GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

10TH REPORT OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House the 10th report, in both official languages, of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-338, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act (retroactive payments).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a private member's bill entitled an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act on retroactive payments.

The intent of the bill is very simple. The bill intends to allow for retroactivity in the area of widows' pensions. The present legislation does not allow for any retroactive claims.

I have proposed that the legislation be modified so that it would be possible to apply for the widows' allowance and receive payments retroactively from the date the claim is filed, not exceeding the death of the veteran. Too often it is the case that, through no fault of their own, these people have not received a pension to which they are entitled. I know of one gentleman who at age 81 found out that he could have received a supplementary allowance, but it was only retroactive in that case 14 months. In this case there is no retroactivity.

I intend to bring forth other similar bills in the very near future. My basic principle is that if government can collect the money it is owed by Canadians—and I believe that should be so—in turn Canadians, the people, should be able to collect the money their government owes them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour, duty and privilege to present to this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It is signed by residents who live in and around the Hamilton area: Beamsville, Ancaster and Hamilton.

These petitioners join a growing list of literally hundreds of thousands of petitioners. They request that Parliament recognizes that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society.

The petitioners ask that we amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

RURAL COMMUNITIES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present here today.

The first is from the communities of Semans and Carrot River in the extreme corners of my riding. The petitioners note that recent actions of the government have been a direct attack on rural communities.

They call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, particularly to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services, and to reject the Conservative agenda of cutbacks and closures.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, from the Choiceland, Melfort, Gronlid area, I have a petition noting that property taxes are escalating for health care, education, infrastructure replacement, social and leisure services as well as for protective services.

The petitioners call on the federal government to continue to bear at least a 30 per cent interest in maintaining the safety and security of Canadian citizens through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

HOUSING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions this morning. One is with respect to housing.

These petitioners point out that constitutional proposals transfer housing to the provinces certainly not necessarily with compensation, including the responsibility for non-profit co-op housing. They point out that co-op housing provides thousands of Canadians with quality, affordable shelter.

These petitioners also point out that certain provinces may be unable to support non-profit co-op housing. They are really quite concerned about that. They want housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility and they want the maintenance of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

PENSIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is with respect to indexed pensions. It comes from the Public Service Alliance of Canada. They are the petitioners.

They point out—and I agree with them wholeheartedly—that indexed pensions are a need not just for a certain segment of the Canadian population but for all Canadians.

They also indicate—and again I am in agreement—that more and more Canadians will retire on fixed incomes unprotected in many instances against inflation. They believe as I do that linking benefits to the increases in the cost of living is really quite necessary.

They lament the fact that the government intends to restrict and remove full inflation protection for federal public servants. They believe, as I do and as I endorse, that the government should in fact be aiming to give everyone, all Canadians, pensions that are protected against the cost of inflation.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, under the provisions of Standing Order 36, to present a petition today. It is a continuing voice from Canadians, in particular from the Ontario area; Oshawa, Whitby and other communities, calling on the government to ensure that it brings in real tax reforms so that we can have a fair tax system in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to rise on behalf of thousands of constituents from my riding of Broadview—Greenwood. They continue to sign petitions asking me to request that the government reconsider its position on the GST and abolish it because the lack of consumer confidence in this country is probably the greatest contribution to the high unemployment and the number of lay-offs that have happened in our country in the last year.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, certified correct under Standing Order 36, signed by a number of residents in my riding which states that whereas the goods and services tax as applied to female sanitary products such as tampons and pads and whereas these products are necessities for women between puberty and menopause and whereas the government has decided that the goods and service tax should not apply to certain foods because they are necessities, wherefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and service tax from women's sanitary products.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 100.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Starred Question No. 100.

Mr. Cooper: Due to the length of this response, I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

*Question No. 100—Ms. Langan

Since January 1, 1985, has the Prime Minister of Canada reimbursed the Government of Canada for the purchase of food consumed by himself, his family or guests and, if so, (a) on what dates did he remit the cheques (b) in what amount?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): During the period from September 1, 1984 to April 30, 1991, the Prime Minister reimbursed a total amount of $55,115.00 for the purchase of food consumed by himself, his family or non-official guests at 24 Sussex.

Cheques covering this expense were remitted as follows:

Cheque Date	Amount	Period Covered
April 15, 1985	4,000.00	Sep / 84 - Mar / 85
September 16, 1985	4,000.00	Apr / 85 - Sep / 85
May 23, 1986	3,773.50	Oct / 85 - Mar / 86
November 27, 1986	3,204.00	Apr / 86 - Aug / 86
December 15, 1986	699.00	Apr / 86 - Aug / 86
October 7, 1987	3,960.00	Sep / 86 - Aug / 86
November 13, 1987	4,182.00	Apr / 87 - Aug / 87
June 17, 1988	4,138.00	Sep / 87 - Mar / 85

October 20, 1988	4,287.50	Apr / 88 - Sep / 85
August 2, 1989	4,949.00	Oct / 88 - Apr / 85
May 31, 1990	4,398.00	May / 89 - Oct / 86

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in order to prevent further ecological disaster through the pillaging of transboundary fish stocks off Canada's east coast, and in order to save an essential national industry and valued way of life for many rural citizens, Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

He said: Mr. Speaker, good morning, good morning to my friends from the west. They seem to be up for this important debate. I am not surprised because the motion is crystal clear. It is very simple.

First of all, it states what the problem is, as you, Mr. Speaker, so well read it a moment ago, and then it gets directly to the solution.

I want to draw the attention of my friends on the government side in particular, and the New Democratic Party, to the wording of the motion because it is not designed to raise any hackles whatsoever, not designed to invite a partisan shouting match, though we are reasonably good at that if it has to be done, if it can make a point, but it is not designed for those purposes. Rather it is designed to seek some consensus on an issue that has been begging for consensus for too long.

First of all, this debate is about the survival of a people, my people, the people who live on the south coast of Newfoundland in communities like Lord's Cove and Rencontre and on the southwest coast in Grand Bruit and Fox Roost, on the northeast coast in Horewood and Aliston, Codroy and Highlands on the west coast, New Ferole up in the northwest coast, Port Hope Simpson in Labrador and yes, in the rural communities of Nova Scotia.

These people, or more correctly, their forebears came to those shores five centuries ago. From the counties of southwest England they came, from Cornwall and from Dorset and from County Tipperary and Limerick and Cork in Ireland and from Scotland and from Wales and from the Channel Islands and from France.

Some of them fled religious persecution. Others fled starvation. They all came because they saw an opportunity to build something better, to build a better life. They did not come empty handed. They came with their tools. They brought with them a language, be it English, French, Welsh, Scottish or Irish. They came with a value system that encompassed a deep awe for human worth, a genuine love of life itself, an uncanny knack for taking advantage of scarce opportunities. They came with a healthy respect for the forces of nature and they came with a stubbornly strong work ethic.

They brought something else. They brought a brand of raw courage, steeped in fatalism and bordering on the foolhardy. There is a Newfoundland folk song that some will be familiar with. It is entitled: Let me fish off Cape St. Mary's. In it there are a couple of lines that capsules that trait of raw courage I have just mentioned. The author had the fisherman riding the waves in the very rough ocean while he pursues his living. The lines are these: "When my dory fails to make it, let me be a man and take it".

These were the people and these are the tools they brought with them. Yes, they built and they built well. They built a better life and they built a cherished way of life which has served us well in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia, served all of Canada well and indeed served the entire world. Because that race of people, while isolated geographically, was never insular.

They sent their best to the four corners of the earth. They sent Captain Bob Bartlett to the north pole with the American explorer Robert Perry. Bob Bartlett is from Brigus in Newfoundland. They sent Georgina Stirling from Twillingate to the concert halls of New York and Paris and Vienna. They sent others to the mission fields of three continents and still others to the faculties of great universities and to the boardrooms of the corporate world.

I ask, is that the recipe for turning out welfare bums? Is there in anything I have said so far any inkling that what we have been up to down there all those years is some mad scheme to produce and to create a generation of pogey people or conniving UI cheque snatchers.

That brings me to what is clearly the soul of this debate. An entire people has been brought to its knees, not through its own greed or its foolhardiness or its laziness or its immorality, but by the despicable actions of others and by the equally despicable lack of action of yet others.

This is indeed about the survival of a people. No one is more painfully aware of that than those people. What is even more excruciatingly painful is to realize your peril but to be helpless to do anything about it.

That is what this debate is all about. We need your help. We need the help of men and women of good will from coast to coast in this country. We need the help of people and of governments around the world.

But first, let me be more specific on one or two points. What are those despicable actions of which I speak? And why do I call them despicable?

Yesterday, along with several of my colleagues, I had the opportunity of meeting with Richard Cashin and with members of the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union who were here from Newfoundland to meet with the Prime Minister and various caucuses.

We heard, as I hope the Prime Minister did as well, from Mr. Cashin and his group in the most graphic terms the terrible toll that foreign overfishing off Canada's east coast is taking on people, on communities, on a way of life.

Indeed, during the meeting Mr. Cashin produced a couple of graphs that show pretty clearly the dimensions of the slaughter which is being perpetrated by the Spanish and by the Portuguese off our coast. The first graph showed us how the Canadian fishing effort has just dropped over the last three or four years, and against that they showed us another graph which showed how the foreign fishing effort, illegal fishing effort, has skyrocketed. The two graphs, side by side, tell a story in themselves.

We the people of rural Newfoundland, we the people of rural Nova Scotia, we the people of conscience all over Canada, need your help. We need you in Williams Lake in British Columbia, in Dauphin, Manitoba, in Sachs Harbour up inside the Arctic Circle, in St. Jean-sur-Richelieu down near the American border, we need your help. It is not your pity we need, we are not looking for pity, that is not what we want to evoke; we want to trigger your common sense.

The wanton pillaging of a precious marine resource defies common sense. Our failure as a nation, as a country, to act against that piracy defies common sense. It is precisely for that reason that I turn to Canadians in every nook and cranny of this great country and I ask them to say to their politicians that they want their national government to call a halt now to the senseless slaughter of fish stocks. They want their national government now to do what has to be done to save an entire way of life and a people from sure oblivion.

This debate, this motion, is about many other things too. Yes, it is about the survival of a people. I have said that. Yes, it is about fish, and I have said that. But it also about environment and it is about ecology and it is about sustainable development. My friend and colleague from Montreal will talk about that.

It is about the snake alley of international relations and the art of the possible, and it is about having the guts to do what has to be done and the savvy to do it. My friend and colleague from Winnipeg will talk about that. Others will talk about that and about the environment. My friend from Davenport, my friend from Broadview—Greenwood, colleagues and friends from all over this country, including I hope in all three parties, will talk about various aspects of this important issue.

This debate is about the hurt, about the pain, about the desperation of the thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of men, women and children whose economic underpinning has been snatched away from them.

My colleagues from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia in particular will talk to you about that, including my colleagues from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and from Gander—Grand Falls.

When the people of Newfoundland and Labrador voted to give up their independence and entered this federation 43 years ago this month as a matter of fact, they brought with them a stubborn and strong work ethic. Newfoundland brought a bank balance for it was in the black when it joined Canada and it brought phenomenal natural wealth, not the least of which was the world's richest and largest fishing grounds.

Now 43 years later, take a look at us. The bank balance has long since gone. The fish are gone, at least for us, although it seems they are there for everybody else. They are there for the Spanish and the Portuguese but they are not there for us. And a strong work ethic is not unlike our appendix, it is still there but it is not of much use anymore. There is no place to practise it.

One of the colourful and descriptive words among many—and this one I believe is unique to the Newfoundland vocabulary—is a word that my good friend whom I am delighted to see here, the gentleman from St. John's West, the minister of fisheries, knows and uses often, I am sure. It is the word hangashore, stay ashore, as in do not go fishing.

A person who is a hangashore is a person who is considered to be lazy. It is the ultimate, the most insulting put-down that you can hurl at another Newfoundlander, to call him a hangashore. Because if he does not go fishing he is lazy, he is a hangashore. What a telling term.

In traditional Newfoundland to work was to fish. The flip side of that, the corollary of that is true today. If you cannot fish, by and large you cannot work in Newfoundland. You are a hangashore, but not deliberately so. You are a forced hangashore. Forced by the Spanish, the Portuguese and the lack of action by the national government.

Do we begin to even understand what this debate is all about? We want to be able to practise our work ethic again. We want first crack at the fish that brought us to these shores five centuries ago.

We are the only Canadians who came into this country by voting to come into it. I was not born a Canadian. My father and mother were not born Canadians. My brothers and sisters were not born Canadians. We voted to embrace a nation. And we want now from that nation we embraced four decades ago, a bit of fairness because we have not been getting it on this issue.

We have become pawns in a larger game, a game that dictated for five whole years, from 1985 to 1990, a shameful silence on this issue. Nobody at the national level spoke up for this issue. Why? Because fish resources during that period were judged to be easy trade-offs for big ticket items with the European Community and an easy trade-off for inflated egos as well.

But now the chickens have come home to roost. The disaster is at our door. It is not just at the doors of the people who are having difficulty putting bread and butter on the table in rural Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, but it is at our door as a Parliament and at our door as a government.

If we fail to act on this one, we are not worth our salt. If we allow a people to be destroyed, if we allow one of our great national industries, equal in magnitude to the great auto industry of this country, to be decimated, if we allow our sovereignty to continue to be trampled, if we allow a great marine resource to be pillaged beyond retrieval, what are we doing here? The disaster is at our door, but so is the solution, the only solution.

I understand that my friend, the minister of fisheries, has tried other options. Knowing him I know he has pursued those options with great vigour, great enthusiasm and great commitment. For that I have commended him often both publicly and privately. But I believe in his heart of hearts, as he has indicated in some of his unguarded moments, he knows there is only one solution and it is contained in this resolution.

He knows and I know that solution will not be easy, but I have never seen this government back away from solutions that are not easy.

The government knew when it took on the free trade issue—and we were on different sides on that one but I use it as an example—that it was not an easy fight, but it was committed to it and saw it through.

I was not on the government's side on the GST, but I use it as an example of another fight that it took on because it, for whatever reason, believed in it and saw it through.

So do not give me the argument back that we cannot do it because it is not very easy to do. It is going to be painfully difficult to do, but it has to be done.

I see my time has run out so in conclusion, as my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has just said, we are all in this together.

We have focused on this issue six ways to Sunday. No matter how good Canada's conservation, no matter how well it regulates its own fishery, no matter how good the compensation package for people who are deprived of incomes out there, and there has to be a good compensation package, no matter how well we regulate the inshore, no matter how fairly we apportion licences, all of that is going to be by the board if we do not come to grips with this central problem.

On this one I say to the minister and the Prime Minister, they have the goodwill of every member of this House and of all well-intentioned Canadians. I ask him to rise, support the motion and then let us begin the admittedly difficult task of putting the decision into effect for the good of those people to save that way of life and for the good of Canada.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, two years ago the hon. member for Burin—St. George's took me and one of our senators throughout his riding which covers most of the south coast of Newfoundland.

We visited the Codroy region, Stephenville, but what will always be etched in my memory is our visits to four fishing areas: Ramea, Grey River, Gaultois, Baine Harbour. Two years ago these communities were closing down. The fish plants were either working at a very low capacity or no capacity at all.

The member for Burin—St. George's had us meet with many of these people. We asked the question: Can we retrain people? I was full of optimism that we might be able to do this. But I came to the reluctant conclusion, after speaking with the people in so many of these areas who have fished and lived off the sea for so many decades, for centuries, that this was not possible.

• (1040)

To try to do that would be cruel. It would mean uprooting the people from the villages, from the areas, and taking them elsewhere, destroying a way of life. Why? Because of what the member from Burin—St. George's has lead the charge for in this House of Commons, preservation of the fish stock particularly in the face of foreign overfishing.

To me, it is a tragedy coming to be realized when we see these great human beings with their way of life taken from them. I urge members in this House from every part of the country—and I come from Toronto, North York, Willowdale. But to me, to see these Newfoundlanders deprived of their way of life through the short-sightedness of national policies and international overfishing, we must bear the blame.

It is not their fault. It was in our hands. We made the treaties and we enforced them. We are the ones who have been negligent. We owe it to them. We owe it to ourselves to ensure that we take the steps proposed by the member for Burin—St. George's.

In conclusion I ask him, if his resolution is passed, how long does he feel it will take before the fish stock can be restored to the level that Canada needs?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, let me come directly to the last part of the question first. Here I seek the camaraderie, the support of my friend from St. John's West because I think he has voiced some frustration with some of the findings he has had from scientists.

Certainly part of the problem has been some of the guessing. Do not forget that trying to measure how many fish are out there is a very inaccurate science at best. So the regeneration period, the restoration period before there is a healthy fish stock, the answer given will depend on the scientists talked to and often when it is that they are consulted.

Some say that we can do it in the short term. I will not get into numbers, but I will say that I have not heard anybody, not Dr. Harris in his report or Mr. Dunne, the director general in Newfoundland of DFO, in his report or any others, none of them have said, the minister has never said that it is gone. Nobody has ever said: "The game is over".

Everybody has said: "If we do the right thing". Let us stop my talking in code. If we take control of the fish stock, because we have managed the stock inside the limit with reasonable good sense, although there have been some lapses of good sense. If we had been able to manage the stock that is now under threat, we would not be debating this resolution today.

I say to my friend that everybody who has scrutinized this problem believes there is a solution. It is surprising who is getting onside on this one. I just saw a newspaper in Windsor, Ontario. I see editorials across the country. I see people who have studied this industry for years. I see the heads of the great fish companies, National Sea and FPI now saying in the last few weeks that there is only one solution. That is to extend jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

Everybody is saying that. The minister, in various forms and sometimes by allusion, has said the same thing. Nobody argues the validity of the solution. What the minister I am sure will say in a few minutes is that it is going to be difficult, and I understand that.

I have one further point in response to my friend. He mentioned having visited communities like Ramea, Grey River, Gaultois and so on. The cry out there is: "Create some jobs".

Does it not strike you, Mr. Speaker, does it not strike the minister that the jobs we want to create are not painting cemetery fences or putting people on buses to Cambridge, Ontario? The jobs we want are right under our noses, except they are being performed by Spanish and Portuguese. Let us give them back to the people who had them in the first place.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, very briefly. In his powerful speech, the member for Burin—St. George's made reference to something that is of some significance. He spoke of the senseless slaughter of fish stock. Would he elaborate on that term so as to give us some elements as he sees them.

Mr. Simmons: I thank my friend from Davenport. Yes, it is easy to elaborate on that. The figures are well known. There is an organization called the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, NAFO, which has been together as an organization since 1977–78, which has had 12 signatories, 12 members, 11 countries in the European Community. Canada is a member of NAFO.

They have a group of scientists who look each year at what we should be catching without destroying the stock. Then they give quotas to their various countries. All the countries stay within that quota, except the European Community which beginning in 1985 began to transgress the quota.

Starting in 1985 or 1986 NAFO said there ought to be a moratorium, there ought to be no northern cod caught, and instructed its members to abide by that moratorium. Since 1986 when no cod were supposed to be caught, we have had the Spanish and Portuguese, through their membership in EC and NAFO, catching 400,000 tonnes that they were not supposed to catch. Last year alone they caught 47,000 tonnes that they were not supposed to catch. That is slaughter.

That is one example, but only one of many we could give, were there time.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a two-part question. The motion suggests that we should take immediate steps to extend something called functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I have a chart here that shows the cod harvest in the northwest Atlantic from 1960 to 1991. In 1960 over 1.1 million tonnes of cod were taken. It keeps climbing up to 1968, 1.9 million tonnes, mostly by foreign fishermen. Then it starts to descend as the cod stocks were getting wiped out. In 1976, 1977, 1978 the total catch of everybody was down to about 400,000 tonnes, Canadian and foreign. In 1977 of course there was a 200-mile economic zone established when the nations of the world had reached a consensus that they would accept this and would recognize it if a country took over not jurisdiction, but extended an economic zone out 200 miles from its coast.

My question is this: If a country could simply just extend functional jurisdiction and solve the problem, why did the government of those days—and for most of the period it was a Liberal government—not simply extend functional jurisdiction from 12 miles, as it was, the jurisdiction that was accepted in those days, out to 200 or out to the nose and tail of the banks so that the whole problem would never have occurred of overfishing on the Grand Banks? We would not have had 1.9 million tonnes taken in 1968 and the like. That is one part of my question. If there is some easy solution, why did our predecessors not take this easy solution?

The other part of my question is this: What exactly is functional jurisdiction? Would the hon. gentleman tell us, is it likely that the other sovereign states of the world, particularly high seas fishing countries, industrial states like the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, Japan, et cetera, would accept this as being a norm that they are prepared to accept all over the world, whatever this is, functional jurisdiction beyond 200 miles?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments period is now over, but is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Simmons: I thank my friend from St. John's West and I thank the House for giving me unanimous consent, which I promise not to abuse. I will be brief and to the point.

The minister is absolutely right that of course up until especially around 1968 there was a real pillaging going on out there. In fairness, and not to play politics with him, but he and I had membership in the same party in those days. He and I were in relatively equal positions to advise the government of that particular day.

I would hope that some of the wisdom that he passed on, as I am confident of some of the wisdom that I have passed on, had the effect which was triggered in the 1970s, where men like the late Don Jamieson and the late Dan McDonald, Senator MacEachen and others like Romeo LeBlanc led the charge. They essentially did what is being advocated here. It is true they went out and attempted to do what the minister is attempting to do these days, to get as many allies out there as they could. Eventually, they bit the bullet. He is right, they might have been a little late in doing it. That is the charge we are making of this particular administration right now, if there is a charge.

He did something that I had hoped he would not do. He talked about there being an easy way. I said: "No, there is no easy way". Knowing him, I do not think he will wait for the way to get easy before he treads it. Let us not get locked into that little red herring. It is not going to be easy.

Functional jurisdiction? I do not believe that if the government accepts this resolution today and does what the resolution says tomorrow, that would solve the problem in one fell swoop. It would trigger a number of new problems. The minister has said that. He implied it a minute ago.

I submit, one, that in the absence of other alternatives, this is a solution which will begin the process of finding a solution. At the moment, Spain and Portugal know that all they can expect from Canada is a visit now and then from the minister. He will come over and lecture them with his admittedly colourful phrasing. He will go back home and they will go on willy-nilly fishing all they want. This is want they have done for the last several years.

The extension of jurisdiction will raise, as the minister alludes, a whole range of problems. What it will do on the positive side is force those people to begin talking about the problem. They do not even talk about it now. Most of them do not even admit there is a problem at the moment. It will begin the process of getting them to the table to begin the process of focusing their minds. If the minister wants to draw some lessons from what happened leading to the 1977 extension, I believe there is a reasonably good parallel how Canada bit the bullet because there were not too many choices other than to stand by and allow the resource to be pillaged. Men like Jamieson and others were not willing to do that. I do not believe men like the present minister are willing to do it much longer.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the previous speaker on the tone of his speech if not on the total content of it.

The motion says to stop further ecological disaster through the pillaging of transboundary fish stocks off the east coast and so on, Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That would be the area outside the present 200-mile fishing zone.

It is not clear what is meant by this term functional jurisdiction. Nor is it clear why the rest of the world would accept this attempt to extend jurisdiction out in that area. When I asked the question, I did not get an answer really to give me any specificity on that issue. What the motion suggests is action that is premature. It is a non-confidence motion. The government and I will be asking my colleagues to vote against it because it is premature and it is certainly inexplicit as to what Canada has been asked to do.

In starting my comments, let me just point out again that in 1960 there were patches of over 1,100,000 tonnes of cod in this area, going to 1.9 million over the years to 1968. Then it diminished as the pressure reduced the stocks in 1976 when the total catch, foreign and Canadian, was about 400,000 tonnes. During that whole period, Canada and other nations fought to establish the Law of the Sea convention that would give some recognition beyond the 12-mile limit to coastal states with respect to an exclusive fishing zone. That is how long it took when the stocks were really being pillaged, pillaged to heights that no one could even visualize today. It took a period of 10 or 12 years for the Law of the Sea convention to be established and accepted by other nations of the international community because, unless a large preponderance of other nations in the world accept your attempt to extend jurisdiction, of course, your extension of jurisdiction is useless. It will simply lead to confrontation and conflict.

The hon. member of Parliament mentioned something about sovereignty; that our sovereignty was being trammelled. Our sovereignty as a country is certainly recognized within our territorial boundaries and in the 200-mile fishing zone, it is recognized with reference to fisheries matters. The rest of the world recognizes it.

Our sovereignty is not being trammelled today. However, a fish stock or stocks is being trampled upon and in fact is being threatened with extinction because of totally unjustifiable overfishing by certain other nations in the world on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That is not a trammelling of our sovereignty, that is a trampling of our common sense. That is a trampling upon the principles of sustainable conservation that the world community says it believes in, as enunciated by the Brundtland commission in 1987.

This is, I believe, one of the worst examples of ecological and environmental catastrophe that is present before the world today. People talk about the threat to the tropical forests. They concern themselves about the ozone layer and the like. There are a great number of people who are concerned about seals and seals are not a stock that is in danger at all. There is no threat. Seals as a separate species of animals are not threatened at all. In fact, their numbers have grown beyond all comprehension. They have doubled in the last seven or eight years. The harp and the hood seal were never threatened with extinction.

We notice that some people are apparently so concerned about them that they will spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on silly advertisements saying that seals do not eat cod. As the Minister of Fisheries in Newfoundland suggested the other day, what do they do? He has never seen them lined up waiting for Kentucky Fried Chicken. I have never seen them eat popsicles. They certainly eat something that is in the ocean. We know they eat capelin and they eat cod and they eat other fish species.

Although seals are not endangered as a species at all, some people go absolutely bonkers at the thought that there should be any killing of seals or any culling of seals. Now, it is a separate issue. What is threatened and what I am concerned about is not seals because they are not in danger. It is fish stocks that are in danger and specifically the northern cod stock, which is the reason why Newfoundland was settled in the first place hundreds of years ago and flatfish stocks, as I explained in New York on Tuesday when I was there.

The American plaice, the witch flounder, the yellow tail flounder, are three valuable flatfish stocks which the European communities of Spain and Portugal have so overfished by ignoring NAFO quotas in the last four or five years that the NAFO quotas have had to be reduced by 50 to 60 per cent. NAFO scientists have had to flatly say they can no longer estimate what the total allowable catches for those species should be because they simply do not have the information. They do not know how much has been discarded. We have the same people, the Spanish in particular, and the Portuguese catching juvenile flatfish, using mesh sizes not permitted by NAFO to catch these small juvenile fish that they are catching in the nursery grounds outside the 200-mile limit.

That is what we should keep our eye on and not get diverted. As Mr. Diefenbaker once said when Richard Cashin interrupted a speech he was making in the House, "When the big game hunter is out after big game, he does not get diverted by rabbit tracks". We should not get diverted by seal tracks and advertisements by people who claim that they are environmentalists, such as the Fund for Animal Welfare that made a fortune a few years ago in wrecking the seal hunt, spending $100,000 on these silly newspaper advertisements this week.

What is endangered is not the seal. It is not any mammal, it is not any marine mammal. It is a species of fish, the flatfish that I mentioned and the northern cod in particular.

The hon. member said we failed to act on this. We have not failed to act on this. We have acted in dozens of ways, innumerable ways to try to prevent this overfishing taking place outside our 200-mile economic zone. Inside we have a tremendous system of surveillance and enforcement. We have observers on every trawler that fishes inside the 200-mile limit. On every foreign trawler and even on our own trawlers we have observers to make sure we know what is being caught, what is being discarded, what the species are and that the rules are observed.

Outside the 200-mile limit there is a very ineffective system of surveillance and management which we have been trying to get improved through NAFO. But as to failing to act on this one, since November or December of 1988, when we learned of the scientist's newly rejiggered estimates of what the state of the northern cod stock was, our efforts in this direction have been untiring in trying to overcome the foreign overfishing that is occurring on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

As Minister for International Trade, on every occasion when I met the Minister for External Affairs, the Minister of Trade for the European Community Mr. Frans Andriessen, I brought this matter up with him.

I have attended several meetings with Manuel Marin, Fisheries Commissioner of the European Community. I have been at meetings in Spain and Portugal pursuing these matters with the foreign ministers, ministers of fisheries and trade ministers of those countries. I have spoken in a campaign in the U.K., Japan, and Paris. I met with the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries in Paris and the Minister of Agriculture in Bonn, who is responsible for fisheries as well. We have arranged parliamentary visits to the European Community and to European countries of both opposition and government members. We have had media campaigns, public relations campaigns. We have tried to get environmental groups, including Greenpeace and others, involved in this issue. To date they have been very reluctant to take any prominent role in it at all.

The only thing I can fathom is that the codfish or a fish is not some attractive little animal that you can get a TV audience really interested in from the point of view of it being warm-blooded or with big luminous eyes or cuddly looking, or whatever it is. The poor beast does not look like much. In fact I have to admit the codfish is a stupid looking animal and very difficult to cuddle.

It is not a fundraiser. It is not eye-catching, so we have had difficulty getting some of these groups involved as they should be, because this is the great ecological and environmental issue of this year and of the next several years, believe me, not just in the northwest Atlantic but everywhere in the world where pressure on the fish stocks is such that our fish stocks are in danger of not surviving.

We have taken action at NAFO. As a result of our efforts we have a special session of NAFO being held in May at which we are trying to get them to improve their surveillance and enforcement system.

We are always having trouble with the European Community. There have been some advances but their system is totally unsatisfactory. They do not know what is being caught out there by Spain and Portugal. The European Community relies on Spain and Portugal to report to them what is being landed in their countries. Spain and Portugal do not even have a sufficient number of inspectors to be present when their ships do arrive and land fish. When they report that skate is being caught or hake is being caught, they do not know whether that is really skate and hake or cod. We know that a great deal of what they report landed as skate and hake is really cod, and on and on it goes. A special meeting of NAFO will be held in May. We have addressed this issue in the UN. Ambassador Fortier made a very good speech on the subject just a month or so ago. We convened conferences, starting in St. John's, to get the international community to deal with this issue. The conferences continued to San Diego. Sixteen nations, including our own, have a resolution before UNCED to deal with this issue, to establish what the rights of the coastal state should be with reference to the management of straddling fish stocks.

It is a resolution that is also supported by Iceland, Chile, Argentina, New Zealand and by other concerned coastal countries. We are hoping to have many more signatories before the UNCED process ends in the great meeting in Rio de Janeiro in June.

Just this week I spent the day in New York meeting ambassadors from the United States, Japan, Argentina, Chile, Jamaica and other countries to try to get increased support for this resolution of the issue. I met with Mr. Maurice Strong, who is the Secretary-General of the UNCED conference and who agreed absolutely that this was an issue that must be front and centre at the final conference to be held in Rio de Janeiro in June. He said he would do all he could to assist in it being front and centre and being dealt with in an adequate manner.

We want a world conference of high seas fishing countries to be held that will adopt a resolution similar to ours to resolve this issue, so we are taking action on those fronts.

What we need to do now is to have people like Mr. Cashin, and other leaders of the industry in eastern Canada, perhaps the provincial governments, go to New York this month to make sure that the non-governmental organizations assembled there are brought up to date and made aware of this issue and get their support to see that the conference at Rio de Janeiro takes action on this issue.

It is not that there is no action being taken. A number of years ago we took action. We refused to allow European Community vessels to fish within our 200-mile limit for under-utilized stocks or stocks that we were not using because they would not observe proper conservation rules outside the 200-mile limit. That was action.

We took action to refuse to allow European Community countries to visit our ports. Their fishing vessels are no longer welcome in our ports unless they have an emergency or some reason of safety or to prevent a danger to life, health and safety that they might be allowed in an emergency. Otherwise, they are not even allowed in our ports any longer. Portuguese vessels that used to fill our harbour at St. John's no longer are there. If you go to St. John's today, you will not see one. There have been many, many actions taken that are within our power to take.

Since I became minister of fisheries, I have advanced this cause all I could, just as I was doing before, since I represent the province of Newfoundland as a minister. I intend to visit Cuba, Russia, Poland and Panama over the next few weeks.

We have a problem with the non-NAFO countries. Panama's vessels are all Spanish or Portuguese owned. Panama and South Korea are out there taking 40,000 odd tonnes of cod and flatfish a year as well outside our 200-mile economic zone. We are hoping to make some progress with Panama on how this can be dealt with. The Koreans are now reducing their fishing effort in the northwest Atlantic.

It is not that action is not being taken. Bilaterally and multilaterally in international institutions we have got to make our case. We have got to be able to show the rest of the world if we are forced to take some unilateral actions in the future. We have to be able to show the rest of the world: "Look, we have made every possible effort bilaterally. We made every possible effort multilaterally in international organizations to resolve this question of overfishing of straddling stocks outside our 200-mile fishing zone, and despite these huge efforts and the reasonableness of our position, and recognition by impartial parties, environmentalists and the rest, that this is a threat to a fish stock that might vanish from the earth if this overfishing is not stopped, we cannot accomplish anything".

There is a consensus procedure in international organizations. You need to have the other parties agree. There has to be a consensus. There has been no consensus despite these tremendous efforts of ours and the reasonable steps we have taken.

This all having been done and nothing having been accomplished because of the obduracy, the obstinacy, the closing a blind eye to the imperviousness to the needs of humanity of Spain and Portugal to the European Community, in the light of all of this and having had no results, we are now going to have to take certain unilateral actions.

We asked the international community to accept them and to back them up because if we try to extend our jurisdiction, functional or otherwise, outside the 200-mile limit, it will not matter a twit if other countries are not going to recognize it.

The opposition member suggesting this course of action had to answer the question: What is to happen if we say we are extending jurisdiction of fisheries matters to the nose and tail of the Banks, but the countries fishing out there say: "We have freedom of the high seas. International law backs us in this issue. Canada has no authority outside 200 miles. We do not recognize it. We are going to continue to fish". What then does Canada do?

It is useless to declare functional or any other kind of jurisdiction if you cannot back it up, if you cannot successfully establish it. It would come down to a question of confrontation. If they do not accept our jurisdiction, if they do not set the quotas we set or stop fishing if we say: "Stop fishing", how do we enforce it?

We have to ask ourselves: Are we prepared to follow up with some kind of armed force? How are we going to follow up if we do that? Before we get to that stage, surely, we should stop posturing. It is easy enough when you are not in a position of responsibility to play the war-like hero. I could pretend to be Sylvester Stallone. I certainly look just as good as he does.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Better. I might not be quite as muscular. But that would not serve Canada well because the world is not going to be bullied by Sylvester Stallone unless Sylvester Stallone can show first that he has attempted to be Clark Kent and that he has done everything possible multilaterally and bilaterally to get other nations to do the proper thing in connection with these fish stocks.

That is why we cannot accept this motion at the present time to extend functional jurisdiction. We have to complete this process.

I think the Speaker is indicating that I have to come to an end. It is amazing how fast time goes. I did not even get to my notes here that were so carefully prepared for me. We are all agreed in this House on what the problem is, that our fish stocks are being endangered and so is the way of life.

I have not got the time now to go on with the economic steps we have taken or outline some of the things we have done, say, in Gaultois or wherever it might be, the Atlantic AFAP program, the PWAP program and how we are attempting to deal with the economic consequences. That will be for another day.

I thank the member who introduced the motion for his interest. I know of his concern. I ask him and the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and eastern Canada to exhibit patience. If we are to be successful in this cause, we have to exhibit some patience, go at this, and I think the way we are going at it is the right way.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first on a serious note, I thank the minister for his speech. I found it disappointing in some respects, but I will come back to that in a moment.

On a less serious note, may I ask the man of a thousand faces a question? I was thinking when he was talking about being Sylvester Stallone that the chest is slightly lower.

The minister has done something again today that I have seen him do fairly often. Maybe today, since we just a few feet across the aisle from each other, we can sort this one out. I get confused about many things, I admit that, but this one, I think, is a matter that he might be able to clear up fairly quickly. He says in one mouthful —and this is not the first time he has done this either—"now this is foolhardy and this can't be done, and if you did it you would have the whole world on your door with their gunboats", and so on. Then, in the next mouthful, he says; "Now, by the way, if we have to do something down the road, we want to be able to demonstrate that we have taken all the preliminary steps".

Which is it? If it is foolhardy today, March 12, 1992, is there something I am missing that would make it less foolhardy if he has to do it later on? Either it is a plausible course of action or it is not a plausible course of action.

In the one mouthful he condemns it as being irresponsible, that only people not in a position to have to make the decision would advocate. He might be sparring politically but he should bear in mind that one of his dearest friends on this earth, one Vic Young, advocates this position and I do not think he is running for any office. National Sea advocates the position, and many other people who do not have any political points to score are making this argument.

So I ask him: which is it; is it as foolhardy as he pretends, or is it something that maybe he has up his sleeve when the time comes? Because he has said both today, and I would submit to him that it really ought to be one or the other.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, as is true so often in life, it is certainly true in international affairs, that it is usually not one or the other. I am not suggesting in this situation that it is one or the other.

I am suggesting this. If and when Canada has to take some kind of unilateral action in connection with this situation, such as the kind of unilateral action the hon. member is advocating in his resolution, that we have to be able to show the world, hopefully, at that stage we would want to have as many nations as we could supporting our actions and saying that, "Yes, this is sensible, you've been driven to it, your stocks obviously are endangered."

Environmental groups, ecological movements support the fact that our fish stocks are in danger. We have spent several years now trying to persuade the European Community, Spain, Portugal, South Korea, Panama to cease fishing and to observe the requirements of this international body NAFO.

We have had resolutions passed. The Prime Minister had a resolution passed at the economic summit last year by all the leaders of these countries which said that nations should observe the quotas established by regional international fisheries authorities. We have done all these kinds of things, we have brought this to the United Nations, we have brought it to the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development, we have put before them this resolution proposal on coastal stocks.

There are five major points here and I cannot refer to them all. But if it were accepted, the nations of the world would be agreeing that with respect to a stock occurring both within the exclusive economic zone of the coastal state and in an area of the high seas adjacent to it, the management regime applied to the stock must provide for consistency of the measures applied on the high seas with those applied by the coastal state within its exclusive economic zone.

We have put forward a sensible solution to this problem. We have had it backed by X number of countries, but it was stopped because the European Community and other stubborn countries with a huge amount of clout and economic power now no longer want to be neighbours or neighbourly or worry about the rest of humanity, and who are now one of the largest economic power aggregations in the world. They are not concerned about what Canada might or might not like or what humanity thinks.

We have done all of this but we have been stopped by the people who are causing the problem. We think yes, obviously this is the only move left to take and we think a sensible nation should observe it.

We have to get the world community to that stage.

An hon. member: How much time do we have?

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think that we have to. I am satisfied myself that this problem could be resolved in four or five years, going as we are, but we do not have four or five years to resolve it. I am of the opinion that we have this year to try to get a resolution of these issues and that if they are not resolved by next year then surely any sensible congregation of people would say: "Well it is time for us in the world to change the rules out there." But we have got a much better chance—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but other members want to raise questions with the minister. The hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the minister in his interesting analysis of the problem which he put to us, also made reference to the interpretation of functional jurisdiction.

Our distinguished colleague from Winnipeg South will elaborate and offer the minister a very clear explanation as to what we mean in this motion by functional jurisdiction, drawing from the experience of Iceland in the 1970s. We hope that the intervention by our colleague from Winnipeg South will convince the minister that this is an approach that deserves his consideration and support.

My question has to do with a short commentary on the part of the minister on this motion which he said he would interpret as a non-confidence motion.

We do not deem this motion to be a non-confidence motion. Therefore we would like to ask the minister to reconsider his interpretation of the motion as being a non-confidence motion because it is not intended in such a manner. Also, it falls technically within a certain range of motions so that we can convince the minister that this motion deserves the unanimous support of this House.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, as I have tried to explain, we cannot support the motion as it is at the moment because it calls for immediate steps to extend something called functional jurisdiction outside the present 200-mile exclusive fishing zone to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

In our view, this would be premature and in fact contrary to the interests of Canada for us to attempt to do this at this time. I am not going to say that the time is not going to come when possibly this might be an option that we have to consider, but I think the House has to recognize that what is being suggested is an extraordinary, highly unusual step which could only be taken or risks everything else having failed.

As I explained in my remarks or hope I have, we have a number of initiatives under way at the moment that we have got to hope will be successful. Yesterday, for example, Mr. Cashin and three or four members of his union met with the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has been and is now fully engaged in this matter. He is going to be taking it up intensively with the leaders of countries that make up the European Community, as he has in the past, but this will be at the top of the list for action. I think it is likely that he is going to attend the conference at Rio in June. I do not believe he was looking on that affirmatively until recently because he wants to make sure that this issue gets the proper attention at the conference.

The UNCED process, we have to hope, might be successful as well as the diplomatic steps that we are taking.

So we cannot accept the resolution as it stands for those reasons.

Another problem is that this is an opposition day motion, and I am no expert on the rules here, but these are traditionally understood to be and accepted as non-confidence motions. Now there has been one in recent history—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Time is running out. Resuming debate.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, seeing that the minister has been so accommodating this morning, I wonder if we could get unanimous consent of the House to ask a few more short questions of the minister.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As you know, the period for questions and comments is over. Resuming debate.

[English]

On a point of order, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish of course to question your judgment and your ruling, but I am sure you will agree that the House is the master of its own fate and its own time; that the House can determine at any time under any rule, under any restriction, under any impediment imposed upon it by rule its own decisions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member is right, but the hon. member must ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I so do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend the question and comment period?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the support of the House on this.

I listened attentively to the minister when he went through a long list of all the actions that he has taken, from the international meetings, foreign ministers of fisheries, ministers of external affairs, media campaigns, public relations campaigns, Greenpeace and environmental groups.

My question is a very simple one. What do all these people say to the minister when he presents the facts that our fish stocks are being raped or slaughtered? We have all these environmental organizations that are touting sustainable development day in and day out. Whenever they spot a little problem in whatever riding it is, they come with the banners and the placards and seem to raise quite a fuss.

What do all these people say when he pleads this cause of the fish stocks and the people of Newfoundland? I would be curious as to what they report.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to environmental groups and the like, in our conversations with them they have exhibited sympathy and said: "Yes, this is certainly an example of violation of the rules of sustainable conservation and Brundtland".

But this is an issue on which they have to be careful or they do not seem to be able to mobilize themselves into enthusiastic support of the position, perhaps because it is a government that is concerned in taking the action. They seem to want to keep clear of governments, that somehow they are going to be suspect if they are on the same side as government.

Perhaps we are not using them effectively. As I mentioned in my remarks, Mr. Maurice Strong suggested that we should be giving them a briefing, that we should send a delegation to New York to make sure that the non-governmental organizations are properly seized with it.

Some of them, you see, have got old scores to settle with the Canadian government because of the seal hunt. The feelings between certain groups and us are not the friendliest because of the tactics they used to stop the seal hunt because the seal was never an endangered species and the problems that have resulted since. Perhaps that is a factor as well.

With respect to governments, we have acceptance from countries like the U.S.S.R., now Russia, Cuba. Japan observes all the NAFO rules, Norway and so on. There is a small group, and the small group basically is Spain and Portugal which is determined by the policy of the EC, South Korea; Panama is really Spain and Portugal again, who say: "There is the freedom of the high seas, that anything you do will derogate from freedom to fish on the high seas". They use all kinds of excuses. A couple of years ago it was: "Your scientists don't co-operate with our scientists, so why should we accept the views and recommendations of your scientists?" Then we overcame that because we brought all the scientists together. The NAFO or the EC scientists do not disagree with our scientists. Then they have other objections. The Portuguese say: "We have fished there for hundreds of years and now you are not letting us fish there." The industry seems to take the attitude that: "Look, Canada has this huge zone out there. You are greedy-guts Canadians. You have this huge area of millions of square miles or kilometres or whatever you want to call it out there, and now you want to control the fishery of the whole northwest Atlantic and chase us out of there. We have been chased out of other parts of the world. Now are we no longer to be allowed to fish as we like? You are trying to save all the fish for yourselves."

So they are very suspicious of us and the Spaniards are the same. They get driven out of Namibia. Namibia extended a 200-mile limit down there and stopped them fishing there. The next thing we had six or seven boats formerly fishing Namibia now off the northwest Atlantic, 147 of them last year.

Our problem, by the way, and I want to appeal to the member for Gander—Grand Falls to straighten up his thinking on this, is not foreign fishing within the 200-mile limit because that is under absolute control. We know exactly what they are doing when they are in there. We have fees that we charge them so we know exactly what they are catching. It is outside.

These are the kinds of answers we have received from them. The latest rumour I heard that had been planted down in the UN was a suggestion by the EC that we were not listening to our scientists, that the problem was caused by our not listening to our own scientists. They are seizing on the Cabot Martin theory or whatever.

In other words, it is my fault, I should have eliminated the whole TAC for northern cod, but I am not doing that or I did not do what the scientists said we should do two or three years ago. So this whole crisis is our fault and not their fault for catching fish when they have no quota. It is ours for not listening to the scientists. So they have all kinds of excuses that they give.

Now maybe we need somebody with the flair of the hon. gentleman. In fact, we have to pursue more involvement of the opposition, but somebody with the hon. gentleman's flair to take hold of this issue and propel it in non-governmental ranks for us.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I thought it was amusing the comparison of the minister with Sylvester Stallone. I think that one of the points in common is that neither one will ever be accused of overestimating the intelligence of their listeners.

Will the minister tell us why the government has not ratified the convention on the Law of the Sea? When he was going on about highly unusual two questions ago, does he not think the situation is highly unusual? Does he not think it deserves some special measures, some other than weak-wristed government? Does he not think that it deserves a bit of vigour in the backbone of the minister of fisheries of this country?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I can say that in one particular case I have overestimated the intelligence of an hon. member, the hon. member who just spoke. What do these questions add to this discussion at all? The weak-wristed action of the government. Where is the weak-wristed action?

All kinds of actions have been taken by the government. Is the hon. member advocating some kind of war-like action or bellicosity of that nature?

Is it weak-wristed to try to use diplomacy in all its forms or the UN or UN conferences or non-governmental bodies to try to achieve our objectives? What a silly, jejune, imbecilic statement by the hon. crosser of the floor. I would not doubt that he would even double-cross the floor if he had a chance.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister, a couple of moments ago, referred to me and he said that I had to get my thinking straight, on these licences inside to foreign nations. I heard the minister on the speaker system in there a few moments ago as I was coming into the hall. The speaker system certainly does bring up the volume of the hon. gentleman's voice, but it certainly does not do anything for the idea behind what he is saying.

I heard him say that the foreigners inside the 200-mile zone, of course, are monitored. Now just imagine. Foreigners inside the 200-mile zone fishing in factory freezer trawlers, they are monitored. We are talking about people who do not have any fish in Canada. What are the foreigners doing with licences inside the 200-mile zone? The minister's department, in its backgrounders says: "Oh, we have an obligation under the Law of the Sea".

There is no such thing. We did not ratify the Law of the Sea. There is no Law of the Sea. There is a Law of the Sea by custom, but there is no Law of the Sea under section 63 that talks about utilization of the resource inside the 200-mile zone.

Let me ask the minister a question. Fishermen who are today in Ottawa, some of them had to go around this winter picking up rocks with money supplied by the Government of Canada to pick up enough for their unemployment insurance. They could not get enough fish. Foreigners are out there in their boats inside the 200-mile zone fishing the same fish, turbot. They call it Greenland halibut here, but it is turbot. They get their quotas.

The minister turned around by the same logic a couple of weeks ago and allocated tuna licences to Japan inside the 200-mile zone, five times our quota and unlimited quotas of yellow fin and big eye. So we want to ask him: Will the minister do the proper thing? Forget the yellow fin, open his big eye and kick them out.

Mr. Crosbie: When I saw the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls rise to his feet I thought, will we see a miracle today? Will he speak some sense? Unfortunately, my hopes were crushed. So I am very, very disappointed that he is keeping on with the same old line.

Let us take his yellow fin line. The Japanese get a quota from ICCAT, the international association with respect to tuna and Canada gets a quota and the U.S. gets a quota to catch tuna. For a number of years we have been allowing the Japanese tuna vessels to come within our 200-mile area to catch a small proportion of that tuna which, of course, they can catch outside and inside. It is an international high seas fishery.

We do this for the Japanese because they have given us solid support as members of NAFO, the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization. They have complied with its regulations and rules in every way. We have never caught them violating our conservation rules at all. We have an observer on their boats. They pay us fees for this privilege of coming inside to catch a quota given to them not by Canada, but by ICCAT.

So unless we are to alienate every other member of NAFO, there are 12 or 13 countries in NAFO including Japan. The U.S.S.R. was a member, now I think it is likely to be Russia. They complied as well with the rules. That is why we have done joint ventures and so on with them.

If we are prepared to have fish plants close all over Atlantic Canada, Canso would have to close, for example. Burgeo would have to close if we rule out any foreign vessels fishing within our 200-mile economic zone, even under agreements with Canadian plants where the fish has been landed at Canadian plants or it has been caught for Canadian owners.

If we want to eliminate every foreign vessel from fishing within our 200-mile zone where we can watch them and know exactly what they are doing and where they are doing it because it is in the Canadian national interest to help Canadian processing workers, we can do that. But we will add hundreds and hundreds more to the rolls of the unemployed in Atlantic Canada now.

Now for me to do that, if I could stand up in this House tomorrow and say that no foreign vessel is allowed to fish in our 200-mile economic zone, that might sound tremendous for a day or two to some hotheads, like the hon. gentleman or people who are deliberately heating up their heads like the hon. gentleman so they can ventilate more steam or excoriate the issue in a more ferocious manner. But that would result in the likely loss of thousands of jobs in eastern Canada if we do that. There is not one foreign vessel while I am Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that is going to get a permit to fish in the 200-mile limit that cannot show it is fishing here because of the national good and the national interests of Canada. And Greenland halibut, or turbot, is no longer an under-utilized species. No one is going to get Greenland halibut, or turbot, unless it is going to be a benefit to Canada and a certain amount is going to be processed here, et cetera.

While it sounds good to say that we are not going to allow one foreign vessel to fish, we would suffer badly if we did not have reasonable arrangements that are in the Canadian national interests. That is the answer to this foreign fishing vessel allegation within the 200-mile limit.

An hon. member: A supplementary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I need some clarification because the question and comments period extension given earlier is not an eternal extension.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in hearing the minister respond to the member for Davenport in terms of extending the 200-mile limit.

The minister acknowledged that there may come the time when in fact he will do what we are asking him to do this morning. I am just wondering when that time will be, when in fact the time and the need could not have been greater than today and now to do exactly that in protection of those stocks and in the best interests of our own national interests.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, that is of course a matter of very, very great importance yet to be decided.

The timing would have to be when we have concluded that we have the best chance of taking such action successfully, because a very substantial proportion of the international community has been lead to the conclusion that this is the sensible and reasonable thing for Canada to do and that it should get support. That is when we should take further unilateral action, if the present methods that we are now pursuing are unsuccessful.

I cannot give any exact time, but that is the best answer that can be made. The time is not yet, but in my opinion we do not have an awful lot of time that we can wait further. I cannot quantify that.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been a very interesting and informative morning and a very important discussion.

The courtesy and the co-operation shown by all members present in extending this question period, for example, shows that we can work together in our common interests and the common interests of Canadians when we are all convinced that is the correct way in which to handle the current situation.

It is commendable and I hope some people who are quick to criticize politicians will note that it is not always that way. While this will not be reported because it is not the sort of thing that will make headlines, at least we here know and those who happen to be watching at this time will know as well.

It is a pity the government could not accept this as anything other than a non-confidence motion. Certainly if there is any blame to be attached, then it is blame that should be attached to any party that was the government of Canada at any time in the last 12 years.

This is not a new situation that started the day before yesterday. It has been the situation since 1980 and the Harris report showed that the foreigners have been overfishing their quota every year since 1980 except for one year.

So it is nothing new. There is nothing new about this particular situation that is described in this resolution. When the Liberals were in office, they could not or did not do anything about it. The Tories have been in office for eight years and they could not or have not done anything about it to date. So much for the Liberals and the Conservatives.

The New Democrats have not been in office, but at least in 1987 in a federal convention we passed a resolution urging the government to take all necessary action to extend our authority beyond the 200-mile zone with respect to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks so that we could manage that resource properly.

Since then, our leader in 1989, speaking in the House on behalf of the New Democrats, made the same argument. Again, during the emergency debate of about two weeks ago, she advanced that position on behalf of the New Democrats.

We have been consistent. In our case, the difference is that we have not had the opportunity yet as a government to implement what we believe and what everyone speaking here today has said must be done—to take control of that resource beyond the 200-mile limit when that is necessary to actually manage the resource.

The resolution lays all the blame on foreign overfishing. There has been some discussion already that there are some other factors. For example, the minister mentioned seals. I have mentioned them ever since I was in Newfoundland in 1990 and had listened to a lot of fishermen and fishing companies. I heard from a lot of people the problems of the diminishing cod stocks.

I have known personally from hearing from Newfoundlanders that it has been a problem for some time. Seals certainly were mentioned. The scientists now estimate that seals are consuming some 1.5 million tonnes of marine life annually.

It does not matter really whether they are eating cod, capelin, shrimp or a combination of all three. They are eating something that enters into the chain. Whether they are eating cod or what cod eat, they are affecting the cod population. It is so logical that I do not know how it can be questioned.

I saw a program last night on the news channel as I was waiting to take part in the debate in which one of the scientists seemed to write that off totally. He wanted to ignore completely the fact that the seal population has almost doubled in the last eight years. At that rate, the seals are going to be consuming more and more cod, capelin or shrimp or whatever the cod are eating; directly or indirectly, that will affecting the cod population.

We should be harvesting that under-utilized resource. It is done in some countries. I saw on the same program that Iceland harvests that resource. It harvests the seals without drawing any attention to itself. I am not sure how it manages it. Perhaps we should try to make a deal with Iceland so that we do harvest our seals and ship them to Iceland where they can be exported without causing any problems, or dealt with in some way.

I have been trying to find out since yesterday evening about nine or ten o'clock when I saw that. At 11.45 a.m. today I still have not been able to find out how the Icelanders manage to accomplish this without attracting a lot of undue attention.

It is also Canadian overfishing. The minister talked about the various excuses that the European Community gives for overfishing the quota. I thought he was not going to do it, but at the very end he did mention one more thing, that the European Community claims that we are also overfishing the quota.

I had an opportunity as a member of the fisheries committee to travel to Europe again in 1990. The committee split in half. Some of us went to the Iberian Peninsula, Spain, Portugal, et cetera. Others went in the other direction. I am one of the ones who went in the other direction.

We all heard the same arguments. They all told us that Canadians were also overfishing their quotas, and indeed we were. They were not the quotas set by government necessarily, but the quotas recommended to us by our own scientists.

The minister said that we were not paying attention to our own scientists, and the scientists could not get together. The European Community was not setting the quotas. They were being set by NAFTA. Our scientists were really giving it the information. It was setting the quotas and the Europeans were supposed to accept the quotas that were set in the first stage, the first step, by our scientists. Each year we were setting quotas that were higher than were recommended to us by the scientists. We were not overfishing our quotas because we boosted them up too high.

I can recall the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans saying that he was not going to wreck the Newfoundland economy, that he was not going to put that kind of pressure on the economy in Newfoundland and lower the quota to the figure recommended by the scientists, by the Harris commission.

The previous minister of fisheries said much the same thing, as quoted in the Harris report, with respect to a recommendation on fishing. A further recommendation was rejected by Mr. Valcourt on March 30, 1990 because of the additional hardships it would produce in 1990 following total allowable catch reductions previously announced.

The Harris commission recommended further reductions. The minister said no because it was going to create additional hardships. The current Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that if it is going to create hardships today, it does not matter what will happen tomorrow, he is not prepared to lower those quotas.

Had the government had the intestinal fortitude to do it in 1990–91, and going right back to 1980 when the figures showed that we were fishing too much, then we would not be in the serious situation we are in today.

The figures in the Harris report for the 2J3KL catch show that for every year since 1980, the European Community exceeded the quota allotted to it by us except in one year. That was in 1983.

As far as the Canadians are concerned, in those same years, 1980 to 1989, the last date in this report, the Canadians caught less than their quota, but not because our fishermen did not try. Not only did they try, they tried harder. They had better equipment for locating the cod. They had better equipment for making sure they caught every cod that was available. In spite of that, they caught less than the quota allotted to them because the biomass, the number of cod in the water, was decreasing. Population was declining. We knew that was going on. Professor Harris knew it and he did not keep it quiet. He did not keep it a secret, and yet we did little about it because it would mean hardship today. It will mean disaster tomorrow, the way we are going.

The president of Nat Sea in Newfoundland, a year and a half ago, made a presentation. I do not want to put words in his mouth, but as near as I can recall he said: "In five years we could be looking for the last cod fish off the shores of Newfoundland". He knew it was serious. The fishermen talking to me knew it was serious. More recently, I visited the south shore and saw four boats come in that had been out six hours. None of them had a marketable cod on board.

We have known how bad it is. The Liberals had some idea of it but they did not have as much information as we have had in the past few years. The Conservatives have known and they have not done anything because it would mean hardship today.

That was pretty short-term politics and did nothing at all to save the industry. The situation is serious. There is little question about that. This has to be done. There is no question about that as well. The fisheries council had a report done and there are ways to accomplish this, in spite of the minister's concern. In the 1970s Iceland took unilateral action. It mobilized world opinion on its side before and while it was doing it. World opinion did accept the idea that this was necessary for conservation and proper harvesting. Iceland had to have control of the fish in the waters off Iceland even beyond the 200-mile limit. In the mid-1970s Iceland took action and got world support. There is nobody fishing there now except Icelanders.

According to a study prepared for the Fisheries Council of Canada on the problem of foreign overfishing, a declaration of unilateral jurisdiction should be seen as: "a positive step in the further development of international law. Not breaking law, making new law. International law is created by states. Only the acts of states can transform something which is a mere proposal into a binding legal rule".

It was indicated in the study that for Canada to generate international support it would be necessary for us to make it clear that the purpose of such unilateral action would not be for Canada to claim a sole right to harvest straddling stocks on the high seas, rather the purpose of such action is to preserve Canada's interests and the interests of the international community in the conservation of these stocks.

The evidence is there. Stocks are declining. We could be looking for that last cod in a relatively short time. We have developed equipment such as the deep sea trawlers, so good at finding the cod, so good at destroying their spawning beds and destroying this resource, that what should be a renewing and renewable resource could well be facing extinction. We have done this. Foreigners share the blame and the seals share the blame. We have to accept our share of the blame as well, and we have to take action, following Iceland's lead if necessary, although I hope it will not be necessary.

Nevertheless we must make it clear to the world that this is what we are going to do. In the interests of Canada and in the interest of saving what is an international resource, this is the action that must taken. It is not an action we are imposing on any nation or group of nations. We are prepared to live within the recommendations of the same scientists who have been setting the quotas for the European Community, quotas it has been ignoring, such as overfishing, and quotas that we have been ignoring when we set quotas for ourselves that are higher than what the scientists recommend.

We are not blameless. None of us are. Let us take our share of the blame, admit it to the world and let us get on with doing something about it, regardless of who did it or did not do it. Let us get on with proving to the world that we are prepared to take the actions necessary to preserve this resource.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

My apologies to the hon. member for the interruption. With all due respect to the Chair, are we to break with the traditions of this place, that is to say that on this allocated day the mover of the motion, in this case the Official Opposition, would normally in the course of events by fourth intervener in this debate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I understand the hon. member's question since he himself came to the Chair to talk about it with me, except that I checked afterwards with our advisors, with the Clerk.

This tradition exists, but there is also the tradition of alternating between one side of the House and the other. The Chair is still in an awkward position: Which of the two traditions should prevail? Under the circumstances, since I saw the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore right away, I thought that I would recognize him, since I make it a duty to recognize an opposition member right after a speech by a government member.

Once again, this is not an easy decision to make and I take good note of the comment by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate. Usually in the House the members from Newfoundland have spoken about this issue so much that whatever part of Canada we are from, we have heard of it and understand it to be a very serious issue. I have taken a personal interest in it myself.

I would like to begin by following on the point as to whether or not this is a non-confidence motion. I heard the minister say that he was treating it as a confidence motion and therefore wanted government members to vote against the motion. Others have spoken on the other side of that.

I would like to suggest that it is very important to make a distinction between the government and Parliament. We are gathered here in this Chamber as Canada's parliamentarians to debate a serious issue, and I would have thought it would be helpful to the government to have a clear and strong statement reflecting our views on this issue, which it could then use to its advantage in dealing with the international community in direct bilateral and multilateral relationships and discussions.

I think too often the mistake made here is to obscure the distinction between the government and the House of Commons. On this issue I certainly would express my view on the record that this need not be construed as a confidence vote. I certainly do not see it that way.

The issue has been raised by the member from Newfoundland who sponsors the resolution, particularly in human terms. He has talked about the suffering by fishermen in his home province, and it is certainly a serious issue right across Atlantic Canada. The numbers are evidence of that. In the last three years alone we have seen some 38 permanent plant closures with a net loss of jobs in the Atlantic Canada fishing industry of some 5,200. That is particularly severe in Newfoundland where there is already 20 per cent or so unemployment.

We have seen the current shortage of harvestable cod resulting in two major plant closures and 1,500 lay-offs, as well some 16 vessels tied up. Other members have spoken about the various statistics and the numbers are clear; this is a crisis in the north Atlantic cod fishery.

Putting it in some perspective, many histories have been written about the North Atlantic fishery, both scholarly and popular. One of the more popular treatments, drawing on the scientific information has been authored by Farley Mowatt. His book is entitled Sea of Slaughter. That book documents very well how through the past centuries the North Atlantic was a very plentiful, bountiful area for all forms of marine mammals and fish stocks. Indeed many species of whales are now extinct because of their harvesting, the whaling industry. We have seen a general decline in the North Atlantic fishery and the elimination and loss of many species, clearly due to direct human intervention through fishing.

Part of the debate already has focused on whether this is entirely offshore or to an extent also inshore. I can tell members that in my own visits to Isle-de-la-Madeleine, to Prince Edward Island, to Newfoundland, it has been very interesting to see in early morning some of the fishing boats coming in, their holds filled with fish, knowing that they have been able to use a lot of very scientific equipment in finding where the fish are and catching them, and the use of radars and sonars and so on.

There is no question here that this is a sport or a hunt. It is a very scientific based activity, to commercially harvest fish stocks and there is a whole economy that depends on that.

But it is a sobering thing to see the extent to which technology has been advanced in perfecting the methods of harvest. That has gone on and on, both inshore and further out, to an extent that we now face this crisis in the Atlantic fishery.

I listened to the minister expressing his views about the need to develop a consensus on the issue, the need to have co-operative multilateral approaches and so on. He listed a great many steps that have been taken.

Last week a new issue came to mind when I met with five members of the European Parliament who were in Canada looking at this question of our east coast fishery. One of the Tory members from the United Kingdom, Bryan Cassidy, asked me why Canada had never taken this issue to the World Court. I had no answer for that. I would like to raise that question in debate here, from one of our colleagues in the European Parliament to fellow parliamentarians here in Canada, to actually ask that question.

We know that the NAFO quotas have been carefully established. We secondarily know that beyond that several European countries, members of the European Community, have gone beyond those quotas. We heard the minister this morning refer to both Spain and Portugal not only catching well beyond the quotas but also using nets with a finer mesh than is legal for them to use and other evidence like this that has been documented.

The question therefore is when there is clear evidence of a violation of accepted international rules, a breach of legal agreements regarding net size and so forth, why has the Government of Canada not taken this issue to the World Court as part of its effort. I think that is an issue that we have to examine more carefully here in Parliament.

I should also report to other parliamentarians here that in this discussion I had with the European parliamentarians several of them had been singularly unaware of lobbying efforts by the Government of Canada to raise this issue of overfishing. For example one of the members, Mr. Henry McCubbin from Scotland, a member of the European Parliament, a Labour Party member, sits on the fishing committee of the European Parliament. He indicated that he had not ever been approached by a representative of Canada with respect to this overfishing issue.

This is important information to put on the record in the Canadian House of Commons because it will cause us to reconsider what new efforts need to be made in bringing to the attention of Europeans the issue of overfishing, working officially and also through party relationships, indeed the need to redouble this effort at bringing the issue to bear. A number of them were thinking of returning to the European Parliament and introducing a resolution there dealing with the overfishing and the abuse by Spain and Portugal of the quota system. This is action coming as a result of concern and conscientious European parliamentarians getting the facts about the cod fishery. I think it is important to see that we in Canada are putting that information out effectively.

One of the issues that the minister referred to, and several others—the member from Saanich, British Columbia was mentioning the seals and their relationship with this depletion of the cod stocks. The minister said that it was important to keep our eyes on the issue and that the seal population and their consumption of fish was not directly relevant to this problem. I would agree with him.

I have here a copy of the Malouf report. This is yet one more in a long series of royal commissions in our country. They seem to be very expensive these days. We are hearing of royal commissions on election law and on reproductive technology in the $20 million to $25 million range. I understand the Malouf report which was completed in 1986 is in something like the $23 million range. What amazes me moreover is that this report on seals and sealing in Canada, a very substantial three volume report, is not well known in the country. It is not well known by many people who are dealing with this issue either in government or in Parliament.

I discussed this situation last Friday night with the premier of one of the maritime provinces. He was completely unaware of the results and recommendations of this $23 million, 1986 royal commission, a commission that in the course of its work had caused 550 seals to be opened up so the contents of their stomachs could be examined. In four of them they found cod so that, in fact, less than 1 per cent of these seals were consuming cod.

Certainly the harp seals in the northwest Atlantic eat a wide variety of marine organisms, including fish, shrimps, other crustaceans and squid. The member from British Columbia was saying that whatever they are eating, they are eating something that is part of the food chain and therefore they are part of the problem. He put it in terms of logic. The same logic could also be used to say that if it is true the seals are eating all of the cod and the cod-related fish in the food chain and the cod is gone, then also the seals must be going. At the same time he is saying the seal population is increasing. We would need a few years to see the trends on this, but if what he is saying is to be treated logically, then we can be witnessing a massive depletion of the seal population in the next couple of years, as they will be starving to death. It will not be the result of any government organized call.

The question about the population is an important one because the minister also mentioned it. My research and looking at these documents show that the Canadian government's own surveys indicate that the harp seal population has not exploded since the European import ban in 1983. There has been really no marked increase between 1978 and 1990 and claims that the number has gone from two million to I think recently the number that the Newfoundland Fishermen's Association has been using of 3.3 million animals since 1983, that kind of increase is based on the unfounded assumption that the population has been growing at a constant rate. I cannot find in any of these reports that I have looked at any data to support that assumption. Certainly Canada's royal commission on seals and sealing indicated that harp seals are migratory and only overlap with the northern cod stock for a few months of the year. More than half of their annual diet is consumed beyond the limits of traditional Canadian fisheries in the northwest Atlantic.

To finish that point, I think that some of the recommendations that are made by this royal commission should be taken to heart by all of us, parliamentarians, government officials at the Canadian and the provincial levels because there is a wealth of good information here about the relationship and how it can be kept in balance.

I certainly believe that resource management is important. Where human intervention has upset the cycle it is important to see that a balance is maintained. On the correlation between the seal population and the fish stocks, there is a lot of information here in this royal commission report that indicates that it is too simple to say, as a number of members do and members of the public do, that the seals really are the culprit. That is using them as a scapegoat.

I just conclude on that point with this from yesterday's Halifax Chronicle Herald: "Canada should think long and hard before authorizing an expanded seal hunt which could trigger a ban on fish products in Europe". I think that is a serious and significant view from Atlantic Canada that should be taken to heart on this issue. I would agree with the main point that the minister of fisheries made, that this question about seals is important, but a separate issue from the core concern that is before the House of Commons right now, which is the depletion of the north Atlantic cod stock.

In conclusion, I come back to the point that we should, in addition to the other initiatives that the minister has mentioned, take this issue before the World Court. We must take new initiatives at lobbying with parliamentarians in Europe and elsewhere. Again, I do not see this as a non-confidence vote in the government.

I think that it would helpful to the Government of Canada to have from Canadian parliamentarians a very strong statement about our feeling that the issue is so serious we should take every measure possible and leave no option unexamined or unattended in our response to the crisis that is facing the people, the ecology of the north Atlantic and indeed, on a broader basis, the whole world. This is a global resource. I agree in a sense with the whole spirit of this resolution. We, as one of the principle countries closest to it, have a role here as global custodians.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): The member questioned my comment on the growth in the seal population. I wonder if he has discussed this with the minister. It was the minister who, at a briefing, I believe on February 20, when hosting a breakfast for a group of MPs, told us that the population had gone from, and I am trying to recall the figures now, two million up to 3.6 million, which is almost a doubling in that period. I wonder if he has consulted the minister about the information he has with respect to the seal population. It seems to be at variance with what the minister has unless he is suggesting that the minister just picked this out of the air.

Also, he told us that out of 550 seals, three had identifiable cod in the stomachs. Can he tell us something about the contents of the others? Were some of them empty perhaps? The reputation that seals have is of eating the cod belly which is soft and easy to accommodate their stomachs rather than the head bone and the other bones.

I am wondering whether there were contents in the stomachs of some of these seals that just could not be identified as to just exactly what they were.

Mr. Boyer: Two questions. The number of 3.3 is the one being used by the Department of Fisheries. There is other information there as well in the Department of Fisheries, looking at projections. I think the numbers game here is always a difficult one. None of us can actually know definitively the numbers that are there. There are some numbers that I think are vastly exaggerated that are being put out as part of the effort to say that the real and only problem here is the seal population as a way of avoiding dealing with the problems of overfishing in the outer fishery, the over-licensing with respect to the inshore fishery, all of these other problems.

My point is simply to say that discussion with respect to the seals ought to be kept in balance in that context and not to make it a scapegoat. Yes, it depends on the season, of course, when one is looking at seals' stomachs to see what kind of food or amount is in there in the season, where they are and so on. I will list the species of fish and invertebrates that were found in the stomachs of those seals. This is in alphabetical order; it is not in the order of quantity.

There is Arctic cod, which is not to be confused with Atlantic cod. There was Atlantic cod which includes the northern cod. There was barracudina, capelin, eelpout, flatfish, including witch and plaice, fourbeard rocklings, Greenland halibut, grenadiers, hake, herring, redfish, sandlance, sculpins and skate. As well, they found that the seals were eating invertebrates as follows: amphipods, crab, decapods, euphauslids, mysids, shrimp, squid and octopus.

The other number that is important to bear in mind when we are looking at this is the notion that the seal population is increasing without any human intervention. Canada in fact still has the largest annual seal hunt in the world. The current quota is some 186,000 harp seals per year and I think last year the number was around 50,000 seals that were killed. That is another number to be kept in bounds as to what is actually happening here.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a specific question of the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

We always hear, especially those of us who live in larger urban areas like Toronto, from the environmental groups whenever there is an international crisis related to the environment. They are always knocking on our doors and telling us about the interdependency of the world that we live in. As members of Parliament, we are always very sensitive to react to the forces and the needs of the environmental groups that exist within our communities. Of course, many of these environmental groups have international linkages that are always educating the whole world on the ecosystem that we are all involved with and living with here.

Does the member not think that maybe it is time that all of us as parliamentarians should turn and challenge the environmental groups of this country and also of the rest of the world to pick up their placards and their systems of communication to put pressure on those countries that are not respecting the ecosystem here, the sustainable development formula and use the same kind of energy on this as they do on other issues?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. To elaborate, the minister himself said that with some NGOs and some environmental groups, his relationship or the government's relationship may not be the happiest in the world because of the history relating to the seal hunt. He then invited members of the opposition to work with NGOs. In fact, I think it was the member from Newfoundland to whom he mentioned that.

As the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood raises it, I would fully agree. All of us, as parliamentarians, ought to work with environmental groups that share this concern about the ecology in the north Atlantic to work with this concerted effort to focus on the real source of the problem.

One such organization, and I know it is not one that gets a lot of plaudits around here because of the history related to the seal hunt and so on, is the International Fund for Animal Welfare which has recently organized a fact-finding mission for some European parliamentarians so that they could then go back and work in Europe, not on the seal hunt, but on the underlying cause of the problem, which is the overfishing by Spain and Portugal. Why? Because the International Fund for Animal Welfare understands that the more this problem develops, the more the pressure will come. We are seeing it around here to find a scapegoat. And then it gets back to the whole thing going in reverse. It gets back into the seal hunt and then you get back into the boycott from Europeans and many others of Canadian seal products, of fish products and so on. It is kind of a domino in reverse.

There is one example of where an NGO has been trying to focus on the cause of that problem with some of the people who have something to do about it in Europe.

It may be a good example that we could all cite to other environmental organizations to help become part of the solution here. I think we are past the stage on this issue where we should be adversaries. We should be looking at a global resource and the ways in which it is being threatened. We should try to find the most effective way to have good information. That is important, using that information to work co-operatively and with some force. I go back to even using the World Court as part of the solution to that.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we are here to discuss the fall-out from environmental lunacy.

Overfishing, the lack of conservation in the north Atlantic, may inflict its initial damage deep within the marine ecosystem, but its eventual consequences are to be found in the devastation of hundreds of Atlantic Canadian communities and thousands of Atlantic Canadian families.

There can be no more vivid example of the absolute interlinking of the economy and the environment than the tragedy before us. While time limitations permit me only to address the environmental consequences of overfishing, it should be understood that the failure to adopt the principles of sustainable development is society's failure, and society must bear the cost.

That means that we have an absolute responsibility to support financially those who have been deprived of their livelihoods and the communities that depend on it.

We are here, Mr. Speaker, to discuss cod overfishing, which is depleting an important natural resource of the Atlantic.

For some time, many of us have continually made the connection between the economy and the environment. There could be no better example than the one before us in this House today.

Overfishing in the Atlantic by France, Spain and Portugal is an act of economic and environmental aggression. It has resulted in the collapse of Atlantic cod stocks, the destruction of that region's economic base and the devastation of hundreds of Canadian communities.

With the problem of overfishing, we are only reaping what we have sown. This tragedy should teach us a lesson: never again can we separate the economy from the environment.

[English]

The broad issue is that the nations of the world are decimating the fish stocks of our oceans. The specific issue, the nations of the European Economic Community are decimating the cod stocks of the north Atlantic. Canada is bearing the brunt of their folly. The government does nothing. The purpose of this motion which I support wholeheartedly is that the time for action is now.

The good of the global community now demands that Canada take a bold act of responsibility, that Canada take forceful steps now to preserve the straddling cod stocks. We must not allow a modern day tragedy, the decimation of the global commons. If that means unilateral action, then let us not fear to take such action.

It is justified. It is justified morally and it is also justified within the evolution of international law, the development of the economic interdependence of nations, the moral interdependence of the entire ecosystem. A growing international awareness of sustainable development, ecosystem management, and the global economic and ecological interdependence, the interlinking, all point the way for the absolute need for international law to evolve.

Canada must lead the way in pushing for special measures to protect the resources of the Atlantic northwest. Let us be very clear. It is not that we would claim a sole right to harvest straddling stocks on the high seas. Rather, the purpose is to preserve the interests of the international community, including Canada in the conservation of these stocks. These are world resources which are being endangered.

Unfortunately, it has become manifestly clear the preservation of this international heritage will not be accomplished by relying solely on co-operative measures. It is all too clear that these have failed, time and time again over the last several years.

One does not have to look very far for a successful precedent for the kind of unilateral action which we are advocating. In 1970 the Liberal government of the day unilaterally passed the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Zone Act. This established functional jurisdiction over a 100-mile zone around the islands of the Canadian Arctic archipelago. Thank heavens we did this.

Today we judge that there are abundant grounds for taking such precautionary action. A basis exists in the Law of the Sea and in international law. International law is flexible and evolving. It is a mistake to think that it is static.

Under the Law of the Sea a coastal state may unilaterally extend fisheries management from its exclusive economic zone to the adjacent high seas if international agreement on conservation measures is not attainable within a reasonable time period. It is essential that we do so to protect this coastal state's preferential right, and that is recognized in international law.

The history of the Law of the Sea illustrates changing notions about the status of the ocean, its resources and claims to jurisdiction over areas shared by sovereign states.

For instance, the freedom to fish in high seas unfettered by state control was once unquestioned. When such notions were prevalent, however, the patterns of fish migration were unknown. The size of world fish stocks was unknown. The subject matter of international law was envisaged only in static, rigid terms.

Today the law must evolve in response to our new awareness that marine resources are, in fact, exhaustible and fluid. Fish move freely and concepts of ownership and possession based on cartography are practically irrelevant in today's world. We must now understand that the ocean's living resources are shared, finite and transient. The unlimited freedom to fish in the high seas must be regarded as an antiquated and outdated concept.

Except where rules emerge from international conferences, someone in this world has to be the first to establish a new paradigm. Unilateralism is an integral part of the evolutionary process of international law. It is not the exception.

That is why Liberals seek extension of national enforcement authority outside of the 200-mile zone. The position that we advocate is well supported. It is well supported first by the objective territoriality or effects principle of international law. This is a recognized basis of jurisdiction, for instance, in the case of criminal conduct. It is an extension of the territorial principle that permits a state to apply its laws to acts committed elsewhere that cause an effect within the state's territory.

Second is the effective administration of justice principle. According to D.P. O'Connell, a Law of the Sea expert, and I quote:

> If a state has the right in international law to make laws with respect to fishery, it would seem to be a corollary of that right that it has the competence to make those laws effective.

That is what we are saying. That is the gist of our resolution, justifications for taking strong action to protect the straddling stocks are evidently abundant.

The Conservative government has ignored these possibilities. It has offered us oceans of Crosbie-like rhetoric. But has it set a deadline by which it will abandon the diplomatic route if it proves ineffective? The answer sadly to say is no.

Has the government announced its plan of action if diplomatic action fails, as it did last year, the year before, and the year before that? The answer again is no. Can Canadians believe the government's stated commitment to resolving this crisis? Unfortunately, from what the minister said this morning, the answer is no.

The issue therefore is what should we do? First, legislation should be prepared to establish a provisional custodial management for the cod fishery outside of the 200-mile limit. This legislation would be defended on the grounds of expert scientific advice which has been received, the principle of sustainable development which is clear, and the legal regime established under the Law of the Sea convention.

Second, Canada should announce conservation measures with full enforcement now, including arrest and prosecution for vessels both within and outside of the 200-mile limit.

Some may well respond to this recommendation for strong unilateral action by saying that force to protect straddling stocks are not optimal courses of action. To that I would respond by saying that passivity, that doing nothing when an important, irreplaceable Canadian and global resource is being depleted is even less than the optimum.

There is only one other alternative to this form of action, retaliatory trade measures and everyone in this House knows that they themselves carry their own consequences. The government option of simply watching the world go by is one that is no longer acceptable.

Third, our intention to enforce fisheries conservation measures outside the 200-mile limit must be heavily publicized both within and outside the country.

Four, the Law of the Sea convention, as my colleague from Alberta so articulately said earlier, should be immediately ratified. How can the world community take our complaints in Canada about ocean management seriously when we have not even ratified the very convention which establishes the ocean management regime? It is the product of nine years of international negotiation, the world's most ambitious and advanced environmental convention—

Mr. Caccia: Which Canada pioneered.

Mr. Martin: —which Canada pioneered, of which my colleague from Davenport was a member of the government which lead it forth. It is simply unacceptable given our current circumstances that Canada has not ratified the Law of the Sea convention.

Five, we should go to the World Court in The Hague to seek a ruling that supports our enforcement of conservation measures on straddling stocks based on our necessity and obligation to preserve these stocks within the 200-mile limit.

It is clear in international law that given the right to enforce conservation within the 200-mile limit we have the right to enforce conservation outside if it is necessary to affect our jurisdiction within.

Six, we should serve notice that we will introduce a proposal in the context of the GATT that countervail trade measures, sanctions, be applied to countries which defy internationally-accepted environmental conventions, including those respecting living marine resources.

Seven, an agreement on the conservation of marine living resources should be the highest priority for Canada at the UNCED conference in Rio de Janeiro. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans this morning said that that is his intention. We are tempted to applaud, but unfortunately, his words ring hollow.

The Prime Minister has yet to commit to attending the earth summit. If this government really places the highest priority on resolving the fisheries crisis, the Prime Minister should announce today in this House that he will be personally bringing this message to the other heads of state at UNCED.

Let us be very clear, he must achieve more than a mere reiteration of declaration of principles, principles which are already set out in declarations by the G-7 and other international bodies. There must be teeth arising out of the Rio convention.

Eight, the government should seek a commitment to a follow-up conference to UNCED specifically committed to overfishing.

Let me be very clear. Some of the recommendations that I have made are for provisional and limited extension of functional jurisdiction until an appropriate arrangement is developed. Others are more permanent. One thing is clear. We can delay no longer.

Let me quote from the Brundtland commission.

> Traditional forms of national sovereignty are increasingly challenged by the realities of ecological and economic interdependence. Nowhere is this more true than in shared ecosystems and in the global commons—those parts of a planet that fall outside of national jurisdictions—the commission is convinced that sustainable development, if not survival itself, depends on significant advances in the management of the oceans. The underlying unity of the oceans requires effective global management regimes. An international ecosystem approach is required for the management of these resources for sustained use.

These words ring painfully true today to the people of the Atlantic provinces. That is why we recommend unilateral action now. That is why we have brought forth this resolution today. It is the first step on the road to a global solution.

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

> That the House continue to sit between one and two o'clock this day, for the purpose of consideration of the motion now before the House moved by my hon. colleague for Burin—St. George's.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their place.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Fewer than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard about the so-called steps to be taken for this functional jurisdiction, whatever functional jurisdiction really means.

The member has heard what the minister said earlier today about what is taking place in the international marketplace and the various things we are already doing.

The minister was in New York this week. Also, a strong representation is being made to the conference which will take place later on this year in Rio.

I am wondering what action the hon. member feels the government is not already taking with regard to the possible outcome of this additional jurisdiction.

He will know that it took years in order to finally get agreement among the countries on the 200-mile limit. There has been a real success about the 200-mile limit. But I am certainly not aware of any precedent of additional jurisdiction outside of the 200-mile limit. How would he propose that we get that support? You cannot do it by yourself in an international marketplace.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. parliamentary secretary's question.

I believe the minister answered it by the contradiction in response to some of the questions of the member for Burin—St. George's in saying that what he was trying to do was to sort of build up enough support around the world for taking the very kinds of actions that we are recommending that he take today. If he thinks he can take those actions in three to six months, why in heaven's name can he not take them now? The damage has been done and these stocks are being winnowed away so quickly that we must take action now. In international law we have the authority.

The member asks what we can do. First of all, let us ratify the Law of the Sea convention. It is the strongest body of international law that we have with us. Article 63 of the convention talks about stocks occurring within the exclusive economic zones of two or more coastal states. Article 63 talks about straddling stocks, it talks about the right of a state to protect for ecological and for economic reasons its own coastal interests. The Law of the Sea convention gives us the authority.

For heaven's sake, why will the government not ratify it?

It is a clearly established convention of international law. The Oceans Institute at Dalhousie has written extensively on it. It says that where you have the authority to preserve a stock within a 200-mile limit, you have the right to go beyond the 200-mile limit if that is the only way you can preserve the stock that exists within it. It is clear in international law and we should be going to the World Court.

If you take a look at the evolution of international law, it has happened consistently as a result of either international conferences, which according to the minister are failing, or because of unilateral action taken by individual states. Canada has done it, the United States has done it. It is one of the fundamental tools, because the world is changing.

The problem is that the current government is so rooted in an archaic view of inter-dependence, it is so rooted in an archaic view of sustainable development, which the rest of the world is now supporting, that it fails to understand the tools it has at its disposal.

In summary, very clearly: (1) ratify the Law of the Sea; (2) exercise your full rights under international law; (3) take an action in front of the World Court; (4) the government must examine the alternative between trade retaliation or enforcement and prosecution on the high seas. Other states have done it. The time has now come for Canada to stand up for its own rights and for the rights of the global commons. We are not simply talking about Canada, we are talking about a global resource and we have a responsibility as a developed nation to protect it.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, what has become clear in the course of this debate so far is a problem the government has with functional jurisdiction, as put on paper in our motion.

We have already dealt with that briefly earlier in this debate and I am sure that my distinguished colleague, the member for Winnipeg South, in his intervention will explain to the government benches the potential and the history of functional jurisdiction.

What we are saying in essence with this motion is that we can draw from the model, the experience and the history established in the 1970s when Iceland took an initiative that we are proposing here today.

As recently as two or three weeks ago, this initiative was recalled by Judith Swan, the executive director of the Oceans Institute of Canada, when she said on CBC Radio: "Canada could extend its fisheries jurisdiction to the outer limits of the Grand Banks and enforce its regulations on all fishing vessels in the area.

Retaliation by foreign fishing countries is a clear risk. They could attempt to ignore the new jurisdiction or take the case to the International Court of Justice. Canada could stand its ground in such a case that this country would show a scientific basis for its action and point to the danger of permanent depletion of the stocks. The empty results of years of attempting to halt foreign overfishing would then become an argument in our favour."

This is what was said by a scientist who spoke from the Atlantic coast on the CBC.

Obviously an initiative like this is not common and would be particularly looked upon with disdain by bureaucrats in the Department of External Affairs. That is nothing new, however. The issue has reached a point in its development which requires political action.

My colleague from LaSalle–Émard has very clearly put forward a many-pronged political initiative in his intervention earlier. As he also pointed out, the credibility of the Government of Canada is impaired so long as it refuses to ratify the Law of the Sea for the very clear reasons that my colleague made when he pointed to section 63. It is all in there.

I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the minister have a clear understanding of the potential offered in the concept of section 63.

How can we go to the international community and say that we want to have international action to protect the stocks if we do not ratify an international piece of legislation which has been ratified by 43 nations but which requires 60 nations' ratification in order to become operative? That is where the problem lies.

Very recently, Brazil, another coastal nation, has ratified it. Canada's ratification would send a very important signal to the world community if it were to do the same. The time has come for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and for the government to bite the bullet and to move in that direction, considering the fact, as the member for LaSalle—Émard said earlier, that Canada was a pioneer in the phase leading to the signature of this document.

This document requires two steps: a signature and the ratification. Where we are wanting is on the ratification side.

This example of the fisheries is the first tangible, dramatic, social, economic example of unsustainable development. We have reached that point with the fisheries. We are beginning to understand it. We can see the social consequences on the population affected.

Do not forget that 20 or 30 years ago the people living along the coast of Scotland depended on the fishing of herring. Those stocks have disappeared and those communities have suffered considerably. We do not want to see that problem repeated in our communities, in our coastal regions. We should learn from that experience in order to prevent this from happening in Canada.

Unsustainable development is one side of the coin. We have to learn ways therefore, to make this development sustainable for future generations. The problem has been accelerated and compounded by the innovation of the trawler ships fishing the Grand Banks by many nations, including Canada. That has had a large impact on the fish stocks, much larger than anticipated.

Two years ago, Dr. Leslie Harris reported to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on the state of the northern cod stocks.

For instance, the report pointed out that to ensure the survival of the cod stocks, measures needed to be taken and still need to be taken. I quote an observation that Dr. Harris made: "A very determined effort to restrict or eliminate the actual catch of cod by foreign vessels operating under Canadian licence within the 200-mile zone and the determined Government of Canada initiative either to bring the entire Canadian shelf under Canadian management or to reach an effective international agreement that will curb the irresponsible and destructive activities of certain countries fishing the nose and tail of the bank is required."

Among the report's recommendations, Dr. Harris said: "That the Department of Fisheries and Oceans review its management structures and approaches with the end of establishing a more focused and co-ordinated approach." That is an internal, perhaps structural matter.

He went on to say that: "The Government of Canada must be convinced of the imperative necessity of regulating, through agreement or otherwise, foreign fishing pressures upon northern cod".

It was two years ago that Dr. Harris recommended taking specific action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize to the hon. member, but I did not receive any indication of whether he is speaking for a maximum of 20 minutes or whether he is splitting his time with other members. I would appreciate if he would give some indication to the Chair.

Mr. Caccia: I am splitting my time and I will be glad to yield to my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Mr. Mifflin: I was going to ask a question of the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A five-minute question or comments period. I ask your collaboration, the hon. member for Davenport has two minutes left.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I will stay within the limit you have indicated and I appreciate your kindness.

To compress it and to conclude and also to go back to the statement made earlier by the minister, it seems to me that at this stage in developing a strategy for Canada the government, when planning our position for UNCED at the conference in Rio next June, instead of promising to raise the issue and moving along with a certain resolution, should instead use that forum to defend the unilateral extension of Canada's fisheries jurisdiction. It should defend it as a practical and indispensable step to ensure the sustainability of that resource.

I am quite sure we would have the weight of the majority of world opinion on our side. We would send a signal to the world community that conservation of global resources is a priority for Canada, that we recognize the global significance of this resource, as my colleague from LaSalle—Émard stressed at the conclusion of his remarks.

In other words, we have to take an initiative that will move and shake up the world community in the wake of the recognition that we can no longer effectively manage a biological resource according to artificial political boundary lines. That point has been reached, and as the member for Burin—St. George's told us earlier, the chickens have come home to roost and we have to draw our conclusion.

• (1300)

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to make both a comment and ask a question of my hon. colleague from Davenport.

I watched with interest his reaction to the thought that it would be out of the question, it would be bizarre, it would be improper international behaviour, to consider such an act as is being proposed by this very sensible motion, and specifically the part of the motion which says: "to extend functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks".

I would say that the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard made probably one of the best and the clearest statements about how this is possible in international law and I was delighted to hear it and I have indicated that to him. It is a precedent in international law that when your livelihood is being threatened or if there is a good reason, then this is a step that can be taken and, indeed, has often been taken. You have heard me speak, almost like a broken record, on this subject, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted for him to hear it from other colleagues.

From the ecological viewpoint, I have the greatest respect for my colleague from Davenport. I think he has added that dimension to this tragic situation that we see ourselves in.

Everyone has his own opinion on how this can be done. The hon. member relates it to what has been done in the past, but I wonder if the member would share with us, from his considerable experience in things international like this, what his interpretation is of the way this action can take place?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for his intervention.

On the question of functional jurisdiction that we are proposing, which is a technical term but which in essence means that Canada has jurisdiction on the management of a resource that affects its economy because it is in proximity of our coastal lines and because of historical reasons. The position of the government, it seems to me, is weak.

I detect from the speech of the minister of fisheries a certain hesitancy, a certain fear and also a lack of historical knowledge from which he actually could draw, not only inspiration but also the necessary determination.

The most recent example was given by Iceland less than 20 years ago. It is a small nation which decided one day that it had to defend its economic survival by asserting its jurisdiction over its fish resources. It is clear in the memory of the international community.

This then leads me to answer the question by my colleague, to the effect that if one were to attempt to give an interpretation as to what might be the reaction of the international community, I would be inclined to suggest that world opinion would be on our side. It would be on our side for the very simple reason that the thinking of the public which has been educated, which we all have been in recent years by the report of the Brundtland commission, Our Common Future, the understanding of the management of common resources globally, would be such that it would applaud Canada for having taken such an initiative.

All that is needed at this point is the political will to act, to take certain risks, but to take a strong stand and give leadership in the international community. This is what we are expecting the government to do.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged and honoured to rise on this motion today, a motion to extend, among other things, the functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I say, in all sincerity, that this is probably the most important day that I have spent in this House of Commons. This is a parliamentary debate on a subject that is very important to all of us here. It is particularly important to me because I represent so many people involved in the fishing industry. With 57 plants in my riding and the livelihood of a large part of those who are involved and those for whom I am responsible that rely on the fishing industry, it is so germane and pertinent to the points that are being made here today.

As I reflect on what I have heard here today, both from sitting in the House and watching on the monitor in my office, there are five points that strike me and I would like to share them with you.

The first point is related to the facts, not interpretation, not political rhetoric, not speeches, not political will, but the state of affairs as it exists today.

The second point I am struck with is the response of the hon. minister of fisheries. His response on what could be done, what should be done, what might be done, and in particular why he did not feel that he could vote for this motion. I will comment on that in a few moments.

The third aspect that I was struck with is the talk that is going on, and I have related to what has happened, what has been the result of all this.

The fourth aspect is the tone of the presentations in the House itself.

The final thing is, where are we after all is said and done?

Let me start with the very brief facts, Mr. Speaker. Before I do that I want to make some definitions clear. I am talking about foreign overfishing outside the 200-mile economic zone of Canada. I am talking about not just northern cod. I am talking mostly about cod, but I am talking about groundfish as well that are processed in Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada. I am talking about the nose and tail of the bank, which are those two parts outside our economic zone.

The nose, which is like a segment of a circle, is about 60 miles long and the furthest part of the circle comes out to about 40 miles; the tail is about 100 miles long and the segment goes out to a maximum of about 60 miles. It is not a very large part of the ocean, not a very large part of the continental shelf. But large enough, that in the spring of this year it holds 10 per cent of the biomass of cod in that area. In previous years on record it was 5 per cent, and in one year it doubled.

Whatever is happening there, a lot of fish are hanging out there. And it is very important that we zero in on this. This is what we are doing today.

The fact of the matter is that plants are closing, trawlers are being tied up, inshore fishermen have their nets empty and people are without work. The fact of the matter is that foreigners are illegally catching more and Atlantic Canadians are legally catching less. The fact of the matter is that if we had the 380 million pounds of fish that was caught by foreigners last year we would be able to open all the fish plants that were closed in Atlantic Canada.

The fact of the matter is that the fishing industry is on the verge of decimation. The fact of the matter is that people are being alarmed, there is a human face on this. Those are the facts. I think most of that was put on the record by the hon. member for Burin—St. George's who spoke very eloquently on the subject.

The second point that I was impressed with today was the response of the hon. minister of fisheries. I thought he gave a fairly good statesmanlike presentation, but certain parts of it had what I would call "statesmanlike weasel-wording". The minister acknowledged, in my mind—this is my interpretation of what he had to say—that something could be done about this. But he seemed to believe that the timing of it was more important than the principle. He gave us a litany of what has been done. He also said that while he seemed to like the motion, that because it was a non-confidence motion he believed that he would not be able to vote for it, or would not be able to advise his colleagues to vote for it. The minister of fisheries has been around this place longer than I have been and he knows that with the stroke of a pen or an amendment this can change. So I do not buy that, quite frankly.

I am saying that this is a motion which will allow his government to put in place action to stop this problem and put an end to all that is going on, not next year, not in six month's time, but now. Now is when we need the action. The minister has said he believes it can be done. He believes in the principle but he does not believe the time is right.

The third point I want to mention is, what has happened with all this talk, all the litany of things that the minister has spoken about? Nothing. In fact, the more we speak, the more the foreigners overfish illegally. There is a direct proportion to the diplomatic action and the overfishing. This year, 47,000 tonnes of northern cod alone were caught illegally, 40 per cent of what all Canadians caught legally. That is what is happening with the diplomatic talk.

Portugal says: "I do not see that they have a problem". Spain says: "Canadians are catching too much anyway". They are throwing it back in our face. We are the laughing stock of the European Community because we are not doing the things we should be doing. So that is where we stand.

The fourth aspect of this is the tone of the debate today. The minister of fisheries says this is not a national sovereignty issue. Well, I beg to differ. There are 8,000 people being affected by this in Newfoundland alone. There are 32,000 people in the industry, so that makes 25 per cent, 25 per cent of the automobile industry in a province, 25 per cent of farmers, 25 per cent of textiles. If that is not a national sovereignty issue, what in the name of God is? It is national. Look who got up and spoke today. We have had speakers from British Columbia to Newfoundland. We have had my hon. colleagues from the prairies, from Ontario, from Quebec. And we will have speakers from every one of the Atlantic provinces. If this is not a national sovereignty issue and if this is not something that preoccupies this House as a national subject, given the range of speakers and where they come from, I do not know what is.

Where are we left? Where are we with all this? With the speeches, with the talks and with the litany of action that the minister has promised, with the United Nations conferences and the speeches that are being prepared for ministers who will speak here today, where are we?

A picture is worth a thousand words. In the first two minutes of the speech of the hon. member from Burin—St. George's today he mentioned two graphs, one with foreign fishing going up with time and one with national, legal fishing going down. That is what is happening.

So what we are left with is a motion that both sides of the House agree is doable. It is recognized. There is precedent for it. We do not disagree on the principle. We are disagreeing on the timing. We have the evidence. We have the agreement on the principle, so now we are down to one little itsy-bitsy thing, the timing.

The solution is there, we are waiting for the time. When is the time going to be right? If you come to a brick wall and it is in the way of your goal, you butt your head. If that does not work you use a hammer. If that does not work you use an axe. If that does not work you use a sledge-hammer. If that does not work you might have to get a bulldozer. You may have to pay for it. You may have to pay a man to work on the bulldozer. That is the price you have to pay.

We may have to pay a price for doing what I am suggesting and what has been suggested by this motion that we do. I have no doubt that we will, but the price will be worth it because national sovereignty, the face of this country, the livelihood of people are at stake.

What are we waiting for? How many more anxious faces do we need to see? How many more fish plants and processing plants do we have to see close? How many locks on gates do we have to see? How many more mayors of communities have to come to my office here in Ottawa and my office in Bonavista? There is one sitting there right now. I would suggest, no more, no more time, we must do it now.

I am saying this government should have the political will to act now to extend the functional jurisdiction so that we can put an end to this difficulty that will, if we do not do something, cause the end of the fishing industry and the dignity and the livelihood of those people involved.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has a history of involvement with the fishery that perhaps no other member of this Chamber has.

We have witnessed in the last month one of the largest fish plants I suppose in Atlantic Canada close its gates just a short distance from where the hon. member grew up and who is so intimately involved with the fishery. If there is one person who knows the industry as an industry, that is as a business, it is the hon. member who just spoke, and his family too.

I want to ask him to elaborate on this fact that right within a gunshot, as we would say, from his home where he grew up, the only employer either just shut its doors or is about to shut its doors. Could the hon. member tell us how many people are involved?

Mr. Mifflin: I thank my hon. colleague from Gander—Grand Falls for giving me the opportunity to get into this kind of detail because a 10-minute presentation does not allow it. The hon. member is right and I do thank him for his comment.

The processing plant on the border of Catalina and Port Union is the largest and the most up-to-date processing plant in Canada. It is owned by FPI and it was built not that long ago. FPI and in fact all of Atlantic Canada boasted that it was probably the most modern in the world. The maximum depends on the season, but the plant can employ up to 1,200 workers.

Now 1,200 workers on the Bonavista peninsula, and I represent 250 communities, that plant services about 75 communities, some more than others, some less than others. But the hub of the area if you like, the towns of Bonavista, Catalina, Port Union, Melrose, Elliston, Newmans Cove, Kings Cove, Trinity, Port Rexton and I could go on, up the peninsula every community is affected by it. Not just the worker, the fishermen, the trawlermen, the plant worker, the family of the plant worker, the corner store.

To put another end on this, I spoke with a businessman in St. John's, Newfoundland, who was a director of an organization called Atlantic Building Materials. It is a hardware building store. He said: "We can tell you how good or bad the fishery is by looking at our volume of sales." So it is not just the corner store, the Foodliner, Foodland or Sobey's store that is affected. It is the big stores, the hardware stores that sell building materials, the gas stations, the provisioners. The main provisioner in my riding in Carbonear is affected by this. I speak to them, I know.

