dunning.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DEBATE ON DEFENCE ESTIMATES—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the house is to be free to continue the debate on the defence estimates on Thursday, it will be necessary to suspend the rule under which the Speaker leaves the chair without question put. I move, therefore, with the consent of the house:

> That the provision of standing order 28 respecting the committee of supply be suspended for the sittings of Thursday, 18th February, and Friday, 19th February, 1937.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION TO STUDY TAXATION AND DIVISION OF FINANCIAL POWERS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already had occasion to intimate to this house that the government has been giving a great deal of thought to the desirability of appointing a commission to study certain aspects of the relationship between the dominion and the provinces. The aspects to which I refer are primarily financial. They include the allocation of sources of revenue, and the financial capacity of the provinces to discharge their responsibilities.

The problem we have had in mind has become acute in the case of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The depression, intensified by drought, has drastically reduced the income of the people of these two provinces and consequently the revenue-raising capacity of their governments, while at the same time it has given rise to steadily mounting relief costs and fixed charges. These two provinces have thus far met their obligations, but we have been advised that it is impossible for them to continue to meet their present burdens with the sources of income available to them. Representations to this effect were made at the financial conference held in Ottawa in December, and the matter was again discussed by the premiers of the respective provinces with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in January.

As an outcome of the discussions between the premiers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the Minister of Finance, the Bank of Canada was invited by all concerned to make an independent study of the financial position of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and was asked to present its views at the earliest possible date. The bank's report on Manitoba is now in the hands of the government. The report has been tabled to-day. It expresses the view that Manitoba has imposed taxation on a scale at least as high as that of any other province in Canada, and has restricted expenditures as far as it was possible to go without curtailing the services to an extent which would not have been in the public interest. Certain additional expenditures are now believed to be essential, but the bank is not prepared to say that it is practical to secure the necessary funds by means of further taxation, and there is no nearby prospect of securing revenues to cover the provincial share of relief costs. The report on Saskatchewan is not yet available, but it is probable that it will disclose difficulties at least as serious as those of Manitoba.

In giving consideration to the situation, as a whole, we have thought it unwise to consider the ability to borrow as the only test which should be applied. If provincial governments find it difficult to discharge the responsibilities which have been placed upon them, and, at the same time, in spite of genuine efforts at economy, to make both ends meet, there will eventually be an end to their ability to finance deficits by additional borrowing. The difficulties of the prairie provinces have been greatly intensified by drought, and the earning power of their people has been affected accordingly. But other sections of the country are not free from problems of a similar character, although they may not be so acute. We have, in short, ample indication of certain fundamental strains and weaknesses arising out of our present allocation of financial powers and governmental responsibilities, and if no attempt is made to remove them, the ill effects will not be confined to the sections where they now appear.

In these circumstances, we propose to appoint a royal commission of inquiry to investigate the whole system of taxation in the dominion; to study the division of financial powers and financial responsibilities between the dominion and the provinces; and to make recommendations as to what should be done to secure a more equitable and practical division of the burden to enable all governments to function more effectively—and, I may add, more independently—within the spheres of their respective jurisdictions.

The commission will be faced with a great volume of work, and will require some time to formulate its recommendations. Its appointment, therefore, cannot represent an immediate solution of the pressing financial problems of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. If these provinces are to continue to discharge their present responsibilities, some immediate financial assistance is necessary. In the circumstances, we believe that the dominion government would be justified in extending temporary aid to them pending the report of the royal commission. A recommendation to that effect will be made to the house when the supplementary estimates are brought down.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): It is obvious that this is not the moment for a discussion of the intimation given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but as a citizen of Alberta I protest with all my might against this discrimination. I protest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) permitted that province to default and did not advance it the necessary money shortly after the present provincial administration came into office, whereas he now accords Manitoba and Saskatchewan that assistance which will save them from the course which it was necessary for the province of Alberta to follow.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I assume, Mr. Speaker, the rules will not permit me to reply.

Mr. BENNETT: Reply as much as you like; it is the fact.

Mr. DUNNING: The charge of discrimination just uttered by the leader of the opposition is a complete surprise to me. The condition to which he refers and which is the occasion of his protest was the condition of one year ago. I shall not now discuss the merits of the situation which then existed; they were discussed in this house under the conditions which then prevailed. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that another year has passed and that year has seen more widespread drought than western Canada has ever experienced, more especially in the two provinces to which reference was made by the Prime Minister to-day. Further, may I say that the provinces concerned have made and are making every effort to discharge all their responsibilities. On no occasion has there been any effort to coerce the dominion government. There has been at all times a frank and straightforward presentation of their problems. Secondly, the provinces requested the Bank of Canada to look into and verify their statements of their financial position. That report is in the hands of the government at the present time and was tabled to-day. It is not a report containing recommendations but a report dealing with the facts of the situation. It is with that situation that we are attempting to deal to-day. No mention was made in the statement of the Prime Minister regarding Alberta; no approach has been made by the province of Alberta along similar lines. I can say, however, that the province of Alberta has been treated by this government absolutely without discrimination in so far as financial assistance is concerned since this government came into power; and I can go further and say that the government has no intention whatsoever of discriminating against any province in this dominion and is prepared to sit down with any province and discuss its problems and bring forward such solutions as the circumstances may appear to warrant.

I am having to speak thus extemporaneously because it was a great surprise to me that the leader of the opposition should make such an accusation of discrimination under circumstances which are well known to all members of the house and throughout the country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to the Prime Minister, the commission to be appointed is to study the present allocation of the powers of the provinces and the dominion especially as they relate to taxation and generally to financial problems. I should like to ask him whether it is not possible to include in the duties of the commission a study of the responsibility for unemployment and other matters of the kind which are perhaps equally important, if not more so, and which have to a certain extent at least led to the present difficulties of the western provinces. Is it not possible that the scope of the commission might be extended?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that on a reading of the statement I have made my hon. friend will find that the scope of the commission with respect to all financial matters is very wide and, I imagine, will be found to embrace to a certain extent at least what he has in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: I assume that a copy of the order in council appointing the commission will be laid on the table when the commission is appointed.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

REDUCTION OF DEBTS BY BOARD OF REVIEW IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with regard to the percentage of reduction in debts by the board of review now operating in the province of Saskatchewan. It has been reported that under the present board the percentage of reduction is 43·9 as against 27·8 under the previous board. My question is this: will farmers whose cases were reviewed by the previous board be permitted to resubmit them and have them reviewed by the present board?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): There is no provision in the law which would enable such a rehearing as my hon. friend requests. As he and other interested members are aware, the privy council has recently held the particular statute in question to be valid. Until that decision was reached no detailed consideration had been given to the possibility of amendments, and I cannot indicate at this stage whether amendments will or will not be proposed this session.

SUPPLY—NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning that the house go into committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. MacNeil.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): It is the right of every hon. member to criticize any policy that is submitted to this house for its consideration, and that right becomes a duty when the member believes the policy to be contrary to the welfare of Canada. It is for that reason that I take part in this debate.

My mind rebels against the possibility of Canada participating in another war if such participation can be avoided. Our first duty must be the maintenance of peace. We must safeguard as far as possible our own people from the appalling consequences of war. The welfare of Canada must be our supreme concern. I will not go so far as to say that there are no possible circumstances under which Canada should go to war. Some great fundamental principle might demand it, and I have no doubt that if such a contingency should arise, Canada would courageously face the call of duty. But Canada must herself decide whether she will participate in war. She must also decide for herself whether she should prepare for war. It is that question which in my humble opinion is involved in this debate.

I assert, as the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) has frequently done, the right of this parliament to decide whether and to what extent Canada shall participate if war is declared. I assert her right not to participate if that is her desire. I go even further and assert Canada's right to declare her neutrality if she wishes to do so; for I believe that every question of peace and war in which Canada may be involved is for the Canadian people to decide and for no one else. However, it is not my intention at this time to enter upon a debate on this constitutional point.

Before we embark upon a policy that may lead to Canadian participation in war let us think of the possible consequences in terms of human life and the effect upon the individuals for whose welfare we are for the time being responsible. Have we forgotten the terrible cost of the last war and the absolute futility of that war? What does the record tell us? Here it is: ten million men killed, twenty million others wounded or disabled, nine million orphans, five million widows, ten million homeless refugees, and $186,000,000,000 wasted. That is only a rough story of the cost in human life and money of the great war, a war that settled absolutely nothing.

Canada played a noble part in that war, but at what an appalling cost, not only to those who were engaged in it but to posterity as well. I have here a statement of the cost to Canada of the last war. It is difficult to obtain exact figures and the figures which I shall cite are subject to some adjustments, but they are, I believe, substantially correct. The statement is as follows:

Sums directly paid out for war purposes, demobilization and adjustment of war claims from the commencement of the war to March 31, 1936	$1,697,352,212
Sums paid out as interest on the war debt for the same period, approximately	1,600,000,000
Sums paid out for war pensions, approximately	685,000,000
Cost of administration of soldiers' civil reestablishment, approximately	228,797,650
Cost of administration of soldier land settlement, approximately	25,403,704
Losses on soldier land settlement, approximately	75,000,000
Cost of care of patients and medical examination of pensioners	45,474,988

This makes the immense total of over $4,357,000,000. This vast sum includes the major item of direct monetary costs incurred by the nation at large. It does not include the direct or indirect losses occasioned to private individuals by reason of the war or the dislocations caused by the war, nor does it take into account the enormous loss of human life—60,000 young men—or the human suffering that has been the lot of those who participated in the last war, and their dependents.

This vast sum of approximately $4,500,000,000 has been paid by the Canadian people for the last war, an average of approximately $200,000,000 per annum for the past twenty-two years. What could that great sum have accomplished for the Canadian people if it had been devoted to the cause of peace and the social and economic welfare of our people? Is it any wonder that men should hesitate about embarking upon another war and be fearful of any policies that may tend in that direction?

Moreover, that war has not yet been paid for. An enormous annual cost for the last war still remains upon our shoulders to be paid this year, next year and annually almost in perpetuity. For the year ending March 31, 1936, the cost to Canada of the last war may roughly be estimated as follows:

Sums directly paid for war purposes, demobilization and adjustment of war claims	$ 54,843
Share of interest payments attributable to our war debt, approximately	100,000,000
Sums paid out for war pensions	41,521,577
Cost of administration of soldiers' civil reestablishment, approximately	10,000,000
Cost of administration of soldier land settlement, approximately	750,000
Cost of the care of patients and medical examination of pensioners	2,863,991

This represents the immense total of over $155,000,000. If that sum could have been used for purposes of peace instead of having had to be applied in payment of the obligations imposed by the war, what could it mean in increased opportunities for the Canadian people, particularly for that great body of the youth of Canada on whose door the knock of opportunity has not been heard?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I approach this subject from the point of view of the welfare of the Canadian people. I am not at all concerned with what other countries may think of Canada. My first duty is to Canada, my own country, and to my fellow Canadians; to save this country, if at all possible, from participation in another war the consequences of which will be even more destructive than those of the last war.

What are the reasons advanced for this new policy? We are entitled to examine them closely and to accept or reject them. It has been sought to justify the increases in the naval, militia and air force estimates on the ground that they are necessary for national self defence purposes, and that the moneys voted will be used exclusively for such purposes. These purposes are said to be threefold: to combat subversive elements in our midst; to protect our trade routes, and to repel foreign invasion. Let our thinking be clear before we embark upon a policy that may perhaps, even contrary to the wishes of those who initiate it, march by rapid stages from one of purely national self defence to a very different one of participation in a war, contrary to the best interests of our country. It is our duty to examine this question from the viewpoint of the welfare of Canada and Canadians; for, if this is the beginning of a policy of preparation for war, and if we are commencing to engage in a race of armaments, the time for a protest against such a policy is now, before the policy gets under way and beyond our control.

I have heard it stated that this increased vote is necessary to enable us to combat subversive elements in our midst. Obviously the naval vote is not intended for such a purpose. Is our air force or our militia to be increased for this purpose? Is it our intention to combat those whose political views differ from those we hold ourselves, with an increased air force or an increased army? It is only necessary to ask the question to demonstrate its absurdity.

Are we, then, proposing to defend our trade routes? May I remind this house that Canada sells her wheat to ninety-nine different countries throughout the world, and that her other exports also go to a large number of countries. Are we going to defend all our trade routes? Obviously Canada cannot attempt any such project. Our external trade is of vital importance to us, it is true, but we would pay too great a price for it if we had to embark upon a naval program adequate to its protection. If we do not intend to protect all our trade routes, which are we to abandon and which should we protect? I again remind this house that during the last fiscal year fifty-three per cent of our export trade went to foreign countries and forty-seven per cent to the United Kingdom and other British countries. Our trade is international and with all the world. The argument that this vote is necessary for the protection of our external trade must in my opinion be dismissed as untenable.

One other alleged justification for this increased vote remains. We are told that we must be prepared to resist foreign invasion. Against whom must we prepare? Is it against Japan? Are we to militarize our Pacific coast? Is it against Germany? Do we intend to militarize the St. Lawrence and our Atlantic coast? What plans have we for these purposes? We are entitled to know such plans, if indeed any exist. Why should Canada not take advantage of her favourable geographical position? We must face facts, and admit that no nation can successfully invade Canada unless the United States is a consenting party to such an invasion. Does any person think for a moment that the United States would permit Canada to be invaded, either by Japan from the west or by any European nation from the east? Their own self-interest in this country would preclude any such possibility. Canada is safe from foreign invasion so long as the United States remains a friendly country. There is only one country that could annex Canada, and that country is the United States. Against that great country Canada could not successfully defend herself, but from that country I can see no danger of invasion and no necessity for national self defence. These are facts. Why should Canada not take advantage of them? Other countries rely upon their surrounding circumstances, upon their geographical position or upon such balances of power as may exist or can be created, whichever is of the greatest advantage to them. Is it right for other countries to do this and wrong for Canada to follow a similar course? I may be told that this is an unworthy attitude for Canada to take, but where the welfare of Canada and of the Canadian people is involved, I care not what others may think of our attitude. We do not need to demonstrate Canadian courage to the rest of the world. Sixty thousand Canadians—and I am proud that my own brother was one of them—did so with their lives during the last war. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has always been easy for man to show his heroism on the field of battle; throughout all the ages man has been instinctively courageous when the hour of his trial has come. Often it is more difficult to stand for peace than to yield to the call of war.

I do not believe that these increases are necessary for purely national self-defence purposes, and I am afraid that something more than purely national self defence is or may be involved in this new policy. I sincerely hope that my fears are groundless, but I believe it to be my duty to sound a strong note of warning.

Is there any other justification for increased armaments for Canada? Are we under any obligations to other countries to arm ourselves? If the history of the League of Nations during the past few years had been different, my answer might be in the affirmative. After the great war was over the League of Nations was created. It was to be a great organization of all the nations of the world for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world. Frequently it has been said that the League of Nations has failed. I do not altogether agree with that point of view; for there have been many events that have happened since the league was constituted, which would have thrown the world into war if there had been no league. It is not the League of Nations that has failed; rather is it true that the great powers have failed the league and been false to the hopes of humanity. All the great powers must share the blame—the United States for their refusal to enter the league; France, perhaps most of all, for the narrowness of her outlook; Japan and Italy for the madness of their imperialistic ambitions. Even Great Britain cannot escape her share of the blame for the failure of the league in the case of Manchuria and to a lesser degree in the case of Ethiopia. I am confident also that the course of Germany would have been vastly different if the treaty of Versailles had been written in a different spirit. The failure of the great powers to cooperate for peace and establish the collective security of the world is responsible for the state of the world to-day, and they should pay the major portion of the penalty. I would feel more kindly towards this increased vote if it were part of a world program for the collective security of the world, either through the League of Nations or through any other agency for world peace, but such is not the case. Until the great powers demonstrate their desire for peace and their determination to achieve it, it is not for Canada to attempt police duties for other countries. The great powers have failed the smaller nations, and at this time have no right to look to them for aid.

I am opposed to the proposed increases in our naval, military and air force votes. They are not, in my opinion, either necessary or effective for purely national self-defence purposes. They are clearly not part of a program for the purpose of accomplishing the collective security of the world, and thus discharging our obligations as a member of the league. I am afraid that we are witnessing the commencement of a different policy, the preparation of Canada for participation in another war. I hope that I am mistaken, but I am afraid that we are tending in that direction, perhaps even against our own wishes and our best intentions. This year the following increases are proposed: Militia services $5,831,502; naval services, $1,832,310; Royal Canadian Air Force, $6,706,622, a total of $14,370,434. This figure represents an increase of over 70 per cent as compared with the votes of the preceding year, and there will probably be further substantial sums in the supplementary estimates. If we permit these substantial increases to pass unchallenged this year, I am afraid we shall be met with a demand for a further increase next year, which we shall not be able to resist. Army officers are never satisfied with the adequacy of their equipment, and we shall be faced with increasing pressure from other sources as well. Every hon. member knows how easy it is to fan the sparks of patriotic fervour into a blazing flame, and how difficult it is to control that flame. It is essential that we should preserve intact the right of parliament to decide whether Canada shall participate in another war, and if parliament is faced with such a question its voice must be a free voice. It cannot be as free as it should be if we now embark upon a policy of preparing for war, for although to-day we may be merely defence conscious, to-morrow we may be war conscious. Moreover the proposed increases are mainly for our mobile forces, and it may happen, because we are ready, that the government of the day—not necessarily this government—will face parliament with an accomplished fact, this country committed to participation in another war,—and perhaps a war with which Canada has no real concern—and this parliament powerless because of the force of public war hysteria to save Canada from the ruin that would inevitably follow.

It is because I wish to safeguard Canada and the individuals who live in it from the devastating consequences of participation in another war that I raise my voice in earnest protest against these proposed increases. I do so because I am afraid that we are embarking upon a policy of preparation for war, and that such a policy will tend to participation in war, although those who now initiate the policy honestly and sincerely intend it to be one of purely national self defence. It can so easily pass out of their control. I hope that I will be mistaken in my fears, for the question of Canadian participation in another war is so serious a one that it may easily split this country from coast to coast and do irreparable harm to the cause of national unity.

May I say a few words with regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). As I understand his amendment, two criticisms of the government are involved in it. One of them expresses grave concern over the proposed increases in the expenditures for armaments. With that criticism I am in agreement. The other involves condemnation of the government for the inadequacy of its social security program. I am not prepared to follow the hon. member in that condemnation, for I believe that the government is making a sincere effort to discharge its obligations in that regard. Moreover, any amendment to a motion to go into supply involves general denial of supply, and is a motion of lack of confidence in the government. I cannot vote for such a motion, for this government, facing almost overwhelming problems, has made substantial progress in its efforts to solve them and will receive my support in its continued efforts in that direction. For these reasons therefore, I shall not vote for the amendment.

My stand is one of warning protest against a policy which I believe at the present time is unnecessary, and in the future may be fraught with serious danger to the welfare of Canada and the Canadian people. The views which I have sought to express are held by thousands of Canadians from coast to coast. They are not, Mr. Speaker, confined to one province. Nor are they confined to the members of any one party. There are thousands of Liberals throughout Canada who feel as I do. In speaking as I have done I express not only my own personal views but theirs as well. It would be a mistake to let it be assumed either in Canada or elsewhere that the Liberal party of Canada is united on this question, for such is not the case.

For the reasons that I have given I can not support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North, but I reserve my rights when we are in committee of supply to vote for such decreases in these estimates as I deem proper.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of the amendment before the house is to prevent consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Necessarily it involves as a main consideration the question as to what Canada's policy should be from the standpoint of armaments and military force. It is from this point of view that I desire to discuss it.

To-day there cannot possibly be any question as to the ramifications of international armament firms and the support they have received from international bankers. Neither can it be challenged that more and more each month the world is furnished with disclosures which, to put it mildly indeed, would astound even those who in the past have considered that a war must necessarily be part of our modern civilization. On numerous occasions in the house I have argued this point, and placed on record much evidence which still remains unchallenged. The evidence shows that preparation for war never takes the slightest notice of the welfare of the people who supposedly are to be saved when armed conflict occurs. It is well known that informed opinion throughout the world to-day deprecates war with all its sufferings and with the wanton destruction of human and material wealth that it inevitably entails. It has also been amply shown that war preparations are definitely linked up with the monetary and financial system, and that the minds of the people are prepared in advance by the press which seemingly at every opportunity and on every occasion is willing and anxious to support the policy of increased armaments. The result of this publicity is evidenced on all sides throughout the world in the ever-mounting expenditures made for the purposes of armaments in this wild race in which the world is now engaged and which may easily result in the destruction of our civilization through another armed conflict of nations.

Even soldiers seem to be kept in the dark as to what they are fighting for. It is only after years, it is only after a level-headed survey of the true conditions, that they express their utter disgust and most severe condemnation of war and all its implications. I should like to quote General Smedley Butler, who is reported in Common Sense Magazine for November, 1935. General Butler had distinguished service in the American army for a period of thirty-five years and is the author of numerous books on military affairs. He said:

> In the past two years large national guard forces have seen active service in 20 strikes in as many different states, from the Pacific coast to New England, from Minnesota to Georgia. They have used gas, bullets and tanks —the most lethal weapons of modern war— against striking workers. Casualty lists have been impressive. In one instance they erected barbed wire concentration camps in Georgia to "coordinate" striking workers with all the efficiency of the fascist repressive technique.
> I spent thirty-three years as a member of our country's most agile military force—the marine corps. I spent most of my time being a high-class muscle man for big business, for Wall street and for the bankers. In short, I was a racketeer for capitalism. I suspected I was just part of a racket at the time. Now I am sure of it. Like all members of the military profession I never had an original thought until I left the service.
> Thus I helped make Mexico and especially Tampico safe for American oil interests in 1914. I helped make Haiti and Cuba a decent place for the National City Bank boys to collect revenues in. I helped in the raping of half a dozen central American republics for the benefit of Wall street. I helped purify Nicaragua for the international banking house of Brown Brothers in 1909-12. I brought light to the Dominican republic for American sugar interests in 1916. I helped make Honduras "right" for American fruit companies in 1903. In China in 1927 I helped to see to it that Standard oil went its way unmolested.
> During those years I had . . . a swell racket. I was rewarded with honours, medals, promotions. Looking back on it, I feel I might have given Al Capone a few hints. The best he could do was to operate his racket in three city districts. We marines operated on three continents. The war racket operates at full swing in our own country to-day. Make no mistake. We no longer fulfill by our example as a nation the role of leader in disarmament and peace-maker to mankind. Our present war preparations and military expenditures forever nullify the Kellogg peace pact to which we subscribed.

Training regulations No. 10-5 of the war department contain the official "doctrine of war," for the United States. . . . Section V, paragraph 6, says "the object to be attained by (military) training is to enable the army to wage offensive warfare," . . . Let us remember that the military ideal of our country has never been defensive warfare. Since the revolution, only the United Kingdom has beaten our record for square miles of territory acquired by military conquest. . . . Our whole history shows we have never fought a defensive war. Our armed forces have up to date plans for offensive warfare against almost every country on the globe—all in the sacred name of "national defence." Should some affront be given to our national honour by Japan, say, there is a plan ready to be put in operation against the Japanese. . . . And the same for almost any nation you might care to name. The war department and the government, under the present law, is at the mercy of the rulers of industry and finance. . . . We support armed forces that have all the evils of the old time European prussianized military systems.

The correction of these evils is our immediate duty. We must deny to our armed forces the functions of diplomats, politicians and agents provocateurs. . . . There must be no more reactionary and destructive intelligence work. The true domestic enemies of our nation—hunger, injustice and exploitation—should concern the military intelligence—not the subversive shadows of their own creation. . . . Nations should consider whether, after all, their best defence might not be to divert to social welfare the effort, energy, and money spent preparing for offensive war.

When conditions develop to the point where the further existence of the money machine is imperilled, a gigantic international abattoir is set up and into it are poured millions of the finest of the world's youth to be slaughtered for the benefit of the money machine and nothing else. Ambassador Page cabled to President Wilson from London on March 5, 1917, saying, among other things—

If we should go to war with Germany, all the money would be kept in our country, trade would be continued and enlarged until the war ends, and after the war Europe would continue to buy food, and would buy from us also an enormous supply of things to re-equip her peace industries. We should thus reap the profit of an uninterrupted, perhaps and enlarging trade, over a number of years, and we should hold their securities in payment. . . . Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our present preeminent position can be maintained and a panic averted.

Let us see what followed: A month and a day after receiving this cablegram, President Wilson declared war on Germany. This is unchallengeable evidence that financial considerations and not human considerations were at the very root of the American entrance into the European conflict. Remember the declaration of President Wilson a few days before his death, when he said:

Is there a man or woman, nay is there a child, in this audience, who does not know that the seeds of war are sown in hot, successful commercial rivalry?

The American senate, in a report on corporate earnings and government revenues, being senate document 256, sixty-fifth congress, second session, shows very definitely that Mr. Page's recommendations bore their fruits. From this report I quote some of the profits which have been admitted, and it must be remembered that these figures were supplied by the firms involved. There are some illuminating figures in this report. Twenty-two meat packing firms reported profits of 100 per cent or more. Sixteen cotton yarn manufacturers reported profits of 100 per cent or more. Thirty-nine garment manufacturers reported profits of 100 per cent or more. Fifteen steel plants and rolling mills reported profits of more than 100 per cent. Bituminous coal producers in the Appalachian field reported as follows: 135 firms had profits of over 100 per cent but under 500 per cent; 21 had profits of over 500 per cent but under 1,000 per cent, and 14 firms reported profits of over 1,000 per cent. Every day while the great war lasted 20,000 men and boys were killed, wounded or taken prisoner. Of the 66,000,000 mobilized, roughly 10,000,000 were killed at the front. The Swedish society for the study of the social consequences of the war reports that, including deaths among non-combatants and deaths resulting from epidemics arising out of the war, we have the appalling total of 40,000,000 dead as a direct result of the war. The total cost, estimated at $337,000,000,000, would require to meet it a payment of $20,000 an hour from the birth of Christ until the end of the world war. If the cablegram of Ambassador Page had been blazoned on the front pages of the world press I doubt very much whether the American people would have considered it their patriotic duty to embark upon a mission of mass murder, particularly had they then known that their effective participation on the battlefields of Europe would have resulted in the creation of 21,000 new millionaires in the United States as a direct result of war-time activities—we had six or seven hundred new millionaires in Canada as well—with no less than $58,000,000 of new profits for the du Ponts, about whom we have heard something in this house within the last few days; one of our civil servants is very closely connected with the du Ponts. The Central Leather Company increased its annual dividends 1,100 per cent; the General Chemical Company, 1,400 per cent; International Nickel, 1,700 per cent. It is inconceivable that American soldiers went to war for that.

I cannot conceive that hon. members can be asked to consider increasing expenditures for armaments and defence without being specifically informed of the dangers that threaten us in the immediate future. It is my opinion that if this country is to be asked to embark with all other nations of the world in a mad armaments race, the first duty of this government is to furnish the house and the people with a complete and detailed report of the reasons why we are to arm, against whom we are to arm, and for what purposes these armaments are to be used. It is folly to assume that the increased expenditures this year can afford defensive protection to this country, and it is reasonable to assume that this year's estimates are merely the thin end of a wedge that will be driven even deeper into our national finances if we once allow it to enter. Surely the people of this land are entitled to full knowledge on questions such as these: What guarantee can the government give that there will be no war profiteering? What assurance is there that at this very moment our natural resources are not being turned into implements of war?

An hon MEMBER: They are.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): What firms in Canada are at present engaged in the manufacture of armaments, munitions and war supplies for Great Britian or any other countries? What profits are actually being reaped by Canadian concerns through the provision of such materials? And—perhaps more serious than all else—what guarantee have we that our youth will not be expected to face the very arms and be targets for the very munitions that are now being exported from this country?

I cannot conceive a better description of the causes of war than that recently furnished me in a letter from Mr. John Hargrave, an author of repute, whose book Summertime Ends, published by Bobbs Merrill Company, New York, is most illuminating. Mr. Hargrave has made an extensive study of world economic systems and has inquired deeply into the causes of war. I quote from his letter:

> War is the inevitable result of a faulty financial system of distribution in which the "home market" of every country fails to be fully effective, and in which, therefore, the scramble for export markets abroad becomes imperative.
> It is essential that each great producing country should make its own "home market" effective by the issue and use of its own debt-free consumer-credit. This is the only way in which it is possible to eliminate the root cause of war.

When we are dealing with a matter of this kind, surely it is incumbent upon us as the representatives of the people to give consideration to causes rather than to effects. I suggest that the spectre of all the wars in history will rise up—on the day of judgment—and point an accusing finger at the leaders of mankind, because it is only to cover their own stupidity and folly and refusal to think that the common people are led to the shambles. It has gone on for centuries; it is about time to put a stop to it. I challenge anyone to find that there is any other cause of modern wars than the one that I have just stated in my quotation from Mr. Hargrave's letter. May I further suggest that this statement is an accurate analysis of the root causes of war. May I say also that it is futile for this country to embark upon a policy of armaments and defence without thoroughly investigating the economic causes of war, and having found them, proceeding immediately to remove them.

Perhaps it is well to have in mind the words of the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), speaking at Ottawa on February 7, 1936. In stating the two cardinal principles of defence, the minister said:

> First we must have the defence forces sufficient to control subversive elements from within, and sufficient also to repel attacks from without.

We have heard a great deal about subversive elements from within. Unfortunately many members of the government have not very well described what these elements are. Does the government fear that the people of this country, with its more than a million on relief, will rebel against the continued policy of scarcity? Does the government believe that our youth will become tired of walking our streets and roaming through our provinces in futile search for work? Does the government believe the taxpayers of this land are becoming so overburdened with taxes that the almighty dollars of interest will have to be extracted from their pockets with the aid of bayonets? I repeat that the Canadian people, who in the ultimate must pay with their blood and dollars for armaments, are entitled to receive from this government without further delay a clear statement of the intentions of the government; and particularly, if there are such great dangers within our borders, let the government point its finger at these so-called subversive elements. I for one believe that Canadians are a peaceful people. I believe indeed that they are too peaceful. I have long since expected that they would cry very loudly against the continuance of economic conditions so contrary to their welfare and so definitely opposed to the policies possible in this enlightened age.

I very well recall the many discussions in this house relating to old age pensions, pensions for the blind, veterans' assistance and other measures of social welfare. Inevitably during these debates the house was informed that these things were very nice and very desirable, but there has always been a nigger in the woodpile; always there has been no money available for such services. Just the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) rebuked the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) because he had the temerity to advocate some slight departure from the rules of orthodox finance. The cry of inflation is regularly raised in this chamber. For my part I would much prefer the methods advocated by the hon. member for Rosthern than again to see the national debt increased by loans, as will be inevitable if we embark upon this wild armaments program.

To hon. members representing the province of Quebec—and I include ministers of the crown from that province—I would say that if I am at all a judge of public opinion the French-Canadians in this country are a peace-loving race who strenuously object to any warlike activities on the part of this country. I willingly concede the high patriotism of French Canada, but it is a patriotism devoted to their homes and our national institutions and one that is very little concerned with entanglements beyond our borders.

In closing I express my intention of supporting the motion because in my opinion this house lacks the complete information necessary before embarking on a policy of armaments; because the financial position of the country cannot permit of this added burden under our present orthodox financial methods, and primarily because I consider that the essential problems in Canada must first be solved, and that the duty of this government is to achieve for all complete economic security before launching on the production of non-essentials. I am forcibly reminded of the many promises made by the present government's supporters during the last election campaign. I recall the statement of the Prime Minister on the night of the election, to the effect that "the battle in the next parliament will be between the power of the people and the power of money." The amendments to the Bank of Canada Act last year gave the first victory to the power of money. This year, let our actions in parliament be such as to give victory to the power of the people.

[Mr. P. J. Rowe.]

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): This debate centres around the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) which reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all section of the Canadian people."

As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) said, this is a double-barrelled motion in that it contains two major propositions, one as to defence, and the other as to social security. I may say at the outset that I cannot support the amendment and I will give reasons therefor.

In the debate which has taken place yesterday and to-day a good deal has been said with regard to expeditionary forces which Canada might raise to take part in a European war. I listened very carefully, as most hon. members did, to the speech made by the Minister of National Defence, and nowhere throughout that whole speech was there any word with reference to offence; wholly and solely was that speech intended to convey what was the purpose of Canada in the realm of defence. There is no one, I am sure, in this house or throughout the dominion who is anxious for an increase in armament expenditures. All of us hate the idea that there should be any increase in these expenditures from which we are suffering so much in our economic structure. But, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Selkirk states that there is bound to be controversy in regard to these estimates, he is of course entirely correct. I do not think, however, that he is speaking for the Liberal opinion throughout the western part of our country, and I know he is not speaking for a great many of the young men who may ultimately have to take part in war. I have in my hands a resolution passed by the Junior Liberals Resolutions Committee of Manitoba, a study group of eighty within the province, who have gathered and correlated most of the opinions expressed by the young men in the Liberal ranks in the province. They passed a resolution to this effect:

> Therefore be it resolved, that Canada work for immediate reform of the league; first, by reorganization of the world court, so that it will command the confidence of all nations, large or small, in its settlement of disputes; second, by the guarantee of collective aid, if attacked, to those members of the league who have faithfully carried out their league obligations; and third, by the establishment of a coordinated international, land, air and sea force, to which Canada should pledge a proportionate contribution, for the enforcement of international law,

That Canada's land, air and sea forces be increased and modernized, until adequate for coastal defence, and suitable for a contribution to an international police force,

That if Canada is involved in a conflict all wealth and all industry be conscripted,

That generally, Canada's foreign policy be based on complete support of the league, and that no conflict be engaged in, save for the purpose of enforcing the authority of the league and supporting a system of collective security,

And finally, if after such steps have been taken, it is indisputably clear that there is insufficient armed force at the disposal of the league to effectively enforce its decisions then Canada should reconsider or postpone its league policy, and if continued bad faith is displayed by the great powers in the league, then Canada should withdraw her support and take whatever measures are necessary for her own security.

I read that resolution for the purpose of demonstrating that throughout this country to-day all men and all women of this dominion are concerned with what is the foreign policy of Canada, and I think I can start out with this axiomatic remark, that our foreign policy, to be a sound policy, must defend the existence and promote the welfare of Canada. If Canada were not so placed geographically that a war in Europe might seem—and I emphasize the word "seem" —remote to Canada, the answer to our foreign policy might very easily be arrived at. But situated and placed as we are, there are those who urge that Canada adopt a policy of isolation. Well, Mr. Speaker, those who advocate such a policy must choose between two kinds of policy—armed isolation and a deliberate detachment from other countries, or a defenceless Pacific isolation until some foreign power likes to put an end to it. Canada must sooner or later face the question of its relationship and obligations to other countries, particularly those included in the present British commonwealth. When we heard the news that arrived from Great Britain the other day, the appalling news that two billion dollars were to be obtained by loan in order to increase the armaments of Great Britain, we stood back in amazement and wondered what madness was here that such a thing should be necessary in Great Britain. I do not think anyone will disagree with me when I say that the government of Britain when they undertook to make that loan did so not because of any false fears but because of the realization that nothing but stark necessity was making them enter the world's money market to borrow money for armament purposes. It was not the policy of Mr. Baldwin's government, for he was elected on a peace policy; and you will remember, Mr. Speaker, the outraged convictions of many people in Britain when the Baldwin government proposed to depart from that policy. They found that public opinion was stronger even than the government, and they had to withdraw from the position they had taken in connection with the Laval-Hoare agreement. That is evidence to me, sir, that there is a real fear in the minds of those who are competent to judge that war may be upon us in 1937.

I was reading at the beginning of the year an article by Mr. A. G. Gardiner, an internationally known publicist. In this article he was pointing to the fateful year of 1937 and indicating those who might again create war in this world. He referred particularly, of course, to Hitler and Mussolini as the two men who seemed to have the say-so as to whether there shall or shall not be war. He discussed many things that were happening in both these countries, and I should like to preface my remarks, before going on to deal with these estimates, with the reasons why the government of this country should take stock of her forces in order to meet any potential attack on the part of a foreign country. Mr. Gardiner pointed out—I might say in passing that he is no friend of the government of the day in Britain; as a matter of fact he is a man of peace so outstanding that he is internationally known—that Goering had said that the German people must have guns, and not butter. That is a striking phrase, but I think it is emblematic of the policies that obtain in Germany to-day; they are more concerned with guns than they are with the food of the people. He also pointed out that there were fifteen million families in Germany to-day who are being mobilized against famine; that there were regulations against the hoarding of gold, and that the nation was compelled to take what it could get to eat in the way of food, and not what it wanted. He also referred to the desperate need of money in Germany. When I read that, it was so striking that I had to memorize it, and I was really glad to think that I was in Canada and not in Germany; for only recently they passed a law in Germany inflicting the death penalty by beheading upon those who smuggled money or securities abroad or maintained funds abroad without reporting them to the Reichsbank. I am sure hon. members will agree that it is a mighty good thing to be living in Canada to-day, despite all its adversities.

To add to these horrors there is now being consummated, and it is becoming more and more apparent, a union between Hitler and Mussolini. They are supreme; they may do anything. The sanctity of the bond is not in their vocabulary. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the gentleman's agreement was made between Britain and Italy, at the very moment that Lord Lothian's committee was sitting and endeavouring to complete its regulations regarding the non-intervention pact so far as Spain was concerned, the port of Malaga was being taken with the assistance of fifteen thousand Italian troops. Those troops could not leave Italy without the knowledge, if not the consent, of Mussolini. These are the men, Mr. Speaker, whom we may have to fight against. The nations that they represent apparently have no voice in the foreign policies of their governments. Only the sweet will of both these strutting braggarts rules the world of peace. What does that mean so far as Canada is concerned? It has brought vividly before this country what may happen in the year 1937 unless precautions are taken.

I assume from what I have heard of the arguments in this debate that the main thing that is troubling people to-day is the question of the implications respecting empire defence in the increased estimates of the Minister of National Defence. If I may take the word of the Minister of National Defence in the speech he made in this house yesterday, he clearly stated and reiterated that there was no meaning to be attached to any such implications, that the policy of the government was not for offence but for defence, and that the government did not propose to form any expeditionary force for a European war.

The last war created a nationalism which has been rampant over the whole face of the world. Instead of nations living together harmoniously and trading with one another they are to-day living in fear that they may be fighting each other to-morrow, simply because of the caprice of any one of these dictators. Everyone knows that the rape of Abyssinia took place not because there was any conflict between Italy and Abyssinia, but simply because Mussolini had to still the flames of revolt throughout his whole country, and could only do so by giving to his people a promise of gain and of glory. Canada is not immune from attack by either of these two gentlemen. If the internal affairs of either Italy or Germany compel them again to enter the field of war, do you think for one moment that they have not in their minds this vast domain of Canada, where eleven millions of people occupy half a continent, and where foodstuffs are so abundant that we are able to feed many nations of the world? Naturally they would look to Canada, and if it should happen that either of these countries were in conflict with Britain, what do you think would be the first object of either of them, if not to stifle the trade routes from Canada to Britain, and if possible starve Britain?

Some would say, and have said in the course of this debate, that we propose to take care of the trade routes by which food is carried from Canada to Britain. There could be nothing more ridiculous. The very paucity of the estimates and the magnitude of such a task is surely the answer. It could not possibly be. Nevertheless both Italy and Germany may and undoubtedly will recognize that the stifling or cutting off of the trade routes from Canada to Britain would be equivalent to a victory over Britain. There is no need for Italy or Germany to land one soldier on the shores of Britain if they can stifle the trade routes leading thereto, and that certainly would be one of the first things they would attempt to do.

Some would say they might come to Canada. I do not think that is too far-fetched a statement to make. It is in the minds of all that in 1933 General Balbo came with his air squadron to Canada and to Chicago, and surely it is not beyond our imagination to conceive that the machinery of war and the lessons gained in war have been so emphasized and assimilated—and war technique so improved beyond recognition—that to-day there is a real fear that we might be invaded by either of those two countries. It is said that the distance is too great. Let me recall that when Mussolini was organizing his suicide squadrons—and some gentleman asked the other day how the invaders proposed to get back if they ever did come to this country—those who made up the personnel of the suicide squadrons pledged themselves for particular purposes with no idea that they would ever return. If an aerial squadron came to Canada it could destroy our eastern ports; Montreal could be reduced to ashes, and the elevators containing grain intended for overseas might be destroyed. I do not think it is too far-fetched to suggest that as a possibility that might occur during a war. Navies alone are not needed; navies of the air are needed, and these foreign governments are addressing themselves to that feature of warfare more than to any other.

Then it is said that if Canada should be invaded we could depend upon the United States to protect us, that the Monroe doctrine would apply. I wonder if hon. members who refer to the Monroe doctrine realize its implications. It is not statutory; it was contained in the presidential address of President Monroe delivered as far back as the second day of December, 1823. I need not read it all, but I shall read what is material as far as any assistance by the United States in the defence of Canada is concerned. This is the important part:

> We owe it, therefore, to candour, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

It will be noted that the reference is to the extension of their system. But President Monroe went further:

> With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere—

At that time I assume Canada was a colony of a European power:

> —but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States.

Then further:

> In the war between those new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

What I have just read, Mr. Speaker, means this: If Italy or Germany were to declare war on Great Britain, is it in the mind of anyone that they would not treat Canada as a belligerent? If one of these countries takes up the burden of war again we may be assured that these birds of prey are not likely to issue any formal declaration of war. It will come at a moment's notice. The president of the United States and his congress would take some time in preparing a mandate, and if they issued any such document they would become a belligerent as against this other nation with which they had no quarrel. The difficulty is easily seen, and it is not too much to say that the United States is not bound automatically by the Monroe doctrine. I think it is fair to say that any support given by the United States would be given because their own interests in connection with trade or the lives of their citizens demanded it of them. In the meantime the damage would have been done.

When the Minister of National Defence was making his statement the other day he reiterated the fact that there was no thought in his mind of any of this appropriation being used other than in the defence of Canada. In the eloquent terms with which he expressed his point of view he was only expressing the view of the government, and I am quite sure he did not exceed the instructions of the cabinet. When I look at the cabinet, Mr. Speaker, I see men who speak my language and who are affiliated with me politically. If it were not so I cannot conceive of the Prime Minister coming into this house and saying on several occasions, with all the emphasis at his command, that on no occasion has there been any commitment or any undertaking given to any government on the face of the earth with regard to these estimates, and that the only meaning to be drawn from the increased vote now asked of this house is that it is to be used simply and solely for purposes of defence. And in addition, Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister have stated what I think is generally accepted throughout the dominion, that in no case shall Canada enter into a war which involves the sending of an expeditionary force out of the country until the consent of parliament has been obtained. I believe that is the policy of the government of the day, and I think it was also the policy of the previous government.

That does not necessarily mean, however, that this country will not defend itself against aggression, and as I understood the speech of the Minister of National Defence the purpose of these increased estimates is that we may have the equipment necessary in order to protect our shores. I am prepared absolutely to accept the statement of policy that has been made on behalf of the government. I know they will carry out that policy, and I am going just a little further. The Prime Minister has taken many political steps during his career. He will be the leader of the delegation which will leave Canada in May to attend the coronation, and following the coronation there will be an imperial conference at which all the nations of the commonwealth will be represented. The Prime Minister has already established a precedent; when he negotiated an economic treaty with the United States he was the first statesman in the whole world to make a breach in the tariff and economic walls surrounding the nationalist countries of the world. He did make a breach, and that breach has been widening ever since. Men are beginning to realize that the peace of the world depends to a large extent upon economic interpenetration and trade between countries rather than upon force of arms.

I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister that when he goes to the imperial conference he take with him the viewpoint expressed in this debate, and declare in unmistakable terms in every address he makes that Canada is nauseated with war and that we are anxious that the League of Nations should again function in order to bring about peace in the world. Canada's influence may not be as great as that of some of the larger nations. Numerically we are not strong, but I do not think anyone will deny that potentially, in our citizens and our resources, no country is superior to us. I suggest therefore that at the imperial conference the Prime Minister again take the initiative within that commonwealth league of nations upon which the hope of the peace of the world still rests, and that he there and then communicate to those countries comprising the British commonwealth of nations the fact that Canada does not want war. We ask him therefore to say to the British nations "Let us, if we can, canvass the situation again."

In an address delivered a few days ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said that the league was not dead. I believe I am voicing the views of most hon. members and a vast majority of the people throughout the country when I say that in the league lies the hope of peace. It behooves Canada to exhaust every effort towards making it the commanding influence compelling peace in the world.

Mr. J. ALPHIDA CRETE (St. Maurice-Lafleche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since the question of national defence means so much to all Canadians, may I be allowed first to remind the house that the stand I am taking is purely from a Canadian point of view. I love my country well enough to wish for its happiness and security; I love it well enough not to lay it open to trouble and agitation; I love it well enough to desire that it be respected by other powers, and I love it well enough not to base my political views on personal ambitions or patronage contingencies. I am not opposed to the principle of national defence, but such principle may surely be considered from different angles, and it is in that spirit that I intend to discuss the present estimates in order to see whether they properly answer their purpose.

Responsible as we are towards our respective constituents, I think that it is our duty to give our best consideration to the defence estimates. What we have to consider to-day is not the annual vote of $15,000,000, but a substantially increased appropriation which is about twice what the government saw fit to ask for last year. Since that time I admit that our economic prospects have become brighter, but the public debt is nevertheless very large, and our very financial condition has to be accounted with in relation to the estimates that we are discussing, when you consider that our debt is largely due to the military venture of 1914-1918. These circumstances as a whole have led me to ponder and to ponder seriously over the situation, considering the opinion of my constituents who, in that regard, hold the same views as in the last election when they voted, at least in my province, on the strength of the oft-repeated statements of the leaders and candidates of the different parties. Today, the people are getting excited over this question and watch the stand that each one is going to take in view of their promises. When I heard, last night, one of my compatriots end his speech by saying: "I would be a traitor to my race if I thought that we were not taking the means of protecting ourselves," I wondered whether his attitude, prompted, I am sure, by the purest of patriotism, fully agreed with the feelings of our Canadian people in the province of Quebec.

In spite of the civic virtues which such statement entails I am afraid that it will not be greatly appreciated by his compatriots, even in this chamber.

Here are the humble observations that I for one venture to offer to the hon. members of this house. Mr. Speaker, the first question that comes to our mind in this: Why such an increase in the estimates of the Department of National Defence? For what purposes do we start building armaments? We may assume two things: We are building arms either for the empire, or for Canada. For the empire? We may have thought so for a time. I need not remind the house of the numerous formal visits of certain emissaries from Great Britain and of their untimely statements, so much so that the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) himself had to correct them, from a Canadian point of view, in order to reassure public opinion. Even in Canada, some representative people repeated these appeals and echoed them to the four corners of our dominion. But to talk about arming for the empire, Mr. Speaker, would preclude us from speaking about national defence, because, after all, Canada must not be synonymous with the empire, and everybody knows that the empire does not mean Canada.

However, to-day, we are told that we are dealing with a plan of national defence, that is to say, if we take the proper meaning of the words, a plan exclusively for the defence of Canada. Besides, I think that it is actually the intention of the present government who positively say so in their statements. Therefore, we are not arming for the empire, but for Canada, and for Canada alone.

But even for Canada I do not think it is advisable in the present circumstances to increase our defence budget by 15 millions. It seems to me that neither our geographical position, nor our political status, nor our financial condition justifies such an additional expenditure.

Canada, being, geographically speaking, an extension of the United States toward the north, has in the south a conventional open boundary 3,000 miles long. Let us suppose for an instant, in order to illustrate my point, that we be attacked from that side. All the Canadians fit to wear a uniform, all the conscripts, would not be able to cover efficiently one-third of the 45th parallel. And how would we build up our reserves? Are we going to put up a Chinese wall, a Maginot line? Even if we did succeed in fortifying the great lakes district well enough to make it safe against any invasion, the frontier would nevertheless remain open on a distance of 2,500 miles.

An attack from the Japanese, in the west, on the Pacific coast, would never be tolerated by our neighbours who have common interests with Canada on that coast and who will always keep the road open to Alaska. Everywhere else, we may depend on the assistance of the United States because of the Monroe doctrine, which was further emphasized in the positive statement which the president of the United States made while in Quebec, last summer.

Let us now consider the problems connected with our political status, and the conclusions are the same. For instance, if you look over the history of the last century you will see that there was no important conflict on Canadian territory since 1814. Of course, I know very well that war breaks out suddenly, but everybody knows that an armed conflict can be but the outcome of difficulties which have been made worse by years of serious economic misunderstanding or unsatisfied racial ambitions. But we in Canada, who are in peace with all the nations of the world and are cited as an example even in the League of Nations, how could we understand the uneasiness and the agitation of our warmongers.

A cursory examination of possible causes of war all over our planet at this time shows that those governing ideas which are shaking the old world—communism, fascism, lust for conquest—do not represent for us any real war threat. I shall deal later with the danger arising out of communism. No country could pick a quarrel with us in order to secure colonies, for we have none. It will be recalled that, at Versailles, it was not deemed necessary to allot us the smallest share of colonial spoils: that is another benefit we have reaped from our participation in the last war! Thus, the latest warnings of the German dictator are not meant for us. We have no colonies and we will not go to war in order to secure any. Considering the present population of Canada, our natural resources and our industrial wealth are, on the whole, sufficient for our needs; we even find it possible to export outside the empire our most plentiful products. In that field, the Prime Minister has clearly understood the importance which the lowering of tariff walls may take for the preservation of international peace. If, in some unusual instances, we had to lower these walls to still lower levels, we did that, as will be recalled, to avoid a disastrous war and to comply with the terms of a covenant.

In my opinion, our financial position is another serious objection to such a substantial increase in the appropriations with which we are dealing. Let us not forget that our per capita debt amounts to $272. Let us consider, also, what burden the organization of an efficient national defence would mean for the taxpayers in this country. With such a vast territory, with our scattered population, what could we do with $15,000,000? Why, hundreds of millions would be required, and even then the efficiency of our defence would be doubtful.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the organization of our defence upon an efficient basis is beset with numerous difficulties most of which are physically insuperable. I even venture to think that the officers of the Department of National Defence realized that, since the plan which is now submitted to us is not what can properly be called a national defence plan. Indeed, as we look over the estimates, we notice that quite a few items which show an increase over last year, are for the purchase of offensive arms.