So you can imagine and you can perhaps forgive my somewhat unusual—not antagonism, but frustration if you like, which I share with hon. members on this side of the House and I think, to a certain extent, on that side of the House, when your brother and sisters and brothers-in-law and cousins and friends, today, as I stand here, do not have jobs. They are not sure when they are going to have jobs, how long they are going to have jobs this year and God knows what is going to happen next year.

This is the human face. This is what is involved and this is what we have to put an end to.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to address the issue of the 200-mile limit and the pillaging of resources in that area.

Mr. Speaker, I will share my speaking time with the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, and I might speak for just a bit more than 10 minutes.

I would like to acknowledge the depth of concern expressed by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's in his motion concerning the pillaging of transboundary fish stocks off Canada's east coast and the possibility of extending Canada's functional jurisdiction in an effort to combat the problem.

His sincerity in raising the issue is beyond question. However, sincerity alone will not carry the day. The government must deal in facts. As you know, the February 1992 report of the Canadian Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee on the state of the northern cod stock revised downward the estimates for the over-all biomass and for the age seven years and older biomass. The over-all biomass level is thus estimated to be at approximately the same level as in 1980 and the spawning stock biomass level to be slightly below that in 1979.

In each of those years the TAC was set at 180,000 tonnes. The CAFSAC report went on to state that 1992 catches for the first half of the year should be restricted to the lowest level possible. CAFSAC will provide advice in July for the remainder of the 1992 fishery.

In recognition of the current state of the northern cod fishery, the Minister of Fisheries and Ocean introduced, on February 24, a conservation ceiling for managing the resource. The ceiling of 120,000 tonnes for 1992 represented a 65,000 tonnes reduction in the total allowable catch for northern cod and was announced as part of a six-point program.

The first point concerns management of the fishery. CAFSAC recommended that the catch during the first six months of 1992 be reduced to 25,000 tonnes, about half the level for the same period of 1991. This measure was adopted, effectively ending the winter fishery by offshore trawlers in Divison 3L. Other measures to conserve the stock will be worked out in consultation with industry representatives as events unfold.

In view of the reduced state of capelin stocks, upon which northern cod feed, the offshore capelin fishery in the Canadian zone in 1992 has been closed. Harvesting of cod by offshore trawlers during peak spawning periods has been banned. Fisheries, where cod is a by-catch, can be undertaken during the first half of 1992, provided this by-catch remains within acceptable limits.

The traditional inshore fishery will continue to operate without limits on catches, and this is important, Mr. Speaker. Larger inshore vessels operating in offshore areas will have catches restricted. In September, further limits will be placed on the fall offshore fishery, as necessary, to ensure that Canadian catches do not exceed 120,000 tonnes. These measures do not reflect traditional management patterns for the northern cod fishery. However, they fit the exceptional circumstances confronting us at the moment.

The second point has to do with protection of individuals and communities. The immediate effect of the problems with 2J3KL cod will be lay-offs of offshore plant workers and trawler fishermen. With very few exceptions, these individuals will be eligible for unemployment insurance. This will provide reduced but on-going incomes for them until the time when a fall fishery would be prosecuted, if they are not engaged in other harvesting or processing activities in the interim.

Fisheries and Oceans has begun work, in conjuction with other departments, to identify measures to meet the needs of those affected this year. They will soon be in contact with fishing companies, unions and provincial governments in this regard. However, the nature and extent of assistance needed will depend in large measure on the results of the fishery for the remainder of this year.

What can be stated now is that assistance will be extended to affected individuals and communities where this is needed. This could consist of an extension of measures under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program and the Quebec Federal Fisheries Development Program. We must not forget that the problems we encounter in Atlantic fisheries also exist in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and, of course, the St. Lawrence itself.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program was introduced in May 1990 to help ensure a viable fishery for Atlantic Canadians. AFAP takes the form of a package of policy and program initiatives aimed at rebuilding fish stocks while helping fishermen, fish plant workers, and communities in Atlantic Canada adjust to the impact of reduced fishing quotas. These reductions have caused disruptions in employment and income stability. AFAP initiatives are intended to help bridge the gap to sustained levels of employment and higher incomes as stocks rebuild. The range of operational activity required to successfully implement such a comprehensive program has been extensive.

In addition to this program, Mr. Speaker, the government launched in the summer of 1990, the Quebec Federal Fisheries Development Program following a series of consultations with fishermen, processors and other interest groups. The over-all goal of this program is to ensure the long-term viability of the fishing industry, while providing help to workers and communities in fishing regions. The Quebec Federal Fisheries Development Program has four operational components: marketing, processing, harvesting, and research and infrastructure.

While much remains to be done, there have been significant achievements since the inceptions of these programs. These include: new inputs to the stock assessment of nothern cod; major extension of our surveillance and enforcement activities, resulting in increased compliance with all aspects of fisheries regulations by both domestic and foreign fleets; direct payments to fishermen and plant workers affected by catch failures and plant closures; financial assistance to individuals and companies for diversification initiatives both within and outside the fishery.

The minister will soon announce members and terms of reference for a task force on the income and adjustment problems facing individuals dependent on the Atlantic fishery. This task force, to be composed of industry and union representatives, will be appointed in the coming weeks, Mr. Speaker. It will have a broad mandate and the full support of federal departments and agencies in its work. It can play an important role in charting the course ahead after 1993.

Mr. Speaker, the third point is foreign overfishing. The Prime Minister recognizes the gravity of the problem and will be pressing European leaders to take measures without further delay to abide by decisions of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, including the moratorium on catches of cod in 3L outside the 200-mile zone.

Representatives of the European Commission and member countries of NAFO were recently briefed on the Canadian position on foreign overfishing. This government, Mr. Speaker, is placing high priority on the issue of foreign overfishing. Just this week, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans went to New York City to meet the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to stress the importance Canada places on conservation of marine resources.

We hope to place it on the agenda at the earth summit conference of world leaders in Rio de Janeiro in June. Canada will call for a follow-up conference to deal specifically with the high seas fisheries. At Canada's request a special NAFO session will be held in May to focus on effective control measures outside the 200-mile zone to ensure that catches do not exceed NAFO decisions.

In the next two months, the minister will be travelling to Cuba, Norway, Russia, Poland and other NAFO contracting parties to reinforce this position.

Concerning non-NAFO fleets, Mr. Speaker, there have been encouraging signs very recently that the problem of Panamanian and Korean fleets may be approaching an end, including commitments by the Korean government regarding their vessels now operating outside the 200-mile zone. While we are making progress, this government recognizes and shares the frustration of those in the Atlantic fishery that see these and other activities undertaken against foreign overfishing, but with little in the way of concrete results. This cannot go on.

There are those who say Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. But, as the minister said recently in London and Tokyo, all avenues available to us must be explored if we are to achieve tangible progress toward ending foreign overfishing.

Other measures, including unilateral measures, will be contemplated only after all other options are exhausted.

The fourth point concerns Canadianization of underutilized species fishery. To alleviate harvesting pressure on northern cod and other traditional species, the government is encouraging the development of new fisheries.

While foreign allocations will not be eliminated, they will be reduced to a minimum.

Soon, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be announcing the approval of industry proposals to harvest underutilized fish stocks. This will increase employment in fish plants and will diversify and add value to Canadian seafood products.

In addition, we will soon be establishing an advisory board on the use of foreign vessels and foreign allocations within the Canadian zone. This board will be composed of persons from outside government who are knowledgeable with respect to the Canadian fishing industry. The board will operate in a manner open to the public and will have a mandate to provide advice as to what is in the interest of Canada.

The fifth point deals with scientific research. There is a need to restore confidence in the reliability of fisheries resource assessments. To do this, we need to integrate into the process the experience of fisherman, inshore and offshore. Scientists analyze the inshore catch-and-effort data and collaborate with inshore fishermen in studying ocean conditions. At the same time, scientists invite fishermen on research cruises and accompany them on commercial trips.

Industry has proposed that special scouting charters be undertaken to identify concentrations of northern cod, and to provide further information on catch rates and stock availability, particularly in divisions 3K and 3L inside and outside the 200-mile zone. The minister has asked the department to make the necessary arrangements for these scouting charters.

Fisheries and Oceans is committed to a further major increase in research on cod inside and outside the 200-mile zone. Important initiatives will focus on oceanographic factors—such as water temperatures, salinity and currents—which influence the migration of cod and capelin, and may also contribute to the mortality rate.

The sixth and last point, concerns control of the seal population. The population of harp seals off the east coast is estimated at 3.5 million. This is a substantial increase from the estimate of two million made by the Royal Commission on Sealing in 1985.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, until now, measures to control seal populations have been constrained by concerns regarding possible effects on markets for fish products arising from anti-sealing groups. However, representatives of the fishing industry have been unanimous in their advice that, notwithstanding the concerns with respect to markets, measures should now be taken to start bringing the seal population under control.

The Government of Canada is committed to the rational management of all marine resources based on the principles of conservation and sustainable development.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that the establishment of a conservation ceiling of Canadian catches for 1992 of 120,000 tonnes, in effect a TAC reduction of 65,000 tonnes, is a severe mesasure. It goes beyond the 25,000-tonne reduction suggested by CAFSAC because, in light of the circumstances, more stringent measures to protect fisheries resources are needed.

The management arrangements for 1992 that I have described are of an interim nature. Other measures to improve our understanding of the resource, especially predator-prey relationships and oceanographic factors, will be pursued urgently. Many details have to be worked out. This will be done in co-operation with the fishing industry, unions and provincial governments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est)): I understand that the hon. member for Gaspé is sharing his time with his colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine. But before that, I will give the floor to the hon. member for Malpeque for questions and comments.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member. I have a question for him but before posing the question I would like to make a couple of comments.

I am very pleased today to support this motion before us because foreign overfishing is costing Atlantic Canadians thousands of jobs. In the Atlantic provinces the fisheries employ over 100,000 people. That is a lot of jobs. On top of that, they employ roughly 8,000 in coastal Quebec.

Foreign overfishing is a very serious problem and it is one that the federal government has to address now. The fact is that while Newfoundlanders and other Atlantic Canadians are losing their jobs, foreigners are fishing hundreds of thousands of tonnes of fish off our east coast far in excess of the quotas that have been set for them.

This government's lack of action in this area is hard to understand. It simply ignores the needs of Atlantic fishermen.

Another example of ignoring the needs of fishermen is in a recent proposal to change the boat safety regulations. This is a proposal which is causing a great deal of concern to fishermen in my area, Prince Edward Island, because these new regulations call for fishermen to equip their boats with life rafts, with survival suits for each fisherman and with a second set of running lights.

I know that all fishermen would agree safety is the primary concern. There is no question about that. Most fishermen are happy to abide by sensible safety regulations. I underline the word sensible because this proposal does not make sense in a lot of situations. Why would an oyster fisherman be required to carry a life raft in a boat that is too small to hold it in the first place?

I use that as an example to illustrate how out of touch this government has become with the needs of fishermen.

Would the member agree with me that government's lack of action now in dealing with the whole issue of foreign overfishing simply demonstrates the government's lack of concern for fishermen in Atlantic Canada?

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Marin: Mr. Speaker, I understand the frustration and the conflicts which can arise in fishing communities where resources are increasingly scarce. It will be hard for me to agree that the ultimate responsibility lies with the government, whatever it is, for inaction.

I would take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank my colleague who asked the question. She is getting up to leave the House before I have answered her.

It is very important to realize that what is happening now in the fisheries is not the government's fault. It is the fault of a system which for years has been very poorly supervised. When we talk about overfishing by foreign boats inside or outside the 200-mile limit, we must not forget that Canadians also overfished in those areas. We must not forget that when we wanted to restrain the increase in the number of seals, these same people who are telling us that it is the government's fault were there telling us to do nothing.

I believe it is a biological phenomenon which is very hard to control and honestly I cannot believe that it is my government's fault if the resource within the 200-mile limit or the Gulf of St. Lawrence is at such a low level.

In any case, I would ask the hon. member who asked me the question to read the notes, since she left the House before I finished my statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. I am quite prepared to recognize the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, but I would point out to him that five minutes remain of the 20 allocated to his party. The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): I do not know if five minutes will be enough, Mr. Speaker. I would prefer to have 10 minutes, as someone who has chosen to live in the Magdalen Islands. In any case, I will try to make my point as briefly as possible.

[English]

I had the privilege a few minutes ago to meet with Mr. Cashin and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Without speaking on behalf of the minister or on behalf of Mr. Cashin, one thing that we did agree on is that problem of the northern cod should not be a partisan political area. We should work together on it.

I am sure I will get agreement from the other side of the House that there are three problems. First, there is the problem of northern cod on the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks. That is, the problem with external affairs in the foreign fishing. Second, there is the problem of our overfishing in our own waters, which has been addressed to the satisfaction of some fishermen but not to others. Third, there is the problem of our seal herd.

I get very touchy when we talk about seals. I am an old seal hunter. I believe that with the herd of seals we have in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off Newfoundland, off the Madeleine Islands, after having met with Mr. Cashin and the minister of fisheries, we have to go through, like it or lump it, our external diplomacy, international etiquette, call it whatever you wish. It is frustrating for the fishermen, but we have to do that. We cannot run out with the gunboats.

Even from a Madeleine Islander's point of view, I would hope that Newfoundlanders would not go out with their fishing boats and lose their lives to try to make an example of a Portuguese or a Spaniard who is over there fishing. I would hope that we could have a little bit of patience and see what will happen.

I am assured that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, with the good advice of Mr. Cashin and other Newfoundlanders, will take appropriate action if we do not get action from the foreign side.

Regarding the restraint that has been asked of the fishermen with the reduction in the quotas, the government side has had to be responsible for the loss of revenue of the people involved. If it is not good enough it should be improved. Again, I would ask the opposite side and my colleagues in the government that we make it the least painful as possible for the fishermen.

In the four minutes that I have left I wish to talk about seals.

When I was elected on September 4, 1984, I met with my friends, the Magdalen Islanders, who told me that under the former government—and I am not getting into partisan politics here, Mr. Speaker—they said to me, "How come those damn Greenpeacers are shocked, which means that we will lose money because we can no longer hunt seals?"

I took a stand in 1984 and I have not changed my position since. I fully agree with the seal hunt. We should never forget that hunting seals, just like hunting deer or moose in Newfoundland or Labrador, or hunting partridge or whatever is an important activity. It is very important income for people both in the Magdalen Islands and in Newfoundland. What is even more important for us in the Magdalen Islands, is that we have a system whereby every ounce of liver and of seal meat can be used. We can take every ounce of oil and process it and it will all go on the market.

[English]

I am a former farmer. I did slaughtering on my barn floor. You go to a slaughterhouse for pork or chicken, nobody worries about it. They hang the pigs up, cut their throats and they bleed to death.

They have a reasonable harvest of the seal herd. There is no problem, and I would hope for the environmentalists and for the Greenpeace people and the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls from the other side of the floor will support me in this, to do a reasonable harvest of the seals, we will bring more money to Newfoundlanders, more money for the Magdalen Islands, have a good economy and we will not hurt the environment because the seals are hurting our northern cod stocks.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's intervention here this afternoon.

Can the member help me out here a little bit? Given that there has been a charitable action by the minister of fisheries with the stroke of a pen to issue licences to other countries to enter our waters, to fish in our waters, to rob the livelihood of those who depend on the fishery, given that kind of charity, I ask first whether the member could tell me: would he not agree with me that charity should begin at home?

The second question is: Can the hon. member opposite tell me what other country on this entire planet allows foreigners to jump on their vessels and go into the waters of other countries and to fish in those waters? Can he give me that figure?

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I thought one of my principal points when I was making my statement was that we would try to keep this non-partisan.

I guess my hon. colleague does not want to keep it that way. I will say one thing. Having been in the House of Commons for seven and one-half years and regardless of political stripe, the thing that angers and ires me the most is to hear downtown metro people talking about seals from Newfoundland or the Magdalen Islands when they do not know what in the hell they are talking about. I do not like it.

If they want to be partisan, I will give an answer. When talking about overfishing, I do not set the rules, you do not set the rules. International law and international trade are things that have been established, but when it is said that we are giving licences to foreigners to the detriment of our own people, there is not a Conservative government, there is not a Liberal government, there is no other government that does not look after the rights of Canadians.

We may differ how we look after them, but the insinuation that the hon. member makes that we are looking after the foreigners and not looking after Canadians gives dishonour, not only to the hon. member, but also to his party.

[Translation]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question for the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I have been in his riding, both in winter and summer, to watch the seals and visit the Magdalen islands with their typical island economy. I would like to ask a very short question about the role played by seals in the islands' economy, since he said this was very important. I agree with what he said, but one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Seals and Sealing in Canada—

[English]

In the report of the Royal Commission on Seals and Sealing in Canada recommendation 39 states: "The non-consumptive use of seals such as the viewing of seal herds should be encouraged subject to appropriate regulatory measures to protect the animals and their habitat".

• (1350)

I would like the hon. member to comment on ecotourism, a new dimension of his riding's economy, because I am sure it is a very important factor.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member, who has already been to the Magdalen Islands two or three times.

Although he did not go on a seal hunt, he saw first hand what happens to the seals on the ice in the gulf.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that we are getting a lot of tourists and a lot of development in the Magdalen Islands because people are coming from the United States, Italy and other European countries, in fact from all over the world. We are experiencing a boom in the tourism industry, unlike anything we have seen in the past 10 or 15 years. This is very important, Mr. Speaker.

However, as far as culling X number of seals from the herds is concerned, this will not harm tourism and it is certainly not a threat to the continued existence of the seal herds. In fact, what we call the "harvesting of the herd" benefits everyone.

[English]

It is very important not to shock the environmentalists. We can do a reasonable harvest. We can use every ounce of meat, every ounce of oil and we will sell it on the market. CIDA buys all kinds of mackerel in cans. We can sell seal meat too. We will keep our herds. We will have the seal hunters and they will have their jobs.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on the record a question that the minister of fisheries will undoubtedly have to answer tomorrow at the University of New Brunswick law school.

The minister of fisheries is speaking at the law school on Friday, I think at 1.30 in the afternoon, and the general public is invited to attend together with the media and, of course, with law school students who will be questioning the minister of fisheries on the subject of fisheries management as it pertains to the Law of the Sea and what the minister of fisheries and the Government of Canada intend to do under the law to protect our fisheries.

I will try to present the question in the seven minutes I have. The question is this: According to the department's own information sheets, in 1990 it gave 195,000 tonnes of fish as foreign allocations within our 200-mile zone and it issued 117 foreign licences, foreign allocations within Canada's 200-mile zone, enough to keep 19 fish plants going in Canada. That is the department's own background material. This is Fisheries and Oceans Canada. At least, I don't know, 10,000 jobs in 20 fish plants.

The rationale, as given by the minister and the department, for giving out these foreign allocations inside the 200-mile zone is that Canada has an obligation under the Law of the Sea. This is the information package or backgrounder of Fisheries and Oceans. The Law of the Sea requires coastal states, and it goes on and on and on.

The question is if the Law of the Sea required Canada to give 119 foreign licences last year and 195,000 tonnes of fish to foreigners, then why can we not extend our jurisdiction over straddling stocks that is also required under the Law of the Sea?

The government says that it cannot extend it for transborder stocks because we did not ratify the Law of the Sea. There is no Law of the Sea. There is a Law of the Sea by custom which was signed by 119 nations at the United Nations in 1983. But then it required 60 to ratify it in their own countries and to date, only 43 have done so.

So there is no Law of the Sea. But the Law of the Sea is used to give foreigners allocations of fish within our 200-mile zone. The minister of fisheries stood in this House a few moments ago and said: "Oh, but fish that Canadians do not want are given to the foreigners". I am sorry but I have them in my riding as other members do.

Why Canadians cannot get licences to catch squid unless they are a certain group of Canadians. A man on welfare cannot get a licence to catch squid; a woman on welfare cannot get one. I cannot get one. Nobody can get one unless he or she qualifies as a full-time fisherman and has certain other qualifications. But the Cubans can get one. Oh yes, 12 miles off the coast, there is the Cuban flag. Japanese can get one. Russians can get one.

If you go out and you catch a fish that a foreigner is catching under a Canadian licence you are thrown in jail. Then you spend your time in jail. A great many Canadians have spent their time in jail, because they cannot get a licence.

Last year, Fisheries and Oceans said they gave 117 foreign vessels licences 195,000 tonnes—that is their publication—to vessels that are over 400 feet long. Why, you could drop the biggest Canadian vessel in the hold of one of those foreign vessels and you would need search and rescue to find it.

If the Law of the Sea forces Canada to give licences to foreign nations and allocations as the minister said it does in this House today, how can he turn around in response to this motion and say: "but the Law of the Sea is not law".

Under section 62 of the Law of the Sea, it says that you must give allocations that are in excess of Canada's needs, or a coastal state's needs, to a foreign nation if you are not using it. Then the next section says that in the case of transborder stocks you have the right under international law to enforce their conservation.

So the Government of Canada uses one section of the Law of the Sea and says: "We have to give to 11 foreign nations quotas because of the Law of the Sea". Then it turns around and says: "Well, we cannot stop the foreigners from overfishing outside the 200-mile zone because there is no Law of the Sea".

It is going to be interesting. Tomorrow we will have our lawyers, our law school students and perhaps law professors, perhaps a judge or two, ask the minister of fisheries on the spot in Fredericton at the University of New Brunswick law school. I wish I were there to listen to the sort of logic the minister of fisheries is going to come out with when he talks about the Law of the Sea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock p.m., I must interrupt the debate.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

TRADE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when the free trade agreement was signed neither the United States nor Canada could agree on fair trade rules. So it was decided that they would be negotiated over the next five to seven years.

Three and a half years later we still have not started to negotiate the fair trade rules. As a result, when the Canadian softwood lumber industry or Canadian manufacturers such as Stelco or Honda increased their exports to the United States by being price competitive, the U.S. uses or threatens to use its anti-dumping and anti-subsidy countervail laws to eliminate this increased competition.

Apparently Canada has decided to defer fair trade rule negotiations until after the current GATT negotiations are completed. Meanwhile, the lack of fair trade rules is destroying the truly open North American market contemplated by supporters of the free trade agreement and is threatening Canadian jobs.

We can compete but we need fair trade rules now. We need a level playing field, but once again we appear to be one of our own worst enemies.

ARCTIC WINTER GAMES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 15, the 1992 Arctic Winter Games in Whitehorse will begin and will run until March 22. Over 1,400 cultural and sports participants will be at these games. They come from Greenland, Russia, Alaska, Yukon, the Northwest Territories and northern Alberta. Sixteen different sports are featured, traditional and contemporary.

The traditional sports include Dene and Inuit games like the snow snake, the knuckle hop and the one-leg high kick, et cetera. Contemporary sports include hockey, cross-country skiing, dog mushing, silhouette shooting, snow shoeing, volleyball and wrestling.

Unique to these games is the focus on culture: Arctic arts, crafts, dance, drama, story telling and music are highlighted along with the sports.

For an absolutely unforgettable northern experience, I urge all members of this House to come to Whitehorse next week.

Good luck to all the northern athletes and good luck to all the NWT athletes. Any member wishing to know more about how countries can get together, this is the perfect opportunity.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE ORCHESTRA

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it has been some time since I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, but if I were I would immediately press to establish a new policy for the National Arts Centre orchestra.

When the National Arts Centre orchestra is on tour in Canada it should open the performance with our national anthem. The strong melody and and patriotic words of O Canada should resound loud and strong in every community and concert hall in which our national orchestra plays.

What if some communities do not want our national anthem played? Then the National Arts Centre orchestra should refuse to play there.

Canadians must unite in their opposition to the divisive forces that threaten our existence as a strong nation. The National Arts Centre orchestra must not be the patsy to any divisive forces.

"O Canada, our true north strong, united and free".

HOUSING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, Winnipeg is really the home of co-op housing. The first major project in Canada began in that area, and since then over 3,000 families have enjoyed the benefits of that major program. On behalf of them I want to speak out against the disgraceful cut in the co-op housing project that was in the last budget.

Let me read, if I may, a comment made by residents of Carpathia Co-op which provides a good mixture of housing for low and middle income, single parent families:

> The federal government has a responsibility to the people of Canada to ensure that we all have access to secure, modest, affordable housing.

There is a contradiction. In January the former minister of housing said clearly that the co-op housing program was an ideal program to provide a mix to stop the ghettoization of social housing across the province. Then, in the House of Commons yesterday, the Minister of Finance said that co-op housing was not useful for providing that kind of support for mixed housing.

When is the government going to get its act straight? I think it is time we understood that this government has a commitment to the people of Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians have never heard of the experimental lakes area, the ELA, in northwestern Ontario; nor have they heard of the internationally decisive work done there.

It was the ELA program that first proved it was phosphates that caused the explosive growth of algae in fresh water. It was the ELA program that proved it was industrially generated acid rain that was killing Canadian lakes. And the ELA program is continuing to do ground breaking scientific research such as gathering the long-term information that will allow us to gauge the real effects of global warming.

But, astonishingly, the program does not yet know how much money it will get from this government next year. At very least the current paltry and inadequate allocation of $155,000 must be recommitted. Ideally the funding should be increased.

For a mere $450,000 a year plus a one-shot $10 million investment in site development, Canada can retain and enhance one of the most crucial and internationally lauded scientific projects on the planet.

RED CROSS MONTH

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to remind members of the House and all Canadians that the month of March is Red Cross Month.

Last year, 2.5 million Canadians gave their time as volunteers or donated blood to the society because they can see the positive results of the work it is doing.

In Fredericton alone over 600 volunteers are involved with the Red Cross Society, offering such vital services as transportation aid, an accompaniment to citizens needing help for doctors' appointments, often staying with them for personal support. Another program offered by the Red Cross across Canada and appreciated in my community is the house fire relief service extending financial support and assistance to families that have lost their homes and personal belongings due to fire.

The Canadian Red Cross Society influences the lives of people daily in communities right across this country, including financial assistance in providing supplies to help victims of war, famine and natural disasters abroad. In Canada the Red Cross organizes many home programs including support for veterans and seniors, and more than a quarter of a million people have benefited from its services.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, human rights groups in Canada want to know the real reasons for the scrapping of the Court Challenges Program.

The government says there is enough federal jurisprudence but legal experts say that simply is not true. The government says it is part of the deficit reduction, but all evidence contradicts the suggestion that the justice department could perform this function more cheaply. This would also be a conflict of interest for the department which must defend any court challenges.

Could it just be a coincidence that Preston Manning has called for this program to be scrapped? Considering the support that the Prime Minister has given the program in the past, surely there is no one in this government who is not committed to protecting the human rights of every Canadian.

We all hope this program will be reinstated.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of a constituent from Calgary Southeast who contacted me expressing concern about a statement made yesterday with regard to veterans affairs.

I have spoken to the minister and I am pleased to report that there are absolutely no plans, as the hon. member for Hillsborough yesterday suggested, "to shuffle veterans affairs positions around the country".

I was advised that the department may relocate some jobs to streamline operations, but it would do so only to improve efficiency while maintaining service to our veterans, with every possible consideration of employees who may be affected.

The member also mentioned the winding down of the veterans lands administration. The government is looking at ways of improving the efficiency of the agency. We are looking at investigating privatization of the administration of VLA's activities and at other ways of ensuring continued cost effectiveness.

We will wind it up, but in an orderly way and with every consideration for employees who may be affected and at the same time ensuring that service to our veterans is maintained.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, at a general meeting of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities on March 6, 1992, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds was asked about the use of the port of Churchill.

The minister said that the port of Churchill had many problems that are not incurred at other ports. He included the example of a Brazilian ship last September or October running into an iceberg and puncturing its hull. The minister then stated that welders had to be flown to Churchill. The minister also stated that the Brazilians were not going to be going to Churchill any more.

I have a document from the Canadian Coast Guard. It has reviewed its casualty records for 1989, 1990 and 1991 and has stated that there was no recorded incident of the form of damage described.

It also checked the records of the Transportation Safety Board. It had some incidents recorded where Brazilian ships had ice damage. However, these were on ships that were in transit to or from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They say: "None were to ships"—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member.

HIGH SPEED TRAIN

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, as member for Québec-Est, I am happy that the report of the Standing Committee on Transport tabled yesterday dealing with high speed trains acknowledges the economic spin-offs of such a project.

I must stress the fact that the final feasibility study now under way deals with the complete corridor from Quebec city to Windsor, Ontario and not only the Montreal-Toronto section.

Like the other members of this House, I am eager to see the conclusions of that study since, if that great pan-Canadian project becomes reality, it could mean not only job maintenance or job creation in the area of passenger train operations and rolling equipment manufacturing, but also the acquisition of new, up-to-date technologies, the interlacing of foreign and Canadian companies and the creation of strategic alliances. Eventually it could also mean a new direction for production and research and development activities in the aerospace and aeronautics industries.

By taking the necessary steps for this project to succeed, Canada could improve its position within the export market and better place itself among the five major countries in the area of railway stock production.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to denounce an unfair action by Canada Post.

In several parts of the country, including Saint-Frédéric-de-Beauce, Canada Post allows postal outlets to sell stamp booklets at a discount price. Often these outlets are very close to post offices, even as close as across the street. This practice is unacceptable.

Canada Post allows its own competitors to play with the price of stamps. On the other hand, the post office never cuts its prices. So it will become an easy target for postal officials who are more than willing to close post offices in rural areas.

The people of Saint-Frédéric-de-Beauce see through this scheme, Mr. Speaker. They see through it so clearly that they formed a surveillance committee. The government is dismantling the Canadian postal system with so-called streamlining operations and questionable business practices. The selling of postage stamps at a discount price should be banned, because it means the closure of post offices in Canada.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, last night CBC television aired an interview with the Prime Minister and his wife.

In that interview the Prime Minister used language which some would say is not politically correct. He said he would do serious damage to anybody who threatens to injure his family. If anyone wants to criticize Brian Mulroney for saying that, they had better think first about this: He is a father and a husband before he is a prime minister and when Frank magazine attacked his daughter he reacted.

There are 26 million people out there expecting the man to be some kind of an emotionless, non-human public servant, set on earth just to look after their needs. He is human, he speaks his mind, he supports and defends his family in any way possible.

For those who may call for an apology, I can only say that many of us are still waiting for an apology from the magazine that discredited itself in the first place.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of extremely serious issues on the environmental front in Alberta that cry out for action from the federal government.

Regrettably the ministers responsible seem paranoid to the point of inaction, something that is not going unnoticed by Canadians who care. Why is it the Minister of the Environment has refused to come to Parliament to halt logging in Canada's largest national park, Wood Buffalo? This House would send a strong message to Canfor and Daishowa that there will be no more blackmail for cash.

Why is it that the Minister of Transport continues to do nothing for about the illegal Oldman dam despite a clear direction from the Supreme Court of Canada for him to do his duty pursuant to the Navigable Waters Act. That reservoir should be ordered drained by the minister, and he knows it and yet he does nothing. Why is the Minister of Agriculture doing nothing about the risk of disease transfers from game farms to wildlife? Does he really support shooting wild elk to protect them from catching diseases from game farmed elk.

Something stinks about the inaction on environmental issues in Alberta and the smell seems to be political.

MORDECAI RICHLER

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, Mordecai Richler has struck yet another blow at Quebecers. According to this author, the people of Quebec form a tribe whose elite is but a self-destructing force, we are suffering from collective paranoia and owe our emancipation to English Canada.

As a Quebecer, I cannot condone racist comments and a bunch of lies such as these. It is unacceptable. It is unfortunate that such an individual should call himself a Canadian. Mordecai Richler must be exposed and I hope that leaders in English Canada and in the Jewish community will join in denouncing this consummate racist with a totally decayed mind.

Mr. Richler is a racist of the worst kind who smears Quebec's reputation abroad by peddling one lie after another. If a Quebec nationalist were to write something like that about another nation or minority, I bet it would cause an uproar in Canada. Canadians must speak out. They either denounce his action or they are his accomplices.

JEWISH STUDENTS' NETWORK

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, 60 young men and women from the Jewish Students' Network are with us in the House today. They have come from Victoria, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, London, Waterloo, Guelph, Toronto, Kingston, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax and Israel. They have come to protest the plight of Syrian Jews who are denied basic rights set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in Syria's own Constitution. They cannot emigrate, vote, work for the government and are subjected to harassment, police surveillance, arbitrary arrest and imprisonment.

All parliamentarians applaud you, the dedicated students from Network, in your fight for human rights. We join with you in protesting these callous abuses by Syria and in calling on President Assad to end them. This Saturday as the Jewish community throughout the world observes Shabbat Zachor, the Sabbath for remembrance of oppressed Jews, we will remember with you, for oppression is not a Jewish issue, it is an issue for all mankind. We will not forget.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport.

The government has announced that it is rushing ahead with plans to privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport, an airport that makes a $100 million profit every year. The airline, the province, the regional governments say: "We do not need it".

I want to know from the minister why he is going ahead with this when everyone says that it is not needed. Why does he want to give $100 million of profit to the private sector at the expense of the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 and 1989, Pearson airport was so congested that everybody suffered unacceptable consequences. The indications concerning the traffic at Pearson over the next few years tell us that we will again experience a similar situation in 1997-98 unless changes are made. So we are preparing for the future. We have confidence in Canada's future and we believe that this is the most appropriate time to do this planning and at the same time create 3,200 jobs over the next five years in the Toronto region.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, how is it that the minister tells us today that he must proceed with this when studies on the needs at this airport are not yet completed and when the minister himself said that he did not want to consult anybody, that he was not interested in talking with anybody involved, except his contractor friends who could make money?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely unbelievable that the Leader of the Opposition, of a supposedly serious party, would talk like that here in the House. We have consulted all interested parties. Last Monday evening, we even had a meeting in Toronto with two Ontario government ministers and four mayors from the region. During that meeting we explained very clearly to these concerned that there was no problem with the process. They simply wanted to propose a delay in order to set up a new local authority that meets none of the criteria of privatization through a local authority that were established four years ago by this government. Only on Monday did all those people realize that there should be another local authority in which the three levels of government would be involved.

Among the people who were there, the mayors of the two largest communities in the Toronto region systematically opposed the creation of such an authority.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, questions were asked in this House about privatization of airports and the government said at that time that it was not the policy of the government. It was said here in this House.

The minister has now said that developers will have 90 days to come up with proposals for taking over these terminals. Canadians should know that one company, Paxport, has a major head start. It even had a scale model of a proposed new terminal airport on display at the Rideau Club for members of Parliament two years ago. A principal in that company is Don Matthews, a former chairman of the PC Party and fund raiser for the Prime Minister in his leadership bid.

We all know that the Prime Minister likes to roll the dice. Can the minister assure us that in this case he is not loading the dice for his friends?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we should perhaps recall that when submissions to build terminal 3 were requested, the person that the Leader of the Opposition just referred to was one of the bidders, but he did not get the contract. Instead, the contract was awarded to friends of the Liberal Party.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport.

I have gone through the proposal, the press release, everything that he released yesterday very carefully and the numbers frankly do not make any sense. Using the minister's own growth projections with respect to passengers, Pearson airport does not reach its 28 million person capacity until well past the year 2000, not 1997 as the minister stated yesterday. Likewise, his figures on job creation are totally hypothetical.

This announcement simply does not make sense at the present time. Will the minister therefore withdraw his request for proposals, go back to the drawing board and come forward later when he can prove to Canadians that what he is going to do is in the best interest of Canadian travellers and Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. We are proceeding because we believe that this is what is needed in order to have the proper capacity at this airport in 1997–98. The time to do it is now because this is the time that we are going to get the best prices.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that he can refurbish as many airport terminals as he wants and that is not going to help with the problems of capacity at Pearson airport. If the minister is actually trying to tell people that runway expansion at Pearson is a certainty, why does he not come out and say that clearly so that people understand what is going on here? If that is what he is saying, why does he not tell us how he is going to pay for runway expansion?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read all the documents that we put out yesterday, he would have noticed that we clearly stated that the request for proposals is considering no runway expansion and, as an option, three additional runways, so we are covering all aspects.

I do not understand why the hon. member from the other side is so much against the creation of 3,200 jobs in the Toronto area at this period of time.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport knows full well the dangerous state of the Canadian airline industry in Canada. We do not know if we are going to have one or two carriers by the end of this year or next. Yet he has embarked on a plan to turn over the most profitable airport in our total aviation system to the private sector at a time when we have seen a drop in air traffic by about 12 per cent with no real indication that it is going to turn around any more than the economy is going to turn around. I want to ask the minister if he can justify to this House and, more important, to the Canadian people who will have to pay the bills how we can do this kind of mathematical wizardry to suggest that the private sector, at a large cost to the people of Canada, can do better?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I remind the hon. member that the forecast of Transport Canada on the number of passengers who are likely to go through Pearson airport in the coming years has been deposited with the EARP panel that is studying the additional runways. These figures have been accepted as accurate by this panel.

The traffic at Pearson over the past 10 to 12 years has increased by 4.5 per cent annually. We are basing our forecast on a 3 per cent increase per year for the next 10 to 12 years. This indicates to us that by 1997–98 we are going to run into a capacity problem at the airport. We are not doing this for tomorrow, we are doing this for the future because of the time that it takes to put the renovation and upgrading together.

We figure that when we have completed this process we will be right on time to meet the proper capacity so again we will not find ourselves in the position in which we found ourselves in 1989. I am surprised that a representative of the NDP is against the—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should go on to the next question.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it would appear that the Minister of Transport relies on the same advice that the Minister of Finance relies on when he says that we are already out of the recession.

We know that the recession is not over. It is not even close to being over. We know that because of the decline in use of the aviation industry by Canadians that there will not be a 3 per cent increase. We would like to get back to that point, but we know it is not going to happen for quite some time. We also do not know if we are going to have one or two air carriers in this country. If we end up having one, you are not going to need any of that space whether it is at terminal 1 or terminal 2.

I ask the minister again: Will he reconsider this decision, put it on hold until such time as the aviation industry has turned around and we know what the long-term future of our carriers will be?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the number of passengers going through an airport is not related to the number of airline carriers. It is related to the number of people who are travelling by air. We are not going to reverse our stand.

I find it rather peculiar that the same people who a few weeks ago and even a few days ago were asking the federal government to borrow money to do infrastructure work that belonged to other areas of government are now wondering why the federal government is getting into a project that will create 3,200 jobs without borrowing money and at no cost to the taxpayers.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the minister should also remember that Pearson airport contributes $100 million of profit a year to the aviation system. That is the cost to the taxpayer that this government is prepared to give over to its private sector buddies which means, in the long term, it will be the taxpayers and the users of the aircraft who will have to pay the price.

I want to ask the minister once again: Will he reconsider this decision given that the province of Ontario does not like it, the municipalities do not like it and the industry, that is going to have to pay the piper, does not want it at all?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because Pearson is such an important component of our airline industry in Canada that we do not want it to suffer the same type of congestion that it did in 1988–89 and caused so much disruption in the system.

We believe that this is the best time to preserve the integrity and the profitability of Pearson because we are not going to lose money in that. By having the private sector doing it, we are going to save some money in the operation and we are going to use the business sense of the people in the industry to make Pearson even more profitable.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

To this day the entire privatization deal of terminal 3 involving the financial figures, the text of the agreement and the rationale for contract awarding remains a state secret which this government does not want to open up or divulge to Canadians.

Why is the government once again prepared to proceed in the very same manner? Why this rushed 90-day period? Could it be that Gordon Sinclair, president of the Air Transport Association, was correct when he suggested that this deal has more to do with rewarding the efforts of developers that have found a mark in this government?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat. This exercise is predicated on the fact that we must meet the capacity requirements of one of the most important airports in Canada.

We have to plan ahead. We have the figures on what are going to be the capacity needs starting in 1997–98. We are preparing now and at the same time we are helping the economy of that area of the country.

I am very surprised that a member from the Toronto area would be against the creation of 3,200 jobs.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the motivating force of this very massive and costly project should be need and not greed. That is something this government does not understand.

Given that all taxpayers of Canada have invested heavily in the nation's premier airport, and since the selling price of both terminals will be considerably lower given the economically depressed state of the air industry, why is the minister prepared to risk at this time the holdings of those 26 million Canadian shareholders?

What happened to good business sense which meant buying low and selling high?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is precisely one of the components that has been part of our decision.

In the depressed state of the economy the cost of the renovations and upgrading that will be necessary are of course going to be lower at this stage than at any time in the future.

The end result, again I repeat, is the creation of 3,200 jobs for five years in an area of the country that is very much depressed.

I do not understand why members on the opposition side, especially those from the area, are so much against it.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this government pursues its policies regardless of the hardship it brings to Canadians.

Today interest rates have been again increasing. Real interest rates are at a level which will further discourage economic recovery.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: How much more pain does this government wish to inflict on Canadians and why?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would disagree with the hon. member.

This government is doing everything it can to help the situation along. I hope she is not suggesting that we borrow more money. I hope she is not suggesting that we go the Liberal way, that we borrow more money and get higher interest rates.

Interest rates of course are the result of a very volatile situation, but we have done our share as a government and will continue to do it. The rate that went up by 11 basis points today is already much lower, three times lower than it was during the Liberal period.

We have done our share and we will continue to do it. I am convinced that with our policy interest rates will continue their decline as they have over the last 14 months.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, with help like that, it is no wonder we are in trouble.

Mr. Speaker, the one and only time that Canada had no inflation was during the Great Depression of the 1930s. I therefore ask the minister: Now that the inflation rate is almost zero, can he give us a good reason for today's rise in interest rates?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that we must be clear when we talk about increases in the interest rate. Eleven basis points is quite normal, because when interest rates go down, there are ceilings and plateaus. This is quite normal and I prefer our plateaus to the deep hole that was dug when the Liberals were in power and interest rates were sometimes over 20 per cent.

As a government, we have done and will continue to do everything to ensure that these rates go down without borrowing money that Canadians do not have and without increasing taxes, so that the economy can recover.

We are doing our part and we are sure that the economy will respond.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

In his 1990 report, Professor Harris stated that it was difficult to contemplate a capelin, a crab or a shrimp fishery that would not impact on the cod resource.

Assuming the minister agrees with this, does he not also agree that we must examine the licences for all vessels licensed to operate within the 200-mile limit to see to what degree, if any, they are interfering with the endangered cod stocks or the cod food?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member might be getting confused by the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls who often gets mixed up on this question.

At the present time I am reviewing very carefully the use of foreign fishing vessels within the 200-mile zone. No foreign vessels are allowed to fish within the Canadian 200-mile economic zone unless it is in the national interest of Canada and there is a request from our fishing industry or the fishermen's union for them to do so. They are only allowed to fish for species, otherwise, that we do not catch ourselves or use ourselves. Every foreign vessel that fishes within the 200-mile limit has a Canadian observer on board. So we know exactly what they are doing, what species they are catching, what they are discarding, what their actions are, and we make sure they observe our rules and regulations.

Our problem is not caused by foreign vessels fishing within the 200-mile limit. It is caused by foreign vessels fishing in an unrestrained manner outside the Canadian 200-mile economic zone where international law does not permit us to exercise authority.

As the debate today shows, our patience may not last forever.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, what the minister said may be the truth but not the whole truth.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stupich: No, it isn't. It is not just one factor that is endangering the cod stocks. It is a whole host of them.

One of them is that the quota for this year was set, tI believe, at 120,000 tonnes; it was reduced from a higher figure of 185,000 tonnes to 120,000 tonnes according to a fairly recent press release. Professor Harris recommended some four years ago, in view of his state of alarm about the depleting cod resource, that it should have been reduced then to 90,000 tonnes. We are still one-third higher after four years.

When is the minister going to take these reports seriously and get the quotas down to where Professor Harris said they should be?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, let us have some accuracy in this matter. Dr. Harris' report was presented to the government in 1990 which I calculate to be two years ago.

Nowhere in his report did he say that the TAC should be reduced to 90,000 tonnes. He suggested that the management tool we use of F0.1, which allows one to take 16 to 20 per cent of the biomass of some particular stock each year, was the correct way to proceed. In the present circumstances we should try to keep the catch at a rate of 0.30 because we could not operate at 0.1. Since then he has said that we should be very cautious and he has recommended that TACs be reduced more than we have reduced them. But we have set the TACs in accordance with the advice of Canadian scientists, CAFSAC advice, and at no time have we set quotas any higher than was recommended by our own scientists.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The softwood lumber industry, because of the 14.5 per cent surtax, today is really in shambles. The immediate problem is: What can we do about this terrible problem today?

• (1440)

The present situation is not unlike what happened in 1971 when our American friends imposed a 10 per cent surcharge on Canadian exports to the United States. The Employment Support Act was passed specifically to remedy that type of unfair taxation by the United States.

Will the minister take this question as our representation to invoke the terms of this act immediately as a countermeasure to what the Americans have done to the softwood lumber industry of Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, of course we will take any representation from the hon. gentleman, but I have to tell him that the big problem with 1971 was that they did not have a dispute settlement mechanism to help them solve the problem. They had to reach out and provide more public funds from the Canadian taxpayer to handle the problem.

What we are trying to do is make sure that American taxpayers who are going to have to pay more for houses as a result of this decision, American taxpayers who will have to pay for this wrong decision on the part of the Americans, will pay for the bad decision they have made with respect to this matter.

What we have is a dispute settlement mechanism now which we did not have in 1971. I think our case is so strong we may not even have to use that mechanism. But if we do, we will and we will use it vigorously.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That answer is totally unacceptable. I am talking about a problem that exists today.

At the time of the dispute settling mechanism we could go to GATT. What I am talking about today is an interim measure. In 1971 when the countermeasure, the Employment Support Act, was introduced, it only took three days to pass through this House with all-party support. Let me add that at that time all parties in the House gave full co-operation to the passing of this act.

As an interim measure to help every softwood lumber industry and employee in Canada, I ask the minister to invoke this Employment Support Act today. He should not only invoke it but make it retroactive to the date the Americans imposed the tax, March 6, so that we can show them we have the ability to counteract moves they make in our export business.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, that bill passed, if it did, in three days because there were no other options available to the Government of Canada.

The option available at that time was GATT. GATT, as we all know, is not binding. GATT has very powerful moral suasion but it is not binding. Today we have GATT, and as a matter of fact we are pursuing this particular case under GATT. We expect a resolution from them in June or as late as July.

We are pursuing GATT but we are also pursuing our rights under the free trade agreement which gives us what we did not have in 1971 and what we did not have until 1989: the binational panel, the dispute settlement mechanism. That is why we do not have to resort to spending millions of taxpayers' dollars on the proposal the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement both countries must provide an equal exchange of information for government contract tendering and bidding.

According to External Affairs officials, Canada has provided statistics to the United States but the United States has not responded, despite three years of requesting this information.

Will the minister defend Canadian businesses and ensure that this part of the agreement is fulfilled, or will he suspend the supply of this information until the U.S. begins to provide the necessary statistics?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the government is aware of this request for information. The Americans indicate that they are going to supply us with that information. Of course if they do not, that would be a very serious violation of the understandings we have with them under the free trade agreement in terms of bilateral trade outside the free trade agreement.

What the hon. member should know, however, is that we have negotiated through the free trade agreement access to American procurement we never had before. We have information now from American government authorities on contract opportunities we never had before. We have that information. We would be very happy to supplement it with the information the hon. member suggested as well.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the minister making some sort of commitment to take action. I would like to bring to his attention that in fact the agreement states the two governments must exchange information on an annual basis to allow monitoring of contracts. Without this information, how can the government know if Canadian businesses are getting a fair shake in the U.S. market?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The hon. member makes a constructive point. We will make sure that we have all possible sources of information, including the information that he suggests.

Our information right now on the American market is very deep and very comprehensive but we will be glad to pursue our rights under the agreement with the Americans as raised by my hon. friend.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Last week, the minister and his colleague in Newfoundland made a very difficult and important decision for conservation of Atlantic salmon, one that followed a ban on fishing in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia some years ago.

Accompanying the decision last week was an offer to the fishermen to repurchase their licences for retirement. I think that was a sound and compassionate offer and an investment in future conservation.

I would like to ask if that offer is also going to be made available for those New Brunswick and Nova Scotia fishermen who still retain commercial licences?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I believe last week we made an important step forward with reference to the conservation of the Atlantic salmon, one of the finest and noblest fish that it is possible to come across, or to catch or to consume for that matter.

With respect to the question of a similar program for commercial fishermen in New Brunswick or elsewhere, we are considering an initiative to retire the remaining commercial salmon licences in New Brunswick as well as in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

However, in Newfoundland and Labrador this is a program shared 70 per cent by the federal government, 30 per cent by the province and therefore we will need the co-operation of the provincial governments in these places as well.

I am glad to see that the hon. Leader of the Opposition, who is from New Brunswick, is very interested in the reply to this question.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Lead in gasoline causes irreversible brain damage in children. Knowing this, the Canadian government banned the use of it in Canada in 1990. However, this ban did not extend to the export and production of leaded gasoline.

Why should the children of the developing world suffer from a Canadian desire for exports? Will the minister today announce that he will enforce a ban on the export and production of leaded gasoline?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows, in the case of tetraethyl lead, the Government of Canada has a policy by which we do not permit its common use in Canada now. It is permitted in certain exceptional circumstances in farm machinery. It is also used for certain planes. I think there are about 75,000 aircraft in Canada that use that type of fuel. Those are the conditions under which it is used.

In the case of export we are now in the process of putting forward regulations requiring that a notice be given to the countries that receive this product because in Canada there is specific legislation that constrains its use.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think most members would agree there should be standards internationally, not just for Canadian children, but for all the children of the world.

Methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, or MMT, has replaced lead in gas used in Canada. It too has potentially dangerous health effects and has been banned in the U.S. since 1978.

Will the minister allocate funds to help companies producing lead and MMT to convert to the use of environmentally friendly alternatives like ethanol?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): I am very happy to report to the House, Mr. Speaker, that in the last budget the Government of Canada, through the Minister of Finance, brought in a measure that would specifically encourage the use of methanol by withdrawing the excise tax on that specific product, a very innovative measure that is going to be good for agriculture.

It is good for the environment. The impact on the environment is not perfect but it is going to be very good and that is exactly what the Government of Canada is proceeding to do.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last week I met with farmers from Halton and Peel counties. They are concerned about their futures as a result of the GATT talks, the possible elimination of article XI.

I know the minister is fighting for Canada's position at the GATT, but I have a question for him. Some farmers want Canada to take a walk away from the GATT table if we do not get a strengthened article XI.

Can the minister tell us what the likely consequences of that would be?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the position that Canada put forward at the GATT was developed with the stakeholders, the producers and the provinces.

The rationale for Canada's position under supply management was the recognition that article XI, as it exists today, after findings by GATT, would no longer allow us to continue with supply management as we view it in Canada. Therefore, the need to have it strengthened and clarified so it could apply to further processing or other products is important. That is why the position was developed.

I think the members of the supply managed community understand the rationale for the development of this position and are continuing to support Canada in presenting it at GATT.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for internal revenue.

Manitoba cabinet makers have lost up to half a million dollars because of poor application of departmental policy by Revenue Canada. Last week the Canadian International Trade Tribunal determined that Manitoba cabinet makers had been right all along.

In the case of the Imperial Cabinet Company versus the minister of internal revenue, would the minister endorse the conclusions of the tribunal? Will he admit that his department has unfairly treated Manitoba cabinet makers?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that all manufacturers of kitchen cabinets were provided with the regulations, in fact, on two specific occasions, once in 1985 and again in 1989. Consultation was made available to all those in this industry prior to any decisions being made by Revenue Canada to the satisfaction of the majority who participated.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. That interpretation is contrary to the ruling made by the tribunal, and I have the document.

In March of last year, the minister said in this case of the Imperial Cabinet Company, if his department was at fault those cabinet makers would be given refunds.

Will he now make immediate restitution to the Imperial Cabinet Company. Will the cabinet minister make refunds to all eligible cabinet makers from Manitoba?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this cabinet minister made available refunds to all cabinet makers in Manitoba in the past, on two separate occasions.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

After over 60 interventions in this House to the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance, the government continues to do nothing to address the competitive position of the port of Halifax. Higher Canadian fuel taxes, higher Canadian sales taxes and higher Canadian depreciation have all contributed to the operating costs of the port of Halifax being 28 per cent higher than the highly subsidized U.S. ports.

When will this government start putting Canada first and implement policies that give the port of Halifax and Canadian industries an opportunity to compete fairly against their American counterparts?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in his latest budget, the Minister of Finance adopted a certain number of measures to help the transportation industry be more competitive. The Canada Ports Corporation has undertaken a study concerning port competitiveness across the country and it is coming out with recommendations to all ports to do what is necessary to make themselves more competitive.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

As a result of this government's shipbuilding rationalization plan, nearly 200 employees of the Dartmouth marine slips are waiting for their pink slips because of a pay–off for lay–off deal that is currently being negotiated with the department.

My question for the minister is this. Since the Dartmouth yard has always been a profitable operation and suitable buyers are interested, will the minister give this House his assurance that he will not participate in a rationalization scheme that will lead to the premature closing of the Dartmouth marine slips in the port of Halifax?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member could have gotten a more positive answer from the government benches if he had given notice on that particular question. It is a very technical question.

He knows that it is very important to rationalize the shipyards across Canada. Each case has to be treated within that over-all policy. I would be glad to look into this and get back to him.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It involves the experimental lake areas program run by the Freshwater Institute.

This program, arguably is now and has been among the most important environmental programs run in Canada. It is the program that proved acid rain comes from industrial pollution. It is the program that proved algae comes from phosphates and not carbon. It is one of the lead elements in determining the nature of global warming and its impact on Canada now.

But it is in a funding crunch. I would ask the minister if perhaps he could not come up with the roughly $450,000 in operating money required this year and, if he is feeling really generous, the $10 million to do the site upgrading to bring it to first-class, world-class standards.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is asking the question is in the money crunch and I am in an answer crunch because he was not able to give me notice of this question until during the Question Period. I have not looked at the Edmonton Lakes situation now for some time.

An hon. member: The experimental lakes.

Mr. Crosbie: The Edmonton experimental lakes. Is it in Ontario? Now you really know I have not looked at it recently.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: I will do my best and get back to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East, short supplemental.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could jog the minister's memory or perhaps that of his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, with a brief quote from the report of the Auditor General in December in which he said:

> The program has clearly reached a critical decision point. The secure financial base is eroded and the program currently relies heavily on unpredictable special external funding sources.

My question is for either minister. Would either minister please come up with the money to keep this flagship program going and make it able to do the work that is vital that it do?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of the Environment would answer affirmatively if he were here.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

MORDECAI RICHLER

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Quebecers were amazed and disgusted to read this morning that Mordecai Richler considers them "a tribe with a self-destructive elite". In Toronto, he admitted that he thought Quebecers were anti-Semitic and a tribal society.

I ask the Minister of State for Multiculturalism to denounce and condemn these racist, offensive, insulting and degrading remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry, but questions must concern the administration of government. The question may be serious, but it is not one that concerns the running of government.

Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask another question.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I put the question to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship because he is the guardian of the spirit of tolerance and generosity in this House.

In that regard, I again ask him to call upon his colleagues and the English-speaking community in Montreal and Quebec to oppose—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I have to point out that the question is out of order.

CHILD BENEFITS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

As the Acting Prime Minister will know, there has been a great deal of confusion on the part of the Canadian public dealing with the child benefits package.

In the Budget Papers the minister announced that $400 million would be provided this year for the new child benefits package. We found out yesterday from the minister who responded in the House that it is now $500 million.

Could the Acting Prime Minister please confirm for Canadians just how much money is being made available: the $400 million in the budget or the $500 million as claimed by the minister yesterday?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased my colleague brought this matter to the attention of the House.

As he will realize, the white paper with regard to the child benefits package is a new regime of fairer and simpler taxation. Obviously the Minister of Finance stated the $400 million in the Budget Papers. We are now reviewing with our counterparts from province to province the package the minister put forward. We will be coming back to the House later with the specific plans.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the Acting Prime Minister knows, this child benefits package is front and centre to the program of this government. It is good to see so many members on the opposite side concerned and so many facts available.

In answer to another question yesterday, the question about the public consultation aspect of the white paper—and all members of Parliament know that a white paper is the cornerstone of public consultation with the whole country—the minister responded that they would be "working hard".

Could the Acting Prime Minister elaborate on what working hard means for a public consultation process?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am pleased so many members on the other side of the House are looking at this favourably.

Some hon. members: Favourably?

Mrs. Sparrow: Yes, favourably. It is fairer and simpler taxation. It is going to put more than $2 million over the next five years into child care, and that is exactly what the people of Canada want.

Open consultation starts with the minister talking to his provincial counterparts, with agencies, with concerned commissions, and indeed with taxpayers and families right across the country.

I think the member can just wait and see that it will be totally open.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my regular question to the government House leader concerning the business of the House for tomorrow and for Monday and Tuesday. Perhaps he could indicate what bills he intends to call for those particular days.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow, Friday, March 13, an allotted day.

On Monday it is the government's intention to call Bill C-13, the federal environmental assessment process bill, for debate at report stage and to carry it through to completion hopefully on Tuesday.

In terms of the rest of the week, discussions are ongoing with the opposition parties in this regard. I will get back to the hon. member as soon as possible.

POINTS OF ORDER

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, during his response to my question, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans observed that the Minister of the Environment was not in the House. Unfortunately that was not only incorrect but of course was a question of order because he was commenting on the presence or absence of a member.

However, as the Minister of the Environment is here and under the circumstances, I think he should be allowed to confirm the assertion of the fisheries and oceans minister that he would in fact grant the money required to the program.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is an extension of Question Period, but as the minister seems to be prepared to answer of course he may.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, for the record I think it is important to point out that yes, the Minister of the Environment was in the House. What the minister of fisheries said, and I think everybody understood, was in jest. I felt that it was probably better that he answer the question given the fact that he had fully briefed me on this issue.

ADMISSIBILITY OF QUESTION RAISED DURING ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I appeal to you to help me understand a Standing Order of this House, since I wanted to ask the minister of multiculturalism a question about a case of racism. In this House, ministers are responsible for the law on hate literature. We talked about racism and fighting racism and I do not know why my question was not in order. I would like you to tell me who in this House is responsible—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Speaker was in the Chair at that time and he already made a decision. The purpose of questions asked during Oral Question Period is to call the government to account on the work of a department and that question in no way concerned the work of the minister or the department. The Speaker already gave his decision and I uphold it.

NOTICE OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, on March 10, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization tabled a notice of a ways and means motion.

This motion appears to me to have been irregular, and I want to explain why. I asked the Chair to provide some guidance on this issue and to consider ruling out any further proceedings based on this notice.

The notice that I am referring to is short and I will quickly read it in its entirety:

> That it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act and other legislation respecting the implementation of the goods and services tax to give effect to the statutory measures that were announced by the Minister of Finance in the press release dated March 10, 1992 relating to the goods and services tax, to be applicable as specified in the announcement.

This notice on its own does not tell us much. It contains nothing of substance except to indicate that it will change the GST and that the changes are contained in a press release.

I do not think it is necessary as this point to take up further time outlining the important role of a ways and means motion or the strictures it places on the ability of the House to amend the bill based on it.

I accept that this is not the first time that a ways and means motion has referred to a press release or another non-parliamentary paper, but we have raised that general issue before. In fact the Speaker has ruled:

> There is nothing in our Standing Orders or in our practice to restrict all references in ways and means motions solely to documents tabled in the House.

I ask today whether that ruling has not been misinterpreted by those who prepared these notices. Surely that ruling was not intended to permit notices which contained as little real substance as that which was tabled on Tuesday.

After all, the Speaker qualified in his ruling of January 29, 1990 that:

> In considering whether a ways and means motion should only refer to documents tabled in the House, the argument appears to hinge on whether the House and members had access to the documents and that these documents were public in nature.

He further qualified:

> The terms of the motion itself which I have just outlined must serve as a beacon to guide members in drafting any amendments.

I suggest that the notice given to the House on March 10 does not meet this test. As a beacon, it will not provide very clear light on what amendments are or are not acceptable because it simply refers us to a press release that was released outside this House.

I do not think a motion to concur in this notice should be permitted. I ask the Speaker to rule that this notice is irregular and that there can be no further proceedings on it.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona indicated in his comments, the ways and means motion was not different from others that have been accepted in the House.

Indeed I would refer the hon. member to a ruling by the Chair of January 29, 1990 when the same issue was raised by his colleague, the member for Kamloops.

That being said, I think it should be pointed out for the record that in fact when the ways and means motion was tabled, the press release referred to was part of the tabling. The information was there, but I do acknowledge that with a few changes on a word processor it would fit in more with the traditions of this place.

Even though what occurred was not out of order in terms of our practices and previous rulings, I think a change in procedure may be appropriate in this instance. We will make that strong recommendation to the Department of Finance.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I wish to concur with my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona. We are intending to raise this when the government was obtaining concurrence.

However, the difficulty with the notice of the ways and means motion is that in accordance to the ruling to which my hon. colleague has made reference it was to be a beacon to guide members and I think, as members now know from the words of the government House leader, it is probably not appropriate and the recommendation the government House leader is providing is timely.

I would hope that this kind of practice would not continue in the future. The difficulty with this notice of ways and means motion is that it is incomplete and, I would go as far as to say, unintelligible.

The notice provides for the introduction of a bill to amend the GST along the lines described in a press release. However, the ways and means motion merely refers to that release which was neither appended to the notice as tabled nor subsequently tabled in the House itself. In other words, the House is asked to decide on an issue about which it has no official knowledge.

The parliamentary secretary is indicating something quite different. However I just wish to be on the record as concurring with my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the points made by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and by the minister. There seems to be a way where things could be done in a more appropriate manner. Should things not be done to the satisfaction of hon. members, I am sure they will come back to the House and we can look at it at that point.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Simmons (p. 8079).

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls has two minutes remaining.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is here. As I was saying this morning, the minister of fisheries will be appearing tomorrow afternoon at 1.30 at the law school of the University of New Brunswick. The posters say that he will be addressing the students and faculty of the law school concerning the fisheries.

As I was also saying this morning, he should explain why the department on the one hand issues press releases saying that it has to follow the Law of the Sea in giving quotas to foreign nations inside the 200-mile zone and then turns around on the other hand and says: "We have no jurisdiction over transporter stocks because the Law of the Sea was never ratified by the 60 nations to make it law".

I hope the minister will be able to explain that tomorrow afternoon to those bright young law students who will, as I understand it, have an opportunity to question the minister immediately following his address.

The issue is very clear. Canadians are not able to fish because the government says there is no fish inside the 200-mile zone, the major reason being that the foreigners are taking it outside the 200-mile zone. Yet the Government of Canada is able to give them cod quotas in 2G, 2H and 3N-O off the minister's riding. It was able to give tuna quotas a couple of weeks ago to Japanese vessels, to give them squid quotas off Nova Scotia, to give them mackerel quotas off Sydney Bight, to give them the quotas of what the minister and the department claims are under-utilized species to Canada. There is only one under-utilized species in this country under this government, and that is the fishermen and the fish plant workers of eastern Canada.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. colleague from Gander—Grand Falls. I watched his performance and his involvement in the fishing industry long before I became a member of this House and I share, along with all my fellow Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians, a great respect for the hon. member, who is something more than a folk hero and a great champion of the fishing cause in Newfoundland. I compliment him on his very substantive presentation.

I have heard him speak at length, both in Question Period and presentations in the House, on a fascinating subject, the so-called under-utilized species that has been caught in Canada, exported to another country and then comes back to Canada in a secondary processed fashion at a much higher price to the chagrin of fishermen and plant workers. It comes back to Canadians so that we have to buy the fish that we cannot catch because of the so-called legal implications of the Law of the Sea.

I am fascinated by that subject and I would like to ask the hon. member if he could give us a couple of more minutes on this aspect of the dreadful subject of foreign overfishing.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely correct. As he was speaking, I could just imagine what the longlinermen here in Ottawa are thinking today. Here we have the Japanese who have just received seven large ship licences for tuna. Bluefin tuna are an endangered species today in the northwest Atlantic. They got five times the quota from this government that Newfoundlanders or Nova Scotians got within our 200-mile zone.

Out in 3M, that great spawning ground that was a recognized area of spawning called the Flemish Cap, outside the 200-mile zone, the Government of Canada lifted the moratorium last year for the first time in years and gave foreigners 12,900 tonnes and gave Canada 100 tonnes.

An hon. member: Wow.

Mr. Baker: The point being that I am not saying Canada should have been allowed the 12,900 tonnes. I am saying that nobody should have been given any quota out there in that spawning ground.

In answer to the hon. member's question, when you examine the figures from customs, you will see that the very type of fish allocated is under-utilized inside the 200-mile zone. That same type of fish is imported from every country that is given a quota inside our 200-mile zone, every country that violates the law outside. We also import the same fish back into Canada: Korea, Atlantic cod; Chile, Atlantic cod, brought back into our country. We are importing so much fish today that in the past eight months we imported from the EEC countries one third of the total amount of fish we export to them.

I will conclude with this. We even import from four nations to which we give fish aid, foreign aid. We also import some fish back from them. That is how serious the situation has become.

Perhaps the minister should think about this and say that we will forbid the imports of Atlantic cod from places like Korea and Chile.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): If the hon. member does not want just his colleagues on his own side asking him some questions, I would like to ask a question.

I wonder if the hon. member would agree with what is fact that no quota for tuna has ever been given to Japan by Canada. Any quota for tuna that Japan has is a quota given to Japan by ICCAT, the international organization that supervises international catching of tuna.

Never in the history of Canada that I know of has any quota for as much as the tail of a tuna or the nose of a tuna or the fin of a tuna been given to Japan by Canada. This is done by the international organization that supervises.

As I said earlier this morning, and I would like the hon. gentleman to confirm whether he heard this, we have allowed Japan for a number of years to fish within our 200-mile zone to catch a limited number of the tuna for which it has a quota from ICCAT. It is easier for it to catch that particular quota from ICCAT within our zone. In return, one of the quid pro quo from Japan is that it has invariably supported us in NAFO, the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization, and has invariably observed the conservation rules of that organization and has voted in the same way to support the causes that we support in NAFO.

Does the hon. gentleman suggest for a minute that there is something pernicious or terrible about our allowing one of our firm supporters in NAFO to catch some of its tuna quota given to it by an international organization within our 200-mile zone?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister. The five minute period of questions and comments has expired. I am quite prepared to let it go on with unanimous consent and then I would allow of the hon. member to answer. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: I will conclude my question. Does the hon. gentleman realize that Chile has no vessels whatsoever fishing in the northwest Atlantic? I do not know where Chile is catching the Atlantic cod unless the Atlantic cod has been transplanted somehow to Chile. Cuba might catch something out there, but certainly not Chile.

I would like the hon. gentleman to explain to me where all this Atlantic cod that Chile is said to be exporting to Canada is. What is the volume of it and how did Chile get it in the first place, since Chile has no trawlers fishing in the northwest Atlantic and has never appeared as far as I know in the northwest Atlantic? Could he explain to us what the problem is with allowing Cuba, for example, to catch some offshore squid if it appears in 4VWX, in that particular zone, when Canada has a huge surplus of squid which Canadians do not and cannot catch and therefore we permit a quota to foreign vessels?

The hon. gentleman mentioned cod in zone 2G and 2GH, far up north. Would the hon. gentleman inform the House whether any foreigners have ever caught any cod up there and in what quantities they have caught cod up there? Or is he simply attempting to cod the House and to cod the Canadian people?

An hon. member: I withdraw unanimous consent.

Mr. Crosbie: Great. I accept your withdrawing unanimous consent and now the member for Gander—Grand Falls cannot answer.

Would the hon. gentleman answer some of these questions and stop trying to fool the people of Canada and the members of this House with specious pretences that he is using fact?

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, let me take these issues one at a time. First of all, as far as squid is concerned, the minister asked what is wrong with giving Cuba offshore squid in 4VWX. Zone 4VWX is a zone just east of Nova Scotia. It fishes in what is called the silver hake box. It is 80 miles from the coast of southwestern Nova Scotia. It fishes there on what we call the 401 of squid that are born in Florida, as the minister knows. They go up the coast of the United States. They go around Cuba but they are too small to catch. They are just right to catch when they get to Nova Scotia. They are just big enough for the trawlers to intercept them. That is where Canada gives its 15 factory freezer trawler licences to Cuba.

The minister must realize that it was under his ministership that we restricted squid licences to all Canadians. Today squid is a restricted fishery in Newfoundland. Squid is a restricted fishery to Canadians.

Let me get on to another question. The minister refers to tuna and ICCAT. He made a very impressive little speech about tuna and ICCAT, the international organization.

There are only three countries that belong to ICCAT, Canada, the United States and Japan. They meet once a year on assigned quotas. This past year they met and they assigned quotas: to Japan, 1,300 tonnes of bluefin; to the United States, 800 tonnes of bluefin; to Canada, 570 tonnes of bluefin. Canada is the only one of those three countries that allows Japan inside its 200-mile zone to catch tuna. We are not allowed to go inside Japan's 200-mile zone or the zone of the United States to catch tuna. We have assigned Japan a tuna quota of 180 tonnes of bluefin off Newfoundland, which is five times the quota that is assigned to Newfoundlanders, with an unlimited quota of other types of tuna.

One final point that the hon. member made, he talked about flags. He asked where the Atlantic cod are coming from. It is on the customs reports into Canada in the past year. He asked about Chile and about Korea. They do not see any Korean flags out there. They do not see any Chilean flags out there. They see Panamanian flags out there, that is what they see. That is where those countries get their flags and the hon. member should know full well.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, let me say at the outset that we can say without unqualified hesitation that no one knows more about where squid comes from in the world than the hon. member from Gander. I would also say, more appropriately, that no one understands what is happening to the fishing industry and says it with more eloquence and more commitment than the member.

I want to join this debate to ensure that Canadians understand that this is not just a regional issue. As deeply as my colleagues from Newfoundland feel the ravages and the pain of their own fish workers and their own fishermen, this is an issue for all Canadians. This is an issue that affects every one of us. This is an issue that has ramifications and implications even beyond our own borders. It is very important that all Canadians stand up and be counted on this clear issue when there is such an incredible threat to one of the most valuable resources Canada has possessed for the last 400 or 500 years.

We like to talk about problems of holes in the ozone, but the much more real dramatic, environmentally sustainable development crisis facing us is right off the coast of Newfoundland today. It is that which we all have to speak out against and raise our voices to in order to understand that action is required.

I have to say that I was deeply and sorely disappointed when I listened to the minister speak today. I have always felt that when this minister takes on a cause he goes the full mile. He has never been reticent either about his own talents or about his own commitments. Listening to him today trying to defend the indefensible we find unacceptable. We tried to convince this House that this government was doing everything possible within its range of authority and jurisdiction to stop this overfishing. I went back and checked a few small facts.

He gave us a travel log of all the places that he and the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have visited, trying to convince people in Europe and other places that they are in the wrong. Let us look at a few interesting facts. I suppose there is no better test of a government's commitment than where it puts it resources. Let us talk about the UNCED conference. This minister said: "By God, we are going to take a stand at UNCED". Why is it that the Department of External Affairs has cut its budget in half in terms of its commitment to UNCED in the next fiscal year? Is that a sign that it is prepared to take an environmental defence?

Last August, when the Government of Canada prepared its national report for the conference on environmental development, an incredible opportunity to state the case of the initiatives it will take on overfishing, what did it assign in this book of 300 pages? One paragraph was on overfishing. Not only that, it promised, in this very same book, a national, sustainable fisheries and oceans policy. That was last August. Have you seen this policy, Madam Speaker? No one else in the House has seen it. It is the best kept secret in the minister's back pocket. Here was an opportunity to use UNCED to state the Canadian case, put a policy on the table and it has disappeared.

Let me give a few other interesting facts in the estimates book of the Department of External Affairs. The most important aspect that we can undertake is the legal department right now. We need the best legal minds in this country working out the kind of presentations that we are going to have to take. What has the Government of Canada done? It has cut the legal affairs division of external affairs by almost $2 million. Where is it going to get the lawyers? Where is it going to get the research to mount the kind of battle that is going to be required?

Furthermore, not content with just cutting its own bureaucrats, it totally wiped out the world renowned International Centre for Ocean Development which has provided, over the years, some of the best research on fishing, on environment, on ocean management and on the international Law of the Sea. We do not even have the kind of intellectual muscle to go to work on behalf of Canada because this government does not believe in providing the kind of sound, hard reasoning.

Do those few facts alone tell us that this is a government that really cares, that really is committed, that is going the last mile and using every resource possible? Hardly, Madam Speaker. Maybe the best reason is that I do not think it believes in what it is doing. I think it is all for show.

In fact, I will give a final commentary. The information campaign that was supposed to inform the rest of the world about the problems in the northwest fishery has also had a line in the budget, from $135,000 to 0. This is a government that is standing up for the northwest fishery, but it cannot bother to spend 5 cents to let the rest of the world know what the problems are. Is that a government fully committed to the battle? Is that a government going to the barricades with all swords brandishing? It seems to me it is a government that is meekly, sneakily crawling off into the night because it does not have a case.

Let me come to the crucial issue. We all know that this thing must be resolved in an international context and that is why I want to speak today, because I find that the arguments used by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be weak and fallacious when it comes to the right of Canada to take a stand.

I heard the minister this morning and he said: "We have freedom of the high seas. International law backs us on this issue. Canada has no authority beyond 200 miles. We do not recognize it. We are going to continue to fight if it comes down to a question of confrontation." He said: "We are limited. Once we get out of that 200 mile zone it is like a wall we cannot climb."

Twenty years ago when a previous government was faced with a serious environmental problem in the Arctic waters this Parliament was given a bill called the Arctic Waters Pollution Act which established unilaterally the right of Canada to protect on behalf of the entire international system those precious, delicate, fragile Arctic waters. That was a unilateral action.

As a result of that unilateral action we were able to push the rest of the world into recognizing the right of coastal states to defend environmental requirements beyond its own. We took the initiative, we established a case and the rest of the world agreed. That is why in the resolution presented by my hon. colleague from Burin—St. George's we say it is time for this government to take action, to bring legislation into this House, asserting the right of Canada to exercise management in that area on behalf of the entire international environment.

We are not asking for a bigger grab bag for Canada. We are saying that if somebody does not take action there will not be any cod at all. It will be a resource that will virtually disappear as a sustainable food resource for the rest of the world. To give that kind of legislative initiative some credence and credibility, this government today, as soon as it can, must ratify the international Law of the Sea.

It is tragic and criminal that one of the most important international initiatives undertaken by Canada during the 1970s, up to 1982, signified that there has to be a rule of law on the high seas where there can be a dispute settlement mechanism. This minister was the minister of trade.

He used to run up and down Canada saying: "We have to have a dispute settlement mechanisms". The Law of the Sea has a dispute settlement mechanism, but because President Reagan in 1982 picked up the phone and said to our Prime Minister: "Back off, Brian", we are no longer prepared to become a major advocate or supporter of the Law of the Sea. Canada, to its disgrace, has yet to ratify that fundamental, international law.

When this minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs say that they are doing everything they can, all we can say to them is: "That is hogwash. That is nonsense. We cannot believe you, because you know what the steps are. You know what your rights are. You know what the opportunities are, and you are not taking them."

If we were to sign and ratify the Law of the Sea, we could clearly establish the need to use it to provide a clear and unmistakable authority to provide for the conservation of the fishing stock beyond the 200-mile zone. That is a clear and obvious alternative for Canada to exercise under the rubric of international law.

For the sake of me, when there are such crucial resources at stake, I cannot understand why this minister and his government is so negligent in its response.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question, or perhaps two questions.

First, the hon. member refers to the estimates. I do not know what item appears in the estimates for public relations spending, et cetera in connection with this matter but I can assure him that I am making provision for the year 1992-93 for the spending of many times $100,000 in connection with public relations campaigns to get on our side environmentalists and others in connection with this issue.

There will be more than adequate funding available for anything we need to do in the way of promoting the campaign to confirm and establish what the facts are with respect to this overfishing outside the 200-mile Canadian economic zone, hopefully to get the nations of the world onside and ready if we have to take some kind of action such as the motion proposes, ready to be supportive of that action.

I would like to ask the former minister this. He referred to the Arctic pollution regulation or the action taken some 20 years ago in the Arctic. He must surely realize and recognize that it was an entirely different situation in connection with the Arctic. The action taken was not recognized and approved by the rest of the world.

By now, of course, it may well have been. The only party that had any active interest in the area at all was the United States. While I would have to do some research on this to get the exact facts, it certainly was not supportive of our action and I am sure protested it. Because we were taking action in an area that other nations were not occupying and a region that they could not get to, we had a good chance of some success with respect to that unilateral act.

A unilateral act taken along the lines of what is proposed in this resolution are surely quite different. It would be our extending our jurisdiction in connection with fishing matters, the management of fisheries out beyond 200 miles and in fact out to about 280 miles to the nose and tail of the banks in an area where many other countries are, at present, fishing and exercising high sea fishing rights so that there would be an immediate clash between our action and their exercising what they think are their rights under international law.

We would immediately have conflict and confrontation with at least five, six or seven other nations, including the European Community, which is a very powerful combination of 12 other countries.

Surely the member will admit that these are two different fact situations. If we are to even contemplate taking the kind of action that the resolution proposes, we have to set the stage so that a considerable part of the world and other nation states are ready to say: "Yes, this is an action that is justified. This particular state took every conceivable step it could to have this resolved and now it has taken a unilateral act".

It is this unilateral act that the rest of the world should be prepared to accept. That is the position we have to get ourselves in. Surely he will admit the fact situations are quite different.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I will take both those serious questions and respond in like time.

First I would say to the minister I am more than pleased to hear that he will take up the slack that his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has allowed to develop. I want to say to the minister in return, is his own department of fisheries prepared to pick up the major subtraction of legal fees, the cancellation of the Ocean Development Institute, the support for the UNCED conference?

I want to say to the minister that he needs the backing of his colleagues. It is time he stopped fighting the battle himself. It is about time his entire government got behind him on this issue. While he may be prepared to fight it, it is clear his colleague from external affairs is not prepared to fight because, by her own actions and where she is cutting her budget, we can see that there is just no interest in the issue at all.

On the question of precedent, international law is not like domestic law. There is no central world government that can make decisions. To use the words of a lawyer, it is a "horizontal legal system". The precedent is an evolving one, usually undertaken by different countries that take initiatives, establish certain rights which then become accepted or then get codified into some kind of regulation or some kind of international agreement. We cannot go to some international legislature and petition for them to pass a law.

Changes in the international law only come about when individual countries make their case. I want to make this observation to the minister. If he looks at the international Law of the Sea, article 116, it is clear that it gives the dominant preference to coastal states. If I might quote a fairly senior and learned international lawyer: "Article 16 gives the right of coastal states to issue the kind of orders on conservation beyond the 200-mile zone". Other states would have to respond to us with that initiative. That is the kind of international law we are asking the minister to assert.

Of course we want other countries to agree. I would simply make this observation. The other countries will not agree until we take the action, until we take the initiative. That is what this resolution is about and why the government should support it. If we took the initiative, brought in legislation, then went abroad, then we could begin to establish a new set of international laws as it pertains to the conservation of our fishing resource.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate on the motion of the hon. member from Newfoundland on the state of Canada's east coast fisheries.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I am sure that some members here today remember the Atlantic fishery in the early 1970s.

Canada's territorial sea had just been extended to the 12-mile limit. The waters beyond 12 miles were entirely international and we used to refer to them as the high seas.

I would like to take this opportunity in considering the motion before us today to remind hon. members of the tremendous progress that has been made in recent years and to describe some of the real measures that can and are being taken by Canada to protect fish stocks.

In the early 1970s, fish stocks beyond Canada's 12-mile territorial sea continued to be severely overfished and were crashing to an all-time low. At the same time international experts were meeting at the third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

By 1976, a consensus had emerged that national jurisdiction had to be extended 200 miles to protect the interest of coastal state fishermen and to protect conservation needs of living marine resources.

On January 1, 1977, Canada extended its fisheries jurisdiction to 200 miles, consistent with what would become a fundamental principle in the 1982 United Nations convention on the Law of the Sea. This was a tremendous gain for Canadian fishermen. It meant that Canada achieved exclusive jurisdiction over more than 40 important fish stocks on which Atlantic Canadian fishermen depend.

But the new 200-mile zone did not encompass the entire extent of the Grand Banks, leaving two small portions known as the nose and the tail beyond our zone in international waters.

Five important groundfish stocks could be found both inside and outside the new 200-mile limit. These straddling stocks, as they are known, remain vulnerable to fishing by foreign fleets. In addition, three other groundfish stocks remain entirely outside Canada's 200-mile zone in an area known as the Flemish Cap.

To ensure that stocks occurring beyond the Canadian zone were properly managed, 11 countries whose vessels had traditionally fished in the northwest Atlantic joined with Canada to form the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, known as NAFO.

The NAFO convention created a framework for international co-operation to ensure the optimum utilization and rational management of the northwest Atlantic fish stocks and recognized the special interest of the coastal state Canada, in conservation and management of these stocks.

Until 1986 NAFO worked well in the best interests of all its members including of course, Canada. Scientists from all NAFO member countries assessed the state of the stocks every year and provided the scientific basis for annual management plans. NAFO members agreed on total allowable catches, known as TACs, and national quotas.

Member countries respected the TACs and quotas. NAFO members also agreed to a wide range of conservation measures like mesh size and inspection schemes. NAFO established for itself a solid reputation in both scientific assessment of fish stocks and in fisheries management.

This conservation regime was successful in maintaining and rebuilding fish stocks. TACs for most NAFO stocks actually increased in the early 1980s.

Then in 1986, Spain and Portugal became members of the European Community. The European Community then began a policy of overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit. The EC decided to ignore NAFO conservation decisions and instead to conduct a unilateral excessive fishery in the waters just outside the Canadian fisheries zone. In this way the EC simply took advantage of the fact that the 200-mile zone does not protect all the fish stocks that spawn and live on the Canadian Grand Banks.

Since 1986, EC fleets have taken cumulatively more than 400,000 tonnes above their NAFO quotas in the northwest Atlantic. They have hit straddling stocks of flatfish such as grey sole and flounder so hard that NAFO TACs for those stocks have been cut in half since 1986 to avoid total depletion.

Fishing vessels fishing under EC flags have also been joined in the last few years by vessels flying so-called flags of convenience or of states that are not members of NAFO.

• (1550)

In 1991 a total of 28 such vessels fished in the NAFO area and are estimated to have taken about 43,000 tonnes of fish including 7,000 tonnes of northern cod. Though they were flying the flags of countries like Panama, 19 of these vessels were crewed by either Spanish or Portuguese. The other nine were either registered in Korea or crewed by Koreans.

Overfishing in the NAFO area has focused attention, and quite rightly so, on the action of the small number of countries that do not respect NAFO rules.

But it is important for Canadians and for members of this House to realize that only one NAFO member has overfished in the NAFO area. Seven out of the eight active NAFO members besides Canada, namely Japan, Russia, the Faroe Islands, Norway, Denmark, Poland and Cuba support fishery conservation, respect their NAFO quota and have a long-standing record of co-operation with Canada.

Canada's international fisheries policy has built upon the co-operation and support of those countries to do exactly what the hon. member's motion suggests, to save a national industry and a way of life in Atlantic Canada.

Canada has not isolated itself or acted alone in protecting its fisheries resources. Instead we have worked with countries that share our objectives for conservation and rational management.

In 1977 as Canada was preparing to extend jurisdiction to protect coastal communities, agreements were reached with all our important fishery partners. They agreed to recognize the new Canadian fisheries zone and to co-operate with Canada on conservation. This was essential for Canada.

In 1976 there were over 100 non-Canadian vessels fishing in the waters that were to fall within Canadian jurisdiction. On January 1, 1977 Canada assumed control of these waters without encountering resistance.

In return Canada gave access to Canadian waters and ports to the countries with which it had signed fisheries agreements, with one important difference. They now fished only in locations permitted by Canada and only as long as they respected all the relevant Canadian laws and regulations.

[Translation]

As the Canadian fishery and its markets expanded, the volume of fish stocks allowed foreign vessels within Canadian waters went down. In 1986, Canada announced another change in its international policy: only fish surplus to Canadian needs, fish that Canadian fishermen could not use, would be allocated to foreign fishing fleets. Since then, other countries—with the exception of France, which receives allocations under a fishing agreement that acknowledges the special status of the French islands of Saint-Pierre and Miquelon—have only fished surplus fish stocks in Canadian waters.

What does this mean? It means that groundfish allocations for foreign vessels dropped from 370,000 tonnes in 1977 to 80,000 tonnes in 1991. During the same period, quotas for Canadian fishermen rose from 300,000 tonnes to 815,000 tonnes. In the past two years alone, under the Groundfish Enhancement Program which gave Canadian companies a chance to develop a fishery of species that had not been used before, Canadians caught 40,000 tonnes of fish formerly allocated to foreign vessels, including silver hake and Greenland halibut in the Davis Strait.

Madam Speaker, we must remember that international relations did not destroy the Canadian fishery but actually contributed to its development. A well-known figure in the Canadian fisheries industry recently told the Evening Telegram in St. John's that when they were fishing within the 200-mile limit under joint ventures, foreign vessels had a positive impact on many Canadian companies and communities. Positive international relations made such joint ventures possible. In fact, we are seeking the support of these countries during the crisis in the Canadian northern cod fishery.

As members of this House are well aware, there are still a number of serious problems that must be dealt with if we are to improve conservation in the northwest Atlantic. The biggest challenge to NAFO is the need for effective control measures to deal with a small number of fleets that are overfishing in the regulated zone, in other words, on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

[English]

NAFO has been making responsible quota decisions and putting in place the necessary conservation measures. These are being violated in the following ways. Spanish and Portuguese vessels fish far in excess of the quota set for them. The Iberian vessels violate not only the quota set by NAFO but also the unilateral quota set by the European Community. Spanish and Portuguese vessels do not comply with NAFO fishing regulations such as mesh size.

This is what makes it so devastating when they fish on the tail of the Grand Banks, in the nursery area for American plaice and flounder stocks.

The NAFO scientific council has reported that the flounder caught by Spanish vessels outside the 200-mile limit are much smaller and younger than those that Canadian fishermen are permitted to catch inside the Canadian zone.

Spanish and Portuguese vessels misreport their catches. A common ploy is to fish for stocks that are regulated by NAFO such as cod and flounder but to report catches of species of fish that are not regulated by NAFO, such as skate. Many fishermen know these tricks and some may try to use them if they think that they can get away with it.

It is worth while to stress that last point. Effective control of fishing activities inside the Canadian fishing zone or international waters is making sure that fishermen will not get away with it and that they know they will not get away with it.

Effective control of fishing activities can be achieved. By and large we have achieved it inside the Canadian fishing zone and we are continuing to address remaining deficiencies. The same can be true in the NAFO area. The problem can be solved. Solving the problems, making sure that fishing activity on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks is effectively controlled is now the focus of Canada's effort in NAFO.

We know that NAFO must have, and must have soon, an effective system for ensuring that catches do not exceed quotas and that fishing regulations are respected. Otherwise there will be no fish left for any fishermen.

There has been some progress since Canada made this a priority in 1990. A new NAFO hail system came into effect in 1991, similar to the system we have inside the Canadian fishing zone for both domestic and foreign fleets. Vessels have to hail their positions when they enter and exit the NAFO area and when they change divisions within the area.

On Canada's initiative NAFO member countries approved last fall the use of aerial surveillance to monitor compliance with the hail system. If there is a difference between where the vessel is observed by the aircraft and where it is said it would be, the vessel may be cited for an infraction of the hail system. This will make it harder for vessels to misreport where they were fishing.

The additional resources the government is now putting into both aerial and surface surveillance along the 200-mile limit and the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, $28 million annually, is paying off.

In 1991 Canada logged over 3,000 hours of air surveillance, recorded 4,600 individual vessel sightings and conducted some 310 inspections of foreign vessels in the NAFO area, 285 inspections on European Community vessels alone. These surveillance efforts enable us to keep track of activity in the area and to keep NAFO informed of any apparent infringement of the NAFO rules.

With the hail system, aerial surveillance, NAFO inspection, this is a good start but clearly there is still a lot more to do to achieve control of fishing activity in the NAFO area.

• (1600)

Action cannot be delayed. This is why Canada sought a special meeting of NAFO to discuss enforcement issues and to get the agreement of other NAFO members on measures to be adopted as soon as possible in 1992. Other NAFO members have agreed and a special meeting will take place in May at the NAFO headquarters in Dartmouth. Canada will pursue a number of initiatives at that special meeting.

An important point is including catch reports as part of the radio reporting system. Vessels will be required to report their catches when they report their geographic location. This information will be a great help to authorities of NAFO member countries who are asked to keep track of catches by their vessels, and also to fisheries inspectors who board vessels to check whether quotas and other NAFO regulations are observed.

Canada would also like to see a regulation that would oblige vessels fishing in the NAFO-regulated zone to show their logbooks to NAFO inspectors, who would then be able to check log entries and compare them with the catches stored in the ship's hold.

We also would like to see changes in NAFO reports that would make it easier to spot vessels accused of violating NAFO regulations and to know what coercive measures were taken to prevent further violations.

Creating an international observers program within the NAFO zone, similar to the one that has been so successful in Canadian waters, is another item on the agenda of the organization's special meeting in May.

Other NAFO members have told us that an observer program would be very costly and difficult to administer. However, what could be more effective than a program that puts observers on board fishing vessels to remind fishermen that they must observe NAFO quotas and other regulations?

There are a number of other surveillance and control mechanisms that could be adopted by NAFO later on. The use of electronic procedures to track ship movements is now common practice. NAFO members are considering a system that would control the number of vessels allowed to take fish stocks subject to quota by NAFO. Some countries have already taken steps along those lines. Another option that will be discussed at the special meeting is bilateral agreements on regulation enforcement, similar to the international agreements applied to salmon fishing in the northern Pacific.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I would urge members to reflect on the progress that has been accomplished since that memorable day in 1977, when Canada assumed responsibility for fish stocks within its new 200-mile limit. There are still problems that remain to be solved, but during the past 15 years, Canada has entered into international alliances and designed mechanisms that can and should be used to deal with the present crisis. All this was achieved within the limits of international law, because this country has always recognized the rule of law.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity of seconding this opposition motion today and I would like to repeat it for our viewing audience because I think it is important that we understand exactly what we are putting forward in the House today.

In the opinion of this House, in order to prevent further ecological disaster through the pillaging of transboundary fish stock off Canada's east coast, and in order to save an essential national industry and valued way of life for many rural citizens, Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. This was put forward by my colleague from Burin—St. George's.

I have listened carefully to the debate today. As my colleague from Burin—St. George's said earlier, this is an environmental crisis. He said that we are all in this together. He suggested that the tone of our debate should be constructive. We are naturally trying to prod the government into taking more aggressive steps but we are not trying to point fingers without coming up with some constructive criticism.

I have been listening all day and I keep hearing the words sustainable development, that we are all operating on the premise of sustainable development. I guess it was in 1988 that my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur, when he was putting together a bill on forestry, requested in committee that the definition of sustainable development be put right into the act, not just the words, but the definition. It was defined. Sustainable development means development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

My colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur was very insightful when he requested that definition. When you repeat that and you keep going back to that definition, it is something that every person in the world should understand today. Therefore, when we talk about a situation that is happening in Newfoundland, off the coast of Newfoundland, if we really are as a world community buying into that sustainable development, whether the Law of the Sea is ratified or not ratified, or whatever the limits are in terms of our 200-mile limit, 200 or 250, if we are not operating on the premise of sustainable development, then that is the fundamental environmental law that is being broken. We know now that the law of sustainable development is being broken, so what we have here is a serious communications problem.

The minister of fisheries said that he has travelled the world speaking to foreign ministers of fisheries, talking at the United Nations and in all kinds of different international forums. He basically said that nothing was happening. If something as fundamental as an ecological disaster like this is happening and our minister is taking all these steps to communicate what is happening, then there is something wrong with the communications. The communications strategy or the content of the communications is not working. What we have here is an ecological disaster that is worse than the Valdez oil spill. What we have here is something that is as bad as the Brazilian rain forest. What we have here is something that is as bad as the oil spill in the Persian Gulf. Look at the amount of world attention that was garnered for those environmental disasters. This is an environmental disaster no less serious than those three.

I do not want to get hung up on the law. All of these laws are important and I agreed with everything that was said today. Our communications on this environmental disaster are lousy. Sometimes we have to take a lesson from some of our American friends—I hate to admit that. Look at the plight of the farmers in the United States. I see Willie Nelson and his "Farm Aid", which is something he has done for five or six years in a row now. There is not a network in the world that does not cover it, does not bring focus and attention to the issue.

Maybe we should be looking at something like that. Maybe we should have something like "fish aid". Maybe we should be calling in the Bryan Adams, the Anne Murrays. Maybe we should be using some of that Canadian entertainment talent that is respected all over the world, and say that we have an environmental disaster on our hands here and we need help. We are not going to do it by just debating on the floor of this House.

Last Friday night a constituent of mine from Newfoundland, Jim Martin, brought in a tape he had just completed. The title of the tape was The Rape of the Grand Banks. I was in my constituency office on Danforth and I put the tape on and we listened to it. Within five or ten minutes there were about 15 or 20 people gathered around listening. The power of music in communicating a problem like this is something that we should not overlook.

Right now we have some of the best entertainers in the world. Here is a crisis on the environmental side. They have certainly gone to the rescue of other environmental disasters around the world. Maybe we should ask them if they would help us out on this problem.

The names that keep coming up today are Spain and Portugal. What are we doing? What is Canada's presence at the World's Fair in Seville this year? What are we doing there as a government? Are we going to have one of those big exhibits that just mentions the terrific tourism features of Canada? Are we going to have something that just boasts of our manufacturing? Maybe we should use that World's Fair to talk about this ecological disaster. Maybe we have to develop a little more of a flair for the dramatic. Maybe we have to take a page out of the Greenpeace book. Maybe we have to enlist Greenpeace. I remember being here in 1980 and 1981 when Greenpeace and every other environmental organization in the world dropped hundreds of thousands of post cards on every member's desk protesting about the seal hunt. It certainly had an impact. This crisis is 10 times larger than the seal hunt but we are not communicating that.

Today I read the pamphlet of the minister of external affairs, this beautiful glossy pamphlet entitled Canada and the World Environment. As I read through this I thought it was a flawless document. There was not anything in there that anyone could argue with. We have to take the words that are in this document and somehow bring them to life, give them meaning. I would humbly suggest to the government that when we have a crisis here in our country, bigger than the Valdez oil spill, bigger than the spill in the Persian Gulf, as big as the rain forest disaster, then we must communicate it.

If our own Government of Canada communications systems are not equipped or are not creative enough to really bring the CNNs of the world to the crisis, then let us go to the best in that field and start getting world attention in order that we can solve this problem.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to what the hon. member has said and I must say that I agree with him on several points. It is unfortunate, however, that so far all of Canada's efforts in the international forum to draw attention to the disastrous situation of northern cod stocks and the impact of their depletion on the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada did not yield the expected results.

I would like to remind my hon. colleague that, if Canada contemplated for instance a resumption of seal hunts in the winter months, as traditionally practised by Atlantic Canadians, I am convinced that all conservation groups, including Greenpeace, would come right out and launch a huge protest campaign.

Why are organizations apparently dedicated to conservation, to the preservation of the environment, such as Greenpeace, not showing concern for the disastrous situation created by the depletion of northern cod stocks and its economic, social and human impact on communities in Atlantic Canada?

He seems to know a great deal about promotional programs, publicity stunts, spectacular actions. Perhaps he could contact groups like Greenpeace and help us alert them to this situation.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question.

There is an organization that exists, I think at arm's length from the Government of Canada, yet the Government of Canada supports it. It is called the National Round Table on the Environment.

The member knows of this organization. It is an integrated organization of government and private sector people from all over the country, from all sectors of the economy, that deals with all issues related to the environment.

I have been following this organization closely in the last year. It seems that it has a very different way of communicating its message. It is much more flexible in its communications strategy and its communications approach. It seems to have a good relationship with a lot of these non-governmental environmental organizations.

I would suggest that maybe this quasi-government organization, the National Round Table, which I believe reports to the Minister of the Environment or the Prime Minister, should perhaps be mandated to develop the communications strategy. Maybe it could be the bridge to all of these environmental groups that sometimes have difficulty in dealing directly with government agencies.

I am not suggesting for a second that getting Greenpeace to take up this cause is going to be easy. I am not sure that we are trying hard enough. That is my point. Quite frankly, if the minister were to write a letter to all these environmental organizations and they refused to assist, it would taint the credibility of the organization. Although we have had bad experiences with them in the past on other issues, where maybe we questioned their motives, this should not stop us from asking them to address probably the most serious environmental disaster we have ever had in our country.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate today. It is good that the House is taking the time to look at the problems facing the Atlantic fishery, but as was said, we have to debate the problems.

I look forward to the day when we can talk about the tremendous success in the fishing industry and how prosperous the communities are.

The motion today is about extending the jurisdiction to control of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

Problems in the Atlantic fishing industry are not new. The people of the region have made their living from the sea for literally hundreds of years, having come from England, Scotland and Ireland. Fishermen have had to endure the dangers of nature, the dominance of merchants and isolation. Nor is the problem of overfishing new.

In the eyes of many people in Atlantic Canada the problems in the fishery are caused by two things, foreign overfishing and government inaction on the overfishing. For years fishermen, unions, plant workers and companies, all of these people, have been telling government to take firm action on foreign overfishing.

When the current crisis started back in the late 1980s, the government appointed Leslie Harris of Memorial University to study the northern cod stocks and to make recommendations. In his report, Dr. Harris said that while Canada must pursue a negotiated agreement over the control of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, I quote:

> The setting of the Total Allowable Catch and other management decisions ought, in logic, to be the responsibility of a single regulatory authority which, in the instant case, should be the Canadian government.

Everybody agrees that a negotiated settlement giving Canada control of the entire Grand Banks is preferred to acting on our own. However, for a number of years the government has been pursuing this with absolutely no progress. In fact foreign overfishing on the nose and tail has increased. The government has sat idly by and and watched the Spanish, Portuguese, Germans, Koreans and others taking our fish. In the formal recommendations to the report Dr. Harris said, and I quote:

> That Canada should seek international agreement to permit its management of all fish stocks indigenous to the Canadian Continental Shelf, and that extend beyond the two hundred mile economic zone; and, that failing achievement of this objective, Canada should take unilateral action to acquire management rights in accordance with provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention.

The key words are "take unilateral action". However, action seems to be a foreign word to this government.

On a number of occasions my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has outlined the historic precedent that would allow Canada to take over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. From what I understand, one of the key requirements of the government is to extend the jurisdiction which would have the ability to enforce its jurisdiction.

Just over a year ago, the Canadian government sent the navy halfway around the world to stop a madman from destroying a country. The government was defending freedom, it said. Well, what about defending Canadian fishermen? What about defending our environment?

Right now a number of fishermen from Newfoundland are preparing to go to the nose and tail to challenge foreign vessels stealing our fish. Experts in the matter from Iceland are providing advice. While it is nice to see fishermen take strong action against the foreigners, they should not have to do it. It is not the job of the fishermen to protect Canadian sovereignty, it is the job of the federal government. The only job fishermen wish to do is to go out and catch fish, have a fair supply and receive a fair return. Unfortunately, the government is asleep at the switch and is not defending our interests.

Nobody is really talking about the navy blowing the Spanish trawlers out of the water. What we are talking about is using the navy and the Coast Guard in an effective and aggressive way to protect our interests. If we can protect Kuwait, surely to God we can protect ourselves.

Members opposite have a habit of going back 10 or 20 years to find bad things the Liberal government did. One thing they will never find is a Liberal decision to abandon Canadians in time of need in the name of diplomacy. The Liberal Party has always defended the interests of Canadians, first and foremost. When action was needed, Liberals took action.

We have a government that is sitting on the sidelines talking. Talking might be fine for the embassies of Europe, but it is doing nothing for the Canadian fishermen. The government has tried the diplomatic route and it has failed. Now the government must move to extend Canadian jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. Anything less than this is unacceptable. If the government fails now, the fishery could be destroyed. For the sake of fishermen, plant workers and people in Atlantic Canada, I urge the government to end this destruction and stand up for the Canadian fishermen.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Would the member be kind enough to give us his view as to why the weak-wristed people opposite, and I see the minister of external affairs opposite, have not seen fit to ratify the Law of the Sea convention? Perhaps he has a view on that. I think most of us in this House find it to be very hard to swallow when we hear it, and I suppose we will hear shortly from the minister, getting up and telling us why it is that they cannot ratify the Law of the Sea convention. The minister might not have heard the minister of fisheries this morning who was asked that question very clearly. He got up, and after comparing himself to Sylvester Stallone, did not even grapple with the question, let alone answer it.

Mr. MacAulay: I want to thank my hon. colleague. When we look at the problem of overfishing and the quotas, the European Community was given 20,049 metric tons and they indicated they fished 46,000. Our figures indicate they fished 58,000 metric tons. This was quota, fish they received quota for.

The fish they did not receive quota for, it is indicated they took in total 152,950 out of a total quota of 20,049. From what I understand, the Law of the Sea gives preference to coastal states. I think now we are in a desperate situation on the east coast and the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. It is time that we take action in this country to stand up for the fishermen and extend control to the nose and tail and then see how it will be dealt with. If we do not take unilateral action and move in this country, there will be no reason to move very shortly. The fishery will be destroyed and the stocks will be gone. Now is the time to stand up for our Canadian fishermen.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): First of all, I want to say how much I appreciated the remarks by my friend from Prince Edward Island from the riding of Cardigan. He knows better than most members in this Chamber, I submit, certainly better than many what job loss means to rural Canadians, whether they live on Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or elsewhere in this country. Many of his constituents are fishermen and many are farmers, but all of them, like my constituents, are really the subject, the guts of this particular motion that we are discussing today. These are people who live close to nature, close to the earth, close to the sea in the case of the fishermen.

I would submit that he, better than many people in this Chamber if there were time, could relate to us the kind of devastation, the kind of heartache that results when men and women have their livelihood yanked out from under them and have their way of life under threat.

I had no particular question for the member, but I just wanted to take the opportunity to thank him for what he said in this debate. Having a voice from Prince Edward Island to lend to the growing call for some action on this issue is extremely encouraging and I just wanted to thank him.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have already heard from a number of my colleagues, including the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, on the problem of foreign overfishing in the northwest Atlantic, the impact on the stocks, the measures needed to achieve sustainable development of the fishery and the tremendous efforts that the government is expending to resolve the problem and to ensure a viable future for the communities affected.

Well unfortunately we cannot create the fish, but if the hon. member is prepared to listen, which would be unusual for him, perhaps he might learn something.

The severe depletion of the northern cod biomass is only the most recent example, although it is certainly the most critical, of the precarious balance of nature, in this case in the northwest Atlantic, and the serious consequences when international management measures are disregarded.

The economies of the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland in particular, are facing yet another blow with further plant closures, tying up of fleets, increased job losses. The tragic consequences of human suffering and hardship involved are only too evident and it is something on which the government is focusing all of its efforts.

The hon. members of the opposition raise the question of what is to be done to solve the problem. The government is pursuing a very clear strategy to this end and, while my colleagues have spoken to a number of its specific components, I would like to review it further with you. But there are a number of general points which must be emphasized in preface.

There is an international framework within which we carry out our strategy. The provisions of the Law of the Sea convention with respect to conservation of living marine resources of the high seas represent customary international law. The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization which derives from the Law of the Sea is the responsible regional fisheries management body. The United Nations which provided for the convening of the Conference on Environment and Development is a key multilateral forum for the resolution of international problems by peaceful means.

Bilateral diplomacy has a host of mechanisms aimed at the resolution of differences. But because each nation is sovereign, progress is often too slow and painful. One needs to make use of every possible avenue to ensure that a problem receives the priority that is warranted and that pressure from every source is exerted to achieve a resolution.

[English]

This then is the essence of the government's strategy. Most of the fishing by foreign fleets and all of the overfishing is taking place outside 200 miles in international waters where Canada has no jurisdiction except in relation to Canadian vessels.

Under the Law of the Sea, states have the duty to take such measures for their respective nationals as may be necessary for the conservation of the living resources of the high seas. They also have the duty to co-operate with other states or with regional organizations. But flag states alone have the legal authority to enforce against their own vessels.

The problem of overfishing is centred on the activities of vessels from the European Community, principally Spain and Portugal, and to a lesser extent from a few countries that are not members of NAFO, notably Panama and Korea.

[Translation]

I would emphasize that most of the countries that fish in the NAFO area—Japan, Russia, the Faroe Islands, Norway, Denmark, Cuba—support fisheries conservation, respect their NAFO quotas and cooperate with Canada.

[English]

Since 1986 however when the EC began to set its own unilateral quotas, EC vessels have reported catches of cod, flounder and redfish totalling more than 530,000 tonnes as against NAFO quotas of 100,000 tonnes. Non-NAFO vessels have caught more than 165,000 tonnes.

Since 1986 the EC and those other countries that do not co-operate with Canada by respecting the conservation decisions of NAFO have not been eligible for benefits in the Canadian zone. Their fishing vessels are barred from Canadian ports except in emergencies. They are not accorded allocations of surplus fish from underutilized species in the Canadian zone. They are not eligible to take part in commercial ventures involving any fishing by their vessels in Canadian waters.

These restrictions however have failed to induce the co-operation that we sought and vigorously pursued. The cumulative impact had begun to take its severe toll and in 1989 this government initiated a comprehensive campaign bilaterally and multilaterally aimed at ending foreign overfishing in the northwest Atlantic outside the 200-mile limit.

We will be pressing ahead on all fronts in 1992. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has laid out an ambitious plan of objectives and initiatives for the first half.

[English]

We have undertaken a high-level political initiative lead by the Prime Minister to ensure leaders of the EC, its member states and other nations are aware of the serious consequences of overfishing.

At the Houston and London summits of the G-7, for example, the Prime Minister pressed the issue with his colleagues. He obtained commitments in the communiques to conservation of living marine resources including compliance with the regimes established by regional fisheries organizations through effective monitoring and enforcement.

In bilateral and multilateral discussions at every opportunity we have sought to persuade the EC to return to compliance with NAFO decisions.

We have participated actively and constructively in bilateral working groups on science, surveillance and control and non-NAFO fishing which were set up following ministerial meetings with the then new EC fisheries commissioner, Manuel Marin.

There have been some signs of progress such as the acceptance of eight of the eleven NAFO management decisions for 1991 and for 1992, but clearly not as much as we would like.

In 1991 the EC initiated implementation of the NAFO vessel reporting system and assigned a fisheries patrol vessel to the regulatory area for seven months. It will increase its presence in 1992. That will be of some assistance but surveillance data confirm that EC vessels in 1991 were still taking catches significantly in excess of quotas.

[Translation]

Early last summer our special ambassador for fisheries conservation who was appointed to co-ordinate and carry forward Canada's diplomatic, legal and information initiatives in this important area initiated bilateral consultations with the European Community. The EC rejected Canada's proposals to help resolve the problem, but we remain committed to working out a resolution with them which ensures compliance with NAFO decisions.

[English]

Respect for the 3L cod moratorium is critical. The minister of fisheries and I called in EC heads of missions on February 27 to impress on them the sense of crisis that is prevailing and the need for urgent response on the part of their governments. We pointed out to them that it is not simply in the interest of the Canadian fishery but also ultimately in their interest that this overfishing comes to an end.

• (1640)

Ambassador Gherson will be returning today from his current mission to the EC to present the scientific evidence on the northern cod stocks and to urge the EC to stop fishing contrary to the NAFO moratorium. EC capitals are now reviewing Canadian findings and our early information is that they are quite shaken by the data we have given them.

We have continued to press our case within NAFO and have provided leadership to the work that has begun to improve its system of surveillance and enforcement. The number one priority in international fisheries management is improving effective control.

All NAFO members must agree on the measures necessary to ensure that conservation decisions are enforced. It is not simply just ourselves or the result will be a failure.

At our request a special session on surveillance and control is being held in May. We have undertaken bilateral initiatives and we have led work within NAFO aimed at eliminating fishing by vessels registered in countries that are not members of NAFO.

The Panamanian government has at last been co-operating with our officials on steps to end the use of Panamanian flagged vessels in northwest Atlantic fisheries and further meetings are scheduled.

Korea has reduced the number of vessels licensed to fish in the area. We will continue to press it to withdraw completely.

Canada has also spearheaded international efforts to improve the effectiveness of international law as it pertains to high seas fish stocks.

A major objective for Canada in this legal initiative is international recognition of the special interest of coastal states, like Canada, in conservation and management of fish stocks which are also harvested both inside and outside national fishing zones.

Canada will be taking its proposals on high seas fisheries conservation to the United Nations Convention on the Environment and Development—the earth summit—in Rio de Janeiro to seek international support for improvements to high seas conservation.

The Canadian delegation is active at the current prepcom for UNCED in New York and support for our approach is growing.

A comprehensive Canadian information campaign has underlined the ecological risks of overfishing and called on the European public to oppose foreign overfishing in the northwest Atlantic. A number of you have participated in the parliamentary delegations that have taken our message to Europe.

The minister of fisheries himself has travelled to London, to Tokyo and to New York to speak on the need for effective control of international fisheries, and will visit other capitals over the coming months to build up support for Canada at NAFO and the Rio summit. These are some of the ways we are working to end foreign overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit.

The new scientific evidence serves again to confirm the devastation of the northern cod stock by the relentless foreign overfishing and seeming disregard of NAFO's rational conservation decisions in the nose and tail of the Grand Banks outside the 200 mile zone.

[English]

I can assure the members of this House that during 1992, efforts to end foreign overfishing will continue to be a top priority of this government.

The Prime Minister, my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I have repeatedly and at every opportunity registered with our colleagues in the Community that the northwest Atlantic fishery, especially northern cod, is in serious trouble because of continued and excessive overfishing by EC vessels.

It may seem to have produced very little by way of results but it is like water dripping on a stone and we are seeing growing alarm in Europe concerning this issue.

We have made clear that it is an issue of critical importance for Canada. The EC and non-members of NAFO must recognize and address this issue seriously. If this important resource is to be saved, this country must bring its fleets under effective control in compliance with NAFO conservation decisions. Ultimately their own fishery is also at risk besides our own and if a concern for the environment is not something to which they will pay attention, then surely in their own self-interest, they will start to pay attention.

I want to quote briefly from a report by the Secretary-General of the United Nations who underlined in eloquent terms the dimension of the problem and I quote:

> The elaboration of the law of the sea regime for the rational management and conservation of high seas living resources is now firmly inscribed in the international agenda. While this may be in large part attributable to the large-scale drift-net fishing issue, it is to be emphasized that this issue is but one symptom of the larger problems confronting world fisheries within national jurisdiction and beyond. Another symptom is the report of problems of overfishing by distant-water fishing fleets in the proximity of EEZ's.

The United Nations General Assembly took up this issue for the first time at our request, at the request of this government, in 1989 and it expressed concern regarding the use of fishing methods and practices on the high seas that can have an adverse impact on the conservation and management of the living resources of the marine environment. That was elaborated in 1990 and we intend to use as well all of the countries that will be going to the UNCED in June in Rio to keep reinforcing this on a broadly-based international scale so that pressure can be brought to bear on the main culprits.

The General Assembly, as a result of our efforts, adopted a resolution that criticized fishing methods and practices such as vessel reflagging and inadequate surveillance control and enforcement aimed at evading the regulation and control of high seas fisheries. This, of course, has given us the opportunity and the ammunition that we need as the Government of Canada in this regard. It recognized that the measures now in place to conserve and manage the living resources of the high seas are not effective and they do not adequately implement the provisions of the Law of the Sea convention. That is something that we will take to UNCED when we meet with other countries there in June. It called on states to prohibit fishing methods and practices that can have an adverse impact on the conservation and management of the living resources of the high seas and to take the measures required to give full effect to the applicable provisions of the 1982 Law of the Sea convention and called on states to comply with the regimes established by regional fisheries organizations through effective monitoring and enforcement measures.

It is against this background of crisis in the Canadian east coast fishing industry and developing international concern—which is growing largely as the result of the efforts of this government—with respect to the problems caused by overfishing by distant water fishing fleets, that Canada launched its high seas fishing initiative at UNCED. This initiative seeks to develop specific principles and measures consistent with the Law of the Sea convention with a view to giving full implementation to the provisions of the Law of the Sea convention, strengthening regional organizations and ensuring the recognition of the special interest of coastal states with respect to straddling stocks. That would provide for an effective legal regime governing activities on the high seas. We are optimistic concerning our ability to achieve this objective.

The first steps in the elaboration of the principles and measures were taken at a legal conference held in St. John's, Newfoundland in September 1990. The conference recognized the need for such measures and agreed on a set of conclusions reflecting an increasingly shared view on how the rules of international law should be interpreted and applied. This was further developed into a set of principles and measures at a meeting of Latin American states, New Zealand and Canada in May in Santiago, Chile. This is called the Santiago paper and it was tabled at a meeting of legal experts in New York City in July. The meeting was convened by the UN by the Under Secretary-General responsible for the Office of Ocean Affairs and the Law of the Sea.

In August, the Santiago papers, as refined in New York City, were included under agenda item 21 at the third UNCED preparatory committee. It gained additional sponsors and was praised for its "forward-looking strategies" to deal with specific problems that have arisen in the last decade and to implement effectively the provisions of the Law of the Sea convention. The Santiago paper has won the support of some 40 countries and is part of the documentation on the table this week as a fourth UNCED preparatory committee begins its work in New York City on fisheries issues.

Canada and like-minded countries are determined to do all they can to ensure that the principles and measures set out in that Santiago paper are incorporated in the documents adopted by the UNCED summit when it convenes in Rio and that they serve as the basis for a diplomatic conference to be convened following the UNCED summit to address in particular the problems of high seas fishing.

The government considers the only way that Canada can achieve its goal of protecting Canadian fish stocks for Canadian fishermen today and in the future is through international co-operation and not through confrontation on the high seas.

We are determined to act with the imagination and vigour required to achieve success, and we know that it takes a considerable amount of effort. Results are not always visible in the early stages, but our fisheries communities deserve no less because ultimately it is international co-operation that is going to assist them.

We are committed to finding an effective solution to this problem, a solution that enhances Canadian control over the fish stocks off Canada's east coast throughout their migratory range. That is why we are going to such extraordinary lengths.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions.

I have listened to the minister on two occasions. I know that she takes this debate seriously, as we all do, but three weeks ago we held an emergency debate and this week it is our opposition motion on the crisis that exists. We would like to see more effort, more energy from the government on this crisis.

Our fishermen are serious and our communities are serious about what is happening out there. If the government is not going to take more action, then it seems to say to the rest of the world that we are not interested. I cannot believe that we are not interested. I know that the minister has recounted all the times that she has spoken, or the Prime Minister has spoken, but we have to see some real effort right now.

The season is upon us, and the reality is the potential of 8,000 jobs immediately in the Newfoundland area and the spin-off in other areas.

I ask the minister two or three simple questions and I will start them in this way. First, this week The Globe and Mail carried an ad that I think was false. I would like to know how she, as minister of external affairs, can have our national daily carry an ad that is not disputed by this Government of Canada.

We know that the herd has to be culled. I am sad to say that it is growing. We know that the herd eats too much fish, and it is not just cod, it is the whole stock out there. It is the amount of fish that seals eat. Why has the government, the day after or by this weekend, not taken a responsible position and placed an ad to counteract that terrible ad that we saw in the papers this week? On the east coast, we think we are defeated before we ever get started with this government.

The second thing I want to ask is this. Why have we not ratified the Law of the Sea? It was 1977 when we signed it. I know the U.S. will not sign it. I know why it will not sign it and I know why it does not want to sign it, because their big business and their multinationals do not want to be over-regulated by a Republican government, that is Reagan and now Bush.

There is no reason why we have not signed it and shown that we believe in what is in the Law of the Sea. I think that there is no reason why we cannot put more effort into this. I belong to parliamentary delegations. I have not been asked to go over and meet with the U.S., or the EEC, or France or the Commonwealth to get support from our own colleagues in Parliaments and try to overcome this burden.

Would the minister please give me an answer?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, let me deal with the last part of the question first.

As minister, as the hon. member well knows, I am not responsible for parliamentary delegations. They have to be approved in this House for money. That is not a government activity. That is a House activity. Let me say as well that I would be very happy if the hon. member would like to put together a parliamentary delegation and then we can discuss it. I have never been presented with a request for a parliamentary delegation.

Let me also say that on the Law of the Sea convention, which we did sign in 1977, needs strong multilateral support. We live by the Law of the Sea convention and we tailor our activities accordingly, but if it is just ourselves ratifying it, it is not going to have any impact on this problem. What is going to have an impact on this problem is exactly the kind of actions that we are taking and that we are taking in Europe.

When the member says we have not pursued this vigorously, I can assure her that we have brought our relationship with the European Community to a state of some considerable tension as a result of the vigour with which we have pursued this problem.

Mr. Mills: They don't know what the problem is.

Mrs. McDougall: We have pursued it both at the level of the commission and at the political level.

In Ambassador Gherson's latest trip to Europe, when he presented them with the data, yes, he did not get a warm reception. It was quite the reverse. He got a very cool reception at first, but once people started to look at the data, they are paying closer attention.

This is the kind of thing that has taken us a long time to get to, but it is worth every minute that we have spent and all the energy that we are putting into it. We have done this at some considerable cost to the other issues we are dealing with in Europe because it has led to strains in our relationship with the community at both the political level and particularly with the EC commission, to say nothing of our relationship with Spain and Portugal. That is all the more reason to pursue this.

In my view, the only thing that is going to have an impact on their—I think the hon. member might listen to my answer instead of talking to her neighbour.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I am listening.

Mr. Kilgour: The seals, Barbara, the seals.

Mrs. McDougall: What is going to have an impact on this ultimately is if we can convince the Europeans that it is in their own self-interest, it is their fish that are going to disappear as well as ours. That seems to be the only thing that is going to have an impact, particularly on the Portuguese.

The retiring Spanish ambassador, when he left to go back to Spain before taking a new assignment, was clearly quite shaken up by the information that we had presented to him. He said that in his view, and he would be advising his government, that it was essential that we bring this issue to a resolution.

In terms of the ad in the newspaper this week, I agree with the hon. member. We are looking at the issue of seals. We need more data. We understand the fundamental principle and we agree with her conclusion on this. We do need some more data on this. But the ad itself was very offensive and I absolutely agree with her.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): A very short question, Mr. Speaker.

Presently there are two factory freezer trawlers from St. Malo, France heading across the Atlantic to fish. One of them will fish the northern cod stock, the second will fish the cod stock in the gulf.

As the minister knows, March 30, the end of this month, all French vessels were supposed to lose their quotas of northern cod and also cod in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, lose it totally. However, the Department of External Affairs, in consultation with the tribunal meeting in New York on the boundary dispute between Canada and France, St. Pierre and Miquelon, the Canadian government informed the tribunal that it will not accept a decision in French only.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Why, we are bilingual.

Mr. Baker: France, of course, under international law would accept the decision in one language, as any other government would, but the Department of External Affairs was adamant. The registrar of the court informed external affairs that because of that it would take four days into the month of April to deliver the decision. This meant that because of the four days Canada has now given France an additional three months of quota of northern cod and cod in the gulf.

I ask the minister to respond and to tell us why the Canadian government did not really feel like following international law and just gave away three months of additional quota to France and they are sending over the factory freezer trawlers when she stands up in the House and says: "We are concerned about northern cod and cod in the gulf"?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, the decision has not yet been written and Canada has not asked that the decision when it is written be translated, even though, as the hon. member knows, it is the practice of this government that we always work in two official languages. I hope he is not trying to turn this into a language dispute as well as a fish dispute. It is serious enough.

The boundary tribunal will issue its decision this spring. Consistent with the agreement the French quota in 2J-3K-L will be reduced in the same proportion as reductions that affect the Canadian offshore fleet.

The hon. member knows that this is pursuant to an agreement that was signed by a Liberal government, and it is an international treaty that has been very difficult for us to live with.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to seek unanimous consent to extend the question and comment period a little longer so that we can have the benefit of the presence of Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend the period?

Some hon. members: Yes.

An hon. member: No.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Who said no, the minister?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my point of order of course is one of fairness. This morning the minister of fisheries took an extra half hour to respond to questions on this issue. The only minister more central to this question than the minister of fisheries is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that she, who said no to the request for unanimous consent in the last 30 seconds, will want to reconsider. We would like to have the benefit of her knowledge on this issue.

I ask for unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The Speaker has no option but to receive the request.

Mr. Mills: That is not a good thing to do.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (M. DeBlois): I have no choice but to comply with the decision of the members of this House. And since there is not unanimous consent, I cannot go back to that matter.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just given the lie to all of her pious comments about being concerned and serious in wishing to protect and defend the cod stocks in Canada's eastern waters and the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. It is completely hypocritical of her to come here and claim that she is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I have to remind all members that there is no unanimous consent to extend the period. It is not the choice the minister. I ask members to be fair on that matter.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my comments. They are less well prepared than they should be because I was planning to intervene on a question or comment to the minister if she had stayed a little longer.

I would like to begin by addressing the point I was going to raise earlier with the minister, the question of control of the stocks currently in the area, that is the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

As the minister would know and everyone here would know, that is currently regulated by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, NAFO. One of the problems we have with NAFO is the fact that its current constitution does not have any teeth. There is no way to regulate Canada or any other country that wants to enforce more stringent conservation measures or formulas for managing fish stocks under the region governed by NAFO in that area. It permits countries such as Spain and Portugal to fish in that zone with impunity and to violate the NAFO quotas and in fact their own quotas. Canada has no recourse under the current rules to do anything about it.

If we are not to proceed immediately as our motion suggests with functional jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks to protect those straddling stocks, it is clearly in order to seek a strengthening of the NAFO convention so that it allows countries to enforce the NAFO quotas. Currently they are meaningless because countries such as Spain and Portugal violate them routinely and have been doing so for several years. There is absolutely no way in which the quotas under NAFO can be enforced.

The government knows very well that some obvious amendments can be made to the NAFO convention which would allow for the convention to have more teeth, to be stronger and to enable that organization, in the absence of Canada's jurisdiction over those zones, to be perhaps more effective in conserving those stocks.

I am sure the minister is very well aware, as is the minister of fisheries, that article 12 of the NAFO convention which bears directly on this problem needs to be strengthened and needs to be made more effective so that this can take place.

We are informed that NAFO will be meeting May 1 at a special meeting which I believe will be convened by Canada. I have been told the issue which is central to the effectiveness of NAFO is not even on the agenda. I would think it ought to be very high on the agenda. If this government does not want to extend functional jurisdiction now but wants to proceed gradually, as it seems to want to do, one would think it would at least be pushing to strengthen the organization that currently regulates the area in which the nose and tail of the Grand Banks is located, namely NAFO.

It is very surprising to me that would not be very high on the agenda. This government should be seeking to put some teeth into the NAFO convention. Failing that, perhaps the government ought to be considering getting out of NAFO altogether since it is obviously not of any use to Canada in terms of protecting the straddling stocks, one of its major responsibilities.

I wanted to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs why this avenue is not being pursued or, if it is being pursued, what the results of her efforts so far have been and whether we could expect the government to be taking strong action to strengthen the NAFO regime from a conservation perspective.

Failing that, it seems that the motion before the House today is obviously the next step. There is really no other place for this government to go but to affirm Canada's functional jurisdiction over those zones. There is no other way, in the absence of any responsible behaviour by the states which are fishing that zone and in the absence of any regulatory regime which can be enforced and where objections by countries such as Canada have any legitimacy. We are currently seeing the depletion of a fish stock with drastic consequences for the economies of eastern Canada, particularly Newfoundland but also Nova Scotia. We would think this government ought to be working to strengthen the only organization that is governing those regimes.

That was the first point I wanted to raise with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps when she reads Hansard she may want to provide me and this House with the answer to that question. I would be very interested in hearing it.

It is important to underscore, as has been said by several speakers today, that this issue is not an issue which is confined to one part of Canada. It is true that the province of Newfoundland which depends vitally on the fishing industry, particularly the fishing industry centred in the northern cod zone, stands to be devastated by the collapse of this fishery. It is also true that the province of Nova Scotia is in the same situation, although perhaps less directly than Newfoundland. In my own constituency of Cape Breton Highland—Canso we have plants that fish the northern cod and other groundfish stocks which stand to be depleted by the excessive fishing in those zones.

This is an issue which extends beyond Newfoundland to Nova Scotia and, as other members have pointed out, to all of Canada. It is an environmental issue of alarming proportions when we see countries purporting to pay lip service to environmental concerns completely denying these concerns. We are facing a very serious situation which we in Canada have a right and a responsibility to take a leadership role in correcting.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me congratulate my friend and my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso for his excellent participation in this important debate.

He was here a moment ago, as I was, when we witnessed a spectacle that I really could not believe. At the same time it confirmed for me something I had suspected for some time. I want to see if I am out in left field on this or whether or not my friend from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso shares my view on it.

I had been alleging for some time that the minister of fisheries would very dearly like to get on with this issue in the spirit of the wording of the motion. He realizes the futility of diplomacy, sweet talk and so on. He realizes as one who lives among the people most affected by this, as a man who represents those people, that it is time to bite the bullet. I had been alleging his problem was that he was alone in the cabinet.

For the record, he has had to say otherwise and to say: "Oh, no, my Prime Minister is behind me; everybody over here is behind me". Was I wrong? Is it too late in the day? Am I having some kind of illusions? Am I misleading myself? I saw the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who ought to be our lead spokesperson on this, half sleepily read very badly a text that somebody had prepared for her. Her heart clearly was not in it. She refused to take any questions beyond what was required of her.

Would the member want to comment on whether he thinks my suspicions are correct? Is it the problem of the minister of fisheries? Was it confirmed before our very eyes in the Chamber just now that the people who matter most in this play, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs, could not care less about this file? That is one of the reasons it is going nowhere, unless the minister of fisheries takes it in hand, delivers an ultimatum to the Prime Minister, and says it is time to do what has to be done with respect to this foreign overfishing.

Does he agree the real problem is that the people whose support he needs are not coming to his defence and indeed are laughing at the whole issue?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I certainly share my colleague's suspicion on this question. I think one way of illustrating the contrast in the commitment to the issue would be to play back the speech of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs back-to-back. You would see that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, because he comes from an area that is vitally affected by this crisis, is committed and serious about doing something about it.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, perhaps because her constituents are not as directly affected immediately by the problem or perhaps it is some other reason, obviously by the tone of her voice and by her expression here today, does not exude in her body language a deep and abiding commitment and determination to solving this problem. Perhaps we are misreading her. I guess we will have to wait and see what happens.

I am afraid that the fishermen in eastern Canada and the fish stocks themselves cannot wait much longer. They are being plundered and the livelihood of a whole part of the country is disappearing while we wait for this government to sort itself out and to sort its priorities and we wait for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who seems lackadaisical in her approach to this very serious issue.

I do not like to accuse anyone of being insincere, but it is awfully tempting when you see the behaviour we just witnessed a few minutes ago.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would have to agree with my colleagues on the lack of interest. I would say that the minister of fisheries should bring them back a big dose of cod liver oil and it might get them all moving and doing some action. However, we do not seem to have any energizer over there and that minister of fisheries has gone down instead of going up so he needs a dose of cod liver oil as well. Cod liver oil might give him the force or the energy.

Mr. Robitaille: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Terrebonne on a point of order.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I would just remind you, this House and the hon. member that we do not need to dance on the desks and shout as they do to show some interest in the subject. Just because we keep cool, Mr. Speaker, does not mean—

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, my good friend from Quebec, who normally exhibits an awful lot of good horse sense, good common sense, has really missed the point here.

His minister, his colleague, has badly upset us by coming into this House and mocking an important issue. That does not sit very lightly with me. Better she had not come in than to come in to pay lip-service to an issue she either does not understand or does not believe in.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think that we express opinions on all sides of the House. It is a matter of opinion and I think that it would be good to return to the substance of the debate according to our rules. I again recognize the hon. member for South West Nova.

[English]

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Whatever they need, they need a new battery change and they need some energizers over there.

An hon. member: They are out of gas.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): They are out of gas. They are out of steam and they are out of any type of power.

We have seen here this week representatives of the communities from Newfoundland and the representatives of the fishing efforts in Newfoundland. They have come to Ottawa looking for help and guidance.

This is not the first debate. We had one three weeks ago. That was an emergency debate. It went on well into the evening and well into the night. My colleague the parliamentary secretary knows that this is a serious issue.

I may have said that there is something lacking in the government and to my way of looking at it and to Canadians I am sure, looking in from out there, is the idea that the government is not doing anything, and it is not.

• (1720)

Government members may go to New York to the conferences and they may talk once to somebody in New York, but there are things that we, as Canada, can take upon ourselves.

One, we can say to the world even though we have 200 miles we are not totally in control of our biological stocks that we depend on to fish and we want control of that. We want to go to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That is the crux of the issue, we are not in control.

How would we gain control? We perhaps could take on the role of monitoring the foreigners who go there because our coastline is adjacent to that stock, and we are not doing that.

When I say monitor it, we have all sorts of conservation methods within the 200–mile limit and we cannot monitor any of the conservation methods that we have here in Canada, that short distance of control over the biological stocks. So we should be saying that.

The other thing that we should be doing is we should take very effective diplomatic relations against the offending countries. One, our trade with Spain and Portugal, or maybe we should tell Canadians not to go there.

Maybe we should look at what is going to happen in Madrid or Barcelona with the Olympic Games coming up this year. Maybe it would hurt some people over there as it is going to hurt our people here.

I have seen other countries ban the Olympics. We had some people ban our Canadian Olympics. Why not put that as a threat out there? Why not take our diplomatic officials away from some of those countries to show those countries we are serious as to how it is affecting the east coast.

The last thing, why not put a ban on their goods? We drink their wine. We take their canned sardines or any of the canned fish they send over here. Let us show them it hurts in Canada what they are doing, irrespective of any of the guidelines that we feel should be enforced in those areas.

I have not seen this government do any of that. Sure it is hard to take some of that, but we have to show them that we mean to and we want to support the fishing effort on the east coast.

I would also like to say in the short time that I have that we as a country have made it clear to the foreigners that we are serious this time. We should take over all the activities within our 200–mile limit.

It may mean that the Government of Canada has to put a bit of money into changing gear so we can fish, changing processes so we can market the fish that those countries come within our 200 miles to catch that we do not catch, that is considered under–utilized by the Law of the Sea. It is no longer under–utilized.

Those foreigners should not be within the 200–mile limit. We should say as of today we are fishing it all. I do not care how we market it. We should be able to sell it to those countries, Japan, Cuba and the former U.S.S.R. that come to fish within our 200–mile limit. We are not doing it.

This is the same thing as GATT. The government says that it is doing this and this and this, but it is not doing anything.

I can sit here, my colleagues can sit here, nobody has gone face to face with any of the organizations. I belong to all those organizations, to Canada–France, Canada and the Commonwealth, Canada and the U.S. I have not been asked on either the GATT or in this dispute to sit down and talk face to face with people who belong to the same organizations or the IPU and tell them what they are doing.

It has to start even here at home. An ad that appeared in The Globe and Mail I think it was on Tuesday had all those lovely seals saying "Not me, not me, not me, not in a month". And the implication was: "I have not had a fish in a month, I am not the culprit". It is wrong for the government to allow that ad to go across Canada as if it is the fishermen who are to blame for the foreigners and others and the seals that are taking the fish.

That is wrong. The impression that will be given to the rest of Europe is that we are responsible. We are not responsible in this. We want the foreigners off. We want to cull the herd of seals and we want to tell the world that the seals do eat a tremendous amount of fish.

Why can the government not pay for that? It pays for an awful lot of other ads.

Mr. Kilgour: It has no backbone.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): There is no backbone. That is right.

The environment, fisheries and external affairs departments should be taking a paid ad in the papers to support the east coast in this effort. If they do not, we will see the same thing that we saw last night on the lumber in B.C. on the national news here in Canada being analyzed by people in Germany saying that we were doing something wrong.

We are going to have it everywhere in Canada if this government does not start to act responsibly and to defend our primary industries and resources.

The government can do that by taking a full page ad, the same type of ad that the IFAW had in The Globe and Mail and probably in other newspapers this week, which was so detrimental and without any consideration of the real issues behind it.

I just want to say that the government has the ability. It has the power within Canada, within the Department of External Affairs and within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to give support to our fishing communities. It has the power.

We have a navy. We may not have much of a navy under the national defence policy because we do not have a national defence policy, but we have a navy that could be out there. We have planes that could be out there doing some surveillance the same way that they do it within our 200-mile limit.

We should be taking that authority; ratifying the Law of the Sea and taking control of the biological stocks that are rightly Canadian.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the last member.

It is passing strange that she would tell this House that the government has the ability to stop an ad from being run in a newspaper. I heard her words. They are the ones she used: "They should have stopped it and not allowed it".

The last time I checked, we are living in a democracy which does mean freedom of speech. The hon. member is doing the people of the east coast a disservice when she insinuates that those kinds of things can happen.

Mr. Mills: She said protest.

Mr. Belsher: I know what the lady said. I was listening, and that is why I am up here commenting about this.

Mr. Kilgour: A sexist remark.

Mr. Belsher: No. She is a good friend, as far as friendships can go from across the aisle here.

What we are talking about here today is a fishery which we are all concerned about. We have had very disturbing news given to us by our scientists who say that the spawning mass which was 270,000 tonnes was lowered to 130,000 tonnes, and that is for the 7-year old and older cod, as well as for other parts of the biomass too. They have downgraded their estimates on that.

In the light of that, what other actions could the government have taken particularly with what we do control within the 200-mile limit other than what has been taken already?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, if I did say "stop" and "allow", I would never presume that this House should ever stop and disallow anything in the newspapers as has been done in some instances, however.

I will say that I would have hoped that the editorial board of The Globe and Mail would have had a little bit more common sense. What I was implying was that the Government of Canada—it cannot be the fishermen who put the money in; they are always putting money in—this is a real fact. It is a known fact that the seal herd should be culled. The seals eat a tremendous amount of fish and they are continuing to do so.

On your question as to what else could have been done, I say that what will happen I saw happen two years ago in Nova Scotia when the government, without doing a study, said that fishing had to stop because the stocks could not take it and because there was overcapacity onshore and in the fishery.

What will happen is that the fishermen will hurt so badly that come this year there will be very few fishermen left because they have had to sell their quota—that was the department's decision—to companies and they no longer have that effort. The communities are going to die because there is no longer a fish plant.

I felt at that time and I still feel today that there are a tremendous number of foreigners coming into our waters to take species that should not be called under-utilized any more. We should be able to fish all the fish that those 100 foreign freezer factory ships that come within the 200-mile limit fish, even if it means that we have to put money into converting what we have to fish, if it means that we have to put money into developing markets to send that.

We are not under the free trade agreement in this. We are talking Japan, Cuba, the U.S.S.R, eastern Europe, western Europe, all over the world. We are not doing it. We have lost a lot of time in not doing it. We have allowed the foreigners to think that they now have a right within our 200-mile limit. They do not have a right within our 200-mile limit. I think that they have a limited right if it is done well and directed well to come and fish outside, but they should not be violating our biological stocks as they are doing.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity that I have to conclude this debate. What we have heard here over the past several hours is a fitting discussion about an issue which is a real tragedy for Canada, but particularly for our most eastern province of Newfoundland. It is a tragedy that pertains not only to the cod fishery, which is largely what this debate is about, but which pertains as well to the salmon fishery in which we saw significant action taken just last week by the minister and his colleague in Newfoundland to close that commercial fishery indefinitely. It is a tragedy that is exacerbated by the closure or at least the slowdown of the Hibernia oil development project.

It seems that for Newfoundland all news is bad news as this particular time in its history. It is very fitting that we have this debate this afternoon. I believe that in our heart of hearts all members share the concern for the province of Newfoundland and share the determination to find ways to launch new initiatives to take action to solve the very serious problems which confront us.

The cod fishery disaster is not too strong a word. The cod fishery disaster is a major environmental world issue and one which deserves world public support and world public attention in the same manner that unfortunately and inaccurately world attention has been devoted to our lumber products and forest products in Canada, both on a trade basis and on a very significant environmental basis from Europe.

I am going to speak about this a little later with respect to a public information program but it seems to me that one of the things we have to do with this cod issue and this overfishing issue outside our 200-mile zone is establish in Europe the same kind of environmental outrage, the same kind of environmental action in support of our position, as has been applied against us on the basis of inaccurate perceptions with respect to lumber.

It is sort of a sad irony that Europe has responded to a perception of forest management in Canada which is inadequate and has acted to boycott our lumber products. In the face of a totally documented disaster with respect to our fishery, extremely well documented, and one that is being perpetrated by the our own European colleagues in the fishery, we cannot seem to mount the public outrage, the public thrust for action that is so desperately required.

There is no dispute that overfishing is causing the severe depletion of the fisheries resources off Canada's Atlantic coast. The northwest stocks are being ravaged, principally by European Community fleets operating on the high seas outside of Canada's 200-mile limit.

Since 1986, overfishing of those straddling stocks has totalled more than 400,000 tonnes above the internationally established quotas, and has continued without any appreciable reduction in 1991. Although migratory patterns differ from species to species, one element is common to the cod and the flounder and the redfish stocks that straddle that 200-mile limit. Many migrate for part of the year outside the 200-mile zone to deeper water on the edge of the shelf, and that is where they are subject to intensive overharvesting which has led to the stock depletion.

This is not supposed to occur. These straddling stocks are supposed to be harvested in accordance with conservation and management decisions made by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. It was Canada and the European Community, Japan, the U.S.S.R. and Norway, among others, that signed the NAFO convention in 1978. NAFO was established to scientifically assess stocks, to decide on a total allowable catch, to allocate quotas to the NAFO contracting countries and to set inspection and control measures for the area outside the 200-mile zone. However, it remains for those NAFO contracting parties, those countries that belong to NAFO that exercise state flag jurisdictions, to give effect to those NAFO decisions. That has not been happening.

Before 1986, the European Community did adhere to virtually all of the North Atlantic Fishing Organization decisions. In 1986, Spain and Portugal joined the European Community and they were given a limited access to European Community waters and were promised other fishing opportunities. Beginning in 1986, the European Community commenced to object to NAFO quotas and to set higher quotas for itself unilaterally, quotas that have been allocated largely to Spain and to Portugal. As well, the European Community has failed to exercise effective control over its Iberian fleets, which have fished virtually at will outside our 200-mile limit. As a result, catches by European Community fleets have greatly exceeded both the NAFO quotas and even the unilateral quotas which the European Community has set for itself.

This has created a real crisis in fisheries in the northwest Atlantic. From 1986 to 1990, European Community fleets reported catches of cod, flounder and redfish totalling more than 530,000 tonnes. This was more than five times the European Community's NAFO quota, and for some flounder stocks it has been reported that they have exceeded the NAFO quota by 18 times, much of it being juvenile fish harvested in nursery areas.

These are just the reported catches. They do not include unreported catches or catches which have been misreported on unregulated species like skate. These figures do not include catches by non-NAFO fleets either. From 1986 to 1990, non-NAFO vessels operating without any NAFO quotas caught more than 165,000 tonnes of cod, flounder and redfish, which add to the extensive figures I have already quoted that represent such a total overharvesting of our resource.

The figures for 1991 by the European Community are not very different from recent years, notwithstanding that the European Community did accept most of the NAFO quotas for 1991. In the face of this continued overfishing, stocks have become very seriously depleted and many quotas in Canada have been cut in half. From 1986 to 1990, Canada's quotas for regulated species were reduced by a total of 300,000 tonnes.

That pattern is now well established. Canada and other NAFO contracting parties, except the European Community, have limited their catches to conserve fish stocks. European Community and non-NAFO fleets continue to take everything they can, often just outside the 200-mile limit.

While Canada has had to reduce its offshore fleet by about one-third since 1986, European Community fleets are being reduced in community waters in an effort to end fishing, but the number of European Community and non-NAFO vessels fishing in the northwest Atlantic has actually increased. Why? The area just outside 200 miles is one of the few remaining convenient fishing areas where distant fleets can continue, in effect, to fish at will.

Canada as made repeated efforts since 1986 to persuade the European Community and its member states to end their overfishing. Time is running out for the stocks which are being overfished. It matters not a whit whether overfishing is carried under the flag of Spain or Panama or Korea if the stocks are going to continue to be depleted.

One of the main thrusts by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and by the Department of External Affairs has been to launch a public information campaign that will try to win the state of public opinion in Europe and elsewhere that will bring world opinion to bear on the European Community, particularly on the Portuguese and the Spanish fleets, to end the overfishing, to live within the NAFO quotas, to in effect join in the battle to conserve this immensely traditional and immensely important cod stock.

Campaign activities have been extensive, including visits to Europe by Canadian industry and parliamentary delegations, by participation in environmental round tables, by the involvement of Canadian spokespeople in key European events, by liaisons with environmental and scientific organizations, media briefings, interviews and the development and distribution of communication materials such as pamphlets, brochures and visions.

The campaign has included the Prime Minister, several cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, provincial MLAs, the private sector, union and academic spokespersons and a broad effort to generate European media attention. The public information initiative targets European Community and member state decision-makers, industry leaders, European environmental and scientific groups and the media, particularly in Spain and Portugal.

Some specific examples have been parliamentary missions, including many of our colleagues from this House. In October of 1990, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce led a community development mission to Spain and Portugal comprised of key representatives of the Atlantic Canada fishery community. Also in 1990, a delegation from the Newfoundland-Labrador Federation of Co-operatives attended an international co-operative alliance meeting in Spain. A specially prepared brochure entitled The Fragile Fishery, which documents the foreign overfishing issue, has been widely disseminated in Europe and in all fisheries countries around the world.

In the spring of 1991, industry and union representatives accompanied the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to Portugal, where he made a major public speech and held meetings with his counterparts.

The campaign remains a vital component of the government's efforts, and for 1992 a number of activities and new initiatives are already under way. Our mission to the European Community and our embassies in European Community member states and in NAFO member countries have been provided a detailed communications package in which to develop and present this very important and tragic story.

The campaign is being broadened to support more fully our legal initiative, particularly with respect to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to be held in Brazil later this summer.

During March we have invited foreign journalists from Europe and NAFO countries to visit Newfoundland. This will provide an opportunity for them to gain first hand the knowledge of the impacts of foreign overfishing.

All of these efforts continue and none of them are particularly radical perhaps, but together they bring into focus this tremendously urgent and rapidly developing environmental disaster. In all things environmental, in the whole world of sustainable development, nothing starts without a sense of vision. We have to start again as a country and as a world with respect to our fishery on the Grand Banks to determine what is achievable, what can be done and then commit ourselves to those measures to accomplish those goals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will be please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was held back by the winds of winter, even though I was an hour on the road trying to get here. I did want it to be known that I would support my party.

I cannot believe that the minister himself voted against this motion. It is a shame and a disgrace.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of the Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario) moved that Bill C-263, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (personal and living expenses), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise on this private member's bill that I put into the draw back on June 19 for first reading. This bill is one that some would argue is controversial. It certainly has an impact on an awful lot of Canadians and it deals with tax fairness.

I would like to suggest just who it impacts on. It impacts on all members of Parliament, all senators, all members of provincial legislatures, all elected mayors, reeves, councillors, all school board trustees, all members of hydro commissions, public utilities commissions. It probably affects even a dog-catcher somewhere in Canada, if there is such an elected person.

All of these people who I have mentioned have a special privilege, a privilege to which no one else in Canada is entitled. That privilege is that they are allowed to receive a portion of their income, which is referred to as an expense allowance, tax free. In the case of members of Parliament, they are allowed to receive 33 per cent additional income on top of their allowance that they would receive as a member of Parliament tax free in the form of an expense allowance. That amounts to some $21,300. It is an extra 33 per cent.

It is 33 per cent for MPs and 50 per cent for every other politician in Canada. I am not sure why that particular scenario exists but suffice to say that every other elected politician in Canada is entitled to receive an allowance and that allowance is tax free.

Again, I emphasize the issue of fairness. No one else in this country is allowed to receive a regular income from their employment which is designed to be tax free.

Some might argue: "Yes, we politicians have expenses" and I for one will not debate that issue one iota. We certainly have expenses. I might even be prepared to suggest that we members of Parliament have expenses that exceed our allowance. That is not the issue on which I am standing in front of this House today. I am quite prepared to suggest that we have expenses but I believe that since those expenses are being reimbursed to us, they should be taxable like they are to everybody else in this country.

In my previous career as a sales representative, I also had expenses. At the end of the year many of those expenses were reimbursed to me, but lo and behold, on my income tax form there was this thing called a taxable benefit. That taxable benefit dealt with the free income I received, not in the sense of the performance of my job but to help pay the expenses related to the performance of my job. That was a taxable benefit and I paid income tax on it.

Yet all of a sudden when I was elected as a member of Parliament, I got that same allowance but it was no longer taxable. I guess what I am suggesting by this bill is that all politicians across this country who get that allowance, which each and every one of us does, ought to receive that income as a taxable benefit.

When we talk about it as a taxable benefit, some will argue that they have expenses and have receipts for those expenses. I guess I could ask each and every MP in this House, and all those across Canada in fact, do we not on many occasions buy tickets to fundraising dinners, to charitable events, and receive a tax deductible receipt for those expense?

I wonder how many politicians in this country take that tax deductible receipt and say: "I got this money tax free. I will not deduct that from my taxable income". I would suggest there would be very few politicians in this country who would not take that tax deductible receipt and deduct it from their taxable income rather than from their tax free income. My bill, I think, sets out fairness that every Canadian in this country has that politicians do not have and that is a taxable benefit for taxable allowances that individuals receive.

When I talk about tax fairness I guess what surprised me most of all is when this bill went before the normal process to determine whether it should be votable, I thought it would be difficult. I understand it is controversial and I am not sure many members may rise in support of this bill in this House.

What surprised me most was the party that believes in tax fairness gave me the roughest time in the committee process. I find it rather interesting that a "do as I say, not as I do" kind of attitude applied in the committee process. There certainly was very little sympathy for this kind of bill, even though they believe people should pay their fair share of taxes.

Yes, this would have an impact. The impact would be if we made that tax free allowance now taxable as a taxable benefit, what would it mean to MPs? That $21,000 would become taxable. I presume we are all in fairly high tax brackets so we would pay the 29 per cent tax rate. On top of that we would pay the provincial tax rate of some 55 per cent, plus the appropriate surcharges. That $21,000 would probably cost every MP in this House somewhere in the realm of $10,000 or $11,000 further tax. I understand that. I for one would be quite prepared to say if that $10,000 or $11,000 loss because of taxation is unfair, fine, adjust the allowance. I am not going to argue that point at all. Adjust the allowance on total impact to the revenues of the government. It would make no difference because yes, give us $10,000 more but it will be taken away in taxes. The net effect is minimal.

What makes it unfair is each and every year, as has happened for the last 40 or 50 years, this tax free allowance has existed. Every time an MP gets a raise, the fact a portion of it is not taxable is an increased benefit to high income Canadians and MPs are high income Canadians.

Every year the unfairness of the tax free benefit increases in value disproportionately to what might be the impact on other Canadians who get raises. There is no doubt it has an impact.

Since the salary of MPs is set up on the basis of income and allowance, some have suggested that we could make the whole thing taxable and increase the pension benefit. I would suggest, the way this bill is proposed, that I am not adjusting the income of MPs. Therefore it has no impact on the pension of MPs. The allowance is exclusive or outside the pension of an MP. If we continue to keep it as a taxable benefit, a taxable allowance, it is therefore not part of computing the pension of MPs. MPs would not all of a sudden enrich their pensions, which has been a comment raised by many about my particular procedure.

Is this idea unique or new? I do not know if this private member's bill has ever been introduced before. It is certainly new in this term of office but it is not unsupported in the community. In fact, a very interesting article appeared in The Toronto Star. I heard the NDP premier of the province of Ontario talk about the fact that they should look at this tax free allowance of all provincial and municipal politicians in Ontario. The reason they have that allowance is not provincial legislation, although they need the approval of the provincial legislature. It is federal legislation, the Income Tax Act, that allows for it.

The city of North York talked about this issue at one of its council meetings and it was reported in The Toronto Star. This debate took place last year. Members of the council passed a unanimous resolution asking the province to make the allowance they received taxable. Basically their logic is explained in the paper as follows:

> But councillors say the law is misunderstood and criticized by the public.
> "The public feels that maybe members of council are getting big benefits," says Councillor Milton Berber.
> Adds Councillor Paul Sutherland: "People don't understand why it's (the exemption) there. It really bothers people and it gives a false idea of what's actually being earned".

There are a number of other quotes. I would suggest that is true. A lot of my constituents say: "You people don't pay taxes like we do. You have this unfair advantage. When you raise the income tax rate you are not affected the same as everybody else" .

I guess I am proposing with this bill to take away that charge, that concern of citizens of mine and probably other citizens across the country. We would be taxed exactly the same way as every other Canadian in this country. I believe that is in fact what Canadians are looking for, that MPs, senators, MPPs in the provincial legislatures, and all other politicians from one end of this country to the other pay taxes in the same way.

What does that mean in my municipality and in my riding? Let me give an example. Every riding is different. I have three municipalities in my riding. They each have eight elected mayors or councillors. There are 24 people there. We have another 10 or 12 public school board trustees. We have 10 or 12 separate school board trustees. Now we are up to 44 or 45. We have two MPPs, which put us up to 47.

In the case of the town of Pickering we have five hydro commissioners. In Whitby they have seven hydro commissioners. In Ajax they have six hydro commissioners. We are now up to about 65 people. We have an MP who is in on this. So in my riding alone this bill would affect about 70 people. We would multiply that by the 295 ridings in Canada. I suspect the number is much more than 75 on average because some ridings have 10 or 20 municipalities. A lot of people would be impacted by this legislation.

I come back to the original point. What I am trying to deal with is tax fairness. I am not trying to deal with the income of any politician in this country. It is within the power of all politicians in this country, if they feel their salary is inappropriate, if they feel that the expenses are much higher than they are being reimbursed for, to adjust it in a simple piece of legislation in their jurisdiction to whatever they think it should be. I know we in this House get a lot of flak when we go back to our ridings about making a lot of money, being overpaid and underworked. I am sure all members in this House are familiar with those allegations. Obviously we may not agree with each and every accusation that comes our way.

However, we do have the ability. We were elected to lead. We were elected to make decisions. If members of Parliament believe that $64,000 is not enough, that the $21,000 allowance is not enough or that the housing allowance, which we have on top of all those other items, is not enough, we have the ability to do something about it. I guess my resolution does not address that subject. They continue. All politicians continue to have that ability. Mine is simply that whatever decision Parliament or other legislatures make it becomes taxable. That is what I call tax fairness. That is what I believe is the appropriate thing to do, and that is why this bill is here today.

I am only sorry that ultimately this bill will not be voted on because of the decisions and the process that is involved. But I respect that decision because that is the parliamentary process. I am just sorry it is not being voted on because I do believe it is an appropriate measure that should be taken.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there are many days in this House when I stand and challenge the government on its initiatives, but I would have to say that today I stand and I salute sincerely the initiative of the member of Parliament for Ontario.

He is addressing in my view one of the most fundamental frustrations that the people of Canada have when dealing with the tax act of Canada. The people of Canada feel that the rules, regulations, exceptions and exceptions to exceptions and all preferences that exist in the current tax act of Canada do nothing more than breed complications and paper burden. Absolutely everyone agrees that the current tax act is unfair.

What I like about the member's initiative is that he is taking members of Parliament, the most distrusted people in all of Canada as members of Parliament, and basically saying: "Let us begin this radical reform of the tax act by starting with ourselves. Let us blow out the preferences that we in this House of Commons and all other politicians in the country receive". As the member said, this is really not going to affect our work in any way, shape or form. In other words, if moneys are needed for legitimate expenses then, as the member said, we can come back to this House and say: "Listen, we need more help to look after the expense requirements that we have as members of Parliament".

There is absolutely nothing more distasteful to the people of Canada than to think that the legislators of this country are talking about tax reform and fairness in the tax system day in and day out, but end up giving themselves a $20,000 tax preference year in and year out. The people of Canada will never ever totally trust this system unless we begin reforming ourselves.

As the member knows, I have been promoting or trying to advance the debate in the area of tax reform. I guess it has been almost three years. The whole principle behind the concept of the single tax rate is to blow out all the preferences that exist in this country, not only on the personal side but also on the corporate side. Maybe we could go back to basics on this issue and bring in a new tax act where people can judge clearly whether they are being treated fairly or not. I believe that a system like that will go a long way in bringing a renewed attitude toward productivity and the quality of our work in this country.

I have really nothing further to add to this. I give it my full support. The pity of having a private members' debate like this, late on a Thursday night, is that it should receive more attention. We should give members more notice and we should do more promotion on it. I will be honest with you; I did not hear about this until last night when I was advised by someone from the office of the Minister of Finance that this debate was happening.

It is the kind of thing that Canadians want to see. I regret the fact that it cannot be votable. I do not know why it cannot be votable. You are on the government side. There has got to be some way to get all of this support. Maybe we could make some kind of an amendment to the budget or something, or to the current tax act. Day in and day out the New Democratic Party talks about tax fairness and simplifying the system, so I am sure we would get their support. I know my own leader is constantly talking about tax fairness and tax simplification, so I am sure that if the member who has more and better access to the Minister of Finance were to push this a little harder, we could make this a votable motion and it could be law in this country. It is something that would begin the rebuilding of trust in this institution, which is the central issue for Canadians today.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I also support the general thrust of this initiative. I would appreciate if the member who made this motion would listen closely because I think that in some respects the whole purpose he is addressing is a disservice by dealing in one narrow aspect of members' expenses, members' compensation or members' pension plans.

It is very much like the leader of the New Democratic Party said last week. I was not in the House when she made a speech about pensions. In isolation, she can demonstrate that pensions, which many of us will never hope to receive, are too generous or are based on the wrong criteria, and so on. Frankly, the hon. member has done the same thing by taking the narrow issue of expense allowances and the fact that they are tax free, and addressed that. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has applauded that.

The fact that I know both of these gentlemen well would cause me to be certain they are not sanctimonious. But there is a danger of that by just addressing the one aspect of this problem. I agree that we should not have a tax preference. But I can demonstrate that the expense allowance by itself is inadequate to the needs of most of us. To put this motion and not say that is on the edge, frankly, of not really being fair to yourself or to all the other members.

In the narrowness of your presentation, my hon. friend, and in the response of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, you do a disservice to all members by helping to paint this picture of distrust in dealing with one item in isolation and not in the context of all items.

I have only been in this House for three years. I came here for the first time from a business background, as a matter of fact, a private business background, but an extensive public business experience as well. I was shocked to find the ad hoc, ill-designed, topsy-turvy compensation plan that over decades has been conceived, almost it seems on the basis of, well, what kind of patchwork can we put to the system today to solve this problem?

Last year we instituted a $6,000 a year expense provision for those of us who have to mainftain hotel accommodation, apartment accommodation, or whatever, because we do not live in this area. That came after decades of this House sitting here. That allowance does not provide a means of recompense for me because I happen to own the condominium in which I live. I have to depend on a $40 a day allowance because for some reason it is not deemed appropriate that I file a claim based on my out-of-pocket expenses for a second home, which we all know and every Canadian expects is a requirement of this job.

We go on and on. I have been frustrated at the label that I have received, leaving a business career to come as a member of Parliament, and to find the disrespect in which we are held, the distrust in which we are held, the public perception that we are overpaid and underworked, that we abuse the tax system, we abuse the pension system and that our salaries are too grand.

I am not complaining. I would do this job for free if I could afford it, and as long as I could afford it, because I believe it is one of the most distinguished opportunities any Canadian can have. But the facts are that the total compensation that I receive is inadequate to the expenditures I make and inadequate to the salary I have made all my life. If you count the cost of lost businesses and lost business opportunities, if you take the opportunity cost for this job, it is not remotely adequately reimbursed.

I take issue, frankly, with two individuals who I hold in the utmost respect for addressing this so vigorously in such a narrow, isolated context.

I would challenge you and other members of this House, as I have frankly challenged my own leadership and my own caucus, to launch a study, a commission, some public inquiry into the total compensation of the members of Parliament: the adequacy of salaries in relation to the qualifications and the commitments required; the adequacy of all expenses, the expenses for a second home and for air travel; to make sure that we do not have broken homes because our wives and husbands and children are living apart most of the time; to ensure that the air travel expense we get is not a gift but is there for the purposes we have to serve. Why would you not mention air travel in this motion? The free air travel, the 64 points, particularly if you do not use them for official businesss, is even more offensive than the tax free aspects of the expense allowance.

Mr. Mills: It is not part of the act.

Mr. Bird: Forget the act, we are talking about the total package. You are resting on technicalities. The facts are that the public disrespect members of this House in a total compensation context because every so often somebody, either members themselves or journalists or citizens, take one narrow aspect of our compensation program and highlight it as this motion does today. It makes it look like a very stellar and courageous performance, we are going to change the world. Well, let us really change the world of politics in this country and in this House. Let us call for a public inquiry about the total compensation package, including the pension plan. Let us receive recommendations, let us debate them in this House, let us, in full public view, initiate a brand new compensation regime that touches all of these bases and let us implement it at the time of the next election.

Let us make sure that everybody running for office knows what it is in advance. Let us not compromise anybody's pension plan to this point. They have earned them under visible circumstances. Let us go on, from the next election forward, in a total regime, salaries, expenses, air travel, tax provisions, housing and pension programs that the public has confidence in and it will attract the kinds of people we need in this House.

I would vote for that kind of a motion. I would vote for that kind of a private members' resolution that puts it all on the table and says: "Let's strike such a commission and let's do it now."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke, spoke very well of some of the problems that attend the life of being a member of Parliament and attend the issues which this bill, in some respects, raises. I say in some respects because what is wrong with the bill is that it does attempt to deal with one particular problem in principle in isolation from the rest of the package, if you like, of issues which the hon. member who just spoke raised and that is the whole matter of compensation for members of Parliament and everything that involves.

Therefore, I would support, rather than this bill, the call by the hon. member who just spoke and the call by others over the years, that in some way or another these questions be taken out of our hands. We cannot win in terms of public opinion no matter what we do, as long as the public continue to be cynical about the political process. I might add that the public have always been to a degree cynical about politicians and the political process. In that sense we do not live in some new age.

I remember going through a book that had been prepared Fifty Years of Headlines. One of the headlines I noticed in the year 1906 was about MPs raising their salaries to an exorbitant rate. So as long ago as 1906 the media and, presumably others, were enjoying making members of Parliament out to look bad.

I think this has been an industry for a long time. No doubt, sometimes we have collectively deserved that criticism and other times we have not.

I was disturbed to hear the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood get up and say that we are the most distrusted people in the country. Frankly I do not feel that way. I do not feel like I am one of the most distrusted people in the country. I am still proud to be a member of Parliament. I still feel good about being a member of Parliament. If the member for Broadview—Greenwood feels like one of the most distrusted people in the country, I feel sorry for him. Sure people are critical of politicians and they are critical of the political process. But I think that is an exaggeration.

What we have here in the form of this bill and in the form of the comments made by the member for Broadview—Greenwood and other comments that have been made from time to time around this place is a form of piety, of piousness, of self–congratulatory heroism at the expense of one's colleagues.

The principle that the member opposite wants to promote, that all money should be treated the same, is a principle that I do not think anybody in my party would have any difficulty with. I think it is a principle we have promoted in the past and continue to promote.

All we are saying about this bill is that by itself it cannot deal with the over–all problem, both with respect to perception and with respect to reality as it pertains to members of Parliament compensation package.

The member is dreaming in technicolour if he thinks that if our expense allowance was to be made taxable and we then found it to be inadequate that we could just simply stroll back in here and increase it so that we would be getting exactly the same amount without bringing down upon ourselves much more criticism than the criticism he feels he is responding to now, I think he is being quite unrealistic.

Therefore, I go back to my original point, that no matter how we deal with it, what we need to do is somehow get it out of our hands. That point was made by my leader the other day with respect to the whole issue of MPs pensions, which has become such an issue, that is to get it out of our hands, to have somebody else make that judgment and probably to go beyond what we have done over the years, which is by law to have two retired MPs look at it. People could still say: "Well it is still part of the club". Let us have a mixture of people look at it and come in with some recommendations. I venture to suggest that if we did our jobs here, the responsibilities that we have might be judged by these outsiders to be worthy of more compensation than we receive now. I do not know.

The problem is that it might be the case in spite of everything everybody believes, that the greatest restraint on MPs salaries and other things is to some degree the fact that we do have to set them ourselves and we are politically answerable for that. Maybe there have been times when that has not been the case. I am certainly open to that, having voted against an increase myself in 1981, the last time there was an increase.

But it may be the case that the very fact we are in control of it actually acts as a restraint. It may be hard to believe, given everything people say these days about our benefits, et cetera. In spite of the fact that it might be true, I say for the sake of the political process and for the sake of members of Parliament, we do have to get it out of our hands.

It will not be just us who will have to take our chances with whatever those people will recommend, the public will have to take its chances with what an independent review of our situation might recommend. We will all have to take our chances.

The attempt by the member of single out this one element however much I might agree with the tax principle involved—

Mr. Mills: Well, that is what it is, a tax principle.

Mr. Blaikie: The tax principle involved is misguided at this point to the extent that it does not deal with the entire package it would have to deal with in order to be adequate.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Ontario for bringing this subject to our attention this evening.

I for one can say one's standard of living does not go up when one becomes a member of Parliament. Nonetheless, it still does not alter the fact that the vast majority of people think that members of Parliament are very highly paid people. True, our salaries are certainly well above the average of what a lot of Canadians are earning. We are allowed an expense allowance, tax free money that is given to us to cover the extra expenses we have in accepting this challenge that has been given to us.

I think the hon. member from New Brunswick has hit the nail on the head when he said: "Listen, let us not look at this in isolation. Let us look at the total package and see if we can improve on what has been done".

I know in many other jurisdictions, at the lower levels in public life, the tax free money is usually one-third of the total compensation. That is not the case for members of Parliament. It has been kept to a set amount. I also know the way of life members of Parliament are obliged to live and what people expect of them when they send them invitations to various fundraising activities in the ridings and when people come to Ottawa and look forward to being entertained upstairs in the restaurant. These are things people just assume we can put on an expense account and get reimbursed for.

No, it comes out of the allowance which has been given to us, along with our second residence. In the last two years, we have been able to claim up to $6,000 of allowance for living away from our principal residence.

While I speak in favour of the sentiment of what the hon. member for Ontario is proposing to us, we cannot just look at it in isolation. I do not think he suggested that. I did not hear him say that in his remarks. He said that we would have to look at the total compensation to make sure that we are being fairly compensated.

The very reason we have to say that is the fact that we do not want just people that can afford to be sent to Ottawa to run for office.

We want to make sure that we have the proper cross-section of our country, one that stretches from coast to coast from various vocations so that our country is represented in a way that reflects the mix of our country.

While I express sentiment to what has been done by the hon. member, I concur with what the member from New Brunswick has said to us tonight, that we would really need to do a little more studying on this rather than treating this just by itself.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRADE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should withdraw from the negotiations concerning a North American free trade agreement, give notice of withdrawal from the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and pursue a global trade strategy not based on making the planet an unfettered playground for the multinational corporate elite.

He said: Madam Speaker, come the next election Canadians will have to make a choice about the future of their country. That choice will be a choice between electing a political party like the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada or the Reform Party of Canada—

An hon. member: Same thing.

Mr. Blaikie: Same thing, someone says, incorrectly—that is committed to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the idea of a North American free trade agreement, now being negotiated between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico; or electing a political party that believes that these two agreements, one actual and one potential, ever imminent as we understand, to be so anti-ethical to the survival of Canada that we must get out of one and avoid ever getting into the other.

This is the choice that must be put to the Canadian people at the time of the next election, and it is the New Democratic Party of Canada, and only the New Democratic Party of Canada, that will make that choice a possibility for Canadians in 1992 or 1993, whenever the next election comes.

It will be our duty to do so, both in faithfulness to our own principles and in faithfulness to Canada. Canadians will have to choose between a future dictated by these agreements, a future which will involve one set of problems, or a future free to seek a real and qualitatively different alternative to such agreements, a future which will also have its own set of problems.

In a world that is characterized by the so-called globalization trend that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement are both symptoms of and responses to, the choice is whether to resist this trend or to accommodate it or, even more accurately, when it comes to the current government, to be a promoter of it.

Accommodation or resistance, these are the choices. The accommodationist says, of globalization and its other buzzword "competitiveness", that we really have no option. The accommodationists suggest that those who run the world are increasingly designing a world in which this is the stark reality and that the sooner we get on the bandwagon and redesign ourselves to fit this new world, the better. To accommodationists this is the counsel of reality. To those who would resist, it is of course the counsel of despair.

The accommodationist either believes or wants others to believe in any case, that globalization is something like the weather, that we cannot do anything about it, that the emerging global marketplace is not a human creation answerable to some account of what it does for or to humanity, but a force unto itself to which the wise would do well to submit. To do otherwise is folly, would say the accommodationists.

The resister says of globalization and competition that a planet controlled by global market forces only is not only not desirable but also not inevitable. The resister says that it is one world, yes; an increasingly smaller world, yes; but the resister imagines this one world as a global community rather than a global marketplace where co-operation rather than competition is the buzzword of the earth's future.

The resister says that the globalization we have now before us, and which we are asked to embrace, is nothing other than a politically sanitized concept designed to cover up reality. The reality is that the multinational corporate elite want to turn the planet into a playground for themselves, where they can play their games with each other, unfettered by nuisance factors like democratically elected governments and well supplied with the economic equivalent of cannon fodder, i.e. anxious populations ready to accept injustices or even the dismantling of existing structures of justice in order to secure investment or jobs at the expense of other equally anxious populations less willing or less able to offer the same deal.

Globalization is another name for comprehensive, integrated and very sophisticated blackmail in which governments accept the blackmailer's demands on behalf of their people and then go on to enforce the demands on their own people, all the while muttering phrases that would have us believe that this is strong medicine but will do the trick. It is not medicine, Madam Speaker, it is poison.

In Canada, as with others, the blackmail is twofold: first, we are blackmailed into these agreements in the first place by the corporate community collectively, or seduced into them by massive advertising campaigns, as was the case in the last election. The agreement then makes corporate blackmail on a corporation by corporation basis as well as collectively that much easier and that much more acceptable in the sense that the FTA and/or NAFTA make acceptable what was previously morally suspect. It is not something that Canadians have missed either. What is okay for corporations is okay for individual Canadians and so we get the cross-border shopping phenomenon aggravated by the GST and by a high dollar that is also related to the FTA. But I digress.

In the Third World the blackmail comes in the form of what is called structural adjustment which is the euphemism for, among other things, deliberately starving children in order to save the value system of the global financial world. Structural adjustment is the name given to the demands made on Third World governments which would otherwise want to feed their own people, grow their own food, expand public health services, export their resources for a profit and other such ridiculous things, but are forced not to because such plans do not fit the economic model favoured by the IMF or the World Bank.

In Canada we are under structural adjustment as well. The difference is that we will have to dismantle where others are being asked not to build in the first place. The other difference, to some degree, is that our government seems to actually believe this is all to the good, whereas at least some Third World countries or governments have the self-respect to think otherwise and even to resist at times.

What is at stake in all of these issues is power. Who will run the world, and for what end? It is a question of sovereignty, but not sovereignty only in the narrow 19th century national or nation state sense of the word, although that is not unimportant, it is a question of sovereignty in the big "P" political sense of who and what will be sovereign not only in Canada but in the whole world. Will the marketplace be sovereign?

The problem with the FTA and NAFTA and globalization in general is that they answer this question of sovereignty in a way that puts an end to the ideological debate that has been going on in Canada and other western countries for decades. The debate between market and state, private and public, right and left, produced a balance, albeit fluctuating, between different points of view that gave us mixed economies, an admirable measure of social justice and enough of a role for government that democracy mattered to the economy. But the key thing really is that no one view or institution was absolutely sovereign.

The accommodationists, in answer to the criticism that Canadian sovereignty is sacrificed to the FTA, argued that it was an act of sovereignty to sign the agreement. The resisters agreed that sovereignty can be delegated, but sovereignty is a political thing that can only be delegated to something which is also political. National sovereignty can be delegated two ways; in a decentralizing way toward regions or provinces, or it can be delegated upward, so to speak, to an international political entity like the UN. But to delegate sovereignty to the marketplace, to a non-political, non-democratic reality like either the continental or global marketplace is not delegation of sovereignty; it is an abdication of sovereignty, an abdication of Canada's sovereignty which is part of a larger subversion of legitimate political power by unaccountable global economic power.

Those on the right that have always favoured the marketplace in an uncritical way will now have their way without having to resort to politics. Their goals will eventually be realized by such trade agreements. The economic conditions and rules demanded by these agreements, or by GATT for that matter, which the powers that be wish to see similarly dominated by uncritical free market values, will eat away at supply management, at social programs, at fair labour legislation, environmental regulations and anything which gets in the way of the freedom of the powerful to do what they want.

Domestic political sovereignty becomes a cruel joke. What we are seeing here is the death of politics. Governments will be reduced to catering spectators or beggars, trading their people's values away in return for the favour of global investors.

Even those who voted for the FTA will be surprised at how the Canada they love depended on healthy debate rather than the entrenched victory of their own vision. Their victory will be tragic. Be careful what you ask for, they should be warned, you might get it.

Resisters might be willing to delegate economic sovereignty to an international political organization that was open to regular input from its constituent members, like the UN or the European Economic Community are to some degree, if that international body was dedicated to co-operation rather than competition. It would not be enough to be a timid referee of a global economic dogfight. Delegation of sovereignty will have to occur in some way or another if we are to solve the global ecological crisis.

However, instead of this kind of sovereignty erosion, we are seeing sovereignty eroded in favour of the very eco-ignorant market forces that helped create the environmental crisis in the first place.

In a world where we have just celebrated the end of bureaucratic state totalitarianism in the east, we seem poised in a fit of ideological blindness and gloating to adopt the raw capitalism we left behind years ago. Only now it will be called globalization rather than the brute totalitarianism of economic greed and corporate self-interest which bred the other form of totalitarianism in the first place. Both these forms of totalitarianism will be and have been severely damaging to the environment and to human dignity.

I hope what I have done today is to demonstrate just how profound our objection is to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the possibility of a North American free trade agreement and after that a hemispheric free trade agreement.

It is not just that it is a bad deal that needs to be renegotiated. It certainly is a bad deal. It did not obtain what the government set out to obtain, which was immunity from American trade laws.

In return for not obtaining what we set out to obtain, we gave up our ability to control our energy policy and our investment policies. We gave up control over services and indirectly we set the conditions for the eventual disappearance of our social programs as we know them, our tax system as we know it and various other things that I do not have the time to go into.

This deal will not be renegotiated. This is Liberal illusion. It would only be reopened to make it better for the Americans. Even if in some magical way it could be opened and improved for Canadians—and here I think is the profound difference between the NDP and the Liberals—it would still be a bad deal. It would still be a bad deal because it enshrines a way of understanding a world that is morally wrong.

Canadians will have to choose. Trying to build an alternative to the world intended by these agreements will not be easy.

Maybe the devil we know is already the FTA and Canadians will prefer the devil they know, but it is a devil. Trying to live otherwise will not be the devil, but it will be difficult. It will take a commitment to do what we can by ourselves and what we can do in co-operation with others in the world who want a different world than that envisioned by these agreements.

The Americans will not like it. They want a hemispheric free trade agreement. They could get nasty. But if we do not risk these acts of self-respect and democratic recovery that are recommended in this motion, then Canada is lost in any event.

The question is: Do we want to live on our knees or on our own two feet? The accommodationists would say that we will suffer a decline in our standard of living if we do not buckle under.

The resisters might say that our standard of living is probably bound to fall in any event, either as globalization and continentalization take place, or as American retaliation for abrogation takes place. Or indeed, which would be a positive thing, if we came to distribute the world's resources more equally in a way that provided for frugal comfort for all the people of the world.

A decline in the standard of living can either happen together in a way that preserves that which is truly valuable or randomly as some are devastated by the marketplace and others, a minority, prosper.

The Liberal Party, whose leader in 1988 fought the fight of his life and now comes to the House of Commons once in a blue moon even though he is still an MP, does not have the visceral hatred of the free trade agreement that will be needed to abrogate it. It and its corporate backers, and they are many, legion indeed, will try to sell the renegotiation angle. It might even have to pretend that it wants to abrogate it again if that becomes politically necessary.

However, the Liberal Party's early opposition to participating in the NAFTA talks which disappeared so quickly should be a sign to those who want to see reality. I say those who want to see reality, and I say that for a reason, because not all want to see reality.

There is a class of people in this country that wants to abrogate the FTA but wants to still be able to vote Liberal. This will be a fatal illusion, fatal for Canada and fatal perhaps for the NDP, though that really will not matter any more because if the FTA continues the kind of Canada that the NDP has worked for and envisions yet will be impossible in any event.

The Liberals will not do anything significant to change, let alone abrogate the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. There are those who sometimes from the right of the NDP in the Liberal universe agree with the NDP or know in their hearts that we are the only choice on these kinds of issues but who sociologically cannot bring themselves to vote, or even worse openly support or be NDP.

It is like moving to the other side of the tracks. Self-esteem does not permit it. It is like joining the outs. It is much nicer to be progressive and still be part of the ins. There are others to the left of the NDP who are very self-righteous when it comes to judging the NDP on many issues but they have no compunction about joining with Liberals and various coalitions sometimes at election time.

Those two groups are united by their common sense of being too good or too sophisticated for the New Democratic Party. I say here today that these tendencies will have to be swallowed and eliminated if Canada is to survive. Otherwise it will be said of such people when true histories are written that what they were too good for was not the NDP, but the Canada they and a majority of other Canadians loved and wanted to defend.

Maude Barlow's book Parcel of Rogues, the book she did with Bruce Campbell Take Back the Nation, Linda McQuaig's book The Quick and the Dead, Mel Hurtig's book Betrayal of Canada, all side-step this crucial question of who can actually be trusted to get rid of the deal.

More or less, none of the books deal with the question of who can be trusted and more or less all of them, if they acknowledge the NDP at all—and some of them do not even acknowledge our existence—avoid judgments on who will actually do the deed of abrogating the agreement. It is the question that dare not speak its name, but unless it is asked and debated, the Canadian people will be served very poorly.

Parcel of Rogues is a title that takes its name from a poem by Robert Burns called The Union in which he refers to the fact that Scotland, which never submitted to English steel, was bought and sold for English gold. I used this poem in the House to make such a point on Burn's Day on January 25, 1988, long before the book was even conceived.

An even more instructive analogy in the same vein would be the highland clearances. What made the highland clearances even more despicable and disgusting was the fact that it was perpetrated by the people's own traditional leaders who sold them out to southern interests.

Some historians have explained the relative acceptance of the Scots of such atrocities compared to the Irish by noting that they made the mistake of deferring to their traditional leadership, of trusting them, whereas the Irish knew their landlords to be foreigners and responded accordingly. They are independent today.

Canadians must not make the same mistake by trusting their traditional leadership. The traditional leadership of this country, Liberal and Conservative, is so bought and paid for, so integrated and assimilated into the business elite who wanted these deals in the first place, that they will sell us out each in their own way. The Liberals might feel a bit more guilty about it. They might be a bit like Lord Selkirk and resettle some of us in the economic Red River of the future if they can design one, but we will be cleared all the same, along with everything else that makes us Canadian.

I think I have honestly put the reality of the choices that Canadians face. All political parties have an obligation to say exactly where they are on these choices and why. I have tried to do that today for the NDP. I know where the government stands. Where do the Liberals stand?

I know the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is a critic of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I am truly puzzled and disappointed by his apparent retreat from that position. He now talks about shaping globalization. Globalization will not be shaped. The global community will be shaped when enough of us are willing to stand outside the mindset of globalization, name it for what it really is and set about the very difficult task of building an alternative.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I am very fond of the member who introduced the motion. This was the most eloquent new dinosaur speech I have heard for a long time, dinosaur in the sense that the New Democratic Party would want the country and the world to go back to Jules Verne's Around the World in 80 Days, high tariff, a world that is back where it used to be when we cleared the highland lands.

This is a world that is increasingly getting smaller and smaller. The fax machine and the satellite move news at unbelievable speed. To have a speech based on bring back the high tariffs, bring back big protection, make Canada an island of protection is unbelievable.

I, therefore, want to ask the member what he would do. Would he abolish the free trade agreement? Would he put the tariffs back where Sir John A. had them? Would we go back to 50 per cent tariffs on our manufacturers coming in? Would we try to be self-sufficient in Canada? Has he got a new way to grow oranges? What kind of a Canada does he want? Does he want us all back in little tiny houses with maybe one bathroom and no car? Are we going to go back to the Depression? Would he really want us back to riding the rails? Are we going back to the days of the CCF in Regina? Would he really want that kind of Canada? Does he want to throw away companies like Northern Telecom? Does he want to throw away all of our R and D investment? Does he want to put us back where we have no world markets? What kind of Canada does the NDP see?

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, as usual the member for Mississauga South completely missed the point, particularly the point about the highland clearances. It was not a point of trying to go back to any particular point in time, it was a question about the mistake that people can sometimes make in trusting their leadership. Sometimes that leadership sells them out to other interests. That is the claim I am making about Canadian corporate leadership in this country today. Whether it finds its expression in the Liberal or the Conservative Party, we are in the process, and have been for some time, of being sold out by our own leadership. That was the point I was trying to make and I am sorry if it went over the head of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

With respect to the question of tariffs, I did not even speak about tariffs. The member knows that with respect to tariffs before the beginning of the free trade agreement, 80 per cent of our trade with the United States was tariff-free in any event. The objection to the free trade agreement on the part of the NDP has a lot more to do with the other things that are involved in the agreement than simply the matter of tariffs. I think that is a complete misrepresentation and stereotyping of what I was trying to say.

It is not a question of going back; it is never a question of going back. It is a only a question of going ahead. I accept the global village. I accept that it is not around the world in 80 days anymore, but through satellite communication, around the world in 80 seconds perhaps. I made that point, if the hon. member would have listened to the speech. I said what we needed to create was a global community rather than a global marketplace. I hope that the member will take the opportunity on Monday to read Hansard so that he can see the great chunks of my speech that he missed while he was doing whatever he was doing.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I listened very intently, very carefully, to what my colleague had to say. While I was of open mind and wanted to be generous, I was disappointed that he would cast negative aspersions on the attendance of one particular Liberal member. In terms of attendance, I could mention a member from his party who has got a better record. The singling out of my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre was inappropriate.

He talked about the Liberal corporate backers. Well, I have got to tell you, my backing is from the people. He does not talk about the unions. He does not talk about the greatest credibility factor that the NDP has, and that is the lack of economic policy. He suggests that the Liberal statement to sit down and renegotiate is not an honest one. I am terribly disappointed that he should say that. I will tell you why.

I have an article here from the Financial Post dated October 28, 1991. It says of the leader of his party, and I quote:

> She now says she would try to renegotiate it first.

It refers to the Canada–U.S. trade agreement. It goes on to say:

> If elected, we will sit down with the Americans and say how can we make this thing work? If not, we would give them six months notice, she said.

Is that not renegotiation? If it is not, then tell me what it is. I am disappointed that my colleague would not have acknowledged this position on the part of his leader.

Mr. Blaikie: You can always tell when you have hit something after you throw a stone in a pack of dogs and they start to yelp.

An hon. member: Are we a pack of dogs?

Mr. Murphy: On good days.

Mr. Blaikie: On good days.

Mr. Duhamel: I tried to be generous. I tried to be gentle. I tried to ask a responsible question and the member refers to tossing a stone among a pack of dogs. I resent that kind of statement and I would ask for an immediate withdrawal, please.

Mr. Blaikie: This is a common parliamentary analogy. I am sorry if the member is so sensitive that he cannot even stand such an analogy. I have no intention of withdrawing it because it is not out of order at all. I was simply drawing an analogy.

The member talks about how disappointed he is. I am sorry, but it would have been out of order to have referred to the absence of a particular member on a specific day, i.e. today. I had no intention of doing that. I do find it odd. I am sorry if the hon. member finds it offensive that the former leader of the Liberal Party could be involved in the fight of his life in 1988 and continue to be a member of Parliament and hardly ever show up here to continue the fight of his life and this country against the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement.

I had a great deal of respect for the leader of the Liberal Party who I am talking about now, but I have to say in all honesty that I am disappointed in him, if you want to pursue the matter, the fact that he is not here to carry on that fight of his life. With respect to the member for Winnipeg South Centre, I said that with the greatest of respect. But I am trying to draw you out.

• (1040)

An hon. member: Tell us where you stand.

An hon. member: This is really bad.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I want to say that this is the first time since I have been in this House that I have risen on a point of order. I cannot sit here and see the rules of this House that I respect very much being denigrated.

An hon. member: Who is breaking the rules?

Mr. Mifflin: I am not breaking the rules. If you would listen long enough, you would hear what I have to say. You people should pay attention once in a while.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is Friday the 13th and it is early in the morning. Let us not make it a long painful day for anyone. I know where the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is going.

Mr. Mifflin: And I would like to get there, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the member is already there.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona did not mention at this time that a member was or was not present in the House. He referred to something else. Therefore, I could not according to all rules really take him up on it. I did hear him and I was hoping that he would somehow go to another subject. And I think he will.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I suggest the members of the Liberal Party read Standing Order 15, and I quote:

> Except as otherwise provided in these Standing Orders, every Member is bound to attend the service of the House unless leave of absence has been given him or her by the House.

I do not believe that the member for Vancouver Quadra has that leave.

An hon. member: Oh, oh, now you have done it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception had the floor.

Mr. Mifflin: I do thank you for allowing me to really make my point of order. I appreciate that you can read my mind and I think that is great. You are absolutely right. This is where I was going.

Madam Speaker, do we rely on Beauchesne for everything we want to do in this House? There are not enough books written to control and contain what we have to do to achieve what we are about here.

While the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona may have been within the finite rules of the House, and I will take your word for this, it does absolutely nothing to the tone of the discussion for him to zero in on one member or another hon. member, to get up on a point of order and read Beauchesne's, to quote something that is totally irrelevant to the discussion.

Madam Speaker, I plead with you to watch the tone of this discussion and at least, if nothing else, I plead for relevancy in this subject.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to come at this from a different point. I do not know all the rules of Beauchesne's, but it seems to me that it is not appropriate for a member of Parliament to stand here and slam a former Prime Minister, a man who served this House for over 30 years, a man who, by the way, put his views on free trade quite clearly on the record, and they happen to concur with the member's. Therefore, I think it is a questionable experience that somebody stoop to that level to slam someone who is not in the House.

An hon. member: Right on.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With the permission of the House, I would like us to go on with the debate, which is the motion before the House today, and try to stay within the realms of that motion. We will do a lot more for this place and for the country than by getting into personal attacks of any kind.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member for Churchill rising. I have just asked the House to please let us go on with debate.

An hon. member: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this on another matter, or was the hon. gentleman trying to put a little more oil on the fire? The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I am not trying to put oil on the fire but just to correct something. I was not quoting from Beauchesne, I was quoting from the Standing Orders.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, the Chair was aware that it was Standing Order 15. I have read the Standing Orders.

There is a minute and 45 seconds remaining in the period for questions or comments. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Winnipeg Transcona, and if I understood him correctly, he basically would like to abolish or rip up all of the various trading transactions that we have with the United States.

My problem with his approach has to do with the auto pact. This is a proven instrument of trade between both countries. I know his former leader was a strong proponent of this. I know many members of the Canadian auto workers union support this—

Mr. Blenkarn: They didn't originally, they voted against it in—

Mr. Mills: They were against, now they are for, but the main thing is now they are for it. My concern is one of responsibility. I acknowledge a thousand weaknesses in the free trade deal, and I do not think anyone in this House would ever question where I stood on the free trade agreement. My question to the member is this. Does he not think that there are some existing trade agreements with the Americans, i.e. the auto pact, that he would throw into jeopardy by an irresponsible tone or an irresponsible approach to this existing document?

Madam Deputy Speaker: A very short answer, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I did not advocate, as the member said, scrapping all agreements with the United States. I talked about the FTA and the North American free trade agreement.

The member does point out, quite rightly, that the bind that the country has been put in with respect to our relationship with the United States by this agreement, because what he is trying to do is imply that if we were to get out of these agreements, the form of American retaliation might be, for instance, the cancelling of the auto pact. I presume that is what he suggests.

This is why it was so misleading for the Prime Minister to say in 1988: "Well, it is just a commercial agreement; if we don't like it we will just get out of it".

I tried to be honest in my own remarks about the consequences of getting out of it; the consequences of it could be nasty. I said that. I tried to say that Canadians will have to make that choice. They will have to choose between the difficulty of staying in the agreement and the difficulty of being out of it. I say we choose the difficulty of being out of it. That is fair enough. I want to know what difficulty you choose.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, it is a little hard to know from the tone of the conversation so far, but this is a serious debate we are undertaking here today. The continued success of our trade performance is critical to our future prosperity as a nation. I think every Canadian from coast to coast to coast has a stake in the export success of our entrepreneurs and that is why this government from the day it took office has placed international trade at the top of its agenda.

We have pursued a strategy aimed at making Canada an international competitor worthy of the tough global economy that we have today. I emphasize "global" and I emphasize "today".

We do not live in the past, nor do we intend to. We cannot lift the drawbridge and keep the world out. We have faith in the ability of Canadian companies to compete with known rules of the game. That is really what this is about. To be successful our trade strategy must reflect the realities of today's global economy and Canada's place in it. Regretfully there is no room for romantic and fanciful delusions based on past or imagined successes.

The resolution before us today gives the illusion of promoting a global strategy, but at heart it is a council of despair. It seeks a world that simply does not exist, a world that would ignore the realities of geography, a world that would not recognize the benefits of foreign investment, a world that would tear up our trade agreements, isolate us from our principal trading partners; a world that would turn its back on the achievements of the past, as emphasized by the comments from my colleague from Mississauga, and leave us naked before the challenges of tomorrow.

This government's approach to international market development, to international trade negotiations and to international trade relations has been based on the fundamental premise that Canada is a global trading nation, no more, no less. It also recognizes that we live next door to the richest and most advanced economy on earth. Other countries would give their eye teeth to be so blessed. It is not an unmixed blessing, as we know so well, but surely it is a blessing and let us not believe otherwise.

The United States is our best customer and we are theirs. Last year alone we did $256 billion worth of business between the two countries. No other countries come close to that. It is quality business. It is not just rocks and logs but it is cars and computers. It is software and engineering contracts. It is satellites and subway cars. It is flight simulators and wing assemblies. The Japanese would love to do that much business, so would the Mexicans and the Europeans and indeed, everyone else; except it seems members opposite.

They would tear up the agreement that provides the security for trade, the agreement that furnishes the framework of rules and procedures that gives Canadians the confidence to take on tough markets, the agreement that provides the foundation for two million jobs in Canada.

Our appreciation of that agreement and the trade it represents should not be misled by focusing entirely on irritants. Such irritants are not a sign of weakness but the result of strength. They are a recognition by American interests that we are successful traders. That does not make them easier to accept. These trade disputes sting but it should at least give us some perspective on this whole issue.

Five per cent of our exports to the United States are affected by the current list of irritants. We do not like that number. We do not like the irritants but we have to reduce the number. We have to remember also that 95 per cent of the trade is flowing freely, exactly as we would like.

We are confident with respect to the irritants that right is on our side. Tearing up the agreement would place the 95 per cent at risk. How is that for a great trade strategy? Who would benefit from such a flight from reality? To compound the error of tearing up the FTA, the resolution would have Canada walk away from the NAFTA negotiations.

An hon. member: And the GATT.

Mr. Winegard: And the GATT, as my colleague says. Not only would the resolution ensure a trade war with the United States, it would tell Canada and by implication our Latin American trading partners that we are not prepared to work with them, that we are no longer interested in creating a trading future based on a framework of stable and orderly rules. Make no mistake, that is what the NAFTA negotiations are all about and that is what we would turn our back on.

The GATT world trade talks are an integral and critical element in Canada's trade strategy. It is neither an alternative to nor unrelated to the FTA or the NAFTA. They are all a concerted effort by Canada and its trading partners to create a more ordered and more predictable global trading system. Each is an effort to strengthen the rules, to improve procedures to resolve disputes and to bind nations to a common approach to the regulation of trade and investment.

For Canada, the success of these negotiations is critically important. It will help us gain and defend access to the markets of the world, including the United States and Mexico. In other words, we have not placed our eggs in a single basket, rather we are defending and promoting Canadian trade interests wherever there is an opportunity to do so.

I just came back from an OECD meeting of science and technology ministers having to do with the economy and growth. The whole meeting, with governments of every stripe, concentrated on how we can all be more prosperous, how we can all trade with each other, how we can all have economies of benefit if we have the rules of the game clearly spelled out. That is what this is all about.

Our trade with the United States is important, but so is our trade with the rest of the world.

In 1991, our trade with all of our trading partners totalled $381.6 billion; that is one-quarter of our Gross Domestic Product. Trade with countries other than the United States totalled $124.7 billion. You have to remember that merchandise exports of $34.1 billion translate into more than a million jobs for Canadians. Our merchandise trade with countries other than the United States is growing. Our global approach has been instrumental in a 5 per cent annual growth in that trade since we took office.

Those numbers are the result of Canada's multi-faceted, global trade strategy. Canadian entrepreneurs know that wherever they go they can count on the support of Canada's 1,060 trade commissioners. They know where to find them at 90 offices across the world, at headquarters and at international trade centres across Canada. They know they can rely on hundreds of agreements that Canada has negotiated to smooth their way: air agreements, double tax agreements, economic co-operation agreements, investment agreements, export financing agreements.

Canadian exporters know that they can draw on the support programs developed to assist their marketing efforts: the Program for Export Market Development (PEMD), trade fairs and missions, the Strategic Ventures Program, Going Global, CIDA Inc., the EDC and more.

There is probably not a member in this House who has not used one or more of those programs to promote trade in their own constituency. It is interesting that when it comes to their home constituencies, they want Canada to be an international trading partner and they want Canada to have these kinds of programs which promote their own constituency, but when it gets to the global enterprise, somehow or another they cannot quite manage to grasp the significance of what is being done.

The programs that I have mentioned do not cater to the multinational corporate elite, as you would have believed from listening to the comments earlier. They are for Canadian companies large and small. They are for companies that are found right across Canada; Halifax, Guelph, Gravelburg, Saskatchewan. They employ your neighbours and mine. Our programs are not just for big companies, they are for all Canadian companies.

Our strategy for trade starts at home. We will not be successful traders abroad unless we are successful competitors at home.

I have travelled across this country in the last two years, talking about what we need to do to be a competitive nation, telling the people about the use of technology and how it will help us in terms of economic growth, giving facts and figures of the difficulties as I see them and there has been a response. The whole prosperity initiative is based upon these kinds of discussions with Canadians from coast to coast. They do not want us to rip up the FTA. They want us to continue our discussions with NAFTA. They understand that Canada is a trading nation and must remain so.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the hon. minister. He will have a little more than eight minutes remaining when we resume debate.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

DELTA HOSPITAL

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, yesterday there was a collision between a British Columbia ferry and a Japanese bulk coal carrier off Roberts Bank which is located in my riding of Delta.

The 17 injured passengers were taken to Delta hospital for acute emergency care. Although the hospital only has 75 acute care beds, because it is on many major transportation links and the only hospital south of the Fraser River it has developed an excellent emergency and disaster control program.

This hospital had also handled several casualties from the fatal bus crash on Highway 99 the day before and these casualties had strained the bed situation. In spite of that they handled the emergencies very well yesterday.

I would like to commend the paramedics involved in transporting the injured as well as the administrator, the nursing staff and my former medical colleagues at the Delta hospital for a job well done in bringing good care and comfort to those injury victims. Their planning, practice and expertise has once again paid off in an excellent way.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has considerably angered Quebecers by recently suggesting that they would lose their Canadian citizenship if Quebec separates.

In the first place, ministers of the government should not speculate on what might happen as a result of any sovereignty referendum.

Second, the minister is absolutely wrong with respect to the law. At present Canadian law permits dual citizenship. One can be a Canadian and at the same time an American. One can be a Canadian and an Italian.

Furthermore, one can live for a considerable period of time in another country and still retain one's Canadian citizenship.

The only way a Canadian can lose his or her citizenship is by deliberately renouncing it. Obviously, those who vote for Quebec separation would want to do that. But those who do not will have every right to retain this important heritage. Quebecers are worried enough about the situation in their province and do not need unnecessary speculation to upset them even more.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, virtually all Canadians are understandably proud of medicare and the quality of health care which it provides on a universal basis.

Consequently, we are shocked and dismayed when American politicians, as they do on occasion, criticize medicare for what they claim to be its shortcomings.

You can imagine how surprised and angered Canadians would be, therefore, if they had had the opportunity to read the February 27, 1992 edition of The Brandon Sun and to discover that a Canadian politician speaking in Neepawa, Manitoba, in fact the leader of the Reform Party, had promised to abolish medicare as a universal program.

Perhaps the leader of the Reform Party who is the son of a Social Credit premier undoubtedly enjoyed a privileged upbringing and does not understand the importance of medicare to ordinary Canadians of all ages and particularly to seniors.

Perhaps he does not understand, therefore, that Canadians will not permit any politician or any party, including those whose roots are in the distant past to destroy medicare as we know it.

THE SENATE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I was extremely disappointed that neither the Conservative Party nor the New Democratic Party members of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, better known as the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee of which I was a member, would support the Liberal Party's request to have a strong and effective Senate by ensuring that the Senate's decisions could not be overridden or could not easily be overridden by the House of Commons. If you are going to reform the Senate, surely it must among other things, be effective.

The Liberal Party members registered their dissent on this point on page 55 of the committee report which reads:

"Liberal members—disagree with the majority recommendation concerning the powers of the Senate because of the proposed override of a Senate veto of legislation. Such an override, and it was a simple override, will undermine the effectiveness of the Senate—Therefore, the Liberal members of the committee recommend that a reformed Senate be granted an absolute veto on all bills, except for appropriation and budget bills."

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, International Women's Week is over but double discrimination continues against women of colour and immigrant women.

Domestic workers are locked into live-in jobs where they can be exploited and new policies will exclude many women of colour from coming to Canada as domestics.

Lack of professional accreditation forces many immigrant women to remain in low-paying jobs.

The Tory budget also has added another layer of hardship for these women. The $1 million cut to Canada Jobs Strategy training represents a 35 per cent cut to immigrant women who also lack child care.

Payments owing for pay equity are denied women public servants.

The Court Challenges Program which gave women of colour a chance to achieve equality rights through our courts is cancelled.

The legislated Race Relations Foundation to fight racism is indefinitely postponed.

This government has lost all respect for the rights of minorities, and especially for women of colour who are doubly jeopardized.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, my constituents continue to offer me some excellent advice and comment.

Ron Fotheringham of Bolton, Ontario writes: "We should enact a simple vocabulary change. We should remove the word 'government' from our vocabulary and substitute the word 'taxpayer' in some cases 'taxpayers representatives'. It changes all our headlines and makes one re-think concepts like, 'The federal government today contributed X-million dollars to the purchase of de Havilland'; 'Metro government calls upon the federal government for aid in covering welfare payments to refugees'; 'Your provincial government will ask the federal government for help in these tough economic times'. I have been replacing 'government' with 'taxpayer' in what I hear, read and say. The impact of this vocabulary change is truly amazing. Try it yourself for a week."

And finally, John Benitz of Belfountain, Ontario, simply sends this message: "The silent majority want a united Canada. We also want Canada to be a privilege to enter as an immigrant and not a right. We want to afford our social programs and not burden our children with our debt."

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for this opportunity to air my constituents' views.

SUSSEX, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of all hon. members to a recent survey by Chatelaine magazine which names Sussex, New Brunswick, which is located in my riding of Fundy—Royal, as being one of the top 10 towns to live in in Canada.

Sussex, considered by some to be the quintessential rural community, offers its residents the opportunity to ski the slopes of Poley Mountain, enjoy the splendour and magnificent sights of Fundy National Park on a year-long basis, and participate in the many festivals offered throughout the year.

If that were not enough to make one live in Sussex, it also enjoys a sound agricultural base, two potash mines and several food and dairy processors to maintain the 90 per cent regional employment rate.

I know that all members of this House will want to join with me in congratulating Sussex on being named one of the top 10 towns to live in.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, Canadian consumers are being ripped off by paying for pollution controls that are being damaged by the fuel additive MMT, that may also be putting the health of this nation at risk.

The average new car purchased in Canada costs $16,790. Ford Canada says newer model cars will require an additional $800 worth of emission control devices to meet the green plan's new hydrocarbon emission standards.

Yet as the United States Environmental Protection Agency states in their final notice rejecting the use of MMT in the United States in unleaded fuel for the fourth time: "Ford concluded that the data clearly show that MMT impairs to a significant degree the performance of emission control devices."

The EPA also noted:

"Toyota also submitted data indicating that the efficiency at which the catalyst was operating for the MMT-exposed components was less than that for the non-MMT exposed components."

The green plan emission standards are fraudulent as long as MMT is allowed in Canadian fuel. I call on the government to examine the U.S. EPA decision, the Ford and Toyota evidence, and to replace MMT with the environmentally friendly alternative, ethanol.

DUTY FREE SHOPS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, the Canadian land border duty free program provides a valuable source of revenue to the federal government and the border communities. It creates employment and promotes tourism and national identity through the sale of Canadian manufactured products.

• (1110)

Members of the industry, however, insist that they are unintended victims of the government's plan to levy an excise tax on all exports of Canadian tobacco products.

The purpose of the tax is to combat tobacco smuggling. However, studies have failed to make any connection between our tobacco smuggling problem and duty free shops.

The land border duty free shops account for less than 11 per cent of the export market, yet tobacco sales make up over 50 per cent of their total sales. Our duty free shops rely heavily on these sales as catch lines for travellers and tourists.

The industry is prepared to discuss and suggest proposals to relieve anxieties about cross-border shopping and smuggling. I urge the government to accept this invitation and to consult with the land border duty free industry toward a mutually acceptable solution.

WILSON NEPOOSE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Wilson Nepoose spent over five years in jail for a murder conviction based on questionable evidence.

Last year the Minister of Justice, under section 690 of the Criminal Code ordered an appeal for Wilson Nepoose. In its recent decision, the Alberta Court of Appeal overturned his conviction and ordered a new trial.