As a matter of fact, we notice the greatest increase under the head of military aviation. Yet, we all know that in time of war aircraft are primarily used as weapons of attack. However, I do not question their usefulness as a means of defence, And in the proposed purchases which we are called upon to approve,

I notice 24 bombing planes and 12 fighting planes not to mention 27 training planes! Light infantry, as it were!

Another important part of the estimates which we are requested to vote is to be used for the purchase of two destroyers which Great Britain will soon deliver to us. They are to replace H.M.S. Champlain and H.M.S. Vancouver which, I am told, used to spend a few months each winter in southern waters, that is in the West Indies. If those two destroyers are absolutely necessary for our defence, I am far from feeling safe when they are there. I am even informed that immediately after they reach Canada in March, they will be sent on their cruise and will not return—God help us—before May next!

A little further, I notice that the Quebec fortifications have not been overlooked, $15,000 being appropriated for rebuilding the walls! Perhaps such an appropriation is timely but to those who are familiar with Quebec city, this item is more calculated to perpetuate our past military glory than to ensure our safety in case of war.

As regards our strategic points, Halifax and Vancouver, where there is a remote chance that we might be attacked, I notice that the money to be spent in their defence form but a small percentage of the $15,000,000; there, as in Quebec, the work is more in the nature of a useless precautionary measure. For all these reasons, it seems impossible to conclude that this plan will be efficient. Let no one claim that such is an anti-Canadian view. However brutal and regrettable it may be, reality is still reality; we are physically incapable of defending ourselves adequately, whatever defence plans we may resort to.

It might be said after all that these expenditures would provide employment and give their daily bread to thousands of unemployed. But I suppose no mention is made of the two destroyers that will reach our shores next month from England where they have been built; it is quite evident that no reference is made to the 102 new planes to be built shortly by large Canadian and foreign plants without any noticeable increase in their regular staff. What is left? A few undertakings requiring the hiring of experts which will be contracted for by individuals who also will not employ any additional workers.

Mr. Speaker, my criticism in certain quarters may seem harsh, but in view of the future, I wish it to be constructive, and I candidly believe that war material is not building material.

Should collective inaction and passiveness be inferred from the above considerations, Mr. Speaker? Should we be satisfied with our lot without hoping for a stronger Canada, respected by her neighbours and all foreign powers? Such is not my point of view. I believe in certain methods of ensuring our security, and I trust this house will permit me to suggest them briefly. Whether we like it or not, we are inhabiting the North American continent; all of us wish and aim to be Canadians to the core, but we must take into account our geographical position, that is to say, in the wide sense of the term, we must be Canadians living in America, I am not saying under the American flag, and far less under European flags. I believe in the Pan-American co-operation towards peace, and when I look at the results of our happy relations with our neighbours to the south, I still find greater advantages in this co-operation. The trade agreement alone entered into last year by the government constitutes an evidence in support of my statement, which is becoming more startling every day.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of preventing all trouble within our borders; every subversive movement, communistic or otherwise, should be eradicated at all costs; a limited budget tending to reduce the strength of our constabulary would certainly be unsound economy, an uncalled for parsimony. But it is with great satisfaction that I find a vote of $6,000,000 for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am not in a position to state whether or not the amount is sufficient, but at any rate it is far from being excessive. However I cannot explain the purchase of 102 new airplanes, even if the atmosphere smacks of communism. It is our right and duty to patrol our coasts through close watch, but I do not think that the sight of our cruisers will prevent smugglers from operating in our coastal waters.

I believe the duty of the present hour to be the putting into effect of a well-understood national economy rather than a risky defence policy. We must help in restoring our economic life in its various aspects, lest we forget that death is the great provider of armament factories. Again I ask, Mr. Speaker, if an adequate formula for national defence could not be found in the quest for economic stability. In fact experience tells us that a prosperous nation does not seek to overthrow the government nor does it engage in class warfare. A contented nation does not envy its neighbour's fate and wishes harm to nobody. Even if we could suppress all causes of domestic agitation, I claim that possibilities of conflicts would be so much reduced and would become less imminent.

On this point, we cannot also ignore the opinions of our young men. Without any concerted movement, students from Toronto and from Quebec do not think differently on the question of armaments. Read their papers; you will find in them the same feelings and the same conclusions. Our young men are not in favour of militia expenditures, as they know they will be the ones to pay in the last resort.

Building airplanes, increasing war material and voting estimates to that effect is certainly not the policy we need at the present time. Let us arm ourselves if we wish; however slightly it may be, the fact remains nevertheless that we are plunging into the armaments race when previously everything ran so smoothly. Look at the old world having to bear the burden of past wars, rent by internecine strife and troubled by the outlook of a precarious future; see it look hopelessly for an era of security and real peace. A most terrifying situation that has been going on for years, while the Canadian people were cheerfully marching to the conquest of its destiny under a sun whose light had no blood-stained appearance. Everybody admired and envied our peaceful atmosphere, and rightly so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot leave what I might call the imperialistic clasp to throw myself in the arms of socialism, so in the first place I shall vote against the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North, leaving the question of deciding as to my vote when the various items of National Defence estimates are considered.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to speak in my mother tongue, I should like to say a few words on this very important matter now being debated in this house. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), who spoke a few moments ago, deserves sincere congratulation upon having made such a splendid speech. Personally, as a true Canadian, I will fight unflinchingly against the participation by Canada in imperial extra-territorial or European wars. If I should come to the conclusion, after hearing the explanations by the government for the increase in the estimates for national defence, that these are to be used for extra-territorial wars, I shall vote against the item. Why? Because in my humble opinion the great task of the government is to review our tremendous taxation, to pay our national debt largely due to the war and to give more general support to the great industry of agriculture. Let us keep our young men on our Canadian soil. Let us give employment to Canadian citizens. Let us develop our natural resources and bring about more happiness and prosperity to the people of Canada.

The amendment suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is not only a condemnation of the proposed increase in national defence, but a motion of non-confidence in the general political program of the government. Consequently I shall not give my approbation to the amendment, but I reserve my freedom of speech and my freedom to vote as I desire on the question of the increased cost of national defence.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, I find in the House of Commons' votes and proceedings of Feruary 15, 1937, page 141, the following amendment:—

> The order being read for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply;
> Mr. Dunning moved, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair.
> Mr. MacNeil, seconded by Mr. Coldwell, moved in amendment thereto: that all the words after the word "That" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefore:
> "this house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament—

And the hon. member did not stop there.

> —in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people."

Mr. Speaker, I frankly admit that I will not follow the hon. member on the ground that is covered by the last part of his motion of non confidence.

I belong to a generation which has had to suffer so much from the war that I cannot shirk what I consider my duty in taking part in the present debate. Conscripted in 1917, I am not unmindful of all the offences, the injustice and the abominations which youth had to go through during these tragic days.

Going back twenty years I can still see these young men ostracised, pursued, surrounded, taken away from their homes and thrown into barracks. Even when the war was over the government at that time endeavoured to fine or imprison the young men who had refused to abide by the odious conscription act. In fact, incarceration was the penalty meted out to those from whom the government had been unable to get the price of blood. Shameful retaliation of an inauspicious period which undoubtedly no member of this house would wish to go through again.

The last great world war caused the ruin of individuals, families and even nations. Our ill-considered participation in that conflict led Canada to the verge of destruction. To take part in another war abroad would mean Canada's complete downfall.

I need not recall the history of our unfortunate venture in the last war. I shall also abstain from recalling the extravagant expenditure which it entailed, the thousands of millions in taxes which it cost us and is still costing us, as well as the enormous number of lives that we lost through it. Therefore I state that I am positively opposed to our participation in conflicts abroad. In that regard I shall be unflinching and relentless even if I have to oppose any government. Should a catastrophe occur in central Europe or elsewhere let us not be mad enough again to meddle with it.

You cannot deny the fact that the people were deeply concerned when they heard of the government's intention to increase the national defence estimates. Nobody could blame a Canadian worthy of the name for having at heart the preservation of his home, of his heritage, and of his country. Has he not a right, because of this conviction and this very pride which is a credit to him, to demand from the government a clear and definite statement showing the necessity for such heavy sacrifices. After all it is the Canadian taxpayer who will pay. There is nothing more distressing than doubt and insecurity especially in connection with an issue as serious as the one which we are presently discussing in this chamber. That is why I cannot just now decide as to the advisability of this government measure, though the right hon. the Prime Minister, when he spoke in this house on January 25 last, seems to have stated in plain, definite, firm and clear terms, the exact condition as regards the defence of our territory and nothing else but our territory. In order that there be no mistake, I am going to quote the very words of the right hon. the Prime Minister as they were reported in Hansard of January 25, 1937.

> My hon. friend referred to the estimates. He stated some were claiming they were evidence of preparation for another European war. The hon. member asked, Were these estimates for that purpose, or were they for the defence of Canada, or what were they for? I am not going to anticipate what the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) may have to say when the estimates of his department are before this house for discussion. But I do wish to say at once that, as far as the estimates presented to parliament at this session are concerned, any increase placed there has been only and solely because of what the government believes to be necessary for the defence of Canada, and for Canada alone. The estimates have not been framed with any thought of participation in European wars. They have not been framed as a result of any combined effort or consultation with the British authorities, beyond what would obviously be in the interests of all in the matter of gaining the benefit of expert opinion where expert opinion was obviously desirable. So far as policy is concerned, I wish to make it perfectly clear, that no request of any kind has come from the British government to our government with respect to a single item that appears in the estimates as they have been brought down. Whatever is there is there as a result of what this government feel is necessary in Canada to-day, Canada being part of the world as the world is to-day.
> May I repeat that whatever has been done or is being proposed with respect to necessary increases and expenditure to bring Canada's defence to a more efficient standard than at present has been done with consideration for the needs of Canada and of Canada alone.

Mr. Speaker, I have spent twenty years of my public life in criticizing, nay, in cursing compulsory military service. How many times have I not denounced Canada's participation in the last war? How many times have I not inveighed against the unaccountable attitude and the lamentable error of public men of that time, as also against their excessive imperialism and their lack of Canadianism? My opinion and my stand have not changed a whit since that time.

On October 7, 1935, when the candidates came up for nomination at the last general election, I stated that I was utterly opposed to Canada's participation in any extra-territorial conflict. During that unforgettable political meeting, held in St. Martin, in that fine electoral district of Laval-Two Mountains which I have the honour to represent in parliament, a man in the audience asked me what would be my stand upon Canada's participation in foreign wars. My answer was "I will vote against it."

The men and women electors of Laval-Two Mountains have endorsed in no uncertain way my opposition to Canada's participation in any war. In fact, even in my constituency of Laval-Two Mountains so shamelessly gerrymandered in the sordid hope of ensuring the election of my opponent, I was returned with an overwhelming majority. Yet, nothing was overlooked in the attempt to defeat me; they resorted to political literature, to ample election funds, to promises, and even to the distribution of spurious ballots. Therefore, I need not go to my constituents in order to know that they are unalterably opposed to Canada's participation in any foreign war. I will respect the verdict of the electors of my constituency. In so doing, I shall be discharging but a noble duty toward my country. If I were to do otherwise I should be betraying the interests of the people and making myself unworthy of their confidence. Are not Canada's war wounds still far from being healed? The experience of the past ought to be a lesson for our country. The task of recovering from the unprecedented sacrifices which she has already made is such a heavy burden that the consequences of some other mad venture should not be added to it. If any government, whatever its political creed, wishes to consummate the ruin of Canada, it will encounter the patriotic resistance of a people to whom experience has taught a lesson.

As far as I am concerned, I am not going, in this year of their glorious centennial, to disparage, through my actions, the noble sacrifice of the patriots who brought fame to my constituency. As a descendant of the heroic conquerors of our political liberties, I will never cease to honour their glorious memory. If the patriots of St. Eustache, of St. Denis, of St. Charles, of Upper and Lower Canada had to consider the defence of our territory, and of our territory alone, what stand would they take under the present circumstances? Would they refuse to protect our homes, our families, our traditions, our institutions and the liberties that they have gradually wrested from the shameful oligarchy of their era? But I ask what constitutes our country, our land, our nation if it is not the sum total of the liberties conquered so dearly, if it is not also every man, woman and child of Canada living on the land and by the land of this country. I humbly believe that the answer to this question is the solution of the problem with which we are faced. It is from whence the light will come. I would vainly look for that light in a troubled, nervous, and gloomy world, where I can only find suspicion, doubt and war clouds, and where I hear nothing but machine guns firing, big guns roaring and the deafening noise of armaments. We will find the answer that will shed light on the whole issue only in a peaceful Canada that is faithful to her institutions, her laws, her liberties, her creeds, her constitution.

Should we consent to these national defence increases for the preservation of this peace, the safeguard of our institutions, the stability of constituted authority, the protection of our Canadian people, the defence of our territory, and of our territory alone? Before committing myself to these proposals, I shall wait for the clear, accurate and definite statement of the government whose sacred duty it is to place such unequivocally and without any ambiguity before parliament and the people of Canada. Who could deny it? There are subversive elements now rampant in Canada. An undisguised outcry is heard from certain quarters. It is not very reassuring as to order and peace in this country. Here is a dangerous enemy! This is the one we have to subdue and render powerless if we do not care to find ourselves one day in the turmoil of social revolution and disorder. We need more than inoperative laws to crush down these dangerous agitators, these trouble-makers. A penalty is necessary. I easily believe that the government is determined to preserve peace, order and good government in Canada. It is a sacred duty on their part to organize the protection of their nationals and of our institutions. No authority has the right to evade the primary responsibility of suppressing any attempt made by unruly elements to undermine constituted authority. There comes a time when persuasion is of no avail in the checking of the unlawful movements of certain extremists whose object seems to be to smash, demolish and destroy everything. The sentiment of the law-abiding and peaceful population has been aroused. Important municipalities have increased their constabulary. In the United States, the recent strike at the General Motors plants necessitated the calling out of the National Guard. During the deplorable floods that occurred in the great neighbouring republic, the American army rendered valuable services. But this was on American territory and for the sole benefit of the republic as well as to the exclusive advantage of its population. Should these happenings justify our national defence increases? I will answer that at the proper time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I might add that an important section of the Canadian population will strongly object to these national defence increases, unless a considerable part of these estimates are designed to provide work for the Canadian citizens. It is far better to give the people an opportunity to work than to maintain the depressing policy of direct relief. Under the late administration, direct relief has drained more than $600,000,000 from the national treasury. Lastly, after considering all the reasons brought forward in this house for or against the defence increases, I shall cast my vote in the best interests of my country.

Before taking my seat, I wish to say to the imperialists and the imperialistically inclined: Mind your own business. Canada is now a nation enjoying freedom in her internal as well as her external affairs. The Canadian people will not heed your advice or counsel. Greater and more enduring than the strength of armaments, the doctrine that finds its expression in the great commandment of charity should be the ideal of nations. The more nations drift away from this doctrine, the more they will sink into the quicksands where shall perish all civilizations born of hatred, rivalry and antagonism between races and generations.

Another word before concluding, and I should like every representative of the people to know its significance. Down with Canada's participation in foreign wars! Let us remain unalterably attached to our soil, and develop our unbounded natural resources. Let us reduce the war taxes that still burden our people so heavily, and wipe out our national debt. Let us keep our young men at home and give them work to ennoble their lives. Let us vote money for agriculture that has helped to feed the allies during the last war. Let us again make use of our farmers whose courage has never faltered. Thus a peaceful happy and prosperous Canada will constitute an appeasing example to the other nations and her influence will shine on the rest of the world. By way of final statement, may I say that I will oppose any increase in the national defence estimates until such time as I am convinced that they will never be used towards Canada's participation in foreign wars.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): I agree with the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and others who declare that Canada must be prepared to defend herself, that she must have national security. However, national security cannot be secured simply by the building of armaments. We must establish economic security in Canada, for in my opinion we cannot have national security without first achieving economic security. It would appear that the improvement in world conditions is mainly due to the enormous expenditures, estimated at over fifteen billions of dollars, on armaments. It is indeed strange that a world rich in real and potential production should be passing through such a depression, during which millions of people are unemployed, millions more living on the borderline of starvation, and various social and economic institutions being undermined simply because there is no money. In Canada we have a million unemployed. Our factories are slowed down; our expenditures on education and health facilities are being restricted, and many of our municipal and provincial governments are practically bankrupt. We have no money for this; we have no money for that. The world over—

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member, where does he get these facts?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Which facts is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. FINN: The facts that the hon. gentleman just related to the house.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: These facts have been stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He said that approximately fifteen billion dollars have been expended by various governments on war preparations.

Mr. FINN: Then I would invite my hon. friend to ask the leader of the opposition if he concurs in the statements of the hon. member.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I believe the leader of the opposition will confirm the statement I made.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I think that was what was reported, and I got it from a credible source.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the reporter?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Where does the money come from to send men into the bowels of the earth to take out the minerals which are sent into the great smelters and from there to huge factories to be turned into instruments of destruction? I am looking forward to the day when the labouring population of the world will refuse to go into the mines or the forests or the smelters or the factories to turn out instruments of destruction or, as they are sometimes called, armaments of defence. I am looking forward to the day when billions of dollars will be put to work to facilitate production, from our natural resources, of all the things that civilized men and women to-day require—automobiles, electrical equipment, pleasure ships, et cetera, rather than destroyers, bombers, machine guns and anti-aircraft guns. We hear the statement often repeated that Great Britain and Canada are strongholds of democracy. I believe that Canadians have as much liberty as any people on earth, but we have not yet achieved complete democracy. The democracy we have in Canada to-day is being steadily undermined by self-seeking autocrats.

I am supporting the amendment because in my opinion we should not provide for the building of battleships and the construction of guns until we have at least adequately provided for war veterans and their families and have taken more definite steps to provide for the millions of unemployed and underpaid workers. I am opposed to borrowing money for war purposes. The people of Canada are tired of the debt pyramiding which has taken place in the past, and which has brought about chaotic conditions in our economic life. The government must finance the building up of armaments without creating further debts in this country.

Mr. FINN: What battleships are being proposed to be built in Canada or for Canada?

Mr. LANDERYOU: My hon. friend knows that they intend to build some ships in Great Britain.

Mr. FINN: What have we to do with that?

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I think that the importance of this debate has been exaggerated. The militia estimates on which it is based are not in themselves very alarming. Ten or fifteen millions added to our national defence appropriations will not be sufficient for us to save the British Empire, nor even Canada if she were attacked, and the increase in these estimates is not likely to draw our country into a war.

This question of reorganizing our national defence has been arousing public opinion throughout the country, and, in fairness to those who have felt compelled to protest against the policy of the government in this matter, I think that we must at least consider their criticisms and dispel their legitimate fears. The horrors of 1914-18 are still so vivid in the mind of every Canadian and the mortgage placed on our country is still so heavy that we cannot see without fear any tendency toward militarism, slight as it might be. Consequently I do not blame those who availed themselves of the opportunity to warn us against the renewal of such a tragedy as the last war and its effects. I do not question their good faith nor their patriotism and I like to believe that their criticism is not intended to conceal mean and petty political tactics, but on the other hand I might say to them who sincerely fear these defence increases that they also must believe in our sincerity of purpose and that our love for our country is as real as theirs.

I represent in this house one of the largest electoral districts of our dominion. The voters have clearly placed their confidence in me at the last election. The population of that constituency is essentially Canadian and unequivocally devoted to the interest of the country. I would betray their confidence, I would be unworthy of their trust if I were to take on this question, or on any other issue for that matter, a stand not clearly and simply Canadian. But I would also fail in my duty to my constituents if, for the sake of a few more votes at the next election, I were not to do the proper thing and what I consider to be in the best interests of my country, or if I were not to follow unhesitatingly the dictates of my conscience in the matter of responsibilities.

After all, is there anything very alarming in these militia estimates? The only justifiable fear that has been voiced so far, at least if I may judge by the representations made to me and by what I have read in the papers, is that we might be drawn, directly or indirectly, into future wars on the battlefields of Europe, as some would say, or in wars outside this continent, as others would put it, and that our foreign policy might be dictated to us by London or by a foreign nation.

Mr. Speaker, I will go further in expressing that fear. In so far as I am concerned, I do not want to see Canadians drawn into any war, domestic or foreign, of any nature whatsoever. War is a tragedy which does not benefit the belligerents and which should be looked upon with loathing and shame by anyone who prides himself on being civilized. But there is a vast difference between that and declaring that we must give up all preventive measures and any national defence organization.

I will not admit, either, that the defence policy as presented to us by the government necessarily implies in any way our future participation in a foreign war. Whether we are equipped for war or not, should the people of Canada decide, in a moment of aberration, to take part in a foreign war, or should our territory be invaded, Canadians would be forced, as they have been in the past, to give their blood and their money in order to enforce such a decision or to repel the aggressor.

Moreover, should Canada participate in any foreign war, an event which I neither anticipate nor desire, it is not the army we are now equipping which would take the greatest part in that war, since that army is organized for defence purposes, and solely for defending Canada. Consequently, we are not asked today to decide if Canada will take part in a war or not. If such were the case, I would not hesitate to answer in the negative. The only problem facing us as a result of these increases is whether or not Canada should have her own national defence organization.

If someone were to move a resolution for the abolition of the department of National Defence in Canada or of any form of armament, I would be sorry for my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), but I would not be shocked. But if you want to act as an independent nation, if we are to believe—and it is a legitimate pride—that we are a nation, then we must assume all the inevitable responsibilities. There is no instance in the history of the world or in our own time of a single country which has not provided in some way for her national defence. I do not think either that we can find a doctrine which makes for complete disarmament of a nation, on account of her being opposed to war. Even those who have started revolutions for the purpose of wiping militarism forever of this world, are to-day armed up to the teeth and are always challenging other nations to draw them in new conflicts.

Lenin himself, in the first days of the Russian revolution, published this manifesto to his country, on November 2, 1917:

> We have put an end not only to war but to militarism. We will give the Russian people an opportunity to know the happiness of a peaceful people having given up war and having no regular army.

If we consider the tremendous army which Russia now has, twenty years after that prediction was made, it is obvious that such pacifist and nihilist theories are nothing but empty words used to deceive the people and to make them forget the realities which they must constantly face.

I shall be very careful, Mr. Speaker, not to resort to such theories which bring about results quite different from those that are expected. I have no fear on behalf of Canada, should we organize a modest national army, even though no enemy might threaten us for the time being. On the contrary, I am convinced that such a small army would be a powerful factor of internal peace and one of the best means of developing among our people that spirit of national unity which we all wish to promote in our country. But that objective will only be reached on one condition, and I wish to give at once a warning to those who will be in command of our army, as well as to the Canadian people. The so-called national defence will be truly national only inasmuch as the various elements of our population and the two great races who live in this country are allotted a real and at least an equal share in it.

It is useless to conceal the fact that one of the obstacles to national unity in this country is the unequal division of responsibilities and advantages between the various races. If the province of Quebec looks distrustfully upon the increase in the defence estimates, the reason is not that the French-Canadians are less patriotic than others or that they refuse to assume their share of responsibility as regards the defence of our territory and of our liberties, but they demand the recognition of their efforts, of their sacrifices and of their almost age-long struggle to maintain the integrity of their country, and to ensure its development.

Therefore, if we admit that Canada, as a nation, should have her small army, let all races without discrimination be invited to join its ranks, and especially the French-Canadians who have no other country but Canada which they pioneered. I firmly believe that as long as there remains a parcel of Canadian land to defend, a liberty to safeguard, and an institution to protect in this country, the French-Canadians will make it a point of glory and a duty to fight to the end.

As to the question of deciding whether our army should be equipped in such and such a way, whether we should have a navy, aircraft or war gas, I admit candidly that I am unfamiliar with these proposals. I also do not know whether 10, 15 or 20 million dollars would be excessive or insufficient to complete the organization of a modest national army, and on this point, like several other hon. members, I am reserving the right, when the estimates are taken up, to obtain the necessary information on which to base my opinion.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see where the increase in the defence estimates amount, in principle, to a declaration of war or to some kind of commitment to participate in foreign wars, which I would strongly oppose, should I be given such an opportunity. But the question is simply to decide whether Canada is to have her exclusively national army and if this army is to be equipped with modern weapons as found in every modern army.

Inasmuch as there is nothing else in view—and we have the positive assurance of the Minister of National Defence that such is the case—I am ready to support, in principle, the policy of the government, knowing that I am fulfilling a sacred duty to my country.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT Temiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have before me Le Soleil of March 4, 1935, which reports an important speech made in Quebec by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at a dinner tendered to our very good friend the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) in March 1935. On that occasion the hon. minister spoke as follows:

> I shall repeat to-day what I have always said in my public speeches as well as in my private conversations, and this is intended especially for the young men who are anxious about reforms and changes: Urge reforms, ask for them but do so from within the ranks of the Liberal party which alone can carry them out, and not from without, that is in these new groups which cannot but divide the Liberal forces.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to put on record this statement which is quite in conformity with the Liberal principles as we all understand them. The discussion which has taken place to-day shows clearly that in our party we still enjoy the freedom of speech which was so dear to the old Liberals and which nobody can take away from us so long as the Liberal party will be worthy of its name.

The question that we are now discussing is a very important one and deserves our best attention. As usual, I would like to deal with it in a cool and moderate way.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: There is one thing which has not been mentioned and which is very important, at least for the purpose of disposing of it, and that is what is commonly called red tape. If there ever was a department where red tape is in vogue it is in the Department of National Defence. I have before me an historical document of the utmost importance, namely, the 92 resolutions of 1834. The 45th resolution ends thus:

> . . . listening rather to the governors and their advisers than to the people and their representatives, and shielding with their protection those who consumed the taxes rather than those who paid them.

In other words, in this year of grace 1937, which is the anniversary year of 1837 when the Canadians had to rise in revolt—and your ancestors were among them, Mr. Speaker,—to protect themselves against bureaucracy, this same bureaucracy is now more powerful in Ottawa than it was then. Since a century we have gone backwards. It is time to bring bureaucracy to order.

I always made a distinction, Mr. Speaker, between a real soldier and an actor. A real soldier is one who fought on the battlefields, but an actor is one who kept hiding twenty miles back of the front lines, or in England, or in Canada.

Such a man, Mr. Speaker, has no right to call himself a soldier; he is a common actor and perhaps he can deceive someone . . . I remember having seen and heard Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, one of the greatest actors of England, in the part of Cardinal Wolsey. His presence was imposing, his dress compelled respect, and he had a wonderful appearance, but nevertheless he had never been a prince of the church; he was only an actor. Mr. Speaker, we can apply the same comparison to all those who wear a military uniform and who have never gone to war. Once again it is not the cowl that makes the monk.

There is one thing that surprises me most and it is the statement that has been made in Montreal the day before yesterday by an honorary lieutenant-colonel. I have here a clipping from the Montreal Gazette, and I see in the second section of that newspaper that Honorary Lieutenant-Colonel Ward C. Pitfield stated that the members who ridicule these furbelows were crazy. Well, sir, this individual who sold almost $50,000 worth of paints to the Tory administration in 1932 has a good war record. He did fine service at the front, and earned there his rank of captain, but he bought his title of honorary lieutenant-colonel. To-day he is surprised when we reproach him with making a show-off of a title which he bought. Personally, I am wondering why he should put more value on what he bought than on what he actually earned. That reminds me of the man who got his head shaved and who thought that it was far more stylish to wear a red wig, and also that other man who had all the good teeth that Providence had given him, pulled out, to have false teeth instead. Mr. Pitfield prefers the artificial to the genuine thing. He would rather have what he bought than what he earned and to me that is extraordinary.

I shall ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it six o'clock, and I shall resume later.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock we were talking about red tape. What is it? We find a lot of it in one of our most interesting publications, The Canada Gazette. I have in my hand several numbers of that valuable publication, and I am very much surprised to find that half of them are used in printing notices for the Department of National Defence. We have no army; yet we hear so much about it in this official publication.

I now hold in my hand the last number, and find in it a great deal about the staff of the Department of National Defence. It always speaks about promotions—prosperity in the Woods building. Promotions and other matters take up three pages and a half, in small text. Then there are general orders. They are easy to see, with titles in big, black letters. Then there is organization, disbandment, localization of units, and a lot of letters. These always come from H.Q.—headquarters—and refer to orders in council. Then there is more about promotion.

The number issued prior to the last one was just as interesting. In it we find a lot about the Department of National Defence, when it speaks about cavalry, infantry and everything else. It is most interesting to read that, sir, and most important for the state to have all these promotions. Then, turning to the issue of January 30, we find some more stuff. Oh, yes, we find general orders again. These people in the Department of National Defence cannot learn warfare. They must be trying out their penmanship all the time. Everybody in that department, from the chief of staff to the last appointed stenographer, must also be a typist. We hear a lot about that—most foolish; most stupid—and it continues like that.

This we call red tape. What is red tape? Red tape consists of a lot of formalities carried out just to show the importance of the one who performs them. Red tape is useless, but it is made use of for a purpose. It is carried out to show that the man who executes the formalities is the only man who could do this so well. In the civil service my experience has been that the simplest things, the easiest to understand, are made the most difficult in order to show the ability and the wonderful genius of an ass. Hon. members laugh, but that is the case. Let us take the fellow who is stupid, and who cannot do anything well. He says, "I will make myself important." Then he assumes a solemn air, and attempts to convince his minister that he is the only being on earth who can do a certain thing. Sometimes he is believed; sometimes the officials do not see the ears of the ass. There is a lot of that, but I shall not insist upon it.

This is red tape. It is useless. I am sure the hon. members who moved and seconded the amendment know more about it than I do because they were in the army for a long time. It is perhaps because of that experience they have expressed themselves so eloquently in the matter of national defence. There are good men in that department. I know some who are very able, and I respect them because I am not a socialist or a communist. I am not against the army; the army is a very good thing; it is a necessity. But it should be an army, not a joke. Distinction should be made between the good and the bad.

Let us see the doubtful ones. Gentlemen, I happened to glance at the November issue of Seaports, from Surrey, England, and in it I saw the picture of a jovial beef-eater, Major B. D. C. Treat of Surrey, England, who arrived on the Antonia on October 4. It states, "He will spend some time in the Department of National Defence in Ottawa." I wonder how many notices he has drafted to be printed in the Canada Gazette. He has not stayed here long, but there is reference to him in Hansard, and I am not going to read all that I have before me. What surprised me was that the Department of National Defence knew very little about his military experience. I asked the following question:

What was he doing in England before coming here?

And the answer:

From February 16, 1933, to December 31, 1935, officially listed as major instructor in gunnery, coast artillery school, Shoeburyness, England; otherwise unknown.

Then, the next question:

Previous to his coming here did he visit other parts of the British Empire, and if so, (a) in what capacity, and (b) where?

And the answer is:

Not known—but it is presumed that he did not.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is a serious man, and a friend of mine. I am very much surprised that he did not get more information about the illustrious Major B. D. C. Treat who came from Surrey, England, to share his knowledge with the bloated colonials. But there is more to it than that. After having looked at Seaports, that wonderful weekly, I glanced through the telephone directory of the dominion government, and saw the numerous branches listed under the Department of National Defence. I had a hearty laugh, inside me of course, because I was alone at the time. Then it occurred to me that I would ask for information about people in the department who were real soldiers, and those who were just acting. At first the apparent length of the question surprised a few members, and I had to explain about the book which had given me cause to be a little curious about the matter, and to put my nose in the Department of National Defence; I hold it now. Sir, listen to this: This is a resumé of sessional paper 160 reference No. 41, tabled on February 10.

It reads:

War Records of N. D. Department Staff

A questionnaire by J. F. Pouliot (Liberal, Témiscouata), as to the actual war experience and place of birth of the staff of the Department of National Defence was answered in a return tabled in the House of Commons yesterday by Secretary of State Rinfret.

Mr. Pouliot divided his classifications into those thirty-seven years and over, who served in an actual theatre of war, twenty miles behind the lines, in England or in Canada.

I wanted to be fair to those who were too young to enlist at the time of the war. I wanted to be fair to the younger men employed in the Department of National Defence. I did not want to be hard on them.

The article continues:

He learned there are 95 officers and 215 other ranks in the department 37 years of age or older, and 34 officers and 377 men younger than 37. Then, dealing with those 37 and over, he found there were 68 officers and 119 men who had served in the line in an actual theatre of war; 4 officers and 9 men who had been stationed farther than twenty miles behind the fighting line; 9 officers and 18 men who had been stationed in England; 14 officers and 60 men who did not leave Canada on active service overseas.

Of the total departmental staff, 92 officers and 345 men were born in Canada; 37 officers and 246 men were born outside Canada.

At the time the return was tabled, one had gone home, which made it one less.

Could we not have Canadians filling, not only the humble posts but the more eminent positions in the Department of National Defence? I am proud of my fellow citizens and I believe that an English or French-speaking Canadian is just as good as an Englishman from the old country. I am very much surprised to find that after so many years since the British officers and men left this country Canada has taken a step backwards. We find that one-half of the staff of the Department of National Defence is made up of men who are not Canadians. These figures have nothing to do with the non-commissioned officers as another return to be tabled later will cover those men. I wonder whether among those who stayed twenty miles behind the fighting line or those who, while serving in the Canadian army, stayed in England or Canada, there are not some who did so in order that they might avoid going to the front ? I shall have more to say about this later on. I want to know if there are cowards in the Canadian army, if there are in the department men who have done their best to stay away from the front.

There are not only those in the Department of National Defence who have not had practical experience in war; there are others who are on parade as honorary colonels and honorary lieutenant-colonels. The list of these officers is tremendous, and many of them are honorary colonels of three regiments which have been disbanded. One man has been praised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) just as though he were dead. This gentleman is a general and has been knighted, and I wonder whether he is praised because of his title. I am very much surprised that the 87th regiment of Calgary is not a disbanded regiment. I have many more particulars I could read, but I shall not do so at this time.

This strikes me as being a great joke at the expense of the people and at the expense of our dead. These men take advantage of their wealth in order to parade in a uniform which they were too cowardly to wear during the war. I do not blame anyone for not enlisting; every man is free either to join the army or not to join, but when a man wears a uniform he should have more behind it than the fact that his bank roll is fat. A man has no right to parade like an actor in the uniform of an honorary officer. I am not being personal about this matter as my remarks apply to every one of these honorary colonels and honorary lieutenant-colonels, whose names appear on this official return of the House of Commons. It would be just as easy to have a drum-major twirl his stick in front of a regiment as to have it led by an honorary lieutenant-colonel. At one time there was a crank who used to cover his chest with tin in the belief that he was an emperor. The same thing applies to these honorary colonels and lieutenant-colonels—they are just covered with tin.

There is another marvellous matter to which I should like to refer. The previous government decided that those who fought in the armies of the countries allied with His Majesty during the war were entitled to preference over Canadian citizens when being considered for civil service positions. I asked if the government had any information as to whether those countries which were allied with His Majesty during the war gave the same privilege to Canadian citizens in connection with their civil service. Was the answer yes or no? It was worse than that; it was "no information." When the previous government was in power, the Secretary of State of that time (Mr. Cahan) submitted to the house legislation which gave preference to those who were not our fellow-citizens simply because they had fought in the armies of countries allied with His Majesty. That was pretty hard to accept.

I now come to something delightful, something which is like an oasis in the desert. If there is one decoration which is not the cover of a can, it is the efficiency medal. Is that not delightful—efficiency? It is an American word, signifying one who is efficient, who is able, who has in his hand the key of success. One who is efficient is worthy of confidence, of approval, of respect. So let me quote from our esteemed contemporary, the Ottawa Journal. It announces in its issue of July 11, 1936, "Military awards in Ottawa and district." Mr. Speaker, be careful! Mr. Clerk —I cannot address him, but he must be careful; so must the assistant clerk, lest they fall from their chairs. Listen, and be careful!

The efficiency decoration is bestowed by this government on various men. And who is the most efficient man in Canada?

> The Right Honourable R. B. Bennett is among the many Canadians receiving military decorations in a list made public on Friday by officials of the Department of National Defence.
> Mr. Bennett is honorary colonel of the Calgary Highlanders and has been awarded the Canadian efficiency decoration.

There is efficiency! I never knew that before, and I am surprised that the right hon. gentleman does not wear his medal and does not carry with him all his degrees of LL.D. honoris causa.

What is a medal? The great Napoleon has said, "C'est avec des hochets qu'on mène les hommes"—a great saying of a great emperor who had a deep knowledge of the human heart. I shall never forgive the Minister of National Defence for having pinned that efficiency decoration on the lapel of the leader of the opposition. But time flies; let us speak about efficiency. There are also other efficient people. Last year I drew the attention of this house to the fact that if Colonel Steel had been returned to the Department of National Defence and granted the pension to which he was entitled, he would have had one-half of what he now receives. I complain about that.

Now, with regard to economy. Would it not be better to return General McNaughton to the Department of National Defence at a pension of $4,800 a year and replace him at the head of the National Research Council by a really efficient Canadian and a very eminent man who has been a benefactor to the race of mankind; I refer to Doctor Banting, the discoverer of insulin. McNaughton receives $15,000. His salary should be reduced to one cent. But if Banting were appointed to that position, I would be ready to vote $25,000, $50,000, even $100,000, to permit him to continue his scientific experiments in the interests of humanity. We are not stingy; we are ready to vote money provided that it serves the purpose for which it is voted. I am ready to vote money to rebuild the Moose Jaw armoury which was burned the day before last. It is a useful expenditure. But the objects for which we are to vote must be disclosed to us.

In my opinion this motion is premature, although it serves a good purpose. I find it premature because I want to get some more information about the wide distribution of medals and titles and the real efficiency of the officers and men of the department before deciding whether I shall vote for or against the next estimates. I want information. But I will tell the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) that his motion has been useful. It has been the occasion of a free exchange of views with regard to the very important matter of national defence. I do not know what I might have done had his motion not been twofold, but as it is, I shall not vote for the program of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation until its leader answers the fifty-five questions that I put to him in February, 1933.

I have only five minutes more, and I shall try to use them as well as I can. We have been told that communism is a menace to this country. I do not know that we are entitled to go as far as that. It may become a menace if we continue to give absurd salaries to some members of the civil service who do nothing, when others who work are not well enough paid. Take, for instance, McNaughton's salary of $15,000 as head of the National Research Council; it is a provocation to those who suffer hunger; so is the salary of MacBrien, and so are other salaries which are in excess of $10,000. There should be a reduction in that regard, with the exception perhaps of the chief justice. I do not know of any civil servant who is worth more than $10,000. Not only that, but some others have recourse to tricks in order to increase their salaries. They do not have a flat salary of $15,000, they have apparently $10,000 or $11,000 or $12,000, and they have also some other gratuities or bonuses. That is a shame.

I do not wish to see the federal government carrying on the fight against communism. Why? Because it is the duty of the provinces to do so. It is the obligation of the provinces to maintain order within their borders. Therefore I am much concerned about the intrusion of the dominion government in provincial business, and the more so because to-day I have heard the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) express some opportune views regarding the distribution of taxes in order that the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities should remain within their prescribed limits and be independent of each other.

Great dangers result from distributing money too freely. Our votes would not be so high if Fullerton had not received $30,000, and if Hector Charlesworth had not been granted $6,000 purely as a gratuity, which he did not deserve. Either those two men were competent or they were not. If they were competent they should be in office now; they should not have been put out, and if they were incompetent they were not entitled to any award at the expense of the taxpayers. This matter is very serious, as we all know, and for my part I am ready to do anything that is essential for the defence of the country. But if there is an increase in the estimates, I do hope that when any member recommends an honest citizen of his constituency who desires voluntarily to enlist to defend the country, the doors of the Department of National Defence will not be closed against him and that he will have an opportunity to serve his country, especially when there are people from outside receiving fair salaries and bonuses while our own people are on relief. This should stop at once. The Department of National Defence, before being reorganized, should be ventilated; the windows should be opened and the cobwebs brushed away, and there should be a general clean-up in the department to show that bureaucracy is about to die. There are enough good soldiers in the Department of National Defence; let them use their guns to kill bureaucracy and they will serve the country very well.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): I hope the hon. member who preceded me will pardon me if I do not follow him along the same line. I do not possess his fluency of speech or his sense of humour, nor am I industrious enough to make such an analytical research in the National Defence department as he has done. But may I say in a word that perhaps the officers of our Department of National Defence compare very favourably with the officers of departments of national defence of other countries.

In the last few days I have received hundreds, yes, literally hundreds of communications from my own constituency opposing the increase in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Let me give a sample of the literature which I have received from my own constituents. This morning I received postal cards a sample of which reads:

> As a citizen in your constituency I urge you to oppose any increase in military expenditures.

I may say for the information of the house that I have tried carefully to peruse the names signed on these cards, and I can assure hon. members that the great majority of the communications come, not from communists or wild-eyed radicals but from responsible citizens. The majority of them come, not from men of foreign origin but from men of good Anglo-Saxon stock. I have also received a number of letters from ministers of the gospel, professors of the university of Toronto, students, women's organizations, and presidents of home and school clubs, all opposing the increase in the expenditures of the Department of National Defence, looking upon it as a preparation for war, as an entry of Canada into a race for armaments of war. This is all very disturbing and confusing.

Possibly because of the influence exerted by a depression psychology it is the easiest thing in the world at the present time to foment the public mind into a frenzy to look upon problems not in their true perspective but from an extreme standpoint, and I assume that if I were following the line of least resistance I would stand here and utter a strong indictment against the government and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). If I wanted to curry political popularity in my own constituency, and particularly in certain sections of my constituency, I would strongly condemn the government. Furthermore, if I were of opinion that the increase of a few million dollars in the estimates of the department meant the entry of our country into a race for armaments, meant the imitation of some of the European countries in their mad race toward war; if for a moment I thought that the increase in the estimates meant the precipitation of our country into a European war, I would not hesitate, party allegiance or not, party loyalty or not, to rise in my place in the house and condemn the government for increasing the estimates.

But let us analyze the increase for a moment and see what it does mean. I strongly deprecate the great confusion that has been created in this debate. I deprecate this full-dress debate because it has led merely to a confusion in the public mind. For instance, this afternoon we heard some admirable speeches condemning war. Let me ask this house: Is there an hon. member who will not agree wholeheartedly that war is cruel, brutal and futile, that war destroys not only the vanquished but the victor as well? Is there an hon. member who will not agree that an enormous economic loss amounting to billions of dollars was incurred in the last war and that there was also enormous loss of life among our own Canadians, the flower of our manhood being destroyed, sacrificed on the altar of war?

I believe the opinion is unanimous that Canada should not be entangled in any kind of war. I hate to visualize the next war. Let me read a short paragraph from an address delivered in Toronto by General Pouderoux, a famous French soldier. He says:

> The social consequences of a new war would be absolutely catastrophic. They would bring belligerent nations right back to savagery without any accompanying profit to neutral nations.

who in turn would have to defend themselves against an infection of world wide corruption, similar to any other contagious epidemic.

In this world of shattered nations, demoralized and deprived of all their resources, the peoples of the earth would fall into utter misery and utter barbarism. Their place in history would be like that of the mutilated veterans and beggars in our own nation. They would have to live off the neutral countries who could not very well refuse to keep them from actual annihilation.

Any political regime which contributed to the outbreak of war itself or was not sufficiently energetic in opposing it would not be able to stand against popular movements born of discouragement, indignation, terror or the profound distress of the civilian population. In any future war involving, as it would, non-combatants as well as combatants, governments would have to reckon with the probability of violent and sudden popular disorders. An iron rule imposed by the sheer gravity of events, and by the difficulty of distributing food supplies, would have to be hastily set up in the general chaos of terror and misery.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Does the hon. gentleman tell the house that General Pouderoux favours armaments as preventing the thing he depicts?

Mr. FACTOR: No; General Pouderoux does not favour any armaments or any war, nor does any member of this house favour armaments and war. There is not one member of the government, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) down, who favours armaments and war.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Then why the increase in the estimate?

Mr. FACTOR: Nor does anyone favour the present condition of the world. We are living in a crazy world, a world in which established things and institutions are being upset. I certainly do not favour armaments of war, any more than I favour the dictatorships of Hitler or Mussolini or Stalin. I do not favour armaments of war because armaments of war lead to war. If I thought for a moment that the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of National Defence are foisting upon this country a policy of armaments of war, I should be the first to rise in my place and oppose that policy. But, knowing as I do the contributions that our Prime Minister made to the promotion and development of industrial peace, knowing the contribution that he has made to the improvement of social and economic conditions, knowing as I do the experience that our Minister of National Defence had in war, I say to hon. members that these two hon. gentlemen are the last persons on earth to foist a policy of armaments of war on this dominion.

I am as much an idealist as the hon. member who interrupted me. But I am sorry to say that we are not living in an idealistic world at present. I deplore, as I said, the dictatorships in Europe; I deplore as well the fact that in our own country race hatreds are being created and fomented. I deplore the general instability of the present time. But we must face facts. We live in a realistic world. I do not for a moment consider the increase of $13,000,000 in the estimates for national defence a preparation for war. Let me ask hon. members; let me ask the mover or the seconder of this amendment—and I am not doubting their sincerity—are they prepared to advocate the total abolition of the Department of National Defence? Would they be prepared to say that this country under present world conditions should not vote a single dollar for national defence? Certainly not. Let me ask them then. If we are to have some policy of national defence, why not have an adequate policy? We must remember that we are not living in the horse and buggy days of twenty-five or thirty years ago. Business, agriculture, science have progressed; in every sphere of business activity we seek to use the most modern methods. So my argument is that if a policy of national defence is necessary, in all common sense let us have an up to date policy. Let us have equipment which is modern and fit to cope with eventualities which we may have to face. Modernizing our present equipment is the purpose of this increase. I cannot see why it is called an increase or an expansion of our national defence; it is simply for the purpose of modernizing our defence equipment and bringing it up to date. Its purpose is to provide modern aircraft equipment and some naval equipment. If world conditions improve, and if in a year or two from now we can attain to that idealistic state of peace among all men, the $6,000,000 worth of equipment for our aerial defence can easily be converted to peace-time purposes. The hundred or so aircraft can easily be converted to peaceful uses, providing for an effective transcontinental air service across Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS: They will be out of date then; new ones will have to be built.

Mr. FACTOR: Well, if we have to build new ones we shall build them. The major portion of this $6,000,000 is for the construction of modern aerial defences. Let us have at least sufficiently equipped defences, and for this I have to take the word of our own minister and of those qualified to know, that the amount voted will bring into being a small, compact but effective machine which will be able to defend Canada—yes perhaps, if necessary, to cooperate with other countries of the world in time of peril and of need. I deplore the necessity of even talking about ammunition and anti-aircraft guns and war equipment, I should like to see the old prophetic dream realized, that men should beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Unfortunately at the present time we are not living in such idealistic days. Would any hon. member tell me that if we wiped out entirely our vote for national defence, this would in any way promote international peace, would in any way encourage these mad dogs in Europe to pursue policies of peace? If we scrapped every bit of equipment contemplated in the present estimates, would this in any way give a lead towards international peace? If I thought it would I should be the first to say so. We have to go through this period of transition. As mentioned by other speakers, in this world at the present time it is not merely nation conflicting with nation, there are two ideas clashing. As far as I am concerned, as a Canadian I stand ready to defend those democratic and free institutions which are so near and dear to my heart against dictatorships. I am ready to maintain in the British Empire at least those institutions which make no distinction between class and class, between race and race, between religion and religion, those institutions which do not oppress minorities, which do not de-class people because of their religion or their race. I am ready to defend those institutions because it is only through them and only by readiness to defend them that we can hope to attain that ideal which Tennyson envisioned, in which—> —the war drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furl'd

> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when this debate commenced yesterday, it was not my intention to address the house, since I thought in all probability the debate would be concluded before it became necessary for me to be absent from the house for a number of days. In order that there may be no mistake as to my views with regard to this question, however, I think it necessary for me to say a few words at this time.

One reason why I consider it necessary to speak on this matter is the fact that I am Minister of Agriculture in the government of Canada and as such I am at least supposed to be representative of that great mass of people living on the farms of Canada who are looked upon as the most peace-loving people in the country, though personally I may not be as peace-loving as some. In the second place, Mr. Speaker, I am the only member of the government living in that great expanse of territory which stretches from the city of Winnipeg to the city of Vancouver.

I do not pretend to be able to speak for the people who live in that section of the dominion on this or any other particular question for any particular length of time. I know that public opinion in Canada with regard to most questions changes more or less from day to day, certainly from week to week and sometimes very greatly from month to month and from year to year. On a question such as that of war and peace there is perhaps a more rapid change of opinion than with regard to any other question which might be discussed. It would be absolutely impossible for me to tell the house at this time what would be the attitude of the people of Canada if another war were declared. All the circumstances surrounding the declaration of war would have to be known at the time that decision was reached, and in discussing this matter at this time we can consider, only in an academic way, the attitude which might be taken by the people under any condition of war. After all probably that would not get us very much further than some general conclusions with regard to war and peace.

I agree with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor), who has just spoken, when he says that this is not an occasion upon which to discuss war or the attitude of different members of the house as to the question of peace. We all believe in peace. We would all like to promote peace and to see the world continuously engaged in the pursuits of peace. But most of us know, either from experience or from the reading of history, that it always has been very difficult to maintain the world in a state of peace for any considerable length of time. Perhaps there was no other period in world history when, considered as a whole, the world was so completely at peace as it was during the hundred years between 1815 and 1915. It is true that we had wars in that period of time, but their influences upon the human race were more or less restricted. At the beginning of that period, however, we had one of the great world wars and at the end of the period we had the last great war. If I were seeking for a reason for the lack of great world wars in the period I have mentioned, I might find it in the fact that the North American continent was being opened up largely during that century. Peoples were able to find an outlet from the more thickly settled portions of the world, where difficulties always arise because of the trouble people have in obtaining the food, clothing and shelter they require in order to maintain themselves.

We are approaching another period of difficulty, and one of my reasons for desiring to speak on this question, coming as I do from western Canada, is a thought that was placed upon Hansard yesterday. Anyone who is a student of composition or of speech knows that the proper place to put the thing you want to put over is in the last paragraph of the composition or the speech. You want to get into that paragraph something that will strike the eye and compel the attention of anyone who reads. On page 891 of Hansard I find these words, spoken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who comes from the very centre of the area of which I have been speaking:

> I am convinced, therefore, that if we in Canada are to progress we must stand clear of this mad race for armaments which can lead only to war. On the other hand, if this house decides that we are going to prepare for war, then I submit that those who believe we should prepare, should bring down proposals which are in line with that preparedness. I would not support them, but I maintain that the next war will be a chemical war, a war of scientists, and under the conditions which are likely to exist, our government, if it is going to prepare for war at all, should do it as economically and as efficiently as possible. Call in the best scientists you have in the country, chemists and others, and let them prepare the most horrible gases they can think of. Let them assemble the most terrible germs of the type the nations will use, and let them prepare adequately for the real war that they foreshadow—

Who foreshadows it?

—in the future. And as for our young men, as my colleague from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has said, we should care for their physique and health for, after all, in any form of defence we need well-nurtured, well-developed bodies. As far as I am concerned, however, I oppose such war preparations. I oppose war because I do not believe in war, and I conscientiously object to it. But there is another thing that I believe, and it is this: when people talk about the inevitability of war, at any rate let them not say that participation in war is a Christian duty.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if talking about the inevitability of war, the dreadfulness of war and the destruction caused by war will have anything to do with the promotion of war, I do not know any paragraph that could do more in that direction than the paragraph I have just read. No one in this house has said that there is going to be another war or that Canada will be in it. Certainly that has not been said by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) or by the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) in any speech he has delivered during this or the previous session with regard to this question. Certainly no other minister of the government and certainly no hon. member on this side of the house has declared he is convinced there is going to be a war, that Canada is going to be in it, or that it is necessary to prepare for it. Why this statement:

> I am convinced, therefore, that if we in Canada are to progress we must stand clear of this mad race for armaments which can lead only to war.

Then the hon. member proceeds to say that if the government is going to prepare for a modern war, certain methods ought to be followed. No person in the house has suggested anything about preparing for war. But in considering a question as important as this, I think we ought to know something about the causes of war throughout the ages. Every hon. member must agree with me when I say that if we look back over the pages of history we shall find that the one inevitable cause of war in the past has been that some people have not had sufficient room in which to maintain homes and families in ordinary comfortable circumstances. Whenever they have found themselves in that position they have sought to find new territories in which to settle their families. Sometimes they have found others in possession, and have attempted to drive them off, with war as the result.

What I want to say in that connection is this: We happen to be a people living in one of the most sparsely settled countries in the world. We are a people confronted with conditions similar to those which prevailed in Europe at the beginning of the last century, over a hundred years ago. We are a people who have had the experience of settlement in the last century throughout the United States, Canada and the South American continent. Yet if anybody goes into western Canada today, or in fact into any part of Canada and talks about taking some of the people from the overcrowded countries of Europe, even though those people be from British countries, bringing them over here and settling them on some of the sparsely settled lands in western or eastern Canada, the first people to complain are the group to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar belongs.

In that connection I want to say that if we are going to settle wars, if we are going to stop wars, we must grapple with them at their source, and deal with great world problems which are the fundamental causes of wars. In other words, there will have to be some movement in the population of the world. The history of mankind has shown that when any race of man, black, yellow, white or brown, is confronted with the alternative of starvation or fighting, it fights. I have no doubt that will continue to be a characteristic of the human race for a long time to come. In other words, if we are going to prevent wars we must think of a solution for problems not only within Canada but throughout the world. We cannot adopt a "Canada First" policy; it cannot be one which is confined to narrow ideals with respect to the trade of Canada alone. It must be a policy which takes in the world, and eventually we shall reach a point where people will think of conditions from a world point of view rather than from the narrow nationalistic standpoint.

There is another phase of the matter about which I think we should say something. In some years out in western Canada we produce as high as 500,000,000 bushels of wheat. In an average year we produce enough wheat to feed 30,000,000 people. Yet in that part of the country we have only between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 people, and not all those are employed in production. I should like to suggest: It is all very well to say that we have food piled up, and that we do not know what to do with it. After all we can consume only so much wheat in a diet. Even if they made wheat their sole article of diet those two or three million people could eat only so much of it. Whether we like it or not, we could pile that wheat as high as an elevator, go and sit on it all night when the temperature is forty degrees below zero and, although we did not need to be hungry, we would be frozen stiff in the morning, and would be just as long dead as if we had been hungry.

There are two sides to the question. The people in western Canada cannot live on wheat alone. Last summer for the first time I visited the central part of Great Britain, that densely settled strip of country between Liverpool and London, and I realized that those people cannot produce even a percentage of what they must eat. I sat in a room with a young man who had served in the last war. He began by asking me questions about conditions in Europe, and wound up by asking me why I had gone to London in the first instance, instead of coming to Manchester. "Well," I said, "I went there because I thought there were more people in London, and because the centre of government was there." His answer was this: "Do you know you are sitting in the centre of an area which, within a radius of fifty miles, contains more people than are to be found within a fifty-mile radius of any point in the city of London." I said, "I did not know that; I have not studied your geography." "Well," he said, "that is a fact." I calculated in my mind, knowing from what I had heard in London, that there are about eleven million people in London and the district immediately surrounding, and it would seem there is an equal number in Manchester and its immediate surroundings; we must add the great numbers of people in between those districts, and arrive at the teeming millions to be found in that great industrial area. Then we might transfer ourselves to France, where the fighting was done, stand on the monument at Vimy Ridge and look down upon the thousands upon thousands of people in the cities across the plain on which men fought in time of war. We might go up into Scotland and look at the area between Edinburgh and Glasgow; in fact we might go throughout the world and see the great masses of population in the industrial districts, or at the foot of the Himalayas and at the foot of the Alps. We could then come back to this house and talk about maintaining peace merely by saying we are going to keep Canada to ourselves, not only by occupation of it but in matters of trade and everything else. When our friends from the west sitting in small groups want to solve our difficulties they will go over to Europe, pick up some system of quotas, some system of price setting, some system of production of foodstuffs established there in order that men and women may be fed in time of war; they will transfer them into this peaceful country, and in that way try to settle all our problems.

We get too much of this kind of thing in western Canada; we hear it in all parts of Canada. We hear the kind of argument and kind of thought expressed in the last paragraph of the hon. member's speech. I want to say that this kind of argument in western Canada should cease. We should build the future of that country—yes, upon that doctrine of Christian love mentioned, if you like, in the last phrase of the speech, a doctrine which would make room in this old world for the people in some sections of it who are now pressed into such small areas that they cannot exist. That is one of our difficulties.

It has been indicated to us that some things have already been arranged to take care of the future for us. We are told that we need not worry, because the United States is alongside our borders. We are told that we have a great mother country which has always been friendly; that we need not worry, because if she finds herself in trouble we may make up our minds as to what we want to do. I am one who believes, with Cartier, that the last gun fired in Canada in defence of British institutions in Canada will be fired by a French-Canadian. He asks, "why?" and then he answers his own question by saying, "because they have enjoyed peace, progress and prosperity under British rule in such eminent degree that no change of allegiance could benefit them." That is the reason why people remain loyal to their countries without any coercion. That is the reason why we have a great empire. That is the reason why we are all proud of our empire. That is the reason why we shall be in this empire as long as there is a British Empire to belong to. But this does not mean that there always will be a British Empire if we sit back and say that we are going to depend upon someone else to look after our welfare. Empires are not maintained in that way; institutions of government are not maintained in that way and the ideals in which people believe are not maintained in that way. Ideals, institutions of government and empires worth saving are saved by men and women standing up for the ideals in which they believe and maintaining those institutions along with other people and in cooperation with them.

In so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, our future will be in the British Empire. Let us examine our position for a moment to see under what circumstances we would be possessed of the greater independence. Where would we find ourselves with our millions of bushels of wheat in the central prairies, with our cattle on the plains from one end of the country to the other, with our minerals being mined in our mines from one end of the dominion to the other and with our forests turning out lumber products required in all countries of the world; where would we find ourselves with no defences at all in our ports, no mine sweepers on the St. Lawrence or on the Pacific coast, no protection whatever? If Great Britain were at war and we were in a situation of that kind and did not go into the war and we desired to sell her our food, our minerals and our lumber, her ships would have to come to our ports, not ships to carry freight, but her ships to protect that freight; they would have to come to Quebec or perhaps to Montreal, and the first ship that sailed into either of those harbours or into the gulf of St. Lawrence would put this country into war whether we liked it, or not. Either that or every bushel of grain we had in Canada, every beeve we had in Canada and every munition we had in Canada, our minerals and our lumber, would be shut in behind closed doors at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, or at our other ports.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I doubt very much whether we shall be able to do all that the minister thinks we ought to do with the few mine sweepers he proposes; I doubt very much whether we shall be able to do all that he thinks we ought to do with the few destroyers we shall have; I doubt very much whether we shall be able to do all that he thinks we ought to do with the few aeroplanes we shall have, but at least it is doing something. We are at least telling the world that we shall deliver our freight to the three mile limit. If it is delivered to the three mile line, then no one can say that they must come in after it. If they do not have to come in after it, we shall be in a far more independent position to say whether or not we are going to declare war. For that reason I say that in so far as we as a government are backing up the minister in the position he has taken up to date, we are merely putting ourselves into a position of independence within the British Empire where we can at least talk on an equal footing.

No, it will not be an equal footing, because after all, even when we spend what it is suggested we should spend this year, we are spending only one dollar per capita for every ten dollars they are spending. We are certainly not on the same footing.

Let us proceed a little further. Let us suppose that everybody did stand back and when it was all over, this empire, of which we think so much, was no more. We would have but one choice, if we had provided ourselves with sufficient forces to keep ourselves outside the war, and provided no one would attack us when the war was over, for the time being we could declare ourselves to be an independent nation. But is there any one in this house who believes that would bring our defence costs below what we are considering to-day? Supposing we found ourselves in that position? Every port in the dominion would be open then as it is open now.

One of my hon. friends—I think it was the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson)—said this afternoon that we did not need to worry as the United States would not permit anyone to establish himself on the northern half of the North American continent, even though we were in a position where they could come in because of what might have happened to Great Britain. I suggest that that brings us dangerously near to the position in which Belgium found herself at the outbreak of the last war. We would not be allowed, it is true, to leave open the ports on the northern half of this continent; we would not be allowed, it is true, to leave open the ports along the Pacific because they would be an inlet to this continent. We, as an independent nation, would protect those ports in so far as it was possible to protect them. In order to do that we would have to go a great deal further than we have to go to-day as an associate in the empire to which we belong.

If we found ourselves in that position, what good would it do us to say that we had a great friendly neighbour to the south? The very fact that they were friendly and the very fact that we had neglected our own house would compel them to insist in self defence that we protect that long coast line which has remained unguarded for over a hundred years because of the peace that has existed between us. They would be compelled to take that action in order to prevent other nations which might be dangerous to them securing a footing in this country. That would not lessen our burden, that would not lessen our costs; that would not put us in any better position as a country; that would not make us more independent. Our position then would not be as enviable as the position we are in to-day.

I think I have said sufficient to indicate to the house that I am going to support the estimates which have been brought down by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver). If the government of Canada has done anything at all in this matter of which we might complain, I think it has waited just a little too long. I do not intend to be too critical in saying that as we have been going through some very difficult times. Before I rose to speak this evening I was looking through an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen this morning and which pointed out the costs of that very difficult period. These costs were reckoned in dollars, which are perhaps too material to be the only factor considered, but there is also the human suffering. This suffering perhaps has not been as great as the human suffering during the war, but there has been intense suffering on the part of women and children and most of the men who went to war did so to preserve their women and children from suffering.

We have had suffering since the war. There are difficulties in peace time as well as in time of war; we have experienced many of them in the last few years. But it seems to me that Canada can best hold her head up among the nations of the world, as a great independent nation within the British commonwealth of nations, as a great peaceful neighbour of the United States, as one of the largest food producers in the world, by going on to produce food, by striving to maintain her people in as great security as she possibly can, and by seeing to it that we can deliver our food and other products out at least to the line for which we are responsible. Our function as a people is for the time being that of a great producer of food. And I may say this in conclusion: Food is needed in time of peace almost as much as in time of war. In war you cannot get along without it, and in peace time you cannot exist without it very long. We in Canada have that food in trust. We can satisfy that trust only in one of two ways, either by distributing our production as freely as possible to the peoples of the world and getting in return at least a little more than the cost of production, or by bringing people here to enjoy it with us. Our opportunity to produce food was not given to us for our benefit alone; it was given to us for the benefit of all the world. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the amendment.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with a great deal of attention the present discussion since the beginning, and I have come to a conclusion that must have been arrived at by everybody. There are more points on which we all agree than there are on which opinions differ. For instance, nobody wants war, as we are all hoping for peace. The whole population is against war preparedness and opposed to Canada's participation in any foreign war. Every citizen is against the race for armaments and deplores the loss of human lives and the property damage that has befallen Canada as a result of the last war. Nobody would like to see that occur again; there is unanimity on this point. Public opinion is in favour of Canada having an army and a navy of her own proportionate to her resources. I do not think there is a single person who would like to do away entirely with the defence estimates. So there only remains one point on which the hon. members of this house do not agree; it is the question of determining whether we should include in the defence estimates the same expenditures as last year or spend a little more.

Mr. DENIS: That is all.

Mr. BOULANGER: If I were not a poor countryman who can hardly visualize what millions really are, I would say that we are discussing for nothing, or merely to find out if we should spend $13,000,000 in defence estimates instead of $12,999,999.99.

In fact, we are discussing a question of degree, as to what limit we should go in these defence expenditures, or the amount we can reasonably afford for national defence.

I am not an expert on military tactics nor on questions of national defence; but at the last election, the people of Canada have entrusted the government to men who are supposed to be better informed than I or the other laymen. The Canadian people placed confidence in them for the administration of public affairs and I shall do so also until I am satisfied that such confidence was misplaced. Our present administrators have proven in the past that they were good Canadians, or citizens who had but one thought: that of serving their country. So long as it is not clearly shown that their attitude has changed altogether overnight, I will trust them and continue to give them my support in questions of public administration, of national defence, and when the question of determining what is needed for the efficient protection and defence of our national territory comes up.

I claim that the government, on this national defence issue, is absolutely in the same position as a farmer, merchant or manufacturer who has gone through the depression and who during that period, did his utmost to keep his farm, his business or his manufacture. During the depression, they had to curtail all expenses, effect every possible economy, allow their equipment to depreciate, their stock to be exhausted, and forego all necessary repairs to their farms or buildings. Now that the hard times are over, the farmer, the merchant and the manufacturer will make the necessary expenditures for repairs and maintenance that they were prevented from making owing to depression.

The hon. the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) told us last night that during the depression his department was forced to effect similar costly reductions and retrenchments in the expenses that we all had to make during that period, and that as a result of such economy, our army and navy were in a deplorable condition; also that the time had come to spend vast sums of money in order to re-equip them and place them on a basis of efficiency. The hon. Minister of Defence is only doing what all the owners, manufacturers and farmers will do as soon as the return of prosperity will permit. It is quite obvious that if we were to overlook completely our national defence, do away with our army and navy and the defence estimates, this would entail a debate, as a question of principle would be involved. But I fail to see in this discussion any principle involved, as everybody agrees on the subject of preserving our national defence and in stating that Canada should provide for her own defence within our means and as necessity warrants.

Since it has become necessary to maintain a Canadian army and navy and to do something towards the defence of Canada, we must act like businessmen, like prudent and good administrators. If we do not spend enough to keep our army and navy in a state of efficiency, the expenditures for that purpose, however slight they might be, will be useless. If we want these amounts to be effective, if we want this country "to have value for its money," according to the commercial dictum, we must spend whatever sum is necessary.

Reference has been made during the debate to the so-called peregrinating imperialists; they have been blamed for all sorts of things, and reproached with having lacked discretion and having come here to meddle with affairs in which they were not concerned. There is only one thing for which they have not been blamed—and perhaps they should have been —it is machiavellism. I am under the impression that these individuals came expressly to Canada for the purpose of meddling with affairs in which they were not concerned. May be they said that Canadians were so sensitive that the best way to have them do what they wanted was to ask exactly for the opposite. Probably their method of reasoning was as follows: If we tell the Canadians that they should organize their defence, that they should do such and such thing for the navy, for the air force, and for the army, it is the best way to prevent them from doing so. Possibly they have been guided by the old principles, so dear to the heart of Englishmen of another era and that present-day Englishmen still follow, that the colonies, or call them dominions—to them it amounts to the same thing—offer a potential supply of raw materials, men and money for the metropolis. And what confirms me in that impression is the account given by the Canadian Press of a speech delivered on February 5 of this year by Sir Samuel Hoare, in which I find the following significant sentence:

> Speaking at a dinner of the Bradford chamber of commerce, Sir Samuel stated the sister states of the empire would find any system of isolated local defence extravagant and inefficient.

This conveys to me the impression that possibly the metropolis is not anxious to see the dominions or the colonies set up their own national defence system. And it seems to me as though the metropolis would probably prefer to see Canada contribute men and money to the mother country in order to assist her in her future wars.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the best way to destroy that impression which may be in the minds of these gentlemen in the mother country, and to dismiss completely their idea that Canada is just a potential supply of materials, men, and money, would be to set up our own defence, within our territory, and according to Canada's needs and resources. Once our defence is thus organized, should we be asked later for men or some contribution, we shall be in a position to tell the mother country: Deal with your war in Europe as you see fit; we shall look after our own country, our own defence; we shall keep our men and our financial resources for the protection of our own nation; we shall preserve all our national resources solely for the defence of Canada and we will not participate in any scheme of national defence other than by making our own Canadian territory secure.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of this discussion, two small European countries have been mentioned whose position would be similar to that of Canada, namely Switzerland and Sweden. However, there is an enormous difference between the position of our dominion and that of these two countries. Instead of being situated in Europe, Canada, thank God, is in America. But these two other countries are about of equal strength and power with our dominion. Like Canada they are peace loving nations; they have been at peace for over a century; however, just like Canada at the present time, they do their utmost, according to their means, to set up their national defence.

I have read in the Ottawa papers a report of an interview of Mr. Gordon Murray, of the Manchester Guardian, with the social-democrat prime minister of Sweden, Mr. Hansson, for they have a social-democratic government there at the present time. In connection with national defence here is what Mr. Hansson, the prime minister of Sweden, a nation at peace for over one hundred years, stated. The following words are those of Mr. Murray who interviewed the Swedish prime minister:

I remember that Sweden, the land of over a century of peace, was at that moment active with rearmament. At one period in 1936 the Social Democratic party had endeavoured to make a step forward in strengthening the defences, conditional upon a further instalment of social reform. Hr. Albin Hansson spoke freely on this subject, though he gave permission only for what follows to be published: "The question of Swedish defence has now been accepted as a national matter, and on the necessity for its increase all parties are agreed. It was remarkable that at the general elections rearming was not a matter of party controversy. Its need was generally realized. Though the Social Democrats had declared that rearming should be conditional upon an increase in old age pensions, I made it clear that if the people wished for rearming it would be undertaken in any case. So last session the Riksdag passed a great rearming program, and from 1936 Sweden is preparing itself. Like all small countries, we are strongly in favour of the League of Nations and greatly desire its reform. But that is not preventing us from now facing the necessity to rearm."

Has not Your Excellency to encounter any pacifist opposition?

"My party of Social Democrats," the premier answered, "has long had a highly pacifist tradition. But our pacifist is not of the type which is prepared to receive a punch without replying."

Let us see now what was done in Switzerland with regard to rearmament. I find in La Croix, a Paris newspaper, a statement concerning Switzerland's rearmament expenditure. The report first explains that there lies a vulnerable section where the Rhine flows out of Switzerland to enter Germany, and further says:

Berne realized this so well that it decided recently to issue a national defence loan with a view to fortifying their line along the Rhine, which means the whole of their northern frontier. This expenditure is estimated to cost about 200,000,000 Swiss francs, or a little less than a billion in our money.

In order not to frighten the taxpayers, the Swiss government—that is the federal council, whose president, who has just been reelected for the fifth time, is a Catholic from Tessin, Mr. Motta, a man known for his lofty moral attainments, his ardent patriotism, and his administrative ability—decided to issue a first share of the loan to the extent of 80,000,000 Swiss francs. Do you know how this first issue was covered? In the face of an eventual menace the reaction of the national feeling was such that the incredible amount of 330 millions was subscribed in a short time, or 130 millions over what was estimated necessary for the construction of the Swiss "Maginot line." This fact of which our newspapers made but little mention,, is nevertheless a most significant sign of the uneasiness of our friends in view of the European situation, as well as a wonderful evidence of their strict determination to defend tenaciously their traditional neutrality and the integrity of their land.

But there is something better yet. One would be tempted to believe that the Swiss banks, with an ample supply of funds that escaped from those countries where the financial policy frightens the large money interests, have subscribed the greatest part of this first share of the loan. That would be a mistake. A district bank manager, who is particularly well posted to know how this first share of the issue was covered, assured me that the great majority of lenders were small property owners who brought in either 1,000, or 500 francs, and most of them as little as 100 francs.

And now those who oppose this increase in the national defence estimates are asking:

Why should we do it? Against whom do we arm? Who are our enemies? Of course, it is something that it is impossible to foresee. We are arming not against somebody in particular, but rather against anybody. It is impossible to foresee what we shall do with this army that we wish to make more efficient and more mobile. What we can say to our fellow-citizens is that we want an army which is really useful and which we can use in case of emergency. Against whom do we arm? Many of us have an accident insurance policy for which we have been paying premiums since 15, 20, 25 or 30 years. We have not yet been hit by a motor car, and still we keep on paying the premiums. It is impossible to say on which date, at which time and by which car we may be hit some day.

Mr. Speaker, mention has also been made of the protection which we may find among our American neighbours. It was urged that on account of that protection we ought perhaps to spend one or two millions less than the amount asked for by the government for the purpose of modernizing our military and naval forces, in order that they may be more mobile and more efficient. But, strange to say, those who wish to put us under the protection of American imperialism are the very people who most strongly and most constantly denounce British imperialism. They are the same people who charged the former prime minister of the province of Quebec with having sold away the natural resources of that province to the Americans, whereas he simply wanted to attract industries to our country. They are the same people who charged Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1911, with betraying his country and seeking to make Canada an adjunct of the United States, simply because Sir Wilfrid Laurier wished to establish trade relations with our American neighbours. They are the same people who, in the last election, and more particularly last year censured the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues, saying that they were betraying their country, their fellow citizens and the best interests of Canada, simply because the present government signed a trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying in my part of the country which is perhaps not very refined, but you will pardon me if I quote it. It says: "Whether you are bitten by a male dog or by a female dog, you are bitten just the same." As regards imperialism, I think that American imperialism is not any better, nor any brighter, nor any more desirable than British imperialism.

Of course, Canada is not in a position to maintain a navy or an army powerful enough to defend our land against the great nations of the world, at the present time. It is admitted that we must co-operate with someone else, that somebody must help us; but if we want others to assist us, we should at least show some good will, prove that we intend to defend ourselves, that we are ready to do all we can in that regard according to our means, and that is exactly what we want.

Of course, if the increase of a few million dollars for the purpose of modernizing our army and making it efficient meant a declaration of war, or should we thereby be involved into a conflict, I would be the first to vote against it. But, I would however be consistent enough, I hope, having thus recorded my opposition to the increase in the military estimates, not to give my support to the government immediately after. I do not presume to speak on behalf of the province of Quebec. I am but a humble representative of a rural constituency, with no great fund of experience, but I may nevertheless state, on behalf of that province, that she still remembers what happened in 1911, and is not ready to repeat the error she made at that time and which she has regretted ever since. We know what happened that year. The province of Quebec put the Conservative party in power by voting against the Laurier naval policy. The following year, could those valorous champions, those bold opponents of the Laurier naval policy, those great defenders of the nation, prevent the government of the time from voting a debasing tribute of 35 million dollars to the British navy? Soon after, war broke out, and then came conscription. Have men like Mr. Bourassa, Mr. LaVergne, Mr. Lavallée, who had been returned as a Nationalist member for my constituency, and Mr. D. O. Lespérance, been able to prevent that war? Did they prevent conscription? Did they prevent Canada from disgracing herself to the point of voting a tribute of 35 million dollars to England? No, they never did that.

And if, this year, the province of Quebec were to do the same thing, she would probably be repeating the mistake of 1911, but I do not think this will happen for, along with the rest of the country, she has entrusted the administration of her affairs to men who had and still enjoy her confidence. We are not experts in such matters but the government can avail themselves of the information which experts are in a position to give them. Let us trust the government without haggling over a million dollars more or less for our national defence, for the protection of our homes, and for the safety of Canadian men, women and children.

Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with the defence of Canada, a thing with which we French-speaking Canadians are familiar. For three hundred years, ever since our ancestors landed in America we have been defending our territory. We began in 1690, under Frontenac and d'Iberville, to fight in defence of our country. And I am wondering what we might gain, what advantage we, the oldest Canadians, the sons of those pioneers who lived three hundred years ago, would derive in giving to understand through the length and breadth of Canada that we are no longer desirous of defending ourselves, that we no longer wish to protect ourselves, that we are no longer willing to do anything to ensure the integrity of our national territory.

We began in 1690 to defend our country. We did it again under Montcalm in 1759. And on September 13, 1759, when Quebec fell, while the French regular soldiers were running away, Canadian militiamen engaged Wolfe's army in skirmishes, fighting in the Canadian fashion among the bushes of the Sainte Genevieve hillside. Again in 1775, French speaking Canadians, occupying the Près-de-Ville barricade, under Dumas and Chabot, and the Sault-au-Matelot barricade under Dambourgès, prevented the Americans from taking Quebec, thereby saving Canada for the Canadians.

That gave me an opportunity, a few years ago, of proudly reminding one of my good friends from Vancouver that if the British flag was still waving over the citadel at Quebec, French speaking Canadians were to be thanked for that, and that it was as a result of the defence which those same French-Canadians put up on December 31, 1775, that the Domine salvum fac regem was still being sung in the Quebec basilica. And what our ancestors achieved in 1690, in 1759, in 1775, they did again in 1814, when the "voltigeurs canadiens" under Colonel de Salaberry, hurled back American invaders at Chateauguay. These are historical facts, these traditions are our own, and I am wondering why we, the descendants of those gallant men, should disown our history, renounce our traditions, and for the sake of two or three million dollars more or less, convey to the people all over the country the impression that we are no longer willing to follow the example of our ancestors and stand up against invaders, that we are prepared to lie down as meek victims, and that we rely upon American or British imperialism, upon outsiders or neighbours for our own protection.

Let me revert to the subject of American imperialism; does anyone believe that the American navy and army would defend us out of pure kindness? Does anyone believe that the United States would not demand some kind of compensation for thus protecting and defending Canada? As I was saying, American imperialism is on a par with British imperialism, and if we were to hitch Canada's wagon to the star of American imperialism, the time would possibly come when we might have to help in the expansion of American imperialism in south or central America, and to join in those expeditions, of an economic and financial rather than a military character, described by General Smedley-Butler, whom one of our fellow members quoted this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, I was reading in a magazine an article in which Ralph Connor, an outstanding Canadian writer, tells about a trip which he made last summer in New Zealand, the country of the Maoris. I hope our right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) will listen to what I am about to read; it will probably recall to his mind a speech which he delivered in 1932, during the Ottawa conference. Ralph Connor tells about the struggle between the Maoris and the British, a struggle which did not come to an end until 70 or 75 years ago. He describes the siege of the last stronghold of the Maoris by the British army. The Maoris had entrenched themselves in a kind of camp called "pah" in their language. Here is Ralph Connor's description of that last battle:

> The British general, realizing that he was engaged, not in warfare, but in slow murder, tried again and again to bring the enemy to surrender, offering them fair and honourable terms, but the Maori warriors with their wahinis (wives) at their side to load their muskets, utterly refused to surrender. In reply to a final appeal a Maori chief leaping upon a parapet hurled this challenge at the enemy: "This is the land of the Maoris. For their lands and their homes they will fight on forever! forever!! forever!!!"
> "Send your women away then," said the British officer, hating his job.
> Immediately a tall and splendidly moulded wahini leaped upon the parapet, and standing beside her man echoed his defy: "For our lands, for our homes, we will fight forever! forever!! forever!!!"
> "Why did you not surrender?" asked the British general of a wounded Maori, when the destruction of the pah was completed. "Did you not see how overwhelming our forces were?"
> The Maori warrior answered proudly: "That is nothing. This is our land, these are our villages. Men who dare not defend their homes are not fit to live."

Mr. Speaker, it will perhaps be claimed that the Maoris are uncivilized, but they gave vent to feelings that all civilized people ought to entertain. Those are feelings which I share and which I have most humbly expressed in this house in order to justify the vote I am obviously going to cast against the non-confidence motion that has been introduced.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): I shall endeavour to speak in the language of the majority, but if I feel I cannot bring home in English what I wish to express I shall revert to French, and that without any apologies to anyone. It has been said that no one should sit in this parliament who does not realize that there is no part of the world to-day which is not menaced from without and few parts which are not menaced from within.

Hearing the speeches that have already been made on the national defence estimates now to be introduced, one would be inclined to recall to this august body the geographical situation of Canada. Switzerland, Belgium, Greece and all the other small European countries are situated on the frontiers of the great European powers, and in order to preserve their neutrality and to safeguard their citizens it is necessary for them to keep armies day and night at their respective borders. As to the geographical situation of Canada, it cannot be compared with that of these countries. On the north we are bounded by the Arctic ocean, and no one will venture to say that the Eskimos or the polar bears are a menace to the peace of Canada. Many thousands of miles to the west there is the powerful Japanese nation. To the south of us there is the United States and to the east, 4,000 miles away, the European volcano.

Let us consider the situation from the point of view of the menace from without. Let us deal first with the western menace, that of the Japanese empire. Where and when did Japan ever make a move or utter a word that would justify Canada in preparing against aggression from that country? There is no doubt that the population of Japan is increasing at an astonishing rate and that the time has come for that country to place her surplus population somewhere. Japan has clearly indicated to the world what she wants and where she desires to enlarge her empire. She had the wisdom to attack China, taking advantage of the political situation in that country and of its powerless army. Japan has conquered land as rich as Canada, land of such magnitude that hundreds of years will pass before it is populated by the Japanese people. Yesterday I heard the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) pointing to the danger of a conflict between Japan and the United States and the difficult situation in which Canada would be placed in such an event. Well, I shall frankly admit that such a menace does not alarm me. It would be practically impossible to move a large army to that part of Canada, and the Rockies are a natural defence. What is more, there are three nations deeply interested in the future of Canada, three nations which are financially interested in this country to the extent of billions of dollars. These nations are: Canada herself, the United States of America, and England. Up to now Japan in her diplomatic relations has never made a move which would lead us to conclude that there is a real menace from that source. When did Japan ever show signs of willingness to test her power on land and sea against the British Empire, against the United States of America and against Canada—and I might add, against the Russian bear? Moreover it is not with the military equipment contemplated in the present estimates that Canada could ward off the menace of war with a population of seventy millions, with one of the greatest military forces on land and sea.

This leads us to examine from the second angle the menace from without. The United States of America are our neighbours to the south. There are 3,000 miles of border separating Canada from the United States. Needless to say we do not require any Maginot defence line to protect us there. Over one hundred years of peace and good will have done more than any army could do in that respect, and the best thing for Canada is to keep that imaginary line which separates us free from military guards or anti-aircraft guns. And as Canada will keep the present leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) for many years to come, I believe I am right in stating that he can do more by his tact and diplomacy with our neighbour than any army which we could raise and equip, and by the time he will retire, the equipment bought will have become obsolete.

Then I come to the third angle of the menace from without: the menace from the east. Nearly four thousand miles separate us from the countries which might possibly attack Canada from the east. We have heard of the danger of air raids. These might be by airship or aeroplane. An airship would have to fly over France or England, and the speed of such aircraft is such as to make them of little utility in war. They are difficult to conceal and an easy target for anti-aircraft guns. As to aeroplanes, very few have succeeded in crossing the Atlantic from east to west on non-stop flights, and with bombs aboard I believe such airplanes are a menace more in imagination than in reality. To support this contention I might say that Lloyds of London, the world-famous insurance group, are actually cancelling all insurances against war in every country in the world except in Canada and the United States. If there were any real danger to this country and the United States, why would men of such knowledge and experience not treat Canada as they are treating all the other countries of the world?

As to our navy, it is claimed to be for use on our shores exclusively. Little danger is to be feared there, for to assume such a menace to exist would be to deny the power of England on the sea, and proof has yet to be brought forth to show that Britain does not still rule the sea.

Much more could be said, but I do not wish to take too much of the time of the house. However, I am not convinced that with $14,000,000 we can stop the menace from without, and no one can convince me that we need such an amount to protect ourselves from the menace from within. What is the menace from within? It is twofold: communist agitation and labour trouble. Do we need an army to deal with these two prospective menaces? I think not. If any real danger exists, it is from the communists, and they should be dealt with accordingly. The federal police should be reinforced; the provincial and municipal police are actually being reinforced and should be equipped to protect the property of the law-abiding citizens of this country.

As to labour troubles, I have faith in the ability of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), by his justice and knowledge of the labour situation in Canada, to deal with these problems with equity and justice to the employees and the employer. Some may say it is not within my province to judge the military situation of my country, that experts in military matters have recommended these expenditures. Well, Mr. Speaker, this recalls to my mind an occasion when I was reading law at the university. One morning I attended an important criminal case being tried before a jury. Six doctors had been called by the crown to prove that the accused was sane, and six had been called by the accused to prove that he was insane. The trial judge, who at one time was a member of a Conservative cabinet, after the witnesses had been heard, said to the jury: "Gentlemen of the jury, you have heard twelve experts, but you are twelve intelligent men, you do not need to believe them." What we need is not a defence expenditure, but to be defended from military experts.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the increase in the national defence estimates, because it is my sincere conviction that by this increase of $14,000,000 we shall be just knitting one sleeve of Canada's military uniform, which when completed will have cost Canada millions and millions of dollars. I perform my duty to my country to the best of my judgment and conscience. I regret that I cannot see my way clear to follow my party on this matter. I disagree with my party in regard to the national defence estimates, but I stand with my chiefs on the general policy of the government.

There are precedents for the stand I am taking. I shall vote against the motion of want of confidence in the government as moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), for the issue at stake does not justify such a motion. But I shall not support the increased estimates for national defence when they come before the committee of the house, because in my humble opinion it is putting a useless additional burden on the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country at a time when this country cannot afford such an expenditure.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): It is not my intention to trespass on the patience of the house for any length of time. This discussion, however, is very interesting and important.

I should like to say a few words in regard to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). This amendment, of course, constitutes a direct challenge to the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that this house go into committee of supply, and as such it is a direct vote of want of confidence in the government. If this amendment is adopted, of course this House of Commons changes, but I am certain that will not happen. If that should take place, however, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who leads the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in this house should be called upon to form a government, what would he do? Would he abolish the Department of National Defence in Canada? It is all very well for my hon. friends to criticize and to take a lofty, superior attitude in this house, but what would they do if they were faced with responsibility and with the practical question of what should be done in connection with the defence of this country? A good many years ago, when this country was engaged in the titanic struggle of the great war, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre announced himself as entirely opposed to war. I have no fault to find with that; indeed I may say that I have a great deal of respect for the moral courage shown by my hon. friend at that time. But I recall also that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who at that time was the leader of the Labour party in Great Britain, took a similar position. Mr. MacDonald was an out-and-out pacifist during the war. He was opposed to Great Britain entering the war; he was opposed to military expenditures. Well, a few short years after the war he became Prime Minister of Great Britain and his party had the responsibility of government. What was their attitude in their new responsibility? I am bound to say that Mr. MacDonald took a much more realistic view of what was his responsibility while he was in office than he did while he was a member of the opposition without responsibility. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that if my hon. friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party ever come to power in Canada, they will take a much more realistic view of the whole problem of defence in this country than has been indicated in the speeches which have been made in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North.

No one likes war. For myself I can say that I detest war from the bottom of my heart. I believe I am the only member of this house who was a member of the unionist administration in Canada which was formed to concentrate Canada's energies on the war, and at that time I saw a little from the inside as well as from the outside of what war means to a country. No one wants a war in Canada. It is the last thing that is desired by any person from one end of this dominion to the other. But the fact that we do not want war and that we may detest war with all our hearts does not touch the question of these estimates which are before parliament for consideration at the present time. If I could base my attitude towards these estimates upon my detestation of war I would oppose the estimates, but that is an unrealistic attitude and one which this dominion cannot afford to take at this time. What are the other countries in the world doing? I think perhaps if my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party were a little more frank with the country, they would come out openly as a socialist party. Outside this house I have criticized my hon. friends on that score. Their program is one of socialism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: Advanced socialism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say, "Hear, hear."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have always said it.

Mr. CRERAR: But I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he would be a little more frank and, may I add, a little more honest with the Canadian people if he would state openly that his party is a socialist party. There is no discredit in being a socialist. But what are the socialist parties in the world doing to-day in this matter of defence? I have already cited the experience of the socialist party in Great Britain, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's experience in both his first and second governments. Though I understand my hon. friends in the opposite corner have not the admiration for Mr. Ramsay MacDonald that they once had, still to-day Mr. MacDonald is a member of a government which has just announced the greatest program of expenditure for defence purposes that has ever been announced in Great Britain.

Mr. COLDWELL: And he is a saddened, broken old man.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, we shall take France, which has a socialist government, a popular front government with a socialist prime minister, a gentleman who has been a socialist all his life, or at any rate all his political life. He is not a broken old man. What is his attitude towards this question? I venture to say that Mr. Blum's government is spending as much, if not more, on defence as has been spent by any government in France since the war. What about Sweden? That is a socialist state, or a semi-socialist state, which my hon. friends hold up to us as an example. What is Sweden doing? That country is off to one side of Europe; it has not been at war for as long as Canada has not been at war, but to-day Sweden is spending two or three dollars for every dollar we are proposing to spend for defence in Canada. So I do not think that argument holds.

Perhaps the real reason for the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North lies a little deeper than the mere negation of the estimates brought down by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). As someone has already said, this resolution has two wings. Let me read it:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament—

If the amendment had stopped there, it would have been clear-cut and understandable. But it does not stop there; it goes on:

—in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

From the amendment it seems to me fair to ask this question: If this government had brought down estimates that satisfied the requirements of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his associates in regard to adequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people, would my hon. friends be taking the position they have taken with regard to these defence estimates?

Mr. COLDWELL: We would be glad to get $14,000,000 towards that end.

Mr. CRERAR: That begs the question. I think it is a fair inference from the amendment to say that if a sufficient amount of money to satisfy my hon. friends were being voted in this house for purposes of social security—though I do not know what social security may mean, in the terms of this resolution—then they would not be objecting to the estimates which have been brought down by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If this is not simply an oratorical question, may I say that we are absolutely opposed to the increases in the defence estimates. Particularly is this an outstanding injustice when nothing is being done and no money can be found for social security.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRERAR: If that is so, why did not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre see that his lieutenant the hon. member for Vancouver North worded his amendment in a different fashion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is well worded; I have no objection to the wording of it.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as provision for social security is concerned, I do not know what the hon. member has in mind. This is not the time to discuss that aspect of our many problems, but I would remind the hon. member that this country is providing to-day, in pensions of one kind and another, through federal and provincial governments, a great deal indeed by way of social security.

I may say, however, that the estimates have not lightly been put forward by the government. No government with any sense of responsibility to the Canadian people, having in mind the unemployment which exists and the onerous burden of taxation resting upon our people, would lightly put forward additional expenditures on defence or anything else. It was only because the government, after most serious consideration, came to the conclusion that it was their bounden duty to do so, that these estimates were placed before parliament.

What is Canada's position? We have attained practically all the attributes of nationhood. So far as our conduct of our internal and external affairs is concerned, Canada is to-day complete mistress in her own house. That position brings with it some responsibilities. If we look around the world we must realize that unquestionably, so far as world peace is concerned, the position is grave. That point has been traversed by many who have preceded me in the debate. Whether we like it or not, there are forces abroad in the world to-day which to all appearances are leading the world to destruction or into another great war. Are we to stand peacefully aside and make no preparation for any contingency which may arise? It is all very well for hon. members to talk, but if Canada should be invaded—and that is not beyond the bounds of possibility, in view of the progress modern science has made—

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister tell us who is likely to invade us or attack us?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not a prophet any more than the hon. member, although, if I went into the prophesying business I might do a little better than he has done.

Mr. COLDWELL: We hope so.

Mr. CRERAR: The United States did not want to go into the great war. President Wilson did everything he could to keep that country out of the war. On more than one occasion he declared that the United States was too proud to fight. But that country found itself impelled by forces which could not be foreseen, forces which were uncontrollable, to enter the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: The war debt.

Mr. CRERAR: War debt nothing! No one can measure the forces at work to-day; no one can judge what the possible effects may be. No matter how much Canada may dislike any war activity, if she found herself in a position where she had to defend herself, would hon. members be proud of a situation they had created whereby she had not the means to carry out that defence? I am satisfied the judgment of history on that course would be severe indeed.

We have to take account of these things. Let me repeat that the government does not desire to add to the burdens of the Canadian people. We are not going into this matter lightly as the hon. members for Vancouver North and Rosetown-Biggar indicated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that; I object to the statement.

Mr. CRERAR: I accept the hon. member's statement. He is always courteous in debate, and I wish to be courteous to him. Let me repeat that this has not been entered upon lightly. We have taken this course because after serious consideration we felt it was our bounden duty to place these estimates before parliament.

The question has been asked—I believe it was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver North—against whom are we arming? I do not think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will object when I say he intimated in his speech—I shall not use the term insinuated—that this was part of a scheme by which Canada was committed to supply expeditionary forces overseas. That point has been dealt with by my right hon. leader who, in the most unequivocal terms, has cleared up the situation in that respect. I need not repeat his statement. This government will not decide whether or not Canada shall send an expeditionary force overseas; parliament will decide, if such occasion should arise during the life of the present government.

No; we are not arming against anyone. Against whom would we arm? Whom would we desire to attack? Against whom would we be aggressors? We have no neighbours on the north, and we would not fight the United States on the south. We have enjoyed a hundred years of peace with that country, and I am sure that state of affairs will continue for more than another hundred years. We are not arming against anyone, but we are putting ourselves into a position where, if necessary, we may defend ourselves. I believe that is the bounden duty of any government holding the responsible position of governing this country.

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege yesterday to listen to the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), but since then I have read his speech carefully and in detail, noting every particular. May I say that in his submission to the house yesterday afternoon and evening the minister placed before parliament in clear and concise language the exact position of Canada in relation to defence. In his observations he did not mislead the house in any detail, nor did he withhold from the record one item which might have been regarded as a weakness in the position of this dominion to-day in her world sphere.

I should like to compliment many of the speakers who have preceded me and I want to make special reference to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who presented the position of Canada to the house this evening. I believe that we, as members of the House of Commons, should analyse the situation and consider it from a larger perspective than some hon. members have done this afternoon and this evening. We should not follow the narrow perspective embodied in the speeches of the mover (Mr. MacNeil) and the seconder (Mr. Coldwell) of the amendment.

May I refer again to the speech of the Minister of National Defence. In my humble opinion he left nothing unsaid.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: Apparently some hon. members did not read his speech. May I say that the Minister of National Defence, in outlining Canada's position, left nothing unsaid.

I should like to refer for a moment to Canada's position in world affairs. As has been noted by many of the speakers who preceded me, in the past Canada has depended upon the British taxpayer for the protection of her trade lanes on the seven seas. It has been stated also that Canada has depended upon the protection of the great republic to the south. It has been said that we should still remain wards of either Great Britain or the United States. I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to some facts which have been placed before them in the past. In 1936 Canada sold $400,000,000 worth of Canadian products to Great Britain, while in that same year Great Britain sold $120,000,000 worth of her products to Canada. Canada has a mercantile marine; we have ships on the seven seas flying the Canadian flag, and Canadian citizens are scattered throughout the world. We pride ourselves on being a full-fledged nation, and yet some hon. members object to our paying an infinitesimal part of one per cent of our income in order that Canadian commerce and Canadian citizens may be protected in the event of war.

I should like to place on record what in my humble opinion is our present position. We see in the press to-night that Great Britain is to start the construction of ten ships on April 1. We see another item to the effect that in 1937 the United States will spend a greater amount on armaments than has been spent in any year during her history. We see another item to the effect that Lloyd George, the war-time minister of Great Britain, makes the statement that the world is going mad and that nothing can prevent a conflagration. We read another item to the effect that a British embassy is in the United States trying to prevent Great Britain from being embroiled in a war until the people of the motherland have taken up the slack.

As was stated by one hon. gentleman who spoke last night, for the last four or five years Great Britain has been asleep. That country decided upon a policy of disarmament and the curtailing of votes for national defence, but a year or so ago she woke up to the realization that Europe had rearmed. What is the position to-day of the British Empire? What has happened in Africa because of the Italian rape of Ethiopia? The conquest of Ethiopia placed Italy in control of the headwaters of the Nile. Could anyone have realized three or four years ago that such misery, suffering, degradation and cruelty would have been perpetrated in Spain? What will happen should the fascists gain power in Spain? The first step will be the breaking of British influence in the Mediterranean and interference with British trade through the Suez to the far east.

I may be wrong, but it is my humble opinion that if Great Britain had been prepared she would not have suffered the humiliation she did suffer in connection with the Mediterranean situation and the Italian conquest of Ethiopia. Whether we like it or not, there is existing throughout the world the devastating influences of fascism, communism and nazism which are breaking in surges against the last bulwark of democracy, the British Empire.

What is our position in Canada? Our position to-day is not the same as it was in 1914. Our position to-day is not the relative position in which the British Empire was in 1914. Our position to-day as a component part of the British commonwealth of nations is that we are confronted with the fact that Great Britain has all she can do to protect her own shores. Our position to-day is that we can no longer retain our asinine and colonial aspect in connection with world affairs. Our position is such that we have to spend money on armaments with which to defend ourselves. We must increase those expenditures in order to protect ourselves as Great Britain can no longer help us. Great Britain has all she can do to protect herself. I notice the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) smiling. After following the red ensign around the world he should know the present position of the British Empire. He should know with what Canada is confronted to-day. No one should know that as well as a man who has followed that red ensign from Singapore to London.

We must realize not only that we are an independent nation within the British commonwealth of nations but that we must do our bit. We must protect ourselves. We shall not have the privilege of deciding whether we are going to be neutral or not. We shall not have the privilege of determining whether we are going to get into war and whether we are going to be attacked. To-day Germany and Japan have entered an alliance; should trouble arise, we in this dominion on the highway from Yokohama to London would be subject to attack, and if the views of hon. members opposite should prevail, we would be in no position to withstand it. It is the duty of this and any succeeding government to vote part of the income of the people of Canada by way of protective insurance against eventualities that may arise in a world that to-day is going mad.

I congratulate the Minister of National Defence upon bringing down his estimates, tabling them, going into them in detail item by item, and exposing to the house and to the country the existing weakness of our military, naval and aviation services, and I am taking his speech as the basis of my remarks. We could not to-day arm a battalion in this country. We have no modern machine guns, no modern aeroplanes and certainly no modern coast or naval defences. I remembered, when reference to this matter was made by the minister in his speech, having stood at my office door on the shores of lake Ontario and having seen seven Italian aeroplanes on their flight direct from Italy over lake Ontario. Yet in the face of such achievements somebody comes along and publicly declares, "Better a convict than a soldier," without an appreciation or a realization that to-day this country is more vulnerable than she has ever been, and that the apron-strings of the old motherland have been broken through the necessity of preserving her very life blood, the heart of the empire; without a realization that the next war will be fought, not with picks and shovels, but with gas bombs and with deadly weapons of warfare unknown in any previous conflict. In face of such facts, hon. members move a resolution of lack of confidence in this government because my leader and my colleagues, having the interests of the people close to their hearts, have the courage of their convictions and the foresight to come into this house and table estimates, sir, that in my opinion are absolutely inadequate to meet the situation. May I say to the Minister of National Defence that these estimates, instead of being thirty-four or thirty-five millions of dollars, should have been at least seventy-five millions of dollars in order to bring the naval, aviation and military equipment of this country up to the standards necessitated by the development of armaments throughout the world to-day.

We have listened to many eloquent speeches in connection with this question. I desire, in conclusion, to place upon the records of this house what are in my humble opinion all-important considerations: First, that the last bulwark of democracy is exemplified by the British Empire; second, that by no stretch of imagination can Canada or any other component part of the empire disinterest or disconnect itself from the interests of Britain; third, that the interests of this country lie not only with Britain but with the great republic to the south of us, and we would be remiss in our duty if, as was suggested this afternoon, we should depend upon the strength of the United States to protect our shores. We have a duty as a component part of the British commonwealth of nations. We have a duty to democracy and civilization. Above all, as has been stated in this house, we have a duty to the Canadian people. We are not a colony. And we are not a vassal state, although we would have been if the attitude that has been taken by speakers opposite in connection with these paltry estimates had been taken by this country and by the United States during the world war. Talk about social services; talk about railway deficits; talk about anything else in the way of reforms! We would have neither social services nor railways nor anything else if we were unprotected against a world conflagration based upon the great surging forces of nazism, fascism and communism to-day. Let us get down to brass tacks and realize where we are, whether our nationality be French, English or any other.

An hon. MEMBER: Scottish.

Mr. FRASER: Let us realize that it is our duty as Canadian citizens not only to support these estimates, not only to vote against this asinine resolution, but to make up our minds to continue in our loyalty and to vote for greater estimates next year, the year after, and just so long as dictatorship is rampant throughout the world.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to take this opportunity to correct the false impression given to this house by the remarks yesterday of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). I do not say that he intentionally misinterpreted my remarks of February 4, but misinterpret them he surely did.