The appeal court found that the evidence presented to Wilson Nepoose's original trial was deficient. In fact, it has been suggested that the evidence indicating Wilson Nepoose's guilt was, in some cases, fabricated or coerced and in other cases the Crown withheld evidence which supported his innocence.

I call on the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to strike a full formal inquiry into the Nepoose murder investigation to find out who fabricated, coerced or withheld evidence and recommend appropriate action.

SHARE GROUPS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): It was not enough last week that our closest ally and trading partner attacked us. Now it turns out that two members of the NDP have been systematically betraying and slandering the B.C. share groups that represent our resource-based communities.

Share groups are not anti-environment. Our share groups are integral elements of the communities throughout British Columbia. They represent and try to balance the interests of all stakeholders of our forests and our environment.

The membership does include people who work in the forest industry, but they also include others, mayors, teachers, businessmen and ranchers. This is truly a grassroots organization.

Twice stabbed in the back is too much. It is one thing to receive it from the U.S., but it is quite another to have the workers of B.C. attacked by their so-called friends. The communities of Cariboo—Chilcotin will not soon forget this betrayal by the NDP members of Skeena and Comox—Alberni.

BANK RATE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, yesterday Canadians have seen the bank rate rise for the sixth time since January just because of this government's mind-boggling desire to sustain the Canadian dollar.

With its monetary policy, it is only putting off the economic recovery even further. Unless we put an end to these repeated increases in the bank rate, there will be more bankruptcies, more lay-offs and more de-industrialization.

The Liberal Party of Canada, the Canadian pulp industry, the Conseil du Patronat du Québec and the Canadian manufacturing industry, all denounce this government's irresponsible monetary policy.

I will tell the government that you don't need to destroy the economy to bolster the Canadian dollar. It should stop this nonsense immediately to put an end to this slump and put Canada back on track!

COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): For months now, members in my caucus, particularly the members for Kootenay East, Edmonton East, Winnipeg Transcona and myself have been pursuing a renewal of coal contracts between Ontario Hydro and western Canadian coal producers in order to protect Canadian jobs.

Earlier this year, Shelley Wark-Martyn, the MPP for Port Arthur and minister of revenue and I convened a meeting in Thunder Bay between Ontario's minister of energy and members of a newly formed coalition. At that meeting, the minister of energy agreed to intervene with Ontario Hydro to see if a made-in-Canada solution could be found and he did.

As we speak, Ontario Hydro is briefing harbour officials in Thunder Bay on the results of those negotiations and later today an announcement is to be made in Calgary.

I am confident that Ontario Hydro, the coal companies, the transporters and handlers have found a way to keep people working to reduce Hydro's costs and to send a clear signal that buying Canadian is a win-win situation. My congratulations to all concerned.

CATHERINE ANNE FRASER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Madam Speaker, there were five Alberta women who spearheaded the famous Persons case and the Government of Alberta was the first province to appoint a cabinet minister who was a woman in the Commonwealth. During this International Women's Week it is excellent news to receive the appointment of Madam Justice Catherine Anne Fraser as Chief Justice of Alberta and Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal for the Northwest Territories.

This appointment is not made because Madam Justice Fraser is a woman. She is a jurist of considerable merit, born of Ukrainian and Arab heritage in New Brunswick, a resident of Alberta for most of her life. She is a graduate of the University of Alberta and the University of London. She was admitted to the bar of Alberta in 1971, appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1983, appointed to the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta in 1989 and to the Court of Appeal of Alberta in March 1991.

I am sure all members of the House join me in congratulating Madam Justice Catherine Anne Fraser, the new Chief Justice of Alberta.

COMMENTS BY MORDECAI RICHLER

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I join the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie who condemned yesterday the racist remarks by Mr. Mordecai Richler concerning the French Canadian people of Quebec.

As well I am shocked that the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship did not have the decency to respond to the question posed by the hon. member for Shefford—

Mr. Cooper: Order, order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, yesterday in this House there was a debate on the Liberal motion that Canada should take immediate steps to extend functional jurisdiction for fishing to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

The purpose of the motion was to save an essential national industry and valued way of life for many rural Canadians, in particular Atlantic Canadians, from pillaging of Canada's transboundary fish stocks off the east coast.

There were 18 speakers from British Columbia to Newfoundland and much debate on both sides of the House. The government argued that it wanted to do more of the same, more diplomatic action. The opposition argued more of the same is not working. The motion unfortunately was defeated 90 to 51.

Also, yesterday, Canada's ambassador for fishing conservation ended yet another diplomatic shuttle across Europe without any sign whatsoever that the European Community will curb illegal overfishing off Newfoundland.

Clearly the government's gentle strategy is not working and a concerted escalation in effort is required to send a message to the world that Canada will stand by its people dependent on an industry that is being irretrievably crippled by foreigners.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Canadian airline industry is going through some of the roughest times in its history.

In response to the minister's plans to privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport, the president of the Air Transport Association of Canada said this, and I quote: "We want to minimize our costs to be able to compete with U.S. airlines, but we never asked the minister to renovate the terminals and see no need for it."

Is the minister serious when he talks about making the Canadian airline industry more competitive while at the same time increasing its costs due to privatization?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member got the idea that their costs will go up. We are well aware of the financial situation the airlines are in. We are working on it, through bilateral discussions with the U.S., among others things, in the hope of increasing traffic. But renovating terminals 1 and 2 is part of the plan to get ready to respond, when the time comes, to the increase in traffic expected for 1997–98.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, the minister knows very well that the numbers come from the association and the airlines themselves.

Yesterday the minister agreed that the environmental assessment with respect to runway expansion at Pearson would not be available until August at the earliest. The minister also acknowledged that the problems some developers may face in responding within the 90–day time limit to the request for proposals may require him to extend the time limit if they have paid a deposit and shown that they were truly interested. This announcement reeks of unexplained, unwarranted haste.

Why does the minister not remove the foul odour of political favouritism and opportunism from the timing of the announcement of this project and do what Mr. Sinclair from the airline association suggested and simply wait until 1993 when we see how the airline industry shakes down?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, Mr. Sinclair is a past assistant deputy minister in the Department of Transport. He is no longer occupying that position and does not make decisions for Transport Canada.

We have taken notice of his objection. We understand the objection of the airline industry because it is thinking about the bottom line of the next six months. We are thinking about the bottom line for the airline industry in five or six years' time.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, what is not clear is who is making the decisions for Transport Canada on this issue.

What is happening here is that the minister has put forward an announcement that is unjustified by the numbers that he announced yesterday. It contradicts what he has in his own estimates. He has been unable to justify the timing, given the fact that the environmental assessment is still under way.

Why is the minister prepared to sacrifice a fair and open process in order to ensure that he has a photo opportunity for the Prime Minister standing with a shovel just in time for the next election?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not know if the member is referring to the same insinuation professed in this room yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. If so, I would like to remind him that that particular gentleman is the father–in–law of one of his own colleagues from Willowdale.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport predicts record growth to capacity within six years at Pearson airport. When asked how much revenue that will generate, the minister says: "I don't know". When asked how much it would cost the government to renovate terminals 1 and 2, the minister's response is: "I don't know".

Given that Pearson airport makes money, given that private developers are champing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: There has been a long preamble. Will the hon. member come to a question?

Mr. Keyes: My question is, Madam Speaker: Given that private developers are champing at the bit to get a lease arrangement with this government, what do they know that we do not know? What information has the minister given them that he will not provide for this House?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am sure that you will not allow me the time necessary to tell the hon. member all that he does not know.

On the other hand, we are proceeding on this because we think it is the necessary thing to do, to be able to keep Pearson airport as the main, well functioning airport in Canada. At the same time I remind the member that in a time where the economy is at a slow pace the creation of 3,200 jobs in the Toronto area is a very good gesture.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, the stakeholders, the airlines and other levels of government are all saying the same thing. They agree that this is the wrong move at the wrong time.

Will the minister put the brakes on his request for proposals so that the transport committee can do what is in the best interest of the travelling public in this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is very interesting because on Monday night in Toronto, at the request of the Ontario government, we had a meeting with the minister of transport of Ontario, the minister of the environment of Ontario and four or five mayors from the area.

A document was deposited with us at that time which says that three alternatives for the future ownership and operation of terminal 2 have been analysed. They are continued Transport Canada ownership, transfer to the private sector, or transfer to the SCOAA. Nowhere in this document is there any indication that the Ontario government is against the proposals.

Some hon. members: Table it.

Mr. Corbeil: I will certainly table it with very great pleasure. The only concern of the Ontario government was that it would like to form an LAA, on the board of which would sit the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government. When the devolution of airport policy was adopted by this government, it said very clearly that it would not transfer airports to other levels of government.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, since the budget came out last month, reports have shown our national income in decline, our interest rates rising, unemployment up yet further, and today comes more devastating news with a massive 2.4 per cent decrease in manufacturing. This government is turning Canadian factories into ghost towns.

Will the government recognize that we are still in recession? Will it turn its budget policy in an opposite direction, start getting people back to work in this country and put the manufacturing industry ahead instead of back?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I will recognize without difficulty that the manufacturing industry is indeed going through a very worrisome period. I think everybody agrees with that.

We all know that the national demand is very weak. Foreign demand is very weak. That is why in our last budget we came forward with very precise measures, particularly to help the manufacturing industry, and I hope the hon. member realizes that.

What this situation commands us to do is to make the right decisions, to do everything we can as a government to maintain low interest rates because manufacturers need to be able to invest. They must be able to buy the machinery they need. These are measures we have taken in our budget.

As for interest rates, the hon. member knows that we also have to manage the debt. Every Thursday we put on auction a certain number of money bills or government certificates and people either buy or do not buy them. We are living in a very open market and the interest rates have to fluctuate according to that market.

As a government we do everything we can to try to keep them as low as possible and they are at a record low over the last—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We must go on. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, in fact to give manufacturing incentives to invest at a time when the minister admits that there is not enough demand out there for manufacturing is like pushing on a string. It does not do anything.

Therefore I say to the minister: there is nothing that could hurt our manufacturing industry more than a North American trade deal. Yet the United States now says a deal could be just weeks away. On Monday the Prime Minister attacked our party for not wanting to help a Third World country like Mexico with this deal.

How can the government justify continuing in these negotiations for a free trade deal in North America now that GATT has attacked such a free trade deal as having far-reaching, adverse effects on poorer countries throughout the world?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will recognize this government has done everything it can to help lower the cost of Canadian products in our last budget through the GST reform.

We had this very stupid situation where one of the largest exporting countries in the world was the only one penalizing its own manufacturers. We have done our share and we continue to do it by making low cost capital available.

We have interest rates that have gone down, thanks to the good management of the government. What does he suggest we do? Should we borrow more money and send out the signal that we do not intend to keep our house in order by sending interest rates flying again?

We are not going to do that, nor are we going to raise taxes in order to spend money we do not have.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, in fact this government for the past six weeks has seen interest rates pushed up in this country. For it to claim that interest rates are declining, thanks to its policy, is sheer nonsense. It just does not meet up with the facts at all.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary on trans-border shopping in the United States, which has now increased by 30 per cent in Quebec.

• (1130)

Will this government finally realize that its economic strategy is worthless and merely provides an incentive for Quebecers and other Canadians to go and invest their money in the U.S. economy instead of in Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the United States is also exposed to tremendous competitive pressures, which are increasing steadily. An extremely important point is that Canada, more than any other country in the world, depends on its external trade. Twenty-five per cent of what we build, produce or grow is exported, most of it to the United States.

Previously, our recourse, other than complying with U.S. demands, was very limited. However, thanks to the free trade agreement we now have a tribunal, and we have Canadians sitting on that tribunal, where we can bring these problems.

Two-way trade between Canada and the U.S. is worth hundreds of billions of dollars. When problems arise in certain sectors, we try to deal with them. We have expressed our views very firmly. We intend to defend our interests, and I am sure we will win our case.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Finance. Small businesses are genuine creators of durable jobs. However, they are now burdened with real interest rates almost six times as high as those charged their competitors in the United States.

How does the minister expect our small businesses to be competitive when they have this incredible burden to deal with?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member's analysis when he refers to the importance of small business. It is a sector with tremendous potential, which is indispensable to our economy.

Unfortunately the hon. member talks about interest rates as if the government could raise or lower them by merely pressing a button. They are higher than in the United States, and so we should lower them? I wish he would explain how a government could do that. And how the Liberal government, when it was in power, managed to let interest rates rise 22 per cent. Couldn't it press a button?

We cannot change the market, but by managing wisely, governments can inspire confidence. Since May 1990, interest rates have gone down 625 basis points. We are doing our share, but we cannot ask people to buy our bonds at 2 per cent, because they won't. Interest rates are set by the market.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, that kind of response, talking about nominal interest rates when the question is about real interest rates, does very little to further the economic debate in this country or the credibility of this House or the minister.

Our too high dollar and our too high real interest rates have led to a weakened economy. That weakened economy has led to even higher real interest rates, almost six times higher than the real interest rates in the United States, in order to support wrongly an over-valued Canadian dollar.

The government is caught in a vicious circle of its own making and those who are suffering from it are hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians across the land. This vicious circle must be broken. There is only one way for that to happen and that is to bring Canadian real interest rates into line with U.S. real interest rates.

The question is why will the government not do it?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I wish that someday the hon. member would explain how much leeway a government has to play around with interest rates this way.

The hon. member refers to interest rates and to our high dollar as one of the main reasons why we have this situation. In fact, I disagree with his analysis, because interest rates are much lower now, since we brought them down 625 basis points. The dollar is also going down, but we cannot intervene artificially in these areas.

The hon. member must know that the debt we inherited puts a tremendous obligation on us. We have to finance the debt year after year. People won't lend us the money we need at the rate we want but at the rate they want to charge us, because of international competition. We are not the only ones in the market. We try to get the best rate, like any good manager would. We managed to bring interest rates and the dollar down. We have done our share.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister for International Trade. I just finished speaking to several well established wholesale lumber dealers in the city of Winnipeg. I think they speak for the same constituency right across Canada. They are being forced out of business by the dithering of this government on the softwood lumber issue. Not only must they pay 14.5 per cent additional costs on the lumber itself, but they now must pay additional costs on transport, loading, distribution, paper work resulting in a 25 per cent increase in costs. They have no choice but to move south.

I want to ask this question. It is the same question we have been asking every day this week. Why will the government not invoke the Employment Support Act which gives this government the authority to help companies affected by unfair trade practices by foreign countries? Why will it not try to help keep Canadian jobs here? What is it afraid of this time?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, the issue my hon. friend refers to has to do with a preliminary ruling by the commerce department in the United States resulting from the termination of the memorandum of understanding.

My friend is quite correct. It is unfair and every measure is being taken to correct the issue. He is also right in saying the value added costs are captured in this new ruling. We have protested that to the United States and, of course, we are appealing the ruling at every step. As he knows, we are very much relying on article 19 of the free trade agreement which allows us access to an independent binding dispute mechanism which is of a judicial nature and there is no doubt that we will be vindicated in all questions of this issue.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the reality is that by the time the government gets around to all of this finagling under the free trade deal, all those companies will be located south of the border and we will have lost those jobs. They need help now.

Mr. Peterson: Exactly.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister or perhaps the acting minister of trade, whomever, about another mess that we are getting ourselves into on the trade front.

We have this morning a statement by Carla Hills, the U.S. trade negotiator, that the North American free trade deal will be signed within a matter of weeks. At the same time, a GATT study released yesterday said to enact the deal will have adverse impact on world trade. I want to ask somebody in the government how we can get into this deal without Canadians even knowing what the conditions are, what the impact will be, how it will affect us and, by signing the deal, is this really Canada saying we are giving up on the international trading system?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows better than that. He knows very well that Canada's main trading position is that we want to work with the GATT, the international trading operation. He also knows that we have benefited from the free trade agreement with the United States. He also knows that we will benefit from a free trade agreement with the whole of North America. That is exactly what the policy of this government is. We rely on trade for our economic growth. We intend to rely on trade and we intend to promote trade at every opportunity.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): My question is for the Minister of Forestry. The news in our forest sector is just getting worse and worse by the day. Yesterday GATT issued a report denouncing U.S. trade policies. Now we have learned that the commerce department decision from last Friday on softwood lumber is also going to apply to the value added by service businesses in Canada to their United States exports. Can the minister tell this House specifically what measures the cabinet has met to discuss this week on this issue? What kind of remedies can he offer to these manufacturing businesses? Will he not agree that this attack goes beyond simply our softwood lumber exports? It is an attack on the manufacturing and semi-manufacturing industry in Canada.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, we have already said that the decision is flawed in many different ways. It is peculiar in the sense that it would be the first time that a foreign jurisdiction has brought in a bonding requirement together with a preliminary decision on a countervail duty action. We have protested this measure at the highest levels. Certainly the fact that value-added products are captured with this duty is unacceptable. We have told the department of commerce that. We are appealing the decision. We have appealed the decision to GATT. A GATT panel has been established and will be ruling in June. As I said, we are very confident that at the end we will be vindicated.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, when is the government going to realize that this is not a banana republic? We do not take orders from Washington, D.C. We run our forest policies our own way.

The Prime Minister was sabre rattling last weekend and in the last few days about how he is going to fight this decision. The cabinet was presumed to have met to review this matter. The minister did not tell the House anything new today in Question Period on this matter.

Can the minister tell this House what specific measures this government is going to take to protect our forest industry and to now protect our manufacturing industries that are suffering under this unwarranted attack from Washington, D.C.?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, all is not doom and gloom. Fortunately, because of a very significant turnaround in the economy in the United States, prices for the kind of products my friend is talking about have increased by 30 per cent since the beginning of the year. That gives us small comfort, of course, in the sense that the United States has imposed a 15 per cent duty on our lumber exports.

We are not sitting by and letting this happen. Cabinet has met. We have protested the measure at the highest levels. We have appealed the measures to two tribunals. It is a preliminary hearing and one ought not to be spending the time of the House to alarm everyone.

My hon. friend comes from Prince George. He knows that a lumber company usually sets up and manufactures where the trees are. They just do not pack up tomorrow because they cannot take the trees with them. We will have to keep our cool and rely on the orders and rules that have been established under the free trade agreement and under GATT.

There is no doubt that we will be vindicated on both accounts.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

There is a lot of pubic concern about the possibility of the Yarmouth search and rescue helicopter being cancelled on March 31 of this year. Premier Cameron has said it was a top priority with him. I am wondering if the Acting Prime Minister knows whether the Prime Minister and Premier Cameron have had an opportunity to talk about such an important matter as it relates to search and rescue this week while at the conference?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the minister of fisheries who is responsible for this portfolio, as my hon. friend knows, the department had established a base at Yarmouth and built a hangar at the facility. The $2 million a year contract is near its expiry date. The matter is under review. It has, of course, safety implications and the involvement of other departments. A decision will be made shortly.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I would just like to say the question was whether or not the premier had brought it up with the Prime Minister.

I hope the minister is telling the House that since we are in the middle of the month, the decision will be made immediately before the March 31 deadline when we have so much concern in the area about this. I do not see why a decision cannot be given today if it is so imminent.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, the concerns in the area will of course influence the decision. It will be made very soon.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister of fisheries, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week the DFO Chief of Conservation and Protection said in relation to overfishing in the snow crab fishery that "the unfortunate part is we do not have the acceptable resources to monitor the fishing".

Therefore, will the minister commit the necessary resources to properly manage the fishery in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, knowing the minister of fisheries, his answer would obviously be in the affirmative. I will pass the hon. member's concern on to him.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Fishermen in my riding want access to a larger snow crab fishery. Why will the minister not eliminate the artificial zone differences in the gulf and allow more Island fishermen to participate in the snow crab fishery?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, one of the reasons there are no more licences for snow crab is because there are not enough snow crab for the number of fishermen who would like to get into that particular industry.

Nevertheless I will pass on the hon. member's question to the minister of fisheries.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday there was a collision between a B.C. ferry and a bulk coal carrier out of Roberts Bank. This is the second collision by a B.C. ferry in the last five weeks. Many people are wondering what the problem is.

Can the minister assure us that there will be a careful examination and investigation of the causes of these collisions. Will they examine the structure of the ferries themselves? Is there some problem in the navigation equipment or is it in the operation?

Can he reassure the people in British Columbia, and those who are on the ferries, that everything will be done to prevent further collisions with injuries and loss of life, which fortunately did not occur on these two occasions?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we have been informed of these two incidents. We regret very much their occurrences. As the member just mentioned, we were very fortunate that there was no loss of life.

The Transportation Safety Board is presently investigating these two incidents. The reason and purpose for their investigation is precisely to accomplish what the member is seeking.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport.

On March 6 of this year, Bernie Wiens, the provincial minister of transport from Saskatchewan wrote a very pro-Churchill letter to the minister. In that letter he proposed a meeting of those parties that are very essential to the operation of the port, including the Canada Wheat Board, CN, the port itself, the province of Manitoba, along with the federal government.

Would the Minister of Transport be willing to support such a meeting and make the arrangements to have it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have responded previously to a request for meetings from the various people involved in the port of Churchill. At the last meeting, we indicated that we were still examining the different components so that the port of Churchill could remain open if at all possible.

We have already indicated that next season the port will be operative. I can assure the member that as soon as we have the necessary information to move a step forward we will be happy to get this meeting organized.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the minister is correct, there have been meetings. I am very happy that he had a meeting with myself and other representatives in favour of the port of Churchill.

At that time, we asked for a moratorium on false statements coming from government officials and others with regard to the port of Churchill.

In light of the grains and oilseeds minister's remarks last week that a Brazilian ship struck an iceberg in the Hudson Bay area and welders had to be sent up there and the Brazilians were no longer going to use the port of Churchill, will the Minister of Transport inform the minister of grains and oilseeds that the Canadian Coast Guard said: "There was no such incident. The only incident of that type was in the Gulf of St. Lawrence."

Can we ask the minister of grains and oilseeds to stop making false statements on Churchill?

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, notice has been given of this question and I understand the Associate Minister of Employment and Immigration will respond.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has given an exclusion order to an Eritrean refugee claimant Mrs. Mebrahtu and her three children aged 10, 6 and 4. They are to appear at the Rainbow Bridge at 9.30 a.m. Monday, March 16, bags in hand to be escorted to God knows where. A dreadful history causes this family to be husbandless and fatherless. Now Canadian government action renders them homeless and hopeless.

• (1150)

Surely this government can show some compassion and on humanitarian grounds reverse its decision and grant this single mother and three small children refugee status in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I would first like to thank the hon. member for Northumberland for giving me prior notice of the question she wanted to ask.

I am sure that she will understand that I cannot comment on a particular case here in the House of Commons. I know that our colleague is familiar with the refugee determination process, which is generous and allows Canada to protect those who need our help.

That being said, the decision on the question before us was made by independent decision-makers, who applied the Geneva Convention. Of course for every decision, humanitarian considerations and criteria are evaluated, as they were in the case referred to us in this House. But unfortunately, this request was deemed not to comply with the terms of refugee status under the Geneva Convention, I am sorry to say.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the Mebrahtu family has been in this country for over a year. The children have settled into school and some normalcy. Our inefficient system of refugee assessment has increased the trauma of their present flight.

If the government refuses once again to show compassion to Mrs. Mebrahtu, what advice will it give to this homeless, hopeless woman as she and her three small children walk across the Rainbow Bridge on Monday morning?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, it may be necessary to recall that the political situation in Ethiopia has improved and that of course decisions are always made in accordance with the Geneva Convention.

We should also remember in this House that the refugee determination system must not be considered a shortcut to immigrate to Canada. The decisions were made by independent officials and humanitarian considerations and criteria were also assessed.

BEEF INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister knows that there is a new beef grading system about to be introduced, including an ungraded standard. However, there are no requirements for retailers to indicate grade standards on beef at the meat counter.

The consumer and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association want and Canadian consumers deserve to know what they are buying. Why will the government not require and enforce grading standards to be signed and product to be labelled in the meat counter?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I recognize the desire of the hon. member and the groups he has mentioned. Unfortunately, he would be better to put that question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has that responsibility.

SUBSIDIES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, press reports today indicate that the government has finally completed a study on U.S. subsidies, many of them hidden, to American agriculture producers. In only seven states they amount to $12.2 billion. It is interesting that the government has negotiated the FTA during the last six years and is now negotiating at the GATT.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture why the government has failed to have this critical information available on U.S. subsidies to agriculture producers for the GATT negotiations until the 11th hour. It was almost too late. Many thousands of farmers are depending on these negotiations for their very livelihood. Why has the government failed to have this information available for these critical negotiations.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is mistaken that the government or the industry was not aware of the subsidies that had been identified in the report. The government was certainly aware of the federal U.S. subsidies identified in that report. The government was aware of some of the state subsidies in those seven states. The report identified additional subsidies or programs. I think it would be unfair to call all of them subsidies, but some are programs that assist agriculture in those seven states, some of which were not known to the government at that time. Much more work would have to be done to identify whether those programs are subsidies or legitimate programs, such as we use in Canada, to support agriculture.

HOUSING

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. Last December 17 the minister responsible for CMHC in a press release promised $6.1 million for the co-op housing program. His credibility certainly is ruined by the recent budget.

Is the minister aware that budget cuts which arbitrarily eliminated co-op housing mean that well over 6,000 families on waiting lists in Vancouver now have no hope of housing? What does he say to city councils and housing groups right across Canada that are outraged at this betrayal?

An hon. member: He doesn't care.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I will give the benefit of the doubt and assume that the member's true interests are really those people in need, the people that we are targeting our housing programs for.

There are over 650,000 people in need in the country who receive housing assistance. For the next five years we have allocated $2 million a year for social housing. This totals $10 million. That is not shabby treatment, considering we are in a serious restraint mode.

If your interests are in an organization, that is one thing. Our interest is in servicing the needs of the people who have targeted needs.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, that statement is outrageous. It shows that this acting minister knows nothing about co-op housing and the needs of people who need housing. I am ashamed of him.

In Vancouver, I would like to tell this member, the homelessness, the high rents and a whole influx of newcomers creates an excessive demand for affordable housing. I would like to say that part of the former Expo lands were promised for co-op and social housing creating in a mixed community, the best way to develop housing for those in need.

Will the minister explain how this much needed affordable housing can be built on Expo lands in Vancouver now that federal assistance has been wiped out for housing?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, federal assistance has not been wiped out. We continue to provide support for the 14,800 units of co-op housing now as well as the people who are currently living in 650,000 units of social housing.

We will be providing 28,000 new social housing units this year. It is our intention to help those in need, those who are targeted with a true need, not every program that wants housing.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I want to follow up a question asked the Acting Prime Minister by the member for Winnipeg South Centre. Softwoods are under siege right now by the Americans and we are losing jobs daily. A lot of those jobs are going south.

Will the Acting Prime Minister not act now and use the authority that he has under the Employment Support Act to protect these jobs? It is easier to keep them than to get them back after they have gone away.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as I said in a response to an earlier question, the industry of which my hon. friend speaks—he is probably not as familiar with it as I would be—usually works around the resource. You do not build a lumber mill or a manufacturing plant that depends on trees some place where there are not any trees. Therefore, the fear of everybody packing up to move to the United States is not well founded.

I told his hon. friend that we are dealing with this issue at the highest level; that we are dealing with a preliminary decision and that we are dealing with a process that will finish in July. The drastic measures that he is suggesting simply do not work in this particular situation.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, you do not have to be an expert to know the headlines, "Jobs axed over U.S. duty", "Jobs heading south". We cannot wait for this process to begin next summer.

My supplementary question is the following. On Wednesday, when asked about the Honda dispute, the trade minister said: "Chapter 19 of the FTA is a binding dispute mechanism that is the final stage".

In the absence of the trade minister, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister to tell our trade minister two things. First of all, to read the free trade agreement and second, to ask him to recognize that chapter 19 does not deal with the Honda dispute. The minister may wish it would, but it does not under the deal that was cut with the Americans.

Point of Order

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): The hon. member knows very well that Canada is doing everything it possibly can with respect to this Honda dispute. Every minister, every department of government, is making its opposition known to every position in the United States. We are quite convinced that on the Honda dispute, we are in the right and we will win. The Americans may not like that language of win/lose, but we use it because we are confident we will win this dispute.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I appreciate your indulgence.

Yesterday we spoke in the House on the motion to extend functional jurisdiction for fishing to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. The government's response essentially was: "We will continue to do more of the same with diplomatic action".

Madam Speaker, in response to this diplomatic action, I notice in the news this morning there was an indication that Mr. Randolph Gherson, who is Canada's ambassador for fisheries conservation, ended a diplomatic shuttle across Europe yesterday as we were in this House talking with few signs that the European Community will do anything to curb their overfishing. In particular, British and Danish officials said they needed more time. The Spanish and the Portuguese said that they were not ready to accept Canada's position.

Can I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what she now plans to do to stand by a people who are dependent on an industry that has been wounded and irretrievably crippled by foreigners?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday in the debate in the House, one of the things that has happened as a result of this trip is that the scientific data which we have presented quite openly and with all the facts is fairly long and fairly complex.

When the Portuguese and the Spanish governments were presented with the data, even though the initial response was very unwelcoming, they were quite shaken by what they saw, but they do want time to examine it.

I consider this a positive development. I do not know how long it will take them to examine it. I will be discussing this with the European Commission again within the next two weeks. The fact that they have the data and are looking at it and taking it seriously is exactly what we want them to do right now. We want them to move on it quickly.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, after I asked my second question in the House of the Minister of Transport, there was no answer.

I recognize that there is no requirement for the minister to answer a question, however, I would like permission of the House, if the minister is not willing to do it, to table the document from the Canadian Coast Guard which indicates that there was no Brazilian ship which encountered an iceberg in 1989, 1990, 1991. The minister of grains and oilseeds is obviously incorrect. The only Brazilian ship that had any damage as a result of icebergs was in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

I wish to have unanimous consent of the House to table this document.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member wishes to table the document. Is there consent?

Mr. Andre: I have no problem with the tabling of the document. I regret that he was not interrupted from that bogus debate point that he got into the record, but he can now table the document obviously.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, on a similar point of order, the Minister of Transport earlier today offered to table a document. Can I get his assurance that it will in fact be tabled as he has promised during Question Period and as, of course, the Standing Orders require him today anyway?

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

BROADCAST OF PROCEEDINGS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be empowered to have televised and radio broadcasting of its meetings of Monday, March 30, 1992, according to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the House of Commons.
> That, notwithstanding the report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business concurred in by the House on October 20, 1989 a replay of the proceedings be permitted on Sunday, April 5, 1992 at 3 p.m.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. the parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. The hon. member for Churchill.

PETITIONS

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House today a petition signed by residents of my riding, Ottawa Centre, and surrounding areas in the Ottawa region.

These people ask Parliament to urge the government to correct the injustice caused by high gasoline prices in the Ottawa—Carleton region.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition signed by some 28 people from my constituency and also from London, who are in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers in deploring the apparent increase in crimes of violence, and calling for appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act.

• (1210)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 500 constituents of mine. These were gathered by Diane Lea of Elliot Lake and concern the Nina de Villiers case.

This petition calls on the government to take action to improve the bail and the other parole laws in this country, including sentencing and possession of firearms laws to ensure that we protect our society so that needless violent crimes like the murder of Nina de Villiers last summer will cease in this country and we will have a more safe and secure society.

TAXATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present under Standing Order 36 a petition containing over 1,000 names from many communities on the lower mainland. The petitioners are concerned about the inequality of taxation with regard to the family.

They are asking that Parliament amend the Income Tax Act so that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need and irrespective of child care choice. I think they recognize that some of this has already been done but they are looking for further changes as well.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have here petitions signed by many people in my riding concerning the murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991. This murder brought out serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. For these reasons, the petitioners ask Parliament to recognize that violent crimes against persons are serious and abhorred by society and to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to stand here with a petition from residents of Canada who wish to present a grievance to this House with the hope that the government will be able to provide some remedial action. They say: "Whereas, as Canadians we are fortunate to live in a multicultural society and we are committed to traditional humanitarian principles and abhor human rights violations".

They are asking that Canadians join in commemoration this Sabbath of remembrance for our oppressed people, the Jews, particularly the 4,500 living in Syria, and who are denied all civil liberties. They have no voting rights. They cannot be candidates in elections. They are banned from government employment and, whereas Amnesty International has reported that there are Syrian Jews who have been imprisoned without informing families and without defence or trial and that these people are beaten, tortured and sometimes murdered, Syrian Jews being denied the right to emigrate—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do apologize for interrupting but the hon. member knows that no matter how good the cause is, presenting a petition should not turn into a speech. Please conclude.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I was reading what the petitioners had to say. I will terminate it there. I thank you for your guidance but these petitioners pray that on Shabbat Zachor that Parliament will call upon Syria to lift all these repressive restrictions and permit members of the Jewish community to emigrate freely in accordance with the United Nations' own human bill of rights, Article 13, to which Syria is a signatory.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of residents of the city of Winnipeg. This petition was collected through the work of Doug Martindale, one of the MLAs in the city. It is with regard to the Canada Post Corporation decision to close Empire Drugs at 801 Selkirk Avenue. This drugstore has provided convenient hours for residents, many of whom are of ethnic background, many of whom are seniors who do not speak English.

They have provided an excellent service to the people in that region. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to do all within its mandate to gain reconsideration of the decision of Canada Post Corporation to discontinue postal services at this location.

HOUSING

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to present two petitions on two issues.

The first petition is on behalf of many petitioners who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit Co-operative Housing Program and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They mainly live in my constituency on Burrows Avenue, Tyndall and Dickens Drive. They are concerned that the current constitutional proposals could transfer jurisdiction over housing to the provinces without compensation, including the responsibility for non-profit co-op housing which is a program that provides thousands of Canadian families with quality affordable shelter, and that the provinces would be unable to wholly support this program.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the second petition relates to the recent government immigration directive.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to rescind this new directive, acknowledge the contribution of past, present and future foreign domestic workers to Canada's social and economic well-being, restore our Canadian values of tolerance and humanitarianism and preserve Canada's international esteem.

The petitioners are concerned that the new directive is insensitive to the needs of Canadian employers, callously disregards the needs of the women of the world and contradicts a fundamental principle of Canada's long-standing, non-discriminatory immigration policy.

SRI LANKA

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to be able to present a petition from the people of Manitoba, many of whom are constituents, for the people of the north and east of Sri Lanka who live in fear and apprehension without any hope of peace because of an economic blockade placed by the Government of Sri Lanka. This blockade has led to severe shortages of food, medicine and fuel and only a fraction of the relief assistance is going to the affected population. The current policy of the Government of Sri Lanka is to find a military solution.

The petitioners ask the government to intervene to stop the flagrant violations of human rights and to ensure basic essentials such as food and medicine and fuel.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. One is from a number of people in Newfoundland and Toronto. It concerns the low-level flights, mainly over Labrador. They ask this House to call upon the government to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Inuit, Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training and to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and of their livelihood and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, my second petition is from a number of Canadians living in British Columbia and Cooper Creek, Argenta, Kaslo, Creston, and Salsbury Creek, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, also in Ontario, Bond Head, Etobicoke, Scarborough. Eastminster, London, Watford, Willowdale, Richmond Hill, Barry and Mississauga.

The undersigned call upon Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation, and to allow these people to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

UKRAINE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions, all the same, from constituents in Edmonton Southeast with respect to Canada–Ukraine relations. They all petition the House to have full diplomatic relations with the government and the people of Ukraine immediately.

I appreciate, Madam Speaker, you are probably thinking that this has already happened and it has been somewhat superseded by events, but I would like to file the petitions nonetheless.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from a number of fishermen and others from Murray River, Montague and Sturgeon who depend upon the facilities provided by small craft harbours, and whereas these facilities are deteriorating or are in a condemned state, they call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that all necessary maintenance and repairs be made to all small craft harbour facilities in Prince Edward Island.

JUSTICE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by people from my riding in the Thorold, St. Catharines and Welland area with regard to criminal justice in this country. It seems that the risk to society posed by the early release of a violent offender is of secondary consideration to the rights of the individual criminal.

• (1220)

I think we are putting the cart before the horse. Many of the people in my vicinity are very much taken up with this. We feel that the justice system does not adequately reflect the views of the society in which we live.

SYRIA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Ontario asking that the Syrian government amend its ways, that it allow Syrian Jewry their fundamental rights under the UN Declaration on Human Rights for a right to emigrate.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I have petitions signed by residents of my riding and certified correct under Standing Order 36, wherein the petitioners show that the government had promised to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for three years and state that the recent cumulative increases to UI premiums are unfair and insensitive to small businesses during difficult economic times, that contributions to the UI fund have been increased more than 50 per cent since 1989.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request that the government immediately act to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for both employers and employees for no less than one year.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all questions stand.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to raise the fact that I have a question on this week's Order Paper, No. 146. It dates back to October 28. As you are aware, I had planned initially to get up under the relevant Standing Order to request that I now get an answer. I did not put the 45-day caveat to the question but I would plead with my friend, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the House leader of the government. It does concern a program in 1990-91, the Atlantic Catch Failure Program. I want some figures.

I would humbly request that since it is now three times over the normal 45-day period, if I could have some consideration and perhaps this thing could be rushed along and I could get an answer in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. I did not hear the number of his question.

Mr. Mifflin: It was No. 146.

Mr. Cooper: No. 146. I can advise him that there is work in progress on that. I should have an answer for him fairly soon. I certainly will do all in my power to speed that answer for him so that we can get the information he so rightly requests.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie (p. 8169).

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are eight minutes remaining for the hon. Minister of Science.

An hon. member: More.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I am delighted with my colleague opposite. I thought he said "more". He wants to give me more time and I would be delighted to take it.

As we were finishing the morning, I was saying that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the negotiations with Mexico and the United States and the GATT negotiations in Geneva are all part of a strategy aimed at increasing our participation in global markets and making us more competitive and thus more prosperous.

This trade component of the government's program is matched by complementarity in domestic initiatives. Our efforts to reduce the deficit, to promote price stability, to lessen the regulatory burden, to privatize Crown corporations, to encourage retraining, to upgrade skills, to modernize industry and to increase value added components in the economy, all of these seek to make Canada a more rewarding place in which to invest. It is investment by private entrepreneurs, Canadian and foreign, that will create the jobs of the future; good jobs, paying jobs, jobs with a future. From the fur trade to free trade, trade has been the vocation of Canada.

Today, Canadians enjoy an unprecedented level of prosperity as a result of our historically strong trade performance. Our success in buying and selling on the world market has made us a major contributor to and beneficiary of the global economy. Exports have been one of the main engines of growth and job creation in the Canadian economy and imports have greatly enriched the quality of our lives.

Many of the products of our lakes, forests, fields and mines were developed for export to the markets of Europe, Asia and the United States. Canada's evolution from colony to nation was indelibly shaped by our experience as world traders.

The approach that worked then is not necessarily the approach that will work today. Just as industries need to adapt, so do governments. We must be informed by our past success, but not be shackled by it. The trading world of the sixties and the seventies, and it appears clear that the proposer of this resolution wants us to go back to those days, is not the trading world of today. Today we face, whether one likes it or not, a globalized trading economy.

Trade was the engine of growth. Now it is investment and technology. Canada can benefit from these new circumstances. We do not have to be afraid of them. We have many strengths. We are the seventh largest economy in the OECD. It was these changing economic circumstances which disposed us to take the road to free trade at the beginning of our mandate. These circumstances have, if anything, become more compelling.

In 1985 we were seeing only the early signs of the phenomenon we dub now as globalization. Today the signs are unmistakable. We, like the Americans and the Japanese and indeed all other trading nations, are a part of that global economy. We cannot lift the drawbridge and ignore it. Our standard of living now depends on joining the global economy and winning.

There are direct challenges to Canada which can be summed up in a simple phrase. By the end of the decade, we must transform ourselves from a trading nation into a nation of traders. The FTA, the GATT negotiations, the trilateral negotiations, our prosperity initiative, the February budget, the learning initiatives, are all part of reaching that objective. No one doubts that we are a trading nation, but I think that we are not yet a nation of traders and surely that is where we have to head. Our trading culture remains yet too shallow. We still export too limited a range of products to too few markets. Not enough Canadians accept that international business is the key to future growth.

It is clear again that the proposers of this resolution simply do not accept that Canada must compete on a world scale, that every Canadian must have a stake in global competition and we will not achieve that by hiding from the world. We will not achieve that by withdrawing from the NAFTA negotiations. We will not achieve that by withdrawing from the free trade agreement. We will certainly not achieve it if we do not adapt. Trade is where our domestic economy meets the international economy and a successful export performance is a pretty good indication that we are able to be competitive at home and that the domestic economy is working.

Adjusting, becoming more competitive, is where the future lies. Our past record has been reasonable, but we have to do better. We have to improve our productivity. We have to keep prices stable. We have to accept and join with enthusiastically the ability to compete at home and abroad. We have to invest in the future and provide an economic climate for both Canadian and foreign investors alike.

That is why the government negotiated free trade with the United States. That is why we are negotiating a free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico. That is why we want to conclude a successful agreement at the NTM. That is why we want to reduce the deficit. That is why we want to keep inflation low. We want to reduce the heavy hand of government in the economy unlike the members opposite and the proposers of this resolution.

We believe if we do that the result will be a growing–stronger outward–looking economy that all Canadians can share in. I want to share in such an economy and I want to be part of the fight that takes us there and I want my children to reap the benefits.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the speaker and there are a lot of things he said that we agree with on this side of the House.

We have always agreed to freer trade, more liberalized trade. In fact, 80 per cent of our trade in this country was free before we had this free trade agreement.

I want to refer him specifically to chapter 16 of the free trade agreement under article 1603 under performance requirements where it says:

> 1. Neither Party shall impose on an investor of the other Party, as a term or condition of permitting an investment in its territory, or in connection with the regulation of the conduct or operation of a business enterprise located in its territory, a requirement to:
> a) export a given level or percentage of goods and services;
> b) substitute goods or services from the territory of such Party for imported goods or services; and
> c) purchase of goods or services used by the investor in the territory of such Party or from suppliers located in such territory or accord a preference to goods or services produced in such a territory; or > d) achieve a given level or percentage of domestic content.

Would the minister not agree that American multinational corporations with branch offices in Canada that have been doing an awful lot of research and development, a lot of manufacturing, have now because of the deep recession in the United States basically taken article 1603 of the free trade agreement and used it as an instrument for retrenching, practically eliminating R and D and manufacturing? Essentially there is no investment requirement or there is no enticement for investment requirement in this country.

Under this law we have basically said to the head offices: "You can do what you want in this country". That, in my humble opinion, has led to one of the reasons that so many American corporations have pulled back and why we have so many people out of work, especially in central Ontario.

Mr. Winegard: Madam Speaker, this is somewhat typical of some of our colleagues in the House who really do not believe in free trade. They want to hedge things around because presumably they do not believe Canada competes either in terms of R and D tax credits or other matters.

It is very clear. I can give you all kinds of illustrations of companies that have not pulled back one bit and certainly not pulled back in Canada more than they have in the United States. I could talk about Pratt & Whitney, I could talk about IBM. They may be retrenching but they are not retrenching in Canada any more than they are in the United States.

People tend always when they talk about these issues to talk about the automobile industry. They focus on the automobile industry. That is an industry I know very well indeed, and that industry strangely enough is doing a little more now than it was some time ago. I think it is a disgrace in terms of the automotive industry research and development in this country. I have been saying so for 40 years and I will continue to say so. That does not mean it is doing less; in fact, it is doing a little more, infinitesimally more on an infinitesimally small base.

I think that blaming all the ills of this current recession on the free trade agreement has become a habit and not reality.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the Minister for Science on his comments and, indeed, on his commitment here today, because as we discuss this important issue of trade, it is indeed crucial, as the hon. minister has mentioned, that Canadians become traders.

I want to just bring up a couple of examples and ask the minister about one in particular. There are three examples I want to mention.

Last week I visited a company in London, Ontario. The company is called Trojan Technologies. It specializes in ultraviolet disinfection, research, product development, design systems, marketing, manufacturing and service. What this company does is it actually has these ultraviolet rays that take the bacteria out of waste water.

That company has placed some 70 representatives in the United States and Canada to promote their technology. Up to 1991, it has sold or had in operation 500 municipal waste water ultraviolet disinfection systems in the United States, Canada, New Zealand and Australia.

Officials told me that the company's success has been directly related to the free trade agreement.

In Scarborough, CDA Industries has created 90 additional jobs because of the free trade agreement. This company is the largest design company in Canada designing display products. It designs in paper, wood, plastic, metal. A great success story.

The other company I would like to mention and have the minister comment on is a company that he himself visited in Scarborough, called Webcom Limited. It is of particular interest to me from the environmental point of view because it has a unique competitive edge.

That company's business is printing books, directories and catalogues, and two of the things it has done to make itself competitive is that it has used vegetable-based inks, which we certainly endorse, and it uses recycled paper. I understand it has about 200 employees in Canada right now, and because of the free trade agreement it has increased its sales and increased the number of employees.

I would like the minister to give us some indication of what he found when he visited Webcom in Scarborough.

Mr. Winegard: Madam Speaker, what I found was a very aggressive company using the best of technologies. It has looked at technologies around the world in terms of binding periodicals and journals. It has used that technology, modified it some, and it is now one of the leading companies in North America in this new binding process.

I also found that the company was very aggressive in terms of moving into the United States, and that the United States market was now making up a substantial portion of all of its production.

The company was extraordinarily pleased with the free trade agreement and the access that it gave to that market.

When talking to company officials, I said: "Obviously we have made the right move as far as your company is concerned. Is there anything else that we could do that would help you in terms of capitalizing on the technology and the sales approach that you have?"

They said that yes, they would like a little different arrangement in terms of capital cost allowance for equipment because they intended to stay number one in that business.

I have no doubt that when they saw the budget of a few weeks ago they were very pleased indeed that we had modified the capital cost allowance and the reduction in tax.

That is exactly what we have been trying to do and what I have been trying to emphasize in my speech today.

• (1240)

When my colleague the Minister of State for Environment took me to Webcom, she knew that I was going to see technology in action, free trade in action, listen to people in action.

That is exactly what this government is about. We believe if we do not do that, we will not be competitive. Our position is that we want to be competitive. That is why we have the free trade agreement. We are going to continue to push for freer trade anywhere in the world. We believe that Canadians can win.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the motion we face in this House today, put forward by the NDP is naive and simplistic at best. Its members would have us walk from the North American free trade agreement table. They would have us have no representation there, no observers, no possibility for protecting whatever best interests of Canada might lie at that table.

We all recognize that the benefits for Canada in entering into a free trade agreement with the Mexicans may not be very great, but at least we have to be there at the table to protect our interests. Such naivety. They would ask us to immediately cancel the free trade agreement.

The member for Winnipeg Transcona who proposed this, said: "We recognize there is going to be harm to Canadians. We recognize there is going to be harm but we choose to do that. We choose to get rid of the free trade agreement immediately".

But did he lay figures before this House showing what additional jobs we might lose if we were to immediately cancel out of the free trade agreement? Did he lay a study before us of the industries that would be further affected?

I do not stand here trying to make a brief for the government that this free trade agreement is working at all to our interests. I am going to come to some very specific details to show where it is adversely affecting certain jobs in Canada.

But to the NDP members who want to abrogate it, give us their studies to show that we will achieve greater benefits by cancelling now. That is an irresponsible approach. Until they are prepared to come forth with those studies we cannot give any credence to the blind faith without figures that they can make things better their way.

The other thing that bothers me about the approach of the socialist party members in this House is that they are tending to be totally simplistic in laying all of the blame for our economic perils today on free trade. We know that is not the case.

The Tories gave us a free trade deal which we asked them not to sign, which we opposed, not because it was free trade but because it was not giving us the level playing field we need.

Also, having given us free trade this government then instituted a multiplicity of other policies which have helped to drive jobs out of Canada.

The dollar went up about 25 per cent from when free trade was first postulated. This of course put a 25 per cent burden on our exporters which was a ball and chain and a far worse penalty than any of the American tariffs that the FTA removed.

They gave us interest rates which have been consistently significantly higher than American rates. Today Canadian rates are double those in the U.S.

There is another thing the NDP does not point out to us and is certainly part of the conclusion of our task force on deindustrialization and economic renewal. This is the testimony of businesses right across the province. Not only the high dollar, high interest and high tax policies of this Tory government but what was really throwing a cloud on the investment future of Ontario was the impending labour legislation proposed by the NDP government. Looking at the labour legislation, one witness said that none of the particular measures were particularly bad on their own but taken as a whole, business did not compete in Ontario with other Canadian jurisdictions or with the more likely aspect that they would move to the United States.

Therefore, as much as we want workers to have rights, opportunities and fairness, these things must all be looked at within the context of international competition and what we have to do as Canadians to create jobs.

Let us look at some of the other policies of this Tory government that are causing very severe difficulties. Cross-border shopping is symptomatic of giving us free trade and not having a level playing field for Canadians. Our task force discovered the biggest cause of cross-border shopping which is bleeding Canada out of anywhere from about $3 billion to $5 billion a year and is decimating border communities. From the Sarnia area and right into Montreal, cross-border shopping is just decimating many communities in Canada. Why? It is cheaper in many cases to shop in the United States because we have different fiscal regimes.

The biggest cause of cross-border shopping is the high cost in Canada of gasoline and diesel fuel. That is the single biggest draw. Did the government deal with that issue when it brought out measures three weeks ago? It did not even touch it. It did not deal with the root cause.

What did the government do instead? It said: "We will enter into a collection regime with the provinces. We will collect for them the PST, the province sales taxes, if they will buy into our scheme for the GST". In other words, if they will start taxing more things for the provincial revenue than they are presently taxing and if they will increase their taxes to the provinces then the government will collect. It is doing that in the midst of the triple dip recession in Canada. The provinces have not bit. They will not be blackmailed or cajoled into doing this.

What is another measure the government took to try to correct this cross-border shopping? It said: "What we will do, because cigarettes are smuggled into Canada from the United States, is impose a duty on cigarettes that leave Canada for the United States", a prepayment of the GST.

It might help some of the smuggling problem, but it is really driving jobs to the United States. Now the tobacco companies are finding that they cannot compete and their jobs are going to the United States. Canadians are not going to pay for the increased cost of Canadian cigarettes. They will be buying American cigarettes which do not have this tax imposed on them.

While it might have been a good effort to deal with some of the problems, it was naive. It was not worked out. It is not going to work. It is not going to solve the problem. It is just going to drive more jobs south of the border.

What else did the government do in terms of our mail order industry which was suffering greatly and losing jobs hand over fist vis-à-vis the Americans? The Americans imposed about a $10 Canadian charge on any Canadian mail order goods going into the United States. However, Canada did not impose this on the American goods coming into Canada.

What does our government do? It says: "We will go half way. We will retaliate but we will not charge American mail order companies $10. We will charge them only $5". How stupid. Why did the government not do the same things that the Americans did to us to give our mail order industry at least a level playing field?

I do not know where this government's head is. I do not know who it is listening to. It is obviously not consulting with the industry. Any child could tell the government: "Hey, that is not a level playing field you are creating. Don't pretend you have fixed it when you have not".

Another area where we have seen a great loss of jobs, at least 1,700, is in Canada's printing industry. Maybe the concept of free trade was there and over five years we would get rid of all the duties and tariffs. The printing industry was not against this necessarily, but since free trade it has 1,700 jobs.

Why? Because we do not have a level playing field and the government did not ensure that we did. It was not just tariffs. Now American authorities are imposing a multiplicity of specifications so that Canadian printers must put labels in various spots and big highlighting. Not only do they have a multiplicity of regulations, but they are differently enforced at different border crossings. We have an administration system which is not giving us that playing field.

Another thing that was totally naive was that the Americans know we have to put on our printed goods a big "Made in Canada" and are going to be turned away from it. Why? It is not because of the Canadian quality, but because they have had in place in the United States for many, many years a buy American program, which is a type of nationalism and chauvinism to help their own workers, which we have called for in Canada, but which this government has not brought forward.

In concept freer trade; in reality it just is not there because we do not have a level playing field. Naivety, ignorance, stupidity. The theory is right, but they did not do their homework. This is why we continue to lose jobs in this area.

Another area is manufacturing. In the whole manufacturing sector in Canada since the free trade came in we have lost 345,000 or 16 per cent of our manufacturing jobs.

How can we sustain a vibrant economy when we lose our best paying jobs? Is this all because of free trade? Don't get me wrong; the NDP would probably say it is but it is a multiplicity of issues. If we are given free trade, a higher dollar, higher interest, higher taxes, and impending labour legislation from a socialist government in Ontario, the jobs are not going to stay in Canada.

What did the government do to try to ensure that we had a level playing field before we went into it? Why did it tip the playing field against Canada with its higher interest rates? This is one of the tragedies. We have not bottomed out of this recession. The last reports showed that unemployment is going up. We went from 10.4 per cent last month to 10.6 per cent unemployment. Nowhere was this worse than in manufacturing, the key to the industrial heartland of Ontario and Canada. We lost 22,000 more manufacturing jobs in January.

Let us look at the auto industry. The Minister for Science said it was the fault of the auto industry that we are losing jobs, that it did not do enough R and D in Canada. If the government told that industry to do more R and D in Canada and made it a condition of being in Canada, it would do it. Otherwise it will do its R and D in Detroit and Tokyo. These other countries are not naive.

Let us look at our automotive industry and what has happened to it since free trade. We have lost 27,213 jobs or 21 per cent of our auto parts and assembly jobs in Canada in the three years since free trade. The government tells us that jobs are also being lost in the United States. Yes they are. The Americans have lost 9 per cent of their auto jobs in the past three years. We are losing jobs at two and one-third times the U.S. rate. Is that just because of free trade? No, it is a whole ball of wax that this government has given us in terms of its policy.

I would like to put before this House today some specific amendments to our trading relationships that I think could address the auto sector. First, under the free trade agreement we have a 50 per cent North American content rule. If we have 50 per cent North American content as defined, we will have duty free trade between Canada and the United States. I am going to propose that this is not enough. Canadian content will have to be increased, perhaps to the level of 60 or 75 per cent. In order to grant that privilege of free trade to others they will have to create a substantial number of jobs and give us significant North American content.

Second, under the free trade agreement we have wiped out the auto pact. The auto pact is very simple. It had a safeguard protection for Canadian jobs. It said: "If you want to produce a car outside Canada and bring it into Canada duty free, you have to produce one car in Canada or its equivalent". That was fair. That was from the auto pact. That was wiped out by the free trade agreement.

Under the free trade agreement, by the year 1998 when all duties are eliminated, the big three could pull every plant out of Canada. They would not have to buy one Canadian part. They could ship their cars duty free into Canada without creating one single job here.

Is that what we want to see? We are seeing the evolution of that right now when we are losing auto jobs at two and one-third times the U.S. rate. We have to go back to some type of Canadian content.

I am advocating Canadian content of perhaps even 100 per cent. We are going to need a Canadian content that restores to us what the auto pact gave us. Any Canadian content rule that does not say: "You have to produce one car in Canada or its equivalent for every car you bring in duty free" is not giving us as Canadians our fair share of the job market.

People are going to say: "This is protectionism". Of course it is protectionism. Free trade is not what our competitors are doing. In the European Community they are debating today whether foreign producers will have 15 per cent or 17 per cent of the European Community's auto market by the year 2000. Will they let it get up that high? In Canada we are at 37 per cent foreign penetration right now. In return for that 37 per cent of our auto market those people are producing only 3 per cent of our jobs.

Is Japan a free trader? What is the percentage of its market occupied by foreign or non-Japanese producers? It is 3 per cent. It is 3 per cent in Japan, 15 to 17 per cent within eight years in the European Community, and in Canada today it is 37 per cent and rising. They are not free traders. Why should we be the only Boy Scouts on the block?

We need a dispute settlement mechanism that works. We do not have one today. Let us look at the Honda dispute. The engines are made in the United States for Honda and the United States says: "Hey, there is not enough North American content". The rules for specific determination of North American content under the FTA were not worked out at the table. They were so happy to get any deal they walked before they did the details. They did not even do the subsidies.

We are seeing what is happening now. We do not have a definition of content we can agree on. So what happens? The American customs authorities can slap a duty on us. Fine, but do we have an objective means of settling this dispute under the vaunted free trade settlement dispute mechanism? Is there a way to do it fairly and in accordance with the principles of law? No.

The only right we have is under chapter 18 of the free trade agreement that says we must consult with them. We are consulting right now. If we cannot agree after we have consulted then we can strike a panel to arbitrate it, but that panel's decision cannot be binding on the United States unless the United States says it will be binding. How stupid. Why would the United States agree that the decision should be binding when its customs officials and its administration have already decided in favour of the United States. That is the position we are in and do not pretend that free trade agreement gives us one right we did not have before in terms of this Honda dispute. What is such a shame is that we have production in Canada to the North American market. The Honda syndrome can be applied to every other Canadian producer for the North American market and for the U.S. market. The chill that it will put on further exports from Canada and on further investment in Canada producing for the U.S. market is enormous. If you were going to make the decision as a North American corporation to establish in Canada or in the United States, why would you choose Canada, when because of the Honda type decision and the inadequacies of the free trade agreement, nine-tenths of your market, i.e., the United States, can be shut off?

I am coming quickly to a conclusion. There is so much that is wrong with this agreement, the free trade agreement, because it was not thought out. It does not give Canada a level playing field. It has not given our producers and our jobs a fair chance. I have touched on just perhaps three of the industries in which this has not been the case.

Let us renegotiate. Let us get a fair deal for Canadians.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member started speaking and agreed that a trade agreement, the North American free trade agreement, was a good idea, I thought that we might hear a sensible speech today. But I was wondering, when he got into the mathematics of the Canadian dollar, how he figured it. It was new math to me. In any event, the Canadian dollar was trading at about 84 cents to the American dollar in December 1988, and now it is 83.5 cents to the American dollar. I just wondered what kind of new math that was, where he said the Canadian dollar lost 25 per cent of its value against the American dollar.

Then he went on from there into the auto pact. You know, when he said we produce two cars for every one we consume here, as far as the Americans are concerned, he really lost me. Then when we had the General Motors matter, where they are closing plants in the United States—and, sure, they closed a plant in Canada, but they closed a lot more plants in the United States—I got confused.

Then he went on even further and got into horrible matters concerning the establishment of plants and businesses in Canada. I looked at the exports of Canadian goods into the United States, and in 1988 there was $102.6 billion and then it was $107 billion in 1991. The difference between our favourable balance continued to rise. We find now that our favourable balance is $15.1 billion, when it was only $14 billion in 1988. This is a bad year because our trade on both sides has dropped.

I wonder just where he is getting off. I mean, he must have some sort of idea that we are not capable of running a country. I think he must be reading either the new dinosaurs' material or Mr. Hurtig's material, or doing his research somewhere that has no relevance to what is in fact taking place.

We have a problem in Ontario, and he is right. It was his brother who was premier of a province that spent and increased taxes, and borrowed money in foreign markets and increased the value of the Canadian dollar until he was defeated and his province taken over by the real big spenders, the New Democrats. It was his brother's government that created a growth in the province of Ontario that was unsustainable. That is really why the province of Ontario is suffering and suffering very badly today in this recession, far worse than other places in the world. But let him know there is a world recession, and it is worse in Ontario because of the leadership offered by the government headed by his brother and by the current premier of Ontario, who seems to have no sense at all.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have never had to defend my brother because he has always been superbly capable of doing it himself.

One has to wonder where the Prime Minister finds his judgment on so many matters that are of such vital importance to the future of Canada. Needless to say, I am very proud of my brother and I think his record will stand up very well.

Now let me respond very directly to the three points raised by my friend. I do not think he knows what he is talking about because when he reads Hansard he will find out, as he said, that the Canadian dollar had not lost 25 per cent during his period. Rather the dollar went up 25 per cent vis-à-vis the Americans.

What I said in my speech is as follows. In 1986, when this deal was first announced and being worked out, the dollar was at about 75 to 76 cents U.S. It went as high as 90 cents. In other words, it had appreciated over 25 per cent during the period that this deindustrialization started and had put that anchor around the necks of Canadians. That is all I said. Well, thank God the dollar is coming down. They finally started to listen to us.

The interest rates are coming down and the dollar is coming down, and why they have increased the interest rates five out of the last six weeks in Canada is beyond me. Do we not want a lower dollar to create jobs here? Members from the other side of the House are calling for it, and that member over there has too. So when he said the dollar has lost 25 per cent, he is wrong. The dollar went up more than 25 per cent. I hope he gets his mathematics straight.

Then he said General Motors shut down some plants in Canada but they also shut them down in the United States, why should we worry? Look at the figures in the last three years. Canadian auto jobs in parts and assembly have been lost at two and one-third times the rate in the U.S. We know there has been a recession. We know there is rationalization going on, but why should Canada lose jobs more quickly than the United States. That is not what we are about.

Then he talked about the vaunted trade figures. When this government across the way took office in 1984, Canada had a current account surplus of some $20 billion. Today we are in deficit. In the last quarter of last year we had an $8.1 billion current account deficit, which is a record in the history of Canada, and it surpassed even the previous record of $7.5 billion in the quarter preceding that.

If this is the vaunted economic performance of this government on the international playing field, then my goodness they are wearing blinders and blinkers. Canadians just do not believe you, sirs, on the other side when you tell us you are doing well and that you have been good stewards of Canada's future.

Unemployment in Canada went up to 10.6 per cent. Unemployment in the United States is at 7.1 per cent. That is who we are competing with, and what are you doing to help us get those jobs back? You are naive and you have not given us a level playing field. Please start looking at individual industries. How can you work with them to make sure they have equal opportunities that our American counterparts do to get jobs? Do not give us another of these pigs in a poke like you gave us, that it was not properly negotiated. They cannot even give us binding dispute of the Honda issue. We need binding settlement of that but we cannot get it.

I wish one of those people across there would show us how we can get any resolution of the Honda dispute without the ministers going to Washington on bended knee and prostrating themselves, asking for a favour of the United States government. That is the only way they are going to get it.

An hon. member: That is a great negotiating position.

Mr. Peterson: That has put us in a position here in Canada that I as a Canadian am not proud to be in, and this is why changes have to be made.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker I do, indeed, thank you.

• (1310)

I have heard the saying that the sins of the father are sometimes visited upon the son. But we have an extension here today from the hon. member for Mississauga South who wants to visit whatever sins there might be, either real or perceived, from one brother to another. I do not know how long they are going to go on on this particular tack.

The member for Mississauga South says: "Some people would think we are not capable of running a country." Well, I would like to have on record now that I am one of those who believes that this government has not been capable, is not capable, and will not be capable of running Canada. All you have to do is look at their track record.

The hon. member for Mississauga South said that he was a little bit confused at what the member from Willowdale was saying. Contrary to that, I am not confused at all, but I would like the hon. member from Willowdale to make one further comment.

The member mentioned the auto industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think that the time for questions and comments is over and we must now move on to debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Koury): Two seconds.

[English]

Mr. Parent: I will take up the 42 seconds, if you do not mind, and the 42 seconds will be in the form of a question, which is specifically this. If we indeed were sold down the river with this free trade deal, I would like your comments, Mr. Member, through you, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Koury): Your time is over, thank you.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of the motion that we are debating today, the motion from the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona:

> That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should withdraw from the negotiations concerning a North American free trade agreement, give notice of withdrawal from the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and pursue a global trade strategy not based on making the planet an unfettered playground for the multinational corporate elite.

Mr. Boudria: What does that mean precisely?

Mr. Heap: Well, if the hon. member would allow me to proceed I will explain.

There have been plenty of reports, including even the speech of the last speaker from the Liberal Party, that have pointed out the failures of the free trade agreement and the likely failures of the North American free trade agreement. There have been plenty of reports that have shown that the only beneficiaries of it, the only reliable beneficiaries, are the multinational corporations.

I do not intend to rehearse all those arguments because there are some other points that should be made in this debate concerning the alternative possibilities. I will come to them a little bit farther along, but I want to give simply one of the major reasons for not renegotiating but abrogating the free trade agreement.

The free trade agreement places Canadian law subordinate to American law. That is to say, according to the free trade agreement in title I, section 102, Relationship of the Agreement to United States Law, page 1853 states:

> (a) United States Laws to Prevail In Conflict—No provision of the Agreement, nor the application of any such provision to any person or circumstances, which is in conflict with any law of the United States shall have effect.

Fair enough, if that is going to be a two-way street, but it is not. The agreement elsewhere in volume 2, schedule part A, article 103, Extent of Obligation on page 2 states:

> The Parties to this Agreement shall ensure that all necessary measures are taken in order to give effect to its provisions including their observance, except as otherwise provided in this Agreement by state, provincial and local governments.

In other words, American laws are totally protected from being reduced or set aside or hindered by the agreement. Canadian laws have no such protection in the agreement. It is a monstrous trick to subordinate Canada to the White House and to the American corporations. That is the reason why our party, at its convention last year, adopted the necessity of abrogating the free trade agreement and why that is the position that our party leader has consistently upheld.

Since a well-known supporter of the free trade agreement, Diane Francis, purported to report Audrey McLaughlin otherwise, she has written a letter to the Financial Post on December 3 as follows:

> Dear Editor:
> In your October 26th edition, you published extracts from a lengthy and wide-ranging interview between myself and Diane Francis. On page 1 of the same issue, Ms. Francis draws some conclusions, among them that the New Democrats have softened their position on the free trade agreement. This conclusion is not accurate. Our party continues to oppose the deal and maintains the position that it ought to be abrogated. A New Democratic Party government would use the six-month provisions contained in the agreement to notify the United States of our intention to cancel the deal.

That is the position of our party, as restated before then and since then many times by our leader, by our spokesman on international trade and by other members of this party. Since the government is hard-hearted on it and the Liberal Party waffles on it, I want to look at two of the reasons given for entering and maintaining the free trade agreement in order to dispose of them.

One of the reasons given is that it will help the poor Mexican workers. The Prime Minister loves to get up with flippant sarcasm and and say "Why are Canadians objecting to losing jobs? Don't you want to help the poor Mexicans?". It is well known that the Prime Minister does not give two hoots for the situation of jobless Canadians, therefore there is no reason to suppose that he has the slightest interest in helping jobless Americans or under-employed Americans or jobless Mexicans either or the under-employed ones.

The fact is that there is plenty of evidence to show that the total policies of the American and Canadian banks, the American and Canadian corporations and the American and Canadian governments are not increasing the employment opportunities and the pay opportunities for Mexicans, they are decreasing them. I quote from a paper done last year by Jorge Calderone Salazar on "Free Trade Agreement: Democracy and National Sovereignty in Mexico". This is what he says is needed. I will not cover the whole paper.

> Serious negotiations on foreign debt should begin immediately, particularly with regard to the debt to the U.S. and Canadian banks in accordance with a proposal to reduce substantially the interest rate and the principle.

His position is that none of this trade deal will benefit Mexico so long as it has to pay out more than it takes in on the debt. He goes on to say:

> Recent experience shows that it is perfectly feasible for Mexico to negotiate a framework agreement with the United States and Canada, similar to the one signed by Mexico with the European Economic Community on April 26, 1991. This is a road that needs to be explored in order to arrive at within a few years the formulation of a policy that is beneficial to the people of Mexico.

We have heard the judgment of Senator Calderone and many others, as well as ours, that the free trade agreement is not intended to help Mexican workers or campesina. It will not and in fact it cannot.

The second argument, of course, which is more popularly used is that Canada is too weak to stand alone against the United States. We have a population of only 26 million or so and they have 10 times as many. They have 100 times as much money and so people like the hon. minister who led off this morning for the government side are saying in effect that whatever the United States wants will inevitably happen, so if we cannot lick them, we had better join them.

That is the attitude of the banks, the large corporations of Canada and the government which they control through the Business Council on National Issues. They decided to join the American corporations in exploiting all the peoples of Canada, the United States and Mexico and, of course, intending to go beyond that. It is the Mexican workers and campesinos who are making known that they want allies against the kind of thing that the North American free trade agreement represents.

My point is that Canadians, who now in the majority oppose the free trade agreement according to the polls, are not alone in this matter. We are no longer isolated up in the frozen north. As has been acknowledged across the way, we have fax machines, we have jet planes, we communicate with the 380 million strong nationals south of American border and in the Caribbean.

A year ago when I went to the state of Morelos to observe their strange election practice of not allowing secret voting, I also met with some trade unionists in Mexico. The burden of their remarks to me was that we need an international bill of rights for labour.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling to me a time limit. Can you tell me how much more time I have?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Koury): One minute.

Mr. Heap: I thought we had 20 minutes to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Koury): Yes, you have 20 minutes.

Mr. Heap: As I was saying, they are asking for the kind of international labour rights that have been written into the agreement in the European Community but are absolutely rejected by the President of the United States, the President of Mexico and Prime Minister Mulroney of Canada as part of the agreement. We are told: "You will come along and get those later, maybe".

In October the New Democratic Party sent me to Zacatecus to a meeting that was concurrent with the meeting of the trade ministers. It was a meeting of the Action Canada network, the counterpart networks from the United States, from Mexico, and a number of other political, academic and labour figures from Mexico.

At that meeting we adopted guidelines for a three nation movement for a citizens' alternative development program. I will mention a few of the points on which we agreed; that we should cancel or reduce Mexico's $100 billion debt to foreign banks; that we should cancel the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States; that we should equalize people's conditions across the three countries in work: wages, safety and democratic unions; in the community living conditions; health and education for migrant workers, equal rights with other workers. We should establish equality of women with men across the three countries. Each country should control its own culture, education, communication system and so on.

I will not take the time to list all of the matters on which we agreed. My point is that they are looking for allies among Canadians and they are finding them.

Two weeks ago I attended a meeting in Peru, sent by the NDP, a meeting of the Sao Paolo Forum, a group of Latin American and Caribbean parties that oppose U.S trade domination. They invited the NDP and the NDP sent me. I do not know whether they invited the Liberals. The Liberals were invited to the meeting I attended in Zacatecus but they did not send anyone. I did not see any Liberals at the meeting in Lima but I cannot say whether they were invited.

The people who invited me asked me to describe the deceptions used by the Prime Minister and this government to hoodwink the Canadian people into returning the government of the free trade agreement in the last election. They asked me to outline the damage done by the free trade agreement in the last three years which I did.

They want Canadians as allies in their struggles with the United States. They want our experience of free trade, our knowledge of the United States. They want our trade and they want our voice in international affairs.

My point is that we are not alone. Not only the Latin Americans, including the Mexicans, but in the United States a growing group is advocating opposition to the free trade agreement. The AFL–CIO has registered its view. Many specific unions and locals have, church groups have, academic figures have. There is also a mounting campaign there to have a publicly administered and a publicly funded health insurance scheme like the Canadian one, which the free trade advocates would like to destroy by giving American corporations the right to manage Canadian hospitals and other institutions.

Besides that we have allies in Canada. The position of the Canadian Labour Congress is quite clear in opposition to the free trade agreement. We have research groups such as the Latin American Working Group and the Ecumenical Coalition for Economic Justice, which used to be called GATT–fly, which for many years have been exploring relationships with the Mexicans in preparation for the kind of bad deal that has been foisted upon us.

We have the churches, many of whose Canadian leaders, especially Roman Catholic ones, have spoken against the trade deal. I want to quote John Paul II, not on the trade deal of course, on which he has not spoken to my knowledge, but on a basic principle that was appealed to by the member for Winnipeg Transcona. The Pope said: "What is the origin of all the evils to which Rerum Novarum wished to respond, if not a kind of freedom, which in the economic and social activity cuts itself off from the truth about man". In other words, what the Pope has been teaching, as his predecessors did, is that unbridled market relationships without any regard for the need of people as individual persons is contrary to his teaching.

As one who does not regard the Pope as infallible, I would say that this and many other things that he has said are well worth listening to, including his encyclical Centesimal Anno.

I want to point out that there are proposals circulating in Canada, some of them endorsed by the NDP already and others under study, for an alternative version, an alternative policy, for example, on investment which would mean that the rights of people are to assert sovereignty over their economies, to choose their own development priorities, reject the principle of national treatment for foreign investors and instead assert the right of sovereign states to enforce regulations governing the activities of transnational corporations. It goes on to detail them further.

It has an alternative policy on services, for developing service industries which would rule out national treatment and the right of establishment for foreign investors. Instead it will allow sovereign peoples to set rules governing which services could be provided by TNCs and which services would be allocated to domestic firms. This has been circulated for a year by the Ecumenical Coalition for Economic Justice and is being studied widely.

It continues:

> An alternative policy for intellectual property such as drug patents.
> An alternative view of intellectual property rights treats patents and copyrights as privileges rather than absolute rights. A development centred policy on intellectual property rights would recognize the sovereign right of countries to establish their own patent and copyright systems to enforce generic drug laws, to adapt technology to uses as appropriate to their stage of development, to exclude inappropriate technology from their borders and to resist pressures for global harmonization of patent laws in TNC interests.

Finally I want to mention their comments on agriculture.

> An alternative approach to agriculture would begin with a recognition of people's right to basic food self–reliance. Countries have the right to protect themselves from the dumping of food commodities on to world markets at prices that are below the cost of production.
> It is crucial to distinguish between subsidies that systematically encourage over–production and export dumping and subsidies designed to encourage food self–reliance, ecologically sound agricultural practices and other legitimate development objectives.

In conclusion, I want to say that there are alternative programs and policies being worked out not only by the NDP but by many groups across Canada who oppose the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement.

If we had been given fuller information by the government during the negotiations of both those agreements, if we had been given the information reports that the government swore to give to us, year by year, about the progress, we would be better able to mount those studies now. But because of the secrecy in which this government conducts its policies, refusing even to let Parliament know what is being resolved in our names, the work has been slow, but it is progressing and it is getting wider and wider circulation.

I also wish to refer to a document that is being worked on by a group within my own constituency in which they want to mount a public statement around five points:

1. Cancel the free trade deal—and they give detail on that.

2. Let us put Canadians to work now.

3. Fair taxes will give us the money we need.

4. Strengthen our social services.

5. Canadians need a say in developing our economy nationally and locally.

So in reiteration I want to quote again the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona:

> That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should withdraw from the negotiations concerning a North American free trade agreement, give notice of withdrawal from the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and pursue a global strategy not based on making the planet an unfettered playground for the multinational corporate elite.

In short, Mr. Speaker, dump the deal.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am quite interested in the member's speech. I am pleased that he was down in Mexico while negotiations were taking place on the free trade agreement.

Bearing in mind that the Government of Mexico is pressing this agreement with the United States and is prepared to negotiate with the United States alone, is it his view that Canada should not be at the table, that Canada should let the Americans and the Mexicans negotiate their own free trade agreement, and that we should not be anywhere close to the Mexicans? Should we not be there advising the Mexicans as to what they might want to look out for if they are making a deal with the Americans? Would he not think that we ought to extend our good offices and our assistance to the Mexicans?

Is it his policy and the policy of his party that we should just walk away from the table on the North American free trade agreement that is presently being negotiated with the Mexicans and not do anything?

That is my first question. My second question is, bearing in mind that we are quite proud of our medicare system, does he not think that by being in a trade agreement with the Americans and doing a great deal of business with them, increasing trade every year, a very substantial increased volume since 1988, that we influence American politics to some extent? As he pointed out, even some of the American unions are trying to stop our free trade agreement with the United States, that that agreement is not persuading Americans to perhaps have public medicare themselves? Does he not think that trade is an influential way that we can extend the good offices of Canada to the rest of the world?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member as usual misrepresents what I am saying by suggesting that I am against trade. What the NDP opposes is not trade but we oppose putting all our eggs in one basket and giving the key to it to the President of the United States.

We can offer advice to the Mexicans. I have been doing it and the Prime Minister has been doing it. Some of my advice was more truthful than his, when he went down there and told them that the free trade agreement created 250,000 new jobs in the first year in Canada.

We can continue to offer advice, but I do not want Canada to cede some more of our sovereignty, especially to a government that is as illegitimate as the government of President Salinas. He only gained the presidency by corrupting the last election in such an extraordinary way that even the Organization of American States objected to it. They simply stopped the counting when they found that the opposition party was ahead, and a week later they produced figures to show that Salinas was ahead. I do not want Canada subordinate to an agreement with that kind of dictatorial ruler, who sends the police out to smash trade unions and to assassinate academics or church people who oppose him.

I do not want Canada sitting in those meetings, because our Prime Minister has shown that he has a great weakness for giving the Americans anything they ask for. American Express wanted greater banking rights in Canada than the banks have; he gave it to them. What he got for it in return, I do not know. What he got for Canada, he has never told us. So I do not want that kind of weak-kneed giveaway being carried on in the free trade negotiations with the U.S. and Mexico.

As to increasing trade with the U.S., no. We have too many eggs in that basket already. I want us to increase trade with the Latin American countries, with the Caribbean. According to today's report, the GATT authority has said that the North American free trade agreement will hinder trade to the disadvantage of Caribbean and Latin American countries. They will be losers as a result of the North American free trade agreement. Though we have not had a chance to read the full report, I think they might well be right in that perception. It certainly is the perception of the people that I met in Lima two weeks ago. I would say we have to do our best to make GATT a more democratic organization than it is and the United Nations a more democratic organization than it is, rather than being so cowardly as just to throw our lot in with the guy who used to be the head of the CIA, President Bush.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I listened carefully to the member from Spadina speak, and he started off by saying he would cancel the free trade agreement, but then he went on to put forward a list of alternative approaches to the United States, which would presumably be much more beneficial to Canada's agenda.

Some of the proposals he is putting forward sound quite reasonable, and with a strong negotiator, I think a lot of those proposals would be attainable. Does he not think it would be a much more constructive or a less disruptive process to first try to advance his amendments, his constructive alternatives, and see if he can sell them? What if he did? What if he could make those amendments that he just cited today to the free trade agreement? What if, through a proper explanation and a strong leadership, a future president accepted those conditions?

I, for example, have never felt comfortable with the area of the free trade agreement related to water. I have always wanted a one page special protocol letter saying water is exempt from this deal. Make no mistake about it, it should be a separate negotiation.

We have never tried because we have a Prime Minister, basically, who has gone along with most of what the Americans want. But we may be blessed with a leader eventually that will say: "Hey, if you want to keep this in place, here is what we need." Would that not be a more constructive way to go?

Mr. Heap: I thank the hon. member for a very relevant question. He did, however, miss part of what I said. The President of the United States and the President of Mexico and the present Prime Minister of Canada have already publicly refused, a year ago, to consider any labour or environmental matters in the free trade agreement. They have rejected the very concept of having any such things in. They have gone so far along with the agreement that the only way we can preserve the possibility of what the member has suggested is by withdrawing from the agreement now.

Second, and again I made this point clear in my speech, what I want is that we should negotiate these things with all countries, not trying, as the Prime Minister once rightly perceived, as a mouse to negotiate with the elephant. Before he was converted to free trade he said it would be like the mouse sleeping with the elephant. He was right then and wrong ever since.

We should be negotiating with all the countries of this hemisphere, and we have the possibility of doing that. They want us to. They have asked us to. We should be negotiating with the whole hemisphere, and that would give us the clout necessary to get the United States to come to reason or else to elect a president who would come to reason.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motion seems to be an overreaction to the problems that Canada is having in its trade relations with the United States. Unfortunately, it takes no account of all the positive aspects in Canada–U.S. relations.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that last week was not easy. We would be lying if we did not admit that we were disappointed by Washington's decision on Honda and softwood lumber. We are very disappointed, in fact. We do not believe that these decisions are justified, but we are convinced that we will win in the end, as we did with pork. The stakes were considerable then. It took time, but the facts proved us right. That is why the government is convinced that the policy adopted seven years ago was right and that it remains just as valid today.

For those of you who might have forgotten, let me remind you of the reasons. From the outset, we had three objectives in our negotiations with the United States.

First, we wanted to improve access to the American market for our products and services. We wanted to encourage Canadian producers to break out of the straitjacket imposed by the small domestic market, to retool and to take on the world market. The American market was not an end in itself but a starting point for a greater presence on world markets. We accepted the fact that increased American competition on our own market would encourage Canadians to discipline themselves and to restructure in order to face world competition.

Second, we wanted secure access to the U.S. market. We wanted to be able to give as much assurance as possible to Canadian entrepreneurs who decided to enter the American market that they would not be the victims of arbitrary, ill-considered decisions. We wanted our economic and trade relations with the United States to be protected by rules agreed upon by both parties and uniformly applied.

Finally, we wanted to entrench this improved secure access in a legal framework, with institutional provisions and dispute settlement mechanisms that would go a long way to making us equal partners, governed by rules and procedures accepted by both parties.

Noble words, grandiose objectives. Have they been achieved, Mr. Speaker? On the whole, yes. That is the conclusion which the government came to in 1987 and which it maintains today.

It is not naive but realistic. The international agreements have to do with improvements and compromises that were carefully negotiated. Only one criterion applied: Would the agreement be a tangible improvement over the previous status quo? Based on this criterion, the government concluded in 1987 that the agreement negotiated was a marked improvement over the status quo.

Furthermore, the Canadian people agreed with us in the 1988 election. None of the events in the last three and a half years have changed this assessment—not the verification of Honda cars nor softwood lumber, beer or magnesium. Are we indifferent to the difficulties experienced by Canada's auto workers, forestry workers, miners and brewers? Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. Each of these instances is very disturbing, and we have always used all available resources and taken every opportunity to defend our interests and to help people in difficult situations. We will continue our efforts in this respect, and we will do so, with all the energy we have and all the recourse at our disposal.

The Prime Minister said this quite clearly to President Bush. The external affairs minister sent the same message to James Baker, as the trade minister did to Carla Hills and Barbara Franklin.

However, these disputes should be put into context, Mr. Speaker. Bilateral trade between Canada and the United States is now estimated at $256 billion. This represents three-quarters of our exports and two-thirds of our imports. About two million Canadians are directly dependent on this trade for their living, and millions more enjoy indirect benefits.

During the past 10 years, trade between Canada and the United States has gradually increased. In 1985, when Canadians started giving serious consideration to free trade, goods and services worth approximately $200 billion crossed the border. Since then, this type of trade has increased at an Baverage annual rate of 4 per cent. The rate may have been lower last year, Mr. Speaker, when the recession struck both economies, but trade should pick up as we come out of this recession. How do we know? It is what the statistics on investment in recent years tell us.

In fact, trade agreements are not only about current trade but about future investment. The purpose is to stimulate investment that will provide for sustained growth. In this respect, the free trade agreement remains a resounding success.

From 1986 to 1989, in other words, between the time the business community first acknowledged that Canadian-American economic relations were about to enter a new era, and the actual implementation of the agreement, capital spending by businesses increased by an annual average of nearly 12 per cent. The recession put a brake on capital spending, which nevertheless totalled $80.2 billion in 1990 and $75.2 billion in 1991, and is expected to be around $74.1 billion in 1992. This kind of investment paves the way for a period of dynamic two-way trade and production activity that will be characteristic of the remainder of the 90s.

However, even today, as we gradually come out of the recession, there are encouraging signals. In 1991, there was a 3 per cent increase in the use of marketing services, an area of international trade that is experiencing very rapid growth.

Recession or not, trade between Canada and the United States is proceeding without incident. Every day, thousands of goods cross the border quickly and efficiently, on board trucks, trains and aircraft. Not more than 5 per cent of our two-way trade is affected by the various trade disputes. Without minimizing the importance of this 5 per cent, Mr. Speaker, it must be put into context.

Let me ask the real question, let us get to the bottom line. Setting aside the rhetoric, would we really be better off without the free trade agreement? The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. The Americans are in a bad mood. They are in a recession and 1992 is an election year. For those of us who depend on trade, this is a particularly difficult combination. The United States are taking measures against several of their trade partners. Canada is not the only target, not even the main one. Japan remains their number one target, although Europe, Brazil and other countries are also affected. We are not thrilled about the situation, Mr. Speaker. Neither are the Japanese, the Europeans or the Brazilians. That is why global trade standards must be established to provide a clearer and stricter set of rules and prevent excessive protectionism on the part of the United States and also Europe and Japan. While Canada is generally hit first and the hardest by the American strain of this virus called "unfair trade practices", protectionism is not exclusive to the United States.

The United States has a peculiar way of defining fair trade practices and the strength of their economy is such that it can force its vision of things on others, even when inaccurate.

The fair trading system advocated by the United States rests on the premise that any producer for whom foreign competition creates hardship can plead his case before the authorities. He must show that the foreign competitor has somehow taken an unfair advantage of the United States. Over the years, the American Congress has developed numerous procedures through which American producers can vent their frustrations. In some cases, that is all it takes, but in others, the system provides for temporary or permanent penalties.

Whatever the outcome of these procedures, they are harmful, Mr. Speaker. They have a cooling effect on trade and investment and they erode investors' confidence. The big losers are the American economy and consumers, but we are also hurt.

The American system has gradually become uncontrollable. Once out, it is hard to get the genie back into the bottle. U.S. trade policy is marked by a lack of vision and leadership. The gap between the rhetoric and U.S. action is widening constantly. The U.S. is overly fond of preaching free trade while giving its own subjective and changeable definition of fair trade.

The answer is not to give tit for tat, because, as I said earlier, we often end up harming our own interests. The answer lies in negotiating international trade rules. We know that, and so does the U.S. In fact, U.S. representatives freely admit they need proper regulations more than any other country because their own system is too vulnerable to special interests.

That is why we have the free trade agreement and why we must keep demanding better and clearer regulations. It is also why we must have global trading standards and a three-way agreement between the United States, Mexico and Canada. We must seize every opportunity to obtain agreement on a set of regulations and on better mechanisms for dispute settlement. It is not a matter of one or the other. We need both to achieve one and the same objective: a more open, more predictable and more stable trading system.

However, the best cure for the current protectionist trend will be tangible proof that the recession is coming to an end, especially in the United States. We have reason to be optimistic. U.S. company reports are improving. Mortgages are being refinanced at lower rates.

Consumers have more money to spend, and the private sector is eager to supply the demand.

Any recovery in the U.S. economy will improve our prospects and strengthen confidence in the economy. Once again, Canada has realized that its well-being depends on that of its neighbour. However, once American consumers start spending again, we will be there to benefit, and we will be in a better position to take advantage of these opportunities. The past five years of adjustment and restructuring will have been worthwhile. Canadian entrepreneurs, now stronger and more competitive, will be able to take advantage of our improved access under the free trade agreement.

There are people who maintain that the agreement has made us a favourite target of U.S. protectionists and that it has removed our defences. Now who is being naïve?

Anyone who is successful becomes a target, Mr. Speaker. U.S. interests will always take an aggressive stand against imports. Americans are no different from anyone else in this respect. Obviously exports are more readily acceptable than imports. Any country would prefer one-way free trade. However, trade with other countries is a source of wealth, and both exports and imports are a way to stimulate growth.

It is a fact that Canada still shows a substantial surplus in its trade with the United States. Our annual exports to the United States have increased by $5 billion since 1988, the year before the implementation of free trade. In comparison, we have a general trade deficit of $7.7 billion with the rest of the world. This tells us that the free trade agreement is working well and that it helps preserve Canadian jobs. According to the agreement, customs duties will not be fully phased out until 1998, but exporters in both countries have already applied for accelerated elimination of certain customs tariffs between our two countries. So far, Canadian companies have requested and obtained two series of accelerated tariff reductions which have made it possible to eliminate customs duty on nearly 1,000 tariff items worth a total of $8 billion in bilateral trade. A third series is now under way.

Critics are confusing Canadians by blaming the free trade agreement for lay-offs in our manufacturing sector. One fact worth mentioning is that the current decline in employment in the manufacturing sector is more or less on a par with the number of jobs lost during the 1982 recession, when there was no free trade.

The loss of jobs in the manufacturing sector is not a recent phenomenon. In 1972, about 22 per cent of Canadians worked in the manufacturing sector. By 1990, this percentage had dropped to 15.9 per cent. The displacement of jobs from the manufacturing sector to the service sector is a phenomenon that we share with most developed countries, including Japan. It reflects the impact of the broad restructuring of our global economy.

Furthermore, increased employment in the service sector has more than compensated for the decline in jobs in the manufacturing sector. Administrative, professional and technical positions accounted for one-third of the growth in employment between 1971 and 1981, compared to 77 per cent between 1981 and 1986. According to Statistics Canada, these job categories will account for more than half of the new jobs created in the 1990s. Our manufacturing sector is neither dead nor seriously threatened. It is misleading to mention only jobs losses as proof that our secondary sector is declining. The total value of production in constant dollars and the manufacturing share of the total economy are more accurate indicators. According to these indicators, our manufacturing sector is maintaining itself.

In fact, employment increased in telecommunications and transportation equipment, aerospace and computer software. Since 1988, exports of Canadian finished products in such things as aerospace, industrial machinery, transportation equipment and chemicals have risen by about $4 billion.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that the free trade agreement is attracting foreign investment to Canada, investments that go to Canadian manufacturing and create jobs in Canada. Net direct foreign investment is positive for the first time in 16 years. The free trade agreement has encouraged Canadian companies to reduce their investments in the United States and to invest more in Canada.

Inevitably, the largest bilateral trade relationship in the world has tensions and problems, especially in a recession. Because of the present recession, the two governments have difficulty managing the bilateral trade relationship, and this is an election year in the United States. But the free trade agreement has protected Canadian companies from the arbitrary and unfair application of trade remedies provided in American law.

Final decisions on anti-dumping and countervailing duties can now be examined by a special binational panel.

We also have the right to request a binational review of any change to existing laws and regulations on countervailing and anti-dumping duties.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the United States cannot apply new trade laws to Canada unless these laws comply with GATT and the spirit and letter of the free trade agreement. No other country has such protection from unfair trade action.

Ask our pork producers. The special panels under the free trade agreement saved them $20 million last year by eliminating U.S. countervailing duties.

We are determined to protect Canadian interests and to have the spirit and letter of the free trade agreement respected, because it remains the best guarantee for our trade relations.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member's speech and, quite frankly, I have to question him on a couple of things.

First of all, he talked about increased foreign investment. Foreign investment in this country in the last couple of years, especially in the area of manufacturing, has shrunk dramatically. That is one of the reasons why our smaller and medium sized businesses are having difficulties, there is such a shortage of capital in the market. So I do not really think that free trade did anything to enhance foreign investment in this country.

An hon. member: Not true.

Mr. Mills: It really has not.

Mr. O'Kurley: In my riding $800 million in Dow Chemical.

Mr. Mills: I take the hon. member's point, Dow Chemical, $800 million, and I give him full recognition. But there are 1,700,000 businesses in this country and he cites to me Dow Chemical. I will give him Dow Chemical, but the bottom line is that because there is so little foreign capital coming into this country and because we have such a deficit and debt to service, that has reduced the availability of capital within our banking system.

I will bet you dollar to doughnuts that nine out of ten entrepreneurs who you approach on the street today will tell you that they are finding it very difficult to get additional lines of credit for more capital. That is just the simple truth of it.

Regarding the issue at hand, this free trade agreement, the more I listen to the government side of this House, the more I am happy to be on the record that I campaigned against the free trade agreement, especially chapters 14 and 16. The minister responsible for the environment will know well that most of her constituents, if they had a chance today, would not support her position on this free trade agreement. They would reverse it.

The point that I wanted to ask the member specifically about, and I am reading here and I do not want to cite exclusively from Mel Hurtig's book The Betrayal of Canada because there are some things in it that I do not go along with—

Mr. Soetens: What an authority.

Mr. Mills: No, I qualified my remarks.

Mrs. Browes: Not true.

Mr. Mills: But I do. This is not a quote from Mel Hurtig, this is a quote from an American research magazine. It says that the majority of branch plants in Canada are not permitted by their U.S. parent to export into the U.S. market and compete with them there. Among the long list of "not free to export" companies are Avon, Revlon, Gillette, Mennen, Noxema, Max Factor, Jergens and Lever Brothers.

Does the hon. member not think that there could be or should be some kind of an instant audit and review or a midway review about how this free trade agreement is really affecting the day to day life of the manufacturing industry in this country.

Cannot the government see that there is a global recession and there are some difficulties in the world that we are naturally being affected by. Does the member not think that it would be a good idea to strike a committee to do an audit and a review to see what negative impacts, and maybe positive in certain areas, we can find so that we know exactly what is going on with this free trade agreement and then we can go from there?

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, as a parliamentarian with eight years experience, I think that I can give an answer to my hon. colleague from the Liberal Party. Before taking up politics, I was an industrialist and over the course of 28 years, I have worked to set up three businesses. By 1988, they had the capacity to export to the U.S. I extend an invitation to my hon. colleague from the Liberal Party to come and visit my riding of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup. He will see that employment has doubled in these businesses established in a city with a population of only 13,500. I am not talking about big cities like Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, but Rivière-du-Loup. The free trade agreement has enabled small business to seek new markets in the U.S.

The hon. member quoted a book. Let me quote in turn Mrs. Elisabetta Bigsby, vice-president of the Royal Bank International Trade Centre. I have learned a few things in politics. The politicians in this House are all bright people, but there are others outside these walls and we must listen to them. In a speech she gave in Quebec city earlier this week, Mrs. Bigsby, vice-president of the Royal Bank International Trade Centre said that Quebec has done the right thing in supporting free trade. That is not a politician talking, or a reporter or an author. I think we should believe Mrs. Bigsby.

She was the keynote speaker at a conference lunch organized by the association of Quebec business women. They carry some weight, as you know, Mr. Speaker. She said, and I quote:

> When you depend on a single market with relatively few products, as we do in Canada—

She did not say Quebec, she said Canada.

> —you are in for a bad time when the economy of this buyer country slows down. That is why diversification must be emphasized, be it geographic diversification or product diversification.
> Here in Canada, we often blame high labour costs for our international trade failures. In Germany, labour costs are even higher than here and Germany is still a world power.
> We can give two good examples of Quebec companies—SR Télécom and Vêtements Louis Gareau. SR Télécom exports 90 per cent of the communication satellites it produces.
> Vêtements Louis Gareau makes high quality sportswear and exports all over the world. Those are perfect examples of companies which, even with the high cost of labour, have found free market niches and have penetrated the export markets.

Mrs. Bigsby mentions that 50 years ago international trade represented 20 per cent of all commercial transactions while it represents more than 50 per cent today.

She concludes by saying:

> Since international trade is now done between blocs like the EEC, Asia, South America or the members of the free trade agreement, Quebec was right in approving this Agreement which can only be good for the province.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer another question. The member mentioned that I did not talk about investments in my statement. I'll have him know that Pratt & Whitney, for example, made investments of approximately $130 million in Halifax and that Louisiana Pacific Panel Products Limited invested $65 million in Point Tupper, Nova Scotia.

Pratt & Whitney Canada also invested $1.8 billion in Longueuil, Halifax and Mississauga, Ontario. Papeterie Daishowa invested $130 million in Quebec city and another company invested $120 million in Rivière-Beaudette, Quebec.

Now for the investments in Ontario; there is Dupont—$600 million in Kingston, Trenton, Ajax, Whitby and Sarnia; Bois Cascades Canada—$90 million in Kenora, and I am only talking about investments made in Ontario, not in Quebec. Kimberly-Clark—$60 million in Terrace Bay, Ontario; Goodyear Canada—$370 million in Napanee.

I could go on and on but I will stop here and say this: it is easy to forget. We never take the past enough into account; is the past not a taken of things to come?

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I am going to share my time with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

I should comment at the outset that this is an opposition motion by the New Democratic Party, moved by the member for Winnipeg Transcona. Earlier in the day he made reference to the member for Vancouver Quadra not carrying on the fight of his life. That member was the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada during the last election. It was a fight, a tremendous fight.

But I want to point out that if the leader of the New Democratic Party had attacked the government with the persistence that we did, then the government would have been turfed out of office. But rather than attack the government that is responsible for the free trade debacle, members of the NDP attacked the Liberals because they were determined that they would be the official opposition. But had they attacked the government and the government was turfed out, they could very well have ended up as the official opposition. The Liberals would have been in power and we would have scrapped the free trade agreement at that time and we would not be in the mess we are in today.

I thought I would get some applause from the New Democratic benches but, Madam Speaker, there is not one here to take part in their own debate.

I take part in this debate today as a Canadian who has witnessed first hand the systematic dismantling of this nation by a government whose loyalties are to the rich and the powerful, loyalties that should be toward this nation and her people, but loyalties that have been redirected toward interests outside of Canada, corporate interests whose objective is power and financial domination.

Canadians are now paying a terribly high price; high unemployment, factories closing and moving to the United States and Mexico, our social systems being dismantled and medicare eroded. The free trade agreement has stripped Canada of the power to intervene and protect our cultural, economic and social programs. In fact I have to wonder just how long it will be until medicare is hit with a countervail action by the United States.

This could be the scenario. A United States firm raises the issue that its company is paying its employees' health benefits and a competing firm in Canada is taking its markets. Because Canadians have a current health plan that covers everyone, then I suggest that such a countervail will take place.

This free trade agreement is an unmitigated disaster, even worse than we had forecast. The U.S. trade remedy laws are intact and indeed supersede the agreement, but here in Canada we made many changes to our laws; changes to the unemployment insurance premiums, crop insurance, interest free loans on farm stored grain, the At and East, and the list goes on, all to accommodate the FTA. These are items that are brought about by various sectors of our economy due to the needs of our people, but items that could be misconstrued to be subsidies and subject to countervail by the U.S.

When we look at some of the actions by the U.S. since free trade came in, the countervail on our lumber, the fish issue on the west coast, the continuation of the export enhancement programs, in clear violation of the free trade agreement, our government does nothing. On March 18, 1991, I laid out the procedures in an adjournment debate in this House, as reported at page 18640 of Hansard, to call for consultations on compensation under the free trade agreement but the Tories have done nothing. They have done nothing to protect Canadian grain farmers from the huge export subsidies in the U.S. These grain subsidies are driving our producers out of business and causing very low prices in the total grain sector.

In the softwood lumber case we had unrestricted access to the United States market for our lumber, for everything except prefabricated housing and plywood. Unrestricted access was negotiated under the GATT in the Tokyo round and given away under the free trade agreement. Now we have a government trying to throw up a smoke screen and speaking of retaliation. This is sheer hypocrisy.

I have said from the beginning of the FTA negotiations that it totally ignores the reality of the climatic zones and agricultural geography of North America.

As a life-long agriculturalist I contend that the FTA is clearly detrimental to the economic well-being of the Canadian agriculture sector. Mother nature alone dictates that there is no level playing field. Our physical loss in Canadian agriculture, our climatic area, our soils and abundance of moisture have been completely ignored.

In 1987 the United States government identified Canadian marketing agencies and systems as a trade distorting structure. Yet our negotiators and the government have done nothing to protect our industry against continuing attacks from both inside and outside Canada. Not only have they recognized the differences in our physical base but they have now admitted the fact that input costs in Canada are 25 per cent higher in comparison to those in the United States. They have not admitted that either.

More than 80 food processing firms have closed in Canada since January 1989, 46 of those in Ontario alone. Over 80 food processing plants have closed since free trade came into Canada. By contrast, we see huge new hyper-plants becoming the norm in the United States. If one U.S. company can supply a particular type of ice-cream with only two huge plants in the whole country then we have to realize it could easily supply the smaller Canadian market also without much addition.

Consequently, by ignoring these differences and entering into a free trade agreement that did not specifically exclude the essential elements of our industry, Canada has been placed in an impossible situation by this government. The Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement would make this situation even worse, particularly in the area of food production and processing.