On page 882 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as saying:

> I cannot for instance accept the suggestions made in this house recently by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), when he said on the fourth instant that we should have the world's best fleet in our waters; the world's best army in our land, and the world's best air fleet in our own country. I hope I am not doing him an injustice when I quote his remarks apart from the context.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what the hon. member has done, because from there on is the gross misinterpretation of what I said. He goes on to say that:

> If we are to have the world's finest navy in our waters we shall require one that surpasses the British navy, which has now a naval tonnage of 1,161,000, with something like 200,000 additional tonnage under construction, and a personnel of something like 90,000 seamen. If we were to have the world's finest army we should need an army greater than Germany's or the Soviet Union's 1,300,000 under arms. And if we were to have the world's greatest air force we should have to have a fleet greater than that of the Soviet Union or that of Germany, in excess of 4,000 aircraft.

At this point I wish to give three possible meanings of that. First of all, Great Britain has the world's best fleet and in that fleet she has one boat which is better than the others. Now, if we were to have that best ship, or possibly some similar to it, we could be said to have the best navy. Second, if Canada has the best navy according to the size of her territory, her population and her wealth, we could be said to have the world's best navy. Third, if we had the greatest number of ships and each one of these the largest possible, and if we had a greater number of sailors than any other nation in the world, then we could be said to have the best navy in the world.

This last is absolutely absurd because we have not the wealth to have such equipment, nor have we the men to use for the purpose of manning such a fleet. Yet this last is the interpretation the hon. member has put upon my words. The whole content of my address was strictly self defence, and on no consideration would I permit Canada to participate in foreign wars. I never said or inferred that we should have a greater military force than Great Britain, Germany, or any other country. I was not speaking of quantity at all, but the hon. member for Vancouver North stressed quantity, yes, magnified it many times. I was speaking of quality. I have in mind a little incident which many hon. members of this very house will recall in regard to the Ross rifle. These rifles were of a decidedly inferior quality and our Canadian soldiers were compelled to throw them away and pick up the Lee-Enfield rifles, although they left themselves liable to court martial by so doing.

A repetition of such things as that should not be permitted. We should have the best. As I stated in my last speech, and as I state again, the United States war experience illustrates why no foreign power could invade Canada, provided we took ordinary common sense precaution to prevent it. Is there any hon. member sitting in this house who does not desire to have our homes, our wives and our families protected from the ravaging of a raiding horde?

Mr. Speaker, I cannot lower myself to such depths of degradation as to expect any other country to defend us when we will not do anything to help ourselves.

The hon. member for Vancouver North said, as reported at page 884 of Hansard, the second column:

> If we are attacked it will be because of our relationship with Great Britain or of our proximity to the United States. If either of these powers get us into trouble we have no choice but to rely on them for defence. . . .

Surely the hon. member does not believe that we should get protection from Great Britain or the United States, giving as our excuse that we are merely neighbours and should be protected for that reason, or telling Great Britain that she should protect us because of our relationship with the British Empire, and at the same time do absolutely nothing to help ourselves. I cannot believe that of any hon. member. I am reminded of that old poem:

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!
> Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
> As home his footsteps he hath turned,
> From wandering on a foreign strand?
> If such there breathe, go, mark him well!

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to vote for this amendment, but I must make my stand clear once again. I am not voting against a proper self-defence program, but I am voting against the method the government proposes to use for raising the money for this defence program, that is by borrowing from financial institutions and burdening our people for years to come with an increased load of taxation which they cannot bear.

On motion of Mr. Leader the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 17, 1937

STANDING COMMITTEE—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the name of Mr. Beaubien be substituted for that of Mr. Howard on the standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of the bill is to call the attention of the country to the great loss of life through motor cars. It is not the same bill we had last year. It deals with many phases of the problem which are set out in the bill, copies of which will be available to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

PIERREVILLE, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Was the resignation of Mr. C. E. Blondin, postmaster of Pierreville, county of Yamaska, requested in October, 1934?
2. If so, by whom, and for what reason?
3. Upon what date did the Post Office Department decide to accept the resignation of Mr. Blondin as postmaster?
4. For what reasons?
5. Upon what date did the department decide to make a new nomination?
6. Was any person officially recommended to the department?
7. Upon what date?
8. What is the name of the person?
9. When will the new appointee commence his duties?
10. Is Mr. C. E. Blondin still in charge as postmaster?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.
2. By inspector following the discovery of a shortage in the postmaster's accounts.

3. October 22, 1936.
4. For reasons referred to in No. 2.
5. October 22, 1936.
6. Yes.
7. October 28, 1936.
8. Edmond Desmarais.
9. Matter under consideration.
10. Yes.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PORTERS

Mr. PLAXTON:

1. How many porters, if any, are employed directly or indirectly by the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiary lines?
2. How many porters, working on the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiary lines, are American citizens?
3. Does the United States government permit porters, working on the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiary lines and who are Canadian citizens, to work on trains which have entered the United States and are travelling therein?
4. Does the Canadian government permit porters, who are working on the United States railways and who are American citizens, to work on trains which have entered Canada and are travelling therein?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Two hundred and thirty-three porters are employed by the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiary lines in sleeping and parlour car services operated on its lines in Canada or on international runs. Sleeping and parlour car porters in Pullman service are not included as they are employed and paid by the Pullman Company which furnishes equipment and crews for certain runs on a contract basis.
2. Twenty-seven.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.

GRADE SEPARATION FUND

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What amount was voted for the grade separation fund in 1936?
2. How much was spent?
3. What proportion of it was spent in each province under the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada?

Mr. GARDINER:

HAMILTON GAULT FUND

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is E. H. Scammell, secretary of the Pensions and National Health department, also administrator of the Hamilton Gault Fund?
2. If so: (a) what is that fund; (b) what does it amount to; (c) to whom does it belong, and (d) what is the purpose of it?
3. Is Scammell the only administrator of that fund?
4. If so, when and by whom was he appointed, and, if not, who are the other administrators?
5. In the calendar years 1935 and 1936, were there: (a) any returned soldiers, and (b) any civilians who received money in any shape, way, or form, from that fund?

[Mr. J. C. Elliott.]

6. If so, how many, (a) returned soldiers; (b) civilians; who were the civilians, and for what purpose did each one receive any money?
7. Did a Lieutenant-Colonel Walker, of Ottawa, receive any money at different intervals from that fund, and if so, when and how much each time?
8. Does he receive a pension? If so, how much?
9. How many returned soldiers' requests for borrowing money from that fund were turned down in calendar years, (a) 1934; (b) 1935, and (c) 1936?
10. Does the administrator or do the administrators receive anything for administrating that fund, and, if so, how much?

Mr. POWER:

1. No.
2. No information.
3. and 4. Answered by No. 1.
5, 6 and 7. No information.
8. Information not available without further means of identification.
9. and 10. No information.

RETIREMENT OF RADIO COMMISSIONERS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Upon what date were Mr. Hector Charlesworth, Lieutenant-Colonel Steel and Mr. Chauveau retired as radio commissioners?
2. In addition to receiving their regular salaries to the above date, were they each granted a bonus, an extension of salary payments, or any kind of gratuity?
3. If so, how much in each case?

Mr. HOWE:

1. November 2, 1936.
2. (a) Mr. Charlesworth was granted a retiring allowance of one year's salary ($10,000) payable in instalments over a period of two years.
(b) Lieutenant-Colonel Steel—No.
(c) Colonel Chauveau—No.
3. Answered by No. 2.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RETIREMENT OF TRUSTEES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Upon what date were ex-Judge Fullerton and his two colleagues retired as trustees of the Canadian National Railways?
2. In addition to their regular salaries to the above date, did each one receive a bonus, an extension of salary payments, or any kind of gratuity?
3. If so, what is the amount of the bonus, salary extension or indemnity paid or to be paid by the Canadian National Railways or by the government?

Mr. HOWE:

1. September 30, 1936.
2 and 3. Honourable C. P. Fullerton, K.C., was given a remunerative payment of $30,000.
J. E. Labelle, K.C., was given a remunerative payment of $1,500.

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Have the services of Mr. Hector Charlesworth, Colonel C. A. Chauveau, K.C., and Lieutenant-Colonel W. Arthur Steel, M.C., members of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, been dispensed with?
2. If so, when, how, and on what terms and conditions?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.
2. (a) November 2nd, 1936.
(b) Positions automatically expired on the promulgation of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, under P.C. 2362, September 10th, 1936.
(c) Mr. Charlesworth was granted a retiring allowance of one year's salary ($10,000), payable in instalments over a period of two years.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. TUCKER:

1. When was the Canada Shipping Act proclaimed?
2. What has been the effect of this act on freight rates, particularly on grain being exported from western Canada?

Mr. HOWE:

1. 1st August, 1936.
2. No apparent effect.

BANK OF CANADA—ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. TUCKER:

1. When will the second annual report of the Bank of Canada be available for distribution to members of parliament?
2. Will such report be referred to the committee on banking and commerce?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. A certified copy of the auditors' statement of the accounts of the Bank of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1936, was tabled on January 25, 1937. If by annual report is meant the address by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the shareholders, it should be noted that the annual meeting will not be held until February 23rd, and arrangements have been made to make copies available shortly thereafter.
2. Under consideration.

BRITISH TREASURY BILLS

Mr. TUCKER:

1. How much did the British government pay in interest on its treasury bills against which fifty millions of dominion notes were issued in 1917?
2. In what manner and when was this issue of dominion notes redeemed?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. No interest was paid by the British government on its treasury bills against which notes were issued. They were held as collateral only. Interest at varying rates up to 5½ per cent was paid on the credit opened in favour of the British government for the purchase of munitions and other supplies financed by this issue of dominion notes.

2. Dominion notes were redeemed in cash during the following years:

1923-24	8,600,000
1924-25	16,965,000

DOMINION TREASURY BILLS

Mr. TUCKER:

1. How much money is now owing by the dominion under short term treasury bills?
2. What is the average of interest payable on such indebtedness?
3. What is the length of the period such treasury bills are drawn for?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $150,000,000.
2. ·7566 per cent.
3. Three months.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—HOURS OF LABOUR

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. What are the hours of labour of hospital orderlies in the Department of Defence and in the Department of Pensions in and about Winnipeg, Manitoba?
2. What are the hours of labour of inspectors in the Department of Agriculture in and about the city of Winnipeg, Manitoba?

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Do firemen in the Department of Defence at Winnipeg work a seven-day week of eight hours per day?
2. How many firemen are employed in said department?
3. Do any workmen in said department work a seven-day week of eight hours per day?
4. What is the number of hours comprising a week's work for firemen in or about Winnipeg in the Department of Defence?

DOMINION COAL COMPANY—COAL SUBVENTIONS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What amounts were paid by the Dominion government to the Dominion Coal Company as bonuses for the manufacture of coke, and the manufacture of steel, for the following years: 1934, 1935, 1936?
2. What amount was paid by the Dominion government in subventions to each province to assist in the movement of coal during the year 1936?
3. What quantities of coal were moved in each province under these subventions?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—APPOINTMENTS IN QUEBEC AND ONTARIO

Mr. LALONDE:

For a return showing:

1. The complete list of the positions announced by the Civil Service Commission for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, and 1936.
2. The complete list of candidates who have applied for these positions, (a) English-speaking; (b) French-speaking.
3. The complete list of successful candidates for the positions announced.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. RINFRET: The information asked for by this motion is very comprehensive, and to prepare it would take considerable time and cost a good deal. I call attention especially to No. 2:

The complete list of candidates who have applied for these positions, (a) English-speaking; (b) French-speaking.

To make such a list would mean hundreds, in some cases thousands of names for each position; so that hon. members can imagine what it would mean if this informatoin were prepared with respect to all positions over a period of seven years. Other questions asked by the motion are not matters of record and we would have to take a small census to get the information. I may say, however, that I have explained the situation to the hon. member and he has been kind enough to agree to let the order drop.

Motion dropped.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE OFFICIALS—ALBERTA

Mr. FAIR:

For a return showing:

(a) Name; (b) headquarters address; (c) title; (d) salary; (e) travelling expenses, of all permanent and temporary officials, with headquarters in Alberta, employed or supervised by the Dominion Department of Agriculture or any of its branches, for the year 1936.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a matter of personal explanation and privilege, may I refer to page 945 of yesterday's Hansard, the first column. Speaking of honorary colonels and honorary lieutenant-colonels, I am reported as saying:

These men take advantage of their wealth in order to parade in a uniform which they were too cowardly to wear during the war.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

PROPOSED SURVEY OF LEGISLATIVE AND LEGAL SYSTEM, LOOKING TO INCREASED EFFICIENCY AND STABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform are long overdue in Canada;

That with a view of increasing the efficiency of parliament and of government in this country and also of considering the whole question of over-government and over-taxation and giving the people a more modern constitution adapted to the solution of Canada's present day problems, a survey and study should be made either by a select committee of this house or by a joint committee of both houses of parliament with a view of having a report presented to both houses of parliament for these very necessary reforms and for legislation accordingly, so as to increase the efficiency as well as the stability of government in Canada.

Any such suggestions as aforesaid to be subject to the existing rights of minorities which are not to be interfered with but preserved.

He said: The resolution which is before the house this afternoon is No. 1 on this year's order paper but I thought that private members' day was to be abolished. The resolution was on the order paper in the sessions of 1935 and 1936.

The efficiency of this parliament is one of the most important questions for the people of Canada. Politics is supposed to be one of the greatest sports in the world. This parliament is operating under rules which are antiquated, rules three hundred years old. Take the annual estimates; instead of following the practice which is common to municipalities and private business enterprises, under which heads of departments meet together as a central board and go over the estimates carefully, cutting them down where feasible, and, in the case of the municipality, striking a tax rate, what do we do? We simply hold a post mortem on matters eighteen months old. We get the auditor general's report within fifteen days after the opening of parliament, but what is in it? Nothing but a post mortem examination of expenditure made in a previous year. It took three hundred years of parliamentary strife to secure the freedom of parliament and control by parliament over the executive and over the expenditure of money, but here we meet and pass millions of dollars of taxation representing money which has all been spent beforehand. We should reform our own ways of doing business. Parliament is getting to be nothing but a rich man's game. We sit here anywhere from three to six months. One of the glories of the Victorian era was that in those days they built up assets for the future. To-day these assets are being squandered by parliament, and the country does not know about it. In those days the people kept the state; to-day we are getting into a situation where the state keeps the people.

I say that the estimates are brought down early in the session. Under the constitution if this house moves to reduce the estimates by one dollar, and the motion carries, the ministry resigns. What an absurd procedure! Many men in this house come up here from the municipalities of Quebec and the other provinces, and are accustomed to municipal practice. We have to get some modern business methods in the government of this country. We know at the annual meetings of the banks and financial institutions they are complaining about Canada's lack of business methods. Over-government and over-taxation are the curses of this country. There never should have been any provincial legislatures; they were not in the minds of the fathers of confederation but were created by the fathers of confederation for political, not economic purposes, with the result that you have in this country to-day a state of affairs which is intolerable. You have nine provinces all dealing with purely local matters, and a tenth legislature here, the House of Commons and Senate of Canada. In Great Britain there are no provincial legislatures; a population of some forty-six millions is governed by one federal parliament and local government boards over the municipalities. They get speedy results, while we sit here doing nothing.

I have travelled a little on the trains during the past few weeks, and I find them filled with members of commissions—they call them now committees; the Minister of Agriculture had an advisory rehabilitation committee to spend $10,000,000 on prairies, now changed to many committees. A committee of one hundred will be nothing when the work gets going. They are usurping the functions of parliament, going over the head of this House of Commons. We pass various acts, and at the end you see a board or committee provided for and given power to make rules and regulations which have the force of law. They are imposing direct taxes on the people of the country, and the people are not able to pay them.

It is my desire to offer constructive criticism, not particularly of any government, but based on principles. I believe that next session a select committee should be appointed as proposed in this motion, as was done in the old country, where the reform of the House of Lords and many other reforms, were brought about peacefully and without revolution, with the result that to-day the mother country is recovering from the depression faster than any other country in the world, by reason of a balanced budget, tariffs, a sane and sensible housing scheme, and control over the budget. They are meeting the enemy at the gate—bolshevism, socialism, fascism and all the rest. Look at England about eighteen months ago, with the black shirts, the red shirts and the shirts of many colours, so that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. But in England to-day a cardinal principle is respect for the monarchy, respect for institutions. Sometimes as I listen to things said in this house I begin to wonder whether there are not some Canadians who are ready to praise every country in the world except their own. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we will have to reform our ways, for the burdens and restraints and artificial barriers we have placed on business make it hard for men to carry on.

I would suggest that estimates committees be set up. This is not a new proposal. Such committees exist in other lands to-day. In England they have a committee system, and they have had such committees in the United States for about fifty years. Instead of taking up to-morrow the estimates of the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Immigration and having a discussion of policy on the vote for salaries we would appoint a committee on estimates or perhaps two or three committees. The officials of the departments concerned could appear before those committees and give all the information required. This is the municipal system, the board of control system, and in this way we would have some central authority looking after our expenditures. The committee, on which all parties would be represented, might strike off half a million dollars here or a million dollars there, and it would not affect the fate of the government. Under our present system of responsible government the ministry falls if anything like that happens. Our system is three hundred years old; it is out of date.

We have a great deal of useless over-government and over-taxation in Canada. If many of these provincial governments were out of existence entirely I think it would be a good thing for the country. I believe we should adopt the British system and enlarge the powers of the municipalities. Judging from the way some of these provinces are going on, after a while there will be no municipal institutions left. The provinces are grabbing all the revenue that formerly was collected by the municipalities. At one time the income tax was the exclusive field of the municipalities. That was the case from confederation down to 1917, when this parliament invaded that field and imposed an income tax for war purposes, which constituted a duplicate income tax. Not satisfied with that, the governments of the provinces came along and imposed a triple income tax, which surely is an absurdity.

These provinces receive direct subsidies from parliament under the British North America Act, and what are the subsidies given for? The terms of confederation state why they are given; they are to compensate the provinces for their inability to levy indirect taxation, and to maintain provincial and municipal institutions. Now the provinces want the power of indirect taxation, and if it had not been for the action of the other branch of this parliament a bill would have been passed which would have given the provinces power to invade almost all fields of municipal taxation. They would have added a tax on real estate, a tax on the municipal assessment, and, in addition, a duplicate sales tax. That bill was thrown out by the senate, because the interests of the people of Canada and the interests of good government and law and order demanded that this should be done.

It is my opinion that the municipal system should be substituted for our present system. Parliament should meet here for only about three months. Under our present system some of the committees set up do not meet at all; others elect chairmen and that is the last we hear of them for the year. We have altogether too many committees, but we are very badly in need of a legal committee. Reforms must come in the interests of national security. If we had a single parliament during which there was a socialist majority, Canada would be ruined. Whither is Canada drifting? Where are we heading? As I say, in a single parliament untold damage could be done; the state could be revolutionized against the will of the people, if the socialists had a clear majority here. I suggest that we should consider changing the rules of this game. Did you ever hear of a game that had the same rules for three hundred years? Instead of being here for about three months, which is all the time that should be required to transact the necessary business even during the very heaviest session, we are here sometimes for six months, and when we have fall sessions we are here practically the year round. This political game should not be a dead game; it should be up-to-date and modern, and the rules of the game should meet changed conditions.

I believe some measure of constitutional reform should be adopted which will prevent amateurs from periodically interfering with industry and agriculture in Canada. That has been the curse of this country for many years. Artificial burdens and restraints which have been imposed upon business have prevented business from functioning normally. Parliament hardly ever meets without creating some additional restraint on business and trade.. As a matter of fact parliament has become the chief enemy rather than the protector of liberty in this country. Nothing has been done to check the shocking death toll on the highways. We meet here and talk about many things, but the terrible death rate on our roads and highways is ignored, while in England the problem has been practically solved.

Constitutional reform is the only remedy for the meddling of amateurs with business that is going on to-day. Nothing is more essential than good housing for the working classes and cooperation between the farmers and the consumers, but efforts to deal with these matters have failed. As a result the consumer has been placed at the mercy of the producer. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that when our parliamentary system was started some three hundred years ago the basis was territorial representation, because that was an agricultural age. Parliament included representatives of the shires and towns and of the producers and distributors of agricultural products. Thus the producers and the consumers were brought together in parliament, not to regulate other people but to regulate their own affairs. The government cannot isolate itself from trade and commerce; if it did so it would have to cease functioning. I believe our activities should be reorganized so that industry may become self governing within the constitution. The country is sick of politics as it is practised here; that has been stated by many leaders of industry. I wonder how many of the front benchers opposite would be returned to parliament if they had to be elected by a referendum. If a new government were to be elected by a plebiscite how many members of the present cabinet would be returned to office? The government should discharge the trust it received from the people back in 1935, and that is not being done at the present time. The people gave the government a mandate to bring about reforms, and if this is not done it will be all the worse for us. We should have a clear cut national policy and we should concentrate along national economic lines. If nothing is done by the present government I fear—though I hope it will not come about—that we may see an even greater drift in Canada towards socialism.

I should like to see something done along the lines of the action taken in England. There the union between the forces of Baldwin and Chamberlain and the sane, sensible thoughtful trade union movement saved England last May. I should like to see something done along this line. In the early days of this country everybody owned some property—a farm, a little mill, or something else. We have been slow to see how the rights of property have been taken away in Canada by big business; the old system has passed away, and a very large majority of the people are just proletarians. In the days of Sir John A. Macdonald it was very different. In this house we are behind the times, and unless we wake up and reform our house from within it will be reformed from without. So far as my knowledge goes, none of the great reforms that have marked the history of England since 1800 originated within parliament; every one began outside. The same is true of this house: all our great reforms, except those which were initiated two years ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), began outside the house. Reform was not enacted into law, either in Canada or in England, until parliaments were driven to do something. Look at the mother country: parliamentary reform did not start in the House of Commons or the House of Lords, but outside those houses. The abolition of the slave trade, the abolition of the corn laws, prison reform, colonial reform, Catholic emancipation, and the reform of the franchise—all these started outside parliament.

The government cannot isolate itself any longer from trade and commerce; if it does, so much the worse for the people. To-day the world is in a state where liberty has been contracted. We must be on guard as a people, recognizing the extent to which liberty has been contracted, not only in Europe but the world over, until there are left to-day very few parliaments. Even in this country there is little freedom in the press, in the pulpit, in the legislatures, or in the universities. In former times the state was the defender of the people. Where are we to-day? A couple of sessions ago there was a newspaper identity bill before this house which raised the issue of who owns the newspapers. Many honest country weekly old type newspapers in this country have been driven to the wall because of the economic conditions I described a few moments ago; there have been others merged into unions of papers. Where there used to be two papers independently owned, in the larger cities we now find them controlled by the same interests, and in these newspapers a page and a half is devoted to the turf and pages to professional sport as against about a column and a half devoted to parliament once in a while. In one paper to-day may be seen a list of 245 horses now racing, a number equal to the number of members of the House of Commons. I never in my life saw such names; if any hon. member has not a horse named after him let him apply to the paper in question. That is the direction in which the fourth estate in this country is heading, and the lack of attention the press give to government by the people. In no small measure it is due to the attitude of parliament itself, confronted with issues such as the great number of people out of work, and other important social problems. To-day the press are paying little or no attention to the proceedings of this house; in fact if I read some papers I should not know that parliament was even meeting apart from the fact that I am required to attend it.

The other day I was in a little Anglican church called Holy Trinity. It is surrounded by towering factories, and at its noon Lenten service is filled with white-collar workers and girls from the factories. The choir consists of splendid men, a few of them are even out of work. As I say, the service attracts a number of white-collar workers; girls who have little money to buy lunch will refresh themselves with a five or ten cent meal and afterwards go into the church. The other day I heard them sing that well know Lenten hymn:

Take up thy cross, the Saviour said,
If thou wouldst My disciple be;
Deny thyself, the world forsake,
And humbly follow after Me.

After that hymn was announced, one of those white-collar workers said to me, "What are you going to do in parliament?" Others after the service asked me to do what I could for the poor white-collar workers who are being driven out of the land by the decisions of the law courts, while we sit in the high court of parliament and do nothing. One of the cardinal principles of the British constitution is that the courts are subservient to the legislature. To-day in Canada we find parliament with nothing to do, its powers taken away from it and given to committees and commissions of all kinds. Where are the principles of magna charta? With liberty contracted in every direction, is there such a thing in Canada to-day as magna charta? In the last two or three years, at any rate, I have been unable to find it. It will be remembered that when magna charta was adopted it embodied in many forms the spirit of liberty. One provision was that:

No free man shall be arrested or detained in prison or outlawed or banished or brought to ruin, nor shall we set forth against him nor send against him, save by the judgment of his peers and in accordance with the law of the land.

And again:

No scutage or aid shall be imposed save by the common council of the realm.

"No taxation without representation." Is that the law in Canada to-day? No. We have appointed numerous outside bodies that are imposing taxation. It was in defence of that principle of no taxation without representation that the American colonies commenced their struggle with the British government. Yet under universal suffrage we see magna charta restricted, if not abolished, and almost kingly powers conferred upon magistrates in connection, for instance, with the restricting of bail. Thousands of people in Canada are in prison for debt. While such things are going on, liberty is a meaningless thing. Look at the penalties that are being handed out to juveniles fifteen and twenty years of age at a place called Guelph not authorized by law or the criminal code. Where is the spirit of magna charta to-day as regards trial by jury? What substitute have we? In many of the leading cities, the substitute for trial by jury is trial by newspaper. From the way some newspapers are allowed to carry on, trial by jury has become a farce; and when an appeal is made for law reform this parliament has not one member who will rise to say a word in favour of such reform.

All the great landmarks of our constitutional history, beginning with magna charta, going on to the Declaration of Rights, the Petition of Rights, and the Statute of Westminster, were founded on one principle; they were simply the reassertion of the principle of the subjection of the executive and of its members to the law of the land. It was the strength of the barons that made magna charta possible; a police force, so to speak, not to be used unless necessary, which gave us the liberty of our whole constitutional system. To-day that liberty is contracted. To-day the Canadian working man is at the mercy of arbitrary social conditions beyond his control. A century ago reform of the franchise secured the liberty of trade and industry for the mercantile and industrial middle classes. Later it was extended to wage earners; then women were given the franchise and their aid enlisted in the betterment of social conditions. We cannot afford any longer to sit still here and take no notice of what is going on in Canada. The danger to our freedom is greater from within Canada, than from without.

What is Canada's answer to all this? What is the answer of the House of Commons?

First, we should set our own place in order, overhaul the British North America Act, revise our parliamentary system, our constitutional system, our cabinet system, reform our house of parliament and increase its efficiency; above all, reform our social and economic life so that it will stand as a bulwark against the clamour and agitation of those forces which now find in our dominion so much scope for their work. We should adopt some system of Christian socialism for the workers of this country, the white-collar employees, the artisans and the farmers. A system of Christian socialism was brought in a hundred years ago by the industrial revolution. A similar movement brought about the evangelic and Oxford movements. There were great social reforms brought about in England a hundred years ago and similar reforms have been long overdue in Canada.

We must strive for freedom from within. We must be ever on our guard. Freedom from without will be taken care of by those who prize it even unto death. It was the armed strength of the barons which made magna charta possible, and it is the armed strength of the British Empire which will ensure the freedom of the British people. History shows that disarmament is impossible in a world where intolerance is so rampant. The disarmament of the free is the tyrant's chance now as in the days of King John.

We have been sitting here for many sessions talking about everything and doing nothing. Whenever reform has been mentioned we have been faced with that comedy of errors known as the British North America Act. As I said a few years ago in another debate this act is a relic of days long gone by. The workers of this country have been made to suffer great hardship because of the British North America Act, because back in 1867, certain wise men, whose vision was poor, loaded the provincial system on to the federal government. This is entirely opposite to the system which prevails in England and the United States. In 1867 there were no joint stock companies, there were no telephones, there were no power developments, no N.R.A., no eight hour day, and many of the great discoveries in science and medicine had not been thought of. The authors of the British North America Act did not play squash or badminton and they left us this relic as a result.

A lot of provincial legislatures were created. These are all spending money and the result is over-taxation. These provinces are nothing but a lot of Balkan states fighting among themselves, and the taxpayer is made to pay. The shortsightedness of this act of 1867 should not be allowed to continue any longer because it has brought about in Canada the creation of a state equivalent to slavery among our men, women and children. Our workers are living in nothing less than hovels; they are being forced to exist in a state of slavery. Yet we sit here as a parliament and do nothing. On April 1 of last year I made the following statement in this house:

> I would like to say a word or two in relation to industrial employment, because I want to contrast with the precepts of Christianity the way the industrial workers are used. Contrast our professions with the ruthless competition, the cruelty and vice of present day business and industry. Here personality counts as nothing, the dollar is all supreme. Modern life is machine life, soulless, a life of standardization, high speed production, a highly efficient organization for the making of profit. Everything is done in the mass, and life is made uniform, monotonous and artificial. Dividends are the chief objective; to get dividends human beings are sacrificed. Wages are shockingly low, often below the level of mere subsistence, so that people are forced into immoral and criminal ways of life to eke out a precarious livelihood. The maximum in hours of work is exacted in return for the minimum in wages. Senior employees, whose lifeblood has been drawn from them by long years of faithful service, are in many cases cast out without retiring allowance to make room for younger and cheaper people. It matters not what suffering is entailed for human beings so long as the stockholders are paid their dividends. This amazing selfishness and shortsightedness of the modern industrial system is creating a progressively lower standard of living and a vicious struggle for existence philosophy on the part of the people, increasingly serious social problems which must find their tragic solution either in war or in revolution. In the face of modern methods of competitive living the royal law of love, bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ, is a hollow mockery in Canada, presumably a Christian country. This is the contradiction of modern life; a truly wonderful appreciation of the value of the single soul in some quarters, but an absolute denial of any such value in others.

At that time I was speaking on the National Employment Commission. We are now into another session and nothing has been done. Edmund Burke once said that government is supposed to be a practicable thing, and not a thing to please the schemes of ordinary politicians. Is that so of this country? It is not. We have appointed a lot of commissions, but nothing has been done. My opinion is that the senate could be made a much more useful institution than it is. Last year it did a good work in throwing out legislation for indirect taxation. The senate should consist of the lords of mind and intellect in this country and it should have increased powers. Look at what the senate of the United States did for the people of that country. They exposed the absolute rottenness of the financial institutions of Wall street and various institutions throughout the country. Has the Canadian senate ever done anything like that? No. The senate should have increased powers; under a new constitution it could be more useful.

Under the existing party system there is no security against further taxation. Parliamentary reform should do two things. It should define how far a money bill which may ruin the taxpayers of this country may go, and it should devise machinery to save the country from revolutionary socialistic acts on the part of any government. Reforms of a certain nature should not become law unless the people have given their assent at the polls. I am not criticizing the Canadian senate, because I believe its membership includes a few of the brightest minds of the country. If we sometimes handled our business here as well as they handle theirs, there would not be much room for complaint. They should have the power to refer back any matter of an extremely controversial nature, and the people should have a chance to give their assent to certain reform measures.

The senate should be representative of all sections of Canada and should be composed of the best minds in science, the learned professions, the employers of labour, the trades unions and the cooperative societies. Such a body would command the respect of the people of Canada. Look at what the senate of the United States did for the people of that country. Governor Couzens' senate committee sat in Washington in 1927 to deal with unemployment problems. The report of that committee was available in 1930 and when the depression came they coped with it. The senate of Canada should have done something about this great problem.

In conclusion I should like to say a word or two about law reform. A learned Scotsman told the law society at Osgoode Hall in Toronto a year ago that the lawyers have to clean up the messes made by the politicians. I commend those words to the government. Law reform has become a meaningless thing in this country. Our gaols are filled with young people whose only crime is that they cannot get a job. It is predicted that in England in fifteen years there will not be any prisons left, owing to the law reforms they have brought and are bringing into effect in the old land. What are we doing? We sit around and do nothing. We refer matters to the supreme court and the privy council, and then refer them all back again. We send to the supreme court and the privy council a lot of abstract questions about the new deal legislation of 1935, instead of submitting concrete cases to the courts. England has had a system of unemployment insurance ever since 1900, but we are still talking about it. We have to wait to hear from the law officers, and before we hear from them probably the workers now living who would benefit from unemployment insurance will be dead.

There are several reforms that need to be made. There is trial by jury, for instance. The Minister of Justice and the leader of the opposition are benchers of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and must be interested in these questions. As was said before the law society last year, the lawyers have to clean up the mess which the politicians made, and it will be a big job for the lawyers when this parliament gets through talking about the new deal legislation. The new deal in this country was all right, if only hon. gentlemen opposite when they were sitting over here had given the new deal a chance, instead of injecting doubts and throwing buckets of cold water over it. They would have given it a chance if they had had any desire to help the working people of this country.

I have in my hand a copy of another act which is helping to clean out the prisons in England, the Money Payments (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935. This act gives poor people time to pay the fines that are imposed. My bill last year was rejected by the Justice department, and I think, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to change the name of that department to the department of injustice, because people can still be imprisoned for debt in this country. It is no wonder that with such acts as this Money Payments Act and others which they have in England the prisons over there are being cleaned out. They have an up-to-date system, and have made many law reforms.

Talk about the new despotism! We have imprisonment for debt in this country, bail refused in trivial cases, and so forth. The whole system is a relic of the middle ages. No wonder it was stated at page 9 of the housing report of 1935:

> Slums are a heavy indirect charge on the community. It is estimated by the bureau of statistics that crime costs us in Canada $60,000,000 per year, taking into consideration the lost time of those in our criminal institutions. The Department of Health estimates that public health costs us, including all phases such as medical fees, hospitalization, etc., $20,000,000 per year. These figures would be substantially reduced by the elimination of overcrowding and bad housing.

And, I might add, by urgently needed law reforms.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support in a general way what I believe to be the objective of the motion moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), I propose to confine my remarks chiefly to the effect which the present very high cost of government in Canada has on business, and through business, on employment in industry and in business. The hon. member in his motion refers to overgovernment and overtaxation, both of which we have in Canada, and both of which in my humble opinion, which I shall attempt to back up with facts, have had and do now have a very serious effect on employment.

I am pleased particularly with that part of the hon. gentleman's motion in which he suggests the appointment of a select committee of this house or of a joint committee of both houses of parliament to consider the subject matter of this resolution. I am glad that he suggested a committee, and not a commission, because this country has at present sixty commissions, if not more, the majority of which are overstaffed and overpaid, and the great majority of which are costly millstones on business in this country, and through business on employment. I am convinced, as the hon. member has said, that the members of this house and of the senate should do a lot of the work which is now being done by these sixty or more commissions that have been inflicted on the country.

A word or two on the cost of government in Canada. We have ten parliaments; we have a council in the Yukon; we have one senate, and I believe we have one legislative council. There are approximately 884 legislators of one kind or another, 764 of whom are elected and 120 appointed. If one looks into the administrative structure of the very large institutions in the United States, infinitely larger than anything we have in Canada, handling far more money than does the government of this country, and having many, many thousands of employees, I do not know of a single instance—and I have looked into the structure of many of them—where they have such an enormous and costly staff as this country has, including members of this parliament and the legislatures, to run our business. I am convinced that the cost of government in Canada could be very materially cut down.

I read a few days ago—and I confirmed it to-day—a statement issued by our own bureau of statistics, that the debt of Canada and of its provinces and municipalities, direct and indirect, but not including the indirect debt of the municipalities, now totals almost seven billions of dollars. This is an enormous debt for eleven millions of people to carry. It is a staggering millstone on production in this country, and is one of the major reasons why industry has slowed up. It is one of the major reasons why so many industries which I knew but which are not now in operation, have been compelled to close their doors.

I think the hon. member for Broadview was correct when he said that the provincial governments are doing or attempting to do much work which this parliament should do, and which is only interfered with by the legislatures. Just how that can be remedied I do not know, but perhaps a joint committee of this house and the senate, in association perhaps with a committee from the provincial legislatures, could bring about reforms along that line.

The bureau of statistics tells me that the provincial debts of the nine provinces are very close to $1,700,000,000, and that they are ninety-nine per cent higher than they were ten years ago. This is something for business men to stop and consider because we cannot go on in the way we are going. It imposes too overwhelming a cost on industry, and through industry on employment. That is what I am mostly concerned about. All my working days I have been studying the question of employment, and I know that every cost of this kind which is added to industry reduces employment. When we come to the third branch of government in this country, the municipalities, I find that the 4,200 municipalities in Canada also have a debt amounting to about a billion and a half. To try to carry on under the triple burden of federal, provincial and municipal taxes, industry and business are faced with a very difficult task. Business in Canada has had inflicted upon it taxes which it is now almost impossible to bear, and I will mention a few of these taxes. I say they have been "inflicted" upon business, and I think that is the right word. Perhaps some of them are absolutely necessary, perhaps most of them are; but at any rate they have been inflicted to a large extent upon employment itself. For instance, we have the sales tax, the excise tax, the income tax, the stamp tax, the tax on cheques, the business profits tax, a small one in connection with the radio, the corporation tax, the municipal business tax, the tax on capital, taxes on gross revenue, taxes on branches of industry. If a company has its head office in Montreal and branch offices in cities throughout Canada additional taxes are inflicted upon these branches, notwithstanding that they give employment. Then we have other taxes—the poll tax, the property tax,

A considerable number of these taxes are either duplicated or, as sometimes happens, levied from three directions. Take for instance the income tax. In Ontario we had a municipal income tax and a federal income tax, and now the province itself has taken the right to inflict an income tax on the people of Ontario. The gasoline tax is imposed in Canada in at least two ways and in the United States sometimes in three ways. If there are three gasoline taxes in the United States it will not be very long, if that tax is not now collected in Canada by three different taxing bodies, before every gasoline user will be compelled to pay taxes three times on his gasoline. When I was in the state of Mississippi last summer I had to pay a state tax of six cents on gasoline, a municipal tax of two cents and a federal tax of one cent. I do not know how many other states have it three ways, but every state in the American union has it two ways, federal and state.

All these taxes, whether we like them or not, do add to the cost of production, as every industrialist knows if he has trucks, and cars for his selling agents. Every one knows that these taxes add to the cost of production.

I was struck by an editorial that appeared in the Kingston Whig-Standard some time ago. This is an old, reliable newspaper, a supporter, I believe of the government of the day, and some fine editorials appear in it. It is a famous newspaper going back very many years, and the editorial in question, with which I very largely agree, refers to the present government of Ontario, though what it says is applicable to many other provincial governments. For my part I do not want to apply it to the present federal government. However, this is what it says:

> We do not mean to reflect upon the capabilities of the members of the government, but not one of them has to-day any actual business connection, so far as we are aware, nor has any one of them had the difficult task of piloting a business through the depression and endeavouring to keep men at work. The government is composed of two doctors, four lawyers, one engineer and three farmers. Naturally, when any matter comes up affecting manufacturing, or wholesale or retail business, or even the capitalists of the province who finance business, there is no one to put forth their side of the question.

As I say, I do not wish to refer to the present government, nor in what I am saying have I any reference to the previous government; but apart from those two I am convinced that it may be said quite truthfully of all governments in Canada that they have had far too few business men in administration. I am not suggesting that a high class lawyer like my hon. friend from Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott), who is looking at me, knows nothing about business, but I would ask him to say whether he has been engaged practically in giving employment to five hundred or a thousand men in his time. What I say is that the man who provides employment, who is associated with the strenuous business life of the country, who is buying and selling and processing material and having it distributed throughout the country, always anxious to see that it gives satisfaction, is the type of man we too seldom find in the government of the country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): When he gets into trouble he goes to his lawyer.

Mr. MacNICOL: And many a time his lawyer has misdirected him, as I have seen.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But he keeps on going.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not one of those who believe that lawyers are infallible, because, as I have observed too frequently, if you go to five different lawyers they will give you five different kinds of advice. What the Whig-Standard says with regard to government I endorse, and that is not making any reflection on any hon. member.

Before I conclude I want to show exactly what has been the result of the high cost of government and the intolerable tax burden that has been imposed by government on business; and so as not to mention any Canadian business concerns, many of which have been forced out of business, I will refer to one that interested me intensely last summer—the Amoskeag concern, one of the greatest textile manufacturing companies in the United States. That company had been operating 700,000 spindles. It had 20,000 looms and its 22,000 employees—that was the maximum number—turned out in five days enough cloth to go around this world, a length of 25,000 miles. To-day that business is closed, and the closing was due among other things to the cost of government. This was the statement of the board of directors to a commission sent to investigate. The plant is situated on the Merrimac river in the state of New Hampshire. It had ample power, not unduly expensive, but during the last two or three years the A.A.A. set up by the United States government took out of that concern for processing tax close to $3,000,000. When they closed they had, I believe, over 12,000 employees; the number had been reduced from the high point, but even 12,000 is a large number. This industry was the mainstay of that fine city of Manchester and one of the great business enterprises in New Hampshire. The commission reported that the high taxes were an important factor in the inability of the plant to operate at a profit. It is so easy to inflict taxes on industry. People who know nothing about giving employment to hundreds or thousands of men, and the tremendous difficulty of keeping them employed, are ready to pile up taxes on industries. I am not defending the industry that exploits people, as some do; the great majority of industries do not, but unfortunately all suffer because of one that does not play the game. I have often wondered why the government cannot take care of the industrialist who does not play the game. In my opinion the government can, but why should all industry be attacked because one offends?

The commission recommended the repeal of the stock in trade tax and easing of local taxation, especially on buildings not now in productive use. There is a point; a plant may have a dozen buildings, several of them perhaps not in use for one reason or another, perhaps not fit for operation; yet the tax is imposed on the whole plant whereas it should be imposed only on the part that is actually operating and giving employment. The commission found that the federal processing tax imposed by the A.A.A. under the cotton control scheme wrought serious injury. The tax amounted to $2,500,000 in two years. The commission recommended the reduction of local and state taxation and insisted on the necessity of economies in state and local government.

After all, the purpose of government, and the object of all who really love their country, should be to provide employment, in either the primary or the secondary industries. In Canada I believe about a million men and women are engaged in the secondary industries, processing what has been produced by the primary industries. Any legislation or taxation which interferes with industry reduces employment, and that cannot be beneficial to the country. Employment is the major problem of any government. Later on, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) brings in his report about employment, we shall have a lot more to say in that regard. But it is the purpose of government to promote and ensure the employment of the people. Every man or woman has an inherent right to employment, and that which obstructs employment is not good for any country. In Canada the high cost of government tends to restrict opportunities of employment for our artisans. That great plant of which I have spoken is much larger than any I have in mind in this dominion; it stretches for several miles up and down both sides of the Merrimac river, in many cases two or three rows of fine buildings, standing vacant, a warning to all those who seek to provide employment.

In this country to a smaller, but still too large a degree, the high cost of government is a serious menace to employment. We have at the present time certain commissions investigating industry in this country. I am not opposed to investigating industries which have been found wanting in honour and lacking in due sense of responsibility to the people, but I am opposed to the practice of withdrawing executives from their offices in large numbers, particularly in times of depression, when they should be diligently occupied in seeking ways to provide more employment. I am opposed to these constant demands on the executives of industry. I know what it is to be taken away from an office for two or three weeks at a time to answer a lot of silly questions. Sometimes, perhaps in order to find out something, questions that seem silly have to be asked, but to me at any rate many of the questions asked of these men are silly and in many instances work hardship on men who are trying to make business grow and to give employment. In all too many instances these men drop dead in their offices or die from overexertion on returning home. More care should be exercised on the part of the government about asking those who direct business to come to Ottawa for these investigations. The executives responsible for operating a plant should not be disturbed more than is absolutely necessary, for to disturb the executives disturbs employment in some measure at least.

One word in regard to the cost of municipal government. As one goes around our big cities to-day, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and elsewhere, one sees wreckers pulling down fine buildings. I have in mind one in Toronto, on one of the main streets of the city, close to a main corner, pulled down not long ago. I inquired why it was being pulled down and was told by those who knew, that it cost too much to keep it standing, the taxes were too high. It had been vacant for a short time, and by pulling the building down they had to pay taxes on the land only. That seems to me a mistaken policy. I cannot see how the national wealth can be increased by destroying such buildings. There should be some way by which municipalities could lower the taxes on unoccupied buildings. This is just one more way by which cost of production is increased, and every unnecessary cost added to production adds to unemployment. I do not want anyone to think I am stretching that in any manner. Someone may say a tariff adds to the cost of production.

Mr. GOLDING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: An hon. member says, "Hear, hear." Very good, but in my time I saw a plant grow under the tariff from a personnel of thirty-seven to a total of nine hundred and twenty-five. That plant was a child of the tariff, one might say. The purpose of a tariff is not to increase the cost in a general way, and the government should regulate the tariff in order to prevent anyone from using it to exploit the people. It would be along that line that I would work if I had anything to do with the formation of tariffs. My sole purpose would be this: if a tariff would give employment by encouraging production in this country I would impose a tariff, but on the other hand I would take strong and vigorous measures to prevent the use of that tariff for the exploitation of the people.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the activities of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) are very diversified, and this is a sort of omnibus resolution which embraces many different subjects. I am sorry I cannot support the resolution, because I have always had a great liking for my good friend, and especially have I had a high opinion of his judgment since I saw him cheering the Quebec hockey team here in Ottawa last week. I should like to read the resolution, in order to show its wide scope and what would be involved if it were adopted:

> That, in the opinion of this house, constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform are long overdue in Canada—

That sentence is less than three lines in length, but it includes almost everything.

> That with a view of increasing the efficiency of parliament and of government in this country and also of considering the whole question of over-government and over-taxation and giving the people a more modern constitution adapted to the solution of Canada's present day problems, a survey and study should be made either by a select committee of this house or by a joint committee of both houses of parliament with a view of having a report presented to both houses of parliament for these very necessary reforms and for legislation accordingly, so as to increase the efficiency as well as the stability of government in Canada.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The resolution, which is expressed in such sweeping, general terms, is not very easy to comprehend or to discuss adequately in all its implications and objects. The scope of the resolution is extremely wide, and it may be said with some truth that if this House of Commons set up a committee to consider all the things mentioned in the resolution it would be an investigation of a formidable character. It is obvious that to achieve the purpose of the resolution the constitution would have to be altered substantially; the British North America Act would have to be radically amended, particularly in regard to the matters in which all the provinces are interested, and such changes could not be attempted without at least some degree of consultation and agreement with the provinces concerned.

As to the various topics suggested by the resolution, I shall say only a word or two with regard to each.

The question of constitutional reform was debated in this house the other day on a resolution moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who also suggested the setting up of a committee to consider amendments to the British North America Act. Possibly this part of the resolution might have been stated to be out of order, because it deals with a matter already dealt with in a former debate; perhaps, therefore, I need not repeat what I stated when the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was under consideration. May I say merely that this subject has been considered by a dominion-provincial conference, by a committee of that conference and by a committee of experts which drafted the amendments which ought to be made and which even drafted a bill to be submitted to the imperial parliament for the purpose of giving Canada the right to amend the British North America Act. That work is not yet concluded.

With regard to financial questions a subconference was set up under the chairmanship of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). That was done last year, and it was agreed that an attempt should be made through an amendment to the British North America Act to define clearly the right of the provincial authorities to levy particular taxes and to remove any legal doubts as to certain forms of taxes of which the provinces desired to avail themselves. In pursuance of this recommendation of the subconference, which recommendation was accepted and supported by the various provincial governments as well as by the dominion government, last year a resolution was introduced into parliament providing for the adoption of an address to His Majesty to amend the British North America Act by way of an enactment of the imperial parliament, in the first place to widen the field of taxation available to the provinces by extending their legislative jurisdiction to include certain forms of indirect taxation, and, in the second place, to facilitate the granting of guarantees to provinces that could not finance without such guarantees. That resolution was adopted by this house but was amended by another house and failed of adoption there mainly on the ground that the proposal to confer on the provinces certain powers with regard to indirect taxation would disrupt the fundamental scheme of the British North America Act. The Prime Minister yesterday made an announcement that a royal commission would be appointed for the purpose of going into this whole matter of taxation between the dominion government and the provincial governments in order that any necessary financial adjustment might be made to enable the provincial legislatures to administer the matters entrusted to them under the British North America Act.

As to parliamentary reform, I do not conceive clearly what my hon. friend has in mind in this regard. If it is change in the representation in parliament, this is a very difficult matter which should not be part of a general resolution of the kind now proposed. If it is a change in the representation in the senate, or the substitution of an elective or partly elective senate for the present one, I might agree with my hon. friend, but he has not mentioned what scheme he would support. I do not know whether I myself could support it, but there might be improvements to be made in the light of the circumstances as they have been since 1867. Does he intend merely to alter the procedure in the House of Commons? He spoke about a committee on the estimates. Such a committee has been proposed many times in this house, but private members do not like the idea that they should be deprived to some extent of the opportunity of saying what they have to say on any items of the budget by letting a committee of their colleagues deal with those matters. I think there would be many reasons in favour of the creation of such a committee, but apparently the suggestion has never met the favour of the majority of this house, let alone unanimity, when it has been discussed.

My hon friend is certainly wrong when he says that this parliament is not a chamber of liberty but is killing liberty. I do not believe that there is anywhere in the world a freer parliament than the parliament of Canada. We have not even the restrictions which free houses such as the British parliament and the United States congress have imposed upon themselves, by way for example, of the "guillotine" and the restriction to one or two days of the discussion of various matters. Here we have perfect freedom. If my hon. friend has anything to complain about, it is not that there is no such liberty; it is perhaps that there is too much. It is certain that this parliament has not killed liberty. I need only refer to the proceedings of the last few days on the motion with regard to military expenditure. May I tell my hon. friends that if such speeches were made, or even if such motions were proposed, in some of the old parliaments in Europe or elsewhere at this time, those who made them would be in gaol instead of listening to me. No; as far as liberty and freedom are concerned we have them in Canada, and we should strive to maintain those privileges rather than express complaints which are certainly unjustified.

As to cabinet reform, there again I fail to understand what the hon. member has in view, because he has not expressed it. Perhaps cabinet reform would mean the change of the present ministers by substitution of others.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I observe that my good friend from Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) applauds this sentiment, but he is not serious about it. Cabinet reform—is it the number of ministers? Well, the number has been reduced from twenty-one to sixteen, and, knowing what I do know of the amount of work that has to be done, I do not think it is possible to reduce it further. It is all very well to say that the United States have fewer ministers than Canada has, but they do not do anything else but look after their respective departments. They do not sit in congress or in the senate; they do not participate in legislative work; they are only administrators of their own departments, whereas ministers here have to attend the sittings of the house and committees and to look after all sorts of additional work. In the absence of any suggestion in regard to cabinet reform, I fail to see what can be done in that regard.

As for law reform, there again what the hon. member has in view is not apparent. Law reform, like parliamentary reform, embraces a great variety of proposals. Does he suggest the amendment or repeal of certain federal statutes, or bringing them into harmony with provincial laws? I do not know. What I do know is that after the last dominion-provincial conference a committee of dominion and provincial officials was convened in Ottawa to consider the Dominion Companies Act, and they have succeeded in securing a basis of proposals to the various governing bodies which would make uniform throughout the dominion laws dealing with companies.

As to other questions—and there are many—regarding government and over-government, there again I sympathize with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). There are in Canada many parliaments, but it is the result of overruling circumstances; for without the provincial governments having been retained and maintained it would have been impossible to reach agreement on any scheme of confederation; we should not have been able to form a national government in Canada. Possibly it would be in the financial interests of at least some sections of the country if two or three provinces were united into one, but that is their own business, and it would be not only futile but an impertinence on the part of any committee of this house to study the question as to the organization of the provinces.

As to overtaxation, this is a matter which has engaged the attention—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —of the dominion government, and I see that it is engaging the attention of my right hon. friend. One of the questions considered by the subconference on financial questions of the dominion-provincial conference of 1935 was "duplication of taxation and possible reallocation of tax sources as between the dominion and the provinces." A discussion of the evils of duplicate taxation in Canada and of the relative jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces in the field of taxation resulted in the detailed consideration by the subconference of the following suggestions:

1. That the dominion should abandon the field of income taxation, leaving this field solely to the provinces.
2. That the dominion should continue to impose a sales tax but should turn over to the provinces all or part of the proceeds of this tax earmarked for unemployment relief.
3. That the dominion should upon request of any province assume responsibility for the collection of the provincial tax on individual incomes; the dominion to collect the tax for the provinces on the basis of rates fixed by the provinces and to remit such taxes to the provinces.
4. That a study should be made of the possibility of unified collection by the dominion of succession duties, the dominion either to remit the proceeds to the provinces or to retain them as a source of revenue in exchange for either the transfer of other tax sources to the provinces or the assumption of governmental services now performed by the provinces.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

There was a diversity of view in all these matters and no agreement was reached respecting the proposal to transfer tax sources from one authority to another. But there was general agreement that where both dominion and provincial authorities imposed the same type of tax, cooperation in the administrative field should be worked out in order to reduce unnecessary cost and inconvenience to the taxpayer and to produce increased revenue to governments.

Following the dominion-provincial conference of 1935, an arrangement was concluded between the dominion and the province of Ontario for the administration and collection of income tax on behalf of that province. The Ontario income tax is now being administered by the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue. A considerable economy in respect to cost of administration is being effected, and the inconvenience to the taxpayer, who is required to make out only one form, is reduced to the minimum.

I have referred already to some of the remarks made by the hon. member. He complains that in connection with parliamentary reform we have been talking too much since the opening of the session and not doing enough. I suppose he excepts himself from that indictment. He must realize that it is pretty hard to restrict the freedom of members who have or think they have something important to tell the house and the country. My hon. friend also says that there is no freedom of the press. I cannot see that. He says there is no freedom in the legislatures and no freedom in our pulpits. Why say that? We are free in Canada to say what we want to say in our legislatures and in our pulpits. The hon. member complains about newspapers giving only one column to parliamentary matters while they give three columns to the discussion of turf matters. I fail to see what a committee of this house could do about that. Newspaper owners publish what they think will best sell their papers to the people, and I do not think we could change that by any legislation or by the recommendations of any committee. The hon. member says that our churches are empty, that there is no longer any liberty in our pulpits. I may say that the church to which I go is far from being empty. I invite my hon. friend to come with me and I know he will see many people there.

Mr. SPENCE: Perhaps you do not go often enough.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is something I shall discuss privately with my hon. friend.

This resolution involves a number of very important matters were they discussed apart from one another, but I fail to see how they could be a matter of investigation by a committee of this house.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I did not hear the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) speak to this resolution. I was interested in what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said with regard to high taxes making necessary the destruction of so many buildings. Some people are ready to recommend a revision of the British North America Act or some other method of getting us out of these dilemmas in which we find ourselves, but I am inclined to think that we should spend a little more time and energy in an attempt to keep from getting into these dilemmas in the first place. I should like to direct attention to a condition of affairs which exists in many of the municipalities in Ontario. The reason why taxes are so high at the present time is found in the extravagance of the past. We now find that we cannot maintain the standard of living we set up. Not very long ago my attention was called to the annual report of the bureau of municipal statistics. One of the striking features of this report is that the people who do the most complaining about the cost of keeping up our standards of living, live in the very sections which enjoy the highest standards. These people do the most grumbling about paying for these things, and object to the taxes levied therefor.

I find that the total city municipal debt of the province of Ontario is $343,900,000, while the total municipal debt of Toronto alone is $188,000,000, or considerably over fifty per cent of the total city debt for the province. Considering this debt on a per capita basis, we find that the debt of Toronto is $302 per capita as compared with a per capita debt of $147 for the whole province. Let me draw attention to the difference between city, village and township taxation. The average per capita debt of the cities throughout the province of Ontario is $250, while some of our villages and towns have a per capita debt of only about half that, and in the rural municipalities the average per capita debt is only $45. If we could have an amendment to the British North America Act which would instil into the minds of those who are responsible for municipal government the necessity for frugality and thrift, I think we might accomplish something. But we boast about our liberty and give the people in our municipalities the right to formulate any policy they see fit to adopt, and the result is they have no qualms of conscience in mortgaging the future of the people who live in those communities.

Mention has been made of the moral standard of the people being so much lower. I do not think anything does more to lower the moral standard than debt. There are many people who through no fault of their own are endowed with only minor talents; for the parable of the talents still holds good —some are blessed with ten talents, some with five, and some with only two. And the man with only two talents in the complexity of our civilized life of to-day finds it very difficult to make a living and carry the heavy burden which the state places upon him. The result is that these people are forced to do things they otherwise would not do, and there is no doubt that they have to carry their share of the taxes, because concealed in the purchase of everything they buy for their household is a part of the taxes and the debts. That makes it very difficult for them to maintain the standard of living they would like to have. Hunger is one of the things which forces people to do things they otherwise would not do.

I would also draw attention to the fact that the major portion of our total income tax assessment comes from industrial and financial centres, and they are the ones who seem to have made the poorest use of their opportunities. The city of Toronto, for example, has an income assessment of $49,000,000, while the total for the province is only $86,000,000; in other words, Toronto's assessment is about 60 per cent of the total.

Coming back to the counties of which I was speaking a few moments ago, I see that there are seven counties listed here, out of a total of thirty-eight, which have no debt at all. I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the hon. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Sanderson) who represents one of those counties, the county of Perth. It has furnished a very striking example of frugality in the province of Ontario. If you will go through this list you will find that the per capita tax in those counties is such that men can still make a fair living without having to share too much of their income with the tax collector.

Speaking of this virtue of thrift, I am very proud to say, and possibly the Toronto members may take a leaf out of the book of some municipalities outside their own, that in the county of Brant in the last six years we have paid off $140,000 of our regular debentures. That included, of course, interest and principal. On top of that we paid $99,756 cash on our twenty per cent share of the cost of provincial highway construction, which amounted to nearly $1,500,000. From 1930 to 1937 our county debt has been decreased considerably, and it is now about twenty per cent less than it was seven years ago at the beginning of the depression, in spite of the heavy commitments of the twenty per cent obligation in respect of highway construction.

The sponsor of this motion (Mr. Church) might well pay heed to what other municipalities have done instead of criticizing everything that comes along. The other day, for instance, I noticed that he was very militant on the housing legislation, and said that Toronto had received under the home improvement scheme only $103,000. Well, if I were in the lending business and observed the financial record of some of our municipalities, I think I would be reluctant to extend credit very much further to those who do not make a better showing in administering their own affairs.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the house to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

PROBLEMS OF WESTERN CANADA

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO STUDY AND REPORT ON ECONOMIC AND PSYCHOLOGICAL CONDITIONS

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River) moved:

Whereas, the western Canadian provinces have materially increased in wealth and population since entering confederation;

And whereas, the geographical location of Canadian financial and industrial centres have prevented friendly understanding of western Canadian life leading to an accumulation of grievances either justified or psychological, tending to disrupt the harmony of confederation,

Therefore be it resolved,—That this parliament would serve a great need and greatly enhance Canadian unity by appointing a commission to investigate broadly the various problems of western Canada, both from an economic and psychological point of view and to bring in recommendations to this parliament

He said: Mr. Speaker, on February 1 last, speaking to a resolution moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I took the opportunity to make to the house a statement regarding certain problems of western Canada, and at that time I laid down two rules which I think will bear repeating.

The first rule is this: The vitality of national life, being dependent upon the harmony of its component parts, is capable of resisting temporal erosion in proportion to the degree in which harmony exists.

The second rule is: The deterioration of a political entity, subject to the diversity of its constituent elements, is slow or rapid in proportion to the fractional facets of its local problems.

It would appear that many others hold these views because since I last spoke on this question I have come across various suggestions more or less in line with the ideas expressed in my resolution. For example, a letter was addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, over the signature of Henry W. Morgan, dated January 28, 1937, and reading in part as follows:

> The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is at one with the government in recognizing that unusual financial difficulties are presently facing the prairie provinces. The chamber therefore notes with satisfaction that the government is in close touch with these emergent financial conditions, which with governmental concurrence, are now being reviewed on the ground.

And further on:

> However necessary the above recommended survey may be to remedy effectively these special western problems, the Canadian chamber is unanimous in pressing strongly for the immediate naming by the dominion government of a national commission, whose functions, inter alia, will be federally and provincially, (1) to clarify the inter-relation of financing and taxing powers, (2) to survey the duplication of public services, (3) to redefine legislative policies and (4) to establish administrative responsibilities. Many of the actual relationships between the federal and provincial governments have, we believe, become out-moded and need readjustment. . . .
> Because of the peculiar financial, economic, social and constitutional problems before the dominion, the present time seems particularly fitting for the empanelling of such a national committee.

It is to be noted that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce believes in a commission that would make an impartial and a thorough inquiry over the whole of Canada. While it might be desirable to adopt this suggestion, I am primarily concerned with western Canada and its relationship to Canada as a whole. I am not qualified to make a statement with regard to conditions in eastern Canada. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce speaks of these special western problems and I believe the interests of western Canada would be best served by a commission specially set up to study western Canadian problems.

Recently the president of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, addressing the annual general meeting of shareholders in Toronto, said in part:

No one who is familiar with the history of the west will believe for a moment that the problem cannot be solved in a sane and reasonable way. Neither can any one fairly doubt that it is the sincere desire of all thinking men, whether they have a financial interest in it or not, that the problem should be so solved. What is required at the moment is assistance—sympathetic, of course—but, by all means, expert, and the suggestion which has been made that a commission, corresponding to what is known here as the "Duncan commission" of some ten years ago, should be appointed to deal with it seems to be a reasonable and proper suggestion. The future of the west is of vital concern to all of us.

It is also to be noted that this appeal is much more in accordance with the subject matter of this resolution. However, this organization is chiefly concerned with the financial problems of western Canada. A commission set up to study merely the financial problems of western Canada would, in my opinion, not be satisfactory to the west simply because the financial question is not the only one that needs to be solved. I intend to-day to review briefly some of the difficulties I pointed out on February 1 last, but I shall deal with these later.

Yesterday the Prime Minister's statement came to me as a surprise. I have read that statement very carefully. It is proposed:

—to appoint a royal commission of inquiry to investigate the whole system of taxation in the dominion; to study the division of financial powers and financial responsibilities between the dominion and the provinces; and to make recommendations as to what should be done to secure a more equitable and practical division of the burden to enable all governments to function more effectively—and, I may add, more independently—within the spheres of their respective jurisdictions.

I do not believe that such a commission would give satisfaction to western Canada. Nowhere in this proposed royal commission do I find that such questions as the tariff and immigration, freight rates and the question of subsidies, are to be studied. It is not my intention to relate once more what I pointed out on February first in regard to the tariff and these various problems. I believe that on that occasion I placed on Hansard a fairly complete analysis of these problems and I should like the Prime Minister to take into consideration the remarks which I made then. In fact, I might say that I should like to make those remarks a part of what I have to say to-day.

Something else took place in this house last week. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave us what I considered a most able and comprehensive survey of the drought situation and its effect on western Canada. The terrible consequences of this situation were made quite clear. He showed the loss which the drought had caused to Canada as a whole and how it had aggravated the financial position of the western provinces. It was pointed out that this particular problem, because of its very nature, must be recognized as a national one. I had hoped that the minister would go on to show how the drought had compelled an increase in provincial expenditures, while at the same time it restricted the field of provincial revenue. Though this fact is well known to all hon. members, definite records would have greatly assisted all Canadians in obtaining a still more impressive picture of the situation.

But let us come back to the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday. It appears that the royal commission will be set up as a result of a report made by the Bank of Canada regarding the finances of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not present to-day because I should like him to hear what I have to say. It appears further the Bank of Canada believes that unless financial assistance is given to Saskatchewan and Manitoba these two provinces face default, and therefore the dominion is of the opinion that in the circumstances it would be justified in extending temporary aid to the provinces in question pending the report of the royal commission. The Prime Minister concluded his remarks by saying that a recommendation to this effect would be made to the house when the supplementary estimates were brought down.

I wish to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in protesting with all my might against what I regard as a discrimination. There is no doubt that Alberta faced a financial situation just as difficult as that faced by Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and Saskatchewan and Manitoba are to be saved by this dominion from default. Alberta, however, was allowed to default. If my memory serves me rightly, the reason given at the time this default was allowed to take place was that Alberta would not agree to a certain loan council which was then being proposed. I submit that the situation is unchanged; neither Saskatchewan nor Manitoba is being asked to agree to a loan council scheme. They are to be granted assistance without any strings attached, the reason given being that they face default unless the dominion helps them. Alberta also faced default, but it had to submit to impossible conditions which are not now being exacted from Saskatchewan or Manitoba in order that they may receive assistance.

As the leader of the opposition said, no matter what explanation may be given, it is a fact that Alberta was allowed to default and find its own solution, whereas Manitoba and Saskatchewan are going to be saved by this parliament from this course. What happened on April 4, 1936? These are a few gems from the Financial Post of that date. I have before me a clipping from the Financial Post of April 4, 1936, in which the following statement appears:

> Rejecting financial salvation in the form of the proposed loans council scheme of federal aid, Alberta defaulted payment of principal of bonds maturing April 1.
> The maturing loan is $3·2 millions of six per cent bonds issued in 1916, and payable only in Canada, against which the province had sinking fund of some $560,000. The province is paying interest. . . .
> The dominion government was willing to aid Alberta in meeting the maturity, provided the provincial government subscribed to the loan council plan of financing.

And further on in regard to dominion policy, this statement is made:

> This policy has been applied to Alberta with the result that Premier Aberhart has chosen to default. Its next application will be to British Columbia.
> It is now hoped that the loans council plan will be of future service in salvaging provinces whose credit has suffered by reason of default.

And so on. But where is the loan council now? Why is Canada going to help Manitoba and Saskatchewan? Not because they have agreed to a loan council, but because the Bank of Canada says they need help.

I quite agree that the western provinces should be assisted, but once more I desire to protect emphatically against what is a serious discrimination against certain Canadians. Furthermore, I would point out that some of the policies adopted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) have had a good deal to do with things which have happened in Alberta. It has been pointed out by many people that relief has increased in Alberta, and for that there is a reason which I can give. During the past summer certain moneys were granted by the federal government to Alberta to help unemployment through road relief projects, and one of the conditions attached was that no one who was not on relief could get employment on that work. What was the result? Everyone who was not on relief but wanted to earn a few dollars tried to get on relief in order to get employment and earn what he could. Therefore this had the effect of increasing relief in Alberta. That is one feature which merits consideration when the figures are being analyzed.

However, it is not my intention to speak particularly of Alberta. I feel the problems faced by all the western provinces are very similar, and when the Prime Minister announced yesterday that he would set up a commission to study the financial problems of the west, that does not go far enough. It may not be correct to say that he has adopted the suggestion from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, but after a financial investigation by authorized persons he has come to the conclusion that the west needs financial assistance. Western Canada, however, will not be satisfied with simply an investigation or review of its financial problems. As I stated on February 1, there are many factors in western Canada to-day which are causing difficulty. Many people in the west feel that the east does not understand their problems. Some days ago it was said that eastern Canada responded and responded spendidly to the call for help from the west. I agree that that is a fact, but I also believe that western Canada should be given an opportunity to air all these grievances which have been fermenting in the minds of the people there. As I state in my resolution, some of these grievances may be fancied and others justified. But whether justified or psychological, they tend to disrupt the harmony of confederation.

I do not intend to cover again the ground that I traversed on February 1, but I should like the remarks I made then to be considered as part of what I have to say to-day. At present people in the west live under the shadow of wrongs, real or fancied. They fancy that eastern Canada does not understand them, looks on the west as a burden, a drain on the federal treasury, thinks the east pays the bills while the west lives in irresponsible affluence. When the western people think of what they have gone through during the last few years, the drought they have faced, the plagues of grasshoppers, the hot winds that have blown away their seed many times, and the impossible conditions under which they have had to live, they naturally feel bitter towards those who are not prepared to give them the sympathy which they deserve. Even though this resolution has come up after the statement given to the house yesterday by the Prime Minister, I trust there is still time for the government to reconsider the setting up of this royal commission and to give western Canada a really good hearing.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): In rising to say a few words on this resolution, perhaps I had better touch upon the three main parts of it. The first part deals with the fact that the western provinces since coming into confederation have increased materially in wealth and population. That is a fact which cannot be gainsaid. Then we have the statement that because of the geographical location or centralization of financial and industrial power in eastern Canada since confederation, certain grievances have arisen, and that these grievances, whether justified or psychological, have a tendency to disrupt the harmony of confederation. There is a certain degree of truth about that too. Then in the last part of the resolution we come to the statement that this parliament should appoint a commission to investigate these grievances and problems and bring in recommendations upon which parliament could act.

In discussing this resolution, my hon. friend made one or two very broad statements, which I think can be refuted as being absolutely without foundation. One statement concerned the matter of government policy in regard to the grievances existing across the country from ocean to ocean, grievances which are nation-wide and are to be investigated by a national commission. The hon. member stated that the dominion in dealing with Alberta adopted a discriminatory policy. Where he gets such an idea, in view of the statement made in the house yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I do not understand. If he will turn to page 922 of Hansard of yesterday he will find in the closing remarks of the Minister of Finance this clear-cut, definite, constructive and, I would think, convincing statement, referring to the question of discrimination raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett):

> I can say, however, that the province of Alberta has been treated by this government absolutely without discrimination in so far as financial assistance is concerned since this government came into power; and I can go further and say that the government has no intention whatsoever of discriminating against any province in this dominion and is prepared to sit down with any province and discuss its problems and bring forward such solutions as the circumstances may appear to warrant.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, that statement happens to be inaccurate—although I am bound to accept it—Alberta was driven to default, and people holding its bonds have in some cases been practically ruined because of the inability of that province to pay. The Minister of Finance would not help Alberta although it asked for help, and now the other two provinces are to be helped.

Mr. McINTOSH: In answer to the statement made by the leader of the opposition I would say that if Alberta is seeing evil days financially and industrially the fault does not lie with the dominion government, the Finance minister, or the Prime Minister of this country. It lies very largely with Alberta, headed by the government existing in that province at the present time.

Mr. QUELCH: What about Manitoba and Saskatchewan too?

Mr. McINTOSH: Rather than be diverted from my remarks may I touch upon what the Prime Minister said in the house yesterday in regard to this national commission which the government is to appoint to investigate financial and industrial problems from ocean to ocean, that is, all over Canada, in the maritimes, in the industrial provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in the three prairie provinces and in far-off British Columbia. This commission will deal with every province; it will touch upon every financial and industrial question concerning which there is any grievance in the country, and the terms of reference will be wide enough and ample enough to enable this commission to consider all the grievances of the nation, and after hearing the evidence and considering it in the light of reason, to bring in a report upon which legislation will be based and put into effect by the government of the day. In dealing with the power and scope of that commission the Prime Minister used these words as reported at page 922 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The difficulties of the prairie provinces have been greatly intensified by drought, and the earning power of their people has been affected accordingly. But other sections of the country are not free from problems of a similar character, although they may not be so acute. We have, in short, ample indication of certain fundamental strains and weaknesses arising out of our present allocation of financial powers and governmental responsibilities, and if no attempt is made to remove them, the ill effects will not be confined to the sections where they now appear.

In other words, all these fundamental grievances, all these complaints and strains not only of Manitoba and Saskatchewan but of all Canada, which surely includes Alberta, will be dealt with. They will all be dealt with impartially, not in a political or a partisan way but for the good of the whole country. When that is done we expect that a report will be brought in upon which progressive and advanced legislation will be based and enacted by the party now in power. That is the situation exactly.

May I say further, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Pelletier) may have a certain degree of realism about it, but if I am not mistaken the hon. member is trying to place the blame upon a few financial and industrial organizations of eastern Canada for all the grievances that at present exist in this country. I think that is what is at the back of my hon. friend's mind, but I believe he is entirely mistaken. That is not true; that is the argument advanced by the hon. member and others of his group all over Canada; but it is not sound; it is not in accordance with the facts and it is not in accordance with history. We all admit that to-day there are serious problems facing the Canadian people. We all admit that we have problems affecting Canadian nationhood, problems with which we must deal and, to the best of our ability, solve, but I wonder whether there is any special financial or industrial organization or any special class of people or any particular individual responsible for these grievances. I would not think so. I believe we can truthfully say that the Canadian people themselves are responsible for all the problems confronting Canada to-day. Since confederation we have been dealing with national problems through the ballot box; every four or five years we have made pronouncements upon fiscal problems, tariff problems, financial problems and industrial problems, and on those pronouncements the governments of the day have acted. So I think it is rather late for any hon. member to attempt to pin upon any organization, financial or industrial, the responsibility for grievances that at present exist in Canada. I would say the Canadian people are responsible, and if they have made a wrong decision the only thing to do is to get busy and correct that decision.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, many wrong decisions have been rendered during the last fifty or sixty years. I do not believe our fiscal policy has been what it should. I believe that fiscal policy has been built up largely for the protection and development of secondary industry in Canada. Rather it should have been a combination policy, one for both the primary and the secondary industries of this country, with no discrimination shown. But what did the Canadian people do every time they were asked about the matter? They rendered a decision in favour of high protection, and they got it. That is democracy; that is responsible government. I would say that if we want these tariff, financial and industrial grievances rectified, the commission method is the right way to go about finding out just what are the difficulties. Then, when these grievances are corrected, we expect the Canadian people in future to keep themselves on more solid ground industrially and financially in considering problems of government. That is the proper way to proceed, rather than to deal discriminately with any one section or any one industry of the country. All the industries should be dealt with in a constructive manner.

I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that in my opinion the government is to be complimented upon having decided to appoint a national commission to investigate the financial and industrial problems confronting the whole nation, not leaving out any one province but covering the whole country. After the fullest possible information has been secured, with all the facts pertinent to the matter, a report can be made, and upon that report action can be taken in order to enable the provinces and the dominion to function more successfully, more effectively and more constructively within the respective orbits of their jurisdiction. To my mind, if that is done we shall live in a new day in Canada, and I would say that the sooner this commission can get busy and bring in a report, and the sooner that report can be acted upon, the better it will be for all the dominion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat if I was correct when I understood him to say that the financial condition of Alberta in April of this year was the result of the misdeeds of the government in power during that month.

Mr. McINTOSH: What I want to make plain, Mr. Speaker, and what I wish to affirm is that if there is anything wrong with Alberta, financially or industrially, this dominion government is not responsible. The way to cure a condition of that kind is to go back and lead your own people to the constructive and sane solution of your own problems in a way that will mean a better day for the province of Alberta.

Mr. HEAPS: Then may I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Would he apply the same rule to Saskatchewan?

Mr. McINTOSH: Why, certainly. We can depend upon the people of Saskatchewan making a sound decision. There is no question about that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are not all the people of Saskatchewan Liberals now?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member did not answer my question.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I wish to say this: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the condition of Alberta in April, 1936, was the result of the policies of the government which was in power in that province at that time. I challenge the hon. member to prove that the financial position of Alberta on April 1, 1936, was in any way due to the government in power in that province at that time. He absolutely cannot do it.

Mr. McINTOSH: The government of Alberta has a definite financial responsibility. It has had it for the last two years. It has not faced it aggressively or effectively. So much for the provincial government. While Alberta has not done that, I fear it has not done the next essential thing; it has not cooperated with the present dominion government in a manner to get anywhere. Because of these precarious limitations I suggest that the best thing for Albertans to do is to adopt a new perspective and a new type of action —cooperative action, and then, perhaps, Alberta will be more successful and contented.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Vote Liberal, eh?

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, they might do worse than that.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, as has been said, the first section of the resolution before the house deals with the increase in population and the increase in wealth of western Canada since it came into confederation. My experience in that country started long before the west came into confederation. I have been forty-five years in that section of Canada, and since I have been old enough I have watched the development of western Canada.

When that country was first settled and the land broken up, naturally it would stand much more strain than it can at the present time. When I say that I am speaking of agriculture. In other words, when land is first broken up in a new country you have very few crop diseases, very few insect pests, and practically no noxious weeds to fight. During the first twenty years of occupancy of a new agricultural country, the cream, or a large portion of the cream, is taken out of that country, and in that period such a country can stand much heavier tolls than it can support at a later period.

Western Canada developed very rapidly. Part of its trouble came at the time of the great war. The people of the west were asked by the then dominion government to produce as large as possible a volume of foodstuffs for the armies overseas. They were urged to bend every effort to that end. As a matter of fact, we in western Canada who had not gone overseas and were on the land did bend every effort to produce all we could in the way of foodstuffs for those who had gone overseas and for the rest of the country. In doing so, in many cases we did not carry on the very best system of agriculture. We cropped our land too heavily; we did not summer-fallow enough; we endeavoured to produce as much as possible for the immediate time, and largely as a consequence we got ourselves into a lot of trouble. I should like to say on behalf of the farmers of western Canada that they were the only people in the whole dominion who were asked to do a certain thing and then had complete control taken of their product and a price set upon it by the federal government. Many people have said that the price of wheat during the war was very high. It was high then as compared with other times. Prices ranged from, first, $2.04 to $2.20, to $2.15 with a certificate that later brought 48 cents. But there was no restriction upon the charge that any other person in Canada might make for the commodities the farmers needed to buy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The commodities they had to buy in order to produce grain went to tremendous prices. I remember having paid at that time as much as $30 per bag for sugar. At that time wheat was $2.20 per bushel. I recall having paid as high as $9 per day and their board to men who came to labour in the fields. Every last thing that the farmer in that country had to buy at that time went to extremely high prices, much higher proportionately than the price of products he had to sell, and many of us found ourselves at the end of the war period, when it might be supposed that we would be wealthy, in a worse condition than when the war started.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We said nothing about that. We felt at that time that it was our duty and our contribution. No one has ever heard the western Canadian farmer make any real complaint as to his position at that time. But hon. members should remember or should know the extent of the farmer's contribution at that time when they are dealing with conditions in western Canada to-day, for his present plight is in part due to the conditions of that time.

The hon. member who moved this resolution (Mr. Pelletier) made mention of tariff. I was glad to hear the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) state, what I know to be true, that this commission which has been formed will look into all the troubles or grievances of any province in Canada. Surely one of the greatest grievances of many people in practically all the provinces is the taxation arising from the tariff in this country, not as a taxation by the government, but as a taxation by special interests in Canada upon the rest of the people.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Why a commission, then?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Why a commission? What can be done but to get the facts before a body which is impartial?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): As I said the other day, the tariff in this country has greatly affected many of the provinces since confederation. Only a short time ago a commission in Nova Scotia made certain recommendations with regard to the tariff. They said:

> We believe that the tariff policy of Canada has reacted unfavourably upon the economic development of Nova Scotia. It has tended to retard the growth of the exporting industries of the province without providing adequate compensation in other directions. It is true that, by means of the tariff and subventions, the central Canadian market has been brought within the reach of the coal mining industry, which would otherwise have been the monopoly of the United States industry; and that the steel and car construction industries have received a share of the orders for railway material and equipment from the Canadian railways; and that the dominion government has assisted in other ways. When, however, the advantages and disadvantages have been set against each other, we are definitely of the opinion that the fiscal policy pursued by successive governments has reacted injuriously upon the welfare of Nova Scotia.
> We agree with the following statement quoted from the brief submitted by the then government of Nova Scotia to the royal commission on maritime claims in 1926;
> "Protection, or free trade, or an exclusively revenue tariff, may be advocated with some show of logic, but surely no reasonable defence, no consideration based on equity or sound public policy, can be advanced in support of a system under which Nova Scotians are compelled to buy what they consume in a substantially protected home market, and to sell what they produce in a virtually unprotected one."

This applies not only to Nova Scotia but to the seven provinces outside the industrial area and to the majority of those people in the two industrial provinces who are not engaged in industry. The tariff has given to certain people engaged in industry the power to tax other people, to such an extent that, in many cases, out of every dollar we have spent we have had to pay twenty-five cents for nothing. There are two or three aspects of the tariff which should be brought out. Until a few years ago it was always believed that the taxing power lay with this House of Commons. This has been the case in most British countries, but during the last two decades this taxing power has been gradually taken away from the House of Commons. In the first place, it has been turned over to the industrialists by means of the protective tariff. In the second place, certain provisions have been enacted which place this taxing power in the hands of the officials of the Department of National Revenue. When the budget is brought down, some hon. members may think they are making the tariff of this country, but that is not what is being done. There are some 1,200 items in the tariff schedule and about 120,000 different articles are imported into the country. The rate of duty charged depends upon the classification into which an article is placed. An article may come in under a duty of twenty per cent, but it will have to pay forty per cent if it is placed in another classification. The rate of duty depends upon what classification the officials of the customs department decide shall apply to a particular article.

The Department of National Revenue is located in Ottawa and anyone who has watched the operation of government, no matter what government may be in power, realizes that it is not difficult for those engaged in industry to come to Ottawa in an endeavour to obtain concessions in tariff rates or a more satisfactory classification for the articles they wish to import. The industrial areas are spread out around Ottawa and those engaged in industry are able to put considerable pressure upon the department. You will see these people coming to Ottawa and exerting every influence on the ministers of whatever government may be in power in order to obtain concessions. These people are able to place their views before those who administer the Customs Act, whereas the consumer as a whole has no chance to place himself in a similar position.

The result is that no matter what tariff schedule is brought down in the House of Commons, that is not the schedule under which goods are brought into the country. During the last several years higher and higher rates of duty have been charged upon goods coming into Canada. Speaking on the suggested British North America Act changes the other day, I referred to the general effect of the tariff upon the country. I stated that the effect had been to centre the industrial areas in this part of Canada and thereby take away the means of raising revenue from the outlying provinces.

Mr. WALSH: Is the hon. member inferring that the industrial area is centred within a radius of 100 or 150 miles of Ottawa because the seat of government is in Ottawa? Is he suggesting that that is the reason why Ontario and Quebec are so highly developed industrially?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No; I never tried to infer that that was the case because the government is located here.

Mr. YOUNG: He did not say so, either.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): This area has been developed because of a protective tariff. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that in the past several years, since this policy of protection has been in effect, many industries which used to be located in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have moved into the central area of Canada.

Mr. WALSH: Would the hon. member care to suggest one or two of them?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There are a great many.

Mr. WALSH: Suggest one or two.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, I shall not.

Mr. WALSH: Then do not make the statement.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If my hon. friend thinks my statement is incorrect, he may make a speech. Some maritime members will probably speak on this resolution and they will tell my friend plenty. I realize that he is very much interested in this matter from the attitude he took the other day when he said that the Turgeon commission was more or less window-dressing. I want to tell my hon. friend that the Turgeon commission is one of the best commissions ever set up by parliament.

Mr. WALSH: I suggested it was political window-dressing.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is worse than what the hon. member said before. The Turgeon commission is one of the best commissions ever set up in this country. Fortunately for the people of this country it has brought out many facts which prove the contention we have made in this house for years, that the men in the textile industry are just racketeers and not industrialists. When the report finally comes out, I hope that this government will act upon it in a way to prevent any industry in Canada from again having the temerity to do what these gentlemen have done during the last twenty or thirty years.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Will the government act?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Certainly they will act.

Mr. WALSH: May I ask if the hon. member has been instructed by the government so to answer the question that has just been asked?

Mr. DEACHMAN: May I ask if my hon. friend was instructed to ask his question?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I would say to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) that in this party and under this government every man has a right to say what he sees fit, and as for myself I will say what I think is proper whether the government says anything about it or not.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How can the federal government act on the report of the Turgeon commission when provincial governments have jurisdiction over corporations?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not going to lay down the policies of the government; that is for the government itself. But when the facts have been brought out before that commission, they will be turned over to the government, and I have every confidence that the government will act in the interests of the people of Canada in that matter.

There has been talk—and my hon. friend mentions the same thing in his resolution—about disruption of the country. The other day, speaking in this house, I happened to say that there was more danger of disruption to-day than there ever was before, and one or two of my friends on the other side of the house asked me: Are you saying that as propaganda for that part of the country or do you believe it to be true? I replied: I am not saying it as propaganda at all. I am saying it as a warning to this House of Commons and the country. My hon. friends who sit over in that corner of the house may think they are in this parliament because of their professed policy of social credit. If they think so, or if anyone else in this country thinks that is the case, they are entirely wrong. My hon. friends are sitting in that corner of the house as proof of an economic revolt in western Canada to-day. That is the reason they are there, because of an economic revolt against the old party.

Mr. DOUGLAS: That is why this government is in office.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Perhaps, but that is the real reason why my friends are sitting in that corner of the house, because there is an economic revolt in western Canada.

As one who was born in western Canada, I might give a little of the history of that country. Many people came to western Canada from Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces about fifty or fifty-two or fifty-three years ago. They came from all the different constituencies that are represented in this house. They settled in western Canada, and started to develop that part of the dominion. They raised their families there, and their families are still there, but the original settlers who went out from the east are now most of them dead.

What is the racial complexion of western Canada to-day? The main part of the population is composed of the sons and daughters, and the grandsons and granddaughters of the people who came out to western Canada from this part of the country, but remember this, very few of them have ever been back east. Then there are many people who came directly from the British isles, and who know from experience nothing whatever of eastern Canada. There are also many people from the United States, and many others from different parts of Europe. When one gets west of the great lakes, one will find very many people there who have never had an opportunity of associating with the people on this side of the great lakes.

In western Canada to-day a certain feeling is growing amongst the younger people. They walk into a store to purchase something, and they find they have to pay a certain price. They realize that the price is too high, and they ask why. Somebody says: "In order to build industry in Canada." And the young people will ask: "Whereabouts?" The answer will be: "Oh, fifteen hundred or two thousand miles away from where you live, in order to give employment to the people in the east." Then they will ask: "What is all this being done for?" And the reply will be: "To build up Canada." And these young people are saying: "Well, are we not a part of Canada? If we are, where do we come in? What has this to do with us except that we must pay?" And, Mr. Speaker, that is the only portion they have in this "Canada First" policy.

Mr. KINLEY: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Certainly.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. KINLEY: I was not in the house when the hon. gentlemen made the statement that central Canada had by various means contributed to the ruination of industries in the maritime provinces, and I understand he was asked to name specific instances. I agree with his statement, and I shall be glad to give specific instances, if necessary.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. gentleman knows that my statement was correct, and there are many who would be willing to support it.

Mr. KINLEY: I just wanted to settle that before six o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that many of these people had no experience of the east and many of them were thinking to-day that they were not being treated as a part of Canada under the "Canada First" policy. One cannot blame them for endeavouring to fight in every way possible against a situation such as that. After all, we must remember that no British people ever stood for such a thing before, and I do not think British people would ever stand for it.

I do not intend to support this resolution because I think the commission to be set up, which was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, will cover the question in all its phases in every part of Canada, and it will be up to the members in that corner of the house as well as the members over here from Saskatchewan and other provinces, along with their governments and others interested, to place before that royal commission the grievances of every part of this dominion, so that we may finally get them straightened out and come to some definite conclusion.

Mr. WALSH: It is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 18, 1937

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, respecting foreign enlistment.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Foreign Enlistment Act is an imperial statute which under its terms extends to Canada and all the dominions. Under the Statute of Westminster Canada may repeal, change or amend that statute. The purpose of this bill is to repeal the imperial act and replace it by Canadian legislation. It has generally the same provisions as the imperial statute, but they are made to harmonize with Canadian conditions in matters of administration and procedure.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Minister of Justice be so kind as to give a day's notice of the second reading? There are certain matters in this connection which, I think, are relevant, and which I should like to discuss on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will arrange it privately with my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

INVESTIGATION OF ILLEGAL LOBSTER FISHING

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Is a fishery commission investigating the alleged illegal fishing of lobsters in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island?
2. If so, what is the name or names of the members of the commission, counsel and stenographer, and what remuneration does each receive: (a) salary; (b) living allowance?
3. How many days has the commission sat to date?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.
2. Commissioner—Hon. Justice A. T. LeBlanc, (a) Nil; (b) $25 a day; Counsel—Hon. H. F. G. Bridges, (a) $30 a day; (b) $10 a day; Stenographer—Miss Jeanne Saindon, (a) $5 a day; (b) Actual expenses.
3. 29 days.

ARUNDEL, QUE., MAIL SERVICE

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. Who is the present contractor for R.R. No. 2, Arundel?
2. Is he a returned man?
3. Who are his sureties?
4. When was the contract given to him, and at what rate annually?
5. From whom were other tenders received for this service, and what was the annual rate asked by each?
6. Are any of the unsuccessful tenderers returned men?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. John Moncrieff.
2. No information.
3. E. T. Rousseau, A. B. Morrison.
4. 29th August, 1936—$800 per annum.
5. John Moncrieff, Arundel, $800; Stirling Simon, Arundel, $800; Geo. Marshall, Arundel, $840; Melvin C. Cooke, Arundel, $854.88; Dave Dubeau, Arundel, $900; John Moncrieff, Arundel, $900; Ross W. Swail, Arundel, $924; R. A. Moss, Jr., Arundel, $960; S. K. MacArthur, $960; Ernest Swail, Arundel, $990; Harry Skinner, Arundel, $1,200; Harry Skinner, Arundel, $1,252.
6. Yes,—Harry Skinner, Arundel. No information regarding others.

DUMPING DUTY ON CABBAGE

Mr. MUTCH:

1. Did the government remove the dumping duty on cabbages entering western Canada thirty days before they usually do? If so, why?
2. Was the government aware that there were several hundred tons of cabbage available in the Winnipeg area on the 16th of January, 1937?
3. What growers' organization in the Winnipeg area did the government consult as to the supply of cabbages available on the 16th of January, 1937?
4. What person or persons did the government depend upon for the information resulting in the removal of duty on cabbages thirty days before the usual time?
5. Did the government take any steps to notify the growers in the Winnipeg area of the impending removal of duty on cabbages thirty days before the usual time?
6. What steps did the government take to notify the fruit jobbers of western Canada of the impending removal?
7. Was the government informed that new cabbage from Texas could be delivered in Winnipeg in bulk for a trifle over 2 cents per pound if the dumping duty was removed on the 16th January?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled herewith.

WELLAND CANAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What are the names of all employees engaged during 1936 on the northern division of the Welland ship canal, and (a) the classification of their employment; (b) total earnings of each employee during the year 1936; (c) date engaged on an hourly basis, the rate per hour.
2. Are the employees engaged on an hourly basis laid off during showery weather, and if so, is it possible to arrange inside work on showery days for men employed on an hourly basis.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE CERTAIN CLASSES OF BLIND PERSONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to extend the operation of the Old Age Pensions Act to include certain classes of blind persons presently not included in the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I am within the rules in suggesting that the notice is hardly ample, in its description of the class of people to whom the resolution refers. I recall very vividly complaint being made formerly that notices of resolutions should indicate clearly the character of the legislation to be founded upon them. I think this notice is rather scanty. I merely raise the issue so that it may not be thought that I am acceding to a view which I believe is not in accord with sound parliamentary practice.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, whether or not this is evidence that great minds think alike, that was my own criticism when the resolution was submitted to me, but the answer given was that short of including the whole bill it was difficult further to amplify the resolution. I shall be glad to give full information when the resolution is being discussed.

Motion agreed to.

N. ROMEO BEAUDET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in view of standing order 119, regarding parliamentary agents, may I direct your attention to the fact that Mr. N. Romeo Beaudet, formerly a member of the unemployment insurance commission, and who is now out of a job, is canvassing members from door to door asking for a job, and I should like you to ascertain whether or not he has secured his licence as a parliamentary agent.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DUPUIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I would refer to the first page of the second section of the Montreal Gazette of to-day, where, under a large headline, I read that five Chambly Canton men were found guilty of perjury at a federal inquiry, and that their statement that the canal superintendent attended political meetings caused his dismissal from the service. Without going into the merits of the case I submit that this is not according to the facts, because the report of the commissioner who presided over the investigation contains four accusations—

Mr. BENNETT: This cannot be a matter touching the privileges of this house.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is the privilege of a member of this house to correct statements which are not according to the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: Touching this house.

Mr. DUPUIS: I understand that there is a plan under way to show that federal employees have been dismissed unjustly in order that some provincial governments may feel justified in carrying out wholesale dismissals of provincial employees. I just want to cite—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is within the rules of the house. A question of privilege must be in connection with a matter affecting this house.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

REGINA RIOTS—COST OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). On January 21 of this year I asked a question with regard to certain costs to this dominion in connection with the Regina riot inquiry. On January 25 an order of the house was issued for that information. As yet the reply has not been forthcoming, and I have been approached about it. May I ask why it takes a month to get this information, which I should think would be readily available?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I received the message from my hon. friend too late to make the necessary inquiries, but it is hardly fair to say that a month has elapsed between January 25 and to-day. We had to communicate with Regina in order to ascertain some facts. I assure my hon. friend that we will file this return as soon as possible.

SUPPLY—NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning that the house go into committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. MacNeil.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the motion before the house and the amendment thereto, it is not my intention to make any extended remarks. I want to be as brief as possible in presenting my position not only to this house but to the people who are responsible for my being here.

Needless to say, I abhor war just as much as any other gentleman who has spoken during this debate. I think war is madness, but I am afraid most of the world is afflicted with this malady at the present time. War is the most diabolical instrument ever devised by man for the destruction of all that is best in civilization. War violates every principle of the Prince of Peace and stimulates the forces of evil. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the war god is no respecter of nations; the most remote and the most peaceful may be drawn into the vortex. Canada is a peaceful nation. I am sure we Canadians have no desire to annex any of the lands that belong to other nations, but we are proud of our heritage, and we would like to keep it. Canada is remote from the possibilities of war, as we see them to-day, and we have no desire to create more armaments for the destruction of our fellow men. But, Mr. Speaker, we must face the facts. I am sure the government does not contemplate any war of aggression. If I did not believe that, I would not vote a five cent piece for the prosecution of a war, but would use my influence to defeat any such purpose. But a war of defence is a different proposition, and that is the position in which we find ourselves to-day.

What is the situation? Briefly it appears to me to be as follows: We have a Hitler and a Mussolini armed to the teeth, casting covetous eyes on the possessions of other people and uttering dire threats at the point of bristling bayonets. Under these circumstances we can visualize what would happen to Canada if we were not in a position to defend our shores. It is true that we could rely on the help of others. I know we could rely on the help of the motherland, and I am sure we could rely on the help of our friendly neighbour to the south. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we have any respect for ourselves or for this grand country in which we live we should be prepared to defend ourselves without asking for aid from anyone. Therefore I must vote against the amendment as presented by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), and I intend to support the government.

May I say that I have confidence in the Prime Minister of this country. He has a long record of service. At Geneva last year, during the meetings of the assembly of the League of Nations, he explained Canada's position. He spoke for Canada, and he spoke for me. He declared that Canada would enter into no commitments in any foreign war without the consent of parliament and the consent of the Canadian people. I agree most heartily with that stand, and I believe the people throughout Canada will agree, also with that policy. The Prime Minister cannot be called a jingoist, and for that reason I believe that under his leadership we are safe. I have concluded my observations on that phase of the question.

May I take just a few moments to describe to the house some of the feelings which I believe exist out in the country. It seems to me that we as members are prone to forget the position and condition of the people who, reposing their confidence in us, have sent us here to represent them. For that reason I try to keep in as close touch as possible with my electors. There has been a feeling throughout my constituency that under existing conditions there would be an increase this year in war expenditure. We have in the prairie provinces a farmers' organization which in my province is known as the United Farmers of Manitoba. At their annual meeting this year, held at Neepawa, which I was privileged to attend, there was presented a resolution, part of which I shall read, to which I gave my support. It seems to me that the very first words show that they anticipated just what is happening. As the resolution is long I shall not weary the house by reading it all; I shall read only that part of it which bears upon the matter under discussion. It begins:

> Whereas under the changed conditions as regards world peace, many people expect the Canadian government to enter upon a new and extended defence program—

And it ends:

> Resolved, further, that in the undertaking of any preparations for the possible contingency of war, (1) the government take steps to commit the nation to the principle that immediately upon the declaration of war financial control of all industry shall be assumed by the government so that profiteering of every kind out of war conditions and services shall be rendered impossible and that all wealth shall be conserved and applied to the national purpose of maintenance of the population and the realization of the nation's war objective and (2) that the working out of plans for such mobilization of economic resources be made a part of any defence policy upon which the nation may enter.

During the last war there can be no doubt that huge sums of money were made by war profiteering—made from the misery and sufferings of the sons of Canada who died on the fields of France and Flanders. That this should have happened is resented to the present day, with the result that in my section of the country a different feeling exists in regard to war profiteers. The Canadian people expect that if we must go to war all the resources of the country will be employed in the prosecution of that war. I believe that in the nation's interest we should conscript, if that is the proper word—perhaps it is not; some people object to it—the resources of the fields, of the forests and of the mines, and all the accumulated wealth.

May I repeat that I am supporting the government in these expenditures, which I believe, involve an increase this year of $11,615,000. The very amount is alarming, but under existing conditions I feel that as a good Canadian I can take no other course than that of supporting the action of the government.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, certain erroneous statements published in a press with interested motives claiming, without any proof in support of such allegations, that the dominion parliament would vote this year $70,000,000 towards national defence, have caused great commotion among the public. It is obvious that if the tories had been in power, probably these statements would have been true, but, thank God, we have in this country a Liberal government headed by the right hon. Mackenzie King, the prime minister "par excellence" and the one who stands in the history of Canada as the less imperialistic of all our prime ministers.

I leave to these comedians of journalism the responsibility of their statements. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that a contingency of that nature would have compelled me to vote against such an excess in imperialistic extravagance. But the hon. the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) asks this house for a total sum of $34,091,873.42, of which $22,339,223.42 is for our defence scheme, and $11,752,650 for the air force. Is this excessive? Is it acceptable? Does my duty as a member of this house authorize me to vote in favour of such an expenditure? I will endeavour in a few words to answer these questions to the best of my knowledge.

And I owe all men and women who voted for me a clear and definite explanation so as to dispel any ambiguity and establish on a rational basis my position as representative of the electors of Labelle and as a member of the dominion Liberal party. Moreover, having given to the press an interview which certain newspapers of my province and of Canada were kind enough to reproduce, I feel that I am under the obligation of proving that my vote will be consistent with my public statements. The text of my interview as published in Le Droit of January 20, 1937 follows:

The agitation caused by this important question of the defence estimates which the honourable the Minister of National Defence will bring down during this session of the federal parliament, has stirred public opinion. I do not believe that this is the proper time to reach a definite conclusion before having had an opportunity of considering these estimates and hearing what the honourable minister will have to say by way of explanation.

We do not know as yet what amount parliament will be asked to vote, nor the purpose for which these sums will be spent.

A definite conclusion would therefore be premature.

I am in favour of ensuring security within our territory and having our customs service watch closely our coasts and the American border, either with ships or aircraft. But these expenditures should be within our means and I am not prepared to vote in favour of excessive disbursements for that item.

As to the important question of Canada's participation in imperial foreign wars, I am altogether against it, either in men or money.

Mr. LACOMBE: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE:

It seems to me that the explicit statements of the right honourable Mackenzie King and of the honourable senator Dandurand on this subject are sufficient to appease public opinion. This does not imply that we should not be very cautious should legislation to that effect be introduced. This is a question of principle on which we must stand firmly. The future of Canada is at stake! All true patriots must have but one slogan: Canada first! And the interest of Canada is not to be found in Flanders, in the Spanish peninsula or in Ethiopia, but on the shores of the St. Lawrence as well as on the territory of the other provinces in the dominion.

Mr. LACOMBE: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE: I must therefore follow this program and abide by this principle. Indeed, I do not claim to meet the demands of the nationalists who, tired of seeking blindly some formulae for our economic recovery in the policies of the Liberal party, turn towards a political and utopian idealism of exaggerated secession, and selfish nationalism whose mean ideals are incapable of looking beyond the horizon of the province of Quebec.