It is imperative Canadian people know what is going on in these negotiations. We currently see the Canadian dairy and poultry sectors under siege at the GATT due to the free trade agreement and the fall-out.

Time after time we have seen time honoured Canadian institutions established under statute of this House being traded away in secret, behind closed doors at the GATT, in the free trade agreement, and now in the Canada-U.S.-Mexico trade negotiations.

I am deeply concerned that on May 1, 1991 our trade minister threw his support behind the U.S. position that environmental concerns be excluded from the negotiations in the North American free trade agreement. They are ignoring global warming and the thinning of the ozone.

In June 1991 the same minister said that he wanted to see Canadian firms get the same access to the inexpensive Mexican labour pool as U.S. firms. Again they are ignoring the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians.

Just to give some indication of the differences in the wage rates, I have a chart here showing Mexican total compensation and minimum wage data. In 1980 the manufacturing sector in Mexico was paying $2.85 an hour. Now it is down to $2 an hour. In 1980 it was a $1.36 an hour in the Maquiladora manufacturing area. It is down to 99 cents an hour now. The minimum wage in 1980 was $1.21. It is now down to 59 cents. Is this what the minister had in mind when he is going to tap those huge labour pools?

I have to ask the government: If that is the case, what is it going to do to the standard of living in Canada and what opportunity does that present to 1.5 million unemployed Canadians?

On the other hand, we intend to show the people of Canada what is happening here. Because of that reason we have to know what is going on because the government is not going to tell us. Will we continue to allow foreign investors to siphon off huge dividends from our economy, from areas which exercise near monopoly positions in the market and have profits three times higher than those of their own United States operations? As we examine such instances do our competition laws apply, and what about the anti-trust legislation in the U.S.? Is it being enforced? I suggest not.

We are seeing a massive concentration of power in the hands of fewer and fewer trans-national corporations and the direction of this government is giving them the agenda to carry out their ambitions.

I am deeply concerned about the future of this nation, the people of this nation and their standard of living. In Mexico, as I pointed out earlier, the wages are far, far less. Yet the government keeps telling us we have to be more competitive with a nation whose wages are far below ours and are still going down.

Finally, what can I tell my grandchildren? I can only recall to them the era when I was their age, an era which put the needs of the people, the needs and welfare of the population, above the greed and the ambitions of huge corporate structures.

As a Canadian, I am very alarmed about what is happening in Canadian society today and what is happening to our structures, to our institutions. It is time the Government of Canada listened to the will of the people and stopped taking direction from the multinational corporations whose bottom line is profit and greed.

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to my colleague across the way. Certainly I do this with no malice because he is a friend of mine and a colleague in Lambton county. Maybe we would want to talk about our home turf as far as the free trade agreement is concerned and about the multinationals in our area that he seemed to be berating a bit. Many people who live in his riding work for either Dupont, Shell, Cabot Carbon, Dow Chemical, Esso, ICI or Ethyl. All of them are multinationals that have contributed a great deal to our community. To my mind they are companies that we all respect. They helped to build our county and our city and provide the sound, economic situation we have there.

I would hope that he was not referring to them when he was talking about the multinationals that he seemed to be indicating were raping and pillaging Canada.

On a more specific note, the free trade agreement enacted a five-year countdown on petrochemicals and tariffs. In two more years after this one there could be no tariff on petrochemicals because there is a possibility in the free trade agreement, if we have mutual agreement on both sides, to have them removed completely.

I hear his party berating the situation, talking about the dollar and the dollar needing to be lowered to have this competitive advantage. Yet I say to my colleague and friend that the free trade agreement allowed the tariffs consistently, five years or less, to be removed. This definitely makes a much more competitive position for exporting that product to the United States. All the companies in our areas supported the free trade agreement. They thought it was good because it made them more competitive. What that means is stability of jobs for the people who work in his area. Many of them supplement their farming operations by working for these companies either on an hourly or on a salaried basis.

He might want to reply to that for those back home to understand exactly, not so much those where my friend comes from but maybe where his party comes from.

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to respond to my colleague from Sarnia—Lambton on this very issue. I should point out to him that the Esso Corporation, Imperial Oil Limited, first started out in the town of Petrolia which is in my riding. Oil was first discovered in North America in Lambton county. It was really the birthplace of the oil industry.

However, I see the difficulties it is going through. I think of those employees at Imperial Oil who walked out the door a couple of weeks ago with no prior notice whatsoever, having been given their pink slips. I see what is happening to the petrochemical industry in that area, as well as in western Canada. It is under pressure and in direct competition with the petrochemical industry on the Texas gulf coast. I just have to wonder what is going to happen here in the long term when it comes to the free trade agreement.

We have to recognize that when those companies came into Canada, under the automotive agreement they had to operate as responsible corporate citizens. The decisions had to be made in Canada for the benefit of the majority of Canadians. That is not happening today. It is one thing that has to happen. If companies based outside Canada are going to operate in Canada, they have to be brought to task, adhere to the principles that will meet the needs of this country whether it is the environment, the welfare of our people, or for the good of the country in general.

I should point out that I have documentation on one large firm that had sales of $4.3 billion in 1990. It sent $538,700,000 in dividends back to the parent company in the U.S. It borrowed $474 million to do that. It was a tax dodge. The Canadian consumers are going to pay back that loan and pay for the interest on it. We have to get back to basics here and make sure these corporations, these transnational corporations, act as responsible corporate citizens in this nation.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, let me preface my comments with an opening remark. I suppose we could say with some certainty that the eyes of the nation are not exactly centred on the House of Commons, on this Friday afternoon debate. I say that with great regret because we are today dealing with what in my view is perhaps one of the most important issues facing Canadians now and in the future, that is a trade policy that makes sense for Canadians.

The reason it is important is that the trade policy, if we would call it that, of the present government, is in shambles. It has come apart. The wheels have fallen off. The sides have collapsed and it is going nowhere except downhill.

Do you remember those bright days of 1988 and jobs, jobs, jobs? The Prime Minister was accurate in one sense. The jobs, jobs, jobs have all gone south. Some 400,000 of them have left this country in the past two years: manufacturing jobs in southern Ontario, the petrochemical industry in Alberta and fish processing plants on the west and east coasts, furniture factories in Manitoba, clothing and textile factories in Montreal. Name it. It is happening. The jobs have disappeared, not been added to.

We also saw clearly this week the great touchstone. I looked back at the record where the Prime Minister said on March 16, 1987 that our highest priority was to have an agreement that ended the threat to Canadian industry from U.S. protectionists who harassed and restricted our exports.

What have we been debating all this week? Harassment of the United States against some of our most critical industries: hydro power in Quebec, softwood lumber which affects every province across Canada, automobile industries in Ontario. If this were the highest priority then I think any honest judgment would indicate that it has been an abject failure. The reason is that it started out with a fundamentally flawed premise that we could tie our trade strategy to a continental approach. We can lock it into North America. We can put all our eggs in that basket. We can have a dispute settlement mechanism confined simply to North American trade and Canada would become the land of milk and honey. At the time we said it would not work that way. It has not worked that way. It defied the fundamental historic experience of Canada over the past 40 years in international trade that we have to work inside an international, multilateral framework to make it work.

The unfortunate part of signing the free trade agreement is that we abandoned that approach. We sort of turned it over to this North American cocoon. The real tragedy is that as the world changes, as we become more interdependent, the opportunity for trade development around the world is increasing and the Canadian opportunity to begin opening trade niches in eastern Europe, in the Russian republics, in parts of east Asia, in central and Latin America are expanding but we are not in a position to take advantage of them. Canadian trade in those areas is falling drastically behind.

One of the reasons is because of the free trade deal. We are putting handcuffs on ourselves. Limiting our ability to process our materials, limiting our ability to invest and give the kind of support to specialized Canadian industry to attract those markets is a direct result of the free trade agreement. We lost control over our own ability to have an industrial trade strategy to enable Canada to expand its markets around the world.

That was our contention during the debate of 1988. We were not arguing about lowering some tariffs because as Liberals we have been in favour of bringing down trade barriers around the world. What we were against was the price we had to pay under the free trade agreement to get that, a price on limiting investment, energy, industrial strategy, regional development. All those things that Canadians have used over the years to provide for a targeted, managed trade strategy we surrendered, we abandoned. We put a strait-jacket around ourselves and as a result our ability to respond to the burgeoning international trade opportunities is thereby limited.

We have seen in the debate this past week where time after time ministers of the Crown have got up to try to defend first the indefensible, which was the signing of a memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber in 1986, really one of the classic disasters. It makes the Battle of Dunkirk look like a victory by comparison.

I will never forget being in this House—some members were not here then—when the then minister of trade, the Hon. Pat Carney, arrived back from her vacation in Hawaii and declared to the House of Commons: "We have won a great victory" to the great applause of the Tory back benches. We had put a 15 per cent tax on ourselves, one of the great sort of ingenious solutions to a problem and in doing that, gave up the right to challenge the U.S. law at the GATT where we would have won the case and forced Americans to recognize that their trade law is wrong. We gave up an opportunity to use the international forum to challenge U.S. law.

I have heard the minister of trade, the Prime Minister and all the other acolytes get up and say: "We have a dispute settlement mechanism under free trade. That will work for us". They do not complete the sentence. They do not complete the equation. The dispute settlement mechanism under the free trade agreement does not allow us to challenge U.S. trade law. We can only look at whether that trade law was properly administered or not. It is not a question of being able to say to the Americans: "You are introducing protectionist trade laws that can harass us". All we can say to them is: "Did you adjudicate it properly?"

It is not a trade dispute settlement mechanism when you cannot challenge a bad law that is killing our industry. When they get up and say: "Let's use trade dispute mechanisms", they are using it as a smokescreen.

We are saying that it is not a question of taking the free trade deal and saying: "Let's get rid of it", as our friends here are saying. What we have to do is look at that free trade agreement, see how it is affecting Canadian industry and sit down with the Americans and properly negotiate those parts which are doing damage to Canada. That is the practical response.

I am surprised, and perhaps some member of the New Democratic Party will explain to me that when we took that stand, it did not mean to say that. As members well know, our own critique of the free trade agreement, which I have just outlined, is there for all to see. It is a question of what do you do about it. We have stated our option—negotiate. If there is not enough negotiation, we will exercise the right to abrogate. It was a clear statement by our leader and by our party in convention three weeks ago.

I listened to the member from Winnipeg Transcona today who seemed to be saying that that is the wrong approach. I went back and read the statement by his leader, the hon. member for Yukon, in the Financial Post, who said and I quote, and the quote is right:

> If elected, we will sit down with the Americans and say how can we make this thing work. If not, we will give them six months notice she said.

That is a very reasonable approach and I applaud the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party for taking it, but what I am wondering is why the member for Winnipeg Transcona jumps up and down, gnashes his teeth, spits pure venom against a policy that his own leader seems to be endorsing. Mind you, he is strange, Madam Speaker.

I want to come to one final point, if I may. I realize that we only have a short time of 10 minutes. The question is, where do you go from here? Clearly we are in a position where we have to look at alternatives. I simply want to return to the trade document that we put out during the 1988 election in terms of a Liberal trade policy. We said two fundamental things. A trade strategy for Canada must be an international trade strategy. It must work through the multinational forums. It must seek to diversify our markets and we must plan domestically the kinds of programs to support Canadian industry developing those markets.

That means working to ensure that fish processing plants can process fish in Canada so we can sell to the international markets. We will do it and that is one reason why free trade is not working for us. That means investing and giving special procurement rights to Canadian industry when they buy things from a government department in order to specialize and enhance their industrial research capacity. That is what we think has to be done so we can sell our manufactured products to Third World countries or to Russia, whether it is agricultural technology or environmental technology.

We believe in an international trade strategy. We believe that even in the case of the negotiations with Mexico and the United States, we are making a big mistake in limiting ourselves to that. The opportunity, for example, of developing a hemispheric trade policy, of incorporating the countries of the Caribbean, Latin and Central America in a broad-based trade arrangement, makes some sense because we balance out the interest. We do not fall into the hub and spoke philosophy of the Americans which is all roads lead to Washington.

We are trying, once again, to have a balanced forum in which various countries can apply equal leverage to make sure that the trade law in those areas applies equally to all countries and does not have a preferred advantage for one strong economic power. I think this resolution would have been much better if we had a positive trade strategy, a constructive approach, not simply tearing up, throwing back, isolating ourselves, but one that looks to the future, one that looks at how this country can once again regain its capacity to be a leader in international trade and not a follower of continental trade policy.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened to my colleague and I want to ask him a very specific question. One of the concerns that I have always had about this free trade agreement has to do with the area related to our water resources. I have always had that concern because the chief negotiator for the United States, Clayton Yeutter, did his Ph.D. thesis in North American water management.

We have heard repeatedly from the government side of the House that water has nothing to do with this free trade agreement, yet we know that many Americans have a different view and there are also many lawyers in Canada who have a different view.

I was wondering if he could comment for a minute or two on what his views would be about water in the free trade agreement.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the issue of water was one that really became an important debate when this House was considering the free trade bill and the hearings that went on about it. What we basically pointed out was articles 408 and 409 where the United States acquired the right to perpetual access to Canadian resources. Under that we went back to the annex of what those included. It included water as part of the annex. We said that when and if the time came the Americans felt that water was a crucial resource that they were running out of—and, by the way, the time is drawing nigh, it is becoming increasingly a matter of more concern—that they could use the free trade agreement to make claim upon those water resources and that our ability to manage those resources and have our own policy would be hindered and restricted by the free trade agreement.

Furthermore, as we pointed out, we eliminated entirely under the free trade agreement the right of Canada to impose export taxes which would be one way again of ensuring that we would have the right, in terms of our natural resources, to require it to be used in Canada and if it was to be exported that we could put a tax on it to at least get a proper benefit from it. That right, of course, was again surrendered. It is one of the reasons why it is essential that the free trade agreement be renegotiated, that we expunge those articles from any kind of trade agreement because, once again, it puts Canada in a position of subservience and it puts Canada in a position of losing control over its valuable resource.

We think of the importance of water to every region of this country; to our cities, to our agricultural areas, to our sports and tourism. It will become one of the great Canadian resources in the future if we can retain control. Under the free trade agreement that is a doubtful proposition which goes back to the fundamental position of our party: the need to renegotiate the agreement.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate today to talk about a motion put forward by a member of the NDP asking for immediate withdrawal from the FTA. I am pleased to see that even the Official Opposition now, after they had a meeting in Hull where the business people came in and seemed to have a little chat with them, are supportive of the free trade agreement, maybe have it altered and changed, but certainly they are not talking the rhetoric they did in the last election of the immediate abrogation of the free trade agreement. Certainly we are on the same side as far as maintaining the free trade agreement. It is amazing how times have changed and we are pleased about that.

I think though the most important thing to understand about the motion before us today is that it represents a prescription that would lead to the isolation of Canada from its international trading partner. It springs this motion from a policy that is very shortsighted, and shortsighted in the extreme, in that it represents really a lack of understanding of economic and international trade realities.

Instead, rather than dwelling on the motion and the aspects of it, I would like to dwell upon and devote my time today to an explanation of how I feel Canada's vital interests are served by the government's decision to participate in a North American free trade negotiation. I would also like, for the benefit of my hon. colleagues across the way, to outline some of the anticipated benefits that would flow from a successful conclusion of a NAFTA agreement.

I also want to show, with respect to this last point in particular, how a successful conclusion of the NAFTA will result in a positive contribution to the ability of Mexico and its brave peoples to fully launch itself on the road to economic prosperity and the democratic development that they so much desire.

In the last 40 years, international trade and economic environment has evolved to the point where the isolationist and mercantilist policies of old have been discredited, as we all know. We are in a global economy. Governments, and indeed entire political systems, have come to the realization that it makes no more sense to throw up barriers between countries than it is to throw up barriers between parts of a single city or a county. We have seen what gifts history has brought to those countries that have put up barriers around them, and we all know too well what has happened to their economies.

Global interdependence makes each of us dependent upon each other now. It is a structure that most fully rewards the competitive advantages of nations. We have seen in decades past what happens in a world where economic security will lead to political and military insecurity.

The North American free trade negotiation is but one element of the government's over-all trade and competitiveness strategy, which is designed to ensure the future prosperity for Canada and all Canadians. That strategy also includes action plans designed to deal with the complex issues being discussed in the Uruguay round of the multilateral trade negotiations of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Both were preceded by the successful negotiation of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, which has given Canada increased access, as I especially noted earlier, to the companies in my constituency. It has given them more access and lower tariffs and more competitive advantage in the U.S. marketplace.

The proposition that Canada is part of the global economic reality seems to be one that is denied by certain members from across the aisle, and it certainly is denied by the motion we have before us today. We on this side of the aisle understand that Canada has succeeded in building a modern post-industrial society, where fully a third of our economic prosperity depends on international trade.

My hon. colleagues would be surprised, undoubtedly, to learn that Canadian exports account for over three million jobs in Canada today. With so many jobs on the line, it is certainly sad, indeed, that we are debating a motion that would, if enacted, result in Canada giving up our preferred access to the U.S. market and to turn away from negotiations with one of the most dynamic economies to emerge in all of Latin America.

However, simply being in the game is clearly not enough. The government and the private sector, including the labour movement, must all work together to ensure that Canadian workers are given the tools necessary to win in this competitive situation we are in. For that we must equip ourselves so that we can play and beat the best in the global arena we are all in.

The government understands that to win, Canada must improve the competitive position of individual business enterprises as much as we must improve our competitive position as a nation. My colleague, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, has launched a competitive investigation, a competitive consultation across the country so that we can look at the five main areas of concentration of competitiveness.

The government understands that learning and education must be a lifelong commitment that serves not only to enrich our lives individually, but also a commodity that ensures the ability of Canadians to respond to future economic challenges and secure long-term, high wage jobs.

Canadian companies need to be given the flexibility so they can successfully adapt to changing market signals. On the production side they must become adept at translating international scientific research and technology into products that can be sold in markets secured by trade agreements.

We need to ensure that innovative Canadian companies have access to equally innovative financial and investment tools and strategies that are needed to support an outward-looking growth-oriented economy able to successfully compete in the global marketplace.

• (1450)

On the home front, our international efforts must be complemented by a more active dismantling of those domestic barriers that inhibit a more competitive and integrated Canadian market.

The fifth major element of the competitive study and competitive rebirth must be that of ensuring that Canada retains its ability to participate in a meaningful way in the foreign markets. This can only be ensured by a strategic approach to international trade negotiations such as that followed by the government in its successful negotiations with the FTA, the Uruguay round and NAFTA.

The presenter of the motion before us today does not seem to understand that trade within North America is already at a level of some $250 billion annually in American dollars. Negotiation of a North American free trade agreement is a vote of confidence by the three countries in the anticipated future of that trade.

Seldom have trade negotiations proceeded on such a solid foundation as that provided by Canada, the U.S. and Mexico. I have already noted that the three-way trade is approximately $250 billion American in trade. To that fact I may note that the combined gross domestic product of the three parties is in excess of $6 trillion U.S. If you are looking for a market in which to develop, produce and sell your goods, you would certainly have a difficult time finding a better one and a more expansive one in the world than the North American market.

The North American market will afford Canadian companies greater opportunities to forge additional economies of scale and production efficiency. On a foundation of enhanced competitiveness, they will be able to increase the capacity of their production as the barriers to trade are gradually phased out.

When considering the need for Canada to be an active participant in NAFTA negotiations, I would ask members to reflect on the fact that Mexico, after the United States, is our largest trading partner in the western hemisphere. As I said, a successful NAFTA negotiation will open up the Mexican market, which itself is poised for expansion. While trade between Canada and Mexico is relatively small now, accounting for some $2.2 billion in two-way trade, a NAFTA will provide an opportunity for us to expand upon that lucrative market for Canadian companies.

In the first instance, Canada seeks to negotiate the gradual removal of Mexican tariffs and other import barriers that currently block Canadian exporters of goods and services from reaching their full potential. The Mexican market is currently 85 million strong and is growing with each passing year. As the economy of Mexico grows, so will the purchasing power of its citizens. Mexico is an economy in transition and a successful NAFTA will help to position Canada to take advantage of the growing commercial opportunities that are presenting themselves in that country.

Also of great importance is the need for Canada to preserve its place as a preferred location for investment, both foreign and domestic. By offering investors access to not only the Canadian market, but also to those markets in the U.S. and Mexico, Canada will help to maintain our inherent attractiveness as a place to do business. A North American free trade agreement will guarantee that no matter where a company chooses to build its plants, it will have access to all three countries, and artificial trade barriers will not be a determining factor as they make those decisions.

I have also heard the minister say that Canada has a chance to build upon the achievements of the FTA where such improvements are of benefit to Canada. This was noted before, but now the Liberal Party seems to be saying yes, we are against the motion today; we want the FTA to remain but we want to improve upon it. Well, we have that opportunity in the NAFTA negotiations to explore the possibility of mutually beneficial improvements to the FTA. For example, maritime shipping could be one area that we certainly would look at. Also, content of cars in the agreement could be looked at.

A successful NAFTA would provide Canadian firms with greater access to the lower-cost production inputs that are necessary if we are to remain competitive with the dynamic economies of Europe and the Pacific Rim that we are competing with. The ability under the agreement to source high-quality products, high-quality components from, say, Mexico by our Canadian component assemblers could be a definite advantage to the competitiveness of our companies.

Following on the lead established by the FTA and carried forth in the MTN, Canada seeks, in the NAFTA, a trade dispute settlement procedure that is rapid, that follows clear and fair rules, and that is cost effective and accessible to the Canadian business sector. Trade disagreements, while they only involve a small percentage of the total trade between nations, can develop into major irritants if countries do not have at their disposal a fair and impartial method of settlement. As we know, before the FTA, we did not have one.

As was noted earlier by my colleague opposite from Winnipeg, who said, "Well, the dispute settlement mechanism is not any good", we did not have anything before. Yes, maybe we can end up with an even better one. Certainly we have taken it out of the political realm. As you know, the U.S. political scene is special interest driven, and it was special interest politically driven in the decisions that we were getting through the U.S. commerce department, and there was no other place to go. Now we have an impartial tribunal dispute settlement mechanism that certainly has proven already, in a couple of instances, to be beneficial to Canada.

Before closing, I would like to lend my support to one of the themes raised by the Prime Minister in Question Period some few days ago. In answer to a question, the Prime Minister noted that the government felt strongly that the NAFTA afforded Mexico the opportunity to further its development goals. Mexico's President Salinas has said, on more than one occasion, that Mexico would prefer to reach its development goals through trade rather than through foreign aid.

Again, I am surprised at the NDP putting together such a motion. It is for helping the down-trodden and for people who need help and helping them. Here is an opportunity to help many people in the country of Mexico to raise themselves up economically through a free trade agreement on a North American basis. I am very surprised that it would not be supportive of that, to help them raise themselves economically.

In ending, I would like to say that I have, in this debate, attempted to explain some of the benefits that will come to Canada as a consequence of our participation in the North American free trade negotiations. I would hope that all members of the House would come to an understanding that Canada's future lies in securing a prosperous place on the stage of international trade.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I just want to congratulate my colleague for the rather sound and principled speech that he has put forward on this important question that was placed before the House.

I also want to congratulate him on his reluctance to move too deeply into some of the comments that we heard from the previous two speakers. It shows great control on his part, control that I am not at all sure that I have available.

I have heard the comment again about water. My goodness, how many times must we go around that issue? They tried it in the election of 1988 and it did not work, and it is not going to work now.

Then we had the old chestnut again raised about medical costs being somehow challengeable under the FTA. Everybody knows that is not so. You cannot challenge a universal program available to all under that. Even if you could, Madam Speaker, the costs rung up by our American colleagues in most of their major industries for health insurance is far, far more expensive and therefore challengeable than costs to Canadian corporations.

• (1500)

The member opposite should know that and get off this business of once again trying to frighten those people in Canada who need that kind of protection, particularly the seniors. I find it almost despicable that we are into this again.

I congratulate my colleague for not being quite as vigorous on this matter as I am.

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, I do not know if there was a question there from my colleague, but there certainly was a comment. I would like to comment on his comment.

I was reluctant to even respond to this business of water. I am a little surprised because I have the feeling that the members of the Official Opposition have altered their position because of a conference they had over in Hull some time ago. Perhaps some people told them they were a little off base. The free trade agreement is important and it should be maintained. Now they are saying: "Yes, but we want to improve upon it". That is well enough said.

But to go back and start talking about water or including the old fear-mongering they tried in the last election, I would suggest that they not continue with that at all. I do not think it goes over well with the Canadian public today. I would suggest that they should stay way from that.

We certainly welcome their support of the free trade agreement. There should be a free trade agreement. Also the member from Winnipeg mentioned with some positiveness the NAFTA. Wow, I guess the numbers must not have been in his favour at the meeting in Hull. It looks like they are coming of age and understanding. When one is the government one gets to understand it to a greater extent. They must have had a few people bring them on side at their little session in Hull. This is pleasing and we are pleased to have their support.

They have some great ideas and suggestions on how to improve the North American free trade agreement. That is great but do not use fear-mongering. I do not think it is fair that Canadians be subjected to that kind of thing. Water never has been and never will be part of a free trade agreement between Canada and the United States. That is known by practically everybody, other than those who want to use fear-mongering.

I appreciate the opportunity to respond.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I was just listening at the tail end of the speech of the hon. member. I would just like to comment on the free trade agreement as such.

I believe when we were discussing the free trade agreement and Mr. Reisman was our negotiator, he was assuring us that there would be a period where there would be adjustments, otherwise we would be losing jobs.

The most important thing he forgot when he was negotiating was that our cost of production is much higher than in the United States. The cost of money is much higher because our interest rates are much higher and the rate of taxation is much higher than across the border. Therefore, how can we compete and have a free trade agreement on the same level if the cost of production is much higher here than in the United States?

Naturally we are seeing that industry is moving south because we are unable to compete. It is much more expensive to produce north of the border than south of the border.

An hon. member: Why did you support the agreement?

Mr. Kindy: Somebody is asking: "Why did I support the agreement"? I did it because I was fooled. They fooled me. It is simple.

Mr. Mills: The whole country was fooled.

Mr. Kindy: Another member just said the whole country was fooled. This is why I believe that we should have a second look at that agreement and take steps to correct those elements I just cited. It is impossible for a country to be competitive with another country where the cost of production is much higher. The cost of production is much higher in Canada than it is in the United States.

Now we are talking about a free trade agreement with Mexico. Imagine! What is going to happen to Canada? We will lose most of the industry and become suppliers of the raw materials for the United States and Mexico. I believe this is a deal that was negotiated in bad faith.

I saw the negotiator, Mr. Reisman, at noon in the parliamentary restaurant. I do not know what he is doing, but he should be called before the bar of this Parliament and asked questions. How did he make the deal? The Prime Minister should be called because he really sold out Canada to the United States.

We have to negotiate; we know that. We have to trade; we know that, but to do so, we should be protecting the interests of Canadians and we have not been doing that.

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, hon. members should note countries like Japan and Germany. They probably have the highest wage rates in the world yet they compete with automobiles and they compete throughout the world. They have relative differences than other countries. It is one of a total balance sheet production efficiency side.

What are we going to do? Close all the borders up? Stay within ourselves, throw millions of people out of work? We have to be competitive. We have to compete in the world. We have to open up our borders and we have to learn to compete with our productivity and efficiency.

I was thinking earlier of the members opposite, rattling about the free trade agreement. As a government, they overspent for years and years and drove us into a debt situation that has made for increased taxation. That is one of the big reasons we have a problem with competitiveness that must be turned around. We have to get rid of this massive deficit, this situation that they put us in. They are rattling about a free trade agreement, about being competitive. They put this country in a position of indebtedness and it will take us years to get out of it. I am appalled at them coming forward with such arguments.

Members say we have to compete, that our industries have to be competitive, but they have to have somebody to compete against or otherwise we, as consumers, just keep on paying ever higher costs for things. We have done this for many, many years and we are fed up with that sort of stuff. We are not going to do that any more. Our companies have to be competitive. We have to compete and we can compete.

We do billions and billions of dollars of trade with the United States and we compete every day. Seventy per cent of the product from major corporations in my area goes to the United States. We can compete. We are looking at building a new major world scale ethylene plant in Sarnia. It can compete operationally with the gulf coast. It has an after tax problem that we have addressed in the budget and now hopefully Ontario will help us with it, but it is operational. We can compete so do not say we cannot. Dupont can compete, ICI can compete, Esso can compete, Cabot Carbon can compete, Ethyl can compete. They will all ship product into the U.S., our biggest market so do not tell me they cannot compete.

We are going to compete more and better and better as we look at how to help them in a competitive situation in our country.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak for the second time in two days on the subject of trade and free trade.

On Wednesday night, the House had an emergency debate on the disastrous effect the Canada–U.S. trade deal has on the softwood lumber industry. We heard members talk about job losses the Americans will force on us. Members opposite tried to convince Canadians that we will receive a favourable decision from the binational panel.

However, the result is clear. The trade deal has not benefited Canada and has done serious damage to some very important industries.

As I said the other night, this government tried to convince Canadians that with the trade deal the Americans would become our partners in trade. There would be a glorious and prosperous future. The country would be more competitive and we would have guaranteed access to the United States market. Canada and the United States would work together. Sadly this is not the case.

Practically every trade action taken against Canada in the last number of years has been launched by the Americans. B.C. salmon and herring processing was challenged by the Americans. The U.S. challenged us over ice cream and yogurt. Our problems at the GATT over supply management are caused by Americans who wish to destroy our supply management system.

The subsidy war between the U.S. and Europe is killing our western grain farmers, as does the decision to put a duty on Canadian built Hondas and the softwood lumber tariff. With friends like that we do not need many enemies. The Americans will not look after our interests that is very clear. What we need is a government here in Ottawa that will protect Canadians. Three years after the deal let us look at the results.

There are over 1.4 million people in Canada looking for work. Today there are more food banks in Canada than there are McDonald's restaurants. Every day we hear about another plant closing, jobs moving south to the U.S., all this from a deal that was supposed to make us competitive.

A large reason for the failure of the trade deal was this government did not provide the adjustment programs it promised during the election campaign. It said it would not be possible to determine what job losses were caused by the deal. I say it would be easy to find which jobs were lost by the deal. Just count the Canadian companies that have moved to places like Buffalo, Seattle, Florida and Louisiana. Companies do not move because of the weather, they move because they can make higher profits, because the cost of business is lower.

The federal government did not help the situation because it allowed Canadian interest rates to soar and the value of the dollar to climb, making exports less profitable. The Canadian food processing industry has been particularly hard hit by this trade deal. In order to have a prosperous food industry you need two things, protection for your producer and protection for your processor.

Before this deal Canada had both. Supply management allowed farmers in the dairy, egg and poultry sectors to earn a decent return on their investment while ensuring a secure a supply to customers and industry at a reasonable price. As well with some import duties our food processors were able to make a fair return on their investment while providing jobs for Canadians.

Now, with the deal, the protection for our food processors has been removed and what do we see? Something like 80 Canadian food processors have closed up shop and moved to the U.S., throwing thousands of Canadians out of work.

What the Americans could not get through the trade deal they are trying to get from the GATT by challenging our supply management. It is a small miracle that there is any food industry left in Canada at all.

The Liberal Party has always believed in a competitive and prosperous Canada. With co-operation between business and labour and the right policies from government, Canada can provide a prosperous future for our children.

New Democrats refuse to recognize the reality that the U.S. is our largest trading partner and that we should work toward a favourable trading arrangement with the Americans.

The government should seek to improve the trade deal with the U.S. Sadly we know this government is unwilling or unable to stand up for Canadian interests. That is why after the next election a Liberal government will stand up for Canada in renegotiating the deal and if we cannot reach a favourable agreement then we will invoke the six month withdrawal clause.

It would be foolish to slam the door shut on our largest trading partner without first seeking to solve our problems. Heavy dependence on one partner is never wise, but it will take time before we can develop markets to move into.

The government wants Canada locked into a deal with the American giant without looking at the consequences. The New Democrats want us to abandon $200 billion in trade. That is not possible.

What is possible is the Liberal position of negotiating a better deal with the United States and through multilateral agreements expand our trade options.

We cannot go blindly into the future. We must develop a balanced approach that favours Canadian interests and Canadian jobs.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments that the hon. member made—

Mr. Boudria: Yes, they were excellent.

Mr. Soetens: In fact they were excellent from his perspective. They were very well delivered and I compliment him on it.

The question I would really have is that he talked about a better deal, that the Liberal Party would negotiate improvements to the deal. But as I listened to his speech, I did not hear him comment about what those improvements were.

Rather than leave it up to the electorate to elect the hon. member's party and after the fact say: "There, now we are elected and we have dotted that i which was not dotted before, that makes it a better deal," I would be curious if the member could give me three or four examples of very clear things that he thinks ought to be improved upon.

Mr. MacAulay: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from across the way. There are a number of things. We certainly have to find out exactly what is going on. Here we are involved in a trade deal with a nation that is ten times our size and we have not established yet what a subsidy is.

There are many things that we have to do just to find out exactly where we are.

I also think we have to look at things that happened for example in the fishing industry, in the herring and salmon industry on the west coast.

The Americans were always striving to have a certain percentage of the fish to process, but through the trade deal we did not permit this. The ink was hardly dry on the deal when the Americans applied through GATT. I would be very surprised if the government was not aware that they would be able to obtain this through GATT. They were able to obtain the fish through GATT and because we have the trade deal we were not able to put an export tax on the fish.

Unfortunately, now the Americans have the right to a certain percentage of our salmon and herring on the west coast. It is very unfortunate because we lose a lot of jobs, jobs that are badly needed on the west coast.

On the east coast in the lobster industry, it was in 1990 when the American government decided that they were going to increase the size of the lobster. We can always go to this great dispute settlement mechanism, but from what I understand it only decides whether the law of the importing nation was properly applied.

For an exporting nation where, in the name of God, does that leave us? We are an exporting nation and the Americans decide we are not going to ship the fish in. They decide possibly we are not going to ship potatoes in.

The problem I see with the trade deal is that the Americans do all the deciding and we, as an exporting nation, need to have some say in the process. As far as I can see, we have very little say.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure today to debate this supply motion.

I must tell you that I do not agree with the New Democrats' motion, and I challenge them to rise right away and contradict me when I say that this motion is definitely not in Canadians' interest. You will note, Madam Speaker, that they did not even reply. But I want to tell you that I would not want the government opposite to start thinking that I am about to praise it either, because that will not happen.

• (1520)

Now that we have established that, let us read carefully what those fine people to the far left want us to do.

They want us to say that in the opinion of this House, Canada should withdraw from the negotiations concerning the North American free trade agreement. Withdraw. Don't want to talk about it; don't want to even see what the Americans are going to do to us when we are not there. They prefer that we not be there.

Okay, maybe by not being there we will not know how bad things are, and therefore what we do not know will not hurt us, according to the NDP.

We should also give notice of withdrawal from the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and pursue a global strategy not based on making the planet an unfettered playground for the multinational corporate elite.

Now that last sentence is a little catchy. But I would like to remind the House what it is that happens when New Democrats propose motions that are not thought of very seriously.

I will give you an example to make my point. You will remember that some weeks ago we had a New Democratic motion on GATT. Well, someone sat behind the word processor at the great NDP nirvana someplace in this building and wrote a press release.

They announced that the NDP were proposing a motion that the government refuse to sign the GATT. I have a copy of it right here, it is dated February 7 and it was supposed to be in regard to the February 12 opposition day.

The NDP released a few copies of this around and some people did not like it. Actually, many of their supporters did not like it, particularly in western Canada. So they had to run around pulling back the copies of the press release already issued because they had embarrassed themselves, that Canada should not be part of the GATT.

Maybe we should move Canada to another planet, according to the NDP. They live on the moon anyway, most of them are Looney Tunes, so they want us to move someplace else.

When the motion did appear in the House, it said "that this party calls on the government to support unequivocally a GATT accord that would—" and then it gives all those fine things that a GATT accord would do. It is not exactly the same. You see what happens? A press release, some people talked to the NDP, they smarten up, and then the final draft.

Do you know what happened today? No one proof-read the motion. That is what happened. And, because no one proof-read the motion, we have a motion here that calls on Canada to run away from the North American negotiations. For all I know, the deal might be a bad deal, but how will we know unless we are there?

Then also, that we should pull out of the free trade agreement.

Madam Speaker, we know that in my riding, we lost many factories because the free trade agreement was badly negotiated. But I ask the New Democrats this: What factory in my riding will reopen if the free trade agreement is cancelled? That is a good question! I know of none, not one. Of course the few industries that may have gained would also lose with that. So we would have lost those that we had already lost and we would lose the small gains made since then. We would be losers all around. That is the New Democrats' position.

Now we have the position of the government opposite, which signs anything that the President of the United States shows them. That is the other side of the story. So here we have a free trade agreement that was signed late in 1988, if I recall. This free trade agreement was signed in a building in Washington, apparently over a meal of Kentucky fried chicken, at three o'clock in the morning by the then Minister of Finance, who had come to Simon Reisman's rescue. Despite all his finesse, Mr. Reisman had managed to bungle the whole deal.

So we have this badly negotiated agreement which contains no definition of subsidies and includes a regulatory mechanism that of course binds Canada but not the United States, a partner ten times as big as the other, with nothing to offset this disadvantage. Finally, it contains nothing to set the value of the respective currencies, which means that as our dollar rises, we can lose as much as if a previously existing tariff was reduced.

Everything I mentioned, Madam Speaker, is what the government opposite gave us. The members on the left, the far left, want to undo what has been done without going back to what existed before, because that is impossible, and want to withdraw from the negotiations as well.

[English]

It could very well be that when the so-called NAFTA agreement is finished, we will not like it either. It could very well be that the government will not even like it, for all I know, although the Americans like it. Anyway, I will give them the benefit of the doubt for the moment. Not much of it, but some.

The point is, how do we know all that unless we are there at the table negotiating? How do we know that the Americans will not give away what we have when we are not there? How do we know that they will not establish policies between each other that will be a nuisance to us, unless we are there? We do not know that. That is why this motion should have been proof-read. That is why someone at the headquarters of whoever wrote this thing on the back of an envelope last night should have reread it before they put it on the word processor. That is why this is wrong.

That does not mean that we should be congratulating the government.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, this government has not protected the Canadian economy as it could have.

[English]

If I have a few minutes left, I would like to read an excerpt from a letter by a constituent, Mr. William Howieson, who sent a letter to The Ottawa Citizen responding to an editorial they had written on farming. Because of the very limited time, here is what he said, in part. He was comparing Canadian farmers to U.S. farmers. He said: "The 1990 New York business summary of 395 farms reveals that the total cost to produce 100 pounds of milk in the U.S. was $15.27. The comparable figure in the 1990 Ontario Farm Accounting Project of 204 farms was $15.32." In other words, there is a 5 cent difference out of $15.

Some members across the way who do not support supply management—not all; by and large the government does—and some so-called consumer advocacy groups are not aware that our farmers here in Canada are every bit as efficient as those on the American side. What is different is the subsidy afforded to both groups.

The hon. member for Algoma raised the point this morning in Oral Question Period in the House of Commons when he told us about a study done in the United States which reported the thousands and thousands of dollars in subsidies to American producers at the same time as those people claim to want to compete with us on an equal footing or "level playing field".

There is nothing equal, Madam Speaker, when Canadian farmers compete with the U.S. treasury. There is nothing equal about that.

[English]

In conclusion, I want to tell Canadians that what we need is neither the folks across the way nor the extremists, who are left with their ridiculous concoctions that they brought to the House today. What we need is something more reasonable, like a Liberal government.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and participate in this very important resolution.

• (1530)

There are, I guess, three points of view being expressed in general. One is from that group that the previous speaker describes as, if I can quote him correctly, Looney Tunes, or something on that basis. I am not sure I necessarily share the name, but I think it adequately reflects a view. The second is from those across the way. The third, of course, is from those on the government side.

Before I give some comments on that, I have a slight quiz for you. I do not know if you would like to answer this, but let me give you a few quotes and we will see if you can answer. If you cannot, I will be glad to provide the answer for you.

Who do you think said: "We need lower, not higher trade barriers here and around the word if we are to build efficient manufacturing industries and increase our productivity?" Who do you think said: "Not only could Canada benefit considerably from freer international trade, it is incorrect to claim that trade liberalization would destroy certain Canadian industries." Finally, who do you think said: "He isn't moved by the insecurity these issues raise for affected workers. I want these people to be afraid of losing their jobs. It's the best motivation in the world."

I realize it is going to take some considerable thought as to who said all those great words. It would be hard to identify him with anything he is saying today, but it is the actual Leader of the Opposition today who made those comments. In fact, they are quoted in Le Soleil, July 15, 1978 and in Hansard on October 20. The questions are there. They are very clear. They are his.

I do not think I heard any of that comment today from members opposite, but I thought I would share them with you, because they obviously have some influence. Should they ever form a government, heaven forbid, they will come back and say: "Yes, but you know what I've been saying all along. What I said during the election campaign is not really what we were going to implement. Just look at my speeches prior to the election." I think it had something to do with that back in the mid-seventies when they campaigned against wage and price controls, and after the election, they said: "Look what we said before. Don't count that." They campaigned on 18 cents a gallon and then afterwards said: "Forget what we said during the election. Look at what we said other times."

I thought I would share that with you. I am sure it is of benefit.

Let me give you more recent information. I think there are some interesting articles. In yesterday's Globe and Mail, in an article written by Peter Cook, there are a couple of paragraphs I would like to relate to you. Peter Cook said:

> The anti-free traders are wrong. But, in the absence of an alternative and in their willingness to misapply every fact and statistic, they have a great capacity to deceive. It is now routinely stated that all the jobs lost in a cyclical recession have been lost "under" or "since" free trade.

I carry on. It says:

> A new study by WEFA Canada of Toronto entitled "Why has Canada's economy performed so poorly?" sets the argument in its right context, explodes the free-trade myth, properly takes Ottawa and the provinces to task for very fundamental policy mistakes and deserves to be better circulated and read than the betrayal-of-Canada drivel put out by the anti-free traders.

I thought I would share that with you. There are some people out there in the world who say, particularly here in Canada, yes, we've got some problems and yes, governments have made some mistakes, both federally and provincially. I would have loved to see the dollar stay at 84 or 85 cents rather than go all the way to 89 cents, and yes, that would have been much easier if we had not had the deficit remain in the $30 billion range during the last six or seven years. I understand that, but the fact of the matter is we are there and we have to deal with those issues.

But to then listen to colleagues opposite talk about the devastation that has been racked on the industry of Canada and our exports, I should point out some other useful numbers, and I am sure you are writing these down with great anticipation because they are going to be useful in any speeches you might give as well.

Our exports to the United States in 1988 were $102 billion. In 1989 they were $105 billion. I realize that is about a 3 per cent increase and that is the first year of the free trade agreement. Certainly that does not sound like any disaster to anything. It does not sound like boom times either if you only increase exports 3 per cent, but it is certainly very positive.

In 1990 we went from $105 billion to $110 billion in exports. Again, that is about a 5 per cent increase, but no great boom times. Again, it is a positive number. Unfortunately the numbers are not fully finalized for 1991, but I acknowledge that it looks like they are going to come in at about $107 billion, which is down some $3 billion from the year before. That is not great, but that is certainly no disaster. That is still well in excess of what it was in 1988 prior to the free trade agreement.

When you look at where we saw the improvements, I think that is the more interesting number, because between 1988 and 1990, our sales went up in things that were technology, in things that were manufacturing. Things like nuclear reactors, boilers, machinery, and mechanical appliances were up 6.7 per cent. Electrical machinery, equipment parts thereof, sound recorders and reproducers, television image and sound recorders and reproducers, and parts and accessories of such articles were up 63 per cent. It is certainly a nice number. Plastics and articles thereof were up 16.5 per cent; furniture, bedding, mattresses, mattress support, cushions and similar stuff, furnishings, lamps and lighting fixtures, not elsewhere specified, a 14.5 per cent increase; aircraft, spacecraft and parts thereof, a 53 per cent increase; rubber and articles thereof, a 16.8 per cent increase.

Those are all good things. What are we hiding our heads for? I am rather proud of those statistics, and that is why I shared them with you. I think when you look at some of these items that are being mentioned across the way, they talk about how bad things are and they seem to want to ignore that.

Let me give you some examples, because those are general numbers. You hear stories about all these major companies that are doing poorly. Well, maybe they are, but let me give you an example of some that may give you a different perspective.

These are all located in my riding, and I thought I would bring it down to that perspective because it is easy to take the companies in the headlines, the ones that announce their $100 million expansion or announce their closing; they are easy to identify. Here is one, a company called All Temp. It is a small business, privately owned. It employs 35 people, and it really has not changed since 1988, so they indicate. Sales volume is up. It is up considerably. It distributes motors, refrigeration parts, things of that nature. Its prices are in fact lower, and some of that is because of the actual reductions that took place in duty.

More importantly, it found that there has been a reduction in the competition from the Far East, the Orient, because it is now able to source more of their products, either in Canada or the United States, and having eliminated the duty, it is in fact more competitive against those companies who use far eastern parts. That is why its business has gone up.

It has also found that some of its suppliers have been able to source some of their production now in Mexico, further reducing their cost of the parts, which in fact has made North America benefit because of the reduced over-all cost to the whole system versus that of the Far East.

So there is a company that has clearly benefited by the free trade agreement, and it says so very clearly.

Another company in my riding is Sollas Canada from Pickering. It was recently purchased by Canadian investors from its Dutch parent. It is a small company. It is a distributor and manufacturer of various plastic banding and packaging equipment. Since free trade was implemented, the company has expanded from three employees to 15 employees. It has moved into a new facility four times as large as what it had before. Its U.S. customer base has grown considerably. Prior to 1989, it had absolutely no U.S. customers. Today, approximately 50 per cent of its customer base is U.S. oriented. What was its forecast for 1992? A great year, the best year it has ever had.

Another company is Timbrem Industries, a company in Ajax, privately owned. It manufactures heavy duty rubber-assisted suspension for trucks, a very unique product made in Ajax. It exports 75 per cent of its output to the United States; 100 per cent of its raw material is Canadian. It supports the deal with the United States, and in fact its sales volume has increased significantly over the three-year period, on an average of about 20 per cent, and it has similar forecasts for 1992. In fact, if it is convinced into the year that the year is progressing as it thought it would, it will in fact proceed with an expansion that it has on its drawing board. Now, it is not employing a lot more people, only three, but it did employ 15 to start; it now has 18. That is positive.

There are others. We talk about how Canadian food processors cannot compete. Is it not interesting that in fact the supplier of the fresh meat and so on to the House of Commons is a constituent of mine. It was recently a new company. It was established in 1989. The sales volume in 1991 was up 50 per cent over 1989.

That company is a supporter of the free trade agreement. It talks about the benefits in that industry which have really been benefits to the consumer. It has been able to comment that because of the competition that exists in the marketplace on processed food, and it is a meat processor, in fact the price has been much more stable.

I know that on this side of the House we would not too often, but on the other side, since those members do not usually have a lot to do in the summer, they would have their barbecues where they serve a lot of steaks. They would know that in the summertime the price of steak used to go up because it was barbecue season. Well no more. There has been real price stability in that product line.

A larger company this time, GE Canada opened a plant in my riding. GE Silicones opened a plant 70,000 square feet in size. It was talking about 1991 being the biggest year in the history of the company. It has the world mandate on behalf of GE to supply silicones to all of their operations world-wide. Its major customer is of course the United States. It is that volume that it gets out of the United States and in fact Canada that enables it to be competitive world-wide.

As I say, GE Canada just opened this new plant, but not only did it open the new plant, it had so many orders that it could not shut down the old plant when planned because the capacity of both plants was needed to fill the order backlog. That company is very supportive of the free trade agreement and it is forecasting a banner year in 1992.

Those are some examples of companies that are doing well and there are others, but what I get from the motion is that members of the NDP would walk away from all of that, would walk away from the success stories, from the whole international trade relationship that we have with the United States, the possible relationship that we have with Mexico. They criticize the international companies that create a lot of employment.

Well, what would we fall back on? I guess I can go back to my experience prior to my election. I was involved in the steel business and we exported extensively to the United States.

What did we have in the United States? We had government agencies working with the President and working with the Congress of the United States putting controls through such artificial trade barriers as a thing called a trigger price mechanism. That is, if steel was shipped below a certain price, all of a sudden it was subject to countervail action and duties and the matter would be dragged through the courts.

All of those actions were taken in the United States, not to get Canada, but were taken to get other countries in the world that were dumping their steel into the U.S. market holus-bolus. But the fact of the matter was that Canada was included.

We were innocent of all of that nonsense, but we were included because there was no mechanism in the U.S. system to prevent Canada from being included. It was simply that when the U.S. announced a duty package all countries in the world were affected.

Prior to the trigger price mechanism, the U.S. implemented various artificial quotas on the countries that were accepted, that they were going to have 3 per cent of their market and they could ship all they want at whatever price they wanted, as long as they did not exceed 3 per cent.

Canada got caught on that. Yet we were not the problem. At least the free trade agreement prevents that from happening.

The NDP would love us to go back to that old kind of system where we get swept in on all these trade disputes, whether we are a party, whether we are guilty or whether we are innocent.

We are dragged in simply because members of the NDP would love us to chuck the free trade agreement. Not only would they have us chuck it, what amazes me is that they even have the gall to bring forward this resolution.

When I look at who the NDP members of Parliament purport to represent, in my neighbouring constituency, the constituency of Oshawa, there is a company called General Motors. I will bet it fits the description of the very international companies that they are criticizing for their investments in Canada.

I will bet you the member for Oshawa has not had the guts to go back to Oshawa and say: "GM get out of Oshawa. Go away. We do not want your investment. We do not want your jobs." I wonder if the various members from Windsor have gone back and said: "You know, these international corporations that have the freedom to simply move from this area to that area of the world, care less"—they have not chased them out of Windsor. They have not said: "We don't want them in Windsor." Of course they do not say that because these people are good employers.

Simply being a large international corporation does not make it a bandit. It does not make it an irresponsible citizen of the world. There are some tremendously large corporations that in fact are very responsible.

In my riding there is Du Pont Canada that has lots of international affiliations. Du Pont is a very responsible company and before it was mandated by governments it was dealing with the whole issue of ozone within its environmental package.

I can comfortably say that as it relates to the environment, Du Pont was in fact providing leadership on the issue. Was it going fast enough? We can always debate whether it was or was not. But the fact of the matter is it started before governments started, not just the Government of Canada, I would say governments around the world.

Du Pont was on its way to trying to rectify some of the environmental problems that it knew its products were causing. But it was fine to simply criticize Du Pont. It is we Canadians, Americans and others in other parts of the world who wanted Du Pont's products, and it was happy to provide them. Once it was aware of the problem, of course it tried to rectify it.

So the NDP say: "Walk away from these trade agreements. Walk away from the FTA, and don't get involved in the North American free trade agreement".

I will acknowledge that the agreement is a very ambitious undertaking. And the agreement is being negotiated, I would say at a timely moment.

The nations of the world are struggling to compete, and we hear this all the time through multilateral negotiations aimed at creating a more level playing field for exporters. That is part of this whole GATT negotiation process that is under way in the world.

As a country, Canada is certainly trade dependent. I do not think there would be anyone on any side of this House who would debate the importance of trade to Canada. If trade is important to us, then open markets on a global basis can only benefit us.

While Canada ranks eighth in the world in exports of goods and twelfth in the exports of services, there is no doubt that our future prosperity is highly dependent upon a successful track record.

What I would say to you is that it is not playgrounds that we are talking about, which is part of the NDP resolution; it is three million jobs in Canada which are dependent upon exports. Three million jobs are on the line if we simply abandon any attempt to get involved in very successful trading negotiations.

The North American free trade agreement negotiations constitute one step in that direction. To be competitive in the world our industry must successfully compete in North America.

A North American agreement would benefit the wide range of export-oriented Canadian goods and services producers provide. The NDP motion basically says that if we get out of the FTA, if we get out of the North American free trade agreement, presuming they would want to stay in GATT, we would be left as one country negotiating with 108 others to have everybody lower their barriers. At least history has those barriers coming down.

But what members of the NDP do not really comment on is that while those barriers are coming down, there are some countries in the world where the barriers are coming down even quicker. One needs only look at Europe where in a sense, a free trade agreement has been set up among the 12 European nations, basically eliminating all barriers to trade.

We have the same happening in the Pacific Rim where countries are very quickly dropping their barriers to trade. We have the same thing happening in discussions in South America among some of the countries.

Why would we as a country want to stand on our own and try to get into all those islands of trade liberalization and have to jump hurdles, when in fact we have the potential through the North American free trade agreement of dealing with a market of some 380 million people? It would be the largest market in the world covered under an agreement. That can only benefit Canada.

I talked about the company that has imports from Mexico, and is working with the U.S. and Canadian suppliers. It is successful.

So I suggest that there is no doubt in my mind that there are some clear benefits to being involved in the North American free trade agreement. Of course, until the agreement is really finalized it is hard to say if it is a good deal or a bad deal.

I am not going to stand up and say it is a great deal. I do not know what the deal is. But I think the intent is that we should be there, we should be negotiating, we should be protecting Canada and that is why I am happy to speak today in favour of Canada being exactly where we are right now.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make a brief comment and then put two questions to the member.

I want to say what an important debate this has been today. It is probably a forerunner of the election to come. The only party in the country that is fighting for Canadians is in this House. New Democrats are fighting for Canadians who are losing their jobs because of Canada-U.S. free trade. They will likely in the future suffer even greater job losses because of North American free trade.

Clearly the debate today showed that those people in the New Democratic Party stand up for the working people of Canada and the Conservatives on the other side support free trade all the way. We are not sure what the position of the Liberals is. That is nothing unusual either. We will all have to deal with that in the election to come.

I have some questions for the member. First, we would know with regard to the North American free trade agreement that elected officials from all sides in both the Mexico and United States have had an opportunity, I understand, under security to go in and to look at the current draft agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico, the North American free trade agreement. I would be interested in knowing if he has seen such an agreement from his minister, the Minister for International Trade?

Second, is he aware if any members of cabinet or on his side have seen that agreement?

Third, would he agree that sharing the information in the North American free trade agreement might go some distance to quelling some of the concerns of a lot of people about that agreement? Would he support that kind of openness that is apparently allowed in Mexico and the United States?

If we are to accept his argument that every single job loss could not be attributed to the Canada-U.S. free trade deal—of course many things happen in an economy—at the same time I am sure the member would agree that every single job created in the country since the Canada-U.S. free trade could not be attributed to the Canada-U.S. free trade.

Fourth, can he tell the House if he is aware if the government maintains any kind of list that on the one side he can attribute job gain to the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement and where he can rightfully attribute job loss due to businesses moving perhaps to the United States under the Canada–U.S. free trade? If he is aware of that, can he tell this House and does he think that information should be made available to Parliament? If it is not available, is that not something this government should be doing if it is so proud of the Canada–U.S. free trade so that it can try to prove its point?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, first I will talk about the North American free trade agreement. No, I have not seen the draft that he has asked for. I do not know which of the cabinet has seen it. To be fair, I have not gone and asked each one of them. Nor have I seen a press release that has indicated who has seen it. However I have every confidence that all of those involved in the North American free trade agreement have seen it, whether it be the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister for International Trade. I think that is certainly appropriate.

Does the member believe we should release it to the House and to the public? He has indicated that it is available in Mexico. If he thinks it is important that he see it, I suppose he should call his friends in Mexico which the member from Spadina indicated he had down there. I am sure they would be happy to share it with him. I do not think at this point in the negotiating stage that we need to necessarily release those documents in public. It is not standard practice.

The second item relates to job loss. The member is absolutely right. There are businesses closing. There are businesses opening. Those are functions of the economy. Those are functions of all kinds of factors within the economy, whether they be poor management, whether they be international trade competition, or whether it be simply a drying up of a market. For example, there is not a great demand any more for wringer washers out there. People want automatic washers. Those things are natural in the market.

I have seen a list of extensive new investment decisions in Canada. I do not know if they are simply related to the free trade agreement directly or whether it is because those people have decided Canada is an absolutely great place in which to invest because we have a good Conservative government and good economic policies. Part of those policies are in fact the free trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to put this on the record. I would like to correct the member from the New Democratic Party.

Most Canadians know where the Liberal Party has stood on the free trade agreement. People will never forget that during the last campaign that the member of Parliament, our then leader, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra debated clearly and won the confidence of Canadians on his debating skills when it came to free trade.

Regretfully the Business Council on National Issues and other associations bought full page ads in most of the major dailies saying that some of the things that our then leader said about free trade were not accurate. Those full page ads probably had more to do with this government regaining power than anything else I know of.

However that is history. We are here today and we are about to face another election campaign. The people of Canada should in no way, shape or form think that we are running away from this flawed document.

This free trade agreement is a flawed document. The records show that unfettered, unreviewed foreign investment in this country is not working. Statistics Canada and all the government agencies will show that beyond a shadow of a doubt.

The member for Ontario, for whom I have a lot of respect, said that we on this side of the House have a great capacity to deceive. Well, I want to let the member know that he is right when he cites that there are some winners in this free trade agreement. We have never run away from the fact that there are some winners. But there are a lot more losers and those losers tend to be the smaller and medium-sized manufacturers in this country. I too, like him, was a businessman. I worked for one of the most successful organizations in this country, Magna International. Eighty percent of our business was exports to the United States in auto parts.

We had a very productive labour force and they still have a very productive labour force and they are doing very well. Large companies like Magna, Dow and Dupont—I give them respect for this—only represent about 25 per cent of the employment in this country. A majority of the employment in this country is with the smaller and medium-sized businessman.

Right now this free trade agreement is not serving that sector of our economy. It is not serving it well at all. We have a situation right now where we have a crisis of confidence in this country because not only do we have 1.5 million unemployed and another two million on welfare, but those with jobs are afraid they are about to lose them.

Therefore, when the member talks about the benefits of free trade, he would be wise, in my opinion, to admit yes, there are some winners. He was the one who said there was a capacity to deceive. He should also admit that under this agreement there are losers. There have been lots and lots of American branch plants in Canada that through rationalization have been given direction from head office in the states to say: "Listen, we are no longer manufacturing in Canada. We are no longer going to do R and D in Canada. We are going to shut you down and all you will be is a distribution centre and a sales office". The members know that well.

Therefore to try and whitewash this, when even Simon Reisman in the last two weeks has said that the Americans are really taking advantage of this free trade deal, even he is beginning to have his conscience twinged—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member would allow 30 seconds for the hon. member to reply after a long intervention.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief. Simply put I listed six companies which are all small, except for GE, in the size of the corporate entity. The other five were all small, privately owned, independently owned Canadian companies manufacturing in Canada that were successful.

I will leave it up to them to talk about the negatives. I am on the positives. Positives, BCNI, all successful people supported the free trade. Mel Hurtig, Maude Barlow, the Council of Canadians all failures. Mel Hurtig has just filed for bankruptcy. He had to sell his company before it failed. Whose advice do you want? Those who cannot make it or those who can? I take those who can.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 4 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

[English]

The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre is not present to move the order as announced in today's Notice Paper. Accordingly that order will be dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence for Private Members' Business, pursuant to Standing Order 42(2).

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved that Bill C-279, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (breast prostheses) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted and honoured to introduce for debate today private member's Bill C-279, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (breast prostheses).

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that people are protected from dangerous and potentially dangerous breast prostheses. Bill C-279 would have a number of direct affects on the regulation of the breast prostheses industry.

First, it would create within the current Food and Drugs Act a specific category for breast prostheses apart from other medical devices. At the moment, the only devices that receive specific mention in the regulations are contact lenses and menstrual tampons.

These two items should, of course, be carefully regulated. But it seems very strange to me that they should be uniquely singled out while breast prostheses should be lost in the catch-all grouping of "any device designed to be implanted into the tissue or body cavity of a person for 30 days or more".

If breast implants are given individual mention, hopefully Health and Welfare Canada might re-examine its policy about other implants as well, ensuring the safety of still more Canadians, and specifically Canadian women.

Second, Bill C-279 would affect all breast implants regardless of when they became available on the market. When the current regulations to the Food and Drugs Act were introduced in 1982, products that were already on the market had no obligation to meet the new safety requirements.

The government has yet to produce the necessary evidence that would demonstrate that the Meme implant was one of these. In fact, to this day, the only proof supplied by the government to back up its claim that the Meme implant was on sale in Canada before October 8, 1982 is a series of advertisements in various journals dating back to that period.

Based on this meagre evidence, there was no obligation to question the safety of the Meme and, therefore, to conduct a full safety review. I might add that because of this, the Meme implant was really on the market in Canada illegally.

The Meme implant is widely used throughout Canada and is by far the most popular implant in the province of Quebec. Plastic surgeons like the Meme because it is much easier to implant than some of the others that are on the market.

Thousands of women across Canada have received these implants and many are very happy with the results that this medical device has achieved. Eighty per cent of those are within the province of Quebec. However, there are also many women who have suffered tremendously because of this product.

I wonder, would these women be in the situation that they are in today had the Meme manufacturers been obligated to prove the safety of this implant. Or would the manufacturers have been forced to modify the implant so that no woman would have to go through the hell that some of the implant recipients have endured.

The third effect of Bill C–279 would be to ban absolutely the specific category of breast implants that contain a degradable ingredient such as silicone that is likely to cause the presence in the body of a substance that the Food and Drugs Act prohibits.

It seems strange that the current regulations are not sufficient to protect women from substances that are prohibited by legislation, but it is clear from the evidence presented by groups such as I know/Je sais, that they are not.

Perhaps the most important effect that Bill C–279 will have is the indirect influence it will exert on the breast prosthesis manufacturers. When they realize that the Government of Canada is finally taking this issue seriously, they will be forced to make sure that any breast implant they make for distribution in Canada will have to be unequivocally safe.

I first introduced Bill C–279 in this House almost two years ago, in June 1990. At that time, the government already had overwhelming evidence there was a problem with the regulations as they stood. One of Health and Welfare's own scientists, Dr. Pierre Blais, had spoken out about the many dangers of the Meme implant as early as 1986. Yet two years later, this government still is waffling.

For anyone who is unfamiliar with the Meme implant, it is a breast prosthesis composed of a silicon gel contained inside a polyurethane foam covering. This is the same foam that you will find inside furniture cushions, carburetors or air conditioners, except in this case it is inside women.

Rather than removing the Meme implant from the market, the Minister of National Health and Welfare chose to remove Dr. Blais from the department. Dr. Blais was forced to resign in 1989.

In May 1989, the government commissioned a review of the safety of the Meme implant. The doctor commissioned to carry out the work, Dr. Carolyn Kerrigan, was a plastic surgeon from Montreal who used the implants herself. She implanted them in her patients and benefited from the Meme's continued presence on the market. This was not a very unbiased study, was it? There is no conflict of interest here.

Her results were: "There is inadequate evidence in the experimental and clinical literature to implicate polyurethane covered implants as initiators of human cancer".

"Inadequate evidence" that they were dangerous? How about adequate evidence that they were safe? In any case, cancer is certainly not the only health risk to humans. We now know that these implants can cause a variety of diseases from arthritis to kidney failure to failure of the auto–immune system as well as a series of ailments including persistent headaches, muscular inflammation, circulation disorders, back pains and skin diseases.

Five full years after Dr. Blais' first warnings, in April 1991, the Meme was removed from the market. Last month, Dow Corning, a major American manufacturer of silicone gel implants, released evidence that it has known the dangers of silicone gel implants for over two decades. That is more than 20 years.

The mandate of Health and Welfare Canada is to protect Canadians from health hazards. It is not enough for the Minister of National Health and Welfare merely to accept the evidence it is given by the manufacturer. It does not take a rocket scientist to see the conflict of interest that is involved here.

On January 8 of this year, in response to the actions of the food and drug administration of the United States, the government asked manufacturers to stop distributing silicon gel implants in Canada. Over a month later, on February 17, an advisory committee was established to study silicone gel implants. It could be months before the study is complete.

I am glad that the government is finally acknowledging that a problem exists. Why is it taking so long? Obviously there is a problem with the legislation as well as with the process.

Even now, rather than proceeding cautiously, the government is forging ahead with plans to speed up the approval of new products. Drug reviews are being contracted out to private consultants. Many of these consultants are being paid to conduct research for the very same companies that are being investigated.

The government policy at the moment seems to be "better sorry than safe". It is not enough to have biased opinions from plastic surgeons saying there is insufficient evidence to show that a product is dangerous. Canadian women deserve more that that. They deserve legislated protection from less scrupulous manufacturers that may want to market unsafe breast implants in the future.

Each year, over one million Canadian women discover they have breast cancer. Many of these women have resorted to reconstructive breast surgery to try to ease the trauma of the painful and humiliating disfigurement that results. For some the cure is worse than the disease. Marcella Tardif was one such survivor. She had surgery for cancer. The implants she received following her surgery caused her physical pain long after she should have fully recovered.

Ms. Tardif started a support group for women who had suffered from breast implants. She found that she was not alone. Hundreds of women had been severely harmed by these implants. They have formed a support group that is called I know/Je sais. It has helped many women but the price has been very high.

Ms. Tardif has even received death threats for her attempts to get the government to do something. I myself have received a letter of threat. Obviously someone out there is very sensitive to the attention that some of us have tried to bring to this tragic issue.

It is also evident that Health and Welfare Canada is either incapable or unwilling to protect the women of Canada from unsafe medical devices. Therefore, these amendments to the Food and Drugs Act are very much required to put in place a legally binding process.

Every woman has a right to choose implantation, whether for cosmetic or reconstructive purposes. It is the government of Canada's unequivocal duty and responsibility to guarantee, to the best of its ability, that these women can fulfil that right safely. This bill takes a giant step in that direction and I can only hope that this government will have the common sense and the dignity to recognize these facts.

This is something I have been researching for two years. I do not take this issue lightly. I have spoken with experts in Canada. I have spoken with experts in the United States of America. The evidence is there. We have to make legislation or regulations. The Government of Canada has to protect these prostheses here in this country.

I urge this government to act upon this. This is not a votable bill, but I urge it to act upon this and to implement measures that will provide the safety for Canadian women.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare recognizes the importance of ensuring that dangerous or potentially dangerous breast prostheses are not sold in Canada. We also acknowledge that this is the intended purpose of Bill C-279 proposed by the hon. member.

However, Bill C-279 overlooks some important facts. The regulatory authority of the Food and Drugs Act and medical devices regulations is now comprehensive in ensuring that all medical devices meet the level of assurance that is being proposed.

But because many breast implants along with hundreds of other medical devices were on the market when the current regulations came into effect the manufacturers were not required to comply with some of the regulatory steps described below. But things have changed. The important elements of the hon. member's proposal are now already included in the current legislation.

Breast prostheses are regulated under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act. This legislation pertains to all medical devices including breast prostheses. To ensure that unsafe and ineffective medical devices are not sold in Canada the Food and Drugs Act prohibits any person from selling any medical device, including breast prostheses, that when used according to directions or under such conditions as are customary or usual, may cause injury to the health of the purchaser or user.

It prohibits any person from labelling, packaging, treating, processing, selling, or advertising any medical device in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive, or is likely to create an erroneous impression regarding its design, construction, performance, intended use, quantity, character, value, composition, merit or safety.

The Food and Drugs Act provides authority for designated inspectors of health and welfare to enter at any reasonable time any place where medical devices are manufactured, prepared, preserved, packaged or stored.

Inspectors may examine anything used in conducting tests on a medical device. They also have the authority to sample, seize, detain or make copies of documents if they believe that the Food and Drugs Act or the regulations have been contravened.

The act also requires every medical device to be labelled and packaged in accordance with the medical devices regulations and to conform to prescribed standards. These broad provisions ensure that unsafe and ineffective medical devices are not sold in Canada.

Every medical device poses a degree of risk. However, those medical devices which pose an unacceptable health risk to Canadians are prohibited from being sold.

The definition of a medical device as stated in the Food and Drugs Act includes any article, instrument, apparatus, or contrivance, including any component, part, or accessory thereof manufactured, sold or represented for use in (a) the diagnosis, treatment, mitigation or prevention of a disease, disorder or abnormal physical state, or the symptoms thereof in man or animal, (b) restoring, correcting, or modifying a body function or the body structure of man or animal.

Breast prostheses are included in the definition of a device under the act. Therefore these products are subject to the many regulatory provisions of the act and the medical devices regulations.

The hon. member's bill proposes to include a new definition for breast prostheses which parallels, if not duplicates, the definition of a medical device already found in the act.

Both describe the product as an article, instrument, or apparatus or contrivance. Both include any component, part or accessory of a product. Both definitions relate to modifying, correcting, or restoring the body structure.

If breast prostheses are included in the definition of a medical device, then one must ask why it is necessary to have a separate definition for this specific device.

• (1130)

Obviously, the hon. member by introducing this bill wishes to introduce new legislative elements specific to breast prostheses. However, these important elements are already entrenched in the current legislation.

This proposal seeks to establish conditions which, if satisfied, would permit the sale of breast prostheses in Canada. The provisions require that tests must be conducted in respect of the device.

The medical devices regulations already require the testing of all medical devices before they are sold. Every manufacturer must conduct tests on the medical device and the test must indicate the benefit and the performance claimed for the device are justified.

Members will be aware that the products on the market were excluded from this requirement and that several breast prostheses were in effect grandfathered when the new legislation was passed. Any new breast implant being introduced would have to submit an indication that such tests had been done if they were currently being introduced.

This bill seeks to provide the Governor in Council with authority to make regulations respecting, among other things, the circumstances and conditions under which breast prostheses may be advertised.

I wish to point out once again that this authority is already provided for in the current legislation.

The Food and Drugs Act gives the Governor in Council the authority to make regulations respecting the offering, exposing and advertising for sale of any device to prevent the purchaser or the consumer of the device from being deceived or misled in respect of the design, construction, performance, intended use, quantity, character, value, composition, merit or safety of the device or prevent injury to the health of the purchaser or consumer. Over and above this, the Department of National Health and Welfare produced a handbook available to women considering breast implantation.

This bill makes further proposals which include first, requiring the department to issue the manufacturer of breast prostheses a notice of safety compliance which acknowledges that the prostheses is considered to be safe and effective for its intended use.

Second, the bill proposes banning the sale, manufacture or importation of breast prostheses which contain dangerous properties thereby ensuring that Canadians have access to safe breast implants.

These objectives are important to the government. The regulatory authority of the Food and Drugs Act and medical devices regulations is comprehensive in ensuring that these vital objectives are fulfilled.

Under the authority of the medical devices regulations a notice of compliance is required from the Department of National Health and Welfare prior to the sale of any new breast prostheses in Canada.

The issuance of a notice of compliance signifies that the department has received sufficient clinical and physical testing data to be satisfied that the medical device being reviewed does not pose an unacceptable risk to health.

The requirements contained in the regulations under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act ensure that the meaningful objectives of the hon. member's bill are achieved.

It is important to point out once again that no medical device is free of risk. The Department of National Health and Welfare reviews and assesses the data respecting the safety and effectiveness of implantable medical devices such as breast prostheses prior to their sale to ensure that unsafe and ineffective devices are not sold in Canada.

The second objective of the proposed bill concerns the banning of breast prostheses which contain dangerous properties including specified prohibited substances or are prescribed under regulations at a later date. This is not a new provision when considering the authority of the current Food and Drugs Act.

Section 19 of the Food and Drugs Act clearly prohibits the sale of any medical device that when used according to directions or under such conditions as are customary or usual may cause injury to the health of the purchaser or user.

The hon. member's proposal does not allow for risks and benefits to be considered and assessed. Instead the proposal requires that implants be banned entirely.

The Department of National Health and Welfare undertakes a scientific risk assessment approach when considering the safety and effectiveness of medical devices. This approach enables the department to assess fully the health risk by a substance present in a medical device. If a medical device poses an unacceptable health risk which may cause injury to the health of the purchaser or user, it is prohibited.

In closing, I hope that I have illustrated that the regulatory provisions currently provided in the Food and Drugs Act and medical devices regulations are comprehensive in addressing the safety and effectiveness of all medical devices including breast prostheses.

The concepts proposed by the hon. member through Bill C-279 are considered to be vitally important, but breast prostheses—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was looking forward to rising and having a very factful and important debate on the subject of breast implants. I was looking forward to it a great deal. I expected that I could put forward some information that would be useful to the discussion and that would in fact help the government.

However, I have heard the hon. member for Winnipeg South, after two or three years of the opposition raising this question in the House of Commons, sanctimoniously say the legislation is adequate and sanctimoniously provide us with words like this is there to take care of any company that brings forward a product in a false, deceptive way, whose competition and merit and safety, et cetera are in question.

We have given two years of evidence in this House that this implant is not safe, that all implants are not safe. We have given indication after indication. We have met with the minister. We have provided him with documentation. We have had doctors in addition to Pierre Blais, who the government up and fired. We have provided documentation to the minister. In fact, what happens? Unsafe and ineffective medical devices, which this hon. member for Winnipeg South says will not be on the market and there are provisions to ensure they will not be on the market and are still on the market.

Do not be mistaken. We do not have a ban on implants in Canada. We have a voluntary moratorium on the use of implants. The day before the report was tabled with the food and drug administration calling for a ban on silicone implants except for reconstructive purposes, we had plastic surgeons in Quebec holding a press conference telling Canadian women breast implants were safe.

I have some real concerns about the effect of voluntary removal of breast implants from the marketplace when we have plastic surgeons insisting that they are safe. We know that the two companies, the company that produced the Meme implant, Surgitek, and the company that produced the majority of the silicone gel implants, Dow Corning, have withdrawn their products from the market. There are an awful lot of implants still lurking around in closets, in hospitals and doctors' offices that are available for use.

The sanctimonious, arrogant response from the member for Winnipeg South goes beyond the pale.

This piece of legislation proposed by the hon. member for Nepean is designed to clarify regulations to ensure that the problems experienced with this kind of implant do not happen again.

There is some speculation that some people from the company of Union Carbide for example were supplying silicone to Dow Corning in bulk. This is speculation. We do not have the entire proof, but we have some pretty exciting documentation. The company believes that the silicone gel used for the implants cannot be purified. Therefore, we have women with implants already in their bodies running the risk that they may fail and will have unpurified silicone gel running through their systems.

Strict labelling is useful but I have yet to talk to one woman who has had a breast implant who has been shown the label before she goes into surgery.

If I had any concerns about the legislation before us it is this. This legislation, according to the comments of the hon. member for Nepean in this morning's Ottawa Sun, calls for manufacturers to be the first to ensure that any breast implant is unequivocally safe. "This bill puts the onus on the manufacturer", it says.

• (1140)

It has been our experience in fact that manufacturers are the people who have been lying to us about the safety of these implants. They have not proven that they are safe. I would hope that this government would take its responsibility seriously and go beyond this bill. It should not rely on manufacturers but should listen to independent scientific study and studies in its departments to ensure that breast implants are safe.

Canada's slowness and Canada's ineptitude on this issue has created a situation where it is laughed at by the United States. The record of the United States is not much better.

We have been raising this issue in the House of Commons since before 1988 and we raised it regularly. I have asked to no avail in question after question in this House for the government to move on this matter.

Finally, after three attempts, our minister had a meeting last July with Marcella Tardif, Linda Wilson, and myself on the subject of breast implants. At that meeting, after he had told these women they were isolated cases, I know/Je sais was formed.

In Quebec we had a meeting of 250 women. A couple of weeks ago and we had a meeting in Vancouver of 150 women. All those women were in pain, all were worried, and are desperate for sensitive medical help.

In addition we know that I know/Je sais has grown. In addition to Marcella Tardif in Quebec and Linda Wilson in B.C., Janet Fontaine in Ontario and Laurie Dobson in Alberta have formed an I know/Je sais.

We are facing a serious situation. The problem we are facing is that we are waiting for a report from Dr. Baines, the woman who said when watching the food and drug administration committee at work that the women who were complaining about this were the squeaky wheels trying to get the grease. She said that we were more concerned about lawsuits and winning lawsuits than we were about women's safety. This is the person we are relying on to come back to the House of Commons and to the minister to tell us whether or not breast implants should go on the Canadian market. I would say that Dr. Baines' position on this issue is somewhat suspect because she has made it very clear that she has no respect for us.

In fact those of us in this House from the opposition who raised this issue of great concern have been accused of being medical terrorists. I would say that those who are willing to continue to experiment on Canadian women should be considered medical fascists. We remember what happened to women in the 1940s used in testing and experimentation.

I know I have very little time and there is so much to say, but I just want to refer to a couple of concerns raised by women in their letters to me. One said: "I had a silicone breast implant inserted in 1974 in Vancouver. The plastic surgeon mentioned no risks and never did it occur to me that the implants would bleed silicone into my system. I have been sick chronically for the past 10 years at least, going from doctor to doctor, even a psychiatrist to no avail. Finally I have just been living in silent misery".

A woman, also from B.C., wrote: "I am writing concerning breast implants and their safety. I wish the Canadian government had responded earlier with legislation indicating that they really had the interests and safety of women in mind rather than waiting until pressure was applied by women who had seen what happened in the U.S. regarding this bill".

I do not want to take the time to read the other letters, but I have a thick file folder of letters from women regarding breast implants. I want to say that one of them told me she is contemplating suicide because she cannot get a disability pension. Nobody considers the condition a person ends up with from a failed implant or from side effects from the implant a disability or an illness. There are serious problems that have to be addressed by the government.

I have a chronology of events I would love to go through on this issue. I have it in both official languages, but I would hope, in concluding my remarks, that we could have all-party agreement for me to table the chronology of events on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no agreement.

The hon. member for Calgary Southwest on debate.

An hon. member: What about rotation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In Private Members' Business there is no rotation, but I will do whatever hon. members want. If they agree that is fine.

The hon. member for Hamilton East can have the floor and I believe that she is going to split her time with the hon. member for Halifax.

The hon. member for Hamilton East has five minutes.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your indulgence.

I guess there is not a woman in this country, that includes women on all sides of the House, who does not fear the threat of breast cancer. The statistics are there and my colleague, the member for Nepean, has raised them again, again and again as have other members of the House.

One million Canadian women can expect to contract breast cancer this year. The statistics on death are equally as staggering. I dare say there is not a woman in this House who does not have a relative or a close friend who has been the victim of this insidious disease.

One of the reasons we have to unanimously support this bill, notwithstanding the comments of the previous member, is that we have to send a message to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that women's bodies are not the subject of experimentation.

The onus and burden of proof should not be on the woman to show that she is being maimed and dying because of a breast implant. Rather, the onus and the burden of proof should be on the manufacturer.

My colleague, the member for Nepean, made a number of very telling points in her speech. The one point that she made in passing that bears repeating is that she and others have faced actual threat for raising this issue.

I would like to read a letter into the record that I think bears repeating. It is a letter written by—

—Réal Laperrière Inc., already known for its public comments and I quote:

Madam:

It is with amazement that I read the stupid allegations you have made concerning breast implants.

I challenge you to repeat them outside the House of Commons, if you are brave enough to do so, which I doubt.

Before making such stupid statements, you should first check the Kerrigan Report, which was commissioned by Health and Welfare Canada.

It is a good thing—and that is the most important part, Mr. Speaker.

—that ridicule has never killed anyone, you would be long gone.

This letter was sent to a member who is responsible in this House for women's health. And this letter refers to the report by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, this phoney report produced in spite of all the evidence heard even from within his own department.

I think it is obvious from this letter and from all the evidence heard and the proofs provided to this House that now is not the time to back down and shrink away from this problem. Now is the time to recognize that it is the Minister of National Health and Welfare's direct responsibility to protect women's health, especially considering that the manufacturers of this product are still distributing it on the market and that even a "voluntary recall" will not stop them.

[English]

These distributors, the people who are out making a buck on the bodies of women, are not going to be stopped by a voluntary recall. They need a very specific message. That message should come from the minister of health and should say to the likes of Réal Laperrière, who frankly is a disgrace to the profession of medical distribution, that we do not take threats lightly in this House of Commons.

[Translation]

The person receiving those threats in Montreal does not take them lightly. It is a very serious matter. And it is incumbent upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare to make sure once and for all that he is going to put the health of women before the interest of manufacturers. What is more important, our health or a manufacturing process that results in such a disaster?

• (1150)

One million Canadian women will be faced with cancer this year. It could hit me or another female member in this House, who knows? We at least want to be sure that our government is going to protect us. At present, the minister of health is not protecting us, quite the contrary. If it were testicular cancer or another form of cancer affecting the male members of this House that we were dealing with, I am convinced we would not have had to wait two or three years after Dr. Blais' resignation to at least do something about it.

Therefore, I urge all of you to support this bill as presented by my hon. colleague.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to stand in this House today and support the private member's bill of my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean, but I am very sad that it is necessary to do so.

Ever since I first became involved in this issue several years ago one sentence has been running through my head, and that sentence is: Show me the studies that show Canadian women that these implants are safe. It is a very simple phrase.

I have listened in committee. I have asked questions of experts on all sides of the issue, and the question I have posed over and over again is: Where are the studies that reassure Canadian women that these implants are safe? Is this a difficult concept? Is this something that is impossible to do?

Since this controversy arose we have discovered that Canadian women, and American women too, have been used in a political battle that is frightening in its ramifications. Last week some of us visited the United States and spoke with both legislators and staffers in Washington about this issue. We have heard that women who had breast implants, particularly those who had them in a post-mastectomy situation, have been particularly used by special interest groups, including their own doctors.

As my colleague from British Columbia said or my colleague from Nepean, or possibly both, "the silicone implant is particularly popular with doctors because it is easy to implant". Certainly we have no difficulty with that. But is "easy to implant" enough when we know that there are 6,000 women in this country alone who are having severe difficulties with this prosthesis? Is 6,000 women statistically insignificant to the members opposite?

I know that members opposite care what happens to the health of people in this country, but we have been subjected over the years with regard to breast implants to a question of smoke and mirrors. We have been told over and over again by people who have a vested interest in their success that they are successful and voices like the voices of I know/Je sais are crying out in the wilderness and not being listened to. Again I ask: Where are the studies?

We supposedly have a department of health and welfare that is one of the finest in the world. It has protected Canadians on many occasions from drugs and other medical equipment that would be inappropriate. Where was it this time?

If there are studies, let the minister of health or let the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health, or let somebody on the government side come forward and table those studies so we can see them. The answer to the question is that there are no studies. There are no studies to prove that the implants are safe and there are no studies to prove that they are not harmful, and there is a dichotomy between those two.

We do not have studies. There were studies commissioned in the United States, of which we heard from various Congress people when we were in Washington last week, that fell apart within months of being commissioned, that lost half of their participants because of poor follow-up and because of no budget.

We have smoke and mirrors. We have people saying yes, they are safe and no empirical evidence to back this up.

There is not a great deal that we ask in this. We merely ask that the government show us that the Department of National Health and Welfare at the Health Protection Branch is indeed doing what it is supposed to do and that is protecting Canadian women. That is what the bill my colleague for Nepean is bringing forward and wants to do. It is a tragedy that it is not a votable bill.

What we want to know is where are the studies and show us now.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do want to emphasize that the health and safety of Canadian women are paramount and the subject of breast prostheses is a very important and a very current one.

The importance of ensuring that breast implants sold in Canada do not pose an unacceptable risk to health has been a concern of the Department of National Health and Welfare for many many years and it will continue to be. However, the legislative regime of ensuring that unsafe and ineffective medical devices are not sold in Canada should not be specifically tailored to one class of a medical device as is the case with this proposed bill, Bill C-279.

Let me make it very clear that every medical device does have some sort of degree of risk associated with it. Canadians choose to use medical devices including heart valves, pacemakers, X-ray machines, breast implants because the benefits associated with the device outweigh the risk to health. Canadians do benefit from medical devices in the form of increased mobility, longevity and the quality of life.

The health of women who have implants is the priority concern of the minister and of the department. The department has published a "Dear Doctor" letter advising all doctors across the country of the status of breast implants in Canada. Doctors have been kept informed and they have been kept up to date. A hotline was established to advise women. Last November, the department also identified specific labelling requirements for silicone gel-filled and saline-filled breast implants. Manufacturers of breast implants have been advised that specific cautions and warnings must be part of the labelling of all these products. This information assists women in consultation with their physicians to make informed decisions about the risks associated with breast implants.

There are a number of risks which are required and must be explained as part of labelling. This labelling information forms part of the type of information that is required to comply with the existing medical devices regulations. Manufacturers are advised that patients considering silicone gel-filled and saline-filled breast implants should receive information pointing out the risks associated with surgical procedures. As well, they should be advised on specific risks associated with capsular contracture calcium deposits, rupture of the implant, changes to breast sensation and interference with mammography. This information is required as part of the labelling of every breast implant sold in Canada today. It forms part of the information necessary for all women, with their physicians, to make informed decisions regarding implantation.

All of these efforts are directed to providing information for any health risk associated with these devices to women, to their physicians and to the Canadian public in general. Information of this type enables all women to make informed choices regarding breast implants. The hon. member's bill, however, would ban certain breast implants if they contained any amount of a prescribed substances without the benefit of scientifically evaluating the risks and the benefits of the medical device, and every device has an element of risk. It is the evaluation of that risk weighed against the possible benefits which ensure—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Mrs. Gaffney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that most members in this House will agree that we have been discussing a very important topic this morning and I would like unanimous approval of the House to continue the debate on this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee C.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are 35 amendment motions for report stage of Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 3, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28 and 35, standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment, all propose technical corrections to one language only. They will be grouped for debate, with a vote on Motion No. 1 being applied to the other 15 motions.

Motions Nos. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 16, 20 and 26, standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment, propose technical changes, notably to bring the text of the bill into conformity with amendments made at the committee stage or to correct discrepancies within the bill. They will be grouped for debate, with a vote on Motion No. 2 being applied to the other seven motions.

Motions Nos. 11 and 18, standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport, will be grouped for the purposes of debate but voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 19 and 29, also standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport, will be grouped for debate. The vote on Motion No. 19 will apply to Motion No. 29.

Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30, standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment, will be grouped for debate. The vote on Motion No. 30 will apply to Motions Nos. 21 and 22.

[English]

Motion No. 31, standing in the name of the hon. member for the Battlefords—Meadow Lake will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 32, standing in the name of the hon. member for the Battlefords—Meadow Lake, motion No. 33, standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport and motion No. 34, standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment, will be grouped for debate. Motions Nos. 32 and 33 will be voted on separately. An affirmative vote on motion No. 32 will obviate the need for a vote on motion No. 34, while a negative vote on motion No. 32 will require a vote on motion No. 34.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all let me say to the House that it is a pleasure to be able to participate in our discussions today in my capacity as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment and also to express to the House his regrets that he cannot be present during the course of today's discussions due to commitments that take him to an important conference, the Globe 92 Conference, and to a meeting of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment which is taking place during the course of the week.

The amendments which are grouped together before us at this stage are technical amendments. They are designed to correct some grammatical errors that were there in the latter stages of our process. In most cases they are designed to ensure that the French text is complete and accurate and so I do not think there are any areas of contention in respect to the amendments which are before us. I would like to take this opportunity, although perhaps I will do so again, to thank the members of the committee. As the committee knows we have been working on this legislation for many months.

An hon. member: Years.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): My hon. friend says years. I say however with total conviction that the legislation which is before us is better legislation as a result of the extensive debate and study which took place. As we will see during the course of the day, a number of the amendments brought forward by the government are in fact an acceptance of amendments offered by various members of the committee. Indeed, although they are in the name of the Minister of the Environment in a very real sense members of the committee will recognize that they played a very significant role in that process.

I will come back to this at a later point, but I would like to thank those members for their very active work and for their co-operation. I think as a committee we set some sort of a model in terms of our ability to work together. We also called upon the assistance of two lawyers provided to us by the Canadian Environmental Network in the latter stages of our process which I think was a significant step and one which I suspect will be adopted by this committee and perhaps other committees in the future.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, having read both the English and the French versions of the bill I believe that these "technical amendments" raise very important points of principle and I would like to speak to those and I also would like to reply to the parliamentary secretary.

Bill C-13 will have a major impact on Canada's environmental future. Environmental assessment lies at the heart of a major effort at consciousness raising. The global ecosystem is not an inexhaustible resource.

That is why we unreservedly support the principle of an environmental assessment law for Canada. Furthermore, the Brundtland report considers impact studies to be a key to sustainable development.

If the experience of eastern Europe can teach us one thing, it is that blind development at the expense of environmental quality is not really development at all, since it is only short term and cannot last.

• (1210)

That is why the time has come to completely rethink our approach to development and the progress associated with it, because human progress depends on a healthy planet.

[English]

The bill we are examining today is the child of several years of court cases which have forced the government into action. It is also, as the parliamentary secretary said, the child of almost two years of intense work in legislative committee, work which transformed the bill before us from toothless legislation into something that at least has baby teeth.

The process of creating this bill was in itself unusual. We Liberals were strongly opposed to the original legislation. We heard from several dozen witnesses following second reading. These witnesses from industry and from environmental groups agreed with us. To its credit, I must say, and I would like to compliment the parliamentary secretary, to his credit, the government chose to heed many of the concerns that had been so strongly expressed and introduced substantial amendments.

In effect, as a result of our committee work, of which the parliamentary secretary was a vital cog, we were practically dealing with a whole new bill.

The committee then called a dozen witnesses to comment on the proposed amendments. Their interventions once again substantially influenced the bill. When the final clause by clause review began, as was just said, we were again involved with two special witnesses who shared with us their significant expertise in environmental law. The result is this bill which is being reported on today.

We must remember the context within which this legislation has been developed. It comes after several years of intense controversy regarding the environmental assessment of major projects; Rafferty-Alameda, Oldman, ALPAC, Kemano, Point Anconi. The ongoing charade regarding these projects has resulted in deep public scepticism as to the integrity of the environmental assessment process. It has created widespread planning uncertainty in the public and the private sectors.

What we have virtually had in the last few years is environmental assessment through court order. In January of this year the Supreme Court of Canada delivered the final judgment on a string of court rulings on the application of the EARP guidelines. They affirm that the federal government has substantial constitutional powers to undertake environmental assessments.

We now have legislation before this House. This legislation will provide a predictable framework for project assessment. However, let me state that what is before us is far from the state of the art on environmental assessments. There are a number of fundamental conceptual flaws in the bill.

Let me enumerate a few. It does not apply to government programs and policies. It does not provide for compulsory intervening funding. It does not require the integration of environmental considerations such as the need for a project. It does not require alternative responses early enough in the planning process. It leaves the power to give the go ahead on a project to the minister with the most vested interest. It includes no direct mechanisms for the effective enforcement of the terms and conditions for product approval.

To begin with, we believe that the preamble of the bill should cite the peace, order and good government clause of the Constitution as a basis for proceeding. The Supreme Court ruling on the Oldman River dam determined that the earlier guidelines fell within the POGG power. This was a very significant interpretation and we believe it should be reflected in Bill C-13.

We also regret that the government has restricted application to the assessment process to physical works alone and did not include programs and policies. The past year has shown that a legislative basis is needed for environmental assessments of policies and programs. In June 1990, when this bill was first introduced by the then minister, the present Secretary of State, he promised that all proposals going before the federal cabinet would be subject to an internal environmental assessment. He promised that a statement on the environmental implications of new policies and programs would be made public at the time the cabinet initiative was announced.

Twenty-one months have passed and we have yet to see a single policy assessment announced. The current Minister of the Environment has stated again and again that these reviews have not been conducted because developing the methodology is very complicated.

It is not hard to interpret this as meaning that the government did not realize the implications of the statement of the now Secretary of State of Canada that it is delaying and stalling for time.

It is clear to us that just as this government had to be dragged kicking and screaming through the entire Canadian judicial system before it would implement project assessments, there needs to be a legally enforceable method for keeping its promise on policy assessments.

This act does not include the most basic principle of a truly participatory assessment system, a mandatory intervening funding program. While it gives the minister the power to establish such a program, it is purely discretionary.

Liberals view intervener funding as critical to the entire environmental assessment process. It vastly improves the decisions made and is one of the few avenues in society for public participation in the decisions regarding major project developments.

Individual Canadians are far ahead of their governments in their concern for environmental protection and in their desire for full and open government empowering people to protect the environment. To participate in environmental decision-making is key to moving toward a sustainable economy and building public understanding of the changes which need to be made.

Intervener funding is pivotal to this legislation. The examination to continue of the need of possible alternatives to a project is not applied at screening stage under this bill. Yet integration of environmental considerations and initial planning is essential to an effective assessment regime.

By limiting the consideration of need and alternative methods of meeting this need to the comprehensive study stage, environmental considerations are imposed retroactively after the project proposal has been developed. We also regret the responsible minister was given so much power to decide whether the project should go ahead.

Bill C-13 limits the environmental assessment panel to making only recommendations to the Minister of the Environment and the minister who is ultimately responsible. It leaves it entirely up to that minister, the latter, the responsible minister to determine what course of action should be taken following consideration of the review panel's report. This structure is open to inappropriate political considerations and political interference.

Liberals support a more independent structure. We support an independent agency which would administer and enforce the federal environment assessment process. It would report directly to cabinet. It would have the authority to improve an initiative, refer it to mediation or a panel for public hearings, or deny approval. Its decision in the end would then be subject to appeal to cabinet.

Finally, we are concerned that the bill includes no mechanism for effective enforcement of the terms and conditions of approval where a project has been approved.

In conclusion, I see this bill as a step forward, a step out of the quagmire of environmental assessment by court ruling. It will provide greater certainty for all players in Canada.

That being said, however, it is very clear that a future Liberal government will have to make many changes to this bill if it is to be truly of use as an instrument for promoting environmentally sustainable development.

Those are my comments on the technical aspects of the changes being made.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it has been some time in coming, getting Bill C–13 on to the floor of the House of Commons.

I for one have been with this process almost from the beginning including my appointment to the pre–study committee that considered Bill C–78, this bill's predecessor, so I am very happy to see it come to this stage.

I am also very happy to see the changes that have been added to this bill since the initial drafting occurred. I have a number of introductory remarks to make at this stage. Before I do that I just want to express one concern on the process that has occurred here in bringing the bill to the floor of the House today.

• (1220)

Of all the weeks in the year for the government to call this bill, it chose the one in which the Minister of the Environment has other commitments outside of Ottawa. He is attending Globe 92, a very important and interesting environment conference. The dates of the conference have been known for many, many months.

It just so happens that while this bill has been ready to be called to the House at report stage for some time now, this is the week that has been chosen.

I am most disappointed that despite all the work the Minister of the Environment has done to get us to this point that he is unable to be with us here today to see the conclusion of his and our efforts through the departmental and committee stages of this bill.

Before getting into the specifics of the amendments and later on the bill, I want to mention that I have a great deal of thanks for the Minister of the Environment for the direction he has allowed this bill to take.

He has been counselled very well by members of his staff, by departmental officials and in particular by members of FEARO and Department of Justice officials. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment has been most helpful during the committee stages.

I was most happy to work with the parliamentary secretary and officials from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office. The president, Michael Dorais, and the vice–president, Karen Brown, have been most helpful throughout the whole developmental process. From the Department of Justice, I would very much like to thank Beverley Hobby for the work she was able to provide to all of us at the committee stage to get us to this point.

As my Liberal friend noted earlier the committee was aided in its work by two environmental lawyers. This is a first, I believe, for committee work in the House of Commons. The committee was very well served by Bill Andrews from the West Coast Environmental Law Association and Brian Pannell from McJannet, Rich in Winnipeg who provided their expert assistance during the amending process of the bill.

Obviously, any member of this House who has a chance to read Bill C–13 and compare it to former Bill C–78 would know of the vast differences between the two bills and the excellent contribution that both those individuals gave to us. It is a credit to the committee chair for allowing this process to fall into place and to be used.

I also want to have on record my particular and personal thanks to Louis–Philippe Côté from the Library of Parliament who was of great assistance in writing amendments for my side of the table and to my own staff and the research staff of my party, Bruce Tate and Sue Wilms, who have provided a tremendous amount of assistance in achieving the things that we have with this bill.

It will be seen as we go through the rest of these amendments today and at third reading later that the amending process and the amendments which were brought forward have vastly improved the bill.

I want to note one other thing at this point. I am hoping that the government takes note. This process began a little over two years ago. Actually, it probably began about four years ago when the need for environmental assessment legislation became known. But a little over two years ago the government recognized that specific legislation was going to require quite a bit of work.

The government began a process known as pre–studying the bill. In fact the committee was struck to pre–study former Bill C–78. I was appointed to that committee, and before the committee actually got to do most of its pre–study work the bill was introduced into the House and the committee got changed to a legislative committee looking at Bill C–78.

I want to stress very strongly that the government should be doing more pre-study work on bills of this nature, bills that are of great importance, bills that have a fairly technical nature to them.

It is obvious with the changes that this bill has undertaken that we could have saved a tremendous amount of time within the department and the ministry, and on all sides of the House, if in fact the pre-study stage had taken us almost to the point we are at today before the final bill was drafted and introduced for continuing debate in the House.

I was very supportive of the pre-study work. I was most disappointed when the pre-study ended and the bill was introduced as it was. As a result we have noted very clearly that the bill was drafted without all the benefit of the knowledge that was required to produce a specific and very important bill.

On that final point, I do want to note that we in the New Democratic Party who have worked on this bill and who have consulted on this bill recognize that Bill C-13 is perhaps the most important piece of environmental legislation that this government has had to deal with.

The Environmental Protection Act that passed in the Chamber a while ago was an important piece of legislation that took us forward in terms of environmental legislation. But with this bill on environmental assessment, if the people of Canada cannot participate in environment assessment, if the public is not involved in environmental assessment, and if the government is not serious about environmental assessment, the country and the world, the planet is doomed.

The people who are going to Brazil in June of this year recognize—and I know they already do because I have read the round-table reports and other reports that take us toward Brazil in June of 1992—that the importance of this legislation is one that we have to recognize right from the beginning of this debate.

The government has indicated through its acceptance of many of the amendments that have been put forward that it considers this bill to be important, and I am very pleased that we are going to take this in the next couple of days through to conclusion and put in place an environmental assessment bill that is going to serve the country well.

Like my colleague who spoke just moments ago, I want to stress in the beginning moments of this debate that in fact, if this bill were written by a New Democratic Party government it would have significant changes over and above those which we are taking here today.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-13, particularly on this first grouping of amendments. They would certainly appear to be very technical in nature, as my friend the parliamentary secretary points out.

It is worth while to take a good look at these particular amendments. It is good to let the public know what these changes are about and what kinds of changes the government should also be including at this time and which it has neglected to do.

Most members in this House and many Canadians are aware that the environmental assessment process in this country really got going in 1974 with the rather loosely worded guideline to cabinet—that was during a minority government in 1972 to 1974. That was followed up by the EARP guidelines order that came in in 1984 which through a series of court decisions such as the Rafferty-Alameda decision and others has come to have the impact of administrative law.

I know the government has been concerned about the growth in the number of review panels that it has basically been forced by the courts to undertake. It has gone from about three panels a year four years ago to more than twenty per year now.

Moments ago I was looking at a ministerial document stamped secret, always handy to have during a debate. You can get a pretty good idea of what kinds of expenditures and PYs the government is planning in terms of this legislation and what kinds of loopholes it wants to build in and the ones it has left built in. One of the concerns that will be heard over and over during the debate this week is that the government tried, and successfully it seems, to court proof some sections of Bill C-13 to make it more difficult for the public interest to have certain kinds of projects properly assessed. There are also some Mack truck loopholes built in and we will certainly be dealing with those. Some of them are right within these motions and I will be dealing with them more specifically in a moment.