Are these estimates excessive? Are they acceptable? Before expressing my opinion on this question, I think it would be important to set the scope of the discussion.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE: We have before us a motion of non-confidence; we must first discuss this motion on its merits before considering the estimates intrinsically. The motion reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) therefore suggests a comparison, but his resolution is so worded that it inevitably leads to a contradiction. How could we vote against this motion of want of confidence, and later vote against the appropriations that are being asked for? The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is that we should have first considered the present motion upon its merits, suggesting as it does a comparison between the amount of the defence estimates and the activities of the government as regards social welfare. There you have two major points calling for a conclusion which may exclude either an affirmative or a negative vote on the estimates.

In order to know whether these estimates are too large or not, let us see, in the terms of the motion, what the government has done in connection with social welfare. I always understood that the social welfare of a nation proceeded from a system of legislation giving the individual a feeling of mental and physical security wherefrom he derived full happiness. It means that if the social welfare policy of the present government answered the needs of our people, these estimates, always according to the terms of the resolution, would not be unreasonable.

You will admit that in discussing this question we must revolve within a limited circle, which I might even call a vicious circle. But I do venture to state that the social policy of this government should meet with the approval of all those who place the interest of their country above party contingencies.

The Liberal government, through its policies, its treaties, its agreements, the ever increasing volume of our trade and commerce, and conventions based on moderate free trade principles, gave rise to an evident feeling of sympathy towards Canada among other nations of the world: Agreements with the United States, Germany and France; the renewal of the Ottawa agreements on a more equitable basis; the statements of Right Hon. Mackenzie King at Geneva; the positive statements of our leaders concerning our absolute independence in case of a European war, all this ought to set our minds at rest.

As regards our domestic policy, both in the economic and the social spheres, we have had relief works, the Dominion Textile trust was brought to reason, prices improved, money is circulating more freely, loans were granted to the western provinces, a bonus was paid on wheat, there was a decrease in our federal deficits, and a satisfactory improvement in business as a whole. All these things, Mr. Speaker, make for a greater sense of security among our Canadian people than under the tory administration of 1930. And we should condemn it all through a vote of want of confidence in the government just because, this year, there is some fear that the increase in the defence estimates may reflect excessive imperialism? That is a conclusion which I cannot share.

The comparison is evidently defective, but we must take it such as it was presented to us by the hon. member for Vancouver North. Therefore, I shall vote against this motion. My mandate as a member of this house does not leave me any other alternative, for I was elected on the express understanding that I would support the government in its fair measures. But is this request for an increase of $14,000,000 in the defence estimates a fair measure? That is altogether a different question. Any man is loath to spend money to buy anything for purposes of destruction. It is with some hesitation that I find it unfortunately necessary to vote for these estimates. I have carefully listened to the speech of the hon. the Minister of National Defence, and I shall support certain appropriations which I consider reasonable, but I am reserving the right to appreciate later some other items the necessity of which I do not quite grasp at present. I shall discharge my duties and my responsibilities as a Canadian to the full, without the least egoist thought as to my personal political aggrandizement. While objecting most strenuously to Canada's participation in foreign wars, I am in favour of taking any steps that might be necessary for the preservation of our internal peace. I want the constituted authorities to be strengthened in such a way that they may be able to hold in check the revolutionary mob whose existence is not recognized in certain quarters but which is planning, under cover, to destroy our secular institutions, in order to raise upon their smoking remains, the haughty structure of their pagan universities and Godless schools.

I am also sceptical as regards the possibility of attacks from the outside, but I may ask those who refuse to believe in such a contingency to prove its impossibility. International events are such that no man can foretell what complications they may lead to. We even see our southern neighbours, protected as they are by their geographical position between two oceans, building up a great air fleet at an annual cost of several million dollars. On this subject, I believe we will simply have to adhere to the principle of the most elementary local protection, because it is materially impossible to think of militarizing Canada. I would indeed be relentlessly opposed to such a policy.

I am equally sceptical as to the true meaning of this armament policy. Are we moving towards a contributory imperialism? If we permit these estimates to be voted without any protest to-day, shall we, to-morrow be bound by a dangerous precedent? Should we also believe the statement made by the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain and reported in the morning papers in connection with the military estimates of 7 billion 500 million dollars voted in England, "that it is not the intention to invite the dominions to share in a common scheme of defence."

Here again, we must admit that accurate foresight is difficult. God only knows what the future has in store and we are powerless before His divine intents.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, upon what basis are we going to build up our knowledge and our conclusions? Whom are we going to believe? Whom are we going to trust? Shall we give credence to the demagogical outbursts of the Conservatives and their newspapers? Or to the sententious warnings of the nationalist press? Or again to the vain threats of certain associations financed by the tories and which, under the chaste cloak of patriotism, are carrying on an active propaganda against the federal Liberal party? Or lastly, to the whispers of a mob treacherously deceived by the false prophets of extreme nationalism, whose adherents will perhaps be the first to call upon our militia to save them from the anger of that mob, roused by them to a frenzy of demagogy?

Of course, Mr. Speaker, as one lone protest has reached me from my constituency, the only alternative left me is to give my full confidence to those who are responsible for the government of our country. To my mind, it would be an insult to question the true Canadianism of the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). His past behaviour bespeaks his future actions. And when he said these words which I find in Hansard, February 15, 1937, page 890:

I must deny categorically and immediately what my hon. friend has said.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had just made a statement.

There are no commitments and no understandings in the nature of commitments between this government and the government of Great Britain or any other government.

I fail to understand how anyone can doubt his word and conclude that our country is moving towards military imperialism. I cannot understand how certain newspapers, especially Le Droit in its issue of February 17, 1937, can make such statements as this one:

Can the Minister of National Defence give us the unconditional assurance that, notwithstanding his own intentions the new armaments he asks for will not be used in a war waged by England in Europe or elsewhere? Is he in a position to give us a concrete guarantee—

Let me emphasize that word concrete so as to show its sheer stupidity.

—that if, to-morrow, England were to be involved in a war, these new armaments will not serve any other purpose than the protection of Canada's neutrality in case of any attack against her own territory? In a word, can he tell us how these new armaments would be used in the event of war? Whatever the Minister of National Defence intends to do for the moment, he cannot give us any real assurance that these armaments will not be used in such a conflict.

The man who made that statement speaks ex-cathedra and he imputes to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) motives that he never had. I may say that the writer of this article, if he is not blind or deaf and if he is not determined to oppose to the end everything that is reddish and to extol everything that is bluish, should read, read over again, consider and reconsider the speech in which the Minister of National Defence states more than once that our armaments will only be used for the protection of our territory.

Let me quote what he says at page 904 of Hansard:

—to give us a small force to cooperate with our air force and our naval force for the protection of Canada, within Canada only.

And at page 906:

These are the actual details of the estimates. They are all for the purpose of coastal defence, and for increased equipment and for cooperation of militia services of Canada with the air force and naval forces for the protection of Canada, within our borders. I cannot make that sufficiently clear to hon. members of the house.

Then at page 907, he says again:

—this defence policy is a Canadian defence policy for the direct defence of our Canadian shores and our Canadian homes.

At page 903:

In the first place, our enlarged defence estimates are submitted only for the defence of Canada. In the second place, they are not arranged between Canada and any other nation.

In the third place, there has not been in connection with a single item of the estimates so submitted any request from any government in any other place whatsoever. In the fourth place, parliament itself must be the final judge as to Canada's participation in any future war—

Moreover let me say to the scribbler who signed the foregoing article that there are many more newspapermen of his calibre who take for gospel anything that smacks of criticism against the Liberal regime and who print on the 67th page news of the good deeds performed by a Liberal government. Would anything convince those gentlemen? Would they require the Prime Minister and his colleagues to execute a notarial document in the presence of 150 witnesses to the effect that they will reject all future commitments? As far as I am concerned, I have no reason to question the statements of the Hon. Mr. King and Mr. Lapointe, and I do not believe that our money will be used for a definite militaristic scheme. That question of the defence estimates amounts to a question of quantum. I have heard the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Before taking a stand on the advisability of certain items, I reserve the right to ask questions about them, and I hope his answers will sufficiently enlighten me, when the estimates are considered by the committee. And I will give the government, as our English speaking friends would say, a fair trial.

If unfortunately they were to deceive me, an occurrence that I fail to conceive, I would be the first to-morrow to denounce them as forcibly as I am defending them to-day. For, the only reward I can expect from politics is the conviction of having done my duty. I will always continue to work without flinching and without any animosity to preserve the freedom of my race and country; so that our people may live in order and peace; so that the dominion Liberal party may maintain his great traditions, based on a truly Canadian policy.

I am a Liberal, it is true, sir; but above all I am a Roman Catholic and a French Canadian. When I say that I am a Canadian, I mean that I want a truly self-governing Canada freely associated to the British commonwealth of nations. I am a Canadian to the core, I will never give up my sons, when they are old enough to be soldiers, for the sake of defending England or any foreign nation.

My Canadianism might be summed up in these words: nothing on earth will ever induce me to send out of the country these two little French Canadians whom I love more than anything else in the world so that they may fight for England or France; but I would consider them as cowards if they were not first in the front line of trenches to fight for Canada, for the land they are taught to love as true French Canadians.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the preceding speaker (Mr. Lalonde) will excuse me if I do not follow him in his remarks. Whatever their content may have been, I am quite sure that his speech was delivered in very good style.

Judging from the speeches that have been made in this chamber since the amendment was moved, Mr. Speaker, I think this group can take credit to itself for having given the members of this house an opportunity of expressing their views on the question now before us. Most of the discussion has not been altogether against our point of view. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in opening his speech on Monday evening, took strong exception to the form of the amendment. He called it a double-barrelled amendment. Let me read the amendment and see to what extent it is double-barrelled:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

The Minister of National Defence, having read the amendment, immediately referred to a resolution that was proposed in this house in 1933, and then, turning to the members behind him, he made this most peculiar statement, which you will find at page 896 of Hansard:

The hon. member for Vancouver North by his amendment is seeking to obtain power, because the carrying of his amendment would mean the defeat of this government; a socialist government would then be in control in this dominion, and we would have the establishment of a socialist state. That is what the amendment means, and nothing else.

Now, that may be good strategy on the part of the Minister of National Defence, but it is certainly not statesmanship. He may think a thing like that will go over with the province of Quebec, where the people may have been prejudiced against socialism, but let me tell him that it is not going to do for the people of this country generally. All that we do in this amendment is to draw attention to and say that we are opposed to the great increase in the military estimates in comparison with what has been done in regard to social services to meet the needs of the people of this country. If our amendment is double-barrelled the reason is that we are dealing with a two-faced government, a government that was elected not to increase the military appropriations for defence but to deal with the serious economic and social conditions within this country.

Mr. FINN: It is doing that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to see it.

Mr. FINN: Well, look about you.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is because I have looked about me that I say I cannot see it.

Mr. FINN: Your vision is not very broad.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is as broad as the dominion.

Mr. FINN: I hope so. I cannot see that far myself.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no reason why you should not; it is easy to travel.

Mr. O'NEILL: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; the hon. member will have forty minutes after I have finished.

The Minister of National Defence then went on to refer to the speech that was made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in reply to the cooperative commonwealth resolution of 1933. He drew our attention to the now famous fourteen points. I have refreshed my memory in regard to the fourteen points which were laid down by the leader of the opposition of that day, now the Prime Minister, and I find that the first of them did not deal with the lack of national security in this country. As a matter of fact, after reading all fourteen points and the whole of his speech, I could find nothing in it regarding national defence. I can find nothing in it referring to the unprotected condition of this country. The following was the right hon. gentleman's first point, which will be found at page 2510 of Hansard of 1933:

As unemployment is a matter of very great concern I shall give it first consideration.

Further on he says that the Liberal party is pledged to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance. But the very first thing this government did when they came into office, this government pledged to introduce a system of unemployment insurance, was to harpoon the efforts that had been made to put such a measure on the statute books of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that statement ought to go unchallenged. The statement that this government started in to harpoon the unemployment insurance scheme is surely wholly incorrect. The government merely sought to get an authoritative expression of opinion which would guide everyone in the country with respect to the legislation, and we have received it. We advised this course at the time the legislation was introduced.

Mr. MacINNIS: The government may have done that, but it did more than that. There are other ways in which we can get an expression of opinion as to whether or not a statute is within the powers of this dominion.

Evidently when this statement giving the fourteen points was made the right hon. gentleman thought that he could put unemployment insurance into effect. If not, why was the statement made? The act having been passed by this parliament, in my opinion it would have been much better to leave it in effect and have some body other than the government refer it to the courts.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, and spend millions of dollars before finding out whether the expenditures were legal.

Mr. MacINNIS: We might, and we might not. We have taken that course in other matters. That was the way it was done in connection with the Lemieux act. Had that been done, we might have found ways and means of giving effect to the legislation. We cannot do that now, until some more definite ways are found of changing it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes—illegal ways and unlawful means.

Mr. MacINNIS: When this government was not in office, the great need and the vital problem of this country, according to their spokesmen, was unemployment. However, when they are in office the great problem becomes the defence of the country, and we find them within eighteen months after their assumption of office, increasing military expenditures by 130 per cent. So the unemployed have an employment commission which does not do anything, and the military clique get the hard cash. I recall a motion made during the session of 1935 by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). It was not a motion of censure of the government of the day for not having dealt with the defence of the country; it was a motion of want of confidence in the government because that government had not taken steps to end unemployment. The motion, in which there is not a word about the need of national defence or the lack of armaments, is as follows:

That all the words after the word "That" in the motion be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets that, notwithstanding the specific promises made prior to the election of 1930, and many times since reiterated, and despite the fact that extraordinary powers to deal with unemployment have been repeatedly secured from parliament, the present administration, after nearly five years of office, has not yet submitted to parliament any definite or effective policy to deal with widespread actual unemployment or distress which continues to be Canada's most urgent national problem.

The situation to-day is practically the same. On reference to the figures given in the Labour Gazette of January, 1937, I find that there were more people on relief in November, 1936, than there were in November of 1935 or 1934. That being so, surely the urgent problem facing this country to-day is not national defence but unemployment.

In the course of his speech the hon. gentleman referred to various other motions that were moved in the house during the session of 1935. He quoted a motion made by his leader, the present Prime Minister, speaking in the debate on the address on January 21 of that year, asking that there be no further discussion on the address but to let the house get on and deal with unemployment. On January 28 of the same year the then leader of the opposition made the following amendment to the motion to go into supply:

That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that the immediate consideration of present conditions of unemployment and the introduction of measures of social and industrial reform should not be delayed or postponed by a consideration of supply in advance of the consideration of government policies with respect to unemployment and the introduction of measures with respect to social and industrial reform.

Yet, as I have said, although this government has been eighteen months in office there is not a word about unemployment or about social reform, but we have here an increase of 130 per cent in the military estimates. Surely the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) was entitled to bring that fact to the attention of the house and of the country.

The minister also criticized the hon. member for having drawn to the attention of this house the plight of many returned men who fought in the last war. I quite understand why the hon. member did so, because I know that he meets these men continually when he is home in his own constituency. I know, too, that he is meeting them here, and when he is not meeting them he is hearing from them.

Mr. FINN: You are a mind reader.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would say further that he is not meeting the same class of returned men as is the Minister of National Defence. He does not meet those men in the lobbies of the Hotel Vancouver and the Chateau Laurier; he meets them in other places.

Mr. FINN: Where?

Mr. MacINNIS: On the bread line.

Mr. FINN: Where is that?

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend's understanding of conditions in the dominion is worse than I thought it was if he does not know the whereabouts of a bread line in any city in Canada. In the Vancouver Province of January 23, 1937, I noticed this item:

Returned soldiers and their families are urgently in need of underclothes and shoes. If donors will phone the Returned Soldiers' Club, Seymour 7570, contributions will be called for.

Those are the men whom the hon. member for Vancouver North meets and who bring their problems to him. Those men are not concerned with the matter of military dress, which was the subject of a military order that was put on Hansard by the present deputy speaker (Mr. Sanderson). These men do not care whether ties are thirty-one inches long or not. They are concerned about the question whether they are going to have a shirt or a pair of shoes to wear. There is undoubtedly a difference between the returned soldiers with whom the minister, on the one hand. and the hon. member for Vancouver North, on the other, come in contact. In the military orders issued and put on the records of this house in 1935 by the present deputy speaker I find this item:

Paragraph 49, Dress Regulations for the Canadian militia, 1932, prescribes a black bow tie, and this paragraph is being amended by adding thereto the words "with square ends." Ties with pointed ends should not be worn, and the edges of the bow should be straight and parallel.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then section (C) reads:

Particular attention should be paid to the dimensions of the tie, which should be about two inches wide at the ends, and the length of the tie, in inches, should be twice the size of the collar, namely, an officer wearing a 15½ collar should wear a tie approximately 31 inches long.

The returned men the hon. member for Vancouver North had in his mind are not concerned whether the tie is thirty-one inches long or forty-one inches long. They are more concerned with having a shirt, with having a coat, with having shoes in which they can walk about in the Vancouver rain. These are the men he is interested in. It is no wonder he brings their troubles and miseries before this house. I can see the hon. member for Vancouver North when a returned man comes up to him, shabbily dressed, with no soles to his shoes, having to keep his coat collar up because he has no shirt on, and I can see the pained expression on the face of the hon. member—I have watched him—and he says, "Well my friend, I am sorry, but we are going to have 102 aeroplanes, just think of that. Your shoes may be bad, but look, we are going to have 102 aeroplanes to protect you." Protect him from what? They cannot protect him from poverty and misery, and if they cannot protect him from that they cannot protect him from anything. This returned man says to the hon. member, "Do you know where I can get a pair of cast-off shoes?" He replies, "Well, your shoes may be poor, but we are going to have mine sweepers in Vancouver harbour; just think of that! Never mind your shoes, just think of the mine sweepers." Should he not, and should we not bring those conditions to the attention of this house?

The Minister of National Defence, made reference to the resolution passed at the annual conference of the Labour party of Great Britain at Edinburgh this year. He gathered from that resolution that the Labour party in Great Britain was favouring the military program of the British government. But such is not the case. On page 906 of Hansard he quoted the resolution.

> That in view of the threatening attitude of dictatorships which are increasing their armaments at an unprecedented rate, flouting international law, and refusing to cooperate in the work of organizing peace, this conference declares that the armed strength of the countries loyal to the League of Nations must be conditioned by the armed strength of the potential aggressors.
> The conference therefore reaffirms the policy of the labour party,—
> Notice this:
> —to maintain such defence forces as are consistent with our country's responsibility as a member of the League of Nations.
> Note: "As a member of the League of Nations."

I was present at that conference, and the statement was made quite definitely that that amendment did not obligate the parliamentary Labour party to vote for increased armaments in the House of Commons. They were free to oppose them if they saw fit, and we see by to-day's Montreal Gazette that they have done that. In a report of the discussion that took place on the armaments increase in the British House of Commons yesterday, I find this:

> Frederick Pethick-Lawrence, a former financial secretary of the treasury, led for labour. He announced labour would vote against the resolution, due to two main reasons.

It is not necessary for me to state those reasons, but the fact is that labour is opposing the rearmament program of the British government, but would support a rearmament program if the British government would give wholehearted allegiance to the League of Nations. And not only is the Labour party opposing the British government in their rearmament program, but the Liberal party is opposing it.

> Sir Archibald Sinclair for the opposition Liberals pressed the point of foreign policy. He charged the country now was paying the price for the government's "feebleness and vacillation" in the Ethiopian dispute.

So there is no point in saying that the British Labour party is at present in favour of the government's rearmament program.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question? I was present at Edinburgh at the conference to which he refers. Is it not true that at that conference it was resolved by the Labour party to support the then rearmament program of His Majesty's government of the United Kingdom as distinguished from the decisions of the past week?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; it is not true.

Mr. MARTIN: I say it is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, we must differ on that point. The leader of the opposition, Major Attlee, made the statement quite clearly that the resolution then passed at the conference put the Labour party under no obligation to support the armament program of the British government.

Then the Minister of National Defence referred to Sweden. There is no comparison in this matter between Sweden and Canada. Sweden is an old nation which is very close to the centre of trouble in Europe. In Sweden most of their present armaments are of long standing. When the question of increase in military expenditures for the defence of Sweden came up in the Rigsdag last spring this is the position the social democratic party took. They said they would not consider external defence separate from internal defence; in other words they would not consider external defence separate from social security within. They had proposed a measure to increase old age pensions, and because they would not accept the rearmament program suggested by the opposition they were defeated. They went to the country and were returned, as was certain would be the case, with an increased majority. There is no comparison here to be made between Sweden and Canada.

Among the fourteen points of the Liberal platform I notice that regarding the last one, referring to our foreign relations, he said, "We would seek to further the League of Nations in its work." Unfortunately that part of the program has not been fulfilled, any more than that dealing with unemployment insurance. Almost the first thing they did after coming into office was to sabotage the league, and to a great extent the Canadian government is responsible for the position the League of Nations is in to-day

The Minister of National Defence told us there was no new policy and there were no increases; then he went on to tell us what the increases were. I have often wondered what are the uses of those increases in arms, planes and military equipment and supplies at the present time. I wonder how much protection the men who line up at Hamilton Hall, in my hon. friend's constituency, every day in order to get their handout of clothes are going to get under this scheme. In British Columbia we are going to be protected from the Japanese. In the prairie provinces we need aeroplanes to protect us against sporadic raids on our sources of food supply. In Quebec we are going to be protected from subversive elements. In a speech delivered in this city on February 10 of last year the Minister of National Defence said:

> There are two cardinal and guiding principles to be borne in mind when establishing a system of national defence; first, we must have the defence forces sufficient to control subversive elements from within and sufficient to repel attacks from without.

It is rather strange that in his address in the house on Monday evening of this week the minister made no reference at all to subversive elements. We were told that these increases in the military forces of the country were necessary in order to maintain our neutrality. Yet when the question of Canada remaining neutral in any future war was brought up in the house some weeks ago the government took the position that it would be impossible for Canada to say in advance that she would remain neutral under any circumstances, that no one could say whether or not we could remain neutral.

Now I should like to know what are the subversive elements for which we require such enormous increases. Evidently in 1936 this was the important point in the program of the Minister of National Defence, because he put it first. Is there any indication that the present forces in the country are inadequate to cope with any situation that may develop? In my opinion there is no more to fear from disorder within this country to-day than there has been at any time within the last twenty years; in fact I think there is less to fear. But who are the subversive elements against which we are going to guard ourselves, and can it be shown that an increased military force is a satisfactory way of dealing with them? Does the Minister of National Defence take the position that what he is pleased to call subversive elements "just growed" like Topsy in Uncle Tom's Cabin? Should he not take the modern view that cause and effect follow each other as a natural sequence? The modern way of dealing with unrest within a country is to try to find the causes of the unrest. If the minister would take a little time to associate himself with the people who do the work of this country he would soon find that there is reason enough for social unrest. If he would take time to read the briefs that have been presented before the textile inquiry he would acquire a better understanding of why sometimes people are driven to action which may be considered illegal, in an effort to remove their economic difficulties.

The textile commission was investigating conditions largely in the province of Quebec. Is it merely an accident that on the part of members from that province we find emphasis placed on the necessity of increasing armaments in order to preserve the country from subversive elements?—as one of those hon. members said the other evening, communist and labour troubles? For myself, after I read certain sections of the brief presented to the commissioner investigating the textile companies I came to the conclusion that if there are subversive elements at work within the province of Quebec those elements are not the communists or the labour organizations. They are the textile companies themselves. But I doubt very much if a bomber would be sent by this government to protect the workers from exploitation by those companies. I would point out also that, in our fast moving world, those who to-day are crying loudly for the putting down of subversive elements, to-morrow may find themselves to be the subversive elements. In consequence it behooves us to get busy and make an attempt to remove the conditions which generate subversive activities rather than to prepare to suppress such activities, which are more or less protests against intolerable conditions.

We are arming for defence. As the minister mentioned each increase in armaments, he told the house that they were for defence. The speakers on the government side of the house, when they attempted to defend the policy of the government at all, took the same line. Of course there is nothing new in that; all countries are arming for defence. Great Britain is arming for defence. The United States is arming for defence; Russia is arming for defence. Do not let us forget that following the discussion in the House of Commons in England yesterday with reference to their armament program, a man prominent in navy circles in the United States made the statement that in view of the increasing expenditure on arms in Great Britain the United States might also have to increase her armaments.

Mr. FINN: But the president did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: The president will be guided by his advisers, and this gentleman was one of his advisers.

Mr. FINN: What was his name?

Mr. MacINNIS: He was a rear admiral of the navy. I can give my hon. friend all the information he wants. I am referring to Admiral William D. Leahy, chief of naval operations, who made this statement, as quoted in the press:

> It is a fair presumption that if any other power expands its fleet the United States may find it necessary to do likewise.

This is the traditional policy of the United States, to maintain a navy second to none, which means that the United States navy must not be second to the British navy, regardless of our friendly relations. As I was saying, all the countries are arming for defence. Germany is arming for defence; Hitler says Germany is arming for the defence of the German people and their right to live. In a book I read recently the statement was made that Great Britain never engaged in a war of aggression, that all her wars were wars of defence. The author pointed out, however, that strange as it may appear Great Britain has come out of every war with increased territory and usually with a great deal of other booty as well.

Mr. FINN: Do you believe that?

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has done nothing but interrupt the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr MacInnis) since he began to speak, and the hon. member for Halifax has not once risen to his feet in order to express his interruptions properly. If the debates of this house are to continue along this line we will never get any business done at all. For the past half hour the hon. member has been in his seat and has done nothing but mumble and interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, and I say he ought to be reproved.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. FINN: What are you doing?

Mr. HEAPS: I will ask you to see, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who has the floor gets an opportunity to speak, as is the right of every hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Halifax said a few words, he did not speak very loudly. I thought the hon. member who is now speaking did not mind it very much, because he did not ask that the member who was interrupting be called to order.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are told, then, that we are not committed to taking part in any trouble overseas. That may be true at this time, but let us bear in mind that Great Britain is not actively engaged in war at the moment. As the law now stands the governor in council may send the militia anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for our defence. In this connection may I briefly refer to the militia act.

In the event of an emergency which section 2 (b) of the act defines as war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended, section 64 empowers the governor in council to place the militia or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

The emergency, if there is one, lies with the governor in council to determine. Before we know it, if we have armies and war equipment, they will be sent wherever they are needed. Speaking in the British House of Commons yesterday Mr. Neville Chamberlain said:

> So far as the dominions are concerned, it is not the intention to call upon the dominions to make any contribution to a common fund. The dominions, as a matter of fact, have spent a great deal of money—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I finish reading this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, let the hon. member finish.

Mr. MacINNIS: I shall continue:

> The dominions, as a matter of fact, have spent a great deal of money upon perfecting or improving their own defences, and that is their contribution to the common fund, but there is no other form of contribution, of which I am aware, under discussion at the present time.

So, you see there is a common fund to which the dominions contribute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. member a question? I did not like to interrupt him when he was speaking. He made a positive statement that one of the first acts of the present administration, after taking office, was to sabotage the League of Nations. Would he please tell the house in what way that is true?

Mr. MacINNIS: First of all, may I thank the Prime Minister for not interrupting me while I was speaking; I had plenty of interruption. I do not think the right hon. gentleman is at a loss to know to what I referred. Very shortly after he took office—possibly before he took office—the League of Nations decided to apply sanctions against Italy, and named her the aggressor in Abyssinia. Then the question of oil sanctions was raised in the council of the league. If there were anything necessary to stop Italy in Abyssinia, it would be the application of oil sanctions. This government repudiated the suggestion supposed to have been made by Canada's representative at Geneva. Could there be anything more calculated to give assurance to Italy that Canada was not with the league than this attitude with respect to the application of sanctions? It was a matter of giving comfort to the enemy, and I say in doing that Canada sabotaged the league.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of accuracy may I state that so far as the application of sanctions is concerned, the present government applied sanctions against Italy. So far as oil sanctions are concerned the present administration made it perfectly clear that the suggestion was not a Canadian suggestion, that it was a suggestion of a committee of the league, and that it was altogether wrong to say that the application of oil sanctions was Canada's project. There was nothing more than that, so far as the present administration is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not until December, though, that it was done.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was there any danger to Canada, even if it were Canada's suggestion?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If war had been declared or had spread as a result of the application of oil sanctions, would the hon. member have been in favour of Canada participating in that war?

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MERCIER: Answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, give me time.

Mr. MERCIER: Don't make a detour.

Mr. MacINNIS: This government applied sanctions. If war had resulted from the application of sanctions, what position would this government be in? The purpose of sanctions was to stop aggression in Abyssinia. The more absolute the sanctions applied, the greater the possibility of stopping aggression. Any action taken under the league might lead to war.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But suppose the hon. member is wrong, and there had been a war, would he have been in favour of participating in that war?

Mr. MacINNIS: Most certainly, in any action which Canada as a member of the league would take to protect another member of the league.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You must have some armament for that, though.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, but we are not using it for that purpose.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, every time a public man has to express an opinion or to advance a policy on a question of vital importance to his country, he must do it as fairly as possible. The satisfaction he may derive from seeing his name in all the papers, his concern about reelection, the more or less attractive reward that may be held out to him according to his attitude toward the party which he supports, in fact every personal consideration must give way to his duty as a representative of the people, and as a patriot.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to raise a point of order. The hon. member has just made a statement that I cannot let silently go by. From the outset, the hon. member sought to leave the impression that those who do not share his views are actuated by personal interest and a desire to reap some benefit from the party to which they belong. I cannot let such a statement pass without protest, and I ask, according to rule 41 of the Standing Orders, that the hon. member be called to order, and that he be reminded that he has no right to impute motives to others.

The hon. member is a newcomer in the House of Commons. He may have many things to learn yet; in the first place, politeness and decency. I do not impute motives to anyone, and I do not want to have any imputed to me. I let everybody free to express their views and I claim the same privilege. I am endeavouring to be polite, courteous and considerate, and I am expecting others to treat me likewise.

Therefore, I shall ask you, Mr. Speaker, under rule 41, and according to the Standing Orders of the house which preclude the imputation of motives to a fellow member, to call the hon. member to order, further that he be asked to withdraw the offensive words which he has just uttered, and that he be reminded that the debates of this house must not be disparaged by personal remarks.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order, I wish to state that the hon. member did not mention any member of the house in particular, and that he has a perfect right to comment upon previous speeches. The hon. member who opened this debate made no personal reference to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger)—

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): One speech on a point of order ought to be enough.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): If you will permit me, I shall quote the rule to which I have just referred in English, because I have not the French version before me. Here is what rule 41 says:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

And a little further, at page 97 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, number 207:

The imputation of bad motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

While addressing the house, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) stated clearly that those who did not share his views—

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): It is untrue.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): —that those who expressed opinions contrary to his own were probably actuated by personal motives and were likely seeking some reward for the services which they rendered the Liberal party. That is what I am objecting to, Mr. Speaker, and I ask that the member be called to order, and furthermore that he be asked to withdraw his statements.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order, I consider that it would be most unfair to call the hon. member to order. The house will divide, either to-night or to-morrow or later, on this motion which has been presented by the hon. member for Vancouver North.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER (Translation): I do not think that the hon. member for Portneuf, in the course of his remarks, has mentioned the name of the hon. member for Bellechasse. I listened to him attentively, and while there was some noise in the house, I do not think that his remarks can be construed as being meant for any particular member of the house who has previously spoken on this question.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North, I had no other purpose than that of expressing openly my views, and I am sure that they will be respected as much as I respect those of others. May I hope, sir, that the stand I am taking will be well understood by my political leaders, whom I still trust, even though I may not share their views on the advisability of increasing these estimates, also by those who are from another race than my own, and by others whose political faith is different from that to which I boast to belong since I entered public life.

I was born, and I live in a French-Canadian province which is part of the Canadian confederation. Although proud of being a French-Canadian, I am proud also of being a citizen of Canada. And I dare believe that following the observations I wish to offer to this house, I shall have no apology to make, no regret, and that I shall still have the satisfaction of being able to face my compatriots, whether in the province of Quebec or in any other province of this dominion.

The motion of the hon. member may be divided into two parts, for the object of this discussion. Thus the first one:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament—

And the second one:

—in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

Judging by the several speeches which have been delivered in this house, it is clear that the majority do not consider this increase as being unreasonable; on the contrary, that it is necessary and that it is our urgent duty to support it with all the strength of which a real patriot is capable. A smaller number of hon. members believe that we are not financially in a position to ask the Canadian people to vote, through their representatives in parliament, another 14 millions for national defence, that there is not such an immediate threat of invasion, and that our geographical position protects us somehow against any ambitions on the part of other nations. Mr. Speaker, I share these last views and I shall vote against the increase in the defence estimates.

We hear some people say: Of course, if an increase of a few millions to make our army more up to date and more efficient amounted to a declaration of war, or if it were likely to lead us to war, we would be the first to vote against it; but let us hope that we would be consistent enough not to give a vote of confidence in the government immediately after voting against an increase in the defence estimates. Mr. Speaker, since when does the Liberal platform consist exclusively in a plan of national defence? Why would it be inconsistent to vote confidence in the government, and at the same time to vote against the increase of military estimates only?

The Liberals have never known of any bondage within the ranks of their party, and Canadian Liberalism owes its strength to the fact that it has no limitations of any kind. All the honourable members are, as I am myself, opposed to participation in foreign wars, but should war break out to-morrow and the empire be involved in it, they cannot tell in advance that Canada would not follow the same course as in 1914. Unforeseen circumstances will again cause the boundaries of Canada to be shifted perhaps beyond Flanders.

Let me quote a statement made on the 5th instant by Sir Samuel Hoare, first lord of the admiralty, as reported by the Canadian Press:

> Speaking at a dinner of the Bradford chamber of commerce, Sir Samuel stated the sister states of the empire would find any system of isolated local defence extravagant and inefficient.

I shall quote at once a few comments by Sir Wilfrid Laurier upon the Guthrie amendment to Bill No. 21, introduced during the 1912-1913 session, by Sir Robert Borden, prime minister. On page 7232 of Hansard, Sir Wilfrid is reported as having said:

> I now come to a consideration of the fact, made manifest by one of the last speeches of Mr. Churchill, that the admiralty favours contribution and not autonomous organization. This is not a new thing: the British admiralty has always preferred a system of imperial contribution to the idea of autonomous organization. At the imperial conference in 1902, Lord Selborne, the predecessor of Mr. Churchill, made a proposal that we should have imperial contributions.

In 1902, in 1912, in 1937, the outstanding men who have successively discharged the duties of first lord of the British Admiralty took an entirely similar view. Sir Robert Borden shared this opinion and requested the House of Commons to vote 35 million dollars as a contribution to the naval forces of the empire. Laurier had gone down to defeat on the navy issue and he, a Liberal who believed in expenditures for this country's own defence, put up a stout fight for the triumph of his views. And we saw men who had fiercely opposed him in Quebec, we saw erstwhile nationalists turn Conservatives overnight and vote for the policy of a contribution to the empire. That was not Laurier's policy, and that is not, it seems to me, the present government's policy.

On August 4, 1914, war broke out. What did Canada do? Even those who had helped to defeat Laurier forgot their speeches on behalf of the Canadian homeland, even prominent supporters of Laurier forsook him in order to join the Union government and vote for war.

In spite of the oft-repeated assurance that national service registration would not lead to conscription, compulsory military service was established here, (I don't say that in the house) What happened, sir?

To-day, trustworthy men are governing Canada. Their policy is Canadian, as was Laurier's policy, but nevertheless Canadian blood was shed in Flanders. A country with a population of 10 million inhabitants, overcome by war fever and imperialistic enthusiasm, raised within a few months a large army. Public men who had unflinchingly opposed our participation in foreign wars voted for the dispatch of troops to help the empire. Circumstances were beyond human control, events were compelling men to act against their own will and Canada became involved in a foreign war. Such sacrifices were made by an unprepared country.

The vote we are called upon to give on the increase in our military estimates is one that expands not only our defensive power, but also our contributing capacity whenever the alarm is raised. And should the same thing happen, should events compel our leaders to act against their own will, it would be too late then to oppose armaments and to make known our refusal to participate in a foreign war in which the empire would be involved. It would be too late then to prevent war preparations and in the excitement that seizes a people in time of war, we would hear again the words: "Aye, Aye, ready."

How much more will the lords of the admiralty, encouraged by circumstances and events, be tempted to play upon Canadian feelings when our country is so prepared as to be able to give a contribution more in keeping with their requirements. Now is the time to give them a warning.

Some might think that the importance of this debate is being overexaggerated. I would vote as willingly as anyone the millions which are requested if we had not such a heavy national debt, if we had a larger population to take care of taxes, and if work were more plentiful.

Why should Canada, at a time when she envisions a brighter future, when she is recovering her faith in her destinies thanks to an essentially Canadian policy, why should our country be halted on her triumphal march against economic and financial difficulties? Why should a war threat, originating not here but outside, introduce feelings of uneasiness and uncertainty about the future, into her now confident mind. She needs all her strength, all her energy if she is to win an ultimate victory, and emerge from the chaos of the post-war depression. Let those who are in favour of armaments and war carry on, if they wish, their unending quarrels. As for us, we want peace and we wish they would let us work peacefully towards securing unity and prosperity for the Canadian people. Many years ago, Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald said in an address delivered before the American congress: "We are all overarmed."

Personally, I believe that this debate and this vote are of the utmost importance and if I am taking such a stand on this question, the reason is that I have somewhat studied the history of European and many other countries. I have witnessed, as everyone has, the mournful events that have occurred since 1914 and if the same thing is to happen again, I want my vote to result neither directly nor indirectly in the participation of Canadian men in a war that would be none of our concern.

Mr. LACOMBE: Hear, hear!

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not presume, Mr. Speaker, to think that my vote may prevent war or my country's participation in a foreign war. Others in this house voted against conscription, which was nevertheless passed by parliament.

But they availed themselves, as I am doing now, of the right to state frankly their views, and their names have not been banished from the minds of their compatriots as if they had betrayed their country.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

But war has not broken out, and I might be told to wait before passing judgment. I am waiting, Mr. Speaker, trying meanwhile to secure information about the opinions that are being entertained within the empire, in view of the so urgent need of armaments. On the 7th instant, the following statement—reported by the Canadian Press in cooperation with the Havas agency—appeared in the London Sunday Times:

Possibility of the dominions sharing expenses of the new rearmament program.

The dominions, the paper says, "could not, for example, continue to enjoy the priceless advantage of her fleet protection if they allowed Great Britain to be crushed through the air, British rearmament is at present a heavy charge on the taxpayer, the contribution now being four times that of 1914, when Great Britain already had the highest tax rate in the world.

"The burden of armaments will be far heavier than in any period of peace in our history. The line of security is to survey and utilize as far as possible the resources of the whole empire for the empire's defence."

Such is the opinion put forward by a London paper, and at this time when all nations of the British Commonwealth are arming, the writer believes, so it seems, that when England launches a program of armaments, Canada and the other parts of the empire should follow suit.

In a recent article published in the Montreal Star, we could read the following:

(Text) The French Canadians are not alone in asking to be shown that they should fight in any particular war. That is the attitude of all the people in this hemisphere. When the Great war broke suddenly on the world in August, 1914, Canada prepared with splendid promptness to send an expeditionary force. Her leader knew that they simply must do it—that it was literally a matter of life or death, but her people did not. Eighty-five per cent of the first regiments that sailed for Salisbury Plain were old countrymen. What did this very significant circumstance show? Clearly that the old countrymen resident in Canada responded automatically to the call when the flag went under fire. That is the European psychology. But the Canadians took time to look into the situation and think it over. When they were convinced that it was their fight they responded nobly—but not until they were convinced. French Canada as a whole was never convinced. Many French Canadians were, however, and many of them went and died gallantly on the field of battle.

But the Canadians took time to look into the situation and think it over. When they were convinced that it was their fight they responded nobly, but not until they were convinced.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that they should never be convinced to go abroad, and in doing my utmost to convince them, should an external war break out in the future, to stay here in Canada and keep their strength and their blood for their own country, I am convinced that I would be doing my duty. French Canada as a whole was never convinced —(translation) but conscription convinced them, English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians, that they had to go, and many of them went to be killed in defence of democracy and of the empire. They could not resist circumstances and events, and I wonder if those who died on a foreign soil would find exaggerated the importance of this debate during which Canadians like them, who do not wish to see their fellow citizens, perhaps their sons, go through the same sad experience, are trying in every way to explain their point of view. I wonder—I fear not their judgment—if they would brand us as traitors or unpatriotic.

Needless for me to mention over again the arguments brought forward by the honourable members who spoke before me on the possibility of having to cope with trouble from within our own territory. I believe the increased strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the finest police organization in the world, would keep us sheltered from danger. But. Mr. Speaker, and here I am dealing with the second part of the motion under discussion, certain agitations can be prevented, not by force but by a well organized, constant, fearless and intelligent struggle. You will gather from this that I wish to refer to the menace of communism.

The second part of the motion of the honourable member for Vancouver North reads as follows:

> In contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

In this, Mr. Speaker, I see an oratorical precaution and a socialistic anxiety.

The Almighty has decreed the existence of classes differing intellectually, financially and socially. To think that everybody is equal, that all the minds are equally brilliant, that man is endowed with qualities that exist and find their expression to the same degree, is only a dream.

Those who tried to make humanity believe the opposite was possible were the real founders of the socialistic idea, the first open door to the large communistic structure.

Class antagonism marked the beginning of their activities. The First Internationale was organized in the early fifties of the nineteenth century, when an industrial exhibition was in progress in London.

When Karl Marx issued his famous call: "Proletarians of all nations, unite," the socialists and communists began their activities. To achieve its purpose, the Neo-Messianian School, to which belonged Heine and Marx, was striving to materialize the religious aspirations of an entire race.

And this was being accomplished inasmuch as possible in the silence of cells, where the communistic poison was flowing abundantly.

Disturbances fomented here and there for the purpose of making an important catch or humbling those who were called the tyrants of proletariat, and the same insidious propaganda was recurring. In the meantime, the Second Internationale was established. Jaurés was one of its chief propagandists. He was even making use of the Bible and going down mine pits with it to preach his gospel where the proletarians were at work.

Years went by, then came the Third Internationale, the one responsible for the downfall of the Czars, the one that is trying to upset the political economy of the whole world.

The real important work is not done by force; it is the cells hidden behind various appellations which, in displaying a feverish diligence and a wonderful perfection of organization, spread the materialistic idea, the idea without morality, the idea without authority, the idea without God. The family has always been the object of their attention. Destruction begins there; this is where they prepare the masses by breaking the sacred bonds of family. We have to meet them there and defeat them by persuasion, sound morality and real Christian charity as our sole weapons.

In my province, young men's associations have begun the fight, a fair, gallant and patriotic fight for the preservation of race and nationality. Let us arm and assist them, and should any socialistically-inspired legislation whatsoever jeopardize their task of renovating and reconstructing, let the representatives of the people vote with courage, even if in their midst, hypocritical followers, while not deserting them, support them faintly in their endeavours, or even go so far as placing obstructions in the way often, like Jaurès with the Bible, ably interpreted, and in the name of every thing that is most sacred.

Socialism and communism have nowhere created a Garden of Eden, and despite their brilliant and sometimes delusive appearance, they only bring trouble, misery and the loss of one's illusions.

A great Spanish prelate said: "Give an illusion to the distressed and a pretext to the hot-headed, and you will have a revoluton."

Let our administrators assist the distressed through fair and careful legislation and let not the hot-headed find any pretext in this legislation. Such is our duty. A great Canadian patriot once said: "Future is not a fact; we have to create it ourselves." Being the humble representative of a rural constituency, I do not claim to be a creator but, as representative of the people, my first and only thought is their peace and happiness.

Mr. Speaker, I regret the incident that occurred at the beginning of my speech. I wonder how the words spoken by me could have been construed as an attack upon one of the honourable members. I am not a lawyer, but a humble country doctor and notwithstanding my knowledge of medicine and neurology, I am unable to do any kind of mind-reading, and I ask those who know me—there are several here—why should I be blamed for entertaining a thought that I never had?

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) (Translation): Mr Speaker, I hope that in the course of the brief remarks I intend to make on the matter under discussion, I will not be interrupted on a point of order especially if it is raised by a member of the party to which I belong. I have great respect for the opinions of all those who spoke before me and all I ask of my colleagues is to respect mine. Before I proceed any further, I am bound to say however that the speeches I heard induced me to select my leaders; that selection I made a long time ago, but I am convinced that my country would be well advised to ignore the advice or the policy suggested by the honourable members for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent), for Laval-Two Mountains, (Mr. Lacombe), for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and other members of the C.C.F. party. In the best interests of my country, I think I should follow the advice given us by the members of the present government who, in the past, have given sufficient proofs of their devotion to their country and of their knowledge of Canadian international politics.

For the past two days, the object of this debate seems to have shifted. I have always been under the impression that the motion that the house go into committee of supply and the amendment to that motion called for consideration of the increase in defence estimates. I find, however, that many members who spoke on that question have not limited their observations to that increase but have considered the matter from the point of view of Canada's participation in foreign wars, of the sending of expeditionary forces and even of effecting direct contributions to the mother country. To one who knows that for forty years a nationalist movement has been organized in the province of Quebec for the purpose of throwing Canadian politics into confusion, especially when the Liberal party was in power, that shift in the discussion is no surprise.

Twice we have contributed to imperial wars since confederation. First in 1899, when a Canadian contingent was sent to the Transvaal to take part in a war which many people thought unjust. I have often wondered, in pondering over history, if the leader of my party was not yet at that time imbued with that colonial spirit which made it compulsory to take part in the imperial wars. As soon as that contingent had departed, the nationalist movement came into life under the leadership of very brilliant men, in the province of Quebec, with the result that, in 1911, the Liberal government which had decided to build for our national defence a few ships, some cruisers and torpedo boats for the protection of our coasts, had to face a furious attack on the part of the nationalists.

In that election, the Liberal party lost 25 seats in the province of Quebec. The Canadian navy in that province and the reciprocity treaty in the western provinces were the main issues during the electoral campaign. The slogan in the western provinces was: No truck, no trade with the Yankees.

When these 25 members took their seats in the House of Commons they were determined to vote against any participation in imperial wars. The following year, the new government voted a direct contribution of $35,000,000 to help the British navy. I do not think that more than three or four of the 25 members which had been elected to prevent Canada of helping or taking part in foreign or imperial wars voted against this contribution of $35,000,000. And then the same men who advocated in the province of Quebec that exaggerated nationalism announced that they were admirers of the empire and that they had become imperialists.

I was in Ottawa when war broke out in 1914. Parliament was summoned immediately, two or three days later 50 millions were hastily voted and Canada was engaged in an imperial war. Our contributions to the great war increased ever since and they finally led to conscription. Our contribution to the great war and conscription have been used as an argument by those who criticize now the increase in the defence estimates. I do not blame them because they seem to confuse the expressions "increase in defence estimates" and "participation in imperial wars."

I will endeavour, in the course of my remarks, to give my own opinion on this subject. I am not a country doctor; I am just a lawyer who tried to learn the history of his country and to give to his fellow-citizens the benefit of whatever experience he had acquired in this house. After the great war, the whole world hoped for eternal peace but to-day, after nearly twenty years of peace I find the same spirit of militarism still rampant.

Coming back to what I said about the part taken by Canada in two foreign wars, I want to mention the fact that it happened at a time when our expenditures were at their lowest and when we were least prepared for war. In 1899, at the time of the Transvaal war, our militia estimates were practically nil. Did the lack of militia estimates prevent us from taking part in that war? Not at all. In 1914, following the 1911 period and after the bill respecting our contribution of $35,000,000 had been defeated in the Senate, we were still finding ourselves in a period where no provision had been made towards national defence. Did that prevent parliament from voting in favour of our participation in that imperial war? Not at all.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should make a distinction between these two matters: "Increase in the estimates for the protection of our country," and "participation in imperial wars, sending expeditionary forces or making direct contributions to Great Britain."

We should consider now what will be the future status of our country. We are part of the British Empire. Are we satisfied to belong to the commonwealth of British nations? Personally, I am.

Our world status could be settled in two different ways. We should endeavour to obtain an effective commercial and economic protection. We might become an integral part of the republic to the south. I cannot accept that plan. We might gain our independence right now. If the Canadian parliament were to proclaim its independence, I have no doubt that Great Britain would be at a loss to find means to prevent a nation of eleven million people from proclaiming its independence while at the same time maintaining bonds of friendship with her. We have to choose between those three policies. Are we to become independent? What would our independence mean in the world, from a military standpoint? Do you think that we would enjoy the sympathy of our great neighbour to the south if we were not sheltered by the might of the British commonwealth of nations? I wonder if the United States would still have the same consideration for Canada. Because we are a growing nation, because we have not yet reached the phase of maturity and because we still have to rely on somebody else for the development of our territory, we must not as yet become independent. Surely our population is too small to defend the country against an aggressor.

Could we be an integral part of the United States without increasing our defence estimates? Do you believe for one moment, Sir, that the United States would let us sit quietly without contributing our share of taxation for the defence of our common territory? Considering that the United States are spending 400 million dollars to increase their navy, do you think that we would be exempt from contributing our share of taxes for such armaments? Being a part of that great republic we would be submerged by their 120 million inhabitants and we would pay our share of all future wars, which may not happen but which nevertheless cost money. We would have to make those expenses but our say in the matter would be that of ten or eleven million people as against 120 millions; our influence would only be a twelfth or a thirteenth of what we have to-day as part of the British Empire. To-day, we have an autonomous parliament. If we are allowed to express such different views as have been heard in the last few days, it is due to the fact that we have a free parliament. We can approve or denounce any measure brought down by the government. Such is our present status.

Now let us look at other countries of the world. What do we find? At the present time nations are divided into two groups. We have, first, the empires possessing vast territories: Great Britain, France, Russia, United States. How have Great Britain, France and Russia acquired their territories? By resorting to violence, to war. If Great Britain is in possession of our country to-day, it is through conquest; if she holds India, it is through force; if she took possession of Australia, it is through occupancy; if she is in possession of Transvaal and South Africa, it is the result of war.

Look at the great French empire in Africa. You will find that it is the result of conquest. Russia has conquered Siberia and other parts of Asia. United States have not so many possessions. But how have they acquired them? West Indies, Cuba, which is under their protectorate, the Philippines are all in their power as a result of the Spanish war. If those nations have been able to extend their territories in the world and if their citizens have secured the trade of the conquered countries and are consequently in a position to do business in all parts of the world, if those nations have acquired all those possessions, it is through war.

Do you think that in the other group of nations, including Germany, Italy and Japan, no men could be found who have not been thinking and studying history and reaching the same conclusions as we have? Those three nations, stifled in their boundaries, will some day enlarge their possessions by resorting to violence, armaments, war and conquest. Take the last two instances of invasions: Manchuria, conquered in order to provide an outlet for Japanese citizens; and the conquest of Ethiopia, the natural resources of which England and France coveted. But those two great powers, rather than start a world war, let Italy take possession of that immense area in which she could pour her surplus population.

Germany is overcrowded. She demands colonies. She casts greedy eyes on Poland. She is preparing for war and is armed up to the teeth.

Do you think the nations in the latter group, dissatisfied with their lot and jealous of other great powers, have been arming in order merely to have the satisfaction of looking at fine soldiers parading the streets? Those nations follow the example set by the nation to which we all belong. War will break out some day. Let us still hope that it will not be too soon and that we will not be called upon to participate in it.

I would now like to make a statement, sir. As a matter of principle, I am opposed to foreign wars, to our participation in wars fought in Europe, Africa or Asia. But I will not admit that, being an integral part of the British Empire, in the event of our territory being invaded, we should stand aloof. I am in favour of defending the Canadian territory. If the day ever comes when we must defend it, I want to be in the position of the man who buys insurance, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) said, I want to take the insurance before any accident happens. I want a little protection at home.

On that question of defence estimates, I have been and I am consulting every day electors in my constituency, and I will tell you an incident which confirms my own views. In our town, we have one of the finest regiments in Canada. That regiment has been in existence for more than twenty years, but without quarters suitable to its normal development. On more than one occasion, we have asked for a drill hall in Hull in order to accommodate our regiment.

[Mr. Fournier.]

Before approving the scheme, I asked its promoter to ascertain what the general opinion was and to inform me if a majority of the population, of organizations and of persons of standing in my constituency were in favour of the proposal. The movement was started in the spring of 1935. I asked the leading organizations in my district for their opinion before taking a stand myself. The archbishop of the diocese has been approached on that question by Mr. Thomas Moncion, chairman of the Senior Chamber of Commerce. I have a copy of a letter addressed by Mgr. Forbes to Mr. Moncion, on May 13, 1935, and I will read it:

May 13, 1935.

Mr. Thomas Moncion,
Chairman of the Senior Chamber of Commerce,
Hull, Que.

Dear Sir:

Having been acquainted with the request that the Hull Senior Chamber of Commerce has the intention of presenting to the dominion government for the building of a drill hall in the city of Hull, it gives me great pleasure to encourage such a movement and to wish it success. I will go so far as encouraging it by means of the present letter. It seems to me that a drill hall is essential in Hull, because of the existence of a regular regiment. Its construction would provide work for the numerous unemployed in the city; and the existence of such a building would be useful to the city of Hull in various occasions, in addition to giving accommodation to soldiers.

Believe me yours religiously,
(Signed) Guillaume Forbes,
Archbishop of Ottawa.

A few days ago, after the defence estimates had been brought down in the house, my parish priest wrote to me as follows, under date of January 30, 1937:

Les Missionnaires Oblats de
Marie-Immaculée,
Presbytère Notre-Dame-de-Grâce,
Hull, Que., January 30, 1937.

Mr. Alphonse Fournier, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Fournier:

Those interested in the plan have asked me to write a letter for the purpose of recommending the building of a drill hall in Hull. I willingly grant that request.

The Hull Regiment, in existence for many years, has so far been accommodated in rented quarters, while, in other cities, military units have suitable buildings. In consequence it seems only reasonable that the Hull regiment have their own drill hall, considering moreover that the project would have the effect of relieving unemployment in these times of distress.

For those two reasons, it is with pleasure that I approve the request that has been sent to you.

Believe me yours truly,
(Signed) Alcide Béland, o.m.i.,
Parish Priest.

But I was not content with obtaining an expression of opinion from my archbishop and my parish priest, I also sought the views of the Conservative member for Hull at Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: National?

Mr. FOURNIER: Not the National, but the Conservative party. Here is his letter:

Hull, P.Q., February 1, 1937.
Mr. Alphonse Fournier, C.R., M.P.,
Hull, P.Q.

Dear Sir:

I take the liberty of writing you to state that I heartily endorse the plan for a drill hall in the city of Hull. I understand that the larger cities in the province of Quebec have a drill hall and I trust the federal government will think of Hull this year.

I invite attention from the ministers on this point.

This drill hall meets a real need and I trust your efforts will be crowned with success.

I will find it a pleasure and make it my duty to join at any time any delegation calling on the Minister of National Defence.

Alexandre Taché, M.P.P.

I will go a step further: L'Association Catholique des Voyageurs de Commerce in my home town goes the length of adopting a resolution and writes me the following letter:

Hull, January 30, 1937.
Mr. Alphonse Fournier, M.P.,
Hull, P.Q.

Dear Sir:

The O.V.C. of Notre-Dame de Hull was pleased to learn of your efforts in an endeavour to obtain a drill hall for our city.

Commendable efforts on the part of all our associations failed a few years ago to obtain such a favour from the government. We venture to believe that we will be fortunate in our present endeavour.

Although opposed to any militaristic idea or imperialistic tendency, the A.V.C. is glad to give its support that the city of Hull may obtain a drill hall such as other cities have enjoyed for long years past.

You will recall the date on which the National Defence estimates were brought down.

A resolution to that effect was adopted last evening, January 29, at our regular meeting.

Assuring you, sir, of our deep consideration, we beg to remain

Faithfully yours,
L'A.C.V. de Notre-Dame-de-Hull,
Georges-H. Grondin,
President.

Mr. LAPOINTE: January of this year?

Mr. FOURNIER: Yes, January 30, 1937.

Mr. DUPUIS: They have changed their minds.

Mr. FOURNIER: Now, so as to obtain adequate support for my argument before the house, I also approached l'A.C.J.C., my home town branch being the Groupe Reboul, and they also wrote supporting the plan. Only, as young men, I admire their perspicacity: foreseeing the discussion which was to take place in this house, they wrote:

Hull, P.Q., January 28, 1937.
Mr. Alphonse Fournier, M.P.,
Main St.,
Hull, P.Q.

Dear Sir:

We have recently learned from the press that the question of constructing a drill hall in our city was being seriously considered. Some influential people in this city as well as a particular association have looked favourably upon the projected execution of this work.

May we be allowed in turn to request your support for this purpose? It is true that in these markedly unsettled times, when everyone talks only of conflicts, this might seem, in the eyes of some people, to be of bad omen, but as it does not appear to us to be the opportune moment for passing judgment on the various opinions which may be entertained—which we have been satisfied to do amongst ourselves—we will limit ourselves simply to request your support for this plan because it will be a source of employment for several unemployed and it will endow our city with a beautiful building.

We trust you will give consideration to this request and thanking you in anticipation of your usual kind attention, we beg to remain

Faithfully yours,
Le Groupe Reboul de Hull,
Aurèle Cousineau,
President.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER: But I went a bit further, I approached the still younger group, I called on the Jocistes:

Hull, January 30, 1937.
To Mr. Alphonse Fournier, M.P.,
Hull, P.Q.

La Jeunesse Ouvrière, Section Notre-Dame, endorses the proposed drill hall for the city of Hull.

Louis Raymond Cousineau.

Having previously had to deal with the young people, I endeavoured to see the older ones, and a resolution was passed by the Saint-Jean-Baptiste Society in my own city, requesting that a drill hall be built in our locality. I shall not read the whole letter, but in it is contained a restriction to the effect that they are not imperialists, that they do not wish to take any part in wars, claiming however that the construction of a drill hall in Hull would in no way affect a declaration of war on the part of Canada or Great Britain at a future time.

I have also a letter from The National Catholic Union. Then come the more sedate citizens in my city—the municipal council—who passed the following resolution, on the 1st February, 1937:

That this council supports the resolution passed by the Hull chamber of commerce under date of January 22, 1937, in connection with the building of a drill hall in Hull, and that copy of the present resolution be sent to Mr. Fournier, member of parliament.

Certified to be a true copy from the minutes of the Hull city council.

Clerk.

The small property owners' association have no apprenhension as to the building of a drill hall in our community. I am in receipt from them of a resolution requesting my support for the proposal. The Sons of Canada, a well-known organization in our country, passed a lengthy resolution giving their hearty support to the building of the drill hall, and adding: Even though a drill hall were built in Hull, do you think that the government shall at once declare a war or participate in a war? Not at all; I do not think so; no more than I am of the opinion that in passing the present estimates the government's intention is to declare a war on any one whatsoever or to take part in a foreign war. It requires far-fetched arguments to lead one to believe that such a slight increase of 15 million dollars may rouse the world to the extent of leading to a world war at the end of this session. I do not think so.

So as to forget none, I shall proceed. The most widely read paper in my own city is Le Droit, published in Ottawa. I have here an article under the signature of Mr. Henri Lessard who is in charge of the editorial page devoted to Hull. Mr. Lessard is not an imperialist; he is opposed to foreign wars, as well as to any expeditionary forces being sent for participation in a war in Great Britain, in Europe, or elsewhere. This is what he has to say:

The building of a drill hall in Hull would not necessarily mean a greater drive towards militarism or imperialism. In fact, for years past we have had in Hull a local regiment, a regiment which forms part of the non-permanent militia and of which our city is justly proud as a result of the fame this corps has won as well as for the part it takes in connection with our various public ceremonies, both civil and religious. The regiment is a French Canadian one.

[Mr. Fournier.]

The article from which I have just quoted is dated the 29th of January, when the national defence estimates were laid on the table of the house. Mr. Lessard concludes as follows:

We are surely not spoiled by the dominion government, whose seat is close to us; they know or should know what our requirements are. Let us hope that this time we shall be given more favourable consideration. It surely would not be once too many.

In all fairness to the author of that article, I may say that a few days ago he called me up over the phone and inquired as to what was my stand in connection with the debate now taking place. I replied that I was listening with an attention, at which I was wondering myself, to every speech delivered in the house and that I was endeavouring to find, in the arguments offered on both sides, a happy medium, in other words, such a solution as should be arrived at by a government fully aware of their responsibilities at the present time, in connection with military matters. Naturally, his telephone call is being answered to-day. I am in favour of the 14 million dollars increase. I do not want the government to continue along these lines next year, but having closely followed the debates in this house and knowing as I do the leaders of my party, I am safe in saying that they would be ashamed of the statements made by them since the opening of the session, had they not spoken the truth. In support of my contention, may I quote from a speech delivered by the leader of the Liberal party. I would rather believe in his words than in anything said by the members of C.C.F. group, or even by my colleagues in the Liberal party. This is what he tells us—believe it or not: I always believe a man until such time as I am satisfied that I am deceived by him. Then, we have what the right honourable the Prime Minister stated when speaking to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth):

As far as the estimates presented to parliament at this session are concerned, any increase placed there has been only and solely because of what the government believe to be necessary for the defence of Canada, and for Canada alone.

And then:

No request of any kind has come from the British government to our government with respect to a single item that appears in the estimates as they have been brought down.

Would the Prime Minister mislead, not only the public, but the members of his own party? I do not think so. Would the honourable the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) involve us in a foreign war? I do not think he would.

Are the four ministers from the province of Quebec inspired by militaristic or imperialistic ideas? It would be a repudiation of all their past, a surrender of the political ideal they have extolled and preached for the last 35 or 40 years. Would it be possible to believe that these men, who have attained the zenith of their political career and—some of whom are in their declining years, would come before the parliament of their country and deceive their faithful supporters? If it were true, I would lose all confidence in human organizations. Do you think that they would come before the parliament of their country to say openly: "Let us vote 14 million dollars" while they would be whispering to us: "Do not say it, but it is for the purpose of sending an expeditionary force to fight in England"? There are people who go on repeating that our public men have debased themselves on the point of making utterances before the parliament of their country contrary to their own views. I am one of those who would abandon their own party if I thought that the present government could be so insincere. There are some people and representatives of certain organizations who are now going through the length and breadth of our province and are advising the people as they have done before, but they will have to admit, as they have done in the past, before crowded meetings, that they have become reconciled with the former leader of the Liberal party. Why did they make their peace with him if they were right before? I sincerely believe that it is not the members of the present government who are insincere but rather those who, in the hope of getting the upper hand in our province, neglect none of the means which might make them succeed, and stoop to all kinds of stratagems for the purpose of misleading the people. I am convinced that I express truthfully the sentiments of the population of our province.

Now, as I want to cover the whole question, I must say that I have received a resolution passed by the junior chamber of commerce of the city of Hull, in which they express their opposition to the construction of a drill hall in our city on the ground that they have asked for the construction of an auditorium, and that the building of a drill hall would interfere with their plans for a recreation centre. I am told that the same organization held another meeting a few days ago at which some young men denounced in the most violent terms any kind of participation in the wars of the empire. I sympathize with the young people of my city and of my constituency. I am just as opposed to any participation in the wars of the empire, but when they say that the increase of the military appropriations is equivalent to participation in war. I cannot agree with them.

I have not yet heard of a supporter of the present government who is going to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Vancouver North. I do not think there will be any. Either to-night, to-morrow or Monday we shall have to vote for the amendment or for the motion of the Minister of Finance. The Liberal party is going to give its unanimous support to the main motion and will vote against the amendment. Then, when we go into committee of supply, those who are opposed to the increase in the military appropriations will be free to make their objections; it is their right. I repeat that I respect their opinions, as I want my own opinion to be respected. If the supporters of the government are displeased with its policy, they are at liberty to vote against it.

After listening to the speech of the Minister of Defence, I wondered if he could add anything to what he said. Will he be asked to give the names of the ships we are going to purchase? What other details could be asked for? Has he got to tell us the number of buttons on each uniform? Shall he have to tell us the colour of the brick to be used in the construction of the drill hall? We must not stoop to such trifles, and since we have in the past given our confidence to men who are better informed than we are, since we have praised these same men, and told the people of our province that they are the great public men of our country, they must to-day retain our confidence. Is it because you do not see the question from the same angle that you are going to withdraw your support from them? Are the people of the province of Quebec going to say that their four ministers do no longer enjoy their confidence? They would not be justified in doing so.

In so far as I am concerned, in my capacity as member for the constituency of Hull, I shall vote in favour of the increased appropriations, but I shall oppose any kind of participation in foreign wars.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Some hon. members were perhaps able to come to a quick decision as to our necessities in regard to armaments. I confess that I took considerable time to study the proposition from every angle, and that I found it very embarrassing. But after all there are only two views; there is the imperialist point of view, which means that Canada's welfare is of necessity connected with the welfare of the empire or of the British commonwealth of nations, and there is the Canadian point of view—shall I call it the "home-made" point of view?—which means that once for all we must cease to look at or think of the empire or the motherland in framing our policies. The latter is my viewpoint. We must regulate our business as an independent nation, free to help or not to help a country which may be at war, and free to arm or to disarm as we see fit. I understand that it is difficult for some Canadians to break the last link which unites Canada to England and to view our situation regardless of what their feelings may be as to the old country. I, however, venture the assertion that of the 245 members or thereabouts of this house there is not one who has not given the most serious thought to the question of national defence. I am sure every hon. member will be sincere when he votes on the question of armament. One may discuss different points of view; one may disagree with another, but one must give others the same credit for sincerity and honesty and patriotism as he expects for himself. The duty of a representative of the people is, after all, to try to find the right path, and to express such views and act in such a way as may be in conformity with his conscience.

If there were only two courses to follow; if I had to vote either for the government or for the Conservative party, I admit I would not hesitate for one moment, for I am certain that the Conservative party, according to past declarations and the past policy of that party, would consider $15,000,000 for rearming our nation to be only small change. In regard to this most important question of armaments I must place what I sincerely believe is the interest of my constituents before any party interest. To make my position clear and to be consistent with myself I shall read what I said in this house on February 4 last:

> I consider that considerations of prudence and foresight demand that Canada, as one of the nations of the world, should have some kind of an army, in the same way that every city needs a police force. We therefore need an army whose size and cost should be measured by the danger that threatens us and our ability to pay. My opinion is that we are not exposed to great danger, and it is a fact that the state of our finances does not permit us to undertake any expenditure that is not absolutely necessary. I therefore object to the provision of armaments to an extent not justified by any immediate danger and by the financial resources of the country. Above all, Mr. Speaker, I object to any participation by Canada in the armament race.

Believing that the war danger in Canada is not pronounced, believing that our means are not abundant enough, and believing that an adequate Canadian defensive or offensive army would be almost an impossibility, I regret I must come to the conclusion that the increase in our military estimates is too large. I am of opinion that we must have some protection, but the difference between the previous year's military estimates and those of this year is too great. The answer to the question whether or not we should spend more for armaments this year is not self-evident. It is not, as the expression goes, lying under one's very nose. There are some people who believe we ought to arm to the extent that we are preparing to arm, and there are other people who do not so believe. After all, we are preparing for future events, and we do not know with any certainty what those future events will be. So there is no certainty upon which one can base his attitude with regard to armaments. The only certain thing is that this year we contemplate spending a great deal more than we spent last year.

It is sometimes hard to do one's duty as one sees it, Mr. Speaker. I find it painful to disagree with the leaders of my party and so many of my Liberal friends. I respect the opinions of those who have different views, and I hope that my opinions will be respected also. I have considered this question just as seriously as a person could consider any question; I have listened to the speeches that have been made in this house; I have listened to the statistics that have been presented and the arguments that have been advanced both for and against the increase in the estimates. As I have already said, I have been forced to make up my mind to vote against the increase in the estimates for our Department of National Defence.

I like people who speak their minds freely. I like people who look a situation in the face and say what they think. It seems to me queer that our hon. friends who form His Majesty's most loyal opposition should be so quiet on this subject. It appears to me that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who thought it expedient to speak for about two hours with regard to the appointment of Mr. John Vallance in connection with rehabilitation work in western Canada, should not have five minutes in which to address us and to demonstrate that an expenditure of $15,000,000 is not very much, that perhaps he would be prepared to go to the extent of $75,000,000 or $100,000,000. Probably if that were done, it might help us to form a better judgment on this issue. I would have expected our very eloquent friend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) to give us an illuminating address on this important question. I should like to have heard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe

(Mr. Rowe), who has the honour of leading the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, give this house the views of the farmers of Ontario. Probably, however, there is some justification for his absence, he is busy, and I have no doubt he is concentrating on a measure which will equitably apportion certain school taxes in the said province. I am a new member of this house; I have not had much experience in politics, but I wonder whether it is possible that political expediency may have something to do with the attitude of the Conservative party on this matter. I am tempted to apply to the Conservative group a word that was applied by the poet La Fontaine to a cat which was hunting in very poor disguise. He said:

Ce bloc enfariné ne me dit rien qui vaille.

The "wait and see" policy which is being followed by the opposition is not very courageous, nor does it seem very frank. I might compare the attitude of the right hon. leader of the opposition with the attitude of a certain accused person who, when asked by the magistrate whether or not he was guilty, replied, "How can I tell whether or not I am guilty until I have heard what the witnesses have to say?"

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the house reads as follows:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

The mover of the amendment (Mr. MacNeil) did not see fit to stop when his idea had been well expressed, and when he had expressed his views against an increase in armaments, in the following terms:

This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament.

With that part of the amendment I am in accord, and would have been content to support it. But he complicated matters by connecting with the first part of the amendment another part dealing with social security and social legislation, that sort of socialism which is and has been advocated in and out of this house by members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It will be noticed that both the mover and the seconder of the amendment are members of that party. I am sure they are sincere, and I am sure they are not communists, but I feel that a great deal of what they say is of a nature to develop communistic ideas in the minds of some, and to encourage others who have graduated in the most advanced form of communism, to go ahead and operate among our people.

My views on social legislation are quite different from those of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I should not want the moneys now allocated to armaments to be employed for the development or realization of the reforms preached by the party I have just named. Besides, this is a vote of want of confidence. It is evident that if the government were overthrown the Conservative party would have to assume office and the direction of the country. The expenses incurred would be very great, when we remember that during that party's last term of office, between 1930 and 1935, they increased the national debt by $920,000,000.

I shall vote against the amendment now before the house, because I find fault with the last part of it. But I shall also vote against the estimates, when they come before the committee of supply, because I do not deem it expedient that the government should spend so much or increase the estimates to such an extent in one year.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a quality to be frank and outspoken. I say the impression should not go out to the public that I hold the view that the present government, and particularly the ministers from Quebec, are imperialists. I am sure they are not imperialists, any more than I am—and I am not an imperialist. I do not want the impression to go out to the public that the present cabinet, and particularly those members of it who are from Quebec, are in favour of Canada's participation in any imperial or European war, because they are no more in favour of our participating in such wars than I am—and I am not in favour of such participation. They simply wish to protect Canada against attack, and to increase the national defence estimates by $15,000,000 for that purpose. That is their sincere point of view. My humble belief is that the $15,000,000 increase is too much, and that is the reason for my dissent.

While I am on my feet may I fulfil another duty, in the name of justice. I wish to denounce a certain section of the press of the province of Quebec for the falsehoods, misrepresentations and sins of commission and omission which appear regularly in their pages with respect to the attitude of the present cabinet, particularly the ministers from Quebec, and the Liberal party in general, concerning armaments. A great deal of the press of the province of Quebec is at this time making a determined effort to mislead the people of that province, and to make political capital out of the question of armaments. I am sure our ministers can well defend themselves, but to represent the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or other ministers from the province of Quebec as imperialists or as ministers in favour of Canada's participation in European wars is to show malice aforethought and to express a base lie.

May I mention particularly L'Illustration as the best example of how vile, how low and how reptile-like a newspaper may be, in the paid service of unscrupulous and furious political opponents. As a new member I have observed what has been going on in the chamber and, astonishing as the fact may be, day after day I have seen that yellow paper, L'Illustration, on the desk and in the hands of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) and have seen him and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) bend their heads together over that abominable sort of paper, which I call L'Illustration, apparently enjoy the perusal of its articles and make feast of the outrageous and deliberate falsehoods appearing in its pages about the attitude of the ministers from Quebec. Those are falsehoods which are intended to make the people of Quebec lose confidence in the Minister of Justice, in the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), in the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), and in the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret).

May I praise most heartily the independent press for the good work it is doing for its readers, and the impartial newspapers for the service they render their subscribers, but let me loathe and deprecate a paper such as L'Illustration for the bad service it renders to the citizens of the province of Quebec.

I regret that in connection with the issue of armaments and the increase in the estimate for the Department of National Defence I have to disagree with the government, but in doing so I am getting not nearer but much farther away from the Conservative party, which in Canada is known as the imperialist party. It is quite possible that the government is right in its present defence policy and it is also possible the future will prove that the estimates for this year were not excessive. Time will tell. I foresee that the estimates for national defence will be passed by this house and I am sure they will be found to be much too small by the Conservative party, whether or not they admit it. I am proud to declare that the policy of the Liberal party has been proved to be good and profitable to the country in every respect. I believe in that policy, but I disagree as to the amount intended to be spent this year on armaments.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, in rising this evening to oppose the amendment now before the house, I am conscious of fulfilling a serious and imperative duty. Since the beginning of this debate I have listened to the views which have been expressed. I have given much attention to this question of armaments. The amendment reads:

> This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purpose of national armament—

I ask the mover of this amendment (Mr. MacNeil) if the house should not also view with concern the conditions facing the whole world at the present time. Every nation is increasing its armaments at a terrific pace. Against whom are they arming? Is my hon. friend in a position to tell me? Does he think what is going on now in Europe is encouraging? Does he view conditions in Spain as a proof of peace? Let us not be satisfied with words. In June, 1914, who ever thought that a European war was impending? The hon. member is a fellow war veteran and I want to assure him that I am not discussing such a momentous problem from a partisan point of view. Will my hon. friend state that in the spring of 1914 there were even a dozen men in Canada who foresaw the war that came in that year? I hate war just as much as do he and my other war comrades. Like all hon. members of this house I do not want my children—I am proud to say that I have eleven—to have to go to war, and I shall not betray them and my fellow citizens and force them to undergo the terrible experiences which the men of my generation had to go through.

Surely the mover of this amendment realizes that the world hardly perceives where it is going and does not realize what may be in store for it. I am astounded at some of the statements made by hon. members. They say that Canada either will be threatened with war, or will not. If she is threatened with war, some hon. members say that either England or the United States will defend us and we need not worry. If she is not threatened with war, some hon. members say, "Why should we arm?" I wish to take up the first alternative, namely, that in case of war England or the United States would defend us. May I be permitted to quote a paragraph from an article written by Doctor Jules Dorion, editor of L'Action Catholique, on January 14 last. This is what he said:

Of course some people are of the opinion that as we can do but so little it would be unwise to spend money in armament and we should be satisfied with leaning on others. Well let us not forget the proverb that says: Help yourself and God will help you. The weakest among men is in duty bound to do his share before relying on his neighbours, and the same thing may be said of states. Their limited area and their small population do not prevent Belgium, The Netherlands, Switzerland, Denmark and other Scandinavian states from having their own army, kept on the best possible footing, and their own navy, when necessary. Belgium has just reorganized her army and made it more efficient, although that country is well aware of the fact that France and England are greatly interested in having her territorial integrity duly respected. Belgium is a living example of a small country being ransacked, notwithstanding the sanctity of treaties and the sympathetic concern of powerful neighbours.

On the other side, accepting protection from one who is not bound to afford it cannot go on very long without servitude. We do not feel inclined to barter our provincial status in almost a sovereign dominion for that of an ordinary state in the neighbouring country.

Not only do I make those words my own, but I think I am sufficiently acquainted with the population of the constituency of Dorchester, which it is my privilege to represent, to say that the people of Dorchester, whether of French, English, Irish or Scotch origin, do not feel inclined to barter their provincial status in an almost sovereign dominion for that of an ordinary state in a neighbouring country. I wish I could say with the same righteous candour which other hon. members have shown, that we need only fold our arms, urge peace and do nothing to provoke another country, in order to ensure the perpetuity of peace in Canada. Let me ask these pacifists if little Belgium provoked anybody in 1914. Did she do anything to justify invasion of her territory? Certainly not. History will show future generations, just as the actual facts have proved to us, that a country can be not only invaded but ransacked in spite of its peaceful feelings and strict neutrality. Against whom do we arm? This is what the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) said last Tuesday evening:

We are arming not against somebody in particular, but rather against anybody. It is impossible to foresee what we shall do with this army that we wish to make more efficient and more mobile. What we can say to our fellow-citizens is that we want an army which is really useful and which we can use in case of emergency. Against whom do we arm? Many of us have an accident insurance policy for which we have been paying premiums since 15, 20, 25 or 30 years. We have not yet been hit by a motor car, and still we keep on paying the premiums. It is impossible to say on which date, at which time and by which car we may be hit some day.

Sir, we are not arming against anybody, but we want everybody to know that we are ready to defend our own country. With regard to danger from the outside, nobody in this house can give us the assurance that we are immune.

Again, the pacifists say that everything is fine within our borders and that we do not need any protection on that account. But is that statement in conformity with the facts? The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), who spoke with such common sense and judgment last Monday evening, provided us with ample material for reflection on the menace from within. He said:

Quite recently, speaking about the strike in the General Motors plants, Father Coughlin pointed out the influence of communism in that strike, and he brought to the attention of the authorities, before it might be too late, the threat of a revolution. During that strike the civil and judicial authorities were flouted.

He also pointed out the fact that Canadians have left their country to enlist in the Spanish army. Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that the press daily brings to light the fact that we are living in disquieting times? Do the events in Spain not cause grave concern to the hon. member for Vancouver North? Does he consider as a purely local incident the shocking trials which her people are going through? Like myself, I am sure he reads the Canadian Veteran, and has he not read in its January issue the following editorial?

With German and Italian "volunteers" forming the major strength of the forces under command of rebel General Franco, plus the prospective addition of several thousand Japanese, on one side; and a large so-called international force aiding the Spanish government on the other side, the war in Spain long since has lost its purely domestic significance. If there had been no outside interference prior to and at the outset, the uprising would have found its own solution in short order for neither faction had the materials with which to wage war for long. But Il Duce saw in Franco's bid for dictatorship an opportunity of making the Mediterranean a truly Italian sea; the Fuehrer envisioned a cordon of nations hemming in France, plus an opportunity of regaining a foothold in Africa. Stalin was aroused by the dual threat to this first real prospect of extending the World International movement beyond Russia.

So Spain has become the cockpit of a little "Great War," her towns and cities ravaged, her people starved and murdered, her treasures destroyed, her social and economic life wholly disrupted. Whatever eventuates, Spain can only be a pliant tool in the hands of foreign schemers for years to come, an unwilling threat to the peace of the world.

Right here in Canada, Mr. Speaker, we find disciples of these two political schools who at present have Spain as their battle-ground, but whose object it is to have the whole world as their sphere of action.

I shall not pass judgment on the systems of government which other nations have thought fit to adopt, but I am emphatically opposed to these nations taking it upon themselves to make us benefit by their experiments. I submit that the forms of government which may have brought order out of chaos in Russia, in Italy or in Germany will never be accepted by the free people of my country, and the propagandists who are paid by the expounders of these doctrines must know that the government of Canada is ready to thwart them by force, should the occasion arise.

Now what about communism? Canada is not exempt in this regard. Only a short time ago I was reading a pamphlet published recently by Les Editions de l'Université d'Ottawa, in which Father Sauvé, O.M.I., said:

> Communism, in Canada, possesses now an organization whose ramifications extend to all sections of the dominion. Every year, the communists hold anti-capitalistic meetings in several places: at Montreal, in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Vancouver. . . .
> Lenin's revolutionary tree has rooted in Russia, but its branches are already extending to all parts of the world. . . .

> Soon, if we do not take care, they will bring about a furious storm. Indeed the hour is momentous and this problem must be faced from its real aspect. . . .
> Is it not His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve who said: "Communism in Canada is not merely hypothetical, it has become a reality. It is ablaze in our midst. To encompass it is a matter of urgency."

In his recent pamphlet Mr. René Bergeron, of Montreal, also tells us that "communism is a force and that this force is a menace to Canada."

With such unequivocal opinions before us, I cannot act like the ostrich, and I shall certainly not deal in any haphazard way with so vital a question as that of national defence. It is true that I am not an imperialist or a jingo, and I will say bluntly that I am entirely and emphatically opposed to Canada's participation in extra-territorial wars. But I want my country to be protected from any invasion, no matter where it comes from, and I shall vote against the motion now before the house. I believe, in so declaring, I am perfectly in accord with my leaders.

Like the hon. member for Bellechasse, whom I like very much, I am only a countryman, and if I reflect the opinion of the "habitant" from down home, I want to impress upon the house that I have no apology to make. On the contrary I am proud to speak for the "habitant." On such important matters as those which are now being considered by this house, I do not claim to be an expert, but I believe in my leaders, and I am happy to tell them that I accepted the invitation to be the candidate of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is now at the head of the government because I placed all my confidence in him and because I admired above all his true Canadian spirit. During the election campaign, on every platform in my constituency and elsewhere I delivered addresses I expressed approval of the policy that he was expounding, and my fellow-citizens elected me to this house. I wish to state here that I believe in my leaders and that I am satisfied with the statements of policy which have been made in the house.

My province, Mr. Speaker, stands second to none in the matter of patriotism. History is there to prove this. We are essentially Canadians and it is our desire to remain such. We do not want Canada to embark upon costly overseas ventures, but, following the example of our forefathers, we are ready to defend our land. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), whom we respect in Quebec because, sir, he does credit to our people in the government of our country and because he represents the best of our race, and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)—all have declared what I could sum up by quoting what the Minister of National Defence said on Monday evening in this house:

> There is no idea whatever of sending a single Canadian soldier overseas in any expeditionary force, and there is not a single cent providing for that in the estimates this house will be asked to vote.

Such emphatic statements, made by men whom we trust, give us much satisfaction.

In conclusion, may I say that Canada, in the critical hours through which we are passing, should be proud to have at the head of her government our present Prime Minister. An imperial conference will be held in London in a few weeks. Those who will represent the government of their country at the conference will bear a heavy responsibility. It is obvious that the defence issue will constitute one of the gravest problems the conference will have to deal with, and our delegates will have the strict duty of representing Canadian sentiment. I firmly believe they will do so.

May I be permitted to read what the Evening Citizen of February 15 had to say with regard to our principal delegates to the next conference:

Canada could be represented by no abler minister at the conference table than Premier Mackenzie King. With a lifetime of experience in round table conferences, affecting industrial and social conditions, as well as in the international field of politics, he is a natural leader along paths of conciliation. The spirit of Canada, the spirit of friendly cooperation, readiness to meet the other man half-way as the most hopeful way to make an enduring agreement, is reflected in every substantial achievement of the prime minister's long political career. . . .

It should be helpful also to bear in mind that there is little danger of this government being led away along any path of imperial adventure. With Messrs. Mackenzie King and Ernest Lapointe sitting together, as they doubtless will, at the imperial conference, no zealous nationalist need have any fear about the safeguarding of the national interest of Canada. . . .

I am fully in accord with the sentiments expressed in this editorial.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the amendment.

(Translation): I would not like to resume my seat without saying a few words, not in my maternal tongue, because my mother was English, but in my father's language, which is also that of the majority of my constituents. I have followed very attentively the debate on the amendment, which I consider as most important and I wanted to express, in the language of the majority of the members of this house, the attitude I intended taking.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not without due consideration that I have taken the stand I am taking now. I have given this question much thought and study and I have tried to understand this matter of increase in the armaments estimates.

I think that I am absolutely justified, so far as I can judge personally, to rely on the leaders of my party. But a few months ago, I was the candidate of the party which, today, is responsible for the administration of the country. I then had faith in them and I was sincere, and now that I have to face a problem the details of which I cannot understand—I admit it very candidly and very honestly—it seems to me that, in conscience, I have but just one thing to do: to leave the matter to those in whom I have put my trust.

Since I have been elected, from the day I have had the honour of representing in this house 27,000 constituents of the county of Dorchester, I have found no reason to withdraw the trust which I placed in my leaders in October, 1935.

Mr. Speaker, is there in the Canadian confederation any province that should trust more the Liberal party's leader than the province of Quebec?

We have experienced some sad days through Canada's political history, and I believe that we should not forget them.

We have been attacked, but I well remember that it is the leader of our party who defended us, and fought against those who were attacking us. It was he who stood up in our defence at the very door of Toronto. And we would lose faith in our government? Personally, I think that we would be wrong, and we will surely not do it.

The province of Quebec expects its representatives to declare in this house that we, from Quebec, refuse to participate in military operations outside our own territory. Nobody has said otherwise since the beginning of this debate, and never, I believe, through all the Canadian history, have we seen ministers sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, and speaking as members of the government, being as positive and as sincere as the members of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly will continue—and I am sure that the province of Quebec will be satisfied, a least I know that the constituents of the county of Dorchester will be—to vote confidence in the King government. I am sure that the province of Quebec as well as its members in this house, realize that nowadays we are happy—and we should thank Providence for it—to have such an eminent man at the head of the government of this country.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I desire to say but a few words. It seems to me that the point of the amendment has been largely missed. The amendment reads:

> This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

I am one who believes that the best guarantee for external security is internal security. At present very few Canadians enjoy security. I believe that the best, and I might say the only real contribution which Canada can make to the peace of the world, is to bring about a condition of things such that the Canadian people may enjoy real security in Canada. If we can do that—and we are among the very few nations, perhaps we are the only nation, that can do it without fear of outside interference, by reason of our geographical position—if we can do that, I feel that we shall make by far the best contribution to the peace of the world. In connection with this I should like to read an extract from a pamphlet written by Mr. Vincent C. Vickers, late director of the Bank of England. This pamphlet contains a petition to His Majesty the King concerning the abolition of poverty, and the removal of the main causes of economic warfare between nations. I am going to read not the petition, but an extract from Mr. Vickers' reasons for signing it:

I personally need no immediate change; I am one of those who can afford to wait; for me things seem to be on the upgrade. But I have signed it because there are many hundreds of thousands of men, women and children in this country—loyal subjects of the king—to whom waiting is an inhuman tragedy, and a national disgrace with which this country should be branded no longer.

He was speaking of England, of course, but I submit that the condition of hundreds of thousands of Canadians at this moment is a national disgrace. Then he goes on to say:

I have signed this petition, also, because over the last ten years I have known the man in the street and the under dog, and from them I have learnt something the existence of which the city of London does not even suspect and cannot therefore appreciate. I hold views which the London press would not publish.

I had occasion the other day to mention the fact that it was impossible to get certain views published in the British press, and this is a confirmation of that statement. The press gave me a great deal of notice in connection with that statement; I wonder whether they will give me the same notice on this. But possibly they may come to the conclusion that silence is sometimes golden. Mr. Vickers goes on to say:

Can it be denied that a system which is based on and exists solely by the creation and enforcement of debt, much of which can never be extinguished, is the source of poverty, discontent and discord at home and abroad, and constitutes a permanent incentive to war.

And finally he says:

Rightly or wrongly the world no longer has confidence in the monetary system. The repeated failures of finance and the collapse of the gold standard system in each and every emergency has undermined the faith of the public in the honesty of its money. The known solidity of our banks and the proved integrity of our bankers have failed to stem the growing mistrust of the currency and credit system which banks and bankers uphold and operate. The money industry should consider their own position. Were they to do so they would—in my very humble opinion they must—arrive at the conclusion that the future welfare of the money industry as it is at present constituted depends entirely upon its own power to crush out the human impulse to go forward and upon its ability to override the will of the people, and so to govern the world.

[Mr. Jaques.]

That is the opinion of a former director of the Bank of England, who bears the name of Vickers, a name not unknown in the business of making munitions.

As I said before, we have no security. Even if we have these one hundred fast aeroplanes, we have no guarantee that we shall be permitted to use them or to practise with them. It is not within the province of this house even to say that. We have no guarantee that even if we get these armaments we can practise with them in time of peace. And certainly we have no economic security. It is because I see no reason to believe, and I have heard nothing in this house which gives me any reason to believe, that the government have any idea of trying to do anything to overcome this evergrowing power of finance, that I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. J. A. VERVILLE (Lotbinière) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely for the purpose of explaining the vote I shall be called upon to give in a few hours. The amendment before the house denounces the increases in the estimates of the Department of National Defence; but it implies as well direct condemnation of the general, social and economic policies of the government.

A vote for the amendment is a vote of non confidence in the present administration—to whose advantage? To the advantage of our Conservative friends whose political program the people of this country repudiated in 1935. Surely such a gesture would be ill-advised on our part. We have the other alternative of throwing ourselves into the arms of our friends of the C.C.F., the authors of the amendment. For my part, I may tell you right now, Mr. Speaker, that I am not ready for any such adventure. The government in power at the present time enjoys the full confidence of the citizens of this country and I personally have no hesitation in declaring my complete faith in the present Liberal policy and in our leaders. This trust is built on the glorious past of the Liberal party, the sincerity of the chieftains of that party, and the excellent results of Liberal policy. The people are contented. Confidence returned once more when the present government came into power and this confidence is felt throughout all the branches of our economic activity. The people have begun to get their breath; and I am wondering why we do not let them breathe in peace for a few more years.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the application of the present Liberal government policies is deserving of our utmost trust; and I unhesitatingly state my approval of these policies. As a proof of my feeling towards my leaders I shall vote against the motion which condemns them.

This does not mean, however, that I favour an increase in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, I am entirely and unqualifiedly opposed to the suggested increase. I have always been an opponent of armaments, and I believe, at this hour, I would be remiss in my duty towards myself and towards my trusting constituents, were I to change my attitude. I feel that what I always fought against when it was proposed by our opponents, from 1911 to 1925, is not more acceptable now that the party, to which I am proud to belong, has been elected to office. It is all one to me that this increased military expenditure will be for defensive purposes in Canada alone, as we were assured by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and other leaders. I do not doubt their word; nor do I doubt their sincerity.

It is simply that, as a matter of principle, I do not see this thing in the same light as they do. I am opposed to armaments in any shape or form, because I am convinced—I may be wrong, I admit—that this expenditure is useless and cannot give us the protection that is expected, apparently. Moreover, the financial state of the country is such that we cannot afford to spend these sums to fight enemies who may never materialize. Finally, we do not know how far this movement will carry us in the years to come.

Economy is the watchword of the day: the government itself preaches economy. When we ask for certain grants for our constituencies we are told that the estimates have had to be pared down for reasons of economy; for instance, this year we are voting still less money for agriculture. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have no right to increase our military expenditure at a time when, for alleged reasons of economy, we are reducing the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, which should receive a larger share of public funds, seeing that the farming industry is sorely in need of money.

One thing puzzles me, perhaps without reason, but at any rate allow me to say frankly what is in my mind. After going through the estimates and listening to the explanations given us so far I find it quite obvious that the money we are asked to vote will for the most part, be spent on warships and on aeroplanes. These ships and 'planes will be bought in England. To me this appears to be an indirect contribution to the British armament program. Why not keep this money in Canada, to give employment to our own shipyards, employ Canadian labour and lighten the burden of direct relief? I would even be willing, if I were convinced of the necessity for so doing, to vote for a larger increase in our military estimates, on conditions that the money were to be spent in Canada, for the benefit of our fellow citizens who ask for bread and who want to work for it.

I cannot for one instant doubt the word of the leaders of the Liberal party when they assure us that the money voted will be spent solely for the defence of Canada; but I cannot help the feeling and, so to say, the unshakable conviction, that in voting for these estimates we are being drawn into the military armaments movement, with the mother country and for her benefit.

And I add this: Can those who are defending us to-day, who are at the head of the national government, and are ever ready to stand guard over Canadian interests, give us the assurance that they will be here very long? I certainly hope they will be; but certainty in such matters is rather out of the question. And after they are gone, will those who take their place be in a position to give us such guarantees? There is a big question mark there, Mr. Speaker. Once the precedent has been established it can be appealed to, and then willy nilly we will have to bow to whatever fate is meted out to us, as a consequence of the responsibilities we are taking upon ourselves to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I may be wrong; and I hope with all my heart that the government has chosen the right road, that the future will justify the government's decision. I express this hope in all sincerity. But, once again, I cannot follow my party in this matter. I am opposed to any increase of military estimates, even for purely Canadian defence purposes, simply because I believe that such expenditure is useless, because nothing appears to justify any such increase, because the organization of our national defence has been sufficient up till now; and also because I see in this increase the first step in the realization of an armaments plan that some day, whether we wish it or not, will be used for other purposes than those proclaimed to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in acting as I do I am faithful to the trust of those who elected me to represent them here. I know that if they were here their attitude on this question would be the same as my own. Since they cannot all be here themselves they have sent me here as their spokesman. Hence my duty to express their opinions and to respect their convictions. By good fortune it so happens that their convictions and mine are identical both against the increase in miltary estimates and for the continuation in office of the present government.

Mr. ARMAND SYLVESTRE (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let pass this debate on the armaments question which, to my mind, is of capital interest to Canada not only for the present but for the future, without explaining clearly my own position and the course I intend to follow.

I must say first of all that I am, have always been, and will always be, a Liberal. As I see it, we may at times have different opinions on matters of public concern; but for all that we are not rebels, we are not insurgents, we have not lost faith in those whom the voters have put at the head of the nation's affairs.

So, with regard to the motion of non-confidence, as it is worded, I am entirely opposed to it and I shall vote against it because it condemns the general policy of the Liberal party.

I hold that Liberal policy alone has reestablished our equilibrium, that Liberal policy alone has brought renewed confidence to the country, and set up an orderly administration in the place of the disorder that was rife under our Conservative predecessors.

Mr. Speaker, since 1919 there have been eleven elections held in my province: six provincial and five federal. I have always taken an active part in each one of them. I have even had the honour of being a candidate on four occasions; and up to the present time I am here solely as the representative of my constituents. Since I have always been in the thick of the fight, I know that my electors have put their trust in me because I have always fought with all my might against militarism and imperialism, in any and every shape or form. Hence I do not believe I would be justified in changing my attitude this evening.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SYLVESTRE: That is why, with the deep conviction acquired through my experience in public life, I find myself under the necessity of stating that I am opposed to this sudden and unforeseen increase in the military forces of this country. In the light of my own experience, and what knowledge I have gleaned from books on the history of all wars, I am convinced that such a policy is chiefly to the advantage of those who produce and supply armaments and munitions, people who are guided by self-interest alone, heartless, pitiless men who strive merely to increase their fortunes; and who, on occasion, wear the mask of patriotism and unhesitatingly lead their country to ruin so that they may garner further riches. We saw frequent examples of this, Mr. Speaker, during the last war which laid waste the entire earth.

That is the reason for my objection to armaments; and I believe that, on this point, my constituents will back me up.

I notice, however, that a large amount is being voted for the development of aviation, both civil and military, in our country. Aviation is a new science which exerts a powerful attraction on youth; unfortunately I must state, without hesitation, that so far our people have not received the fair treatment they were entitled to. I have tried myself to find a place in aviation for young men of talent who seemed to me fully qualified for that calling. The door was closed in their faces simply because of their insufficient knowledge of English. I hope that this time Quebec will get its fair share; that the necessary steps will be taken to found flying schools in our province, with competent instructors who speak and understand the French tongue. Then our young men who are desirous of entering this new career will be able to obtain the necessary knowledge and training to qualify. It seems to me that if a mechanic is competent, if a man is a good pilot, the language he speaks, whether French, English or any other, is of secondary importance; in Quebec our young men should be in a position to learn a trade which should be taught them in their mother tongue.

While I am on that point let me say that after an absence of five years I notice, on coming back to Ottawa, that during the five years of Tory rule there has been built up in Ottawa a powerful hierarchy, which includes the heads of a great many departmental branches, men who are not in sympathy with us and who connive with a majority on the civil service commission to deprive our people of their due rights. It is my duty to raise my voice in protest, so that the dissatisfaction that is evident all around us will not spread further still and the day come when it will be too late to correct the evils that exist to-day.

So, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have given I intend to vote against the motion of non-confidence. Like the hon. member who spoke before me, and like all the voters in my riding I have the fullest and most complete confidence in our leaders; and if I cannot see eye to eye with them on a question which is purely a matter of administration and armaments, I remain deeply attached to their leadership. If I vote to-day against an increase in the estimates, and the future should prove me wrong, I shall be the first to admit it. Like the gentleman who preceded me, I hope the government will prove to be right, and I shall then make due apology.

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wrote the following letter to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on December 31, 1936:

As a member of parliament, I take the liberty of making certain suggestions to you respecting military expenditures which, according to rumours, will show a substantial increase in the coming estimates.

I believe the province of Quebec would frown on this increase which would be interpreted as a direction from London.

Do you not think that our policy should aim at avoiding all participation in European wars, even if England were compelled to intervene in a conflict by reason of treaties or agreements that bind or may bind her to France and Belgium?

In order to avoid all misunderstanding, has the hour not arrived when we should hold a permanent seat in the Pan-American Conference? This gesture would indicate the part we mean to play in European conflicts in which England might be interested.

Should Canada not consider that the time has arrived when it should sever its connection with the League of Nations and study at the same time its status in the British Commonwealth. The fact that our King is the King of England should not imply that we must join in a war on the European or Asiatic continent or in any other quarter of the globe.

It is evident that if Canada clearly defines by legislative enactment its intention not to interfere in any war of the empire, such a course would free us, in the event of European or Asiatic difficulties, from the possibility of attack and would prevent all military expenditures both useless and disastrous for a young country such as ours.

I make these observations to you in a spirit of humility, as a Canadian who loves his country and as a Liberal trustful in the political wisdom of his party.

Please accept, Mr. Prime Minister, the expression of my deepest regards.

And the right hon. the Prime Minister wrote me the following reply on January 19, 1937:

I read with much interest your letter of December 31 respecting military expenditures and Canada's foreign policy.

With respect to expenditures having to do with defence, any expenditure contemplated and decided upon will as in the past relate to the defence of Canada. We consider that whatever action Canada will take in this regard is a matter to be determined by the Canadian government and parliament, and our defence estimates were not discussed with London on this occasion any more than in any other circumstance.

The policy of our government is to strive by all possible means to avoid war. There exists a wide difference of opinion in Canada and in other countries as to the best way of achieving that end. As regards the League of Nations, I do not think it would be advisable to withdraw from that body which if properly developed can constitute a powerful agency for conciliation and peace throughout the world. I would prefer seeking the safeguards against the danger which you see in our relations with the League of Nations by calling it into play as an instrument of conciliation and study rather than as an instrument for the application of economic or military sanctions. I am pleased to forward you herewith a copy of the speech I delivered at Geneva during the last assembly; I believe it will clearly indicate to you the line of conduct suggested on subjects pertaining to the league and on other matters.

The matter of relationships to be established with the Pan-American Conference is an important question. We have given the matter attention but it involves more than one factor which must be taken into account.

I am pleased to know that you interest yourself in these important questions and I greatly value the clarity with which you have outlined to me the views you hold on the difficult situation that confronts us.

I do not want to question the words of the right hon. Prime Minister when he tells us:

We consider that whatever action Canada will take in this regard is a matter to be determined by the Canadian government and parliament.

I have faith in him and in his ministers, but I ask myself if the events that may occur following a declaration of war against the United Kingdom by any nation, will not be so swiftly moving in character that they will control government action in such a manner that parliament will find itself face to face with an accomplished fact and will be merely called upon to ratify an existing policy.

Moreover, were we not given a concrete example recently bearing out what I have just said, when, on the day following the abdication of King Edward the Eighth, the government by a mere order in council recognized his successor and set in motion the mechanism of the Statute of Westminster in such a manner that when parliament convened we had but one thing to do: approve what had been done.

As a matter of fact, I readily bow to the decision taken and approve whole-heartedly the order in council that gave us as successor to Edward the Eighth His Majesty George the Sixth; yet, when I analyse the events that followed one another at the time, I recall the words of Georges Sorel in a conversation captioned "Democracy is compelled to act like other forms of government," and of whom Mussolini said at the end of 1934: "I owe what I am to Georges Sorel."