Of course there is the whole regulatory question. There are 15 sets of regulations, as my friend for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake reminded me this morning. He has done a terrific job in stick handling more than 100 amendments to try to clean up a very complex piece of legislation, perhaps too complex. When you think of 15 sets of regulations and pages and pages, there is an old adage that the longer the law, the more loopholes there are.

It is like income tax. The reason the government continues to produce huge amounts of tax laws is so that it can create loopholes for its friends.

Let us look at what the expected costs were when the Minister of Environment was having an assessment following the Speech from the Throne promise of what can be expected. In the 1989–90 fiscal year the A–base was expected to administer the 1984 cabinet guidelines order. This is immediately following the federal ruling on Rafferty–Alameda. It expected an A–base of $53 million. It only asked for a $500,000 increase and it wanted the person–year A–base to go up to 351 persons, an increase of 300 persons as a result of the court rulings. By 1993–94, it expected the A–base to increase to $118 million per year and person–years to go to 351. So the actual number of people it expected would be working would be 537 administering in relation to court rulings.

This is the process that got us where we are. The cabinet makes a loose ruling in 1974. In 1984 we get a natural cabinet order. In 1987 Our Common Future is published. More widely known as the Brundtland report, it recommends that all countries in the world have a mandatory, legislatively based environment assessment process. By 1987 it came to be recognized that it is not only cost effective and cost efficient, it is the only way we can actually have sustainable development. We must start right at the initial screening process and look at the alternatives to projects which regrettably, as my colleague for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has pointed out, were dispensed with by the government. It refuses to accept looking at alternatives at the most important stage, right when a project is being conceptualized. The importance of having these kinds of assessments is now globally recognized because the environment in many, if not most areas of the world, is continuing to decline and be degraded because of inappropriate construction, development, dumping practices and so on.

The government made a commitment. Our own Prime Minister in the fall of 1987 endorsed, as did the premiers, the Brundtland commission report and for the past four years, first Bill C–78 and now subsequently Bill C–13, which has risen from the ashes of Bill C–78, has finally made its way to the floor of the House. Today we are looking at the amendments which are proposed by the government, by my friend for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and my friend in the Liberal Party who described this bill as having baby teeth. I am not sure the baby teeth have even grown in yet. I would say it is a bit gummy yet. We are going to have to see how the government goes about gumming some of the big projects that are out there like James Bay, Rafferty–Alameda, Oldman dam, Kemano II, and Point Aconi because there is somewhere between $20 billion and $60 billion worth of projects that have been conceptualized and are coming off the drawing boards or, like Oldman, are in fact there.

Legislation can often be judged by how a government has been acting in the period leading up to that legislation. If one looks, for example, at Oldman one has to ask why the Minister of Transport has not even put in place an order for which he has power, authority and control under the Navigable Waters Act to require that the impoundment not be filled any further. The studies are still being done. The panel is still there. The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on it and this government will not even live up to a Supreme Court of Canada ruling.

When I say that this is gummy legislation, it is administered by the Gummy Bears. We have the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Transport and all of these other ministers. They have a piece of legislation full of loopholes, full of discretionary authorities and powers, 15 sets of regulatory authority, bureaucrats all over the place and you have to look for will.

Mr. Speaker, I know you, having played centre in football, understand the need for will. You have always exercised your will well here, but I am just not quite so confident about some of your colleagues when I look at some of the major projects that are out there that they have exercised their will and their discretion in the best interest of the environment.

We look at the major projects out there and how they have fumbled the ball time after time. You never missed a snap. I have looked at the old footage. But these ministers have played a lot of ball without a helmet and it worries the public out there that this government has not really shown the kind of really serious interest in protecting the water quality, the forests, the wildlife, air quality and even our international commitments on global warming, the ozone and so on.

I would describe this as pretty gummy legislation. The Liberals say there are still baby teeth. We may hear from the minister later in the week that this is dentured legislation.

Let me look, in somewhat more depth, at some of the particular projects in relation to this legislation and see where it would lead us. There is the discretionary power and the ability of the government to move to mediation rather than to public review panels and to not have included legislatively, as it should be, intervener funding which should be in there with a trigger that the public can access so that they know if there is an initial screening being done, they can trigger certain kinds of funding. If it is a review panel or mediation it is there and it can be triggered if necessary through the courts.

The government is sending out a mixed message. It is giving the hubbub, you do not need to worry message to the provinces and the territories and it is giving: "Don't worry, be happy"—you know the little whistling song, Mr. Speaker—to the private sector: "Don't worry, be happy. As soon as this is in place, you will be able to go on with your major projects because we have got all these discretionary opportunities with this legislation".

As my friend, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard pointed out, there is going to be an election fairly soon and the New Democrat government is very likely going to have to redraft some major parts of this legislation because it is pretty loosey-goosey. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you do not like loosey-goosey legislation and neither do I. We should have got nose to nose and shoulder to shoulder a little earlier on all sides of the House and moved forward a better quality of legislation, but I guess the government had more members and it decided that was not the way to go.

My friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake did do an excellent job in getting it patched up a bit. The Liberals swung in there from time to time and got a few Johnson & Johnson bandages on to the legislation, but there is work to be done in the next few days. I hope the government is going to co-operate in putting some serious thought to accepting some of the major amendments that we have proposed. I know it has accepted many, but there are some more to be accepted. I think the public wants to know that this is going to be truly workable and useful legislation.

I was looking, just for a moment, at what is called the "Communications Synopsis". It is stamped "secret, for the ministers' eyes only" but it is always worth having a look at. It is called "anticipated impact of having this legislation passed". It is anticipated that 90 per cent of Canadians are going to think very highly of it.

It is expected that media attention could be a four on a scale of five. The media are going to give this a four, and possible headlines. These are the headlines expected. I will just give you two headlines. The positive one that the minister expects is "Government Reform to Aid Sustainable Development", the negative one could be if things did not go well with the media this week: "Feds Back Off Environmental Promises".

I look forward, over the next few days, to participating in the various motions as they come up. I regret that there are only 10 minutes with each opportunity, but I suppose there will be a number of opportunities for me to carry on in dissecting this legislation so that the public knows exactly what there could and should be in it and what is not there.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to add my voice to the debate on this very important legislation and on the so-called technical amendments that the parliamentary secretary has put forward this morning.

I wonder about the timing of the introduction of this legislation. One wonders if the legislative agenda of this government is really as out of control as it appears when the Minister of the Environment has to attend, as the parliamentary secretary has indicated, a very important conference in Vancouver and yet the government chooses this week to introduce this legislation, Bill C-13.

The Minister of the Environment has acknowledged in committee that it is: "One of the most important projects to be introduced in this Parliament". I agree with that. Bill C-13 attempts to go on from the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, which was never intended as an environmental assessment review process.

It was a stop gap measure because of the vacuum in legislation. What has flowed from that 1984 cabinet guidelines order is a large number of court cases because of the vacuum in legislation.

The committee studying Bill C-13 has worked very long and hard on making the necessary amendments. I want to give a lot of credit to my colleague from the Battlefords—Meadow Lake because I know the introduction of 111 amendments takes an awful lot of energy and I would also like to give some credit to, and unsolicited of course, my colleague from the Liberal Party because of all the work that has been done.

There has been a lot of co-operation in committee to try to make this environmental assessment process more clear and to give more certainty. We have seen the sector of court cases, the Rafferty-Alameda process, the Point Aconi process, the Oldman River process, the Kemano project in British Columbia, in my province.

This legislation is trying to stop the use of the courts as a means of determining legislation and to take it back to the House of Commons. It is our responsibility as legislators to do this. It should not be left up to the courts. It is a quest for clarity and for certainty, but it is not quite there yet.

There are other major gaps in this legislation that we will be highlighting in the coming days because it is not quite good enough for us to support yet. This is the most important environmental legislation to come before this House in many years. We are not prepared to give a rubber stamp of approval until we are certain that it has proceeded far enough so that those court cases will no longer have to be the mechanism where people can get involved in environmental assessment. We want a transparent process so that the public can be involved in assessing the environmental projects or any projects brought forth with federal funding. We also want it seen to be a transparent process so that the public is involved.

Many amendments have yet to be debated. The regulations, as has been pointed out, are crucial to the enforcement of this legislation. They are the teeth, the baby teeth, the dentures, whatever. The regulations are the real teeth.

We need some reassurance that we will be able to look at them. As legislators we are here to fulfil our responsibility to the people of Canada in a serious way to make sure that environmental review is done properly and done responsibly. That is what we are elected to do. It is not what the judges are appointed to do.

I also want to point out that we found how far we have come since 1984 with the cabinet guidelines order, how much has happened. We need to have some sort of time line that this bill, even if it is passed, gets reviewed. That is another amendment that has been put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

In conclusion, this is going to be a very interesting couple of days. I hope that the Minister of the Environment and his cabinet colleagues will see fit to be participants in this debate. It is, as the minister himself said, the most important environmental legislation to be put forth in this Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare Motion No. 1 agreed to. That means that Motions Nos. 3, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28 and 35 have all been adopted.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (for the Minister of the Environment) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 5

(a) by striking out lines 2 and 3 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"project is required before a federal authority exercises one of the following powers or performs one of the following duties or functions in respect of a project, namely, where a federal authority (a) is the proponent of the project";

(b) by striking out, in the English version, lines 22 and 23 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

(c) has the administration of federal lands and sells, leases or otherwise disposes of";

(c) by striking out line 37 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"of this Act,

(d) by striking out lines 42 to 45 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"enabling the projet to be carried out in whole or in part; and";

(e) by striking out lines 4 to 6 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"in Council take an action refered to in paragraph (a) in relation to that project";

(f) by striking out line 10 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"stages of the project and before irrevocable decisions are made,";

(g) by striking out lines 18 to 22 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"(iv) where applicable, shall perform the duties of the responsible authority in relation to the project under section 38 as if it were the responsible authority in relation to the project for the purposes of paragraphs 20(1)(a) and 37(1)(a)."

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 7 by striking out line 39 at page 8 and subtituting the following therefor:

"response to an emergency and carry-".

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out lines 15 to 18 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"ducted in accordance with any regulations made for that purpose under paragraph 59(j) as early as is practicable in the planning stages of the project and before irrevocable decisions are made."

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out lines 43 to 46 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"conducted in accordance with any regulations made for that purpose under paragraph 59(k) as early as is practicable in the planning stages of the project and before irrevocable decisions are made."

Motion No. 7.

(a) by striking out line 47 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"10. (1) Before a person or body receives";

(b) by striking out lines 4 and 5 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"Indian Act, the council of the band for whose use";

(c) by striking out lines 9 to 16 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"ducted in accordance with any regulations made for that purpose under paragraph 59(l) as early as is practicable in the planning stage of the project and before irrevocable decisions are made.

(2) Notwithstanding paragrah 51(1)(b), an environmental assessment of a project is not required by reason only of the provision of financial assistance for the purpose mentioned in subsection (1)."

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 30 by striking out line 37 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"subparagraph 29(1)(a)(i) in relation to a project,".

Motion No. 20.

(a) by striking out line 5 at page 27 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) may enter into";

(b) by striking out line 26 at page 27 and substituting the following therefor:

"may enter into an";

(c) by striking out lines 33 to 36 at page 27 and substituting the following therefor:

"(4) Any agreement or arrangement referred to in subsection (2) or (3) shall be published before the commencement of the hearings conducted by the review panel."

Motion No. 26.

(a) by striking out line 5 at page 38 and substituting the following therefor:

"graph 5(1)(b) in relation to projects";

(b) by striking out lines 13 and 14 at page 38 and substituting the following therefor:

"those projects, before irrevocable decisions are made, in accordance with";

(c) by striking out lines 16 to 21 at page 38 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) a process for the assessment of the environmental effects of projects that is consistent with the requirements of this Act and is in effect in the province where the projects are to be carried out.";

(d) by striking out line 44 at page 38 and substituting the following therefor:

"those projects, before irrevocable decisions are made, in accordance with";

"environmental effects of projects that is consistent with the requirements of this Act and is in effect in the foreign state whre the projects are to be carried out."

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by noting again that a series of motions is before us which indeed are technical. Having said that, I must congratulate hon. members on their ability to turn debate on such technical amendments into such far-ranging and interesting topics.

We have before us a series of motions designed in some cases to remove redundant or unnecessary words, because we are anxious to have the legislation as tightly drafted as can be; in some cases to add additional words by way of explanation; and to ensure the words are used in a consistent fashion throughout the bill.

I would also note that during clause-by-clause consideration the committee amended subclause 5(1) to clarify that an environmental assessment must be carried out before a responsible authority can take any action. This required changes as well to subclauses 5(2), 5(1)(c) and 5(2)(b) in order to ensure consistency throughout.

I would hope, therefore, that we could give careful but speedy consideration to the specific motions before us.

• (1250)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in addressing only Motion No. 26 I would like to say that we are very pleased to see the government agreeing with the principle that it is important to ensure that irrevocable decisions are dealt with before they become irrevocable and in harmony with the purposes of the bill as set out in clause 4. Particularly I would refer to purpose (a), which is to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration before responsible authorities take actions in connection with them. It seems to me that Motion No. 26 falls within the spirit of this purpose.

I would like to conclude by putting on record the fact that under the Liberal government in 1984 an assessment process was outlined in the Order in Council guidelines on environmental assessment matters which ensured, and I quote from the text, that "environmental matters are to be taken into account throughout the planning and implementation of all proposals falling under federal jurisdiction. This is to be done before commitments or irrevocable decisions are made".

The government has done well with Motion No. 26. I congratulate the parliamentary secretary for having taken this action.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in the House on this environmental bill.

It is true this set of amendments deals with technical amendments, but these technical changes are very important. For example, the set of amendments deals with projects to be assessed, excluded projects, Crown corporations, Indian bands, appointment of mediators, joint review panels, and provincial agencies.

I want to deal with these in a somewhat broader context. Let me say right away that there is no more important an issue in Canada and in the world than the environment. When the Minister of the Environment allegedly said that our kids should not go out in the sun, or parents should be very careful about letting their kids going out in the sun, people were shocked. I think people are still reacting to that.

I had a chance to speak to some of my colleagues and friends on the west coast who are particularly interested in the environment. Indeed some of them founded a group called Greenpeace in one of my friend's basements a number of years ago in Kitsilano, in Vancouver. Of course Greenpeace now is a world environmental agency, but it started right here in Canada, right in my own backyard in the Vancouver area.

My friends who were involved in the founding of Greenpeace tell me that the minister's warning about the sun and about the kids going out in the sun is only the beginning. As a matter of fact it is chilling, what they tell us.

Mr. Taylor: The warming is chilling.

Mr. Waddell: The warming is chilling. I do not intend to make a pun or make fun of that. This is a deadly serious matter.

What may lie ahead for us is a very different world than what we were used to. That is why I say the environment is the most important issue.

I look, as do all of us, at the letters I get from my riding. We now get faxes and telephone calls. They are very interesting, at least in my case. I note when environmental matters come up that they are inevitably from young people. When we talk to young people in they schools they ask us about the environment. I remember talking to students in the Coquitlam and Port Moody schools in my riding, a suburb of Vancouver with excellent schools and students who are very motivated in environmental concerns. Inevitably the question is the environment.

I was thinking today about the upcoming election. Someone mentioned that it may be within a year. I remember an all-party debate at Centennial High School in Coquitlam, British Columbia, during the last election. The teachers did a bit of a poll as to which party's candidate was winning. I must say that I was somewhat shocked because I was in third place in that poll as we went in.

I remember we only had a short period of time, a few minutes, and I chose to comment on the environment. When I came out of the debate I was quite far ahead in the poll because clearly I had chosen an issue the students were really interested in. They wanted to vote for someone who would champion such issues.

I took part in the study of the previous bill on the environment in the last Parliament. I was on the legislative committee. Having had that experience, I want to congratulate the members who took part in this legislative committee, especially the member for The Battlefords—Meadowlake. When he goes back to speak to the high school students in his riding in Saskatchewan I hope he will say: "I took part in the process that led to Bill C-13" because it is really important.

I say to the hon. member who is behind me in the House that I took part earlier this year in a bill on gun control. It took a long time and a lot of effort. I remember thinking at the time: You do not get a lot of credit for this; you do not get your name in the headlines on this. There is a lot of work behind the scenes. It is a heck of a lot of work and I want to congratulate him.

The world may not know what he is doing, but young people will know and are concerned about what he is doing. As a matter of fact, I noticed that the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has spoken on this issue a number of times. I was just trying to find copies of his speech. I just want to quote the hon. member when he said: "Our children are inheriting a country which is sick and diseased compared to the state of our country a generation ago. Our ozone layer has been destroyed to the extent where the federal Minister of the Environment has warned that our children should not expose themselves to the sun. Many of our lakes and rivers are dead and dying. Our forests are sold off in unimaginably large tracts to pulp and paper companies. We continue to encourage global warming and our children have been robbed of the opportunity to share our environment with many species of animals, plants, fish and birds now extinct through bad choices we have made as individuals and through our government. We can change the future".

I hope this bill will go some way to changing that future because the environment is our future. Canada must have the best environment in the world, and that is what we should be committed to as politicians. I hope this bill will go some way to doing that.

I just want to go over a couple of parts in the bill and make some comments on them. The bill, as I understand it, sets out to trigger the set-off of environmental assessment. We have seen a number of projects such as the Rafferty-Alameda project in Saskatchewan, the James Bay project in Quebec, the Oldman Dam project in Alberta and the Kemano project in British Columbia. The bill triggers these environment assessments. The intensity of the assessment from a simple screening to a full panel or mediation is dealt with; what sort of projects, activities or undertakings are to be assessed; the factors to be assessed are taken into account; who is to do the assessing; the role of the public; and the responsibility and authority of the minister.

Now it is very important that these assessments be clear and we set out a procedure. We in the New Democratic Party would like to see a better environmental assessment procedure. We believe the assessment should be done by an independent agency free from political pressure or influence peddling and the decision should be final and binding.

I am going to conclude there and come back later in the debate to speak about the role of the environmental community which was involved in this bill, and I applaud that, and some of the shortcomings of the bill which still treats environment and economic development as trade-offs. I want to talk about where I think we can strengthen the bill by making a much clearer process, a stronger process and better public input.

Let me conclude where I began. As the hon. member from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has said, I have visited his riding and it is a beautiful environment.

I want to conclude by saying that the environment is the major issue for the future. The young people of Canada understand that. They demand that their members of Parliament, as far as possible, put partisanship aside, as has been done a lot in this committee, to strengthen this bill, to make a strong environmental bill with clear protections and a clear process when we are to begin big projects in this country which could damage our environment. We have just begun the fight.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to add a few words here. I am prompted by my friend from British Columbia who has visited my constituency and travelled in particular to Meeting Lake Regional Park at one point. He rode in an antique vehicle that had been provided to us for the afternoon on a beautiful summer day on the banks of the beautiful lake at Meeting Lake Regional Park in northwest Saskatchewan.

The hon. member speaks volumes when he talks about the importance of the environment to us as human beings. We all would be much poorer without the ability to have those clean lakes and the clean air around us.

I visited India last year for the world conference with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I must say touring a country with a population of 850 million people and trying to find a clean lake like we have in northern Saskatchewan is a task that I do not think anyone could perform.

We have a lot of work to do in this world and starting here at home is a must.

The hon. member talked about regulations and he talked about working on Bill C-17, the gun control legislation. I had to tell him, as we had discussed privately during that bill, my major concern with the gun control legislation was the lack of the ability of members of Parliament and others to have access to and discuss the regulatory process.

On the member's work on that committee, it defined a regulation-making process that gave members of Parliament and members of the other place an opportunity to have a look at the regulations prior to their coming into force and being a part of the process that flows out of that legislation.

The member from British Columbia will note that one of the amendments that will come up later today is virtually word for word from Bill C-17.

I put on the table for this environmental legislation an amendment which would provide members of this House and members of the other place an opportunity to review the stacks of regulations that are going to come down in relation to this particular piece of legislation.

I am most concerned that in fact the regulation-making process is going to be the one that is going to have the most follow-up when Bill C-13 is finally law and we are operating with it in developing the environmental assessment process in Canada.

I would like to see, and I will be urging later in the day that my amendment, which was modelled on the one put forward by the hon. member in Bill C-17, regarding the regulatory process will be accepted by the members on the other side and the members to my right in the Liberal Party.

I do not have enough time to speak about this section, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that but I understand the rules and will be happy to follow the rules. This set of amendments, while it deals with a broad range of subjects, inserts a few technical matters into those sections, but in particular, Motion No. 20 dealing with the joint review panel is one that I would like to say a few words about.

The process of the review panel matters is most important to us. When we heard from one provincial minister speaking on behalf of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, he put up quite an argument that in fact the provincial process is one that has to be the governing process.

I feel very strongly that environmental assessment legislation has to be federal in nature with its strengths resting with the federal government. As we know from the environment committee's report tabled earlier this year, the environment knows no boundaries.

The environment does not recognize these historical and political boundaries that we as humans have drawn on the maps. When toxic materials go into the air and when toxic materials flow into rivers they do not stop when they come to a provincial border. They flow on and they flow on and the damage that can result is most intense.

We heard from the people in the Northwest Territories who argued very strongly that actions that take place in northern Alberta for example will have devastating effects in the Northwest Territories because of the way in which the rivers flow.

We have to be most informed, knowledgeable and sensitive to those facts.

I must say there has been a significant strengthening of the environmental and administrative credibility of the federal environmental assessment process within this bill.

The government has made it clear in the bill that joint panels must adhere to specific standards. These joint panels are an essential part of the process and a major part of this piece of legislation.

Those specific standards which the joint panels must adhere to include factors to be considered, participation in subsequent reports. The government has also through this legislation ensured a clear federal presence on the joint panels which will be put in place.

I believe that in this case the legislation is quite clear and joint panel reviews must meet the same requirements as federal panel reviews. This means that it is the standards that are set by the federal process that in fact run supreme in terms of the over-all assessment process and we will all benefit as a result of that.

In conclusion, I just want to point out to those who are watching part of the conditions under which a joint panel operates. As you know, Mr. Speaker, because I know you have read this legislation very closely as you do all legislation that in this case the minister appoints or approves the appointment of a chairperson for the joint panels and appoints at least one other member of that panel. That ensures that the federal presence is very secure.

The legislation, thanks to amendments which were brought forward, ensures that the members of the panel are to be unbiased and free from any conflict of interest relative to the project. That is not always easy to do, but it is guaranteed here in the legislation that the panel members must not have a bias or a conflict when it comes to reviewing the project on the panel.

Of course the Minister of the Environment fixes or approves the terms of reference for that joint panel. That is a very positive step.

• (1310)

There are hours worth of matters to be discussed here. Mr. Speaker, I see you signalling that my time is up. I recognize and understand that and will continue the debate as we go through the day.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting series of amendments that we are dealing with now.

Some of them touch on the regulatory provisions of Bill C-13. Many people would think that those are something that would only be of interest to lawyers or specialists or certain people in corporations who are proposing projects and might be particularly interested in some of those regulatory provisions.

As I have had an opportunity to discern, these 15 sets of regulations look a bit like a gigantic box of Cheerios. There are all kinds of loopholes being built into these regulations that neither the members of the legislative committee, who were scrutinizing the legislation, nor in fact the parliamentary secretary had a chance to go through. I am certain the minister has not even had a chance to go through all of the regulations.

It is important to put on the record some of the concerns that we have even in terms of this part of the process. There has been a growing and good habit on the government side of including more and more of the regulatory provisions of legislation with the legislation at the time of its passage.

If the government does not include the regulations, then such as we found with the recent farms legislation, an opportunity is placed right within the legislation for regulatory scrutiny. Regrettably, the government has prohibited that opportunity so far. It still has an opportunity at this time to introduce such an opportunity.

It is very important where the regulatory spread is so wide and where so many people of good interest have urged the government to include the opportunity for policies to be evaluated through environmental assessment right at its initial promulgation. Just as with a project as policies are being developed they should be scrutinized, just as should be the budget and development projects outside of Canada that either make use of Canadian capital or resources, be it intellectual or direct development resources.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House some of the concerns that have been raised by the national environmental law section of the Canadian Bar Association in terms of some of the regulatory sections that are now being worked. There is out there for some consultative purposes a work book on regulations.

In what would appear to the public to be a good piece of legislation, one would assume in its mandatory study list to include things such as new nuclear reactor sites, new major hydroelectric dams, new major forestry proposals that would impact on an entire watershed. One would think that those sorts of things would be there.

I noticed under the nuclear and related facilities assessment section by the legal community the following was found. I will try to simplify it and just get to the nub of it. It is the kind of regulatory exclusion that the public would have some difficulty digesting.

It says that the limit for items (a) through (g) in the new section on regulations related to new nuclear facilities is not justified in the view of the definitions of projects under subsection (2)(1) of bill C-13.

In addition, NELS apprehends that almost all of the limits on inclusion of projects in the comprehensive study list under this heading have been imposed not on the basis of any environmental criteria but rather to ensure minimal interference of the environmental assessment process with the ordinary course of business of the Canadian nuclear industry.

For example, the limit under (c) to nuclear reactors with a power capacity greater than 30 thermal megawatts would effectively remove from the comprehensive study the slowpoke reactors which Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has proposed for such densely populated and sensitive locations as hospitals and university campuses.

This is what we have. As I said earlier, the process began in 1974. We got our first cabinet directive for Canada in 1984 that was consolidated into the 1984 cabinet guidelines order.

In 1987 the Brundtland report Our Common Future recommended to all countries in the world that there be mandatory legislated environmental assessment processes that would include the public. By 1988 the gears had been put into forward motion here in Ottawa.

The bureaucracy was drafting, in justice and in other departments, legislation to come before the House. During that period 80 government departments and agencies were consulted. I have gone through one of these "for minister's eyes only" stamped "secret" documents for what was going on in there.

It is kind of alarming because we can go back three years and find on page 4 regarding departmental positions: "Energy, Mines and Resources supports the legislation", that is referring to the legislation before us today, "but opposes applying it to Petro-Canada and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Finances concerned about intervener funding, the inclusion of Crown corporations and the magnitude of uncertainty of the costs of the proposal". On it goes.

As the consultative process was going on, we find different ministers and different agencies trying to pave ways within the legislative process where they can find ways to slip out of, slide out of, avoid having to undergo even an initial screening.

As many people have come to realize, the court judgments that were coming down on the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, whether it was on Rafferty-Alameda, the Oldman through the Supreme Court of Canada decision earlier this year, the court rulings in relation to the Great Whale or the court process involving Kemano II or the Kemano completion process in British Columbia, there was starting to be a growing body of administrative law.

Two other processes were going on. Ministers and agencies were trying to find permanent loopholes. At the political level, government ministers were trying to convince the private sector, the provinces and the territories not to worry about this new legislation because the loopholes for them would not be seen immediately within Bill C-13, but they would come in all of these regulatory mechanisms.

Take the one example I raised. Why should Candu's new phase of nuclear reactors, the slowpokes, because they are less than 30 thermal watts, be excluded? Why should existing sites which may be more dangerous than proposed new sites be excluded?

If we are going to have environmental assessment legislation that is worth anything, it means we get out there and identify from a—I do not want to use overly complex language here—truly ecologically sustainable development perspective what are the best ways of maintaining the Brundtland definition of "sustainable development", which is that we pass on to future generations, a habitable, liveable, sustainable ecology.

That does not seem to be the case. I do not point my finger at anyone, but it does not seem to be what we are doing in the country. As I said earlier, I see the chair of the Rivers Defence Coalition here in the House today, Pat Moss, who has worked long and hard to get sensible policies applied to a major project in British Columbia, Alcan's second phase of the Kemano project.

People like Miss Moss look at Bill C-13 and say: "How would this apply to a project that already has $.5 billion spend on it in the area that I live. Would I be better with the 1984 guidelines order, or would I be better with Bill C-13?" What we do know in terms of the guidelines order is that the government, rather than even having the assessment procedures apply, used what is now recognized as an unconstitutional approach, the same Order in Council powers to exempt the project from an environmental assessment.

That demonstrates to the informed environmental community in Canada the will of the government. If the will of the government on a project that is here now in 1992 and is before us is to sneak around having an assessment, what kind of credibility should members of this House or the public put in a hidden regulatory process?

That is why it is very important to examine this series of motions. We certainly look forward to hearing from members on the government side as to exactly what kinds of assurances we can have that there is not going to be an undoing, through the regulatory Governor in Council processes of this legislation what members such as the for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and others have fought so hard to have placed within the legislation in a clear and understandable way, through a process with Bill Andrews and Mr. Pannell, that was unique and informative and had great potential.

I look forward to pursuing both the regulatory and the policy matters in the next section of amendments.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as we have heard in the speeches today in this House, the complexity of this bill is becoming clear. There are major motions still being put forward at the report stage of this bill.

I would like to focus on Motion No. 26 in particular. The language in it is: "before irrevocable decisions are made". It is very clear from our most recent history on environmental concerns that we have the language in this legislation to ensure that environmental assessment carries through before irrevocable decisions are made. That means that, yes, things will have to slow down, that maybe development is not going to go at the pace the major corporations would want it to.

Canadians have told members of this House that there cannot be development without some consideration for the environment. We now know that the Supreme Court decision on the Oldman River has come down. This is not just a victory for the environmental movements, it is also a victory for the people who made it clear in the language of this motion that irrevocable decisions have been made. The Oldman River dam is now reportedly 25 storeys tall. The taxpayers of Alberta and the taxpayers of Canada will be the ones who are paying the bill on that. This is not responsible behaviour. It was pushed through with the assumption that all was going to be well and that provincial jurisdiction was going to be paramount.

The Supreme Court has decided: "No, wait a minute. There is federal paramountcy on environmental concerns". The Oldman River decision is crucial to the way we jig the kind of jurisdictional squabbles between the levels of government.

The federal government has to have supreme authority on environmental issues. It just makes good sense. Often in this House good sense does not prevail. Rivers do flow across provincial boundaries, air flows across not just provincial boundaries but international boundaries. My colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has pointed out that the environment does not respect the nice little maps we have drawn on the globe. Therefore, we have to find the best way of determining how to care for the environment. Canada, that is the federal government, has to have the supreme authority on those decisions. Canada is the one that is speaking, not just for the country but for all the people in each of the territories and the provinces.

Motion No. 26 makes certain that the environment has to be considered before irrevocable decisions are made, so that the tax dollars that went into that 25 storey structure on the Oldman River will not be wasted in the future. It is not irresponsible environmentalists that are trying to block progress, it is very responsible environmentalists wanting to ensure that the project will only proceed when all things have been considered. That is the complexity of this bill and we will be talking about it over the next few days. For those people who are watching, please bear with us. It is complex and we want to do the best we can for environmental assessment in Canada because it is so important.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motion No. 2 is agreed to. Therefore Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 16, 20, 26 are carried.

Motion Nos. 11 and 18, standing in the name for the hon. member for Davenport, will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 17 by adding immediately after line 34 at page 14 the following:

"(3) The Minister may terminate any agreements made pursuant to subsection 17(1) if the person, body or jurisdiction fails to comply with any section of this Act and the regulations, and refer the project back to the responsible authority."

Motion No. 18.

(a) by striking out line 20 at page 24 and substituting the following therefor:

"37. (1) The Governor in Council shall";

"the Governor in Council shall, by order, authorize the responsible authority to exercise any";

"out in whole or in part and to ensure".

He said: Mr. Speaker, briefly the explanation of this motion is that there is a provision in the proposed bill on environmental assessment whereby the minister can delegate to any person, body or jurisdiction the authority to conduct any part of this screening of a comprehensive study of a project or the preparation of a screening report.

Having done so and having delegated that authority, the proposed legislation is silent on whether or not the minister can revoke this authority, if he or she deems fit to do so.

With this amendment, we are proposing to the government that it be made quite clear and specific that if for any reason the minister deems that the process is not being conducted satisfactorily, then the delegation of authority can be revoked by the same minister in charge of that process.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I will also deal with motion 18 since you have already called it. What we are proposing on the Liberal side is an amendment to shift the decision-making responsibility from the minister who proposes that particular project to the entire cabinet. This may sound a bit dramatic and sweeping but nevertheless decisions are made in cabinet which are far reaching, national and of a scope that sometimes reaches well beyond the boundaries of one district or one province.

In clause 4 of the bill, the purpose of the bill is expressed in the manner that it justifies the kind of amendment I submit. There is a collective responsibility that ought to be discharged by the entire cabinet and not only by the proposing minister, including the Prime Minister. In doing so, I submit that actually the four purposes outlined in the early part of the bill, which sets out what this bill intends to achieve, would not be compromised. It would be accomplished and accomplished better.

• (1330)

In this amendment there is also a provision for proceeding by way of Order in Council, rather than by way of a decision that is not made public. As you know, an Order in Council has to be made known to the public by way of The Canada Gazette.

This is a very important step because it gives a clear and public record of the decision made by the government, by cabinet. It spells out the conditions of the approval including the mitigation measures in the approval, and it does empower the responsible authority to enforce the conditions of the order.

So there are several goals that are achieved by way of this amendment. They are: enforce the bill, make the public information process valid and real, and also give the enforcing authority the validity and the power and the weight of public opinion in the process of enforcing the measure itself.

So for these reasons which flow from clause 4 of the bill in which the purposes are outlined, as I already indicated a few times, the amendments are submitted to this House in the hope that they will be received favourably.

If Motion No. 18 were to be accepted, it would go a long way in defusing some of the criticism that is being addressed to this bill.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the member for Davenport for bringing this matter to our attention today.

It is obvious that there is a bit of a failing in that part of the bill as to the time when the ministers can delegate authority for various matters and not have a termination clause present.

I want to commend the member for bringing this to our attention today. I want to urge the government and other members to support this amendment because of its necessity.

Just to follow on the argument in support of the member's amendment, I want to quote a brief statement from the Minister of the Environment when he appeared before the legislative committee studying Bill C-13 on October 10, 1991.

The Minister of the Environment said that "while the amendments and proposed regulatory process are the product of more than four years of work, the bill before us will affect all parts of our society and it will create a new dynamic in environmental assessment. More than 80 departments and agencies have been involved, as well as the provinces, the territories, environmental and industry groups, and many others. Let us keep in mind that this act reflects a consensus which, in turn, reflects the growing understanding and concern Canadians share about the relationship between our economic activities and our natural environment".

I will just continue the quote for another brief second. The Minister of the Environment said: "I believe that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act provides us with a flexible instrument with which we can meet the environmental challenges of the future. This bill constitutes a major advance in the field of environmental assessment. It encourages projects and practices that respect the environment, and it increases the public's influence over decision-making. This is not the end of the debate, but rather the beginning of a new era in environmental assessment".

If we take the Minister of the Environment at his word in this matter, we see that these are very strong, caring words about building an environmental assessment process that will, in fact, protect the environment over a long period of time.

What the member for Davenport has pointed out to us today is that part of the process of protecting the environment is being delegated to others, perhaps outside of the department, perhaps to anyone. We are being asked to trust the delegation of authority to those out there.

I read into the record the section that we are talking about here, section 17 on page 14:

> A responsible authority may delegate to any person, body or jurisdiction within the meaning of subsection 12(5), any part of the screening or comprehensive study of a project or the preparation of the screening report or comprehensive study report, and may delegate any part of the design and implementation of a follow-up program, but shall not delegate the duty to take a course of action pursuant to subsection 20(1) or 37(1).

What the member for Davenport is telling us is that while this is an important part of the process, because we cannot expect the Minister of the Environment to do everything, it is an important part of the process that we have to protect, without giving the minister the opportunity to terminate agreements that have been reached by responsible authorities, then what we are doing is we are allowing on some occasions perhaps an inadequate process to carry on to an end that none of us will find acceptable.

A termination policy must be in place during the course of any of this delegation of authority. It is only the minister who should eventually have the ability to terminate that agreement.

I find it would be a failure on the part of this act not to have that in place. The amendment before us today sets out very clearly and easily a way to achieve the results that I think we are all looking for.

When the Minister of the Environment says that we are talking about the beginning of a process, a beginning of a debate, we have to recognize that he is understanding and very sympathetic to the ongoing nature of the process that we have begun here.

Another amendment deals with a five year review of the act and gives us an understanding that the government is prepared to acknowledge that there are some failures that we are not quite ready to acknowledge yet because we do not know how everything is going to pan out so to speak.

We have an opportunity right now to correct one of those deficiencies without waiting for five years to do the review and to put it all into place. This is a very easy way to achieve that. Accepting the member for Davenport's fine amendment at this point is something that is the least that the House can do at this time.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the amendments put forth by the member for Davenport demonstrate not only the value of the committee work that has preceded this debate in the House, but also the depth of talent within this House.

The member for Davenport is a former minister of the environment and he has brought that history to the committee. He has seen where there are little loopholes. As my colleague from Skeena has pointed out, the longer the bill is, the more opportunity there is for loopholes.

The committee work in this House is much misunderstood and yet it is some of the most important work of this House. I know the media is focusing mostly on Question Period and perhaps on debates in the House. But behind the scenes there are some very good people doing some very good work for the people of Canada.

This is just one instance where the member for Davenport, from his experience that he has drawn on by having been a minister of the environment, has put forward these very useful and important amendments.

I hope the government will see fit to support these amendments.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to rise in support of the amendments of my colleague the hon. member for Davenport.

I would actually like to pick up on the comments that have just been made by the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands both as to the truly effective work that was done by the committee and the way in which the committee came together to substantially improve this bill, much of which is really as a result of the individual skills of the members.

• (1340)

The fact that the member for Davenport is a former member of the cabinet and indeed perhaps that person who more than any other in the political process brought environmental concerns to the forefront of the nation's concerns is indicated in these amendments.

When he talks about the way that cabinet works as opposed to an individual member, all members in this House would do well to pay heed.

The amendments he has brought forth are the fruit of a lengthy experience and it is indeed pretty heart-warming for me as a member of this House to see those opinions expressed here.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points I would like to make in response to other comments made in the House.

First of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for Davenport for his continued practice of speaking very specifically to the issue at hand.

I would also like to make specific comments to Motions Nos. 11 and 18. With respect to Motion No. 11 my hon. friend for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake read clause 17(1) which relates to a minister's power in the process of delegation.

The first thing that must be stressed lest anyone watching perhaps misunderstands is that the responsible authority in the end of course is left with the decision-making authority. That is the ultimate power.

Although there is provision in the bill whereby responsible authority may enter into arrangements to delegate part of the screening or comprehensive study, including the preparation of that material to a provincial body or body set up under the lands claims agreement or any other self-governing agreement, what is clear is that the responsible authority in the end is left with the decision-making process. I think that is as all of us would wish.

It is also important to note in clause 17(2) because my hon. friend read all of clause 17(1), but in clause 17(2) in the proposed legislation it says "for greater certainty a responsible authority shall not take a course of action pursuant to subsection 20(1), or 37(1) which relates to decision-making power unless it is satisfied that any duty or function delegated pursuant to subsection 1 has been carried out in accordance with this act and the regulations".

In other words what is very clear is the responsible authority, the relevant minister, does indeed have the power to ensure that any part of the process that has been delegated has been done so in accordance with the act and in accordance with the regulations.

It is for that reason that I would suggest to you that the proposed Motion No. 11 of the hon. member for Davenport is not necessary.

With respect to Motion No. 18 which refers to clause 37(1) in the bill, I would note and perhaps it will be recalled from previous debates, that part of the philosophy in this legislation is indeed the principle of self-assessment. It is an important principle and perhaps it is one which is not fully understood.

Part of the principle of self-assessment is indeed to accept the fact that all those who might have a responsibility pertaining to the environment are required to accept that responsibility. There have been times during the hearings when this was questioned.

The concept of self-assessment is important because it is saying really that one cannot ask any one individual, any one minister, to become in a sense a superpower.

The philosophy indeed is that this is a responsibility which must be shared by all participants, not just by all ministers within the federal government, present or future. What is consistent within the legislation is the realization that it must also be shared by other jurisdictions, and in a sense by way of implication it says by Canadians everywhere. The reason I think this principle is important is that it must be clearly understood that government alone cannot be held accountable for the protection of the environment. It is a responsibility that must go far beyond the Chamber, the cabinet or future cabinets to other jurisdictions, to Canadians everywhere.

I would also note that there is an important aspect of accountability in this process. We must remember that as politicians we are accountable for each and every one of our actions. Clauses 22 and clauses 36 to 38 provide for the publication of reports and the justification for not following the recommendation of those reports.

What is clear is there is a direct line between the decision-making part of government, irrespective of which responsible authority that might be, back to the public at large. I think that line is very important. It is a line which must be maintained.

I would also like to make note of the earlier discussion when the hon. member for Skeena, who is present, was referring to the comprehensive list and making reference to the fact that perhaps a nuclear reactor would not be on that comprehensive list. What is important in this legislation is to understand that we are proposing to put into law the methodology by which environmental assessment can occur. We are trying to make it as specific, as well understood, and as all inclusive as we can.

The fact that a particular project is not on a comprehensive list does not of course in any way preclude the fact that that project could indeed be subject to an assessment by an environmental panel, to be referred to a full review, once it has gone through the screening process. We are simply trying to delineate much more clearly now and into the future how that procedure will take place rather than the more loosely drafted guidelines which have been in place since 1984. It was not the intention that they would be law at that point in time; they were designed to be guidelines and were subsequently given the force of law by court decisions.

Here we have what we think is an attempt to clarify and to solidify the environmental assessment process. We believe that indeed we have gone significant steps forward. I would not pretend, as no other member would pretend in this House, that any law passed in the year 1992 is going to necessarily meet the needs of 1994, 1996, or whatever the time may be. We truly believe that what we have in our hands today is, as other members have said, a very significant step beyond that which we have had during the course of this administration.

I want it to be understood therefore that the decision as to whether or not a project would be assessed by way of a public panel will be the result of this process unfolding as it does. There is a series of steps in that regard and certainly I think we will discover there is a very significant opportunity for public participation in that process. Certainly, in my mind at least, we will see much more public involvement in the future than we have on occasions in the past.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment proposed by my friend from Davenport. Even as members of the public were listening to the parliamentary secretary read clause 17, it became quite clear that the termination wording as proposed by the member for Davenport is precisely required.

Before I get into the specifics of it, Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you a little story. It is always good to have an occasional little story. My friend from Crowfoot likes to hear occasional stories.

I used to live next to one of the most beautiful areas of British Columbia where the Parsnip and the Finley rivers join. A dam by the name of the W. A. C. Bennett Dam was built and flooded it back and created what is known as Williston Lake. My friend who is here, the member from Port Moody, also did some work up in that same area with the Beaver people who lived there, the Sekanni people who were flooded out as that lake was rising. They were flooded out of their home communities and they moved into Ingenika and Fort Weir and some moved on down to Bear Lake and elsewhere.

One of the things that I found interesting that they were confounded by, and it still sticks in my memory to this very day, is that during the wintertime because it is so cold in that area the surface of the lake would freeze hard with three or four feet of ice. During the winter months because of the hydro requirements in big cities like Vancouver the turbines would run all winter long and draw the lake down.

If one were to look out as the Saw people took me out to do, the Beaver people who lived that area, one would see the lake. If one were asked "how deep is the lake", one would see the frozen ice going from one shore to the other of one of the largest lakes in Canada, more than 100 miles long. One would say that it was a very deep lake. If one ever fell through the ice, as some people did in logging trucks and in other circumstances, one would fall farther than from the top of this Chamber to the floor. That would be the depth of the ice, and the whole lake had been drawn down.

The reason I raise this story is to illustrate that what you see, Mr. Speaker, is not always what you get. Looking at it in the wintertime it would look like a nice frozen lake, but if you fell through you would not get your legs in the water while you still held on to the ice.

Bill C-13 is a bit like the ice above the lake. What is really underneath, what is really found in the regulatory powers and so on, is what this bill is all about.

Let us look at what my friend from Davenport is seeking. If we look at clause 17(1), it refers to the delegation of authority and says: "A responsible authority may delegate to any person, body or jurisdiction within the meaning—any part of the screening or comprehensive study of a project or the preparation of a screening report or comprehensive study report", and on it goes. The authority can be delegated.

Then it says, as my friend the parliamentary secretary read: "For greater certainty, a responsible authority shall not take a course of action pursuant to these other subsections unless it is satisfied that any duty or function delegated pursuant to section 1 has been carried out in accordance with this act and the regulations".

We would never know that. Clearly there should be another clause to allow for termination. Let me give another example.

A friend of mine who teaches law in British Columbia was working at the University of Victoria law school. The Minister of the Environment allowed him to go in and do a computer search of what are known as class 1 and class 2 permits which allow for pollution of water, air or land, mostly pulp mills and large industries. He went through all the computer base and Canada, this Parliament, had passed over or delegated to the province of British Columbia under the Fisheries Act the right to administer the permitting structures in relation to those class 1 and class 2 permits to place effluents into water. Of course there are fish in the water.

Therefore it is a federal power very clearly understood constitutionally in this country. What he found was shocking and it still shocks me to this day. He found 75 per cent significant, non-compliance for more than a year of the permits that had been delegated from Canada to the province. The province had its environment people out there but in three-quarters of the cases there was significant non-compliance for more than a year.

My friend from Davenport is seeking what one would intelligently expect in a large federation such as ours with two huge territories and 10 provinces and without the kinds of enforceable national standards that would be required for the assessments of policy, projects large and small, comprehensive studies, and so on. Without that in place he is simply asking for an intelligent safety mechanism where a minister comes to be apprised that a delegated authority is either incompetent for a variety of reasons, perhaps not even intentionally, and comes to find himself or herself or the corporate entity to be incompetent to complete a study, to complete an assessment or whatever.

Basically what the House has to recognize during this debate is that clause 17 is simply inadequate. It does not provide the minister with the kind of authority he or she simply requires in order to be able to have either a review panel or a mitigation process properly carried out.

Again I dip into my bank of documents stamped "Secret, for minister's eyes only". It is often in these kinds of documents that one will find the tacky track record of the senior bureaucracy at the political level and what it was thinking about while this material was being prepared. I quote from "Secret, FEARO" page 3, section 10: "Mandatory procedures including public review established by the proposed legislation will apply only to projects as the case may dictate. Ministers will have an obligation to assess new policy proposals but procedures will be discretionary. Public review of policy proposals would be at the discretion of the responsible minister".

We sort of learn as we go along. We can look at Oldman. We know in the case of Oldman that the Minister of Transport is still not even living up to the direction of the Supreme Court of Canada. He was found to have an affirmative, regulatory duty. Has the Minister of Transport lived up to an affirmative, regulatory duty? Every member of this House knows what that is. Every member of this House has a copy of the Navigable Waters Act and we all know the Minister of Transport is not living up to it for political reasons.

What should be done is that the reservoir should not be filled any further. When we look at this legislation we are looking particularly at the proposed additional clause of the member for Davenport. I see you nodding, Mr. Speaker. You are in agreement now, after this vigorous and not overly protracted debate, that this is the kind of thing that should be included. I see we are able to persuade the parliamentary secretary now. Perhaps, if the minister were not at Globe 92, he would rise now before Question Period and agree that this is the kind of clause that should be included.

I think it has been a fairly successful debate this morning. I would just like to close off, Mr. Speaker. You have had a moment to reflect on my story about the level of the ice and the real level of Bill C-13. We have an opportunity, this being the springtime, to fill it back up again with goodwill on behalf of Canada's environment.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the member for Skeena, our environment critic, spoke eloquently on this amendment to clause 17. The amendment is in the name of my friend from Davenport who is a former environment minister and whose amendments and remarks are always worth considering and are usually persuasive in this House. I rise to speak on that.

The hon. member for Skeena mentioned the notion of Williston Lake. I happened to be with him one time going up that lake. It is really quite startling. It is a 100-mile long lake that was created by us, really, by engineers and so on. They created that lake and that caused some very strange things to happen.

The member mentioned what it was like in winter and the illusion of the ice, the illusion of normality. One should see it in summer. There used to be some beautiful native villages and a beautiful valley there.

It was decided that we needed this power. There was no environmental assessment, nothing. There was a dam. The Bennett dam was built there. In the summer you cannot go along that lake in a canoe because, if you do, you are liable to get a missile hitting you from the bottom. The trees at the bottom were left there when it was flooded. Over time they have become loose. As you go along, occasionally the trees will just come up like a guided missile from the bottom and surface on the lake. People have actually been hurt in boats and canoes. They cannot go on the lake.

It is important that we now get a modern environmental process that really works. That is why the minister's discretion must be looked at very carefully. As the member for Skeena said, there must be enforceable national standards. We must not set up an act in which a weak minister or a weak government like this Conservative government can start ignoring things to help their friends as they did with the Oldman Dam in Saskatchewan.

I know we are going into Question Period, so we will come back to this amendment. I hope the House can support this amendment so that we can make a strong, enforceable standard here.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now hear statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, the issue is credit card interest rates. With the downturn of the economy, there are more credit cards in circulation. An estimated 55 million have been issued. That is more than two cards per Canadian over the age of 18.

Why are credit card rates so high? Is there an agreement between the credit companies to keep the rates sky-high at the expense of consumers? Why are the rates twice that of the prime interest rate? These are the questions that the banks, the financial institutions, the retail stores and the trust companies must answer.

While consumers are being ripped off with high credit card interest rates, the financial institutions are making huge profits and paying little income tax.

Madam Speaker, this is not the Canadian way of fairness. I call on Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada to take action immediately.

LAW OF THE SEA

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada is unwilling to ratify the Law of the Sea, yet invokes it when asking for international restraint in fishing stocks such as the northern cod.

The government cannot have it both ways. Last week the Minister of Fisheries said he will put fish on the table at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development next June in Rio de Janiero where conventions on the environment and natural resources will be examined.

For the minister to be taken seriously at this conference, the government to have credibility abroad should at last ratify the Law of the Sea. There is little time left and unfortunately there seems to be very little political will on the part of the Government of Canada.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms of the federal Department of Justice will shortly submit its first report on the regulations that will accompany Bill C-17. A number of sources have indicated that the advisory council will recommend relaxing restrictions on cartridge magazine capacity, as far as the five—and ten—bullet limit is concerned, and that the safe storage requirement will also be downgraded.

Now is the time for federal and provincial members, the medical community, municipalities, the police, representatives of the public and all Canadian students to make themselves heard. Madam Speaker, we must all show our support for the coalition for gun control in Canada.

CAPE BRETON ECONOMY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the recent Tory budget not only promises to privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation, but plans to amalgamate Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into ACOA.

Once again, the Conservative government deals a low blow to the island of Cape Breton. The Cape Breton Development Corporation is a major employer on the island, employing approximately 3,000 people. Now all of these jobs are at risk.

To add fuel to this fire of devastation, the amalgamation of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into ACOA will remove local control from the island. This means there will be no designated budget for this corporation and little emphasis on promoting economic diversification on the island.

These two manoeuvres will add to the already desperate economic conditions that plague the region.

The Mulroney government is continuously sneaking out of its commitment to this region of the country. The Conservative government has abandoned the people of Cape Breton and the communities that are struggling to survive. The only sense of unity this government has been successful at generating across this country are the feelings of hopelessness and economic desperation.

CHILDREN AND HOSPITALS WEEK

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, this is the thirteenth annual Children and Hospitals Week. The theme this year is commitment to caring. The goal is to increase public, parental and professional knowledge about the need for sensitive and appropriate care for children.

This week includes special activities such as health fairs, hospital tours, school programs, teddy bear or doll clinics and the distribution of resource materials.

Children and Hospitals Week is sponsored by the Association for the Care of Children's Health. It is an international, multi-disciplinary association of health care providers, organizations and parents committed to improving the quality of health care for children and their families.

I applaud the association and its members for promoting their commitment to caring for the well-being of children, and I invite members and indeed all Canadians to participate in local activities.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, this weekend I and the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, attended the First Peoples and the Constitution conference held in the Parliament Buildings.

The conference was a success in bringing native constitutional concerns to many non-aboriginal Canadians. Métis, Indian and Inuit representatives, including native women, discussed their goals, constitutional objectives and their vision for aboriginal people in our country.

The conference did not solve all disputes but problems and concerns were addressed, not avoided.

All those who planned and participated deserve to be commended. Their example of working together in open dialogue should be followed as we attempt to solve the constitutional issues that this nation faces.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like to share with the House some of the excellent comments and advice my constituents are giving me.

James Fisher of Burlington writes:

> If you do nothing else before the next election, continue to hold firm on costs, the GST, et cetera and bring the deficit down. If you can do that your party will gain credibility (and votes?). Remember your own survey showed the federal debt is a main concern of your constituents.

R. A. Law of Glen Williams writes:

> Don't give in to people who can't take the austerity measures you are using. We must keep our deficit down.
> Eliminate duplication of government levels which are everywhere.

Donna and Mark Bowman of Bolton write:

> The Quebec issue must be cleared up with Quebec staying in a new "fighting trim" Canada. it has been necessary to trim the fat and lower expectations if we are to survive in the world marketplace. Inflation had to be brought under control. Our federal deficit is a continuing worry as is the status of our political leaders in the minds of Canadians.

Finally, Graham Duff of Cheltenham writes:

> We have to reduce government spending, government involvement and the civil service.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

TURKEY

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on Friday Canadians learned of a devastating natural disaster, an earthquake in Turkey, which was followed on Sunday by a second with the possibility of a third yet to come.

I am certain I speak for everyone in this House in expressing sympathy to the people of Turkey and to their families here in Canada.

As well, I appreciate that the Minister of External Relations and International Development swiftly routed $350,000 from CIDA to the emergency relief fund.

Canadians have always demonstrated a generosity of spirit toward those in need after natural disasters. There is an immediate and desperate need for medicine, doctors, tents, warm clothing and rescue crews to dig for survivors. In the longer term there will be a need for housing, hospitals, food, and medicine.

Through either the various local Turkish earthquake relief funds or through the Red Cross, I urge Canadians to supplement the government aid, which is only a fraction of what will be needed for recovery from this massive devastation.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, Canadians must be made aware of the Reform Party's doublespeak. The Reform Party of Canada put up billboards across Canada advertising that the Reform Party will run its election campaign how Canada should be run, debt free.

Now the Reform Party is encouraging members to buy life insurance, name the Reform Party as the beneficiary, and then transfer the ownership of the plan to the party. The member forks over the funds to the Reform Party for the policy's upkeep which secures themselves a tax deductible receipt for a donation to a political party. In addition the Reform Party then borrows against the policies to fund its federal election campaign.

How will this massive program of massive borrowing be debt-free for their party? There are contradictions here that Canadians must know. The Reform Party said it will run its election debt-free and then it puts into place this policy so that it can borrow large sums of money to run its campaign.

Preston Manning has spoken out—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. The time has expired.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, in the Victorian era hysteria was considered an illness characteristic of the mentally unstable gender: the females.

It was argued that hysteria was tolerated and encouraged by the male dominated medical profession as an outlet for women's frustrations because such expressions of discontent did not have the power to effect socioeconomic and political change.

Discontent with their status quo expressed through political agitation at the time would have been more dangerous.

Today one wonders just how much has changed. Women who have protested and asked for a ban of the Meme implant on the basis of its perceived hazards have been dismissed as hysterical. They have been called medical terrorists for raising doubts about the medical viability of such devices. They have been silenced when they have put forth evidence of their own mutilated bodies as living proof of the problems associated with their implants. They have been treated as hypochondriacs and deemed hysterical for thinking that their sufferings were imaginary.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to review the current refugee policy for claimants from El Salvador.

While we all laud this country for reaching a peace settlement, the fact is that El Salvador is still not safe for all of its citizens.

British Columbians have rallied behind the Garcia family whose claim to remain here in Canada has been rejected. There is every reason to believe that the Garcias would be in danger if they are returned to El Salvador.

Mrs. Garcia was under suspicion just for being a trade unionist. While living in El Salvador, the family car was riddled with bullets, the family home was bombed and the Garcias were held hostage for 11 days.

Just last week, a trade unionist was assassinated in El Salvador. Incredibly, the Immigration Department feels that this is a safe environment.

I ask the Minister of Immigration to look realistically at the situation in El Salvador and to review the claim by the Garcias. This could be a matter of life and death.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the time has expired.

MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, while financing municipal infrastructure may not, in normal times, be the responsibility of the federal government, it clearly is the federal government's responsibility to institute policies that encourage competitiveness and full employment.

The Minister of Finance recognized the link between infrastructure and competitiveness in his budget speech when he said: "At the recent First Ministers' meeting many governments stressed the important contribution that adequate infrastructure makes to our competitive position. The Government of Canada agrees that this is important".

At the same time, there can be absolutely no doubt about the link between job creation and a works program to build and repair infrastructure needed to help make us competitive.

At this abnormal time, when we desperately need to improve our competitiveness and create jobs, the government must initiate a fiscally responsible program to finance the upgrading of municipal infrastructure.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, according to The Citizen this morning, it cost last year $840,000 to supply the Prime Minister's Office with information. The study by Brad Mann Communications Consulting Inc. found that the sheer volume and variety of clipping packages means that some of these products are not being used.

If you think it is expensive to get all this information into the Prime Minister's office, take a look at the other side of the coin. Stevie Cameron, writing in The Globe and Mail this morning, reports that last year when she asked for information on redecorating the Prime Minister's official residence, the government asked for $19,000 as a fee for providing that information.

The government is now saying that all of those agencies that do annual reports simply cannot afford to do that any more. Maybe we should all get hold of Brad Mann Communications Consulting and see if we cannot straighten out what is an obviously very expensive problem where it costs too much money to get information to the Prime Minister and he does not have any left to provide the Canadian people with any information on his own.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, this past weekend's constitutional conference highlights a week of tremendous advancement for aboriginal peoples in Canada, beginning with a Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada recommending the entrenchment of an inherent right to self-government, this Chamber's recognition of Louis Riel's contribution to Confederation and leaders of the four national aboriginal organizations being invited to become full participants in the constitutional process of the Canada round.

Yesterday, the sixth conference of First Peoples and the Constitution concluded on a very positive note under the excellent leadership of co-chairs Premier Joe Ghiz and ICC President Mary Simon.

Issues on the inherent right to self-government, jurisdiction and responsibility, implementation and the First Peoples' recognition were deliberated with enthusiasm.

A very positive message was also sent to Quebec by the aboriginal peoples in seeking a strong united Canada.

I rise today to ask this House to join me in thanking our Prime Minister, the right hon. Brian Mulroney, and the Minister for National Unity, the right hon. Joe Clark, for making all these successes possible.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the time has expired.

KOREAN VETERANS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, on June 17, 1991, the government announced the awarding of service medals for those who took part in Canada's military operations in Korea.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs stated in a press release that: "The Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea recognizes the major contribution of those volunteers who served with United Nations' Forces in Korea". Canada is the only member of the Commonwealth to give our Korean veterans this distinct recognition.

I fully realize that a medal is but a token which Canadians can offer to reflect the magnitude of the sacrifice of those volunteers who served in Korea. I would like to inform this House that there are Korean veterans in Sudbury who have received the medal, yet there was no ceremony to mark the occasion. Instead they received the medals in the mail along with a form letter written on behalf of the Governor General.

I think it is shameful the way the government has overlooked Sudbury's Korean War veterans who served with distinction, especially since—

RESEARCH

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, a unique union of science and business is being fused in Winnipeg, resulting in the establishment of a world class diagnostic research centre, thanks in no small way to a $7 million contribution from the Department of Western Economic Diversification.

By the time the centre becomes fully operational in September 1993, it will have a staff of 70 with up to 30 visiting researchers. Considering that the international market for biodiagnostics is expected to grow to over $50 million over the next five years, Manitoba is now well positioned to reap substantial benefits from this new and exciting growth industry.

Along with the Health Science Centre of the University of Manitoba and the Centre for Disease Control, this new research centre will elevate Winnipeg into one of the world's premier centres for medical research.

Madam Speaker, I would just like to remind the House that yesterday Mr. Vic Peters and his rink won the national curling championship, so that is number two for Manitoba this year.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

There is a report in today's London Free Press about a speech made Saturday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At a meeting of the Progressive Conservative Campus Association at the University of Western Ontario, the minister said that Canada would be better off to wait a few years before signing a North American free trade deal.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister: Is this the position that the government will be taking when the Prime Minister has his telephone conversations with Presidents Bush and Salinas, that Canada does not want to sign a trade deal at this time?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I read the same article in the London Free Press this morning. I must admit that I was surprised to find myself in it, based on what I actually said.

The point that I was making to the students in response to a question was that it would always be very nice to do things in boxes, to do the free trade agreement, to do GATT, to do the NAFTA in a little box, but that is not the way life works. I never in any instance called for a delay in the agreement because these negotiations are going to lead to more jobs for Canadians and better trading arrangements throughout North America.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, in the statement to the students the minister said that the federal government is "happy to be involved, but I would like it to have come a little later when the country is in better economic shape".

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether in his conversations with Presidents Salinas and Bush the Prime Minister will be asking them to delay the deal until the country is in better economic shape, as his colleague has suggested, or is he in fact taking another different secret tack?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, first of all that is not what I said. The hon. member is reading from a newspaper article. There is some semblance of accuracy in this, but they have missed the main point of what I was saying. The point that I was making was that the greater trading relationship will be of assistance in providing jobs for Canadians and in growth in this economy.

I continue to stand by that and so does the government.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I spoke to the reporter and he stands by his story. It will be interesting to see who is actually telling the truth in this one.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs has admitted it is not the right time to sign this three-way trade agreement. Furthermore, the Prime Minister must be aware of the GATT report which says that today, regional trade agreements are weakening the global trading system.

• (1420)

How can the Prime Minister be so obsessed with signing another agreement with the United States and Mexico that he would ignore the GATT report and the interests of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, it is well known that the Government of Canada has always supported the GATT system. However, that does not mean that we are not prepared to proceed with the free trade agreement, the new NAFTA, because we believe that trading agreements, particularly if we can carry over things from the FTA into GATT, are bound to be good for the whole world, not just Canada.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and concerns Ideal Equipment Co. Ltd. in Montreal, which produces sewing machine parts in Mexico. As a result of this transfer of the company's operations to Mexico, 110 jobs in Montreal have been lost.

In the light of the proposed free trade agreement with Mexico, could the Acting Prime Minister inform the House how the government will prevent an exodus of manufacturers from Montreal, where the average wage is $14, to Mexico, where the hourly wage is $3?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the question is always the same. Somehow or other, if any country has lower wage rates than Canada, we are not supposed to be able to compete. You compete because of good management and because of good technology. These things Canada has.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, the government in the last election and during the negotiations of free trade with the United States promised generous retraining programs. The government has failed to deliver such programs.

In case there is a free trade agreement with Mexico, can the government promise a generous adjustment program, and this time deliver?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, Canada has one of the most generous training programs in the world and we intend to continue.

Mr. Prud'homme: Go to Mexico.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Many times in the House I have raised the issue that Canadians have a right to have a full debate in the House of Commons with their representatives on the projected trade deal with Mexico. There are a lot of concerns in Canada about the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal. Millions of Canadians are worried and anxious about what this government is trading away this time.

Today we hear that the Prime Minister will have a telephone conversation with Presidents Bush and Salinas. We do not know what the content will be. Canadians do not know the content. We also see that the government is offering a secret briefing to committee members. When is the government going to talk to the Canadian people to allow a full debate on this trade deal with Mexico? Canadians have a right to know. Why is the government being so secretive?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party knows that we have a whole system in place for consultation with the SAGIT system and that continues to operate.

I would think that she might wait and listen to what the minister has to say to the committee on Thursday.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, every time in this House we ask on behalf of Canadians to have some information, we are told to wait.

Now we hear there will be a telephone conversation today between Presidents Bush and Salinas and the Prime Minister where details of the trade deal are going to be discussed. Canadians do not want to wait until after a deal is signed to find out what has happened to shape the future of Canada. I ask the Acting Prime Minister why does he not, on behalf of his government today, come clean with Canadians and tell Canadians what is happening in this debate so that we can have a full discussion in the House of Commons?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I am sure if the President of Mexico wishes to have a three-way conversation, that conversation may well take place.

Mr. McCurdy: Open the door.

Mr. Winegard It is just ludicrous to believe that the three principal heads of government are going to negotiate over the telephone.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government thinks it is consulting. In June, Canada's chief negotiator said that the Government of Canada would consult Canadians. However, the government has refused to allow a debate here in the House of Commons to give Canadians more information.

The Financial Post has information; the Mexicans have information; and U.S. senators also have information. Where is the information to which Canadians are entitled?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the opposition has had an opportunity in committee to hear everything the minister has to say about the NAFTA. Last week we sat through a whole day debating the issues around the North American Free Trade Agreement. There is another meeting scheduled for Thursday. There are all kinds of opportunities for the opposition parties to learn what this agreement is about.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to go back to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and her famous London speech where she is quoted as saying that the the minister would like to have the North American Free Trade Agreement come a little bit later because Canada is not ready for it yet.

I want to ask the minister why this government is allowing itself to be pushed into another trade deal through a quickie conference call when the minister herself admits that Canada is not ready for such a deal and that it is far too early to make any judgement upon its impact. Why are we allowing ourselves to be pushed around with somebody else's timetable?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think this is really a silly line of questioning. I have already explained the context in which I made the remarks. I also went on to point out the great advantages to Canada that would come from a North American Free Trade Agreement, including to our telecommunications industry among others, where there is great demand in Mexico for some of the things Canada is very good at. It was well received by the students and I think it should be well received by the House.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in 1988 we got the same assurances that there would be thousands of jobs created in Canada. The minister in the same speech conceded that there have been major disruptions as a consequence of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I want to ask the minister how this government can support another trade deal without knowing how many jobs would be lost. How can Canadians trust any deal this government negotiates when they know, to use the minister's words, the major disruptions that have been experienced as a result of the first trade deal it got us into?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Those are the hon. member's words, not my words.

What is important for the future is that the world is moving toward more open trading situations, including Canada, the United States and Mexico. We are doing it through the GATT round and through NAFTA, because that is where the future of this country lies in terms of jobs. We have had increased investment in this country as a result of the free trade agreement. That is going to lead to more jobs in the future. So will the free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States. Because in the 1990s we cannot bury our heads in the sand like the Liberals did for 20 years.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is to the minister of health.

Private Members' Bill C–279, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, was debated in this House this morning. The purpose of this legislation is to ensure that people are protected from dangerous or potentially dangerous breast prostheses.

I would like to ask the minister why, if the current legislation under the Food and Drugs Act is sufficient, did it take 10 years for the government to recognize the health hazards pertaining to the Meme and the silicone gel implants and to eventually decide to remove both from the market? I would like to know why and everybody in this House would like to know why.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I already answered that question many, many times.

Ms. Copps: You never answered.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Yes, I did. I repeat what I said. I will share something with my colleague, that the health of women is the paramount issue we have to keep in mind here. At the same time all those operations were done over many years. The decisions made by her own government before 1984 and those made since 1984 were made in light of the information we have on the question of the breast implant. As soon as I had information which led me to believe that we have to be prudent with that operation, we did what should be done. The Meme breast implant was withdrawn from the market in June and in January we decided to remove all breast implants from the market. Even if the preliminary report from the United States, which she knows very well, was such that in the United States they considered re-installing the silicone gel breast implants back on to the market, I said, and I repeat what I said at the time: I do not have the evidence now that it should be returned on the market. As far as the department and myself are concerned, we do not intend for now to put those breast implants on the market.

I think it is what my hon. friend is looking for and it is what we are looking for also. I understand and I agree with her that all has to be done to protect the health of women. I believe, with all honesty, that that is what I did since I have been Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, one minister after another has consistently told this House about information received, investigations done, reports that failed to prove implants are hazardous to the health of Canadian women. We have heard this consistently. If there are so many reports and so much information is available out there, will the minister table those reports in this House today so I can see them, too?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, information on breast implants, both in Canada and the United States, has in general always been available to everyone. Recently, at Food and Drug Administration hearings in the United States, to which we sent a multi-person committee that attended the presentation of briefs, everything was available. There is no question of the minister hiding any information whatever. The only issue here is whether or not certain medical devices can be used. For the time being, they are not available and I just said in English that I do not intend to allow them to be sold in the coming weeks.

So I think that I have answered the hon. member's first question to me.

[English]

Mrs. Gaffney: Table them in the House.

Ms. Clancy: Show us.

RETRAINING

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it concerns retraining.

I was pleased to hear from the minister in a letter dated March 6 that UI recipients could now qualify for two or three consecutive years of retraining rather than one year. Legislation has allowed the two or three year option, but different policies and a lack of guidelines for employment counsellors across the country left applicants in limbo.

Will the minister now assure all eligible Canadians that two or three year retraining is a national government policy and will be applied right across the country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): What I can assure the member of is that developmental use of UI, which I know the opposition strenuously opposed when we brought this forth, will go on and will take place. The Labour Force Development Board has made recommendations to the government to increase the training under UI by $300 million in this fiscal year. We have accepted their recommendation. We will be spending $300 million more.

As to the issue of how and whether every Canadian unemployed can qualify tomorrow morning for two or three years of training, I cannot say that because that program of retraining is developed according to the needs of the regions of the country. In certain areas for certain trades, yes, this is possible; for others it is not. But this is a developmental program that will continue. I think that unemployed Canadians will benefit from it.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): The minister probably knows that in B.C. the answer is "yes"; in Newfoundland it is "maybe", and in Ontario it is "no" to two or three years of retraining. So it is an inconsistent policy. The policy was inconsistent, now it is unjustifiable. The new policy states that you may seek two or three years of retraining at a community college, but not at a university.

The minister is dictating the type of training an individual must pursue. Will the minister reverse his decision and allow UI recipients to attend either a community college or a university?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Labour Force Development Board and the government are open to any suggestions for trying to improve how we train Canadians.

We have under the Prosperity Initiative led by Madam Marie José Drouin and David McCamus groups of people throughout the country looking at the whole training system we have which includes both the trade side and the post-secondary university side of it.

If the hon. member or his party have suggestions, I am sure that they would be considered because this is about trying to equip Canadians with the tools they need to keep this country competitive. Any suggestions in that regard will be welcome.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Youth.

The government has not yet announced the budget for Challenge '92 program, the student summer employment program. In view of the massive levels of student unemployment, around 15 per cent last summer and expected to be worse this year, surely a decision is needed now. When will the government respond to the real and pressing employment needs of Canada's students? When?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the program is going on known as Challenge '92, as he called it, and the numbers and details should be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. We are now in one of the worst recessions in Canada's history. Students have to cope with all kinds of additional costs for education, and I am thinking of the GST and the alarming increase in tuition fees and other expenses.

Students feel utterly helpless. When will this government produce a student employment policy that is commensurate with their needs?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, of course I do not agree with the hon. member's opening remarks, especially about this being the worst recession, because I am sure everyone will recall that the worst recession was in 1981-82, when the hon. member's party was in power.

As for the summer program, with which the hon. member is familiar since he referred to it as Challenge '92, it is an excellent program which we have had for a number of years and which will still be around this summer. The figures will be announced as soon as possible, probably this week, and I am sure the hon. member and all students will be delighted.

BILL C-55

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Bill C-55 would give the Conservative Government the power to do serious damage to public service pensions. The government could give itself a premium holiday by refusing to pay employer contributions identical to those paid by the employee. It could change the rate of interest on the pension fund, without consultation. It could reduce indexation, and it could do all that by regulation, without going before Parliament or submitting to committee scrutiny.

Is the government aware of the devastating impact Bill C-55 will have if it keeps supporting these clauses in the bill? Is it prepared to withdraw these clauses, at the very least?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should have asked me a few questions about this matter privately, instead of believing every thing he read in a press release by PSAC, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which appears to be particularly keen on drawing our attention to problems that are non-existent, since the government has no intention of doing what the hon. member just said. PSAC is now appearing before the Labour Relations Board because of its actions during the strike. Understandably, they would like the public to believe all this, but the government has no intention of doing what the hon. member said.

In fact, when I tabled Bill C-55, I announced in the House that any problems concerning financing, indexation, and so forth, would be examined with the unions at the appropriate time. The purpose of Bill C-55 is to bring pension legislation into line with the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, Bill C-55 is a sugar-coated poison pill.

• (1440)

In 1984 the minister said: "Have confidence we will not do it". Why put it in the bill if they are not going to use it? They promised they would never deindex Public Service pensions and today they are proposing exactly that.

Bill C-55 could be used together with the Income Tax Act to deindex the Public Service pensions of Canada.

To use the words of a union leader this morning: Why is the government using such sneaky and sleazy methods by giving itself the power to change pensions by regulations rather than coming before Parliament for public scrutiny and legislative approval?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I suppose that the hon. member, being from the Ottawa region, pays great attention to statements that are made by the unions. With respect to the truth, I will be appearing in front of the House committee tomorrow to discuss Bill C-55. It does nothing of the sort that the hon. member has indicated.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Youth.

Almost every year for the last 10 years the Challenge program in support of summer employment for students has been announced in February. It has not yet been announced by the minister, although he has his press release half prepared.

Will the minister confirm that in fact his shyness with respect to the Challenge program is because the funds will be frozen once more as they were last year in spite of rising unemployment rates among students?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, since my hon. colleague seems to be well informed in the sense that I have a half prepared press release, it is a good reason for me not to release it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the students across this country are going to be very much amused by the minister's facetiousness.

I ask him once more to let the students across this country, whose unemployment rate is 15 per cent, know this weekend whether there are any serious prospects for them having jobs.

I ask the minister: Where is the funding necessary to double the number of mathematicians, scientists and engineers, that this government says should be done, if it is not prepared to put money in the pot? What is going to be in the Challenge program in 1992?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, although he seems to be losing his cool today, the program has been announced and numbers will be made public as quickly as possible.

I am sure that the students are going to be more amused with the numbers than my colleague's facetiousness.

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. CN has appealed the National Transportation Agency's decision to maintain service on the Franquet-Chapais subdivisions in Abitibi. Can the minister tell us today when this case will be heard?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I note again that my colleague from Abitibi is very involved in this issue, which he really cares about. I commend him for that, but unfortunately, I do not have the authority to decide when cases will be heard in court.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

The minister ought to know that the investor immigrant program is in jeopardy and our reputation in the Pacific Rim is being tainted. Investor immigrants from Hong Kong and Taiwan thought they were buying western Canadian real estate. Instead their money was spent on rural Saskatchewan gold mines. The prospectus of the offering was approved by the federal government. Therefore, the minister is ultimately responsible.

What will the minister do to protect the investor immigrant program so that people who are thinking of investing their fortunes in this country can do so with some confidence and some assurance that this government will look after those investments?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Absolutely, Madam Speaker, that is the objective of the government in implementing the investor program. If the hon. member has a suggestion as to how we can improve it, we are in the process of revisiting the whole program to ensure exactly that and also to make sure that regions in Canada do benefit from that program. If the hon. member has suggestions to make, I will be pleased to consider them.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the Hong Kong and Taiwanese investors the minister will know invested in Canada, much of it in western Canada, approximately $4 billion in 1990 alone. The federal investor immigrant program is sponsored by the Government of Canada, not by the province of Alberta in this case. The individual in question was acting as a private individual at the time these allegations took place.

Two hundred and seventy-eight Pacific Rim investors want to know why $34 million went to a gold mine in Saskatchewan instead of shopping centres elsewhere in the province.

What will the minister do as minister today to ensure that Canada's name is not further tainted in the Pacific Rim which is very important to western Canada and all of Canada in terms of investments?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a case that is before the courts and as soon as the courts have dealt with this case—

Mr. Kilgour: Three years from now.

Mr. Valcourt: I know Liberals would jump the court. I will not. I am going to await the decision of the court in this matter. If it calls for a change to the way we are dealing with the investor program, we will do that because we pursue the same objectives that I am sure the hon. member wants for Canada. Any change that can improve this program will be made.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In tabling a document on Friday the minister implied that the Ontario government supported his plan to start privatization of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport.

In fact the report he tabled states that the government's plan could seriously prejudice financing for the future of the airport.

In view of the fact that every responsible group, both in the private and public sectors, questions the minister's timing and his motives on this announcement why is the government in such a hurry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, when I answered the hon. member's question in the House on Friday, I mentioned and, in fact, showed him a document that had been distributed at a meeting with the Minister of Transport, the Minister of the Environment and four or five mayors from the Toronto area last Monday evening. At the time, the government mentioned something very important, and I quote:

[English]

The analysis presented has been prepared by a team of airport consultants using information collected over the course of several years and where necessary professional judgment. However it would not be prudent to make business decisions on the basis of the analysis presented in the document.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, what is clear to Canadians and what is clear to those stakeholders at Pearson airport is that this minister's drive to privatize is nothing more than politically motivated. It is a pathetic attempt to rescue Tory seats in Toronto.

Will the Minister of Transport do the right thing, right now, and withdraw his request for proposals and have another look at all the alternatives being presented to him by the stakeholders of this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, judging from the preamble the hon. member is asking us to hold the RFP back because if we do proceed it might give us some additional seats in the region at the next election.

If that is right it would certainly be because this proposal is going to create 3,200 jobs for people in the Toronto area for five years.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in 1981 there was one food bank in Canada. Today there are close to 300. Two million Canadians, including 700,000 children depend on food banks. My question is for the minister of health.

The new child benefit package gives a small top-up to working poor families, but not to families on social assistance which is creating the "deserving poor" and the "undeserving poor" in Canada. It categorizes and penalizes children for their parents' situation.

Why has the government taken out an advertisement in all Canadian newspapers claiming that this is the fairer way, the simpler way, the more generous way? Are these benefits for children or are they for some Tory right-wing agenda?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, obviously the terms of reference for us are not those for the NDP. There is no government in the world that can sustain the kind of approach the NDP is going to have in terms of resources. What we do is we use the resources we have and we say to Canadians: "Here is the best way we can provide help to Canadians".

I agree that as long as there are children going to food banks, we have to do the best we can to correct the situation. The reality is, however, that the resources we have in the budget are being used to help the families of low-income workers and I appreciate the member is against that.

Second, I said that soon we will announce a package for children at risk, where a lot of the children she is talking about will be targeted in a way that we can give more help than now. But there is no doubt that it has to be done within the capacity that we have to pay for it. She can be sure that certainly that is what we will do.

Oral Questions

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stood in this House today and told us that breast implants had been withdrawn from the market and that they will not be put back on the market.

It is true that some manufacturers have ceased production of implants but there are thousands of previously distributed implants in hospitals and doctors' offices. Only three weeks ago Quebec plastic surgeons held a press conference to announce that they believe implants to be safe.

My question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare is, what is the minister doing to ensure that implants are not being used? Second, what will the penalty be if a doctor were to violate the voluntary removal of the implants?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I cannot prevent the Plastic Surgeons Association of Quebec from asking for what they want. The question is that I did not say yes. That is what the member wanted me to do and I did it.

Second, when she is referring to the manufacturers, she should certainly look at the press release I gave out when we created the advisory board. I said explicitly that I asked the department to trace the manufacturers to be sure that no silicone gel breast implant would be given to any surgeon here in Canada from now on.

She knows very well that we did what should be done. The fact of the matter is that the silicone gel filled implants are not available on the market and they will not be in the future. That is exactly what the member wanted.

MORDECAI RICHLER

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, for a week Quebecers have been the victims of hate propaganda. They have been called a mean-spirited racist tribe in public. Quebecers' symbols are mocked in order to publicize a book by Mordecai Richler.

Does the government intend to ban this book as hate propaganda? Does the government intend to use the Criminal Code to ban this book, as the Code allows it to do?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, there are two points. First, if the Criminal Code is violated, there will of course be a response.

Second, I think that it would be informative for Canadians to know the Bloc Québécois' position on the freedom to publish; they want to know the Bloc's position on fundamental rights in Canada.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, that is no way to answer Quebecers about hate propaganda. Certainly not. The Criminal Code clearly says in section—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please put her question?

Mrs. Venne: Yes. Madam Speaker, I would like to know whether the government intends to use section 319 of the Criminal Code, which clearly mentions public incitement to hate and fomenting hatred.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe that I just answered that question. The law is there. If there is a reason to invoke the law, the government is ready to do so. I hope that is the answer sought by the hon. member, except that she may have some other motivation.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

The federal government announced three weeks ago in its budget that it was cutting back on advertising, yet last week the minister of health found $500,000 for advertising across the country of a so-called child benefit package.

How did the minister find this money when he was unable to find any extra money for Canada's poorest of poor children?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the budget did not say that we will not inform Canadians. The budget said that we will look at the way we use advertising to keep Canadians informed.

I am amazed to hear from the member that he does not agree with all the phone calls we had at the Department of National Health and Welfare asking for more information in the form of child benefit packages that we could not provide that information.

The best way to do that was to advertise in newspapers. We first did it nationally. We will do it now regionally and even with the aboriginal newspapers to be sure that Canadians are aware of the good news.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, since the minister knows that under the present program family allowances are universal and that he mentions in his own advertisement that all family allowance cheques are going to include publicity, I fail to see why he has to spend another $500,000 informing Canadians.

Statistics Canada, the government's own agency, admitted that we have 292 food banks in Canada and four out of ten Canadians using these food banks are children. Instead of buying ads perhaps the minister will consider buying food.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I have already answered that question, but for the instruction of my friend, I will repeat what I said.

Everybody agrees that we should not have food banks. But we know very well, and he knows very well, the reasons they are there. We have to deal with that. That is exactly what we are doing with the child benefit package. We are trying to provide more income for low income workers to be able to deal with that.

All members of this House should be trying to do their best so that we can cope with that in the future.

Once again, I will announce a major package for what we call children at risk and within that group we also have those children that he is talking about. Nobody in the world has the resources that the NDP has. In the provinces where they are it is amazing to see that they do not cope with those kinds of problems either.

GOVERNMENT TRAVEL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is to the acting Minister of Supply and Services.

Last fall the government gave the lucrative government travel contract to Rider Travel rather than Marlin Travel. In so doing the computer reservation system for tickets was transferred from Canada to the United States to a subsidiary of American Airlines.

I want to ask the government why it transferred these high-tech computer jobs to the U.S.A.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could take that question on behalf of the Minister of Supply and Services.

As the hon. member knows, we have for some years now had a process of having the private sector arrange for travel for public servants and government travel. In the process we have saved Canadian taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars each year.

The specifics of what the hon. member is talking about will be looked into and I am sure the minister will get back to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, according to the Canadian Travel Press Weekly, every time a member of the House or an official uses Rider Travel, three dollars in royalties for the computer system go to the United States. What will the government do to repatriate this money and the jobs which it has exported to the United States?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, again as I indicated earlier, I will look into the particular accusations the hon. member has raised.

What the hon. member seems to be suggesting, in this area as in so many other areas, is that the option for Canada is to opt out of the world.

• (1500)

ALLAN MEMORIAL INSTITUTE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I have before me a letter from one Richard Clements of Vancouver who 30 years ago was the subject of brainwashing experiments at the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal. They were sponsored by the CIA and the Canadian government.

Mr. Clements wants to know and I want to ask on his behalf: Will the government settle these cases so that a person like Mr. Clements can finally have justice after 30 years?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): What I can tell the member, Madam Speaker, is that that case, as with many other cases, is being considered by the Department of Justice. Unfortunately the minister is not here today, but we are informed that the Minister of Justice should be able to give that information soon.

HEALTH

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a follow-up to the question asked by my colleague from Nepean.

Would the minister indicate why he refuses to table in this House all the reports done in Canada and all the reports which may be in the possession of the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to the breast implant? Would the minister explain to the House why he refuses to table all of this information?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I first would like to know exactly what document or information the members are talking about. I am ready—

Ms. Copps: What documents?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The member for Hamilton East is always impatient. If she would listen for once I would give the answer to her colleague.

I just want to say that I will look at what information he is talking about that would not be available to the opposition and if it is releasable. He knows very well, in terms of health and that kind of reality, that we cannot always give information which would deal with something that is particularly very delicate.

Once again, if there is any possibility that I can make that available, I will. I have nothing to hide. The question is to deal with health and information the best we can.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, if the minister has nothing to hide, which he has suggested inside the House and outside the House, would he not avail himself of the opportunity to present all the documentation in the possession of his department, Canadian, American, as well as that of other countries, all reports and studies? Will he table all of that information in the House of Commons so that Canadians, and in particular women, will have all of the knowledge and all of the information?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it is so big that nobody will suffer any illusion about what the member is asking. If he wants all that information and he believes it is being hidden, why does he not ask the committee to work exactly as it should within the operation of the House of Commons?

Why does he want to play politics with something that is not? We do the best we can in terms of the health of people, but I will not give information if that information is secret, if it does not have to be made available.

Once again I am amazed because normally the member for Hamilton East has that kind of approach. I did not believe it could be that contagious within that party.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–64, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mrs. McDougall (for Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre)), moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

WHALES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from the Sir Frederick Banting Junior Secondary School in Coquitlam, British Columbia.

The students say that in 1982 the International Whaling Commission declared a moratorium on commercial whaling. A loophole in the IWC moratorium, however, allowed for whales to be killed for scientific research purposes and under the guise of science hundreds of whales have been butchered. Some research is conducted. Then the whale meat is sent to the marketplace as an expensive delicacy. Now Iceland, Norway and Japan are threatening to ignore or leave the IWC and start full–scale commercial whaling once more.

The students demand that the international laws be introduced and enforced to eliminate the scientific research loophole so the world's whales can be preserved.

HOME RENOVATIONS

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by about 38 people from the Oshawa area.

They are basically requesting that the Parliament of Canada investigate the possibility of making home renovations tax deductible to the home owner, as has been done in the United States, in the current tax year so that jobs could be created in the building industry and therefore help to stimulate the economy.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 36 I wish to present 64 petitions containing approximately 8,150 signatures of citizens of Burlington, Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Dundas, Mississauga, Oakville, Scarborough, Guelph, Kitchener, Toronto, and other locations in southwest Ontario.

The petition urges the government to stiffen the penalties for violent crime and points in particular to the death of Ms. Nina de Villiers who was brutally murdered on August 9, 1991.

The petitioners ask the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to continue to review all legislation that deals with public safety and negotiate where necessary with the provincial authorities to ensure that the laws are amended to reflect the concerns expressed by the petitioners on public safety.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, on Friday, March 13, close to 1,000 people demonstrated in front of Toronto City Hall to protest this government's bungling of the processing of the refugees in the refugee backlog.

Those petitions have been given to the clerk for approval. The present petitioners here do state that refugee claimants who although successfully established in Canada are being refused landing at the pre–inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External affairs to accept all persons registered in the refugee backlog who are established in Canada for landed immigrant status at their pre–inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews.

• (1510)

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I wish to present around 300 petitions which have over 6,000 signatures.

These petitioners feel that there are still very serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system in Canada. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent. They ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, as the spokesman for international development in the New Democratic Party, I have been receiving a number of petitions.

I have eight of them with me here from people, mostly in Quebec, who are concerned about the trade in humans, the indentured labour between the countries of Haiti and Dominican Republic.

They call upon Parliament, in light of our position, the Canadian position on human rights, to encourage the Government of Canada and the United Nations to take whatever steps are necessary to make sure that this trade in humans is stopped between Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

DOCKSIDE MONITORING PROGRAM

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions on two subjects from my constituents of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

The first has to do with the dockside monitoring program. It is from constituents, many of whom are fishermen, who wish to urge Parliament and the government to rescind any further plans for user fees for this program, to absorb the costs and to supply qualified personnel for this program.

The petitioners urge Parliament to withdraw the onerous fees which have been associated with this dockside monitoring program in Atlantic Canada.

MEME BREAST IMPLANT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The second petition, Madam Speaker, is from women in my constituency and it has to do with the Meme breast implant.

The petitioners urge, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to establish an independent judicial inquiry into the testing and approval process for all medical devices, and in particular the Meme breast implant.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 211, 212, 213, 214 and 231.

[Text]

Question No. 211—Ms. Phinney:

What is the percentage of disabled people living in Canada today?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): By the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, Minister responsible for Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada reports:

In 1986, (latest data available) there were an estimated 3.3 million persons with disabilities residing in households and in health-related institutions. This represented 13.2 per cent of the Canadian population in 1986. Data from the 1991 Health and Activity Limitation Survey will be released in September of this year.

Question No. 212—Mr. Fulton:

Has the Department of Fisheries and Oceans allocated resources, both human and physical, to conduct a technical evaluation and/or impact assessment studies on the operation of Cominco's large hover-craft (ACV) on the Stikine River system between Wrangell, Alaska and the Iskut Mines and, if so, (a) what are the results, (b) when will the Department make these studies public?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): (a) DFO initiated an environmental screening of Cominco Mineral Limited's use of hovercraft to transport materials between Bronson Creek on the Iskut River and Wrangell, Alaska, which was originally completed in February, 1991.

The screening report concluded that some of the potentially adverse effects of the hovercraft operations were unknown, and thus the project fell within section 12(d) of the Environmental Assessment and Review Process (EARP) guidelines order. The report recommended that Cominco prepare a contingency plan for prevention, containment and clean-up of spilled fuel and hazardous products, as well as collect additional information to assess the effects of hovercraft operation on fish and wildlife. The project was permitted to proceed on this basis and was to employ a "thalweg" approach to navigation, i.e. keeping to main channels, that avoids fish spawning and rearing areas and commercial fishing operations on the Iskut and Stikine Rivers.

In June 1991, the EARP screening report was revised to incorporate further information regarding the effects of hovercraft operation on fish and wildlife. No evidence was found to indicate that noise generated by hovercraft would be harmful to any life stage of salmon, and keeping hovercraft operation to the main channels of the rivers would minimize disturbance to salmon and other wildlife species. The screening decision was revised to 12(c) after DFO concluded that potentially adverse effects could be mitigated with existing technology.

In response to public concerns, the impact of wake generated by hovercraft operations on the river shoreline was investigated. An inspection of hovercraft operation was made on October 24, 1991. The wave produced by the hovercraft was estimated to be 0.15 metres in height, comparable to waves generated by typical riverboats of much smaller size. The Stikine and Iskut Rivers are very large and dynamic systems, subject to extremely high spring and summer flows and icing during the winter. Erosion is a constant occurrence during widely fluctuating water levels and velocity regimes; thus, disturbances caused by minor boat wake are not significant when compared to the magnitude of natural occurrences.

(b) When the finalized contingency plan from Cominco Minerals Limited is received by DFO, the EARP screening report will be revised to incorporate additional information. The report will be made available when the revisions are completed.

Question No. 213—Mr. Stupich:

Following the announcement in November 1989 to limit the Pacific Shrimp Trap Fishery, (a) how many such licences were granted in each of the years 1990 and 1991 (b) how many applications were received (c) how many of these licences were granted upon initial application and how many following appeals (d) how many appeals were made in each year (e) how many appeals were successful in each year (f) what were the criteria used to decide eligibility for licences in successful appeals in each year?

(b) 523 preliminary applications for a Pacific Shrimp by Trap Licence were received.

(c) 129 licences were issued based on initial applications and an additional 146 licences were issued based on appeals.

(d) 322 appeals were heard in 1990 and 12 appeals were heard in 1991.

(e) 143 appeals were successful in 1990 and 3 appeals were successful in 1991.

(f) Each licence appeal was considered on its own merit and considered the personal circumstances of each appellant. The Pacific Region Licence Appeal Board considered all relevant material presented in support of a licence appeal, e.g. sales slips, log books, affidavits attesting to fishing activity or sale of fish, invoices supporting vessel repairs, etc.

The aim of the licence appeal process is to determine if the appellant was treated fairly in accordance with the licensing policies, practices and procedures of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and if extenuating circumstances existed for deviation from the established policies, practices and procedure.

Question No. 214—Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso):

Since the implementation by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans of its Catch Monitoring System in the Scotia Fundy Region in 1989, (a) how much has the Government of Canada received annually in payments from fishermen under the provisions of this system (b) how much money in lieu of payment is still outstanding for 1991 and 1992 respectively?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): (a) & (b) Since the establishment of the Dockside Monitoring Program, the Government of Canada has not received annual payments from fishermen in the Scotia–Fundy region. There are therefore no outstanding payments for Scotia–Fundy fishermen for 1991.

In the fall of 1991, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced the formation of a Task Force on Dockside Monitoring. Over the past months, the task force has been studying how the program can be designed to apply on a consistent basis in eastern Canada and how it should be financed. The task force should forward its recommendations for ministerial consideration in the upcoming months.

Question No. 231—Mr. Mifflin:

With respect to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans projects concerning the resurfacing of the wharf at Catalina, Nfld., and of the deep water wharf in Bonavista, Nfld., (a) are they being proceeded with and, if not, for what reasons (b) have they been tendered (c) have they been awarded (d) what is the anticipated start of work on the projects?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): (a) Both projects have been deferred due to the government's effort to restrain spending as announced on January 27, 1992.

(b) Yes.

(c) No.

(d) The start date for work is uncertain at this time.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee C; and Motions Nos. 11 and 18 of Mr. Caccia (p. 8263).

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member for Skeena seeking the floor. He has spoken.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I was just checking to to make sure that I had a chance to speak.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has spoken on this motion.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member for Port Moody—Coquitlam was on his feet when we adjourned for Question Period. I believe that he is just coming into the Chamber right now, and I am wondering if the Chair could recognize him to complete his remarks.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, welcome back.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I want to thank you for your generosity to me now and in Question Period this afternoon. I do appreciate that.

I will just conclude. I tried to ask a short question, I point out, in return. I just wanted to conclude my remarks.

We are speaking on this very important environmental bill. The House has heard a number of speeches this morning. It has heard from the member for Skeena, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake who worked so hard on this committee, and the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands who worked so hard on environmental issues.

You will recall I presented a petition in the House a few minutes ago. I was just out getting a photocopy of that because it reflected, in a sense, what I was saying in my first speech, that young people are really concerned about the environment. This was on a broader environmental issue. The petition, as you will recall, was from the students at Sir Frederick Banting Junior Secondary School in Coquitlam. Those students were concerned about a loophole.

It is very technical. You really have to know what you are talking about to get into this issue. The students really got into it. They found a loophole in the international whaling commission moratorium on commercial whaling. They found that you could in fact kill whales for scientific research purposes. Under the guise of science, you can butcher a number of whales and you can supposedly conduct the research. You then send the whales to the marketplace and sell them. What happens then is that countries like Iceland, Norway and Japan which were trying to observe the whaling moratorium then say: "Well, we had better get back into a full scale commercial whaling because it has been going on anyway".

I cite the petition of the students from Banting Junior Secondary School for two reasons. One of the reasons is the sophistication of the young people dealing with a major international environmental issue in a complicated way. Second, as the member for Skeena was saying, it shows once again that what you see is sometimes not exactly what exists, in this case sort of looking at a way of killing whales for scientific research when in fact they are still trying to look at money in the market. That is why we have to be so careful with this particular bill.

I was just looking at the press release that was put out on this bill by my party where the hon. member had outlined a number of points. There were a number of points that we put forward to try and amend this bill. There were 111 amendments introduced during the committee's review of the legislation. Some of them were accepted. We, in the New Democratic Party, managed to change the bill by including some of the changes.

First, forcing the government to assess alternatives to major projects affecting federal jurisdiction and requiring that the need for a project in the first place be determined before it goes ahead.

Second, drastically reducing government discretion—that is why this amendment is important here—in deciding what projects are assessed, how they are assessed and what factors have to be taken into account during the assessment and whether a project should go ahead.

Third, requiring a review of this bill after five years.

Fourth, improving public participation, strengthening support for sustainable development, increasing the protection of aboriginal rights and including physical and cultural heritage in the definition of the environment.

It is very important having these items to strengthen the bill. We must go farther in this debate in the House and seriously consider the amendment that has just been presented by the hon. member for Davenport. As I understand it, it is an amendment that will protect us from a minister who is not particularly sympathetic or weak, present company excepted, who will be lobbied by a large corporation or by some other interest and will back off and delegate his or her power to some other group. That is why this has to be very tightly controlled.

While I am on my feet, I also want to make reference to something that the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake said. He said that the environment in his riding is truly beautiful. He mentioned Meadow Lake and a summer picnic I had the privilege of attending with him.

An hon. member: You were the guest speaker.

Mr. Waddell: My friend says I was the guest speaker. Well it became less nice after that. The hon. member said he had been to India after that and stated how difficult it was to find a pristine lake in India.

• (1520)

One great British Columbian, former Justice Tom Berger, I want to inform the House, is in India doing the first of its kind, an international impact study sponsored by the World Bank dealing with the Saravar Dam in India on the Narmada River. That is very interesting because 15 years ago or so, Justice Berger did the first environmental assessment of a great megaproject, the proposed Mackenzie Valley natural gas pipeline from Alaska and the Mackenzie delta down to southern Canada and the United States. This was the first of its kind in the world. It was the first real look at a project before the project was built. That is where we learned a lot of matters that are in this bill. We learned how to really do an environmental assessment. We learned how to conduct public hearings. We learned how to fund interveners and what an advantage, not a disadvantage, that was to governments and the process to have all broad points of view.

Let me conclude by saying that we have done great things in the world on the environment. We are pioneering. We have a bill to which we in this party, who are committed to the environment, proposed 111 amendments. There is another amendment on the floor which we think will strengthen the bill. We ask the government and the House to support this amendment.

Remember what the students of Sir Frederick Banting Junior Secondary School said, that the environment is the key issue in the modern world.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. I want to compliment the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment and all committee members on this work.

I would like to put forward to members that there is confusion from time to time in the overlapping jurisdictions. I want to bring this down to my own community in Toronto where we have three rivers that flow through the centre of our city; the Don River, the Rouge River and the Humber River. They flow into Lake Ontario which is a lake that we share with the United States. These are the most polluted rivers in all of Canada.

For years we have had the toxic and biological waste from the largest city in Canada flowing down these rivers into Lake Ontario. They are now just chemical cauldrons.

It seems that because of the overlapping jurisdictions from the municipality to the province, to the conservation boards and ultimately, because of the Great Lakes, the federal jurisdiction, there is always the pointing of fingers at each other, that the municipality is responsible for a certain facet and then ultimately the province. We do report after report but there is never, ever a real final action plan or the resources to begin reclaiming these rivers.

I hope that as we go through the various phases of this bill that we can somehow give the national government a clear cut responsibility for acting when we have overlapping jurisdictions on a particular environmental disaster. Yet there does not seem to be the will of those like the province, those bodies responsible to take action.

I cite another example from two years ago in Barrier Lake, just three hours north of us, where it was obvious the clear-cutting that was done in that area was beyond the sustainable development definition. The Algonguins of Barrier Lake could not get the support of the province to stop the clear-cutting. It was a clear cut case where the province should have stepped in and stopped it.

Yet, we as a national government, other than moral suasion, were not really in a position to do anything about it. We have a similar situation in Alberta with the pulp and paper mills going into the Athabasca River region.

My concern is that there should be some clear definition so that the national government can step in and put a much more aggressive position forward, the ultimate position when the operating authorities fail to act.

I hope in committee that specific examples like that can be addressed. Quite frankly, if there is one frustration I face it is that every month I get approached from constituents in my riding asking: "What specific action is taking place on the clean-up of the Don River? What is the national government doing about it?" You turn around and say: "It is the province that is supposed to be doing something about it". The province says: "It is the municipality". We, as a national government, seem to have either relinquished or do not have that final thrust.

I hope that we can have a clear-cut definition of our responsibility by the time we bring this bill to its final resting place.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I would just like to reinforce to the committee what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has just said. I have the same problem in my riding of Parkdale—High Park.