That which concerns the internal affairs of a country is much less visible than that which relates to external affairs. In the latter case, the part ministers play greatly resembles, even in a democracy, that of an absolute sovereign. Once a conversation is started with the representatives of a foreign power, no obstacle can paralyse a responsible minister. A diplomatic conversation is a sort of battle in which the most unforeseen factors suddenly crop up, and a minister who would telephone every ten minutes to the Speaker of a house before answering his colleagues would be quickly put out of action.

With respect to the management of affairs, one must resign oneself to accept that those who are charged with same enjoy freedom of movement, lacking which they cannot do anything. The error of democracies consists in wanting to control government in all its acts, but control implies acknowledgment of an act after that act has taken place. If harm has been done one consoles oneself by the dismissal of a minister, but it is a poor consolation and the country derives no effective reparation from it.

What was known of yore as "the prince's secret" exists nowadays with all the added complications and niceties of modern international politics; and, admitting, for a moment, that there is a state without "prince's secrets," the ministers of that state will have to deal with other nations which do have "prince's secrets." As a consequence, secret diplomacy will hold sway and the ministers of that state will have to bear it without being able to do anything whatever about it. Hence, they will be compelled, if they wish to serve their country profitably, to subscribe to views of which the parliamentarian, their judge, and the voter who elected their judge, cannot form the least idea.

The political conditions of a nation, its industrial and commercial interests, its fiscal revenues, the obligations of its neighbourhoods, the maintenance of its influence, are so many skeins that unwind into extremely complicated ramifications which the gentleman reading his newspaper in the tram-car could not possibly suspect by the widest stretch of the imagination.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, there is not the slightest shadow of doubt that events which will arise will control the decision of the ministry, a decision compelling rapid action with respect to the interests of what is called to-day the Commonwealth of British Nations; but that is probably where the Canadian people will not find themselves in agreement with the men then in power, and one must not, as I see it, overlook any security factor as regards our eventual non-participation in wars wherein the interest of the United Kingdom, alone, may be involved.

We are told that the League of Nations is an agency for peace; I have grave doubts as to that, for, in the event of a war in which the League of Nations would declare Japan the aggressor country, the economic sanction machinery of the League of Nations would function immediately in favour of Russia; and as for us, members of the league, we would be compelled, as in the case of Ethiopia, to give effect to the covenants we signed as a member of the league: I say the League of Nations would compel us to apply economic sanctions to Japan. There is not a shadow of doubt that the adoption by our country of such economic sanctions with respect to Japan would be considered by that nation an act that would justify it in invading our country; and we would be face to face with the distressing situation of a country such as ours which holds communism in horror, aligning itself with a nation whose ideal is absolutely contrary to that of our Canadian people; for, in this country, our history, our traditions, our very existence rest on a belief that is the corner-stone of any society that aims to live and respect itself, that is to say, belief in God. Now, Russian communism involves the complete negation of God, the basis of our social structure. No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the League of Nations as constituted, is an instrument for peace. I look upon Geneva, its magnificient lake, the luxuriant verdure surrounding the palace of the League of Nations simply as a place well-suited for politicians who are holiday-bent.

We are told that should we vote the increased military estimates which are presently submitted to our approval, such sums will never be utilized beyond our country. Now, if I turn to the Canada Militia Act, I find that Section 64 reads in part as follows:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof in active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Who tells us that the government then holding office will not apply that clause of the Militia Act which empowers the cabinet, by a simple order in council, to use our military organization beyond Canada?

No, Mr. Speaker, I think there is only one logical course for us to follow: that is to occupy as soon as possible a seat at the Pan-American Conference to which, as a matter of fact, we were invited by that good friend of ours and lover of peace, Mr. Franklin Roosevelt. We would thus be proclaiming to all nations our desire to remain what we are actually, an essentially American nation. As a result, with the immense resources that are at our disposal, we would find ourselves free to devote, in a spirit of peace, all our efforts to the development of our country, instead of burdening our budget with a fairly heavy outlay for military purposes. We have not yet emerged from the crisis borne of the war and our commitments resulting from our participation in the conflict of 1914-1918 now exceed $4,600,000,000.

I do not approve the amendment proposed by my hon. colleague from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), because part of it censures the government concerning its social legislation; and I do not hesitate to state that in that field the country never had a man with a better understanding of the interests of the labour class than my hon. colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) whose direct action in connection with the labour legislation adopted by this house has proven extremely helpful in the realm of relations between employers and employees. On the other hand, I wish to state that I shall vote against the increased military appropriations because I am convinced our country owes it to itself to direct its efforts into other channels of greater benefit to the Canadian community to which we have the honour to belong.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, since a great deal has already been said on the subject of war and peace, I desire to say only sufficient to indicate my stand on the amendment. War is a disease, though not an incurable one. It is not a cause; it is an effect. Disease cannot be cured without removing the cause; neither can war be eliminated without removing the cause.

Minor causes of war have been discussed a great deal in the house, but in my opinion the major cause has not. At page 103 of the evidence taken before the agriculture committee of the legislature of Alberta, Major Douglas states what he believes to be the major cause of crime. I agree with him when he says:

> There is no question that at the present time practically ninety per cent of the crime in the world is directly due to the financial system.

In my opinion war is the greatest crime. It is nothing less than legalized murder.

What the world has yet to realize is that war arises not because of the natural antipathy of races but because of a defective money system in each country. Nothing but a change in the financial system can save this or any other country from destruction. In my opinion Canada has done nothing by way of eliminating the major cause of war. This defective money system makes it necessary each year that more and more of each nation's products shall be shipped abroad and sold in foreign markets. The only reason most of these products cannot be bought at home is that people have not enough money with which to buy them. Since all nations have become highly industrialized, the world has become full of sellers and empty of buyers.

The world of to-day is just like a great stock-market. Brokers representing Canada, the United States, England, France, Russia, Germany and other countries are clamouring for buyers, and failing to find them. But unlike brokers in ordinary industrial life, nations can do things to shut out undesirable sellers. They can enact tariffs, and impose embargoes, quotas and trade restrictions of various kinds. When this is done, national antipathy, mutual distrust, jealousy of favoured nations and, finally, suspicions arise. Presently the war munitions racketeer, who knows no country and who plies his abominable trade in every country, appears upon the scene. He thrives upon distrust and suspicion, and fosters international hatred. In recent years his fiendish trade has been carried on with all the cunning efficiency of the devil himself.

I should like to quote part of an article written by Senator Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota, chairman of the senate munitions lobby investigating committee, to indicate how the munitions makers ply their nefarious schemes. The senator says this:

> An investigation of the arms question without treading upon official and semi-official toes would be no investigation at all. Of necessity we have had to deal with the secret courses pursued by the manufacturers and sellers of instruments of war. For years these makers and their salesmen have been weaving their way into governments, deceiving, frightening, corrupting, as their welfare and profit dictated.
> Because of the manner in which they have woven themselves into the very fabric of governments, the industry has won a status of sacredness and secrecy which has enlarged its opportunity to thrive in a way to return great profit to its owners. Rackets thrive best when nourished by dark secrecy, and when governments lend hands to the racketeers the sky is the limit as far as the flow of profits and blood money is concerned.
> I repeat that there is no racket to compare with that of the sale of munitions of war. Our government has fought, at great cost, the beer, liquor, white slave, dope and kidnap rackets.
> The munitions racket, one whose victims is all civilization, has governments as its partners, unconsciously on the part of some of the governments perhaps. Doubly difficult, then, becomes the task of destroying or controlling the racket, a racket wearing the cloak of respectability by reason of its association with and in governments.
> That such a partnership exists is one of the clear conclusions growing out of this present investigation. It must therefore be apparent that nothing short of wide and sweeping disclosures of the truth will ever waken the world to a degree that will win reform to check the mad race now on toward more war.

So it is because of a deficiency of purchasing power and the existence of a defective financial system in every country of the world to-day that we find ourselves on the brink of another universal catastrophe. For a few moments I should like to state what I believe Canada could do to promote world peace and possibly to avert a world catastrophe. Canada, as well as every other nation, is powerless to cope with her problems, whether national or international, so long as private individuals are permitted to exercise the crown's prerogative in creating and issuing the medium of exchange, whether it be in a tangible or an intangible form. President Garfield once said that whoever controls the money of a nation, controls that nation. In 1790 Mayer Rothschild said, "Permit me to issue and control the money of a nation and I care not who makes its laws."

"We must save democracy," is a sentiment which is being reiterated constantly in this chamber. I want to ask what is this democracy we are so anxious to save? In answer to that, all I have to say is that if what we have in Canada to-day is democracy, then it is not worth saving. The medium of exchange in this country is issued and controlled by private individuals. If the statements of President Garfield and Mayer Rothschild are true, then democracy in this country is nothing but a shell, empty and meaningless. Of what benefit is it to the electors of Canada to elect a parliament, if that parliament is absolutely powerless to act? So long as the control of the medium of exchange is in the hands of the bankers, just so long will parliament have absolutely nothing to say about the welfare and destiny of the Canadian people. None other than a former chancellor of the British Exchequer, the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, speaking of the bankers, made this statement:

> They control the credit of the nation, direct the policy of governments, and hold in the hollow of their hands the destiny of the people.

If that is the case in Canada, then we, the elected representatives of the people, are just wasting our time. Lincoln defined democracy as "government of the people, by the people, for the people." What I believe we have in Canada and in every country in the world to-day is government of the bankers, by the bankers, for the bankers. Fear and alarm have been expressed at the possibility of Canada drifting into a dictatorship, either fascist or communist. In my opinion we are suffering under the worst type of dictatorship right at this present time, a dictatorship of bankers. Members of this house are admitting that fact almost every time they speak. It makes no difference what problem is discussed in this chamber, the discussion always ends with the confession that we could solve our problems physically, but for financial reasons, we cannot.

We have enough men, materials and machinery to build a highway system second to none, but we have no money. We have enough men, materials and machines to create the world's most beautiful system of parks, but we have no money. We have the physical facilities to establish an educational system second to none, but we have no money. We have sufficient material wealth to house comfortably every Canadian citizen, but we have no money. We have the facilities to make our people the healthiest and the happiest people in the world, but we have no money. In other words, the mental, physical, moral and spiritual life of our people is languishing simply because we have no money. If that is not a dictatorship of the worst type, I shall be pleased to be informed what is.

When it comes to a fear that this country may drift into a fascist or communist dictatorship, I have this to say: The government of Canada, because of its refusal to do anything about the fundamental cause of our economic difficulties, has made more communists and fascists than has any propagandist. If this government wishes to encourage revolution, the easiest way to do it is to let things get so bad that the infuriated people will take matters into their own hands. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) stated that he was just as anxious to help the struggling masses as was anyone else in this house. I should like to suggest to the minister that a man's faith is justified by his works. When the minister exhibits as much enthusiasm in favour of national money and credit issued in terms of public need as he has done for an increase in the defence estimates, then I shall be satisfied that he is really interested in the welfare of the people.

Having usurped the crown's prerogative, the bankers embarked upon a policy of saddling every government and private institution with as much usury reaping debt as it could possibly bear. Major Douglas in his book Social Credit, has this to say at page 149:

> To a financier a country is simply something on which to base a mortgage. Just as a private estate which is not mortgaged is, to a money lender, an excrescence on the landscape, so a country whose national debt is not as large as is consistent with security is an object of solicitude to international finance.

The international bankers have done their work so well that every child born in this Canada of ours immediately upon birth assumes a debt of almost one thousand dollars, upon which it must pay tribute from the time of its birth to the time of its death. By far the largest proportion of the taxes which Canadians pay is composed of interest on debt. Major Douglas, in giving evidence before the agriculture committee of Alberta, had this to say with respect to taxes, at page 126 of the evidence:

> Now who gets the taxes? The people who complain do not get the taxes. The taxes for the major part go directly into the coffers of the financial system, because they are the bondholders. They are the people who create war and the national debts, and so forth. The national debt is created by a technical process, which inevitably in the first place puts it into the hands of the financial authorities, and the service of that national debt requires taxation. Any popular cry against anything except financial institutions will always be supported by high finance, because it provides the taxes to serve those interests.

To sum up the situation I would say that the international bankers have, through a system of mass usury and taxation, brought the whole world to their feet, so much so that if they were to foreclose, the largest proportion of the population of the world would be forced to retreat to another planet.

If the parliament of Canada were to reclaim its sovereign right and exercise it like the banks of to-day it would be able to purchase anything at no cost to itself. With national money there would be no need for national debt, war debt or any other kind of government debt.

In my opinion the greatest travesty on justice is that after the peoples of the world have paid for a war with the flower of their manhood and the destruction of their homes and property, they and succeeding generations must slave for the rest of their lives to pay tribute to the money-changers on a debt which has already been fully paid.

I am not yet convinced either one way or the other so far as the necessity for arming Canada is concerned. But what I am convinced of is that if defence measures are necessary, they can be financed without borrowing and without taxation of a single, solitary cent. If we are to restore democracy we must do two things: First, we must restore to parliament its sacred and sovereign right, that of creating and issuing the medium of exchange, and, second, we must see that this money reaches the hands of the people in adequate quantities. Its sacred right having been restored, it would then become the duty of parliament to see that whatever was physically possible and desirable would become financially possible.

I should like now to elaborate a little on two ways in which national money could be used in Canada to promote world peace. I believe the greatest antidote to war is a happy and contented people. In my opinion an atmosphere conducive to armed conflict is possible only when people are unhappy and discontented because of the grave social injustices they are forced to tolerate. When men have an opportunity of establishing and enjoying the privileges of a home, they are not prone to leave them to destroy others who are engaged in the same happy activities. The vast majority of people to-day have but one great desire, and that is a more equitable distribution of both the actual and the potential abundance of real wealth, and the absolute security of a home. The home is the most beautiful, wonderful, gigantic and powerful institution that any nation can ever hope to possess. When the home life is jeopardized, the nation itself is in jeopardy. I feel quite satisfied that if there were made in this country an economic survey similar to that made under the direction of Mr. Harold Loeb in the United States of America, it would reveal the fact that we in this Canada of ours, with its immense quantity of natural wealth and its sparse population, could produce sufficient building material, furniture, conveniences and luxuries to provide every Canadian citizen with a completely modern home. If the United States with its present plant equipment can produce over $4,000 worth of consumable goods for every family of four, I see no reason why Canada could not do the same or even better. It is physically possible for every Canadian citizen to be a home owner, and all that remains is to make it financially possible.

If the government of Canada would so arrange its monetary and economic systems that every Canadian citizen who so desired could establish and own a home provided with all the conveniences, comforts and luxuries which industry is capable of producing or which the citizen desires to avail himself of, and if the occupants of these homes were permitted to enjoy the cultural advantages of modern society, I feel quite convinced that that would constitute one of the greatest contributions which Canada could make towards promoting world peace.

During the course of my reading I came upon a suggestion as to what could have been done with the money spent on the great war if that money had been used for the enrichment of life rather than for its destruction. This man stated that the financial cost of the war was $400,000,000,000; that such a sum could have provided for every family in the United States, Canada, Australia, the British isles, France, Belgium, Germany and Russia, a house worth $2,500 with furniture worth $1,000, on a piece of land worth $500; for all cities of 20,000 and over a library worth $5,000,000, and a university worth $10,000,000, and that with the remainder there could have been established a fund which at five per cent would have provided $1,000 a year for 125,000 teachers and 125,000 nurses. I venture to assert that if this money had been used for that purpose there would never have been a world war, and instead of a hell on earth there could now have been a virtual paradise of beautiful homes.

Another great contribution which Canada could make towards world peace would be to demonstrate that a nation becomes prosperous, not because she exports more than she imports, but because she distributes among her own people as much of her own goods as her own people desire to consume and exports only the real surplus, and that not until she has imported goods equivalent in value to that of her surplus. If Canada gave the lie to the so-called favourable balance of trade policy and the necessity for struggling and competing for foreign markets, she would have taught a lesson which the nations of the world could not very well ignore. Since the necessity for forcing our way into foreign markets would be obviated, great armies and navies to defend the hard-won foreign markets and to keep open against all comers these precious foreign trade routes would no longer be necessary. The job of the armament makers would vanish for lack of material to work on. When what I have suggested is done, instead of international distrust and suspicion, the nations of the world will find a basis for harmonious cooperation. Then, and not until then, will peace visit the earth.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say this: Let the prerogative of the crown be restored to parliament, and as a result of the exercising of that power let the peoples of the world discover that in comparison with population Canada has the largest number of beautiful homes. Let it be known that the occupants of Canadian homes are the most enlightened, the healthiest and the happiest people on earth, and it will not be long before the peoples of other countries will demand that their governments institute policies similar to those of Canada and thus avert a universal catastrophe. If the Liberal government had done last year what it led the people of Canada to believe it was going to do, we no doubt would at this time be enjoying the fruits of a policy such as I have suggested. But because they have not restored to government its sacred and sovereign right, and propose to finance appropriations for armaments with debt money, I intend to vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, following the many speeches we have listened to in this chamber, I do not intend to speak at any great length on this question. I merely wish to state why I shall vote to-morrow against the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and why I shall also vote for the armament expenditures which the present government is submitting for our approval.

Mr. Speaker, I hesitated a long time before reaching this decision. I received from all sides, but particularly from large cities, resolutions adopted by people who presumed to dictate the stand to be taken by members of this house and I wondered whether the increased expenditure we were asked to approve was really necessary to ensure the security of our country.

However, the arguments advanced by those who spoke in this chamber against the increased outlay for armaments and the resolutions I received have not convinced me that the sum requested by the government is unnecessary.

I have greater faith, Mr. Speaker, in men such as the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the province of Quebec, the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) than I have in all those organizations that ask us to vote on a question they do not even understand. Moreover, among the organizations that wrote to us and asked us to register our vote, the most serious minded did not ask us to vote against the proposed military outlays. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, of Montreal, which merely asks us to vote so that the necessary expenditures shall be applied to the defence of Canada properly speaking, within its territorial limits. As I see it, we were asked to vote a sum of money merely for the territorial defence of Canada and we were not asked to approve the expenditure of a single cent for empire defence. Moreover, we were told our armaments had to be more up to date. We were told of the necessity of increasing our armament for the defence of our territory, and with this view I fully agree, and I intend supporting the government. I think the time has come for us to consider our defence requirements, and that we should not merely rely upon England and the United States for our protection but that we can and must defend ourselves.

Let us not repeat the mistake of 1911. At that time a movement was started in the province of Quebec which brought about the downfall of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I may say that this movement which broke out in 1911 in the province of Quebec was the immediate cause of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's defeat. What happened? Once Sir Wilfrid Laurier was no longer in power there came that fateful hour for Canada in 1914, and we had not then at the head of the government a man like Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who could have actually assumed the leadership of the Canadian people. Our leaders in this country were rabid imperialists, men who at once, without consulting parliament, without consulting the country, plunged Canada into the war of 1914-1918; and these are the same men who later on, in 1917, applied conscription.

The statements by our Prime Minister at Geneva and elsewhere, as well as those he made in this chamber, convince me that there is a determination to avoid repeating the mistake of 1914, and that, in fact, when the country is called upon to make a decision, it will not be the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government who will make it. The Prime Minister has pledged himself upon his honour to consult the House of Commons, and it will rest with the whole country to determine whether we shall participate or not in a conflict. That is what all the provinces of Canada asked for, that is what my own province urged, and that is the reason why I am ready to give a vote of confidence in the government.

Mr. Speaker, I have no other remarks to add. I do know that an overwhelming majority of Liberals in this chamber will follow the counsel given us by our political leaders and I believe that such a course will be conducive to Canada's welfare. Hence, I will, for these reasons, give my support to the government.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): In rising to speak to this motion I wish to call attention to the fact that most of our time in this debate has been taken up with talk about war, rumours of war, preparations for war and matters of that kind. I do not consider that a discussion such as we have had for the past four days serves any good purpose. We are only delaying the work of the house, and accomplishing nothing. Some of the subjects that have been brought up relate to former resolutions. One of these was the first clause of a resolution introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), as follows:

That under existing international relations, in the event of war, Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be.

In the absence of any armaments how could we enforce that neutrality? It is all very well to say that we should remain neutral, but if we have no armaments to enforce that neutrality we would not be neutral very long.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is in connection with the motion of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), that:

—in the event of another war involving Canada's active participation, every agency, financial, industrial, transportation or natural resources, shall automatically be conscripted for the duration of such a war, and that a penalty be imposed for the violation thereof.

I say here and now that I am opposed to any form of conscription, whether it be man power or anything else. If we have the proper conditions existing in Canada there will be no occasion to conscript people; if the country is attacked they will protect the country themselves because they have something to protect. It is not necessary to conscript wealth or to conscript industry; that cannot be done very well, but what can be done is to impose such taxation on the wealth and industry in the country that there will not be any profit made out of war. That is quite possible, but I do not believe conscription can be enforced, and I am not in favour of conscription, because there would occur something like what happened when there was an attempt in this country to reduce interest rates. Interest rates were reduced, certainly, but they were reduced on deposits, and you still paid as much to draw money as you did before. That is what would happen if you started to conscript. Men who had one hundred head of stock would have them all taken, but a fellow who had one hundred thousand head would probably have plenty left after you got through conscripting. I am not in favour of conscripting anything at any time, but if you do conscript the man power, then you should provide by some means that there would not be any profit made out of the slaughter. It is a deplorable thing to make a profit out of slaughter.

Let us look a little further into this resolution:

How are you going to impose a penalty, and what is the penalty going to be? It seems to me you must have police and courts in order to impose a penalty. I have never had any desire at any time to join the police force, but I think it necessary to have a police force, and a well-equipped one, and I do not think that having a well-equipped police force is an incentive to crime. If you have armaments I do not believe they are an incentive to war. I hate war just as much as does any hon. member. I have a great deal to lose if war came. As far as I am concerned I would probably not be considered fit for a soldier at my time of life, but I have three sons. I would not want to see those boys conscripted and taken to war, or taken in any other way. It seems to me that we have confused the issue a great deal. We have been talking about whether we should go to war and all that, but that is not the issue. In my opinion the issue is whether we should have national defence, and if we should, whether these estimates are in order. That is what we should be considering.

Many hon. members have made the suggestion that we should rely upon the United States for protection. A good many hon. members on this side of the house have referred to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as the representative of labour. I cannot agree with that, although I have no quarrel with any of the hon. gentlemen who sit in the ranks of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. But I do not wish hon. members who are not well acquainted with labour affairs to refer to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as the representatives of labour. I grant that they represent some classes of labour, but they do not represent all the labour people in this dominion. Organized labour men despise people who will take the privileges that are gained by organized labour but will not help to maintain the organization which gets them those privileges. The action of such people is on a par with the suggestion that we should depend upon the United States to protect us and pay nothing for that protection. There are many labour men in this country—and my friends of the cooperative commonwealth federation know it—who will take all the privileges that the labour organizations secure for them, but will not pay any dues. The argument they put up is: Why should I pay dues? The other fellow has to protect me when he is protecting himself. And they ride on the coat-tails of the others. As a Canadian I do not want to be riding on the coat-tails of Uncle Sam. They are good and long but I do not want to ride on them.

This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), replying to a remark by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in reference to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), that it was double-barrelled, said that if it were double-barrelled it was for the purpose of dealing with a two-faced government. That is what the hon. member said if I heard him correctly. I wished to interject a question at that time, but the hon. member sat on me and sat on me pretty hard. That was his privilege, and I am not holding anything against him for it, but in saying he would not permit a question I take it he included all hon. members on the government side of the house. Being one of those members I naturally resent that. I have been working in the interests of organized labour for thirty-five years, and I have never at any time done anything that was not in the interest of organized labour as I saw it. I may be wrong, but that is the way I see it. The hon. member is altogether too vulnerable to make a statement of that kind. I should like to refer to a couple of instances in the last session. I was not here very much during that session on account of sickness, but I read from the record in Hansard which I assume is correct. This is a motion moved last year by the hon. member for Vancouver East:

> Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend all the right of citizenship;
> Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take the necessary measures to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, I was a young member of this house, in experience if not in years, and I was very new to parliamentary procedure. I did not fully realize what my position would be if I did not speak on a question of that kind. In British Columbia we naturally have a greater percentage of orientals than in any other province, and I should have been among those who spoke to that motion. I did not say anything because I was not in a position to vote for the resolution. It was not that I wanted to see more orientals in British Columbia, but there are many more important things to be considered than the few orientals who may be allowed into this country. At the time I was objecting most strenuously to the importation of orientals, they were being brought here in boatloads to work on the railways and for similar work, to displace white labour. The few orientals who come into Canada now are mainly of the better class, educated men, scientists, doctors, lawyers and so on. I was not very much interested in those few men, and moreover we had an agreement with Japan, so I did not think it would be very good business to stir up too much trouble. I had no objection to the hon. member for Vancouver East bringing in his resolution, but I did object very strenuously to a statement he made in closing the debate, and of course when he spoke the second time he concluded the debate on that resolution. This is what he said:

> Anyone voting against it votes for the principle that we should let people come into this country to stay permanently to whom we cannot grant the rights and privileges of citizenship. He will also vote for the continued coming of these people into the country.

As everyone knows, that was not the idea at all. We were not voting to allow these people to come in; we were simply voting not to disturb an agreement that existed between this country and Japan. There is no doubt at all in my mind, however, that during the next election in British Columbia this will be used against me, and there is just enough truth in it that one cannot say it is a lie. This will be broadcast from the platforms of British Columbia against me during the next election, if I run.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I have not the slightest objection to the hon. member discussing this resolution, because I do not think it is anything to my discredit, but what has it to do with the motion now before the house? It has absolutely nothing to do with it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: As to the point of order, there has been very wide latitude allowed during this debate, and I do not think I should rule the hon. gentleman out of order at this time.

Mr. O'NEILL: There is another matter to which I should like to direct attention at this time; I refer to another remark made by the hon. member for Vancouver East for which he did not apologize, and I am very much surprised that he was permitted to get away with it. I do not think he should be allowed to get away with it even now. This was the remark he made:

> However, that did not prevent the Liberal party from helping the communists in Vancouver East. I am told that the communist candidate in Vancouver East did not put in an account of his election expenses, and I understand his reason for refraining was that the Liberal party had provided the funds and that it was up to them to put in the expense account.

Two days later, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman made this statement:

> Since that time I have received information from Mr. Bruce, who was the communist candidate, that my statement was not correct. As he has no one here to make the statement for him, I wish to put that on record.

That is something else which, I suppose, will be used during the next election in British Columbia. The first statement was published on the front pages of newspapers in British Columbia, but the second statement appeared on the back pages of the newspapers, in among the advertisements, in a very small space.

As to the question of whether or not we should increase our armaments, let me say this: I started to work in British Columbia when I was a kid. I have never had to fight since I left school, but I did not make that enviable record by advertising to the world that I could not or would not fight.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the house at this time I give my assurance that I shall do my best to be very brief. Until a few hours ago I had no thought of taking part in this debate, for the reason that to me Canada's need for additional security is so obvious that I took it for granted that the proper time for discussion would be when the estimates were before the committee. But, when I read in the press of Tuesday evening that Great Britain was planning to again increase armaments on both land and sea, it brought very forcefully to my mind the question of Canada's defence, and awakened in me a greater responsibility, as a member of this parliament, towards the people whom I have the honour to represent.

If the report which I observed in the press were correct, as undoubtedly it was, that Great Britain is planning to spend well over $250,000,000 for capital ships, cruisers, infantry and tank battalions, and so on, with a large increase for her navy, then it must be patent to all either that Great Britain is putting forth an even more strenuous effort to avert war or that she suspects that a crisis is imminent. I think I am substantially correct when I say that at one time it was considered heroic to provoke or to promote war but that to-day, so far as Great Britain and Canada are concerned, the opposite is true. In my opinion one of the outstanding characteristics of the mother country in recent years has been her desperate, determined and ever increasing efforts to avert war. I think it can be truly said that she was the last great nation to follow this rearmament policy.

Let it be distinctly understood that I am definitely opposed to war, and that I consider it my duty to do everything in my power to this end. Moreover, I am unalterably against everything in the nature of increased taxation, where it can be judiciously and economically avoided. If I thought the amount in the estimates was to be voted for the purpose of sending our men and boys and resources overseas, or out of Canada, I would vote against it. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) have reiterated time and again most emphatically that not one dollar of the estimates is for defence other than in our own country and for the security of our homes, our families, our cities, our industries, our trade routes, our canals, our harbours and coastlines, our self-respect, and the preservation of her vast area, rich on the surface and underneath, which is the envy of all the warring nations of the world.

Moreover, everyone in Canada knows it is the policy, written and implied, of this government, that not one soldier will be called upon to serve out of Canada without the sanction of parliament being first obtained. Furthermore, the people have implicit confidence that these commitments will be carried out—that is, if there is sufficient time for that to be done. My reason for the last observation is that we must not overlook the fact that fleets of bombing aeroplanes could leave Europe at this time to-night and have these parliament buildings blown to pieces by this time to-morrow. Does anyone in the house or elsewhere believe that we shall be immune from danger of attack simply because we provide nothing for our protection? If that principle be true, why not apply it to our police protection in the municipalities throughout the country. Why do we retain officers all through these buildings and on government property in Ottawa and elsewhere? We do so because there is possibility of some insidious act on the part of ill-disposed persons. Self-preservation is the first law of nature.

For these and many other reasons I could mention, had I not the keen desire to conserve the time of the house, I intend to vote against the amendment which, after all, is little more than a motion of want of confidence in the government. It also involves condemnation of the government for the inadequacy of its social security program. Just why the hon. members for Vancouver (Mr. MacNeil) and Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) presented the amendment in its present form and saw fit to precipitate a long debate costing the taxpayers of Canada tens of thousands of dollars, is beyond my comprehension.

On Tuesday, February 16, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), referring to the amendment, is reported at page 961 of Hansard as follows:

> It is well worded; I have no objection to the wording of it.

My well-considered opinion is that the amendment is drafted in its present scientific form so as to make it impossible to obtain the support of the members of both the Liberal and the Conservative party in the house, so that when hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party have an opportunity of later discussing the matter on the public platform they will reiterate their oft-repeated accusation that neither of the older parties mentioned has the interests of our people at heart.

Whatever may be the opinion of the people of Canada as to whether the amount in the estimates is too great or too little, I am sure they are all opposed to this expensive and futile debate, more particularly since it is quite obvious to all that the amendment will obtain the support of only a handful of the members of the house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, over and over in my life have I found the thing that I ought to do not at all the thing that I liked to do. On this occasion I once more find it so. With the minds of people throughout Canada so filled with doubt, disagreement and fear, who is there that, if his conscience would let him, would not in connection with anything pertaining to war, gladly hold his peace? And yet in these so critical times, with all of yesterday's glowing achievement and all of to-morrow's glorious promise trembling in hazard, one must speak, prayerful that his remarks be wise.

May I say at the outset that no socialist in this building or out of it hates war more heartily than I do. I will grant with anyone, that war never settles anything, that no peace ever satisfies any of the people who make it. Let any treaty be made as wisely as possible, the next generation will likely rise up and curse it. Every modern treaty contains the seeds of a greater war than it closes. I will grant all that. These things are freely and heartily conceded, but I cannot and will not entirely blame the delegates who made or must make that peace. The deficiencies in any given treaty are there not necessarily because of the treachery, the wickedness, the ignorance, the weakness or the indiscretion of the delegates, but because of the clash of interests, the fierceness of passion, the pressure of public opinion and the general set-up of circumstance in the clutch of which the delegates usually find themselves hopelessly gripped.

I will grant furthermore with ready alacrity that war is a fearful waste, that war is monstrously destructive of lives, of health, of comfort and virtue, of happiness and of both real and financial wealth. War fastens upon all participating nations a bondage of debt which enslaves their peoples to the third and fourth generations, and even beyond that. I concede that in any war any participant or combination of participants risks its national freedom, if not its very existence.

Beyond that I will go and concede that the causes of war appear never to be righteous and are almost never what they seem. I will agree that financiers, through hidden international intrigue, manipulate the factors which produce war, and that with them in their baleful endeavours are bound up the munition makers. It must further be conceded that war is always motivated by selfishness and greed, frequently the selfishness and greed of great private corporations and industries, and that secret treaties also help to cause war, as do likewise political machination and trickery. I frankly concede that propaganda, rousing fear, suspicion and hatred, often by shameful lies, both provokes war and tends to prolong it.

Again I will further allow and even contend that war is morally wicked; that it is nothing short of mass murder and mass robbery and that it both engenders and is engendered by mass hatred. As everyone knows, these three things are grossly un-Christian. Yet again I will with enthusiasm maintain that the burdens of war are unjustly distributed. Both suffering and sacrifice are borne by the poor, while little, if any, of these are borne by the rich. The values wasted in war are human values more than material values. The real fighters, the really deserving ones, rarely if ever get such rewards as come from war. The greatest sufferers are the mothers, the sisters, the wives and the sweethearts, the innocent and helpless among us. Could it avail us anything, I would at this time cry out as loudly and as bitterly as anyone against the monstrous wrong and the shameful pity of it all. But alas an outcry would be but an outcry.

Having expressed in some measure my hatred of war, let me now challenge any man in this dominion to show that he is more earnest and more determined than I in his desire and in his efforts to remove the real causes of war. I know what those causes are and I know they must be removed. I have some notion as to how they might be removed, and in so far as in me lies, I shall gladly devote my life's energies in any intelligent effort to remove those causes.

Let me here briefly review a few of the factors which result in war. I am aware that it was largely poverty, especially poverty in the midst of plenty, that rendered possible a Hitler, a Mussolini, a Lenin and a Franco. I am aware also that trade rivalry and the struggle for markets spur nations to outbursts of envy, jealousy and hatred and were in a large measure responsible for the terrible crisis of 1914. I am painfully aware that there are flagrant inequalities among nations; that certain nations such as Italy and Japan are manifestly cramped in point of territory; that many are hampered by lack of resources such as coal and oil and nickel and other commodities needed in the modern industrial world, while at the same time they see neighbour nations, such as our own, keeping almost unused a superabundance of the very things they require. I perceive that in the relentless struggle for markets which must characterize an industrialized world under the present economic system, many weaker or less fortunate nations have seen their markets appropriated by stronger and more fortunate nations. No one senses more keenly than I that somehow, in a general spirit of international compromise and cooperative goodwill, we must remove these irksome inequalities.

Of the fact that there are other galling handicaps, I am not ignorant. No one needs to point out to me how there are nations lacking access to ocean highways because of geographical and artificial boundaries, lacking, as for example Poland did, access to ports and seas. Such a state of affairs makes people fret. It is not as it should be. Years ago it was brought home to me that there are certain races whose nationalities were suppressed by other races. Examples that come readily to mind are the Germans of Austria, the Magyars of former Austria-Hungary and the Poles before the treaty of Versailles. Such a condition creates a breeding ground for the generation of bitterness. It should somehow be removed. Let me, here and now, declare that I will set my foot as far as he who goes farthest in any sane attempt to remove these conditions. But who can tell me how? Where is he who knows? Eagerly and hungrily searching, I will listen to anyone's idea and give it my utmost respect. I am ready to go far in sacrifice or compromise once I have confidence that the sacrifice will permanently solve the problem. Meanwhile, living in a world of stark realities, I know that men must carry on and I conceive it to be my duty to give my support to those who are trying to carry on to the best of their ability and with apparently the best wisdom that man has attained.

Mr. Speaker, I dread war as much as any pacifist in the land—I dread and abhor it. There are four sons in my household, any one of whom means many times more to me than my own life and health. Three of them would be in immediate danger in the next war. As dear to me as my sons are several brothers whose names would almost surely be numbered for service. I have daughters and sisters who might be bereaved. In my life as a teacher I have learned to love with a peculiar tenderness the great numbers of boys and girls whose lives have been entrusted to my care. No one can value more the youth of this land. When I see a young man on the street and there flashes into my mind, as there does so often, a vision of his splendid body shattered by the hand of war, sickness comes over me so nauseating as to make me almost faint. When I see the beautiful face of any of our girls and the vision flashes into my mind of that face distorted with woe, I am moved almost beyond control. At the same time I realize that in the next war civilization is likely to be wiped out entirely. But what can be done about it? If we leave our country utterly undefended while the nations all around are arming, how can we hope that our weakness will prevent our destruction? When has the helplessness of the lamb rendered it immune from the wolf, or the defencelessness of the innocent child saved it from the kidnapping marauder.

As vividly as any man I sense the many excuses which we might offer for not now preparing. Many a youth, for example, is brooding in his heart and saying such bitter words as: "You fellows making the laws do not have to do the fighting; if you did, you would not be quite so ready to talk about armaments." To them I can only reply: "Perhaps so, but our elders decided the last war for us." Had we known all that they knew, I think we would have agreed with them. We members now bear the responsibility. We are trying to do for those whom we represent, perhaps not altogether what they now would ask us to do, but what we believe they would want us to do if they knew what we know and sensed what we sense. We are trying to do what they might wish we had done when they know, ten years from now, more than they now know. Again there are heard throughout the land voices muttering, not loud but deep: "Make Canada fit to live in; make it worth defending and we will gladly defend it. Give a square deal to the men who did your dirty work in the last war." With such voices I feelingly sympathize. I know men have mismanaged this house of ours, this Canada, and we cannot yet agree how to manage it; but shall we because of that, and while we are arguing how to manage it, let our enemies snatch it away from us or bomb our children within it?

Others are saying that the United States will defend us. Probably so, but could we lift up our heads and call ourselves an independent nation if another nation had to defend us? If upon the United States depended the responsibility for defending us, how long would it be before the United States would demand a potent voice in the management of our external affairs? Many ardent souls have struggled through many decades to make Canada independent and to assert Canada's nationhood. What for? That Canada might become a dependant of the United States?

Still other people are saying: "Britain will defend us." But suppose the strain should be too great and Britain should fall. Would Canadians then feel as safe as they feel now when Britain stands? Suppose that she should fall and we knew that that fall had come because she had risked her safety to defend us. Could Canadians ever again be reconciled? If we failed to do our share in preparing to defend our own coasts, and if, because of that, the democracies of the world should fail, could we ever hold up our heads? At other times I hear voices say: What can Canada possibly do to defend herself in modern warfare—there is no safety in war? Such truth as lies in their contention I gladly grant. At the same time I must remember the story of the little drops of water that can make a mighty ocean. Besides, did anyone say during the great war that Canada could do so little? Did anyone think such a thing just after the great war? I cannot help feeling that if we in Canada do anything less than all we can in reason do, then in case of a disaster we must stand blameworthy both to ourselves and to all generations. We shall have betrayed our trust.

Some voices say: Well, Canada's place is in union with the United States; let us leave our defence to the United States, and let what will be, be. These people I beg to remind that even if they become a part of the United States they could not possibly escape the responsibilities of war. Witness what is going on in the United States at the present time!

Still other voices argue: Let us keep ourselves helpless so that we cannot fight, and then we will be sure not to fight. My knowledge of history does not permit me to agree with them. It has generally been found that when men want to fight, they fight, regardless of preparation. Look at ourselves in the last war. Britain, they tell me, was not fully prepared until 1918; yet she fought, and for having been unprepared, terrible was the price she paid. Let hon. members in this connection recall what they heard men in this country saying one year ago while Ethiopia was being lacerated. Did they not hear many regretting Canada's inaction as a member of the league? How would Canadians have felt if it had been Australia instead of Ethiopia? How would they feel should New Zealand now be attacked? Would they say: Leave her to it? I have not yet found a single Canadian who would state that he would consent to such a thing. Suppose that Newfoundland were attacked: then what?

Let us come right down to the present moment: How do our people feel about Spain now? Let me read to the members of this house a resolution which I received from a Canadian city only this morning, and that from the very kind of men who are most bitterly opposing Canadian preparedness:

> Whereas it has been learned that the great fighter for Spanish and world democracy, General Emil Kleber, has been captured by the insurgent armies in the storming of Malaga and,
> Whereas we believe that the efforts of General Kleber, a Canadian citizen, in the leading of the international brigade, is a heroic work in support of Spanish and world democracy, and that his great work is in line with the mission that our own Doctor Bethune is carrying on in Madrid,
> Therefore be it resolved that we do urgently petition the federal M.P.'s at Ottawa to take this matter up at once with the federal government to demand the immediate release of General Kleber out of the hands of the fascist executioners at Malaga, who are being openly aided by the fascist countries of Germany and Italy, in violation of the non-intervention agreement that they have themselves signed,
> And be it further resolved that we do urge upon the federal government that they do everything in their power to call upon the non-intervention committee in London that they demand of the fascist junta in Burgos, Spain, that General Kleber be granted freedom at once.

What would happen to the world if members did what these men urge? What would occur if we could get done what they want us to do? The world would likely be plunged into war, and we along with the rest. How many people have you talked with in Canada who wished to volunteer to go and help the Spanish loyalists? In her present state of unpreparedness Canada could do little or nothing on either side, no matter what she might want to do. Even if bombs were dropped by raiders on this parliament building, on our food factories, on our other industrial centres or on our railway stations, what could we do right now? We are living in a world in which wolves abound. Shall we, to make sure that we will not shoot any of these wolves in case they attack us, leave ourselves without a gun? It would surely seem to be the part of wisdom in us to buy ourselves a good gun and a supply of cartridges, and to learn how to shoot. What we will shoot, or whether we will shoot, we can leave ourselves free to decide, if and when the emergency arises.

I long found myself persistently mystified whenever I tried to make clear to myself why it was that Canada which, from shore to shore, twenty years ago was throbbing with patriotic fervour was becoming not only largely apathetic to considerations of unity, but actually hostile. A British commonwealth which paid so great a price for racial safety now gives palpable evidence of approaching disintegration. The people are the same; their ideals are the same; their danger is as great as ever; but something appears to be progressively embittering them. The blame for this whole development I am going to lay relentlessly upon the financial system under which we live. Our present system, outgrown, obsolete, utterly inadequate, is deteriorating to the point of irreparable ruin—not only the whole British Empire but the whole British people. It might with much reason be argued that every government which is stubbornly clinging to the present system is doing more to compass the destruction of the British race than is any man or movement in the outside world to-day.

Major Douglas as far back as 1923 warned democracy over and over again of the coming of this depression and of the coming of this awful danger of war. Even earlier than that he gave all British people instructions how they might avoid the approaching disaster, and all he got for his pains was supercilious sneers. How can it possibly be that men, rather than accept a new idea, will so risk irretrievable disaster? Even without accepting any new ideas, the men who have been in charge of British nations since the beginning of the great war could have avoided a great deal of this bitterness. Had they only so controlled profit-making during the great war that Canadians would not have had to reflect upon millionaires whose ill-gotten gains were amassed under the guise of patriotism while their fellow-Canadians suffered and bled, we should all be feeling better now.

Let me now turn to one of the most urgent reasons against preparation—one which is suggested in the amendment, namely, consideration for the bad economic conditions and the crying need everywhere obtaining in Canada, the thought how shameful it is to use for defence, money so gravely needed for relief. I do not believe that we should or need use for our defence any of the money which we should or would otherwise use for relief or for other social services. I have urged before in this house, and will perhaps urge many times again, that this dominion government under existing circumstances can safely create a considerable amount of money and safely use it for any necessary purpose.

I have been answered with the retort that such procedure would cause inflation. There has thus far been advanced no argument that can justify that answer. How would Canada proceed to finance herself if war were to break out and she were to become involved? With people in such poverty as they now are throughout this country, how could we possibly hope to raise great victory loans as we did in the last war? During those years Britain spent far more money, I am told, than there was in the whole of Britain, and she still had plenty to carry on. Where did the money come from? Apparently the banks created a great deal of it. Who would create the money in Canada in case of another crisis? Would the banks or would the government? If not the government, why not? The government backs the money anyway, by backing the banks. Why should new money whether created by the banks or by government cause inflation? The government of Great Britain financed the war with a sort of government money. It worked and was sound.

The argument has been laboured that we must have goods; that goods and services are the only purchasing power. If we grant that, how then can we possibly have overproduction? And if goods are purchasing power why then are not banks now lending freely to produce more goods, and why is the government not campaigning for more production of milk, meats, vegetables, sugar, clothing, electricity, building material, coal and the like? We are told the Liberals want more purchasing power; why are they not then taking the most direct method of getting it? We now want purchasing power to finance defence. Why not produce the goods and services, and with them as purchasing power finance our defence? In this manner can be swept away a great deal of the present opposition to the government's defence policy.

And now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with certain considerations pertaining to defence, and having given to some extent the reasons which prevent these considerations from persuading me to oppose the government's policy, let me now give some of the thoughts which have led me this year to support that policy. I choose to use homely and simple illustrations, for I find myself able to think to better advantage in terms of concrete experience. We all recognize that any man has the right to kill in self defence. We, therefore, must regard the individual human life as sacred above all things. If I entered my neighbour's home with intent to kill him, or to do him serious bodily harm, everyone would justify him in killing me. Most people would censure him if he did not kill me. If I entered his home with intent to harm any of his family, and he knew my purpose, most people would justify him in stopping me by force, even to the extent of killing me. If he, knowing or strongly surmising my intent, did not prevent me by force if need be, most people would blame him; many would despise him, his wife and his children among them.

Now, if that neighbour, knowing that I was coming armed, failed to prepare himself against me, he would be almost universally blamed, if not censured. What applies to an individual must surely apply to a community of individuals. Even if my neighbour knew that I was bringing a machine gun or a bomb, or any other deadly device, most people would expect him to do all that he could, even to the extent of giving his life, to save his family. The same reasoning ought to apply to any community of individuals. If, knowing that I was armed and that I might by chance violate his home, he failed to arm himself against my coming, he would be blamed for failure to arm himself against my coming. After I had armed, if he so armed himself, could anyone possibly reason that his arming had caused me to attack him? Again, if that neighbour of mine found himself dwelling in a vicinity where most of the men were armed, would you not hold him blameworthy if he did not arm himself? And if, under such circumstances he did arm himself, can anyone consistently contend that his arming himself would cause me or any of his other armed neighbours to attack him? This reasoning, again, applying as it manifestly does to an individual, appears to me to apply with equal force to communities of individuals.

Now, Canada is that neighbour; she lives in an armed world community; she is filled with resources, fabulously rich—rich in the very materials which ambitious nations covet. If her rulers neglect to arm her, how they can possibly escape the censure of all carefully thinking people it is beyond my power to comprehend.

It seems fitting to me that I should dwell with some care upon certain other causes of war which hitherto, as far as I recollect, have not, in this debate, been greatly stressed. Let me return again to individuals and their neighbours. Let us suppose that my neighbour has a sixteen year old boy. Everybody recognizes that this boy will naturally express himself. He may shout and sing a great deal, not because he wishes to annoy his parents or their neighbours, but just because he wishes to express himself. His parents naturally will endeavour to restrain him. Suppose, now, that he refuses to listen to persuasion or to reason, no matter how much we all remonstrate with him, what can we do about it? Most ordinary people would say that in some manner or another, sooner or later, force would have to be applied to that boy. If his parents did not do it, some of his neighbours, perhaps his neighbour's sixteen year old boy, would likely do it. There are boys among nations. It is because of this fact that we have come to think of collective security through alliances, ententes, leagues of nations and the like. So long as there are no alliances or leagues of nations sufficient to give this collective security, it would seem to be beyond question that each of the neighbours must be prepared, either individually or in cooperation with several neighbours, either to administer correction or to fill the rowdy ones with a measure of awe. There appears no way of avoiding the implications of this reasoning.

Here is another thought. Each race becomes passionately attached to its own way of doing things, to its own civilization, as we call it. A people's language, habits of thought, modes of life, et cetera, constitute something which the Germans called kultur. Now, it is a well-known fact that it is the natural impulse of each human being to try to get other human beings to do as he or she does. As we say, it is the natural impulse, almost an instinct, of nearly everyone to try to impose his will upon his neighbour. It is an equally potent and prevalent impulse for everyone to resent any attempt of his neighbour to impose his will upon him; that is, as we say, each one naturally wants his own way about it. This impulse to impose one's will upon another, and this equally urgent impulse to resent such imposition, and to develop oneself in one's own way, cause ceaseless struggle among individual human beings. Generally the struggle takes the form of a clash of personality resulting in quarrels. But if satisfactory results cannot be obtained by a quarrel, there will be a fight; that is, there will be a resort to force.

Now, each nation or race is incessantly attempting to impose its will upon each other race; that is, each nation is trying to bring about universal acceptance of its kultur, its language, its religion in some cases, its education, et cetera. Just as sternly as one individual resents and resists and must resist the imposition of another's will upon him, so sternly does each nation or race resist the imposition of any other race's will or kultur upon it. Away down deep in the heart of every race this instinct resides, ever present. One of the most cogent causes of war is this very impulse. It is the impulse which has in our day resulted in a Mussolini promising his people all the land that the Roman empire ever ruled; this, too, has resulted in the passionate ebullition of racial feeling which has thrust and is still thrusting Hitler into prominence. Thus far, no one that I have ever heard of has been able to give any sufficient remedy for this cause. Canada has her own kultur, though we call it our own civilization. Is it worth preparing to defend? Every people, so far as I can judge, must be constantly on its guard, ready to defend its own culture. There are, at the present time in the world, at least five great peoples, each definitely dreaming of world dominion, each instinctively if not consciously planning to impose upon us and upon others its own kultur. I do not believe that the Anglo-Saxon race—the British peoples—should strive to impose their will upon others, at least by any aggressive means. At the same time who can see any reason that would justify us in allowing others to impose their will upon us?

We must be ready to give and take with all peoples. We must be ready to compromise. We must cultivate in our own hearts understanding of the legitimate aspirations of other peoples and an honest disposition to help them to obtain the good things of this world. We must constantly strive to allow every other race the full right and opportunity to realize the complete development and expression of its own culture, and to contribute that culture to the enrichment of the world's life, always granted that it does not, by realizing itself, hinder unwarrantably the self-realization of its fellow races. That no race might be able to hinder our own self-realization, we must, I conceive, prepare to defend ourselves in case of need.

Mr. Speaker, it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