Every summer, when the temperatures reach 80 and 90 degrees, the beaches on Lake Ontario are closed all along Mississauga, Toronto, et cetera. Just when the children want to jump into the lake and swim, the beaches are closed. When you try to get to the bottom of the cause of these pollutants again you get this buck passing; municipalities looking to the province for solutions, the province looking to the federal government and vice versa.

Forty years ago, when I came to Ontario, the joy that we had was to be able to swim in Lake Ontario. Now, 40 years later, we cannot swim in the same lake that we swam 40 years ago. Because Lake Ontario joins the Great Lakes, there is international involvement here so the federal government has to be involved. Pollutants do come down the Humber River to the mouth of the Humber so the province is involved.

Canada geese do a lot of polluting. Everyone is powerless to even reduce the number of Canada geese on the beaches when the rain washes their waste into Lake Ontario.

I am glad that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood gave that direction to the committee. I would also like to emphasize that because it is very very important. In my area, it is four levels of government. It is the federal government, the provincial government, the metropolitan Toronto government and the city of Toronto. There are four jurisdictions there and four jurisdictions cannot solve this little problem of keeping the beaches open for the children when the temperatures reach 80 and 90 degrees in July and August. Something is wrong with us, the politicians, if we cannot get four levels of government together to clean up the beaches for our children every summer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 11.

• (1530)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 18.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motions Nos. 19 and 29 which are grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 19 will apply to Motion No. 29.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 37 by striking out line 37 at page 24 and substituting the following therefor:

"can be justified in the circumstances because the project contributes to the goal of achieving sustainable development,"

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 58 by striking out line 17 at page 42 and substituting the following therefor:

"justified in the circumstances because the project contributes to the goal of achieving sustainable development;"

He said: Madam Speaker, before Question Period I listened carefully to the parliamentary secretary and to his rebuttal on Motion No. 11 and the arguments which he made in determining that my amendment was at that point unnecessary.

I have to recognize and admit that his arguments were quite good and that he certainly made a good point which I fully accept.

However, I did have difficulty with his rebuttal on Motion No. 18 when he elaborated on the theme of self-assessment philosophy and approach that would apply in the implementation of the clause then under discussion, clause 37.

We are now approaching another aspect of clause 37. We have a real difficult issue at stake and I look forward to hearing the well thought out rebuttal by the parliamentary secretary.

I would argue that this is a bad clause. It is a bad clause because it opens a serious loophole in the system and in the whole approach and application of this proposed bill on environmental assessment.

In other words, the way one reads this clause and interprets it, one must conclude that here you would have a provision whereby projects would go ahead through the back door, although the same project is contrary to the purpose of the bill as outlined in clause 4 and in particular clause 4(a) (b) and (d).

The purpose of this bill as outlined in the clause reads that it is to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration before responsible authorities take actions in connection with them.

Then the other purpose outlined in the same clause is that the purpose of this bill is to encourage responsible authorities to take actions that promote sustainable development, and finally, that the purpose of this act is to ensure that there be an opportunity for public participation in the environmental assessment process.

Having said that in the opening paragraph of this bill, what we find here in clause 37 is permission that allows a project to be approved if it is likely to cause significant, adverse environmental effects so long as the project can be justified "in the circumstances".

That is a very disturbing passage in this proposed legislation because "in the circumstances" is wide open. It is an immense loophole through which you could drive a tractor trailer, to say the least.

When the Minister of the Environment appeared before the committee, we asked him to give us an example of the type of projects that would be referred to in this particular clause. He could not give us an example. We wanted to know what kind of project would qualify for this type of exemption from the principles of sustainable development.

The bill does not require the minister to make the decision. The bill does not request the minister to provide the public with the rationale for his or her decision.

Therefore, for all these reasons contained in the description of the purposes in clause 4, and for the reasons the minister and officials were not able to provide us with specific examples as to what kind of projects would be dealt with in this particular instance and for the reason that the minister making the decision would not be required to provide a rationale for public consumption, one must conclude that this loophole—I am not saying it will—but it could become a political escape hatch to enable a minister to approve a project regardless of the outcome of an environmental assessment.

This is bad public policy. This is not a good approach, having gone to the trouble of putting together a bill providing future generations of Canadians with a substantial step forward in the field of environmental impact assessment.

Our amendment, to conclude, is one that would require that a project, approved despite significant adverse environmental effects, can really and only be approved if it contributes to the stated goal and purposes of the bill as outlined in clause 4, namely, the implementation of sustainable development. In doing so, we will close this substantial loophole.

It is my hope that our amendment will close this serious loophole and eliminate an escape hatch that could be politically misused by future generations of ministers and really run counter to the intent, the spirit and the purpose of this particular bill, Bill C-13. I hope the government will be giving this amendment favourable consideration. I thank you for your attention.

If you would like, I will also deal with Motion No. 29, if you have already called it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The two motions are being dealt with concurrently and they will be voted upon separately. There are two minutes left, if the hon. member wants to talk about Motion No. 29 as well.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, very briefly, this motion is an amendment that is complementary to the one I just described a moment ago. It makes the language consistent to ensure that when the minister establishes guidelines, codes and practices or criteria to define what is "justified in the circumstances", it will relate specifically, precisely and clearly to the goal of achieving sustainable development.

Therefore, I believe this motion will come up for a vote if the preceding motion, Motion No. 19, is given favourable consideration.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to focus my remarks today on Motions Nos. 19 and 29 as put forward by the member for Davenport. As the member articulated, this focuses our attention not just on the mitigating nature of this bill but also a positive interjection; that is, that it would contribute to sustainable development.

As this House knows, Our Common Future, the report of the UN environment program chaired by former Prime Minister Gro Brundtland, was put forth in the spring of 1987. Sustainable development was incorporated into our lexicon from that report. Often I hear that the term "sustainable development" is made up of antagonistic words: how can you be sustainable as well as having development? That is the challenge we have to face in our world, and that is why I think these amendments that have been put forth by the member for Davenport are a challenge to us in this bill. That is what we are trying to do in Canada and in the world. We are trying to allow for development but to make certain that future generations are not going to pay the price for what we have done in this generation.

It is a very positive contribution to the modification of this bill, and I look forward to hearing from the government members, if they oppose this, as to why they oppose this. It is a very important addition, and it does close a major loophole.

It is important because it challenges us on sustainable development, that whole definition of sustainable development that reverberates throughout the environmental community and the development community. I know it takes more than just a public relations exercise to convince people of a project's worthiness now, and that is why it is important to have the public process, to have the people who are going to be affected by a project involved in the assessment process. It is not just the projects that are going to occur in Canada; it is all of those projects that have any Canadian involvement.

My colleague from Port Moody —Coquitlam earlier today talked about a major project that is planned for the Narmada River in India, and our esteemed colleague in our party, former Justice Tom Berger, has a very important role in that project in deciding whether or not it will proceed. He has been contracted by the World Bank to assess the worthiness of that project, and he has to ask the question of himself, and ask the people who are affected by it, whether or not this is sustainable development. Is this just another megaproject that is going to benefit the wealthy and harm those who are less wealthy? There are plenty of those in India, as you well know, Madam Speaker.

The same goes for the Three Gorges Project in China, where the Canadian corporation Lavalin has a major role to play. So it is Canadian corporations internationally that are acting on these projects. We have to determine, because we have the responsibility in this House of Commons, whether our corporations are behaving in a sustainable manner, and not just in Canada but outside Canada.

To conclude, the motions put forth by the member for Davenport, Motions Nos. 19 and 29, are a positive contribution. I look forward to hearing from the government members and I invite their support. This is the very crux of it: whether or not we can achieve an environmental assessment review process that will allow for sustainable development. I am sure those in the development industries are wanting that as well, because they also have children and grandchildren to whom they want to pass on a healthier planet.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support both of the proposed amendments by the member for Davenport. I think they are quite clear and I think they are quite clearly justifiable.

If one looks at the wording both in Motion No. 19, which says "can be justified in the circumstances because the project contributes to the goal of achieving sustainable development," one also finds in Motion No. 29 the same wording. The member for Davenport, I think, has argued quite succinctly as to why that wording should be added.

I think we should take a look again for a moment at line 37 on page 24 because at the moment that subparagraph (ii) reads:

> (ii) the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects that can be justified in the circumstances,

That basically says to the proponent, whether it is the government, a Crown agency, an arm of government, the private sector, a provincial authority, a territorial authority, a First Nations project, or whatever, simply that "the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects that can be justified in the circumstances".

Well, who is going to justify them? We get back to the whole question, a debate that lingers not only in Canada but in many countries around the world in these now five years since the Bruntland commission came down with its report Our Common Future and came down with a definition of sustainable development. There are many—not only in the private sector, who are developers, but many members of this House with whom I have had personal and lengthy discussions—who do not understand what sustainable development means. They truly do believe it means sustained development—business as usual, the status quo, and simply allowing judgments to be made politically and expediently on the basis of the determination of profitability.

What my friend from Davenport is attempting to reinject here is a sense of reality, because the planet faces a kind of stress and pressure that it has never faced before, whether it is loss of species, pollution of the oceans, pollution of freshwater systems, global warming, or a hole in the ozone. It is a very trying time for a young person to be growing up and thinking that governments, particularly governments of a country such as Canada, are incapable, either by design or by political purpose, not only of understanding what sustainable development truly is in terms of survivability and habitability of the planet, but of making what really should be a showpiece of legislation.

As I see in my documents here, external affairs hopes to travel around the world promoting Canada as the archdeacon of environmental prowess around the world. Frankly, Bill C-13, with a series of modifications and a much more strenuous application of parliamentary scrutiny to the regulatory provisions, could start approaching that level of value to Canada and to the world community. But I think it is appropriate—and like other speakers, I really do look forward to hearing from the government side about why it took so long to pound the reference to sustainable development into the preamble of this, why it took so long to pound the actual Brundtland definition into the purposes clause, and in two circumstances where it is clearly appropriate, clearly helpful and clearly sound, both at law and in principle, to include the goal of achieving sustainable development so that one would proceed with a project that had serious environmental consequences on its own only if that were leading to the goal of sustainable development.

Every project, as we know, large or small, has a measurable impact on the biosystems of earth. Anything we do, including speaking in this chamber, has an impact on the biosystems, however small. What we are suggesting here, and what the member for Davenport is suggesting, is that we have to keep the ultimate goal in mind, that this is an intergenerational process that we have to start recognizing. In a period of a very small number of generations, almost entirely those who have lived during the 20th century have brought about, in many areas of the world, problems that will take centuries and, in some cases, millennia to repair.

Let us go back for a moment to these secret FEARO documents I was referring to earlier. It is instructive from time to time to have a look at the road the government was planning to follow in terms of this legislation in the months and years leading up to today. I quote from page 8, section 11:

> The Need for the Assessment of Policy Proposals: The World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Commission) and the Canadian National Task Force on Environment and Economy have profoundly influenced the thinking of the informed community that is advocating the strengthening of the federal EARP. That community sees clearly, and has expressed very forcefully, that the assessment of proposed policies is an essential element in pursuing sustainable development. Environment considerations must be integrated with economic, technical, social and political factors in government decisions on new policies. Environmental assessment legislation will not be publicly acceptable without addressing this issue in a straightforward manner. If there is no legal obligation to assess policy proposals, the critics of the Process do not believe it will be done consistently or adequately. Moreover, exemption of policy proposals from the Process would be seen as a backward step, as the Order can be interpreted as applying to policy initiatives.

I think that is very germane. Let me again give an example. In the budget we have just had, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the greatest source of bleating and crying for government welfare, has just received $178 million new dollars. There has been no assessment of that policy despite the government's plaintive pleas and promises that there would be in the green plan. But if you add up everything of energy, mines and resources, everything from the green plan, everything from all the other government agencies for this whole coming fiscal year, there is $55 million for alternate energy and for conservation at the federal level for the whole of Canada.

What my friend from Davenport is arguing for is that in a situation where a project is going to have negative implications—and the nuclear industry is one. No one any longer argues vigorously, with scientific basis, that the mining of uranium, the processing of uranium, and the operation of nuclear plants are without environmental impact—severe, long-term, intergenerational environmental impact.

What I am saying here, and what my friend from Davenport is saying, is this. Let us say a project to store all the nuclear waste in Canada would go to Brandon—Souris, to the parliamentary secretary's constituency; it was all going to be trucked there and dumped in his backyard. We read then where it says: "the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects that can be justified in the circumstances". It might create jobs in Brandon—Souris and it might lead to the re-election of the parliamentary secretary, and there might be other things. What my friend from Davenport is saying is that if it has to contribute to the goal of achieving sustainable development, it would fail. It would fail on those grounds.

What we are talking about here is trying to close up some of the more glaring loopholes that are visible now in the legislation. Later this afternoon I intend to come back many times to the holes that we know of in the regulations. There are 15 sets of them being developed that give loopholes for Atomic Energy of Canada, loopholes for the railroads, loopholes for mines, loopholes in fisheries, loopholes all the way through.

As I said earlier, the regulatory framework that comes with this legislation is like a box of Cheerios. It is a gigantic series of loopholes joined together to exempt almost all projects from mitigation and review. In the government's own documents it predicts that after all is said and done, after thousands and tens of thousands of projects are reviewed, it expects only a couple, with the new Bill C-13, to actually get to a full public review.

Many of us believe that the benefits to society generally, to the economy generally, and clearly to the ecology of Canada and the world are best served by having criteria out there that are well known and well understood—what compulsory projects, what ones it will be mandatory to review. My friend from Davenport, in his two amendments, simply proposes that we not leave it up to a political determination of justification and circumstances where there are negative environmental implications, that we proceed in those circumstances only if the longer-term benefit impact of that project is positive towards sustainable development.

I certainly think all members of the House should support and vote for such an objective.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I shall talk about the amendments but also about the bill in general because I think that for us, especially Quebecers, this debate fits in with the whole constitutional debate as well.

What worries me is that this bill asserts total federal control over jurisdictions that occasionally or usually were Quebec's, especially over energy, for example.

The latest constitutional proposals would give the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over energy. If energy is an exclusively provincial domain but the federal government controls all discussion of environmental issues and all environmental requirements, what use is that power?

This bill again shows the contradiction that has long been evident in the constitutional debate on power sharing. Similarly, we saw a while ago the Minister of Communications announce that the government intented to do something that was opposed to the spirit of the discussions now under way.

• (1600)

Whether we go for sovereignty or for renewed federalism, it is quite clear that the provinces' energy priorities will be up to the provinces under the Constitution. They should therefore have full jurisdiction over all environmental impact studies.

So the first problem with this bill is that it confirms this duplication of environmental authority, which I think would only weigh down the whole assessment process.

The very discretionary powers of the federal Minister of the Environment are unacceptable for Quebec and I presume for the other provinces that sometimes have their own provincial projects. The bill would give discretionary power over the justification for a project and over alternatives to it; that means total jurisdiction and total interference in any assessment that a Canadian province might do.

The most criticial point in the bill for me, however, is that the time frames are never specified; that is, a really precise deadline is never given for environmental studies. Imagine how we could ask investors to prepare a project and an investment plan if they had a project that respected the environmental spirit and principles, in other words, it did not harm migratory birds and was non-polluting? When they asked us when they could begin, we would say that an environmental review had to be done. That is normal, but they would ask how soon they would have an answer. No time limit is set. Is it two or three years? A minister could use this imprecision in a dangerous way to delay a project.

In this respect, I think the minister's role and the failure to set a time limit on the various stages in the assessment process are extremely negative factors, especially when we consider our experience in Quebec with the Great Whale project. In fact, we can expect to be faced with the same problems, the same lack of harmonization, the same duplication and the same lack of specific time limits.

I also think this bill is discriminatory with respect to the rights and duties of proponents. There would be two classes of proponents: federal proponents and provincial proponents, who would not have the same rights. This is discrimination, and it is utterly foreign to the spirit of the present Constitution as regards jurisdiction over energy, and similarly, and above all, it is foreign to the current debate on renewing the Constitution or, if we consider the other option which I prefer, the debate on sovereignty.

In my opinion, this bill was tabled too quickly since after the current constitutional debate, entirely different jurisdictions may be proposed by the federal government in the offer it makes in May, which means that the entire bill would have to be revised. It would no longer be in line with the current division of powers and would have to restrict the minister's discretionary powers, especially with respect to project justification, as I said earlier.

As for non-federal proponents, throughout the debate they would be discriminated against because they would not have the same privileges as federal proponents. As I said earlier, duplication of procedures for the assessment of impact studies is also a real possibility, and this would lead to further arguments, as happened in the case of the Great Whale project. We had one study for one part of the environment by the federal government, another one by the provincial government, and the result was endless arguments and legal fights that merely held up the project. And we would not have had a two-or three-year delay if we had been able to proceed immediately. Without this jurisdictional fighting, we would have known today whether Great Whale is or is not environmentally safe, and if it is, work could proceed and Quebec's economy would be better off as a result.

In referring to the minister's powers, I would like to include certain commitments the minister has not made with respect to harmonization in the case of treaties like the free trade agreement and a similar agreement we might sign with Mexico. Commitments at the environmental level should include an obligation on the government when it negotiates a treaty with another country like Mexico or the United States to ensure that all parties observe the same environmental standards.

Unfortunately, that is not the case, so that a company that wants to invest in Canada but may only do so without polluting or disturbing the environment may wish to avoid waiting for the results of environmental studies and prefer to go to a country whose requirements are less stringent.

Now, I am all in favour of having standards. I think the principle of the bill is good. I want us to have very stringent requirements, but when we decide to sign a treaty with another country, we must ensure that country's requirements are just as stringent so that companies in this country will not be tempted to do what 16 Canadian companies did and set up shop in certain areas near the Mexican border where environmental standards are not as strict. We cannot afford to let this happen again.

In concluding, I would like to mention what was said by the Canadian Electrical Association. Generally speaking, the association felt that the above concerns would not be addressed if the bill were passed in its present form. Consequently, it recommended making certain changes, and stressed more specifically the need for putting an end to the risk and uncertainty for provincial proponents, as reflected in the way the courts had interpreted current guidelines so far.

Although their impact on the environment is very benign, electricity producers are uncomfortable with this legislation, and at the same time we have this uncertainty which is felt by all Canadians because until the debate on the Constitution has properly clarified jurisdictions, it is useless to vote on bills and plans that will have to be redone a few months from now. I would like to repeat that I support the principle of the bill, but it would need a lot of changes, and I would have some suggestions to make in this respect in my next speech.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment on some of the remarks made by my friend, the member from the Bloc Quebecois. At the end of his speech he said that he is looking at an overlap of jurisdiction, and he says that delays due to environmental overlapping will stop investment. He was alluding to that. I gather the overlap could be the federal jurisdiction and the provincial jurisdiction.

I wonder what the answer is to that. Is the answer to drop our environmental standards? I do not think so. I do not think the hon. member would advocate that and I do not think he did advocate that, but he came perilously close to saying that. Would the other answer be to have separate countries? Then, clearly, we would have not an overlap between Quebec and Canada. The problem with that, it seems to me, is that we will still need to have standards unless an independent Quebec, as proposed by the Bloc Quebecois, proposes to drop environmental standards in order to attract investment.

I would hope not. Is that what the new Quebec is to be about? I heard the member from Montreal, another Bloc Quebecois member, in Question Period urge the government to censor Mordecai Richler's upcoming book.

While I may not agree with all the things Mr. Richler is saying in his book, I felt a chill on the back of my neck with the notion of censorship. If you do not like an idea you censor it. Is that the new Quebec? I would hope not because I do not think this is a very strong position from which to argue.

We are talking about the environment. Surely the problem with the environment is bigger and I say this to the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois; is the environment a federal matter? Is it a provincial matter? Is it a local matter? Is it an international matter? Fish swim, as one Quebecois once said. I think he was Prime Minister of this country and he was talking about who should control the jurisdiction. Fish swim from the waters near one province to another province in the maritimes. They swim to the international waters.

Winds blow. The winds blow from the United States, pollute Canada and vice versa. Therefore one could argue that the environment is an international matter.

The way to approach the environment as to what the constitutional position should be, should be who can best govern the environment. How would it work from a practical point of view. Sometimes it may be national. Sometimes it may be provincial or sometimes it may be local. Sometimes the jurisdictions may overlap. That may not be a bad thing. I will give you an example of culture, what is happening to culture now. You can make it similar to the environment.

In culture, a federal organization like the Canada Council is working very well for Quebec artists. They are getting the money. There is an arm's length relationship and so on. Quebec artists are saying: "We want to keep them". At the moment, I believe there are some problems in the Quebec cultural bureaucracy. The overlapping system that we have for an artist in Quebec, where the artist can get money and help from the federal government or the provincial government, is working. He can go to the federal government and get good service. That was not always the case. Sometimes it was better in the province.

So it can work in the environment. Sometimes you can have a province where the government is quite frankly bad on the environment as was the previous Devine government in Saskatchewan over the Rafferty—Alameda. The federal government was being pressed to act. That is not a bad thing and can be a good thing.

The hon. member brought up another point from the Bloc Quebecois on which I want to comment. He said that perhaps we should be careful about the constitutional aspects of the environment because the debate is ongoing. There are constitutional negotiations going on and in the next few months the government may end up giving more power to the provinces, on the environment, specifically to Quebec. I think that is a good point. The House should think about that in this debate. We may be passing a bill under which, if we give a lot of power on environment to the provinces, as a result of the constitutional discussions, we could be acting rather uselessly. It is something to look for.

My impression of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee was that Canadians, including Quebecers, by and large wanted the federal government to control the environment. They saw a real role for the federal government in the environment. They saw shared power in certain areas. I say this to the hon. member while I have the floor on this subject. When speaking of the issue of the development of James Bay, I had a prominent member of the Parti Quebecois tell me: "Don't worry. After independence we won't have any problems with the Indians in northern Quebec. We will just buy it. We will give them $1 billion and we will make a deal". I thought: "Boy, are you ever mistaken. I think you are living in another world".

The point I make is that even after independence and I would say this if, God help us, if Quebec did become independent, exercise its rights of self–determination, as I believe it had, if it did that Quebec would still have the same problems. It would have the problem of a minority language and the minority language would be English, just like we have the "problem" in Canada of the minority language French. It would have the problem of native people in northern Quebec who would, I am afraid, if Quebec were to go ahead against the wishes of the native people on the development of a new James Bay project, declare their independence and call upon Canada to send the Canadian army to help them.

Those are my worst fears. We have to be very careful of that situation. The member laughs but one could see the development of that situation down the road as the worst case scenario.

I say to the hon. member that I think the Quebec record on the environment is as good as any other province in this country and the Quebec record on native people, contrary to what other people say, is as good as or even better in some aspects as other provinces in this country.

The hon. member is correct in identifying the environment as important in the constitutional aspect. It is painfully obvious to all of us that the environment, if anything, is an international matter. While we Canadians play the potentially deadly game of whether we should have an independent Quebec or not, the environment problem is not going to go away and independence or sovereignty for Quebec is not going to solve for the environmental problems.

My suggestion is that really smart people would look upon the environment as an interrelated problem of international, national, provincial, and local governments and that we should focus on which jurisdiction in any one area could do the job the best, who could govern it the best so that we could have true sustainable development.

That is the secret. Sometimes it will be overlapping jurisdiction. When we deal with an environmental bill we should look upon it as very important that it is a federal system where we will have federal and provincial jurisdiction.

I will leave you with this thought. Perhaps the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois and his colleagues could ponder this. We have not done very badly in the environment in Canada, have we? Have we not a beautiful environment in this country? We have it through the co–operation of Quebecers and people from other provinces such as my province of British Columbia. Perhaps we should work to keep that.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words at this time on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Davenport. In doing so I wish to add some comments to the debate that has sprung up here with the last two speakers concerning jurisdiction.

I do commend to all members of the House the report which was distributed last week by the Standing Committee on the Environment in which the jurisdictional issues have been dealt with. The member for Skeena is a member of that committee and participated very diligently and with dedication to the issue of the Constitution and jurisdiction for the environment.

As the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam indicated, the environment is an international matter. It is not one that breaks down into small parts easily. One of the topics at the Brazil conference, the UNCED conference, in June of this year is treating it as an international matter that requires the attention of all governments in all parts of the country. There is no doubt that we in Canada have a long way to go to deal with the pollution that exists and the potential for environmental damage that exists in other parts of the world.

That brings me to the subject of sustainable development. Like the member from Skeena earlier, it is really crucial that all members of the House know the definition and interpretation of sustainable development that we are using in the context of this bill and other matters. We have to be very careful that development is not recognized as an ongoing, forever type of a concept when we understand and know that the environment is made up of many finite pieces. Nothing could be more finite than the cod stocks off the Atlantic coast at the moment. We know there cannot be continued development when the resource has been or is in the process of being depleted.

The Minister of Forestry is in the House listening intently to this debate. The Minister of Forestry knows that the forest is a finite concept in Canada. There is only so much timber that can be grown at any one time in the world and at the moment more timber is being cut than is being replanted. Therefore, we do not have an infinite resource that we can continue to develop for our purposes.

It is the same with the atmosphere. The ozone problem is a very good one to examine because of the new hole that has opened over North America and Greenland. As the ozone hole opens, we realize that it is a finite resource that has been protecting us and if we are not careful, i.e., allow the development of CFC based refrigeration capacity in China, India and other parts of the world to meet the needs of growing and developing populations, that development will not be sustainable. As those refrigerators deteriorate the CFCs evacuate and the ozone holes become bigger.

As I said in another comment made at another time in this House, it is alarming to hear the Minister of the Environment talking about telling children they cannot go out into the sun at certain times of the day because the hole in the ozone has made working, living and playing in the sun a dangerous activity.

It is alarming in another sense as well. Children are not the only living things that are out in the sun. Plants and animals are part of our natural environment, our biosphere. Plants and animals cannot be told to put on hats and stay out of the sun between the hours of 11 in the morning and 2.30 in the afternoon. Plants and animals cannot read the ozone warnings that will be published in the newspaper, yet they will be affected by the ultraviolet light coming down through the hole in the ozone layer.

These are finite matters and sustainable development means that when we do anything that affects that environment, we are ensuring that we know we can continue to do that forever and ever and ever. It is our intention, since we know that we borrow this world from our children, to leave this world for them in better condition that we inherited from our ancestors.

When we think about that concept through the generations our environment can only improve with each new generation, as each new generation tries to ensure that they leave this planet a better place environmentally for those who will come after them.

Therefore, sustainable development is a very particular term to the environment. When business misconstrues it to mean that: "By golly, we can do just about anything we want as long as it does not adversely affect the environment", well adversely affecting the environment is something that this bill tries to deal with.

The Minister of the Environment is very proud of the mitigation measures contained in this Bill C-13. The Minister of the Environment has talked about introducing a tighter definition of mitigation that requires a substantial reduction or effective control of environmental effects of a project.

The Minister of the Environment proudly says that these changes ensure minor reductions in the environmental effects of projects so that they cannot be trivialized in the process.

The member for Davenport has raised a matter here that indicates that we cannot trivialize this section of the bill if in fact we adopt his amendment. The Minister of the Environment does not want these matters trivialized. We have a way to ensure that that trivialization does not occur and we should support it.

At the same time we are recognizing that these pieces of the puzzle fall under the part of the bill dealing with decisions of responsible authorities and the way in which the decision of the responsible authority is applied.

I want to add one thing before I close in relation to this and that is relating to the Supreme Court decision on the Oldman dam and policy matters which the government is undertaking. The member for Skeena has talked about policy on a number of occasions here today. He talked about policy of the nuclear industry in Canada.

Right now the government is proceeding with a policy decision on agriculture relating to the movement of grain, the changing of the way in which the railroads could possibly be paid on the moving of grain, the Crow rate.

Mr. Speaker, you have been in the House during debates on the Crow rate. Now the Crow rate has changed to the Crow benefit and the Crow benefit is in danger because the government wants to change that policy.

That is a significant adverse effect on our environment if we take the grain off the trains and put it on to trucks and move those trucks down highway miles all over the western prairies.

That is a policy decision that under this legislation cannot be dealt with in the appropriate manner that projects can be dealt with. We have to find a way to ensure that that is dealt with.

I add that by changing the way in which we move grain, we are not doing sustainable development in this country. We are doing something that is very negative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, I wish that members would start to stay with the amendment, with the clause, with the motion. We are starting to develop a little more than just what we have here as far as the amendments are concerned. I would appreciate hon. members please to conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, sometimes legislation is written so that it allows a considerable amount of latitude in the interpretation of a particular bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, I appreciate that but ever since this morning I have considered a lot of latitude here. I wish that we could get right down to the nitty-gritty and close this thing off.

The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, on a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Just to comment, Mr. Speaker. I think you have been doing a great job today in allowing the flexibility to examine this bill in its fullest. I congratulate you on the fine work you are doing from the chair today.

Mr. Hovdebo: The type of flexibility that we are talking about in this bill is sometimes not the kind of flexibility we want. For instance, in this particular case, the flexibility here would allow projects to go forward if this amendment is left the way it is.

The clause presently says: "the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects that can be justified in the circumstances". That leaves any interpretation that anybody wants to put on the basis for the decision being made.

• (1630)

I am not sure that we want that kind of flexibility left in this bill or in the regulations of this bill. Can we afford to approach this environment with that kind of flexibility? We leave many things to the discretion of the minister in this bill.

Again, can we afford to leave that kind of flexibility in, or do we need to plug the loopholes that are in the bill? That is what these two particular amendments are attempting to do. They are attempting to plug the loopholes.

It is the responsibility of this House. If it works well, it will point out those loopholes. It will analyse them and it will try to make the bill work better in the future. Only by analysis of the legislation and by attempting to plug those loopholes will the legislation work well when we try to use it in the future.

We have spent a considerable amount of time in the last little while talking about the definition which is of the term which the member for Davenport has used. Can it be justified in the circumstances because the project contributes to the goal of achieving sustainable development?

The Brundtland commission established what it considered was worth while and was a good definition of "sustainable development". That terminology is being used all over the world and the definition of it is acceptable to most parts of the world. Madam Brundtland is presently in Brazil working toward the UNCED conference which comes later this year.

The process that we have to look at in this bill is to make sure that the loopholes which we recognized are plugged. I am sure that there are some that we have not recognized and will not recognize. That is all that the member for Davenport is trying to do with these amendments.

Consequently, I would suggest that we make Parliament work well in this particular case as far as environment is concerned and make sure that that loophole is plugged.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, thank you for reminding us of the importance of speaking specifically to the amendments in question as, indeed, the hon. member for Davenport has once again done during his opening remarks.

This debate, particularly this last half hour or so, has been very far-ranging as you know. I would simply like to note in response to the hon. member for Richelieu and to reassure him that, indeed, the legislation including the amendments before us are clearly within the jurisdiction of the federal government. In fact, that point has already been established by the Supreme Court judgment on the Oldman dam.

There is no question about the legal jurisdiction of the federal government as proposed in this legislation. I would also note that there is a recognition of the importance of working in co-operation with the provinces in the legislation. I would make specific reference to the example of joint panels and to co-operation with the provinces in the area of the assessment process.

In addition, deadlines will be incorporated in the regulations and administrative arrangements with the provinces. Some of the hon. member's fears, I hope, will be put to rest by perhaps a more careful reading of the legislation and the proposed amendments.

Motions Nos. 19 and 29 which have been before us now for some time deal with an area to which the hon. member for Davenport has given careful consideration as indeed we did during the course of our committee hearings.

In fact, I would suggest that the results can be found in other amendments which have been incorporated into Bill C-13. They have already been ratified during the course of our deliberations and were in response to this type of concern that was raised during the course of our hearings by witnesses and by individual members.

One of the things that is important to stress is the fact that there is a clear responsibility given to the minister in this legislation to ensure that his decisions, and that of any responsible authority, indeed the very objective of the bill as a whole is designed to encourage sustainable development.

Perhaps for the interest of those who are watching I will read clause 4(b) under "Purposes".

> The purposes of this Act are: 4.(b) to encourage responsible authorities to take actions that will promote sustainable development and thereby achieve or maintain a healthy environment in a healthy economy.

That indeed, is part of the purpose of the bill. It follows, although I do not have the benefit of legal training, that that which follows in the bill as a direct result is governed by the purposes of the bill. So this in a very real sense then is part of the foundation on which the bill is addressed.

In addition, there has been reference in the House to the question as to what we mean by the term "sustainable development". I would draw attention to page 6 of the bill where sustainable development is defined. It means development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

Now most members present will recognize that wording, of course, because it is borrowed in a sense from a greater authority than the members of the committee.

But we have, indeed, turned back to the Brundtland commission and there is a direct linkage between the purposes of the bill, the definition of sustainable development as contained in the bill, and the issue which is at hand.

One thing that is very clear as a result of some of the discussions which took place in committee is that the bill is more tightly drafted than it was initially.

As a consequence, the determination that significant adverse environmental effects are justifiable can now only be made after a panel review or mediation, and not after a screening or a comprehensive study. That is a tighter drafting than existed initially.

Furthermore, the minister has been given the power to set out criteria on what this terminology "justified in the circumstances" means. He has been provided with that within the context of Bill C-13.

Indeed, he is committed to ensuring that decisions under this clause are made within the principles of sustainable development. And in that I am simply repeating my earlier remarks.

How the term "sustainable development" is interpreted by the department will be set out in a guideline on "justifiable" to be prepared under clause 58. That too is a result of discussions which took place in committee.

In our minds, to go further than that at this particular time, to establish the direct legal connection as the hon. member would wish us to do, in our opinion would be to give the courts more of a role in the definition of the term "sustainable development" than we would think is advisable.

The reason I say that is because we are very conscious of the fact, as others have said earlier in the day, that in a very real sense the concept of environmental protection is still in a state of evolvement, as indeed is the technology by which we would seek to protect that environment.

So, while we have used in this bill the clearest and most commonly accepted definition of "sustainable development" available to us at this time, it is equally clear that at some point in the future—and in the area of environmental protection it is difficult to know whether the future be two years down the road or four years or ten years, as the case may be—it may well be that the definition that is in place and is accepted at that point in time perhaps would be different or could at least be a variation from that which exists today.

And so, I would prefer the legislators of the land—in this case the Parliament of Canada—be given the task of defining sustainable development, accepting as we do the fact that this is an evolving definition.

We have heard various suggestions today as to who is going to be the Government of Canada in two years or four years or six years. Some of the parties have indicated their aspirations to have that responsibility; others who are in the House have not yet indicated they see that as being part of their expectations. But it is clear that politicians, elected representatives, are in the best position to accept this responsibility today, rather than to pass the buck, the responsibility, on to the courts.

In doing so, we are accepting a system whereby we are giving that responsibility to those who are accountable.

• (1640)

Certainly one of the things I find frustrating, and certainly my constituents find frustrating, is the fact that very often important decisions are made by jurisdictions over which they have no control. Politicians are accountable and we are held accountable for this legislation. We are held accountable as a government for what we proposed and we will be held accountable if it is passed, as indeed I hope and expect it will be.

I am comfortable with that concept of accountability. I am also very, very conscious of the fact that, as I said earlier, in a sense the terms we have before us are not scientific; they are changing. It may very well be that when we revisit this bill, as indeed we understand will undoubtedly happen at some point in the future, we can re-examine our definition of sustainable development at that point in time.

In the meantime, the combination of the stated purposes on which the minister has accepted a commitment to act, the definition of sustainable development as provided in the legislation, and the inclusion under clause 58 of an indication by which the department will define justifiable circumstances has provided a good foundation on which to act. We feel that although we do not address the precise wording of the hon. member, we have gone a significant step in that direction. I think that under the circumstances we have reached what we consider to be a logical and appropriate point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the next speaker for South West Nova, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—Health; the hon. member for Don Valley East—The Economy; the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—Ukraine; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Post-Secondary Education; the hon. member for Dartmouth—Interest Rates.

The hon. member for South West Nova.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, having taken part in the earlier debate on this bill and having sat in committee while we went through clause by clause, and at other times replacing some of my colleagues in the clause by clause, I have to say that I do have concerns specifically related to this subclause. I do like the use of sustainable development as my colleague has proposed in the amendment.

I would like to give you an example of what I find weak in using "can be justified in the circumstances". If you look at "environmental effects" in the definition clause, it reads:

> "environmental effect" means, in respect of a project,
> (a) any change that the project may cause in the environment, including any effect of any such change on health and socio-economic conditions, on physical and cultural heritage, on the current use of lands and resources for traditional purposes by aboriginal persons, or on any structure, site or thing that is of historical, archaeological or paleontological or architectural significance, and
> (b) any change to the project that may be caused by the environment, whether any such change occurs within or outside of Canada;

There are words in which I have had a little experience, having been chairman of the environment committee when FEARO was discussed—and that is the former regulation, which this bill has improved on perhaps in terms of process—that come out in this clause:

> (a) where, taking into account the implementation of any mitigation measures that the responsible authority considers appropriate,
> (ii) the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects

I just read to you the definition of environment effects. It can be "of any such change on health and socio-economic conditions". With those words alone—"the project is likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects that can be justified in the circumstances"—the minister can go ahead and allow approval. I say that because if you allow the sustainable development clause in there along with the purposes and the definition of environmental effects, I think you are providing Canadians a much safer way of finding out whether or not a federally funded project is going to affect the people in that area.

I will go back to two projects that I have seen in my own area. One was an ACOA grant of about a million dollars, and if FEARO had not been there, there would have been no study to justify that it was not going to cause—even if I disagreed with the result of the study and I could see that it did affect the people who lived around the site, the federal government had a responsibility to do some type of study. When that discretion is allowed, "justified in the circumstances", with no definition has to what circumstances, a very broad relationship is made so any government or any responsible authority can trod over the rights of people, I think, without having to do any study as to the cause and effect of a government project.

In this day and age, I think the local people have to be aware that governments do fund projects and do affect their environment without taking any consideration of it. By leaving it so broad that it can be "justified in the circumstances", it may be justifiable in Ottawa to give a grant or to fund something down on Digby Neck, and therefore in the circumstances it may be only a couple of million dollar project in Ottawa, but it may have very harmful socio-economic and health effects in a given area. Unless the people are aware that such funding is going to be given and if there is nothing in the process to make it mandatory—and this bill says that it is within the responsible authority to justify—I think we have to have stronger teeth. Sustainable development does bring in a stronger element. Looking at the definition and purposes clauses, at the definition of sustainable development, we should be making it stronger to protect the individuals rather than making it broader to protect the responsible authorities in that large area of what is a justifiable circumstance.

I listened to the parliamentary secretary as to the accountability of elected people. Accountability after the fact means nothing once the funding and the project are under way. Any area that allows an escape without some justification—I think these are very weak terms, "justified in the circumstances"—I cannot support.

I have to support my colleague, the member for Davenport, on his motion to change that. Instead of "can be justified in the circumstances", it would read: "can be justified in the circumstances because the project contributes to the goal of achieving sustainable development". Why not have a positive goal for the responsible authority rather than again putting on the unsuspecting public who will find in their backyard a project they did not know enough about?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motions Nos. 19 and 29 in the name of the hon. member for Davenport were grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 19 will apply to Motion No. 29.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

• (1650)

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. That means Motion No. 29 stands deferred also.

Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30 standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 30 will apply to Motions Nos. 21 and 22.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for Minister of the Environment) moved:

Motion No. 21.

(a) by striking out line 46 at page 29 and substituting the following therefor:
"end of the assessment;";

(b) by striking out line 2 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:
"is to be published; and (e) meets any criteria established pursuant to paragraph 58(1)(h)."

Motion No. 22.

(a) by striking out lines 2 to 12 at page 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"lands.";

(b) by striking out line 21 at page 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"Canada and outside federal lands that

(a) includes a consideration of the factors required to be considered under subsections 16(1) and (2);

(b) includes an opportunity for the public to participate in the assessment;

(c) includes a requirement that the report is to be submitted to the Minister at the end of the assessment;

(d) includes a requriement that the report is to be published; and

(e) meets any criteria established pursuant to paragraph 58(1)(h)."

Motion No. 30.

That Bill C-13 be amended in Clause 58

(a) by striking out lines 27 and 28 at page 42 and substituting the following therefor:

"poses of coordination, consultation, exchange of information and the determination of factors to be considered in relation to the";

(b) by striking out line 41 at page 42 and substituting the following therefor:

"substitution pursuant to section 43;
(h) establish criteria for the purposes of an alternative manner of conducting an assessment of the environmental effects of a project referred to in subsection 46(2) or 47(2); and".

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order or a question.

The note I have in front of me states that Motion No. 21 would apply to Motions Nos. 22 and 30. I am not sure whether that is what I heard you read or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is that a vote on Motion No. 30 will apply to Motions Nos. 21 and 22, which is the Speaker's ruling. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): In any contest of will, Mr. Speaker, you clearly would win over anyone else in the House. I understand that and recognize that.

I would like to make a number of brief comments with respect to Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30, which are amendments to clauses 46, 47 and 58 and are designed to establish criteria to the ministerial power for transboundary clauses.

Clauses 46(2) and 47(2) outline the circumstances under which, in the case of a project that may cause significant transboundary environmental effects, the Minister of the Environment may exercise the discretion not to establish a review panel where it can be left to other jurisdictions if all parties are in agreement as to the alternative means. I want to stress the qualification there.

During our clause by clause, which was very extensive—and as members will recall, the minister himself was present for a significant portion of that, which indeed was a generous commitment on his part that we appreciated—the committee amended the above provisions to require the criterion already required for the substitution of other federal processes to be met before the minister could exercise his discretion not to establish a review panel.

That criterion I would like to bring to the attention of the House. It is found on page 31 in the bill, and it is identified in four different instances. Clause 47(1)(a):

(a) includes a consideration of the factors required to be considered under subsections 16(1) and (2);

(b) includes an opportunity for the public to participate in the assessment;

(c) includes a requirement that the report is to be submitted to the Minister at the end of the assessment; and

(d) includes a requirement that the report is to be published.

What we are doing is adding to the requirement for public participation in the process.

In addition, in subclause 58(1) under "Minister's Powers" we provide for the development of additional criteria which may be required to guide the minister's decision. We did that simply in recognition, as I said earlier, of the fact that this is an evolving science and if other criteria are to be identified they can indeed be added there with little difficulty. This same type of provision was added to the federal substitution clauses in clause-by-clause consideration.

The government has agreed to consider such an amendment for the transboundary provisions and has therefore proposed this change. As a consequence of the proposed change cross-references would have to be made in 45(2) and 47(2).

As a further technical matter, the amendments to subclauses 47(1) and (2) are required because the criteria were erroneously placed at an earlier time under subclause 47(1). This motion will result in paragraphs (a) through (d) being placed under subclause 47(2) where they properly belong.

Earlier in the day I referred to amendments which I perceived to be technical amendments, in some cases simply being a clarification of the French language translation. This led to extremely extensive debate on a variety of issues, the extent of which was somewhat of a surprise to me. I would simply suggest to the House that this is a tightly framed series of amendments being proposed by the government. I would hope that it would meet with both approval and speedy concurrence.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will take that as an admonition from the parliamentary secretary and presume to ignore it. I will extend an admonition toward him. This is the most important environmental legislation this House has seen in many a long year. Although he may think that we do not need to debate it any further, I do and I think most Canadians do.

We want these clauses debated. We want a public process. That is why we have the parliamentary channel, so that the aspects of this legislation can be fully detailed for the Canadian public. I know there are people from the Canadian Environmental Law Association who are watching us and wondering what is going on. I know the parliamentary secretary is wanting to push this through. We want stronger environmental legislation too, but we are not prepared to give the parliamentary secretary a blank cheque.

These particular motions have important implications for Canada's relations in the world. The international aspects of environmental assessment are crucial. We are coming up to the world summit in Brazil. Canada in my view deserves some the strong international reputation it has on caring for the rest of the planet. However we have to ensure that the relations Canada has with the rest of the world are not diminished by this legislation.

My colleague for Skeena has given me a copy of his bank of secret documents and I would like to read from that. An issue in December 1989 puts this whole debate in context, because it is the kind of mindset that those of us who are concerned about strong environmental legislation have to struggle against. We are talking about corporations supporting exports, and I cite: "Provision of federal commercial credit to support international trade on the part of Canadian companies through the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian Commercial Corporation is a special case requiring unusual departure from normal assessment procedures. The corporations rarely see an application for a loan early in the planning of a project and in any case have little or no opportunity to influence the project design". We know what is coming. What they are saying is: "Therefore we should have it exempt". They go on to say: "Granting of commercial credit is highly competitive internationally". We can just see the whole mindset behind it: "It is so competitive, therefore, give us a break; don't make us have the same environmental standards".

• (1700)

The corporations note that should they require the usual environmental assessment to be conducted by the proponent Canadian enterprise or by the client countries before agreeing to grant the loan, Canadian companies would be placed at a distinct competitive disadvantage.

We are not talking about competitiveness here. We are talking about the world's environment. They are whining and bleeding about competitiveness. This is why it is important that this legislation is debated fully and that this kind of loophole is filled.

Of course I am not in favour of Canadian loss of exports. I am a strong Canadian. I want Canada to be strong economically, but I do not want that to occur at the expense of the world environment. That kind of rationale is just not acceptable.

I note further on in this document—and this is why I want to say that there is balance within the bureaucracy and this is where we should be giving them some credit—that it says: "The government in pursuing environmentally sustainable development domestically and internationally seeks to build a framework of appropriate understanding, arrangements and obligations with others".

The application of Canadian environmental assessment procedures and activities outside Canada should avoid creating unfortunate precedents of extra-territoriality, be sensitive to local conditions and policies and to agreed international institutions and procedures.

It should not detract from Canada's environmental stature internationally in co-operation with the other countries. That is what these motions are trying to achieve. I think that oftentimes the search for perfection is the enemy of the good, and I learned that phrase from the Constitution committee. We cannot achieve perfection, even on environmental legislation, but we have to make sure that all loopholes acquired by this bill are filled to the best of our ability. We are not seeking perfection. We are not being obstructionists. We are trying to make this bill the best possible so that we can support it.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is intended to be helpful. On page X of the Order Paper, the description of the amendment presently under debate does not seem to respond with the text of the bill being amended.

Therefore there is a necessity to ensure that by passing Motion No. 21 on page X we do pass a motion that fits into the text of the bill. Since this is not possible at the present time, it may be desirable on your part, Mr. Speaker, to suspend for a moment the discussion on Motion No. 21 and proceed perhaps with Motion No. 22 until this matter is clarified.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I was just going to remind the House Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30 have been grouped. I note the hon. member for Davenport has not yet taken an opportunity to speak on the combination of Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30. If he were to choose to do that now, while he is addressing Motions Nos. 22 and 30 I would seek to get clarification on the point he has raised and, with the co-operation of the House, permit him to continue his remarks after I have achieved that explanation if that would be in concurrence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is agreed that I will recognize the hon. member for Davenport on debate on Motions Nos. 22 and 30?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to overburden the parliamentary secretary, but I would prefer it if he were to introduce Motions Nos. 22 and 30 and give us a brief outline of the reasons of the government. Then perhaps we may not even have to comment or people may want to comment, but a presentation on his part would facilitate the task.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I could ask him to do that. I notice that the hon. member for Skeena was rising to speak.

I will recognize the hon. parliamentary secretary on debate.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): I rise on a matter of clarification. If you will recall, Mr. Speaker, you have grouped the three motions together. Indeed the three motions are very much interrelated and I have present an introduction of the three of them together.

That is why I was suggesting the hon. member might want to speak on Motions Nos. 22 and 30. We are indeed debating all three motions simultaneously.

I know my hon. friend for Skeena is quite prepared to speak to the motions themselves. Perhaps, when he has done that, I would have the clarification which the hon. member for Davenport is seeking and he then may wish to speak or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to keep my remarks to transboundary matters in relation to Motions Nos. 22 and 30.

The issue of environmental assessment in terms of transboundary issues and how we handle them is obviously extremely important. We have a few historic instruments to guide us. We have the International Joint Commission which has dealt principally with transboundary water and some air issues with the United States.

We face a growing body of issues. For example, when one looks at the Canadian Arctic in terms of airborne toxics, in terms of the ozone difficulties, global warming, pollution of the oceans, and the transmission of all kinds of toxics into that environment, it becomes quite clear that we require a very clear series of sections to deal with transboundary environmental effects. We also require some fairly strong and precise legislation to allow us to deal with projects taking place in other countries that might involve Canadian technology or funds or expertise, or projects that might consequentially have an impact back on to Canada.

The legislation, as we are just learning now, has some technical flaws in it which may or may not be capable of being remedied this afternoon. However, as I was noting in some correspondence I just had from the Canadian Environmental Law Association, there continue to be some chronic problems that really do need to be addressed. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary or the minister can find an opportunity to deal with these questions. Even in relation to Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 30 with which we are dealing, we come back once again whether we are talking about the mediation process or the review panel process to the whole question of enforceability.

Albeit as we have been dealing with the 1984 cabinet guidelines order in relation as I have said before to the Kemano project, the Oldman dam in Alberta, the Rafferty–Alameda, Point Aconi in Nova Scotia, or the Great Whale project in Quebec, the development of administrative law has required enormous amounts of fund raising by public interest groups that have been forced to take the proponents—sometimes the government itself—before the courts to try to get rulings as to the interpretation of the 1984 cabinet guidelines order which were not written in a legislative sense. They were written as an Order in Council which is clear to anyone who has taken the time to read them. One of the things that we are faced with in Bill C–13 is that it is a giant step forward. There is no doubt that in terms of clarity it is much more clear. But, regrettably, with the clarity has come shrinkage in terms of its applicability and its enforceability. It likely will take another Parliament to address these issues because it seems that this government has gone about as far as it is prepared to go within the body of Bill C–13. It has balked at over a hundred amendments proposed by my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in an attempt to make it more directly enforceable and more directly applicable.

Here we are talking about the mediation section, but in any section you are talking about, it is quite clear that the definition of environment should have been at least as broadly expanded as that found by all of the Supreme Court justices in the Oldman decision of just over a month ago, which goes well beyond the definition that we find here in Bill C–13, and should make reference to social, economic, cultural or built environments.

One of the things that we do know, as I said earlier today, is that there are many existing structures, buildings, dump sites, impediments, river systems, and so on, that are on a daily basis causing more negative consequential environmental impact than many "new proposals" or "new projects" or "new constructions". Clearly, a piece of legislation such as this should have what might be described as some hindsight, a capacity to look at existing or historic human developments that might be having a negative impact on the environment.

Similarly, the definition of "environmental effect" should be amended to expressly include any direct, indirect or cumulative environmental impacts. Regrettably that does not seem to have sunk in yet on the government side.

The definition of "project" focuses almost entirely on physical works rather than government plans, programs or policies driving individual projects. This has been an ongoing debate. Although clause 46 on transboundary and related environmental effects might not be driven that often by projects that have a transboundary nature to them, I think increasingly as we get to understand things like acid rain that is transboundary, marine pollution that is transboundary, problems in the Great Lakes which are transboundary, the movement of diseases among plants and animals which is transboundary, airborne toxics, we come to realize that we need to look at the whole range of impacts, whether they are public or private sector.

Certainly in this House we can be particularly interested in and capable of catching up the environmental significance and environmental impacts of things far beyond simple structures, which is what this legislation and its consequential regulations seem to be driving at.

On meaningful public participation, one of the sections that the Minister of the Environment is attempting to amend at the moment is in relation to something that should have been meticulously included, which is the funding for interveners. There is a separate fund under the green plan but, as most people know, it is very much inadequate and relatively inaccessible. Even the Ontario legislation on participant funding is more clearly dealt with than this legislation. It might well be something that the minister would wish to have been here to speak about, why there was the split in the bill rather than having it carefully included now rather than waiting until some future date beyond the next election.

On the environmental assessment part, the legislation as it is presently being dealt with includes "the consideration of, the purpose of and the need for an undertaking; the alternatives to the undertaking; the alternative means of carrying out the undertaking; the environmental effects, advantages and disadvantages of the undertaking and alternatives; the mitigation measures necessary to address adverse environmental effects; the monitoring and other follow-up programs necessary to address environmental effects; and the public comments concerning each of the above noted factors". The assurance of those things that I have just delineated are not precisely enough dealt with in the bill. We know now that there will be some evaluation of alternatives to but not in as precise a manner as we would like at the initial screening process.

I look forward to dealing with more on these sections in a few moments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that we have cleared up the difficulty in the point of order by the hon. member for Davenport. It was with regard to a reprinted copy that he did not have at his disposal. I think that has been cleared up.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the legislation always assumes that the minister is omnipotent, that when the minister is faced with a problem, the minister will know exactly what the solution to that problem is. Consequently, in this particular section under the administration of the powers of the minister, the tendency has been to assume that the minister does not need the kind of instruction which will give the kind of guidance which will allow him to answer the question in the best possible way for the control of the environment. In Motion No. 29 which we just passed, we attempted to add to that the definition that is given to the minister, the guidance that is given to the minister so the minister can then best possibly use the legislation to protect the environment.

These three amendments that we are discussing now are intended to do more of the same. I commend the minister and the parliamentary secretary in their approach in attempting to do this. The very method used in these particular amendments has had the effect of broadening the responsibility of the minister without defining more particularly the goals that must be reached.

I suppose we could say that the effect has been to leave the minister with more discretion than he had before. Consequently, maybe we should judge these particular amendments by what they have left out rather than what they put into this particular clause.

Although I see no reason why we would not support the particular changes that are being suggested, they do not add to the ability of the minister to make sure that the environment is protected. In other words, they do not give him any more guidance as to how he or she should act in a particular case with a problem.

On that basis, as has been indicated before, this bill could stand a considerable amount of tinkering which might be necessary even before it becomes an effective bill in this House and in the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motion agreed to.

Motion No. 30 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That applies to Motions Nos. 21 and 22.

Motion No. 31, standing in the name of the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake will be debated and voted on separately.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake) moved:

That Bill C-13 be amended by adding immediately after line 26 at page 46 the following new clause:

"59.1 (1) Every regulation that is proposed to be made under section 59 shall be laid before each House of Parliament at least twenty sitting days before the proposed effective date thereof.

(2) Where, within fifteen sitting days after a proposed regulation is laid before either House of Parliament under subsection (1), a motion for the consideration of that House to the effect that the proposed regulation not be approved, signed by no fewer than fifteen Senators or twenty Members of the House of Commons, as the case may be, is filed with the Speaker of the Senate or the House of Commons, as the case may be, the Speaker shall, within five sitting days after the filing of the motion, without debate or amendment put every question necessary for the disposition of the motion.

(3) Where a motion referred to in subsection (2) is adopted by both Houses of Parliament, the proposed regulation to which the motion relates may not be made.

(4) Where parliament dissolves or prorogues earlier than fifteen sitting days after a proposed regulation is laid before both Houses of Parliament under subsection (1) and a motion has not been disposed of under subsection (2) in relation to the proposed regulation in both Houses of Parliament, the proposed regulation may not be made.

(5) For purposes of this section, "sitting day" means, in respect of either House of Parliament, a day on which that House sits".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe that support for this amendment standing in my name today is crucial to the functioning of Bill C–13. Although the provisions of the bill outline the framework for environmental assessment, the bill will only have meaning in content in the context of the proposed regulations.

Far more than most legislation, the teeth to federal environmental assessment lies in regulations yet to be approved or drafted. We have been told there are 12 to 15 sets of regulations, eventually to give substance and procedure to federal environmental assessment.

Exclusion lists outlining what projects and what types of projects will not be required to be subjected to review will be in the regulations. Procedures governing how public participation will occur will be left to regulation.

The comprehensive study lists will be left to regulation. Procedures for examining written evidence will be left to regulation. Public registries will be dealt with in the regulations. The workings of the follow-up programs will be left to regulations.

Let me give the House a sample of the crucial role regulations will play in determining the strengths and weaknesses of federal environmental assessment.

During the extensive committee work on this bill the Minister of the Environment had the following words to say, and I want to quote five paragraphs that have been recorded by Hansard in the minister's remarks. I quote:

"A year ago the committee studying the predecessor of Bill C–13 suspended its proceedings. One of the reasons was the committee's desire to better understand the bill by seeing some of the regulations that will be developed. There are some 15 sets of regulations which will accompany the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. These regulations define the scope of application, assessment procedures and separate procedures for special cases. Regulations will be established to cover areas as diverse as international developmental assistance to the procedures which will govern environmental assessment on Indian lands which is in itself an important matter.

To fulfil my commitment to this committee, I choose to distribute copies of the two key draft regulations to you and to all who have participated in the process. When I say all, Mr. Chairman, I think it also includes the witnesses. This is unusual because the government usually reserves the prerogative to develop regulations outside the sphere of Parliament.

In this case we have legislation that is complex. It is one of the most important projects to be introduced, I think, in this Parliament. The regulations I have distributed, the comprehensive study list and the list of statutory and regulatory provisions are essential to making Bill C–13 operational. They are annotated to make them easier to understand. They are, as members will see, fairly complex".

I will just continue quoting the Minister:

"These draft regulations will provide the basis for a major consultative process outside the committee and they will provide us with a better understanding of how the bill will work. I should add that the consultations we are embarking upon are above and beyond the normal process of public notification that is included in the gazetting of regulations". One last quote from the minister: "Some committee members have asked to see other regulations that affect Bill C–13. I will not diminish the importance of the other regulations, but I ask you to understand that these regulations in many cases cannot be properly developed and constructed until we have finished our work on clause by clause. I can assure committee members that the development of all regulations will be the subject of consultations. I am sure the openness that has evolved in this committee will be reflected in the development of all regulations."

Mr. Bruchet from the Canadian Petroleum Association, speaking to the committee, added: "It is not necessarily the legislation, but the regulations that have the greatest impact on us.

Mr. Bill Andrews from the West Coast Environmental Law Association said to the committee: "The regulations themselves are important, if not the most important part of the bill.

Professor Morse from the Canadian Bar Association told the committee: "—about the importance of reviewing regulations before the passage of the bill, is that it is very important—There is just too much scope left for regulations."

Ms. Brown from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office stated: "The regulations will define the comprehensive study list and the exclusion list."

The parliamentary secretary, the member for Brandon—Souris, stated in clause-by-clause discussion: "It might be more advisable to discuss the question of the timeframe in the regulations."

Throughout the committee's work on this bill, time and time again, important issues relating to environmental assessment were left to the regulations. There is absolutely no question that the extent to which environmental assessment will be able to protect the environment, to safeguard the right of Canadians to a safe and healthy environment rests squarely on the regulations.

The Canadian people, through their representatives in the House of Commons, deserve to have the ability to review these regulations seriously.

This motion seeks the support of the members of this House to have all regulations laid before the House before the regulations come into effect. We are not asking a lot, but any 20 members, or 15 members of the other place, may call for the regulations to be put before the House as a motion.

A clause similar to this one exists in the gun control legislation, formerly Bill C-17, a regulatory clause that is very supportable.

Adoption of this amendment, therefore, is quite essential to safeguarding our environment. I ask for the support of the members of this House, as well as yourself, Mr. Speaker, on this very important amendment to Bill C-13.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for the key and vital role that he has played in committee in developing motions and in helping the entire process to come along and improving the quality of the final bill.

We in the Liberal Party do support in principle any attempt to open up the regulatory process. It is a very important one.

In this particular case, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake puts forward a rather cumbersome methodology so to speak. Nevertheless, it is an attempt to open up the process and this is why I commend him for having done so.

It seems to me though that a better procedure would have been to put forward an amendment that would have made mandatory the reference of the regulations to the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations. This is a committee of Parliament that has the knowledge and experience needed to examine the regulations and to ensure that the regulations flow from the intent and powers that are contained in the act itself.

That committee has performed a very valuable role in the history of Parliament. It could perform a valuable role again in ensuring that the regulations that will be produced are in line with the intent of the law. It may be that when the revision of this bill takes place some time from now, that a measure of this nature will be recommended by the government.

• (1730)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to very strongly support the amendment proposed by my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

The member for Davenport and the parliamentary secretary have noted the work done by the member for the Battlefords—Meadow Lake. It has been extraordinary and certainly our caucus has been very pleased with the progress he has been able to make with the government.

One of the most serious problems that we have with this legislation can at least in part be remedied by this amendment. The Trojan horse of regulations has been recognized many times in this Chamber by members of all parties where we pass legislation which is relatively understandable by everyone in the country who wants to take the time to read it.

Regrettably, the regulatory structures that are going to come with Bill C-13 are massive. There will be at least 15 sections of regulatory powers, some of them extremely vast. I quoted a moment ago from the Canadian Environmental Law Association and its concerns.

I would like now to take a moment to quote from a letter from the national environmental law section of the Canadian Bar Association that it sent to the FEARO office three weeks ago regarding its concerns with the regulatory structures as they are now being developed and why the approach proposed by my colleague for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake would allow members of this House back into that process.

The process is vitally important in terms of projects in our constituencies and a project or events which are environmental but give us concern in the country as a whole.

It points out that environmental assessment under Bill C–13 will be triggered in various ways, but for the present purposes in terms of this section of the correspondence, it points as follows to clause 5(1):

> 5.(1) An environmental assessment of a project is required before a federal authority

And under subclause (d):

> (d) under a provision prescribed pursuant to paragraph 59(f), issues a permit or licence, grants an approval or takes any other action for the purpose of enabling the project to be carried out in whole or in part.

The point that I want to make here is that these two provisions when read together give the Governor in Council considerable discretion. It goes on to say:

> However, certain observations may be made as to the intent of Parliament to structure that discretion.

One of the things that my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is doing here is he is attempting to bring us back into the process.

It was the government side not so many weeks ago in the firearms legislation that allowed parliamentarians back into the process to scrutinize regulations and to bring a new way of bringing those regulations back before the House if we felt necessary in substantial numbers. It would require 20 members of the House to trigger it. That is something we would all agree is quite reasonable.

It means about one member in 15 in the House has to feel so strongly about the proposed regulatory authority as to have it brought back before the House.

Let me give you some examples of why this is so important. These are things that very few members of this House are aware of. I am quite confident that almost no one in the country is aware of the Trojan horse nature of the regulations that are coming now with Bill C–13. This involves the whole reason that we have to have public disclosure and parliamentary scrutiny.

I quote again: "The national environmental law section appreciates the relative openness of the regulatory process employed to date under Bill C–13. Nonetheless, we are concerned about the process by which the statutory and regulatory provisions regulation is being developed.

Specifically, it is extremely difficult for even persons well versed in federal law and environmental assessment to make an intelligent evaluation of the discussion draft for this regulation.

We can comment on the legislative provisions which are referred to but can only guess at what has been left out. The only truly appropriate way to approach the development of this regulation would be to begin with a consolidated list of all federal powers, duties or functions which may be relevant and then proceed by a process of elimination. At a minimum the process of public consultations can only be effective and legitimate if the inclusions and exclusions from the list suggested by various federal authorities are made public".

It seems to me what my colleague is proposing here then brings us back in, which is absolutely mandatory. Let is look at what it is now proposing to dump out the side door.

Provisions under the Migratory Birds Convention Act are now proposed to be set aside. At the moment, a permit is required for any person who would disturb, destroy or take a nest, egg, nest shelter, eider duck shelter or duck box of a migratory bird pursuant to section 6 of the migratory birds regulations.

A large window of opportunity for projects to be assessed in the whole of the country was under that. Now we find under the regulatory authority the government wants to dispose of that. It similarly makes the point in relation to the Sparrow case how important constitutionally it is that that provision be in there for First Nations, but that has also been dumped out.

Subsection 9(1) of the atomic energy control regulations are proposed to be deleted. There is another trigger. Migratory birds, trigger, pull, boom. Under the atomic energy control regulations, one of the most important subsections is pulled. The National Energy Board Act, some subsections are proposed to be deleted. In relation to water and fish, one of the most important ones in relation to the Oldman dam, Kemano II, Rafferty–Alameda, the Great Whale project, the Fisheries Act, sections 35, 36 and 37.

Again, this is the Canadian Bar Association: "It is our strongly held view that the power under subsection 35(2) of the Fisheries Act referred to at page 68 of the Statutory and Regulatory Provisions Regulations Work Book should be included in this regulation. The discussions of sections 35 and 37 of the Fisheries Act which appears at page 43 of the majority reasons of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Oldman River case is specific to the inclusive and not exhaustive definition of proposal in the EARP order".

I just have a couple of more examples that are critically important. It goes on to say: "However, leaving section 37 to one side for a moment, if section 36 of the Fisheries Act is omitted altogether from the statutory and regulatory provisions regulation, the effect may be to unduly restrict the application of impact assessment to the protection of fisheries. Specifically, we would be left with the rather unprincipled position that authorization, pursuant to section 35(2) of works or undertakings that alter, disrupt or destroy fish habitat, is subject to impact assessment while works or undertakings that result in the deposit of deleterious substances in water frequented by fish, or in any place where such substance may enter such waters, would not attract impact assessment. The federal government would thus be left with the rather blunt regulatory tool of prosecution".

Surely, that is not what we are after. It is that kind of regulatory nonsense that should be allowed for the scrutiny of this House, as my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has asked.

There are more examples that are critically important to the public understanding of why this particular amendment should be carried by all members of the House.

On the comprehensive study list as it is now proposed, whole categories of projects have simply been dumped out the side. That is quite inappropriate and it is members, such as members of this House, who would want to be involved.

For example, with modifications of national park boundaries, it is suggested that if it is more than 10 per cent of a national park that is going to be taken away, then there is an environmental assessment. But if it is less than 10 per cent, then that is fine. As the Canadian Bar points out, a 10 per cent limit may encourage project segmentation and the piecemeal erosion of national park areas or park areas.

On water management, similarly it is suggested that there has to be a 40 per cent target level. If only 40 per cent of a river is going to be taken away for a dam or a diversion, then there is no environmental assessment. So, as long as it is less than 40 there is no environmental assessment. Is it going to be measured at the headwaters, is it going to be measured at the estuary, is it going to be measured at high water, low water? These are Mack truck regulatory loopholes that are being brought in through the back door. It is why corporations in the country are quiet about this legislation; this is why the private sector are saying "well, we've been told—". For example, another Mack truck loophole is the criterion of 100 cubic metres per second of annual flow. Unless you are taking more than that, you do not need an environmental assessment.

• (1740)

Two more very quick examples, Mr. Speaker. I know that you, as an Albertan and Alberta born, will want to hear about these. These are critical in the west.

There is a limitation of 10,000 tonnes a day on minerals and mineral processing. Unless you are higher than that there is no environmental assessment required.

I mean, what kind of regulatory jiggery-pokery is that? You know about acid generating minerals, Mr. Speaker. What about the high arsenic levels in gold mines? What about uranium mines, what if they mine 9,999 tonnes a day? No assessments.

Similarly, this morning I raised a matter concerning the nuclear industry. Unless a nuclear site is going to produce more than 30 thermal megawatts, no environmental assessment is necessary. So, if a Slowpoke is going into the Edmonton General Hospital, there would be no environmental assessment. I think the patients would want to know that there had at least been an initial screening and an assessment of something like that.

So the regulatory mouse holes now appear to me to be somewhat larger, more like rat holes. What we are suggesting through my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is that we let a few mongooses loose in the regulatory process to chase the mice and the rats out of those holes, and that the House have a bit of an eyeball, and a hairy one from time to time, on what these guys are up to.

Let us look at rail transportation. Unless you are building a rail line more than a hundred kilometres in length, or tearing one up of more than a hundred kilometres in length, you do not need an assessment.

What kind of a bill of goods are we being sold here? Who is plucking these figures out of a hat? A hundred cubic feet per second; a hundred kilometres long.

I know what has gone on. The cabinet has said, very hush-hush to the draftees: "Look, we are going to make this look tough and bold, this Bill C-13, but behind the scenes, under the skirt so to speak—no ill intent intended, Mr. Speaker—there is something going on". Under the kilt, my friend says. These are literary terms, Mr. Speaker. Robes was what I meant all along. You never know what could be going on.

Just a couple of final examples in terms of other kinds of projects that have been omitted. The comprehensive study list. How could we have gone through this whole process, identifying what kinds of projects, how they would be assessed, how we appoint people, mediation, interveners, scientists. We do all of this. Here I found the secret. I wondered all along. This is the final regulatory quote that you will need, this will fix you right up, this will let you know how to vote, this is the one.

In relation to the regulations, they point out "exclusions mandatory assessment". They expect to do about 10,000 screens per year, about 100 or more will get detailed study, then I slide down through the Latin a priori and all that kind of stuff and it says, and I quote from the minister's own secret little handbook here: "A few projects annually might warrant a public review".

I rest my case, Mr. Speaker. They are trying to exclude everything through regulation instead of saying right up front exactly what kind of law we needs. My friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake saw the rat holes, he saw the mouse holes, he invented a mongoose and he wants to let it loose. Let us let him do it.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to applaud my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in drafting this motion because it is crucial that anyone who has had any opportunity to look at environmental legislation knows that the regulations are the teeth of the legislation.

This is not an unprecedented approach to dealing with those kinds of loopholes, or rat holes or mouse holes, as was previously discussed by the member for Skeena. It is a responsible approach by my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake because what he has done in his approach is not the reinvention of the wheel. He is adopting the same approach that has been used with Bill C-17, the gun control legislation, that the regulations come back to the House.

I know from having listened to Canadians from coast to coast to coast over the past year on constitutional affairs that people do want to be consulted. They want their members of Parliament to have an active role in the drafting of regulations and legislation so that the backroom approach to doing things is no longer acceptable.

We need a transparent process whereby people feel that they are being listened to and that their concerns are being addressed.

This is a way of not only achieving better environmental legislation and better reaction to environmental concerns, it is also a way of improving the status of members of Parliament who are actually going to be doing something. We are not going to be sitting behind closed doors like bureaucrats, we are going to be debating very important regulations.

I commend the examples my colleague from Skeena has put forward. This is not empty rhetoric. We are not trying to be obstructionist. We are not trying to make life more difficult for the government here, not in this instance. There will be other instances where we will try to make it more difficult for the government, but not in this instance. We are doing it in the most sincere way with the intent of trying to make sure that although Bill C-13, 54 pages of bill, is complex legislation, it is not everything. Behind those 54 pages are the regulations that have to go to make certain that the intent of the bill is adhered to.

That is why it is more than important, it is crucial to our support for this bill that this amendment be supported.

This is a way of not only ensuring better environmental legislation, it is also a way of ensuring that members of Parliament are included in the process and therefore Canadians are included in the process. That is what I have heard from people. They want in, Mr. Speaker. They want to be listened to. They want the Canadian environment, the international environment, to be assured. They do not want any more backroom deals. They do not want any more little smirks and chuckles. They want to make sure that the Canadian and international environment is looked at realistically, not in an obstructionist way, but the best environment possible for the world. They want the regulations to support that.

That is what we are asking. We want the members of the House to review the regulations. It is a simple request. I ask for your support.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise very briefly to support what the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has just said and what the hon. member for Skeena said, and the motion of my friend and colleague, the member from Saskatchewan.

I was on the committee that studied Bill C-80 which was the first gun control bill and then Bill C-17 which became the real gun control bill and which has become law.

I want to talk about how we came to get this particular section. Before I do I want to say how important, to reiterate again what the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands said, the regulations are. They are the teeth of the bill.

When you get these bills you really get a law. The drafters cannot put everything in the law so they put the general principles in the law and then they allow the government, the bureaucrats really, the ministry, to enact by regulation the parts of the law. You really get most of the legislation by regulation.

That is the problem we were faced with in the gun control bill. As I said we got a bill to control guns. We pre-studied the bill. Really it was Bill C-80 that went for pre-study. We held hearings. Then the bill was revised and became Bill C-17.

We studied that bill and we gradually began to work through amendments, very much like this bill. We began to reach a broader consensus. We still had a problem. It was safe to say that a large majority of people in the country wanted, as the polls showed, stronger gun control.

There was a minority in the country, mainly gun owners, who were afraid that gun control would go too far and would penalize them. There were a lot of crazy people and wild groups that had their views. They did not want any sort of gun control. But there were legitimate users of guns. I changed my view on this. I see some of my colleagues who helped persuade me that there were legitimate users of guns for hunting, fishing and for their farms. They had to have regulations which were reasonable regulations.

Originally, these people had a lot of false information about the bill. Once they got more information—and I am speaking of the gun control bill, I am drawing a parallel here— they were a little more open to the bill. They still had some concerns. They were concerned about the regulations. For example, how many clips could they put in their gun and so on. That was going to be done by regulations.

We also set up an advisory council so that people who were opposed to guns, those who wanted gun control, those who had concerns, guns clubs, wildlife people and so on, were mixed together in this group and we made sure there was a balance. They would advise the minister and the department. Then the department would bring down regulations. As a further protection, we wanted to have, as the member for Skeena said, public disclosure and parliamentary scrutiny. We wanted those regulations out in the open. We wanted people to see them before they came into effect. We did not want a process that would just delay the bill. You delay the regulation so that you never have any legislation at all. We had to walk on our tip-toes on this.

What the government came up with was a section exactly like this. It said a regulation passed under the bill, in that case the gun control bill, in this case the environment bill, must be laid before Parliament 20 days before the regulation would come into effect. It is not hard on the bureaucracy to do that. That could be done. Fifteen sitting days after the regulation is laid before either the House or the Senate, 20 members can get up and ask that it be debated. Normally, most of the regulations would go right through but if a bad or a weak regulation was presented, then 20 members could get together and have a debate in the House or in a committee of the House. Within five sitting days after the filing of the motion without debate or amendment the House would have to put the question.

The regulation could not be delayed forever. You could not use it as a measure of delay. We are hopefully going to use it as a measure of public scrutiny.

My question to the parliamentary secretary is, if it was good enough for the gun control bill, is it good enough for the environment bill? I am waiting for the answer.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, regulations have always been a controversial issue. The most benign of bills can quickly become obnoxious and offensive by the establishment of regulations which do not please the population. I am sure that every member of this House has supported a bill as it passed through the House only to find that the regulations had made the bill impossible to support or, if they had known what the regulations were going to be when the bill went through the House, would never have supported the bill in the first place.

The process being suggested by the member for the Battlefords—Meadow Lake was unique until the bill on gun control came before this House. It is no longer a unique process, but it is still unique as far as the people of Canada are concerned. It is the first time that there has been the possibility of them being given input into regulations as they were being drafted or immediately after being drafted.

In the past, the regulations have often been laid before the parliamentary committee for scrutiny and a certain amount of debate. In some cases, I suppose, there was a certain amount of change, but there has not been in the past any machinery which has allowed the House of Commons to take a look at those regulations and make sure that they are acceptable by the—

An hon. member: And sometimes the regulations would not be legal.

Mr. Hovdebo: That is right. As my colleague has suggested, sometimes regulations have been found to be illegal. Those kinds of things can be brought before the House, debated and then voted on by this House.

This makes this House rather than the bureaucracy responsible for the regulations. I think the gun control legislation is probably a good example of the kind of information that needs to be fed into a committee or into the bureaucracy to establish the kind of regulations which are acceptable to the population of the country.

Should this be passed or put into this act, it would mean that no one can put into regulations the kind of policy which negates the act that was passed in the first place. That is the case if it is taken up by the courts which have often found that the regulations are illegal. No one knows at the moment what is going to be in the regulations, although we are often told when the bill goes through committee what is intended to be in the regulations, but we are often told things which either do not turn up at all, are changed considerably before they come before the committee or are put into effect as far as Canada is concerned.

Should members of Parliament in this House not be responsible for the effects of their actions? We pass legislation daily, or quite often. That legislation then becomes law and the bureaucrats or somebody establish a series of regulations. Maybe the method that is suggested here is a little cumbersome, but it is the best we have. We hope it is going to work well in the gun control legislation. Consequently, if it is accepted by this Parliament now, we hope it will work well in this particular act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Can I put the question on Motion No. 31?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will call it six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise and raise again the issues which I brought up in this House on November 19, 1991, and that had to do with the outbreak of tuberculosis in the communities along Lake Athabaska and Wallis-ton Lake in Saskatchewan, particularly the community of Black Lake.

At that time, in November, there was a massive public outcry including programs on national television and in the national media drawing the attention of the nation to what was happening in Black Lake and the totally unacceptable rates of tuberculosis that existed there. In late January I had the opportunity to tour those communities personally and see for myself again what was happening with respect to health.

• (1800)

I saw that the control program was working. It was quite obvious that the Health and Welfare officials assigned to the task were doing more that yeoman service. They were being very creative in working with the resources they had.

As well, the people in those communities who were contracted by Health and Welfare to help with the control program have also done an excellent job in making sure that people take their medicine, go to the doctor and make sure that health education is taking place around this disease.

Just this last Friday I had the opportunity to hear the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs address the constitutional convention banquet. As a member of Parliament, I was proud to associate myself with the remarks of the minister at that banquet.

At that banquet he said: "Look what the policies of governments past have brought this country and its aboriginal peoples". He said and I quote: "Infant mortality that is double the national average, suicide that is twice as common and a rate of tuberculosis that is 10 times higher". We have recognition here by the minister and the Government of Canada before the aboriginal people that this rate of tuberculosis is unacceptable, especially in the context of the nation-building we are trying to engage in at the present time.

I would like to point out that the problem is not with the control program or the professionals. Besides TB in those communities there is hepatitis A and dysentery, all problems that indicate very clearly that we have a public health program that goes far beyond tuberculosis.

The basics are clear. There has to be clean water, workable sewer systems to keep those communities sanitary. There has to be a housing program that contributes to adequate housing. The minister challenged my statements at that time on housing. It is true that there are up to 15 people living in a 900 square foot house in those communities on Lake Athabaska. That is not a healthy situation.

I am calling on the government to take action, to build a road into the Athabaska so that those houses and sewer and water materials and healthy food can get in there and that the government put its money where its mouth is in this regard.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, we are very much aware of the housing conditions that exist on Indian reserves across the country. In recent years, the Department of Indian Affairs has provided over $120 million annually in capital subsidies to assist with house construction and renovations in First Nations' communities. Last year, for example, the department provided $130 million toward the construction of over 3,500 new houses and the renovation of 4,600 existing units; indeed, the average rate of construction and renovation over the past eight years has been in the area of 3,200 new houses and 4,000 renovations per year.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has also provided additional operating subsidies to bands that have borrowed from approved lenders to build their houses. Because reserve lands cannot be mortgaged, Indian Affairs provided guarantees for housing loans. Since 1984, the First Nations have made much greater use of CMHC funding, and Indian Affairs now approves between $75 million and $100 million in loan guarantees annually.

The over-all result of these efforts, in partnership with the First Nations, has been to reduce the average number of persons per house, nationally, from 5.9 to 4.8.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is up. I would have many more good things to say, but it will have to wait till next time.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you that we have a problem in Canada. It is a massive problem and it is called unemployment.

Last month unemployment reached some 10.6 per cent, the highest it has been in this country for almost six years. That is up from 10.4 per cent in January. In Toronto it is up to 10.8 per cent, up from 8.3 per cent a year ago and less than two years ago it was only 4.6 per cent in Toronto.

Sure, 10.6 per cent is still less than the 12.8 per cent that we hit during the 1982 recession, but that is really cold comfort to those who are unemployed.

What are we going to do about it? It will be recalled in my letter to the Prime Minister in January I suggested five initiatives.

In early February, the government acted on one of those, the 5 per cent down payment. I was pleased to see that some 6,000 people or more have taken advantage of that in less than one month.

In the budget on February 25 the government acted on two more of my suggestions, one the RRSP proposal, the other one cutting personal income taxes, very modestly I will admit.

The question of course is: Is that going to be enough to do the job to get the economy moving again? There are other things we can do.

One of those things is the lowering of the value of the Canadian dollar. That could make an enormous difference as far as unemployment is concerned and job creation.

A 1 per cent increase in the value of the Canadian dollar results in a $14 million sales decrease for Inco, the International Nickel Company of Canada, and it puts the jobs of some 10,000 employees of Inco in jeopardy. That is the same problem that all Canadian exporters have. They have problems with productivity, problems with labour costs but those cannot be solved in the short run.

The problem of the value of the Canadian dollar can be solved in the short run by reducing the spread between the interest rates in Canada and the U.S.A. That way we can help our manufacturers, our exporters and increase jobs.

It will be recalled that the Minister of Finance said that neither the Bank of Canada nor the government sets the value of the Canadian dollar. Back in November the Governor of the Bank of Canada said that it takes direction from the Department of Finance on exchange rates. Who are Canadians to believe? The Minister of Finance or the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Fortunately, the value of the Canadian dollar has fallen somewhat. But tonight I want to ask the minister again to lean on the Governor of the Bank of Canada, give the direction that the Governor of the Bank of Canada says will be taken from the Department of Finance, lower the value of the Canadian dollar, create some jobs in Canada and get our economy moving again.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the exchange rate is determined by market forces, not by the government. Interest rate spreads are an important determinant of the exchange rate, but several other factors impact on the market evaluation of the Canadian dollar. These factors include foreign borrowings by Canadian entities, our relative inflation performance, international uncertainty, and investor confidence in the policies of the government. This is illustrated by the continued appreciation of the Canadian dollar through the second half of 1990 and the first 10 months of 1991, which took place despite substantial declines in domestic short-term interest rates and in the differential with U.S. rates. Since its peak in November, however, the dollar has lost more than 5 cents, or 5.5 per cent, vis-à vis the U.S. dollar.

While the government does not have a target for the exchange rate—indeed, it cannot have one if we are to have an independent monetary policy—the value of our curency is clearly important and is monitored closely. Large swings in the exchange rate on a daily basis are not desirable because they create uncertainty and hamper our economic and trade performance. As a result, the government has instructed the Bank of Canada to intervene in foreign exchange markets in order to avoid large and abrupt swings in the value of the currency. Official exchange market intervention is designed to provide this very short-term stabilizing influence in exchange markets. It operates both when the dollar is subject to upward pressure as downward pressure.

Mr. Speaker, I would still have plenty to say, but I understand that my time has expired.

UKRAINE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on February 7 I asked a question of the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the liabilities and assets of the former U.S.S.R. It is a very important question for those former nations that are now the independent states.

The answer was that this question was being discussed on an ongoing basis within the aegis of the G-7 countries.

• (1810)

On August 24, 1991, Ukraine declared its independence. On December 1, 1991, the people of Ukraine voted to ratify that declaration.

Canada acted very quickly in recognizing Ukraine as an independent state. However, since that time the government has been dragging its feet. As yet we have no ambassador, our mission is temporary, and Ukrainians wishing to visit Canada are still facing bureaucratic road-blocks.

This lack of will is even more obvious when compared to the United States and Germany. They have established full diplomatic relations with Ukraine.

The Department of External Affairs is still advising Canadians wishing to travel to Ukraine to obtain visas from the office of the former U.S.S.R. when it is well known that Ukraine has indicated that it will issue visas at the port of entry.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to address as well the issue of Canada's position on the liabilities and assets of the former U.S.S.R.

The Prime Minister of Ukraine, Mr. Fokin, had invited the creditor nations of the former U.S.S.R., the International Monetary Fund, and the World Bank to a conference which was held in Kiev on February 18 to discuss the problem of the partition of the liabilities and assets of the former U.S.S.R.

Canada did not have a delegate there. The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank decided to boycott this conference.

Is this decision made in support of Mr. Bush's new world order, or is Canada no longer master of her own decisions due to the fact that 30 per cent of her national debt is owed to the international financiers?

As you know the liabilities of the former U.S.S.R. are $68 billion. Ukraine has accepted its share of 16.8 per cent and demands as well its pro rata share of assets that the former U.S.S.R. is holding abroad, including Canada.

It is my understanding that when Mr. Yeltsin was in Canada and met with our Prime Minister, the Prime Minister gave him a letter stating that Canada considers the assets of the former U.S.S.R. in Canada as belonging to Russia.

On what basis has he come to this conclusion? On what legal grounds did he do so, or was it an arbitrary decision of the Prime Minister?

Would the parliamentary secretary table this letter in the House, or would he prefer to deny the existence of this letter?

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by noting the strong support that the Government of Canada has given to Ukraine since its emergence as an independent state. Canada led in granting diplomatic recognition, we have upgraded our representation in Kiev to an embassy, and we have been in the forefront among Western countries in providing programs of assistance to Ukraine as it converts to a market economy.

This transformation, which requires difficult but necessary adjustments in economic and institutional structures, is a critical ingredient in the adoption of democratic values. A key element will be the formulation of comprehensive economic reform programs in cooperation with the International Monetary Fund.

Ukrainian membership in the IMF and the World Bank, which Canada has been working to achieve as quickly as possible, will enhance its ability to implement such reforms as effectively as possible and with as little disruption as possible.

The conference to which the member referred did not take place. However, Ukraine has met with other republics as well as with representatives of western governments on a number of occasions to discuss the issue of the treatment of the external debts of the former Soviet Union. This is a matter of some importance to Canada as one of the major creditors of the U.S.S.R. The loans extended in good faith to the U.S.S.R. will continue to be serviced despite the changes in political structures. This is important not just for the creditors involved but for the former republics as well, since they have an interest in maintaining their creditworthiness in order to ensure continued access to financing from private as well as public sources in the west. After extensive consultations and discussions with representatives of the seven major industrial countries last autumn, most of the republics of the former U.S.S.R. did agree to acknowledge formally in a memorandum of understanding their responsibility for the debts which the Soviet Union had incurred. They also agreed to designate an agent to work with western creditors to service those debts. Ukraine has recently agreed to sign the memorandum and we welcome this as an important step to promote Ukraine's full participation in international commercial and financial markets.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on November 29, I rose in this House and actually addressed two questions to two separate ministers.

The first one dealt with information or data the Secretary of State through the student loans programs still uses which I believe disenfranchises the number of students who have wanted to take up post-secondary education. I think this is a serious matter.

In response the minister promised that there would be a thorough review of the student loan system and felt that it was necessary in that the program had been started 27 years ago and had not been changed since then. He also added he was close to tabling the completely revised version of the student loan system that would meet the primary objective of the program, which was to help students in need to finish their education and become full-fledged Canadian citizens.

What has happened since then, almost four months ago? The government decided to privatize student loans. The 3 per cent fee or tax on student loans is perhaps going to be cancelled. Unfortunately the students have been subjected to six months more of interest payments.

The second question dealt with a report that is entitled Tradition in Education Toward a Vision of our Future which includes a declaration of First Nations jurisdiction over education.

I wanted to know whether the minister had seen this report and what he thought of it. He had indicated that he was not familiar with it, but that when he and his officials had had an opportunity to complete an analysis he would be happy to review it and bring it forward at the appropriate time.

That was almost four months ago, and I ask: Where is the report? I should point out that this is not the first time that there has been a problem with this minister. For example, on February 13, certain chiefs of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs met with the minister to look at the question of social services for status Indian people off reserve. These people are suffering because of squabbling between the federal and provincial government. They indicated:

> We rightly expected to be received with due respect and a responsible and caring attitude from the Minister.

What happened? They referred to the minister and said:

> Instead, we were appalled and offended to receive from you an unwarranted, unsubstantiated and hysterical outburst of allegations and insinuations.

These particular chiefs went on and asked:

> I and my fellow Chiefs have been profoundly offended by the irresponsible generalized allegations and unprofessional conduct to which we were subjected by you. We feel that, at the very least, your personal apology is called for, along with an early opportunity to productively address with you the serious policy issues we have raised.

My point in bringing this latter matter up is to point out that the first item I have mentioned is not an isolated issue.

I would appreciate responses to the question of student aid and to those other matters I have raised with respect to the aboriginal peoples.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague talks about the system of student loans and we know that it guarantees loans through chartered banks or other designated lenders for all eligible students in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, $630 million in loans a year are guaranteed for nearly 215,000 students. Since the program began, $7 billion of loans have been made to almost two million Canadian students. This program has thus proven itself. The latest budget announced changes to reflect the economic and social realities of 1992. I think that the hon. member is drawing a hasty conclusion in saying that absolutely nothing is happening, when student loans are being reviewed as part of the normal review of the different programs in the various departments.

As for my colleague's second point, I must tell him that the Department of Indian Affairs has regular contacts with the Assembly of First Nations to try to improve and clarify the points being discussed at that level. I think that if the hon. member is patient, as I know him to be, he will have positive results quite soon.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today concerning a question I asked of the Minister of Finance on November 21, 1991, on one of my least favourite subjects but one that I unfortunately had to raise many times in the House. It deals with credit card interest rates that the major financial institutions have been getting away with over the last number of months.

This is not a new issue. There are over 30 million bank cards in circulation across this country. According to the banks' own admissions, out of the 30 million cards roughly 50 per cent of those cards carry a monthly balance of $1,000 or a little more per month. It does not take a mathematical wizard to sit down and figure out that what you are dealing with is not just a few thousand dollars. Fifteen million cards times $1,000 balance per month adds up in the course of things to billions of dollars over the run of the fiscal year.

The problem we have is that as the prime rate or the T-bill rate plunged through the fall months of last year, we did not see a corresponding adjustment in the credit card interest rate market. Indeed, what we saw was that the big banks that offer Visa and MasterCard were charging the same rate of interest when the prime rate dropped as when the prime rate was four points higher.

We have constantly gone after the minister and the government to take some action. It has been the subject of much debate and much public scrutiny through the Consumer and Corporate Affairs committee. But the committee cannot take action. The committee can simply sit down and listen to interested groups of consumers and grill the banks as to why it is they think that interest rates, the spread of which was 12 points higher than the T-bill rate back in November, were not usurious rates of interest.

I want to put it in perspective. For every 1 per cent that the big banks charge in excessive interest on credit card balances, in the course of the year it amounts to nearly $150 million in additional interest charged to consumers. If this isn't gouging, I don't know what is.

We have called on the government time and time again to have the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs call the banks, and in the absence of his persuasive abilities, to get them to drop these usurious rates of interest and to come in with legislated caps.

I want to make it very clear that I have never been a fan of legislated caps, but I am a fan of fairness in the marketplace, and fairness in the marketplace does not mean that the big banks can get away with a 10, 11 or 12 point spread over what they borrow their money at and what they lend it out to consumers at through the credit card interests rates that they charge.

I want to put this thing fully in perspective. We are in the middle of the worst recession we have had since the dirty thirties, and everybody knows that, everybody knows it. We have seen bankruptcies unlike anything we have ever seen before in our lives. The bankruptcy stats that came out for the month of January showed that bankruptcies are galloping out of control. There are over a million and a half Canadians out of work. Businesses are going belly-up a dime a dozen in this country. So there are not a lot of corporate profits around. Stats Canada reported for the fourth quarter of 1991. Listen to this. I do not know if the government was counting on getting a lot of tax revenue from profits. Do you know what the total non-financial corporate profits were in the last quarter of this year? They were a negative $2,007,000,000. That tells you that businesses in Canada are not making any money. They are going out of business.

At the same point in time as business in this country—and mostly small businesses, the generators of employment in this country—was not making any money, the big banks were making huge profits. The Royal Bank alone last year, in the middle of the worst recession we have ever had, recorded profits of $987 million. That is almost a billion dollars.

We have called on this government to take some action, either through the Bureau of Competitions policy, through whatever means possible, and if everything else fails to come in and force the banks to have a smaller and a lower rate of spread on interest between the prime rate and that which they charge to consumers.

We are now months later, Mr. Speaker, and we still have not heard any solutions. I look for some answers today from the parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say I found it frustrating, when the hon. member said that in 1991 or 1992, the bankruptcy rate was higher than it ever had been. In fact, there were more bankruptcies in 1981–82, when the hon. member's party was in power.

That being said, I understand the hon. member's position on credit card interest rates. I can't say I particularly approve of those interest rate levels. However, I am a firm believer in market forces, and I would not want to underestimate the intelligence of my fellow Canadians. If the interest they have to pay on credit cards is too high, compared with the interest on a loan from a financial institution, I think people will have the good sense to go and borrow from a financial institution, to pay back what they owe on a credit card on which the interest is twice what they would be charged anywhere else. I think we have to let market forces prevail in this country. The hon. member said as much. He said he was not in favour of fixed rates nor of urging or obliging companies to have a fixed rate. I agree. Let the market decide, and let Canadians realize that if the interest they pay on credit cards is too high, they can refinance their debts at a better rate. I would urge all Canadians, especially the people in the riding of Trois-Rivières, to look at the options and choose the option that suits them best.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

NOWRUZ DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-338, an act respecting the Iranian New Year's Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, over 150,000 Canadians of Iranian descent contribute to the special mosaic that gives Canada its unique character.

Their roots are founded in the ancient Persian culture.

Nowruz or New Year's Day according to the Persian calendar, falls on the first day of spring. It celebrates the arrival of spring and the renewal of life.

With the help of Dr. Sy Kazemi, a constituent of mine and a leading figure in the Iranian community of Canada, I have prepared this bill so that Nowruz, the Iranian New Year's Day, will be recognized officially on March 21 every year.

Sy has just called again and asked that I close with Happy New Year or Nowruz to all Iranian Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Attewell moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC SECTOR BONUSES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-339, an act to eliminate the payment of bonuses in the public sector of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very simple one. Its intent is to ensure that those individuals who normally receive very huge bonuses are in fact treated much more in line with others who earn a living in Canada.

What we want to attempt to do is to make certain that there are no large payments that are paid out, some in excess of single family earnings in this country. I feel and some of my colleagues do that this would be a very important measure to show Canadians that we are willing to look at those other Canadians who enjoy substantially more than others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have over 300 petitions here with several thousand names on them.

This is to add to the 270,000 signatures that I have already presented to the House of citizens who feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system in Canada. There are many thousands of other signatures that have been presented by other members of this House of Commons.

I would like to add these to those. These petitioners feel that the crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask the government to further amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present today on behalf of my constituents a petition with regard to national unity.

It reads in part as follows. Canada is distinguished as one of the finest countries in the world with respect to its quality of life, its respect for human rights and responding to the economic, social and cultural needs of its citizens. They point out that the government has received advice from several quarters with respect to constitutional change. They would want the government to act quickly.

They ask the leaders of each political party represented here in the House to work together to bring about a satisfactory solution to our constitutional difficulties.

Like most Canadians, these people want a Constitution that meets the needs of our people, be they native, French-speaking, English-speaking or of any other origin.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of people from southern Nova Scotia, particularly Lunenburg county.

I notice that many of these people are associated with a very effective second story women's centre in Bridgewater.

These people petition noting that the goods and services tax is applied to feminine sanitary products and whereas these products are necessary for women during most of their lives and whereas the government has decided that the goods and services tax should not be applied to certain necessities such as food and medical services, they the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 225.

[Text]

Question No. 225—Mr. Taylor:

> With respect to Revenue Canada Income Tax Regulation No. 7303 relating to Northern residents' deductions (a) did Schedule IX originally state that residents had to live more than 160 km from a town of 10,000 in Saskatchewan (b) did Schedule IX appear in a subsequent printing without reference to the province (c) are there 2 versions of this regulation and, if so (i) why was it changed (ii) when did this change take place (iii) how was the change publicized?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): (a) Regulation 7303 was added to the income tax regulations in June 1988. Item 4. of division I in schedule IX to regulation 7303(2) lists 9 locations in Saskatchewan that, for the 1987 to 1992 taxation years, are deemed to be prescribed areas for the purpose of claiming the northern residents deductions under the Income Tax Act. Schedule IX has never placed any tests upon the eligibility of areas listed therein e.g., that residents had to live more than 160 kilometres from a town of 10,000 in Saskatchewan as suggested in the question.

Regulation 7303(1) provides tests for other areas to qualify as a prescribed area provided that each area earns at least 50 points under the tests. Included in the tests is a 160 kilometre distance requirement from urban centres that might apply to residents of Saskatchewan. This requirement has not been changed since regulation 7303(1) became law.

(b) Schedule IX has not been amended, but will expire after the 1992 taxation year.

(c) There has only been one version of regulation 7303 promulgated.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, March 16, consideration of Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee C; and Motion No. 31 of Mr. Taylor (p. 8309).

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak briefly to this motion and in doing so to follow up some concerns that I have had for a long time going back to my days as the NDP environment critic in this House from 1984 to 1987, and I might add in continuity with a concern I have had since the time that I served on the McGrath committee on parliamentary reform.

That has to do with the whole matter of regulations and the relationship between regulations and legislation.

As I understand this motion that my colleague has moved, it would require that there be a process by which these regulations can be brought back before the House and debated if necessary.

When we consider all the things in modern day legislation that are left to regulation, a Parliament that does not have the ability to scrutinize regulation is a Parliament that is working with one hand behind its back at the very best. So many things which actually give reality or do not give reality to the intention of legislation work themselves out in the form of regulations.

That is why the NDP has moved this motion. It was a concern that we had going back to the special committee on reform of the House of Commons where we felt that one of the ways of empowering the House anew would be to give it more power over regulation.

We saw some of this happen pursuant to the debate and the outcome of the process that attended the bill on gun control, which my colleague the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam handled for us. What we are suggesting here is something along the same lines.

The government accepted it then when its own backbenchers felt that they could not vote for a bill unless they were going to get a second crack at the real content of the bill in the form of regulations.

Surely if it is important enough to do when it comes to guns it is important enough to do when it comes to the environment, unless the government plans in its regulations to do by regulation what it would never dare to do politically. That is to exempt by regulation all manner of projects which otherwise would come under some kind of environmental assessment if we were to respect the spirit and the intention of the bill.

• (1020)

We say to the government that scepticism when it comes to the environment is in order. We want to see those regulations and we want Parliament to be able to see those regulations. The government would like that we all pass the legislation and that we all feel good about a new bill. Admittedly it is a better bill than the one that came before this House previously. It is a better bill in large part because of the work done by my colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

But the fact remains that unless we can be guaranteed that the regulations will indeed live up to the legislation and that the regulations are really up to scratch, we might find ourselves regretting this spirit of co-operation somewhere down the line.

As I started to say earlier, I am told by material we have received from the Canadian Bar Association that the regulations would limit environmental assessment to nuclear reactors with a power capacity greater than 30 thermal megawatts. This would effectively remove from comprehensive study the Slowpoke reactors which Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has proposed for such densely populated and sensitive locations as hospitals and universities, for instance.

The fuel in such reactors is sufficient to cause very serious environmental and health damage if there were to be some kind of accident. It goes without saying, at least I thought it would, that such a proposal to build a Slowpoke reactor at the University of Ottawa, not far from these Parliament Buildings, ought to come under some kind of environmental assessment. But we hear that what the government intends is its usual collaboration, uncritical slavish collaboration with the nuclear industry.

As good a piece of environmental legislation as this is, the government will be able to go ahead and exempt Slowpoke reactors from any kind of assessment wherever it chooses. I just think that gives the lie to a lot of the rhetoric which has accompanied the passage of this legislation so far on the government side.

I just use that as one example. There are many others, but I think it should go without saying that the regulations ought to live up to the spirit of the bill. It is clear that we have reason to worry that they will not. Therefore we insist on the passage of this motion which would make sure that Parliament would have some handle on whether or not those regulations did indeed live up to the legislation.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to take a few moments to speak to Motion No. 31, the amendment put forth by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, and to indicate to the House, as I think most members know, that there is a very considerable amount of opportunity for consultation in the process with respect to regulations. Two of the most crucial regulations have already been presented to the committee in draft form, i.e. the law list and the comprehensive study list. It is anticipated that in fact four regulations may be finalized by the time the bill is eventually implemented.

The subsequent regulations will be proposed to the public as is normally the case. This process involves a considerable amount of public consultation and participation by all stakeholders. In fact I can report to you, Mr. Speaker, that meetings have already been held in some 15 cities throughout Canada as part of this multi-stakeholder consultation process. As a result of conversations I have had with some individuals who participated in the city of Regina, if I recall correctly, they as individual participants were very pleased with the process, encouraged by what they heard and pleased by the opportunity to be a part of the process.

I believe that the regulatory multi-stakeholder advisory committee is at work and provides all who are interested and who are concerned with a very real opportunity to be a part of that process.

In addition I would remind the House that any standing committee—and in this case the Standing Committee on the Environment would be the appropriate committee—has the opportunity to determine its own agenda and certainly to make proposed regulations a part of that agenda, if it so wishes.

We have done a very significant amount of consultation already. I am very familiar with the officials who are part of the process. They are well known to members of the House. The officials who work for FEARO and other officials working on behalf of the Department of the Environment are extremely conscientious in their desire to consult widely and to inform widely. I think members of the House would concur with that because the levels of consultation which have taken place during the course of our studies have been exemplary.

I believe there is a good process of consultation under way. I certainly would encourage the standing committee to place any proposed set of regulations on its agenda if it is at all so inclined, and I suspect it will be. I feel the legislation as proposed now does provide for an appropriate amount of consultation. I would encourage the House therefore to support the legislation in its current form.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 31. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Motion No. 32, standing in the name of the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, Motion No. 33, standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport, and Motion No. 34, standing in the name of the Minister of the Environment, will be grouped for debate.

Motions Nos. 32 and 33 will be voted on separately. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 32 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 34, while a negative vote on Motion No. 32 will require a vote on Motion No. 34.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake) moved:

Motion No. 32

That Bill C-13 be amended by adding immediately after line 40 at page 49 the following new clause:

"71.1 A review of the operation of this Act shall be completed

(a) on any day before January 1, 1997 and

(b) on the expiration of every fifth year after that day by the Minister, who may for the purpose of that review consult with representatives of such organizations as the Minister considers appropriate, and the Minister shall cause a report of the results of the review to be laid as soon as possible before each House of Parliament."

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That Bill C-13 be amended by adding immediately after line 40 at page 49 the following new clause:

"71.1(1) The administration of this Act shall, within five years after the enactment of this Act, be reviewed by such committee of the House of Commons, or of both Houses of Parliament, as may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose.

(2) The committee designated or established by Parliament for the purpose of subsection (1) shall undertake a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act and shall, within a year after the review is undertaken or within such further time as the House of Commons may authorize, submit a report to Parliament thereon including a statement of any changes to this Act or its administration that the Committee would recommend."

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of the Environment) moved:

That Bill C-13 be amended by adding immediately after line 40 at page 49 the following new clause:

"72.(1) Five years after the coming into force of this section, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act shall be undertaken by the Minister.

• (1030)

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Top of the morning to you, Sir.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment calls for the minister to ensure that a full review of the act occurs at least every five years starting with the first review on or before January 1, 1997.

The amendment is very similar to the call for a five-year review of the act governing agriculture legislation passed in this House earlier this session, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account program legislation which were brought before this Parliament and passed in the form of Bill C-98.

This bill to establish a federal environmental review process charts new waters. We have all acknowledged that over the last day here in the House. The bill seeks to lay out in law the role which the federal government and its agencies must play in assessing the potential environmental impact of major undertakings.

Given all the new environmental assessment or the lack thereof, given all the news generated in the form of James Bay II, the Oldman dam, Rafferty–Alameda, Kemano, Point Aconi and others, there can be no question that this is the most important single piece of environmental law ever brought before this Parliament.

As I said, the bill charts new waters and many of these waters remain murky. We already know of many of the weaknesses of the bill, weaknesses that the government refused to face during the committee work on the bill. We know that there will be other problems found down the road as we move along in the bill, as the provisions of this bill and its regulations are brought into play, tested and explored.

The future of our environment that we know we borrow from our children rests in part on the ability of the federal government to protect the environment from damage that may be caused by activities, policies and programs. The ability to review this act in depth at least every five years is one step in strengthening that protection for our environment.

This is not a new concept. All three political parties participating in the review of this bill have voiced similar concerns. As we know from the matter in front of us today, all three parties in the House have amendments in this regard.

I raised the need to review this act during committee discussions. The parliamentary secretary who is in the House today stated on one occasion: "I would remind Mr. Taylor, while this bill indeed is breaking new and important ground, legislation can of course be amended at any time".

Karen Brown, vice–president of policy and regulatory affairs of the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, stated before the committee: "The problem that we have right now is that we don't have enough experience to know exactly how we would work it into the bill. Until we get further experience we are really not sure what it is we would regulate and how".

The hon. member for Davenport who spoke quite well during the debate yesterday, representing the Liberal Party for much of the committee hearings, stated: "This was a technically difficult bill and, as Mr. Taylor said, we have learned a lot. We are charting new territory. We will probably discover the weaknesses and strengths of this bill as it is being practised. Probably in a few years there will be a set of amendments that will close the loopholes".

The parliamentary secretary also alluded to the future need to amend this act, and I quote him from the discussion during committee: "I guess my inclination would be to see how it operates", meaning the act. "When we reopen this after a bit of experience, perhaps Mr. Taylor's amendment would be at the right time".

All in this House and all Canadians agree that protecting the environment is central to the work the government should be doing. This bill sets out an environmental assessment process which would take a step toward strengthening the protection of the environment. As all of us who have been actively involved with this legislation know, the bill does not go far enough in protecting the environment. Because it charts new waters there will be undoubtedly important areas which will not be covered by the bill. Some important matters have already been ignored altogether. In other ways which may be unknown to us at this time, this bill will fail to address properly the needs of Canadians for strong environmental assessment and protection.

The simple motion before us today calls for the government to review this bill after five years and for every five years after that, to acknowledge that we should have a look at the very technical aspects of the bill to ensure that we are doing exactly the right thing.

The minister responsible has the authority to do this. It is a very simple task that the department should be doing in any case. The review allows for a more public presence in that review process.

In conclusion and put very simply, I state that there is every reason to support the motion I am putting before the House. There are many good reasons to support this review mechanism. I ask members of this House for their support for my motion.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we have reached now an interesting point in our discussions. We have before us three different approaches to the same problem. One proposal is from my colleague for

The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, one is proposed by the Minister of the Environment and one by the Liberal side.

The question is, how do we put into the legislation the best possible, the most appropriate, the most open process to review the legislation itself?

When we debated the Canadian Environmental Protection Act some years ago in committee, the government of the day, which is the same government as today, did accede to pressures and the interventions of various participants. Included in that, I believe, was the distinguished member for York East who was a member of the committee and made a substantial contribution at that time to include in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act a review process which is the same as we are proposing here for this particular legislation, namely Bill C-13.

We are proposing something that exists in another statute. The idea is to set into motion a review of the legislation after five years. I believe all three sides agree on this. However, there is a difference in the approach in that we propose a review which is open and public. The proposal of the Minister of the Environment, which is the object of Motion No. 34, is very narrow I would say, because the minister would consult those whom the minister of the day considers appropriate. That could be a very narrow, limited consultation process and not a very open one.

If I understand the NDP proposal, it is also not as open as we are proposing. I have taken a careful look at the amendment proposed in Motion No. 32.

Therefore, what I am saying is that of the three options before us, it seems to me that the Liberal option is the one that will allow an established committee of the House of Commons or an established committee of both Houses of Parliament to hold public hearings so as to get the input from the field, from the affected sectors, from the public at large, as to the adequacy and the desirable changes and other aspects of the bill when it has reached the age of five.

• (1040)

In essence, that is what we are saying. There is not much that I can add except to stress the fact that public participation in environmental matters is a principle to which all three parties subscribe. It is my hope that on the government side there will be a favourable attitude to a proposal for a review of the legislation that does put emphasis on the role of the public five years from now when this legislation will inevitably come under scrutiny.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up on what my colleague from Davenport said. I think that his approach is correct when he talks about using a committee of both houses and having more of the public at large involved.

I want to come at it from that sector of our community that is so important to making the success of that and that is the business community. We have a shifting attitude today from the business community in this country toward the environment, whereas three, four or five years ago, there tended to be an attitude where business and the environmental movement tended to operate in isolation.

Increasingly, we see a situation where the business community is taking a more proactive role in all areas of the environment. We in this House do not in any way, shape or form want this review process to move that relationship backward. If we can have a situation which promotes more business participation and involvement in the actual process of this bill, then I think we are going to create a lot more good will.

I keep referring to this organization. I do not believe we are utilizing all the resources of this national round table on the environment as much as we should. They have experts involved. It is a public-private sector organization which advises this Parliament. They have been able to bring together leaders from all aspects of the community and the business community. They keep stressing in their communication all the work that they do, that as we pull the leaders of the business community into this process, it has not only has a national effect, but most of these organizations have international linkages. Those international linkages are so important in getting a common environmental review assessment process going.

I support my colleague from Davenport and his motion. Any time we can have a more open, public at large participation through the committee process, it is only going to serve to refine the bill even more.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support the motion proposed by my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and also the one put forward by the member for Davenport.

It is unfortunate to hear from the government side this morning that it is not prepared to move on the matter of regulatory scrutiny. I would be very surprised if the government did not support in some way the proposal on five-year scrutiny of either the minister, or the member for Davenport, or the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake because if one looks simply at the rate of accelerating interest in and need for environmental assessment, one realizes that this legislation will be in need of a major overhaul in less than five years.

Even the last couple of days of debate have revealed some of the more obvious shortfalls of this legislation that have been incorporated into it for political purposes.

Let me deal with the time line again for a moment because it was only 17 years ago that the first cabinet directive was made in relation to environmental assessment, back in 1974, and it was only eight years ago that the now famous 1984 cabinet guidelines order was passed by cabinet. Many members of the House and many Canadians now understand that the wording was poorly drafted because it was not legislation, it had all kinds of open-ended sections to it and it has only been through a very extensive, costly, and time-consuming court process that it has come to have the kind of administrative legal impact that it has now.

We know now how long this legislation has been in the drafting form. It is some four years. Bill C-13 is very different legislation from what it was when it was called Bill C-78 and when in fact it first came out of the drafting process.

I want to compliment the minister. It is unfortunate that he could not be here for the debate, but I think we all understand why. It was the government itself which chose this particular period of time to have this debate. The minister's own travel schedule precluded his presence, but I want to compliment on the kind of process that he agreed to in terms of the legislative committee. I had hoped that it would carry on during this process and we would have seen more changes here.

It is, I think, worth other committees having a look at the kind of new process that was utilized by bringing in competent legal experts from the field of environmental law. Bill Andrews from the West Coast Environmental Law Association and Brian Pannell with his legal expertise in association with the Canadian Environment Network provided a very critical kind of assistance to the legislative committee.

All of us have realized that the number of changes that took place during the legislative committee process is likely to carry on. It would be naive to think that the body of growing expertise, not only in the area of environmental law but the ability to understand why we have to assess alternatives, is really making the best use of our resources. Is this particular proposal for a dam, a forest project, or anything else, really the best approach.

We are going to find an exponential increase in speed in the need for changes to Bill C-13. It would be deeply regrettable to not have the kind of review procedure that is being proposed and I am reasonably confident that we are going to see a positive vote on this some time later today.

The lack of opportunity within the legislation as it now stands for proper assessment of policies is an enormous and glaring loophole. Examples that jump to mind obviously are in areas such as the field of energy, where this government has just in its most recent budget put forward $178 million for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and only about a third of that on the other side of the ledger for conservation and energy efficiency.

We have argued vigorously all along—the government has not listened—that policy assessment should be much more clearly delineated for assessment procedures under this legislation. I think when the public finds out that they are not getting sustainable development policies from government, not necessarily this one, but perhaps from a future government, they are going to want the legislation changed. A review procedure timetable could well allow on a regularized basis for legislation such as this. It might become every two years, every five years or whatever a regularized redrafting process for this kind of legislation that will need to be changed increasingly quickly.

The reason I say that is that there continues to be many people who hold high office in both the public and private sector who do not know such simple things as the fact that the Pacific Ocean has already risen in direct relation to global warming. People do not seem to stay abreast of these kinds of gigantic, ecological phenomena that are now scientifically known to a certain extent and understood. It is similar to the ozone hole, a very recent issue here in this House.

Should it not be the case that all of the government's policies related to the potential impact of CFCs or other ozone depleting substances undergo scrutiny? We know about it. We were warned in this House by the Minister of the Environment to be careful with our children and to be careful with children generally to keep them out of the sun because of the potential for increased depletion of the ozone over much of Canada later this year. It is not in the legislation now. We are just about to take a vote on a piece of legislation and it is relatively easy already to find areas of incredible weakness within the legislation already.

What about species loss. Mr. Speaker, I know you know about the issue of a loss of one acre every five seconds of forest land in Canada. Most people do not reflect on the rate of loss of forested land in this country. It is the kind of thing that should be clearly delineated in a piece of legislation like this.

It is only through amendments, such as that proposed by the Minister of the Environment, the member for Davenport and my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, that we can constructively assure ourselves and the public that we will be able on a regularized basis to update legislation that is needed to address the largest single issue that we face, which is how to get the economy of this country and the economy of the world linked into sustainable development in its truest sense, which is sustainable habitat and some kind of steady state economics that does not have the kind of increasingly fast-moving, negative entropy that we are seeing right now, not only in the developing world, but in the most advanced countries where, the general environment and general consequences of a declining environment are affecting the populations in those countries.

I have spoken about the speed with which we have seen the change from 1974 until today, and that is a very short period of time. Many pieces of legislation do not have to be redrafted and changed as often. The bulk of changes that we have seen in relation to the assessment procedures from the 1984 cabinet guidelines EARP have come from court decisions. I do not think that this piece of legislation of itself is going to slow down the number of times that the public are still going to be seeking some kind of assistance from the courts.

I see you preparing to rise to support the brilliance of the amendment by my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, Mr. Speaker, so I will take this somewhat unique opportunity to sit down now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I just want to bring to the attention of hon. members again relevancy, particularly to this motion. I appreciate the hon. member winding up by giving us an overview of the whole bill again, but I think it is important that we do get down to the nitty-gritty of the motions, please.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to also commend my colleague, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, on bringing forth this amendment. It is an important amendment and an important addition to Bill C-13.

We have to remember that Bill C-13 is being brought forward and we are debating this just two and a half months in advance of the earth summit in Brazil.

Canada has an opportunity to have the best environmental assessment legislation in the world. That is what we are trying to do. My colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in committee tried to put forth some positive additions to the legislation and the legislation, to the government's credit, has been altered because of those interventions by both the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and the member for Davenport.

However, having said that, I think that we all have to be reminded to have a little humility in this process. Although the bill is very much improved from the former bill, Bill C-78, it is not perfect. As I said yesterday, the search for protection is sometimes the enemy of the good.

What has occurred in the last five years in reaction to a vacuum in environmental assessment legislation has been a series of very expensive court challenges, not just to the communities involved but to the industries putting forth. It is also expensive to the government, the taxpayers. Our money has gone forward because of a void in the legislation.

Although this Bill C-13 is much improved, let us take a realistic look at it. We cannot have thought of everything. I can already see some of the gaps in this bill that may very well provide all sorts of problems down the road. This is why it is important to have that five-year review as a mechanism that will reassure those people: "After five years, the House of Commons will review this legislation again". There is some certainty that we have five years.

That does not preclude the suggestion of the member for Davenport that a parliamentary committee review what is going on. Parliamentary committees are creatures unto themselves. They can review whatever they like to review, and that is as it should be.

The parliamentary committee on the environment has the ability to call witnesses on any issue. This five-year review mechanism suggestion put forth by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is an addition to that. I think it is a very positive addition.

In conclusion, I cannot see why this amendment, as proposed, could not be supported from all sides of the House. It is once again another positive intervention from the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. He has achieved a great deal in committee and this is just one example.

I ask for the indulgence of the House in supporting this amendment.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief remarks on the various amendments before us which basically deal with the involvement of the public in the review of Bill C-13.

As I understand the legislation right now, the government does not specifically address the whole notion of involving the general public in consultation in the review of this particular bill.

My colleagues to the left have indicated that yes, there should be some consultation involving the general public. That, in a sense, should be in the hands of a minister. At least I interpret it that way and I do not say that unkindly. I am a little nervous about that.

I would much, much prefer that it be consultation and involvement of the general public as directed by this House, or perhaps with the involvement of both Houses. We all know that environmental assessment has been a problem. I think we acknowledge that this is a step forward.

What we want to do whenever this particular piece of legislation is reviewed is to ensure that it is another step forward. The involvement of the public is clearly a key to achieving that kind of progress.

I think it addresses another issue. We are talking about the involvement of the general public in legislation that deals with the environment. At the same time, the involvement of the general public is a question that needs to be looked at by all governments at this particular period in our history.

We are not without knowing that we have an electorate, the general public who is much more knowledgeable, who is better read and who is much more sensitive to a number of issues whether they be environmental, economic, social, cultural or what have you.

• (1100)

There needs to be a mechanism whereby the general public can in fact be involved in a significant kind of way in the review of legislation whether it relates to environment or other issues.

[Translation]

With these comments, I just want to emphasize the main point, which is that the general public must be involved, not only in reviewing some environmental legislation, but I would say that we must go much farther and begin to review other legislation in other areas. This phenomenon of the public's desire for greater involvement is fairly recent.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, also the top of the morning to you on this St. Patrick's Day.

I rose in this debate before to speak generally on the environment. I said at that time that the environment is a huge concern of my constituents in Port Moody—Co-quitlam, which lies about some 30 kilometres to the east of Vancouver. It is one of the fastest growing suburban areas in Canada. It has a magnificent setting at the mouth of the Fraser River up against the coast mountains. Also the flowers bloom there today as it snows in Ottawa.

The concern for the environment reflected from my riding comes especially from young people who see the environment as a great priority. They are right. There is a commitment by myself, my colleagues and the New Democratic Party. We have taken a collective decision that the environment will be a priority. That is why we have been speaking and offering amendments. I congratulate my colleagues for their work.

This amendment calls for a review of this act so that we can update it, so that we can make sure it is working and so that we can scrutinize it because things change so quickly in the environment. I want to to show how these environmental matters work and why we need to review things so quickly.

Let us take the mighty Fraser River and deal with that and the environmental problems. The Fraser was named by David Thompson, the explorer, after the fur trader, Simon Fraser, of the Northwest Company, who was the first European to follow its course to its mouth in 1808.

Aboriginal people had been using the Fraser River to live beside and to fish in since time immemorial. This is one of Canada's great rivers. It is 1,368 kilometres long, rising from your province—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again, I appreciate what the hon. member is saying. A lot of us appreciate the history lesson we are getting here. I still would like to mention relevancy. I know the hon. member will come back to it. But within the 10 minutes that he has I would appreciate it if he would speak on the motions, please.

Mr. Waddell: Of course, Mr. Speaker is right. I just wanted to show the area of the river. Here are a couple of problems that pertain to this bill and why it needs review.

The first one is that there are industries and projects by the river. For example, in September 22, 1990 our environment critic, the member for Skeena, wrote to the minister about a de-inking plant that started up on the banks of the river. He wanted to know whether there would be an environmental assessment project of this plant.

In this bill there is some question of the regulations that will be made and will it be necessary to have an environmental assessment for small projects. This is something we are concerned about. It seems from the debate that it will not be necessary. We want to know how it is going to work. If you have a collection of small projects, like a de-inking plant and other plants on the banks of the Fraser, that affects the water quality of the river.

Should there be an environmental assessment under this bill? Probably not. Likely under the bill there would be, but we want to come back to this bill, to revisit the bill, to see whether it is working, to see whether the regulations are too broad, and so on, and whether there has to be more environmental assessment even for a small project.

For example, a small nuclear reactor was talked about by one of my colleagues here. If that goes in at a hospital beside the river, will that be environmentally assessed, or should it be assessed? Well, let us have a look at that and see how the bill is doing.

Another area I want to talk about is as to how it fits in with the other projects. I will give you an example.

I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on May 16, 1991 about a debris control board on the river, about a board that got $180,000 from the federal government and money also from the Association of Forest Industries, a like grant of $180,000 and another $180,000 from the provincial government. And what that board did is it cleared up the debris in the lower Fraser River.

Now that is a very important environmental project. And it appears that the federal government is going to drop the funding for this and really open it up which will endanger fishermen, endanger yacht owners and so on, and endanger the port of Vancouver by allowing debris in the lower river.

The problem is that the government cannot on the one hand come to the House and say: "Here is a bill that is really going to tackle the environment," and the next week with a green plan, come and say: "Look, we are going to spend $10 million on the environment," and forget the kind of small but effective projects like the Fraser River debris trap.

One of the local journalists, Sandy McDougall of the Tri-City News in my area of Coquitlam wrote that it is the small projects that are really the effective things that can be done for the environment and I agree.

That is why I have been taking this cause up in the House. When the government brings in a huge environment bill, or the government brings in a big green plan or huge $10 million or $20 million projects, I am saying deal with the small things. They have an environmental impact and they are worth looking at.

I wrote again to the present Minister of the Environment on February 11, 1992. I asked him to have another look at reinstating the funding for this environmental project. The mayor of Port Coquitlam and the council wrote on this project. Not only that, but also the Vancouver Port Authority wrote, the yachting people wrote, and so on. I am just looking here at a letter from the Centennial Sailing Club, for example, which said; "You have got to change your view about funding the debris control traps on the lower Fraser River because this is an important environmental issue".

Let me just conclude by saying that we have to have a further look at this bill. We have to keep looking to see whether it is working. We have to not only consider the big projects but also we have to consider the small projects. A good example is this debris trap. It costs $180,000. That is a small amount in the context of all the money spent, but here is an effective environmental project, here is something worth looking at.

I urge the government to reinstate it as this bill passes this week. I understand the government might even be prepared to do that. If it does, I will be the first one to applaud it. I say to the government: Let us make this bill work; let us consider the small projects; and let us have a review of this bill as this amendment suggests.

• (1110)

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief comments on the three motions grouped together which are Motions Nos. 32, 33 and 34. Perhaps I could take the opportunity for the benefit of those who are watching or subsequently reading Hansard, the recordings of this debate, to note that government Motion No. 34 calls for a new clause, clause 72, which reads:

> (1) Five years after the coming into force of this section, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act shall be undertaken by the Minister.
> (2) The Minister shall, within one year after a review is undertaken pursuant to subsection (1) or within such further time as the House of Commons may authorize, submit a report on the review to Parliament including a statement of any changes the Minister recommends.

Very briefly, government Motion No. 34 is indeed an attempt to draw upon the suggestions of both Motions Nos. 32 and 33 and to provide for the type of subsequent review that many members, as they have already indicated, believe would be helpful. In other words, in very simple terms, there would indeed be a comprehensive review of the act after its operation, five years after it has come into force.

The minister would then report to Parliament, which of course is a public document, and as always the Standing Committee on the Environment would have the opportunity, if it wished, to place this report on its agenda, to invite the minister to appear as a witness before that committee and as a committee is empowered to do, to invite other witnesses if it so chose.

In a very real sense, the government has indeed attempted to draft what might be described as a suitable compromise, recognizing the merits of the arguments as presented in both cases, ensuring indeed that there will be a review after five years of the act being in operation, ensuring that that review will be made public and ensuring as well that the Standing Committee on the Environment, if it is so inclined, certainly will have the opportunity to have the minister bring that report before it for its examination and indeed, to ask other interested members of the public to appear as well.

In a sense Motion No. 34 is a reasonable compromise of Motions Nos. 32 and 33. I would hope therefore that the House would support Motion No. 34.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motions Nos. 32 and 33 will be voted on separately and an affirmative vote on Motion No. 32 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 34, while a negative vote on Motion No. 32 will require a vote on Motion No. 34. Therefore, the question is on Motion No. 32, standing in the name of Mr. Taylor.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 33 standing in the name of Mr. Caccia. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions of report stage of the bill now before the House.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. If I heard you correctly, you have not yet addressed government Motion No. 34.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Once the vote is taken on Motion No. 32, we will take it on Motion No. 34. We cannot do it until we have taken the vote on 32 and 33. Therefore, we cannot take it on 34. We will do that later on today. It that clear for the hon. member?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): As always, Mr. Speaker, your words of advice are both clear and acceptable.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I believe there is agreement that the votes will be deferred until three o'clock today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered. The vote will take place at three o'clock this afternoon on the deferred divisions.

WILD ANIMAL AND PLANT PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C–42, an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants, be now read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee C.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that it is a pleasure for me to be able to speak to the House today by way of introduction of second reading of Bill C–42, an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants.

This is very important legislation which certainly has the attention of the nation, as is evidenced by the amount of mail which I have received. It is a bill which I am pleased is now before us for second reading debate.

Mr. Speaker, as you may recall, in 1987 the Government of Canada sponsored a major international conference here in Ottawa, the Sixth Conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species.

The present Minister of State for the Environment had the honour of presenting the welcoming address at that conference and she had the privilege of announcing to the 650 delegates representing 88 countries and over 100 non-governmental organizations that Environment Canada was developing new legislation to control international trade in and interprovincial transport of foreign and Canadian wild species.

The Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act, which we refer to as WAPPA, is that new federal legislation. It will regulate international and interprovincial trade in wild animals and plants, including their parts and products. Its objectives are to protect Canada's wild animal and plant species from illegal trade, to help protect wild animal and plant species in foreign countries from poaching and smuggling and to protect Canada's ecosystems from the introduction of designated harmful species, the so-called biological pollutants.

The importance of the issues addressed by Bill C-42 should not be underestimated. In a February 1991 submission to the Minister of the Environment, the coalition of leading wildlife and nature organizations, known as the Group of Eight, identified 10 priority issues for biodiversity and sustainable development in Canada. One of these is improved federal wildlife legislation concerning poaching and illegal trade in wildlife and effective enforcement of such legislation.

Bill C-42 will complement existing provincial and territorial legislation governing the conservation of wild animals and plants. As well, it will allow Canada to better comply with international agreements and support the efforts of other countries to conserve and protect species, especially endangered ones.

• (1120)

As I shall explain later in these remarks, unless this legislation is passed, the federal government will have limited capability to stop trade related illegal exploitation of wildlife, whether this wildlife is the falcon in Canada, or the rhinoceros in Africa.

Therefore, it is especially gratifying to be able to begin debate as that legislation, Bill C-42, moves to second reading today.

Before getting into the specifics of the legislation before the House, I would like to discuss the context within which Bill C-42 was developed. On December 11, 1990 the Government of Canada set out a comprehensive policy and action plan to implement sustainable development in Canada. As members know, that was Canada's Green Plan for a Healthy Environment whose objective is "to secure for current and future generations of Canadians a safe and healthy environment and a sound a prosperous economy". To meet this challenge the green plan set out specific goals and targets and schedules for attaining them.

As part of its program to conserve and protect Canada's special spaces and species, the plan proposed introduction during 1991 of new legislation to deter poaching and illegal trading of wild animals and plants. The government is dedicated to fulfilling its green plan commitments and Bill C-42 received first reading in the House of Commons on November 7, 1991.

This bill is an important green plan initiative and embodies many of the principles of that plan. Poachers, smugglers and traffickers in wild species have no respect for nature and respect for nature is a fundamental tenet of the green plan. The plan emphasizes a strong relationship between a healthy environment and a healthy economy. Illegal trade in wild species undermines that relationship. The green plan stresses co-ordinated action by the federal government. All federal agencies concerned with trade in wild animals and plants will respond under Bill C-42.

Furthermore, implementation of this legislation will also reflect the shared responsibility of the federal and provincial governments with regard to wild species. The strengthening of these partnerships is also an important tenet of the green plan and the Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act will have the added benefit of ensuring the efficient use of public resources. Equally important, the legislation will provide a framework within which all affected and interested parties can work together to develop a program which attacks poaching and illegal trading in wildlife effectively. The Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act will indeed be a partnership for change.

Any co-ordinated and comprehensive approach aimed at fostering a healthy environment must take into account the protection of wildlife. That is why Canada's green plan called for the national wildlife strategy which was announced on November 29, 1991. Bill C-42 is an important component of that strategy.

Under the heading "new legislation to attack poaching and illegal trading", the words of the green plan as they set out the objectives of the national wildlife strategy have great relevance in describing the problems faced in the protection of wildlife from poaching and illegal trade.

The illegal trade in both wildlife and wildlife products is big business both in Canada and around the world. In some circumstances it is having a devastating effect on wildlife populations. For example, the future of the world's rhinoceros population is in grave danger because of the demand for the animals' horns for traditional Asian medicines and for dagger handles in the Middle East. In Canada there is a growing export market for bear gall bladders, again for traditional Asian medicines.

Mr. Speaker, as you and I know, I have spoken publicly and in this House before with reference to the slaughter of a very famous black bear in Riding Mountain National Park called Duke, perhaps the largest black bear in all of North America, that was tragically slaughtered for this very purpose.

In response to these and similar problems here is the commitment that the Government of Canada made in its green plan:

> In support of Canada's international obligations under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (the CITES Convention), Canada will reduce the threats that poaching and illegal trade pose to domestic and foreign wildlife conservation by introducing the Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act in 1991.

In addition Canada's green plan called for strengthened wildlife law enforcement through tougher laws and stiffer penalties and for special measures to reduce the poaching and smuggling of wildlife in Canada. Bill C–42 fulfils these commitments.

The legislation now before the House will provide Canada with integrated, contemporary and forward looking trade controls for the conservation of Canadian and foreign wildlife and the protection of Canadian ecosystems. It will prevent illegal trade in wildlife, particularly endangered species. It will also assist in protecting Canada's ecosystems by controlling trade in designated harmful or undesirable animal or plant species.

The Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act will prohibit trafficking in Canadian and foreign endangered species and their products which are controlled by the CITES Convention. Through improved enforcement powers, the act will enhance implementation of the CITES Convention on endangered species. It would also prohibit wild animals and plants from being brought into Canada if they have been taken or otherwise dealt with in violation of foreign conservation laws. Similarly, if wild animals and plants had been taken, possessed, transported or sold contrary to provincial or territorial wildlife laws, the bill will prohibit their transport across provincial or territorial borders.

These provisions will ensure that poachers and smugglers do not escape prosecution simply by leaving the jurisdiction where the illegal activity took place.

Obviously this challenge cannot be met without additional resources. The government is serious about this legislation and is making available new resources in times of restraint. The bill provides a $12.3 million support program under the green plan and resources obtained under the green plan will establish enforcement capabilities which ensure that implementation of the bill is effective, efficient and fair.

The legislation will also provide much tougher penalties, sufficient to deter poachers and smugglers; fines of up to $100,000 and prison terms of up to five years.

Canadians recognize that the need for the Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act is very great. Indeed, in July 1990 Zoocheck Canada, an NGO, was sufficiently concerned to sponsor a special forum entitled "The Trade and Traffic in Wildlife". Held at the Metro Toronto Zoo, the meeting was attended by Canadian and American experts on international wildlife trade and drew attention to this matter.

International trade in wild animals and plants remains considerable. Illegal trade in wild species continues to be fuelled by the high value placed on certain species, their parts and derivatives.

Canada's wild species are being poached, Canadians are smuggling wild specimens and Canada is being used as a transit route to the United States and elsewhere for illegal shipments of wild animals and plants. The present federal legislation lacks a needed regulatory and enforcement capability.

This urgent need to better protect our wild animals and plants has led to the first overhaul of federal legislative trade controls on Canadian wildlife in half a century. This reform is long overdue. Present instruments to control trade in wild species are complicated and unfortunately inadequate.

For example, at present, Canada's Department of External Affairs is responsible for the legislation through which the CITES Convention is now enforced in Canada. This is done under regulations of the Export and Import Permits Act which was initially passed in 1947 following the establishment of various trade controls during World War II for supply and other reasons.

As things stand now, Customs Canada and the RCMP are the only enforcement bodies with the legal authority to make interventions in this field. As excellent as these groups are, they have many other responsibilities and priorities and are not necessarily fully trained in or familiar with wildlife and conservation issues. Under present arrangements, the responsibilities of the federal department most related to the issue, Environment Canada, are either non-existent or strictly limited.

Similarly, the Game Export Act of 1941, which controls interprovincial transport and export of Canadian wildlife, is weak and dated. It applies only to dead game and fur, yet live specimens and non-game species are poached and smuggled. Its enforcement powers are weak. For example, there is no power to inspect. Penalties are limited to a maximum of $1,000. There is also a need to introduce into federal legislation flexibility which does not exist presently under the Game Export Act.

The inadequacy of legislation in this field has long been recognized. As early as 1953, recommendations were made by federal-provincial wildlife conferences to the effect that the Game Export Act be changed to better control exports, imports and interprovincial shipments of live game.

Further recommendations regarding wildlife were made in 1957, 1960, 1961, 1968 and 1970 and yet few legal instruments were passed. Despite these recommendations to expand and improve inspection for wild species, until now legislation in these areas remained a helpless hodge-podge of far from satisfactory federal measures.

Because the existing laws in this field have been weak and dated, Canada's implementation of the CITES Convention and the Game Export Act has been severely hampered and wildlife has suffered the consequences.

• (1130)

From 1982 to 1985 the federal government presented white papers on the topic to the provinces. Then in 1987 the consultations which led to the present legislation began in earnest, each new version of the draft bill a refinement of its predecessor. Four workshops were held during 1990. These helped develop and define the roles and responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments and helped outline the regulations that would be needed to prevent poaching and smuggling of wild species.

The result is Bill C-42, the bill that is before us now: its prohibitions, regulatory authorities and planned administrative delegation of responsibilities. The proposed act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants will give the federal government through Environment Canada the authority, first, to control import or export of wild animals or plants, or their parts or products, according to the international agreements and the conservation laws of other countries.

Second, it will be given the authority to control import or transport from one province to another of designated live wild animals and plants, thereby preventing the introduction of species potentially harmful to Canada's ecosystems, or to the ecosystems of a receiving province.

Third is the control of transport from one province to another of any wild animals or plants, or their parts or products, that had been obtained or removed in contravention to conservation laws of a province.

Fourth, it can prohibit the possession of wild animals and plants, or their parts or products, that have been imported or transported or about to be exported or transported in violation of the act.

Fifth, subject to regulations for conservation purposes, it has the authority to prohibit possession of endangered wild animals and plants, or their parts or products, if possessed in order to sell or distribute them.

The time for this legislation has come. Concern about illegal trade in wildlife is growing. For example, the subject of the World Wildlife Fund's 1991 fall fund raising campaign was illegal trade in black bear gall bladders. I would like to quote briefly from the literature:

> The World Wildlife Fund wants to make sure that this new threat to Canadian wildlife is confronted right now, before it gets entirely out of hand. Canada urgently needs clear legislation. And we must have strong enforcement.

I should perhaps mention that Canada has already taken early action with respect to the black bear situation by unilaterally listing the species on Appendix III of the CITES agreement. But this alone is not enough. As the World Wildlife Fund notes, clear legislation and strong enforcement are also needed.

Bill C-42 will be of great benefit to wild and endangered animals and plants in Canada and around the world. Its purpose is not to stop all trade in wild animals and plants. Rather it will protect endangered species from trade related overexploitation, prohibit trade in illegal wildlife and regulate ongoing trade in non-endangered wild species in order to prevent poached wildlife from entering the legal trade.

Perhaps I could explain the provisions in some detail. For example, one of the major objectives of Bill C-42 is conservation of the world's endangered wildlife through the elimination of illegal international trade in wild plants and animals.

WAPPA will make it illegal for a person to import into Canada any wild animal or plant which that person knows to have been taken, possessed, distributed or transported in contravention of the laws of any foreign state. Thus the act will ensure that a person cannot escape prosecution for the violation of another country's wildlife protection laws simply by leaving that country and hiding out in Canada. Canada will not be a haven for those who poach and smuggle wild animals and plants in other countries.

WAPPA will replace the Game Export Act and regulations made under the Export and Import Permits Act through which the CITES convention on endangered species is implemented in Canada. Each of these acts controls international or interprovincial transport of wildlife through the use of a permit system. These permit systems must and will be maintained under the new legislation. To avoid unnecessary paperwork for importers and exporters where foreign, provincial or territorial permits fulfil the objectives of the act, through regulations these will be accepted instead of a federal permit.

Under the act federal permits will be required for the import and transport within Canada of wild animals and plants where this is necessary to prevent the introduction into the wild of potentially harmful wildlife. A list of species of concern will be developed in consultation with the provinces, territories and interested parties, and designated in regulation. The federal government is constitutionally responsible for matters relating to international trade and interprovincial transport. This is the reason for the requirement for a federal permit. However, upon agreement, administrative responsibility for the issuance of some permits will be transferred to the provinces. Individual provinces and territories will therefore determine what wildlife may be brought into their respective jurisdictions from other parts of Canada.

The Hon. Bud Wildman, minister of natural resources for the province of Ontario, recently wrote expressing his support for the legislation:

> —the revision of the Game Export Act in CITES related legislation. The steps taken by your government indicate that Ontario's concern for the conservation of wildlife and plants have been adequately addressed in the proposed Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act—The conservation and welfare of Ontario's ecosystems are high priorities for the provincial government. Accordingly, I am offering my full co-operation and preparation of the supportive legislation.

Domestically WAPPA will work to conserve Canadian wildlife within our borders by controlling the interprovincial transport and export of wild animals and plants. The act will prohibit trade in wild species subject to provincial and territorial conservation laws in various ways. If a provincial or territorial permit is required for the removal of wildlife under the act interprovincial transport cannot occur until that permit has been obtained. The new legislation also prohibits interprovincial transport if removal from a province or territory is simply prohibited or if a person knows that the wildlife has been taken, possessed, distributed or transported in violation of any provincial or territorial law.

One of the most important sections of the new act is the one that deals with the possession of wild animals or plants which are being or, have been traded in contravention of the act. This section also addresses possession of endangered species for the purpose of sale or distribution. This provision is essential in order to fight illegal trade in wildlife generally and commercialization of endangered species in particular.

By means of the prohibitions regarding possession of wild animal and plant specimens, the act makes a significant contribution to stopping poaching and illegal trade in wildlife. The act ensures that all those involved in illegal trafficking in wild specimens, not just poachers, shippers or transporters, are liable to prosecution.

For example, those who receive wild animals and plants which they know have been imported or transported illegally can be prosecuted, even though they were not involved in the actual import or transport. Thus the act will strike at the market for illegal traffickers. All too often it is these people who encourage others to commit the import or transport offence.

At the same time, however, legitimate trade in endangered species must be protected. Regulations will be put into place which ensure that zoos and others who captively breed or artificially propagate endangered species may continue to do so. This will ensure that the benefits these important conservation activities bring to endangered species are not compromised.

These regulations will be developed in close co-operation with our many government and non-government partners, and in particular those who will be directly affected by this legislation. Organizations such as the Canadian Association of Zoological Parks and Aquariums, the Avian Preservation Foundation and the Pet Industry Joint Advisory Council of Canada support the objectives of the legislation. These organizations have offered their assistance in preparing the regulations, and the zoo and aquarium association wishes to assist with implementation of the act in ways such as public awareness, species identification, the temporary or permanent holding of detained or seized live specimens and the development of guide lines for the private breeding of endangered species.

The poaching and smuggling of wild animals and plants is a lucrative, large and growing business, and I say that with regret. Domestically illegal trade in such wild species as bears continues in order to satisfy demand for live specimens or their parts. As I have mentioned, WAPPA contains stiff new penalties for those who would prey upon Canada's wildlife heritage and that of the world as well.

Undoubtedly members of this House have heard the term "polluter pay principle" applied with reference to environmental matters. In seeking to stamp out poaching and smuggling, the new act applies the "poacher pays principle".

By providing for both summary conviction offences and more serious indictable offences, the act enables the punishment to fit the crime. Under the act a prosecutor may elect to proceed either by way of indictable offence or summary conviction. For an indictable offence a more severe penalty is provided: up to $100,000 in fine and/or up to five years imprisonment. Less serious summary conviction offences are punishable up to $10,000 in fine and/or six months imprisonment.

Under this act an offence will be considered serious when it is detrimental to survival of a species; in other words when it involves an endangered species or large quantity of specimens of a threatened or other species. Offences where there is or has been serious harm or risk of harm to Canadian ecosystems will also be considered to be serious.

Like the Game Export Act which it replaces WAPPA includes a fines cumulation provision, that is a court can multiply any fine imposed by the number of specimens in a shipment. This provision eliminates the need for a prosecutor to lay a separate charge for each specimen in a shipment.

Furthermore, the new act includes a proceeds of crime provision. Such provisions are now commonly included in legislation controlling undertakings where large profits from illegal commercial activities are possible. The high value of a growing number of wild animal and plant specimens is encouraging people to poach and smuggle wildlife, and thus earn such illegal profits. The proceeds of crime provision will allow a court to impose an additional financial penalty where such profits have been made.

On the other hand, some minor offences such as contraventions of various regulations are more effectively and fairly dealt with if the accused is presented with options other than a court appearance. Therefore the new act also contains provisions to enable enforcement officers to act efficiently in cases where the offence is relatively minor. It creates a class of ticketable offences to which an accused may plead guilty and pay the prescribed fine without having to appear in court.

When a suspect is found guilty of a ticketable offence, any specimens that have been seized in relation to the alleged offence will be forfeited. The collection of unpaid fines will be facilitated by allowing the government to proceed through the courts for their collection.

Penalties have a dual purpose. They may deter those who contemplate violating the law and they are imposed on those who do. The stiff penalties provided by the new act will doubtless deter some people who are considering illegal trade in endangered species, or the import of prohibited or harmful species. For those who are not deterred and those who contravene the act severe punishments can be handed out to serious violators, while still allowing the courts to deal with minor violations in an appropriate manner.

The way in which this act will be administered is also important. The Minister of the Environment will be responsible for administering WAPPA through Environment Canada's Canadian Wildlife Service. In terms of enforcement, since the new act will control the import, export and interprovincial transport of wild animal and plant specimens, Canada Customs and the RCMP that are also responsible for the enforcement of the Customs Act must continue to be involved as they have been in the past.

To make protection more effective, however, Canadian Wildlife Service enforcement co-ordinators and national park wardens of Environment Canada will also be officers under the new legislation. In addition, wildlife in Canada is also managed by the provinces and territories and by the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Thus provincial and territorial conservation officers and fisheries officers will be designated for enforcement purposes once agreement with their agencies are completed. In addition, the implementation program will be co-ordinated with Agriculture Canada to improve protection for live wild animals and plants.

The co-operative effort of this expanded roster of enforcement agency will make possible enhanced inspections and information exchanges, stepped up investigations, and lead to the more vigorous enforcement of environmental regulations.

Officers designated under the act will have all the powers of a peace officer. These are described in the Criminal Code and include for example the power to obtain a warrant, to conduct a search, to make an arrest, and to lay a charge against an alleged violator. In the past conservation officers have often been severely limited in the performance of their duties because they lacked these powers. Now they will have full powers to protect Canada's wildlife.

Wild animal and plant conservation is the responsibility of all nations. In Canada the federal, provincial and territorial governments share these obligations. Wildlife issues are so broad, Canada is such a vast country and Canadians have such a deep and widespread interest in wildlife, that implementation of WAPPA calls for true partnership.

Genuine partnership is what this act will result in. Its implementation will be a multi-agency endeavour, involving five federal agencies and the provinces and territories. This co-operative, partnership approach is essential if we are to deter poaching and illegal trading in wild animals and plants effectively.

Finally I would like to stress that WAPPA is consistent with the requirements of the Constitution, particularly with section 35 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of aboriginal people. The proposed legislation will not interfere with the traditional exchange by aboriginal peoples of artefacts and other items made from wild animals and plants.

The act does not pertain to the taking of wildlife nor prevent trade in legally hunted or trapped wildlife. Rather, its provisions apply to illegal international and interprovincial transport. The act is designed to contribute to the conservation of Canadian and foreign wildlife by preventing trade in poached wildlife.

Canadians cherish the wild animals and plants that are both their heritage and part of the legacy they wish to pass on to future generations. WAPPA responds to growing concerns that wildlife in Canada and other parts of the world must be protected.

This new act will provide the necessary framework for ensuring this concern is addressed. When this act is in place, Canada will be able to meet its responsibilities for protecting and conserving wild animals and plants not only within Canada, but as part of the world community.

In closing I would like to quote once again from the World Wildlife Fund publication entitled "Wild Hunters–Predators in Peril".

> Canadians need to wake up to something that is part of a world-wide trend and happening largely unnoticed in this country: the insidious loss of our most spectacular wildlife species. In many cases elsewhere, the fate of species has been sealed despite the best efforts of conservationists because those efforts came too late. But Canada still has the opportunity to do it differently, by not repeating the mistakes made elsewhere.

Many groups in Canada feel exactly the same way you do, Mr. Speaker, because poaching has been a significant problem in your own province of Alberta. The Canadian Wildlife Federation supports the prompt adoption of the proposed WAPPA. "Canada scores points in wildlife protection" headlined an article in the January 1992 newsletter of the Canadian Nature Federation. It further stated "the long-awaited legislation is welcomed by Canadians interested in wildlife preservation and by their counterparts in the international community". The title of the November 24, 1991, Nature Trail column in The Sunday Star encouraged Canadians to "get behind Bill C-42 if you care about endangered species".

The legislation "will allow Canada to hold its head up in the international community". Even the CITES secretariat has congratulated the Government of Canada on its effort to greatly strengthen Canada's role in the implementation of the convention. It sincerely hopes the final legislation will pass and enter into force at the earliest possible opportunity.

I have taken more time than I normally would to introduce this particular piece of legislation to second reading. I do so in a very fervent belief that the legislation indeed is important. I hope it will receive the prompt attention of the House because Canadians throughout our land are waiting for its passage.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would just like to indicate to the House that should we complete second reading on this particular bill prior to one o'clock, rather than start with another bill, we will call it one o'clock.

Second, I would like to receive the consent of the House so we can continue third reading of Bill C-13 after we have completed the vote that was deferred earlier. That is what everybody has agreed to.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House would like to give the parliamentary secretary the assurance he is seeking.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I also find the proposal of the parliamentary secretary quite acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is unanimous consent. So ordered.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I hope the parliamentary secretary, in his very articulate and wide-ranging intervention, will not get carried away by his own quotations in the assessment of this bill. We certainly welcome the introduction of this bill on this side of the House. After careful examination, we will co-operate for its speedy passage. We would like to bring the parliamentary secretary and the government back to earth as to what this particular bill will achieve. Instead of reading "an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants", the bill should read "an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants from trade". It is a trade oriented piece of legislation. Certainly it is needed, and brings us in line with the international community and with our commitments made under the CITES agreement of 1975. It will place Canada in a good light internationally.

• (1150)

It is a bill that will require witnesses to be heard at the committee stage. Game wardens and other officials with the Canadian Wildlife Service will probably make some pretty significant contributions to its implementation. I would also include the National Parks people in that. No doubt there is a very broad community that needs to be canvassed.

There is a potential sleeper in this issue and that is whether this bill will control the import of game species for game ranching. We have had an experience recently with imported elk with tuberculosis. The problems that have been created are well known. The government needs to be alerted to this aspect of the bill for potential loopholes in its application.

The bill itself has very strong and desirable implementation features. It gives the minister certain powers to appoint officers who will have the role of justices of the peace to implement the legislation. We hope the government will make the necessary funds available. The offences described in the proposed bill are certainly commensurate with the damage that poachers and illegal importers and exporters are committing.

The point that needs to be made is the one I referred to at the beginning. While this bill is heavily oriented on the trade side in the control of imports and exports from Canada of flora and fauna that need protection, it has virtually no impact as proposed on the conservation and protection of endangered species domestically.

That aspect is not revealed in the title of the bill, and therefore has to be highlighted at this stage. It is still possible, when the bill is examined at the committee level, to introduce certain amendments that will permit the introduction of clauses that will allow Canadians in generations to come to enjoy certain species, both flora and fauna, that may be extinct unless something is done about it. That matter is extremely important domestically and transcends the preoccupation with trade which is emphasized in this particular bill.

I would like to bring to your attention a private member's bill introduced by the member for Davenport in May of last year on this subject. That act is entitled "an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species". It is Bill C-209. It is waiting its turn to be debated. In that bill the member for Davenport, in a rather accurate manner, attempted to specify the purposes that need to be achieved in Canada to protect the endangered areas in both flora and fauna.

In Canada we need to identify, protect and rehabilitate flora and fauna threatened or endangered by human activity.

Second, we need to develop and implement programs to restore the populations of threatened and endangered species of flora and fauna to self-sustaining numbers. This is nothing particularly extravagant or unusual. It has been said by a number of conservationists and people in this particular area.

This is what is missing in Bill C-42 which is preoccupied with trade, and quite rightly so. We do not object to that. On the contrary, we support that preoccupation and interest in the protection of the public interest in those terms. At the same time it lacks the conservationist approach for the species that need particular attention.

Since 1964 there has been a Wilderness Act in the United States under which certain areas can be identified and protected. These areas are generally endangered spaces which provide habitat for endangered species. It is regrettable that the government until now did not find the time to table complementary legislation for action of this nature in Canada.

The parliamentary secretary referred to the Wildlife Strategy for Canada which is a very fine document. It has all the right and appropriate words. Unfortunately it lacks an action plan. It fails to spell out the required timetable. It does not identify areas which are prime candidates for protection. It is a good statement of principle without a plan for implementation.

I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary as forcefully as I can that C-42 will not provide protection to endangered species which are not threatened by international trade. In other words, it leaves out a fairly important sector.

We welcome the initiative because it is desirable and necessary, but its scope is too narrow. It leaves out too many species, both in terms of flora and fauna.

Finally , I would like to draw your attention to a fact the parliamentary secretary already alluded to in his concluding remarks. Legislation of this kind will be much more effective and achieve its desired goal if it is matched, accompanied and complemented by a very intensive public information and education program.

We really need to sensitize the public and our young people in particular. They are very receptive to flora, fauna and wildlife and particularly to the endangered side of it. We have to perform a very important role which only governments can perform on behalf of the public. We need an intensive campaign which will accelerate and perhaps make the success of Bill C-42 more readily possible.

• (1200)

Having said that, I really would like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary for having introduced this bill at this time.

I urge him to convince the minister that we now need a companion bill which will deal with the protection of endangered species which are not threatened by international trade.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–42, which as the parliamentary secretary and my friend from Davenport have already said, is a piece of legislation that is long overdue.

It is urgently required and certainly in terms of the essential principles, although I agree it is very narrow in scope, it is a piece of legislation worthy of support and quick passage. We should get it on to the legislative committee and back into the House.

I must point out at the beginning of my remarks that I regret this is not a piece of legislation that comes at the issue with an ecosystem approach. It is clearly crisis management legislation, and it is something that is becoming increasingly common in this Chamber and in chambers around the world, rather than moving forward with the ecosystem approach. This approach was well discussed and widely discussed in the development of the Brundtland commission report "Our Common Future".

We have to start with the title which regrettably is both inappropriate and misleading. It raises the hope among many Canadians that it deals specifically with the protection of endangered Canadian species and their habitat. In fact, it does no such thing.

The scope of the bill needs to be either massively increased so that it deals seriously with endangered species and endangered spaces in Canada, or there should be a parallel bill.

The title should read "an act respecting trade and transport of certain species of wild animals and plants", or it should read "an act respecting trade and traffic of certain species of wild animals and plants". As read at the moment, if someone were simply to read about it in the paper or a magazine article, one would think from the title which says: "an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants" that it is quite a wide bill.

In fact, it might be something like the 1973 legislation from the United States which has protected species as widely diverse as the snail darter or the spotted owl. Regrettably, this legislation is nowhere near that. I regret that it is being sold to a certain extent as that kind of broad-based protective legislation.

It does do three things. It protects some of Canada's wild animal and plant species from illegal trade. It protects some Canadian ecosystems from the introduction of designated, harmful species and it helps to protect wild animal and plant species in foreign countries from poaching and smuggling.

Therefore, it is sort of CITES plus some other species. When I say plus, it means that they are protected or are in need of protection in certain other countries. We are going to be able to assist some other countries that are faced with chronic poaching, smuggling and illicit trading in both plants and animals.

Oddly enough, our own endangered species have never been added to CITES. One really has to wonder after all of these years just how serious governments of Canada have been in protecting either endangered species or endangered spaces.

Right now CITES lists some 1,000 plants and animals in Appendix I, which is the strongest of the appendices. There are 48,000 species and subspecies listed in total. That, of course, is only a small fraction of the endangered species in the world now. It is estimated at 1,900 and as at the middle of this century we were only losing one major species per year.

That accelerated during the last decade to about about one per hour. Now people like Edward Osborne Wilson and other experts in the field of biodiversity think we may be losing as many as 10 an hour. A lot of that related to the dropping of the canopies of the tropical rain forests at the rate of about an acre a second.

Of course, we are not immune from that kind of loss of space either. We are losing an acre of forest every five seconds. So even as I speak here, many acres of Canadian forests, including Canadian rain forests, will disappear forever.

Of the 48,000 species and subspecies listed in CITES, some are very large chunks such as 15,000 species of orchids that are listed because of the phenomenal value in illegal and illicit trade in some plant species.

At the moment the Game Export Act, which is our present piece of legislation for dealing with some of these issues, can only deal with dead animals and fur.

One does not have to be a rocket scientist to figure out that it is not going to get us very far today in terms of the kinds of traffic and trade there is, such as from my home province and from yours, Mr. Speaker, in a point touched on by the member for Brandon—Souris, which is of black bear gall bladders, paws and other parts that are traded for vast sums of money, particularly to the Orient.

Big smuggling and trade is left wide open. This legislation, as I said, should go quickly to the legislative committee where witnesses expert in this field, World Wildlife, Canadian Nature Federation and others well aware of the international and national ramifications of such a bill can be heard.

In 1975, external affairs made regulations under the Export and Import Permits Act to allow us basic compliance with CITES, which is the internationally recognized legislation on international trade and endangered species. However, since then most of the other 112 signatory nations have introduced much better compliance and enforcement provisions than those held by Canada.

Canada has promised since 1987 to develop new legislation. Consultation with the provinces has gone on since 1982. For a full decade there have been discussions with the provinces and territories regarding the need for this kind of legislation.

The green plan wildlife component in 1990 called for the introduction during 1991 of "new legislation to attack poaching and illegal trading" of wild animals and plants and to "strengthen wildlife law enforcement" and special measures for the enforcement of federal wildlife legislation.

Bill C-42 was finally introduced November 7, 1991, a delay of four and one-half years since the government had first indicated that this legislation was coming forward.

It cannot be described as a piece of legislation that has an enormous amount of cabinet or government-wide support, although there is enormous support for it across Canada among those who are aware of the reckless endangerment of species around the world due to trafficking.

There are some very serious problems with the bill that will have to be remedied in the legislative committee.

First, the title must be changed. It is clearly misleading and it would be inappropriate for a piece of legislation to pass with such a misleading title attached to it. As I have said, it should be changed to "an act respecting either the trade and transport or the trade and traffic of certain species of wild animals and plants".

In the definition section of the act the word "animal" is found. It must be expanded in definition to include those Canadian species presently covered by the Game Export Act. This may have been something that was simply forgotten as it was being drafted. Similarly, the word "plant" which is found in the definition section must be expanded to cover Canadian plants.

The bill contains powers to promulgate regulations. These, to as great a degree as possible, should be included now and provided at the legislative committee process.

We debated earlier today how inappropriate it is that Bill C-13 is rocketing through the House without having the 15 sections of regulations at least available for members to view. In a piece of legislation such as this, surely since there have been 10 years of consultations with the provinces and the territories and four and one-half years of drafting, one assumes that this government ought to be able to bring the regulations forward so that we can at least have a look at them in the legislative committee.

By the fall of 1990, there were 195 endangered species in Canada and that was a list prepared by COSEWIC, which is the Committee on the Status of Endangered Wildlife in Canada. We need an immediate parallel bill to be introduced to protect endangered plants and animals and spaces obviously. Or preferably, this bill should be amended in definition and throughout to give life to Canada's federal constitutional authority for wildlife conservation.

• (1210)

That is a power interestingly enough which the present government was prepared to transfer away to the provinces in the recent federal constitutional package. The Standing Committee on Environment made it very clear that this would be an extremely, if not extraordinarily unwise position for the government to take, it being an existing federal power and authority.

We all know that fish swim between provinces and territories, migratory birds fly across provincial and territorial boundaries and there is a very clear and mandatory role for the federal government to pursue. There are the three heads of power, one of which should clearly be listed in the provisions of this bill. That is peace, order and good government. It is a constitutional footing that should be more regularly utilized to avoid court challenges. Similarly, the criminal law and trade and commerce should be utilized somewhat more strongly. I will come to that in a moment in terms of this legislation.

This opportunity should be utilized to enact the biological diversity bill taking a proactive approach to maintaining diversity as well as an endangered species act. It should be clearly enunciated where limited populations and/or limited habitat are threatened by any activity that steps will be taken to protect the ecosystem.

As the member for Davenport suggested yesterday in our debate on Bill C-13, if sustainable development is really believed in by the government as it is by the majority of Canadians, that kind of wording which was proposed on sustainable development should similarly be used within Bill C-42.

Canada has lost a number of species already to various causes and many more are now threatened. Many Canadians have been misled by the title of this bill and have falsely assumed that like the U.S. legislation that protected the snail darter or the spotted owl, this applies and it does not.

The U.S. law called the Endangered Species Act, the ESA, was passed 20 years ago by Congress in 1973. It is hard to find a school child anywhere in the United States who does not know about the ESA. It has been a useful piece of legislation, although its funding has been blocked by such notoriously anti-environmental presidents as Bush and Reagan. Again, it is a narrow piece of legislation because it is almost entirely crisis management as opposed to dealing with ecosystems.

We should protect ecosystems and not just the species. That is why the campaigns that are being launched by many groups are based on the concept of endangered spaces. Otherwise, we get species ghettos or unfenced zoos where small numbers of endangered species manage to eke out a marginal existence.

Biodiversity is clearly preferable because the endangerment of species must be anticipated and prevented. One of the few things that legislatures can actually do is to be proactive rather than reactionary which regrettably is not very successful.

Clause 13 requires a consequential amendment. I am surprised that it is not there already. That clause provides for search and seizure without warrant. I must say it is one of the few pieces of legislation that truly could require such a power.

I can think of a number of situations where enforcement officers involved in dealing with traffickers in endangered plants or animals could find themselves in a situation where they would have to utilize the power. But it is a power that has been found to be very open to abuse.

The only other place you find it in Canadian law is under the old 1978 firearms legislation, the famous old Bill C-51.

I know personally of cases where that search and seizure provision without warrant has been abused by enforcement officers.

One of the surer ways of clearing the mind of those who might want to abuse this power is to require a mandatory report to Parliament on an annual basis, giving all of the specifics of the case where a search and seizure without warrant was utilized. I know there will be a reporting procedure to the courts but that has proven in the past to be very inadequate. It depends on the judge, it depends on all kinds of things as to whether or not any kind of proper follow-up is made. I believe there must be a subsection 13(a) added or perhaps an entire new clause to require specific reporting on search and seizure without warrant.

Under the offence and punishment section I find it awesome that the fines proposed are so out of whack with what other departments and other countries have been doing.

Let me give some examples. Under the summary section, punishment is presently set at $10,000 and up to six months in jail, whereas in the United States precisely the same kind of offence carries for an individual a $100,000 fine, up to 12 months in jail, and if it is a corporate entity involved in illicit activities involving plants or animals, it is $200,000.

Indictably we find the same kind of discrepancy: $100,000 and five years under the proposed legislation. In the United States it is $250,000 for an individual or $500,000 for a corporation and five years in jail.

The department, the minister or the government might argue that the cumulative approach is there. If somebody has a whole bunch of animal parts or animals, a bunch of black footed ferrets or other species, then the fine would apply seriatim to each of those. But the fact of the matter is that in the majority of cases one looks into, that is not an effective way to go about it because the courts rarely utilize that kind of consequential fine.

Even in our own National Parks Act which this House recently amended, the fine for poaching threatened species is $150,000 under the summary section and $150,000 and six months in jail indictably. It is very clear. Even if one looks at the Fisheries Act, it is now $100,000 summary or $500,000 and two years in the slammer indictably. Even in Alberta where poaching has become a very serious problem it is set at $100,000.

Bill C-42 must be amended in this clause. The clause on individuals should be set to $100,000, indictably to $250,000 or higher, and a new corporate clause must be included because trafficking in plants and animals is clearly on the rise. It is becoming a much more serious problem and it is quite often dealt with by corporate entities because to traffic efficiently and effectively in extremely highly valued plants or animals requires that kind of corporate structure. I believe that should be introduced and set at least at $200,000 so that we do not become what might be described as a point of entry.

The parliamentary secretary himself said that Canada could be used as a point of transit for trafficking. Of course that is what we are becoming right now because we have almost no legislation in this field. It is basically vacant other than the 1975 action by External Affairs and the Game Export Act.

The issue in terms of fines is very important. International traffickers look at North America as a large market for endangered plants and animals because people like for whatever reasons the exotic. It is very important that we not have the United States, the great republic to the south of us, with fines set at $100,000 and $200,000 for almost any of the offences and Canada at $10,000.

If you are a smuggler, Mr. Speaker—and I am not suggesting you are—which country would you want to come into? Would it be a country with a $10,000 fine or a country with a $200,000 fine? I would suggest that as a good smuggler you would choose Canada as a point of entry for your smuggling purposes. I do not think we should allow that. When one looks at the rate of species lost, as I said the time clock is accelerating exponentially. We used to lose a species a year. Then it went to a species an hour. Now it is at least 10 an hour.

We need some crisis management legislation, but let us at least make it effective. We can expand this bill so that it covers the waterfront and in fact deals effectively with what Canadians also want, which is protection for endangered species in our own country.

Finally, on the corporate section that should be included, it should be set at least at $200,000 with six months in jail and $500,000 with five years in jail when proceeded with indictably, simply to bring it into the context of other existing Canadian legislation and legislation in the United States. This problem is just like the drug trade. There are enormous profits to be reaped from going and getting snakes, bugs, monkeys, parrots or orchids from all around the planet. One of the major market zones is in our own country and another is in the United States.

If we are to have legislation that works, let us do it quickly and let us do it at the legislative committee. We are going to need more dough too. I note that there is $12.3 million under the green plan, but that only provides 29 new person-years over the next six years. I do not think 29 men and women being added over the next six years will be able to do the job. We are going to have to do something more in that area too.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words concerning this legislation and I give them after listening to the hon. member for Davenport.

The bill before the House is entitled an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants. Then it says the act of Parliament which will come from this legislation will be called the Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act.

That is fine. If we could take the name of the legislation at its word it is an excellent piece of legislation, but we cannot. This does not cover what people would think it would cover if they read the title of the legislation, as the member for Davenport pointed out.

What does it cover? It covers all animals and plants listed under fauna in the appendix to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora signed on March 3, 1973 in Washington, D.C.

The legislation limits the protection of endangered species. It gives the government the power to enforce a law only on an endangered species listed in the appendix to the convention. In other words, it would enable an enforcement officer to go into somebody's house without a warrant, as is listed under section 487 of the Criminal Code, only if the enforcement officer believes that in that dwelling or in that truck or car there is a portion of an endangered species and only if it is listed in the appendix to the convention.

In other words, there are three species of seals listed in appendix III of the convention. But the Pine Martin is not listed. That is an endangered species in the province of Newfoundland. If portions of those three particular seals listed in appendix III to the convention are to be found on somebody's property then the enforcement officer has the power under the act, but if an endangered species in Canada is in somebody's possession it does not give the enforcement officer the same authority.

The legislation, as the member for Davenport has pointed out, is an opportunity for the Government of Canada to spread the net even further. It gives it the opportunity to be able to cover the endangered species. The animals are listed under fauna in the convention. It gives the government the opportunity to do what the Canadian Wildlife Service has wanted it to do for years. This is the vehicle. If the government saw fit, all it would have to do is go to Bill C–209 which is before this Chamber in the name of the hon. member for Davenport and incorporate it into this legislation. Then it would have a complete piece of legislation, not just a partial piece of legislation that to the objective viewer would seem rather limited and restricted in its character and certainly not as serving the wishes the Canadian Wildlife Service as I see them and as we should be serving those wishes.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I too want to voice my support for this bill and the work that the member for Davenport has done on it.

I want to refer in my remarks specifically to a scientific American journal of September 1989 entitled "Managing the Planet Earth". In this particular journal there is an article on threats to bio–diversity. As I was reading this a few months ago I noticed a paragraph which I think is extremely relevant to the bill we are discussing today. I would like to read directly from it:

> Wild plant and animal species also represent vast reservoirs of such potentially valuable products as fibres and petroleum substitutes. One example is the "babassu palm".

Then it goes on to explain that and says:

> Another striking example is the rosy periwinkle.

People sometimes wonder why we are so adamant in trying to preserve these wild plants. It continues:

> —rosy periwinkle is otherwise known as Catharanthus roseus, an inconspicuous little plant that originated in Madagascar. It yields two alkaloids, vinblastine and vincristine, that are extremely effective against Hodgkin's disease and acute lymphocytic leukemia. The income from these two substances alone exceeds $100 million a year.

On it goes. There is also a Thomas Eisner at Cornell University who has suggested, in addition to the compilation of biological inventories, that:

> —programs should be established to promote chemical prospecting around the world as part of the search for new products. The U.S. National Cancer Institute has begun to do just that: their natural products branch is currently screening some 10,000 substances a year for activity against cancer cells and the AIDS virus.

Sometimes when we talk about such bills in this House of Commons people out there are wondering what we are doing here spending all this time talking about preserving wildlife and wild plants, et cetera. The fact of the matter is that we are talking about something that as we preserve it we are also preserving human life. As we take this bill to committee, I think some time in our communication we should link it to how it affects the day-to-day health of our life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee C.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 12.30 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

NORM GARDNER

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, last Friday evening a masked man entered the Steeles Bakery in North York demanding money.

Angry because of the lack of cash in the till, the man grabbed the 70-year old female clerk. Metro councillor Norm Gardner was working in the back room of his family bakery when he heard the screaming.

Mr. Gardner, vice-chairman of the Metro Toronto Police Services Board, was granted a special protection-of-life permit to carry a handgun by the OPP five years ago. This was after his life was threatened.

Mr. Gardner drew his gun and ran into the store where he saw the 70-year old woman staggering and grabbing her chest. The masked robber thrust the cash drawer toward Mr. Gardner and started to run toward him shouting: "Go ahead and shoot me".

Mr. Gardner wisely fired a single shot into the man's leg to protect his staff and himself. The alleged robber fled and was arrested shortly thereafter.

I have known Norm Gardner who is a constituent of mine for over 15 years. He is an outstanding Canadian. He acted in a very responsible manner last Friday.

VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, the world is well aware of the plight of the Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong.

They are trapped in a refugee camp where the living conditions are horrible. They are trapped there by an agreement called the comprehensive plan of action. It is signed by many countries, including Canada. It says that the Vietnamese must return to Vietnam. For many of the families that is unthinkable and worse than death itself.

One of those families belongs to Luong Nguyen whose brother, Dai Duc, lives in my riding.

Luong Nguyen's family arrived in Hong Kong before the comprehensive plan of action was agreed upon. Their Winnipeg-based sponsorship was approved before the plan of action was signed.

As immigration lawyer David Matas put it: "It is gratuitous cruelty on such people to subject them to the plan after they arrived in Hong Kong". Moreover Matas adds, "These people have been duped by Canadian law into thinking they could have been sponsored" and that "the sponsors have equally been misled into believing a sponsorship was possible".

My plea to the government is simple. Help these people.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEER SERVICE MEDAL

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Sudbury complained about the awarding of the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea.

She complained that Korea veterans in Sudbury had received the medals but there had been no ceremony to mark the occasion. My question is: Why did she not organize a ceremony herself?

We all know that this was the advice all MPs received from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. He urged us in a letter to work with veterans associations and set up presentation ceremonies.

This has been done in a number of locations. There was, for instance, a wonderful ceremony in St. Catharines after five MPs, including a Liberal, worked together to put on a marvellous event.

I have a suggestion for the hon. member for Sudbury. If she is in Ottawa on Saturday, she could show up at Room 200, West Block at 2 p.m. The Minister of Veterans Affairs will be there presenting medals to about 100 members of the Korea Veterans Association. Furthermore, the minister has indicated that he is willing to attend presentation ceremonies anywhere and anytime, if his schedule permits.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, the eyes of the world are on South Africa today as, despite some fear and concern, a new course will be charted for all by those who are able to vote in the referendum on the political future of that country.

President F.W. De Klerk deserves much of the credit for bringing the people of South Africa to this point. His call for a referendum is courageous and shows his faith that the people of South Africa are ready to make a commitment to democracy and to equal rights for all regardless of race, creed or colour. That is something we take for granted here in Canada.

With voter turn-out high at this hour, the world can only watch, wait and hope that voters in South Africa will not look longingly back to a time when oppression was acceptable, but like the people of the Baltics, Ukraine, Poland and many other nations have done recently, will step bravely forward to take their full place in the family of democratic nations.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, later today women in Prince George will gather at the B.C. Supreme Court to protest the lack of protection for women by the court system.

A Prince George man who sexually assaulted his former common law wife was sentenced in B.C. Supreme Court to 18 months probation. It was the third time he had been convicted of assaulting her.

Last week, a man who attacked a woman with a metal pipe inflicting cuts and bruises to her head and shoulders and causing her to have part of a finger amputated, pleaded guilty to assault and was sentenced to 90 days in jail to be served on weekends.

I rise today to call on the Minister of Justice to support the call by my colleague for New Westminster—Burnaby for mandatory gender sensitivity training for judges at all levels so they can be aware of these problems.

Violence against women must end now.

DESJARDINS MOVEMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the Desjardins movement, which is going into venture capital this year in order to stimulate regional development and job creation. Desjardins Investment will set up regional development corporations in Quebec's 10 regions, in cooperation with the Quebec Pension Fund, the Quebec Solidarity Fund, the QFL Solidarity Fund and other partners. This is excellent news for Quebec's regions. President Claude Béland declared that Quebec does not lack venture capital but good investment projects.

On behalf of Abitibi-Témiscamingue, I want to thank the Desjardins movement.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, today is St. Patrick's Day. It is the anniversary of the death of St. Patrick and it is a day on which the Irish, and those who wish they were, celebrate being Irish.

Although historians are uncertain about precisely where St. Patrick was born, one thing is certain, St. Patrick was an Italian. I know that some members will say: "There he goes again. He has kissed some kind of Italian version of the Blarney Stone".

I have checked the facts and history records that St. Patrick was the son of Calpurnius, a Roman official in Britain. He was born about 389 A.D. and died around 461 A.D. History tells us that he was carried off by raiders at the age of 16 to pagan Ireland. It was there that he met his life-long friend, Shamus O'Nunziata, who travelled with St. Patrick to Rome in the year 432 when St. Patrick became a bishop.

Of course, the rest is history. O'Nunziata stayed in Rome, dropped the O from his name and St. Patrick returned to Ireland. Have you ever wondered why the Italian and Irish flags are virtually identical? Or why you see a shamrock on all Alfa Romeo cars? The moral of the story is that on St. Patrick's Day there is a little Irish in all of us.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I again rise to bring to the attention of the House the need to fully recognize for full veterans benefits the members of the Canadian Merchant Marine who served on the high seas during World War II.

My late uncle, Captain Ernest Shatford was one such man. From 1939 to 1945 he traversed the Atlantic Ocean many times, from Nova Scotia to Europe, from Newfoundland to the Caribbean. For six years, his life was on the line for Canada and for Canadians. Yet he died two years ago this week ineligible for long-term care in a veterans hospital.

Canada's merchant marine veterans should be eligible for all veterans benefits including full benefits under the Veterans Independence Program.

There should be a book of remembrance with the names of Canada's merchant mariners who gave their lives in the cause of Canada.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs should use his good office on behalf of the government of Canada to encourage the construction of a suitable memorial to honour the memory of Canada's merchant seamen.

These suggestions should not only be accepted by the government but accepted and implemented as soon as possible.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE ROGER LEMELIN

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, Roger Lemelin is no more. Perhaps better than anyone else, he depicted our social history. It was therefore very natural for the people to recognize themselves in his books and television series.

• (1410)

A man of letters, he won all the awards and was the first writer from outside France to sit on the jury for the Goncourt Prize.

A man of action, he skilfully directed America's largest French-language daily for 10 years.

Roger Lemelin was also a great patriot. In his last editorial in La Presse, published in 1981, the author of the Plouffe family series wrote that in taking his positions, he always wanted a stronger, more united Canada where a French Quebec, with its wonderful distinctness, could enjoy the riches of the vast territory of Canada while strengthening its cultural identity as a young nation.

He told members of the Canadian Press in Toronto on May 2, 1979 that never did he think that he would stop being French and that he had fought for French culture all his life. "I am glad to be a French Canadian," he said.

On behalf of my party and myself and, I am sure, all members of this House, I would like to express to his widow and his whole family our admiration and our deeply felt condolences.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, today UCO Petroleum has announced its intention to open 19 retail outlets in Ontario for the sale of gasohol, an environmentally friendly alternative to gasoline.

Gasohol is made by blending 10 per cent ethanol with 90 per cent gasoline. It actually produces more octane to car engines while producing less of the emissions that cause things like acid rain and the greenhouse effect.

I rise to congratulate UCO Petroleum and also the Minister of Finance. Today's announcement comes as a direct result of the federal government's budget announcement to remove the federal excise tax on ethanol and methanol in blended fuels.

This is environmental, economic and agricultural leadership on the part of UCO Petroleum and the government. I am sure all members of the House will add their encouragement and support of gasohol, Canada's future fuel.

BANK OF COMMERCE

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, 22 women in Powell River, British Columbia, are on strike against the Bank of Commerce. The Bank of Commerce runs its Powell River branch with strike-breakers brought from Vancouver Island every day.

This situation is grossly unfair. The bank does not have to bargain in good faith with these women. As a matter of fact, the bank would rather crush these women in their strike as an example to their other employees.

As a result, organized labour in the province of British Columbia is planning to carry out a province-wide boycott against the Bank of Commerce in order to carry the message of these women and the plight of these women to the entire province.

This is completely unnecessary. If the Minister of Labour would use his good offices to try and get both parties back to the bargaining table to find a solution to this, rather than the continued harassment and exploitation of these women by an organization that has assets of tens of billions of dollars and annual profits of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, last week three historical federal judicial appointments were announced, all of them women. The number of women in the federally appointed judiciary has increased steadily from 37 in 1984 to 100 in 1992.

On March 12 Canada named Madam Justice Catherine Anne Fraser as Chief Justice of Alberta and Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal for the Northwest Territories, a first for a woman.

Madam Justice Karen M. Weiler and Madam Justice Rosalie S. Abella both were appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal. Madam Justice Abella is the 100th woman currently serving on the bench here in Canada. I offer my congratulations to all three.

Since this government has come into office, there has been an increase of 100 per cent in the appointment of women to agencies, to boards, to commissions, all in decision-making positions.

COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): I would like to rise in defence of the community newspapers in this country.

As a result of the budget the government announced that it would be contributing some money toward making sure that newspapers did not have to pay the full postal increase in one year. Instead, the government announced that that increase would be over a two-year period. Many newspapers have drastically increased the rate they are charging people who have these newspapers mailed to them. Many newspapers are still threatened with extinction as a result of the government's policy.

Again I call upon the government to review the increases that are going to community newspapers to make sure they can afford to exist in the future and to make sure they can afford to get their information out to all Canadians.

FÉDÉRATION DES COMMUNAUTÉS FRANCOPHONES ET ACADIENNE DU CANADA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada announced yesterday that it was tired of taking a back seat to everybody else in the debate on the Constitution and language issues. According to federation representatives, although they represented one million people across Canada, they were treated as though they did not exist.

Critical of the performance of the Department of the Secretary of State and the Department of Employment and Immigration, and representing minority groups in their respective provinces, the federation now demands a meeting with the Prime Minister, who never bothered to meet them since he was elected in 1984. Its very survival is threatened by budget cuts. Humiliated by this denial of its status as a full-fledged participant in the constitutional debate, the federation has the impression that linguistic duality is not a major item on the present government's agenda.

I ask the Prime Minister to remember his responsibilities and to have a meeting as soon as possible with the representatives of official-language minority groups. Time is running out.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the French and the Irish have a lot in common by association, so I know the Speaker will indulge me if I wish top o' the morning to the Prime Minister, who is an Irishman by birth as I am also, and Mr. O'Nunziata, O'Clancy and others who are Irish by birth or the best of the Irish by choice.

I actually have a question for the Prime Minister. It deals with the tragedy of the 700,000 Canadian children who are getting their food at food banks every year.

Through their seven and a half years in government, the Prime Minister and his colleagues have pursued economic and social policies which have resulted in the tragic scene of two million Canadians lining up at food banks every year. Nobody, including nobody in the Conservative Party, wants to have this tragic situation.

The problem we have is in trying to understand why the Prime Minister persists in following the same economic and social policies which created this sad situation.

Can the Prime Minister explain why he continues on a course of action which has led to this national disgrace of Canadian children lining up at food banks?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I explained yesterday that no one in this House is happy with the kind of situation we are facing today.

However, I believe we must deal with this situation as good managers, and in fact, the government as a whole allocates about $15 billion annually to be used, directly or indirectly, to help children.

It is also true that in the budget, we specifically targeted this group when we decided to add $2 billion, spread over a five-year period, to provide people on low incomes with some relief and help them improve their situation eventually.

I also said that very shortly I would announce a series of measures to provide help as well for a particular group of young people, reffered to as children at risk.

These measures—and here I agree with the hon. member—will not deal with all problems overnight, but this government is intent on dealing with these concerns according to its ability to pay.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, this is the same minister who just a few weeks ago cut all national day care programs, leaving children and their parents without any hope.

The number of food banks has increased from 1 to 292 during the past decade. This is not a statistic, but the sad truth. Today in Canada, we have children who depend on food banks for their meals. Even in a period of economic growth, there is a wide gap between rich and poor in this country.

When will the Prime Minister change his economic and social policies which have been a tragedy for Canadian children?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am sorely tempted to compare the present situation with the recession in 1982. However, I can inform the hon. member for Hamilton East that the Prime Minister, the cabinet and the government had the courage to make certain choices and define certain policies. If 10 years ago, her government had had the courage to make political choices that would have allowed Canadians to make certain decisions today, we would not have had this $400 billion debt we inherited from her government, which prevents us from financing all the programs we feel are necessary. Managing for tomorrow's generation means managing now.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I read in the paper yesterday that the Prime Minister spends almost $1 million a year on press clippings.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, who has been in office seven and a half years during periods of strong economic growth world wide, why he is hiding behind the issue of the recession when in fact the unbelievable increase in the number of children eating at food banks did not just occur during the recession, it occurred during the life of this government.

Does the Prime Minister understand that his policies have created an underclass of Canadians which is growing in bad times and in good?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I tell my hon. friend what I am sure she knows, that her prefatory remarks are false in regard to expenditures on my behalf.

My hon. friend says: "I read it in the paper". That does not mean it is true. It is a false statement.

With regard to the serious question my hon. friend raises, when we were sworn into office in 1984–85 the total federal government spending record on programs for children was $6.7 billion. That has now increased to $9.5 billion, an annual increase of 5.2 per cent even though the cost of all program increases was 3.9 per cent.

The government has consistently spent more, either than the average of inflation or the average increase of all programs, on children and on children's programs than on anything else, with the possible exception of the amount we have expended on natives which have increased even more substantially than the numbers I have given my hon. friend.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has just indicated, I think properly, that we had to make some fundamental decisions in respect of lessening the burden on our children today. That means making sure we hand over to them an economy that is not burdened down even further by a mountain of debt so that they are able to make their own priorities and build their own lives.

Meanwhile the government will continue to expend greater and greater amounts of money to help children and families in need because that of course is a fundamental obligation of this House and of all governments.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Hidden away in yesterday's report on food banks is the startling fact that 450,000 Canadians are living together in total poverty in traditional two parent families. These same families are excluded from any new cash under the child benefit package. Thousands of these families run out of money each month and their children are forced to line up at food banks.

Why is it that these children want to save Canada when Canada refuses to save them?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I explained that to the same member yesterday. We are doing as much as we can in whatever capacity we have to do something. We have already put $15 billion into various programs.

I know that when we talk about resources it does not interest the Liberal Party, it never did. That is why today we have to put 35 per cent of our revenue on the debt payment. It is a reality.

We have addressed a package in the budget to those low income workers who do not benefit from the package of benefits given to those who are social recipients. The member knows that very well.

This program covers things like transportation, school and many other costs that are paid to social beneficiaries and not to those we are targeting.

That is the answer and he knows that very well.

I just want him to tell Canadians, as I do, that we are doing the best we can. We will continue to do that, but with the help of all Canadians maybe some day the food banks will all disappear.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The minister has happily defended the fact that the government is trying its best. In the meantime, hundreds of thousands of Canadians are affected each month by their inability to feed themselves. Since this government took office the number of food banks has risen from 1 to 292.

Does this government not realize that people prefer to work than to stand in line for their daily bread and butter? What are the civic measures this government is willing to present to Canadians to combat the lack of food for so many hundreds of thousands of families across this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in the package that we will be presenting soon, we will try to deal more specifically with the children at risk in many different ways.

What we are calling for today, and I am sure the member will agree with it, is that all volunteers in this country, organizations and NGOs, the provinces, the municipalities, the federal level, put all their energies and resources together to help the most Canadians we can to avoid the cruel reality the hon. member is talking about. He knows very well that we must have all levels of government involved. However, it is not possible to do something if we do not improve the economy of this country in a way that it will provide the resources that we can give to Canadians.

This is the simple position that I have. Once again I am ready to work with all Canadians to do that.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Minister for International Trade or his substitute a question surrounding the government's secrecy and fear over the negotiations on the North American free trade agreement.

The Mexican Senate has had a lengthy briefing on the draft bracketed agreement. The U.S. Congress has had a briefing and the documents are available to them. Yet this government is suggesting that before we get a briefing, we have to sign a statement of confidentiality that would have even frozen Igor Gouzenko from opening his mouth.

I want to know why is it that this government demands confidentiality and rules on us that are far more strict than those applied to Mexico or the United States. What is it hiding?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is asking for a briefing on the negotiations.

He has not had the briefing but he is already opposed to it. Maybe if we give him another briefing he will be in favour. The fact of the matter is that this has been widely publicized, as my hon. friend knows. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says there is a formal briefing on Thursday.

My hon. friend spends a lot of his time on the phone to the Mexicans and the Americans. He has lots of friends down there.

Mr. Angus: At least he gets through.

Mr. Brewin: They answer his calls.

Mr. Mulroney: The three parties have matters of substance they wish to resolve. If those questions are resolved, presumably there will be an agreement in principle that my hon. friend will perhaps upon reflection want to vigorously support.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, at least I get through on the phone.

I phoned the Mexican Senate. They were thoroughly briefed. They even sent me a report on the document. The U.S. Congress has had a briefing. They are discussing it. All we get is bafflegab, delay and secrecy from this government. As a matter of fact, the Mexican press got a briefing on the draft bracketed agreement.

I want to ask this question as one Irishman to another. Why is it that we get the blarney stone and they get the facts?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Well, the Mexicans had the choice of the Blarney stone or Barrett and they took the stone.

• (1430)

My hon. friend says that he called the Mexican Senate and they took his call. Hell, they would do that here.

I should tell my hon. friend that the President of Mexico called me at just about two o'clock.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: What did he say?

Mr. Mulroney: They are yelling "what did he say". He said, among other things, happy St. Patrick's Day and give my love to Barrett.

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today all five of Canada's major chartered banks made it official. Because of a series of increases in the Bank of Canada rate, all of them are raising their interest rates on mortgages by up to three-quarters of a point and the housing sector is just starting to get off the ground.

Does the Minister of Finance not realize that this new high interest rate policy will choke off any recovery in housing, or in the economy as a whole for that matter? Why will the minister and the Bank of Canada not backtrack on this new, unnecessary high interest rate policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that it is market forces that are having upward pressure on the interest rates.

I remind the hon. member that we are still experiencing the lowest interest rates in 20 years. For example, while the five-year mortgage rate is, I believe, at 9.5 per cent or 9.75 per cent, 10 years ago in 1982 the five-year mortgage rate was 19.5 per cent. I think that reflects a difference in the confidence in a Conservative regime versus a Liberal regime.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister should recognize, as Canadians do, that interest rates have been going back up over the past several weeks.

Last month the government introduced policies to lower down payments and allow the use of RRSP funds for the purchase of homes. Now the government is putting the benefits of these measures at risk with these higher interest rates. Why does the government now want to effectively cancel these measures? Why is the government sabotaging its own policies supposedly aimed at helping this economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member recognized the fact that the government has initiated some very important proposals to help stimulate the housing sector. That has resulted in an increase of housing sales of about 60 per cent over last month and over 17.2 per cent on the basis of a year ago. So I think that is good news.

It is also to fair to say that the market pressures and the volatility that is in the financial markets these days is something that we are all concerned about. I think, to some extent, it casts a reflection on the political uncertainty arising from the constitutional issue.

I think all hon. members would hope that we would be able to make progress in that because that would do a lot to improve the confidence in the financial markets and the over-all economic outlook for Canada.

POVERTY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, a new Statistics Canada report puts a human face to the line-ups at the food banks; 40 per cent are children—700,000 children—10 per cent are college graduates and 22 per cent are high school graduates. That is the hungry human face in the lines at the food banks.

My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There is something dreadfully wrong here. Food banks are the only growth industry in this country. I ask the minister to stop talking about incentives for people to go to work. I want him to understand that hunger is an incentive. Will he please tell us why his government is not prepared to help these children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to provide my hon. friend with a fact. My hon. friend refers to this as a growth industry. If that were the case, obviously that would be very, very troubling. Any increase of itself is worrying. My friend should know that there were 576,000 fewer low income Canadians in 1990 than in 1984 and 123,000 fewer low income children. The country has made some very substantial progress. The numbers are going the right way although obviously during the recession we have been knocked back again.

I point out to my hon. friend that we have made very substantial progress in these areas, particularly in respect of children, and we continue to devote the energies and the interests of the government toward that end.

Witness, for example, the decision of the minister of health to focus more and more of the government's resources on children at risk and children in poverty, as announced by the Minister of Finance in the last budget. That I think is an important contribution toward social justice and fairness in Canada.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister's response, but the fact of the matter is that his government has now categorized poor children into the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. That is the direction of his government. We now have 700,000 hungry children in line-ups at food banks. That is the record of his government.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. They have a half million dollars advertising campaign in Canadian papers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member put her question, please?

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is this. Why is his government advertising to the tune of half a million dollars with ads saying their new benefits are new, they are simpler, they are fairer? They sound like an advertisement for a new detergent. Why are they wasting half a million dollars on ad campaigns instead of feeding the hungry in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we of course have done no such thing. Nor do we take any joy at all in any disparities that emerge in our society, particularly as they impact children.

I have already indicated to my hon. friend and the statistics are there—she may want to examine them—that Canada has made very considerable progress.

I point out an analysis that one of our leading journalists did that may interest her and put it in some perspective: "The result is there is a substantial difference between the 1961 and the 1991 definitions of poverty. In 1961 StatsCan classified as low income any family of three with an annual income of less than $3,000. By our calculations $3,000 in 1961 dollars is equivalent to $14,969 in 1990. Yet the StatsCan low income cut-off for a family of three living in a big city in 1990 was $24,255. The poverty line for a three person household developed by the Canadian Council on Social Development was $25,000".

An hon. member: Time.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Mulroney: What I am saying to my hon. friend is that both in relative terms and in real terms the numbers of working poor and the numbers of children under the poverty line have diminished, even though the poverty line has increased and that the—

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Somehow long preambles bring long answers.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has just referred to a confidential briefing for two opposition MPs on the North American free trade agreement. Last year the all-party committee on external affairs and international trade stated categorically: "It is critically important that the Canadian people be kept regularly and fully informed about the course and the substance of the government's trade negotiations with Mexico and the United States".

How can Canadians decide if this government is furthering our national interest in these negotiations when it refuses to make clear its position? Why does the government refuse to keep Canadians informed about the course and the substance of these negotiations as was recommended by the all-party committee?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that throughout all of these negotiations the international trade advisory committees have been operating. The SAGITs have been operating and a very substantial group of Canadian businessmen and women have been involved in these negotiations very deeply, indeed. They have been a great help to us in terms of promoting this free trade agreement.

• (1440)

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that consultations between business groups and, indeed, provincial governments is a far cry from keeping Canadians regularly and fully informed, as urged by the all-party committee.

What is this government's position on the North American free trade negotiations, on the dispute settlement mechanism, on content requirements, on a social and environmental charter? These are concrete issues that demand concrete answers from this government. Canadians have a right to know—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question has been asked.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that in any negotiations of this kind the general Canadian position is very clear. It is exactly the same thing here as it was in the free trade agreement with the United States. We want to do things that benefit the Canadian people. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

The hon. member knows very well that you do not negotiate a trade agreement in public. That would give away the Canadian position and put us behind the barrel. We believe we are doing a good job.

FORESTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Forestry on this St. Patrick's day.

Before the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement began there was under the GATT system free entry for a very large percentage of lumber exports going into the United States. Now under the FTA, as the minister will know, softwood products from B.C., for example, face an import tariff of about 29.48 per cent. Since the situation is a direct result of the FTA, will the minister tell us why his government does not intend to use the Employment Support Act of 1971 to support displaced workers and companies under the present situation.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is badly informed.

The countervail duty provision that was captured in the memorandum of understanding preceded the free trade agreement. It is actually a benefit to us to have a free trade agreement because it adds to the protection we have under GATT. Nothing has changed there. An appeal has been launched with GATT.

The problem with GATT is that any decision by a GATT panel is not binding. There is a decision of a bilateral, independent dispute mechanism and a panel associated with that will be binding. The free trade agreement will be the instrument that will be used to vindicate our position.

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT ACT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I may suggest to the minister who just spoke that this will be an interim measure. There were 21,944 Canadian jobs saved as a result of the Employment Support Act of 1971. The cost of saving each job was only $903.77.

Last Tuesday the minister of industry said that this act was being considered. Last Thursday the minister for small business said that the act was not going to be considered. We know that there are applications in the minister's office waiting for the hearing.

My question is to the Solicitor General. Will he please advise his colleagues that they do not have the luxury of choosing whether to use the act or not to use the act.

They must use the legislation in place. How long will it take to have these applications heard and how long will it take to have the 25,000 jobs in the softwood lumber industry in Canada protected?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): The question is a bit confusing. In 1971 when this act was used we did not have the same protection under GATT. Nor did we have a free trade agreement with an independent judicial tribunal made up of Canadian and American adjudicators who will be dealing with this issue.

I also want to point out to my friend that what we have is a preliminary hearing or a preliminary determination and that there are two more steps in the current round of assessing the legitimacy of the countervail duty actions, after which we will have access to article 19 of the free trade agreement. This is the best protection that we could possibly have in the situation.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, the minister gave contradictory answers on the subject of breast implants, saying on the one hand that the documents were available but on the other that some were secret. Can the minister assure Canadian women that if the documents are available, he will make them public today?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I much appreciate the question raised by the hon. member for Halifax, since I am asking for permission to table in the House a letter that I sent today to the chair of the House committee on the Status of Women, in which I tell her that we will make available to the committee 10,000 pages of documents on past or present studies done by the department or other bodies that we are asking the committee to consider and to be able to use all the required information, as I said yesterday, since neither I nor the department has anything to hide. This again should reassure women about breast implants.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his response.

I would ask if he would also provide to this House a compendium of all the studies on breast implants in the possession of his department so that those could be looked at as well to ensure, as he has said today, that the women of Canada who wish to have breast implants can then make an informed consent.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, all those documents that I released or pointed out to the committee exist today are documents which I can produce.

Of course, we have documents which are under what we call commercial confidentiality. If the member wants through the Department of National Health and Welfare to address any kind of request to the companies and they agree to release the documents, of course it will be a pleasure to do that.

CANADA 125 CORPORATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Canadians will be shocked to learn that this government has found another $30 million, which makes a total of $50 million, for the Canada 125 Corporation, none of which is allocated for community groups to celebrate Canada's 125th birthday.

In view of the minister's and the government's promised fiscal restraint, will the minister explain why this inefficient private corporation is accountable to no one, received an extra $30 million, a 150 per cent increase, when the same moneys would have paid for 10 years of the Court Challenges Program or five years of co-op housing?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, it has always been agreed with the Canada 125 Corporation, a private corporation subsidized by the federal government, that it would have a budget of $50 million: $12 million this year, $18 million for the next fiscal year and the rest for the third year.

The corporation works with a board of directors that well represents all of Canada. It has already approved about 30 projects showing what Canadians have done in the past 125 years. I think that it works very well and I and the government are working with the corporation.

JUDGES' SALARIES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister or his Irish friend on his right, the Minister of Finance.

Will he confirm that his government will add a cost of living allowance to the salaries of Canadian judges which I calculate will cost $10 million additional next year? Will he tell the House why he is increasing the wages of judges who already make over $147,000 per year when, out of the same moneys, the government could fund a Court Challenges Program for five years? Does his government have any priorities?

• (1450)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe that question anticipates an Order of the Day as the Judges Act is currently before the House.

NATIONAL DRUG STRATEGY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The National Drug Strategy expires at the end of March. Will the government be renewing it and when will we know?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the member for the very intelligent question, Madam Speaker. A very brief question and the answer will be brief.

We are working on the file on the drug strategy and I am looking forward to being able to make an announcement soon.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Because of his government's economic policies, Montreal faces losing another 250 jobs, this time at CP Rail. More than 1,000 jobs were eliminated in the railway sector since the beginning of this year, in a city where one out of every two adults is out of work.

When will the government start taking poverty in Montreal seriously and implement a genuine recovery plan to provide real jobs for people in Montreal who really need them?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must know that recently the federal government announced a number of agreements on industrial development and tourism, especially for the Montreal area. We are now negotiating a very substantial announcement for the Montreal area with the Government of Quebec.

We have had astonishing results with our programs for east and southwest Montreal. In fact, the federal government has done a great deal for the Montreal area and intends to go on doing so in order to meet the specific needs of Montreal's community.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, the minister makes announcements but ignores the fact that every day we read announcements that hundreds more jobs will be lost in Montreal.

[English]

In only two years, 28 per cent of the jobs in the Montreal manufacturing sector have been lost. The real question is when are you going to introduce a policy that really creates jobs and not just gunsmoke, saying that you are announcing a program when every day we are losing jobs? When are you going to announce a real program?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would appreciate if, with honesty, the member would say all the jobs which were created in Montreal. He knows very well that in the aerospace industry, the telecommunications industry, the pharmaceutical industry and in many other sectors we have created a lot of jobs in Montreal. I know very well that it is not very interesting for the opposition to say this government works well in Montreal.

HISTORICAL SITES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Preston area of Nova Scotia dates as the oldest permanent black settlement in Canada with the East Lake section of that community being the most probable terminal for the black underground railroad. Yet, this very site has now been designated as a regional garbage dump, outraging both black and non-black Nova Scotians.

Will the Prime Minister ask officials from Parks Canada Historical Sites to immediately assess the site and have it recognized and protected as a site of national historical significance?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as you know, we have a National Historic Sites Board whose responsibility it is to advise the Minister of the Environment and through the Minister of the Environment, Parks Canada, with respect to the designation of all historic sites, regardless of where they may be located in Canada. Certainly, on behalf of the hon. member, I will draw his concern to the attention of the historic sites board.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, almost more than any other member of the front bench, is fully aware that the establishment of a garbage dump in a black community on a historically significant site will push back race relations in the province of Nova Scotia at least a decade.

What role is the Prime Minister or his ministers prepared to play to ensure that this issue does not further aggravate the already delicate state of race relations in the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the site in question is located within very close proximity of the metropolitan authority which has the responsibility for municipal government in that area. There may well be a possibility that this does indeed fall into their jurisdiction.

In essence, I would repeat the answer I gave just a moment ago, that certainly the federal government through the National Historic Sites Board has a very keen interest in any area of potential national historical significance.

I have spent most of my life as an historian and I am very much aware of that. As I said before, I will ensure that the matter is brought to the attention of the National Historic Sites Board.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Ottawa Citizen reports today that a former member of the Immigration and Refugee Board claims that "the Immigration and Refugee Board has become a wretched monster that is out of control".

Canada, as a signatory to the UN Convention on the Protection of Refugees, agreed that all persons with a well-founded fear of persecution have a right to protection from forced return to their country. Yet, Canada's over-all acceptance rate for refugee claimants went down from 76 per cent in 1989 to 64 per cent in 1991.

Will the minister, in view of many recent criticisms of the IRB, respond to the request of the Canadian Council for Refugees by appointing an independent, impartial investigation of its treatment of people claiming asylum in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not. I intend rather to make sure that the IRB can continue its good work on behalf of Canadians.

No country in the world has a better record than Canada in protecting genuine refugees. If the hon. member is concerned about the percentage, I remind him that Canada welcomed and gave protection to over 38,000 people last year. No country in the world equals that record. I think that we as Canadians can be proud of that.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): My question is whether the minister is trying to discontinue that record.

I have a further supplementary. Will the minister propose, as has been much asked for publicly, amendments to the Immigration Act to provide for a review of board decisions that are challenged?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Board decisions can now be challenged by appeal with leave to the Federal Court of Canada. That system is working well. But I have received representations from different groups. As we speak, my department is looking at ways of trying to improve the refugee determination system. Once we have conducted that review and consulted with members, we can then seize the government of proposals and make decisions at that time.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Recently, the Minister of Justice received a letter from Mrs. Bertha Wilson, a retired judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in which Mrs. Wilson expressed her consternation at the Conservative Government's decision to abolish the Court Challenges Program. She said the program was praiseworthy, imaginative and well managed.

At a time when Canadians are rethinking their Constitutional future, why should the government abolish a program that was seen as essential to making the courts accessible for women, aboriginal people, racial minorities, language and ethnic groups—all of whom know rights are an illusion unless they can go to court to defend those rights? How will the Prime Minister bring this program back?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): I agree with everything the hon. member said, Madam Speaker. This program was very beneficial, but after nearly 300 cases, according to my information, we have now created a certain body of jurisprudence. That is what the program was for, and it was not necessarily meant to be in place for another 10 years.

• (1500)

[English]

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Justice. It also concerns the Court Challenges Program.

The minister has suggested that this kind of program could be handled by the government itself. In this case the government would find itself challenging and defending the law at the same time. This would obviously be a conflict of interest for the government.

How exactly does the minister propose to deal with this problem?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, as I said, the Court Challenges Program was an excellent program, a made in Canada initiative, to really examine the laws for their fairness, the equality in language laws that were in place. It has done that very fairly. But, after almost 300 cases of jurisprudence that have been established, one would imagine that we now have a significant volume of jurisprudence.

Whether a program must go on forever should be determined now either by other jurisdictions which have a responsibility, or by the private sector, if there is such an interest.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): The federal government is pulling out of the Fraser River debris control program at the same time it is hosting in Vancouver the Environment '92 conference and at the same time it plans to announce the Fraser River Basin Protection Program agreement between the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

My question is to the parliamentary secretary for the environment. How can the government rationalize abandoning this critical debris control program in less than two weeks in light of its anticipated Fraser River protection program announcement?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as you know, the federal government announced in one of approximately 50 initiatives under the green plan, that it would be providing $100 million to the clean-up of the Fraser River several months ago.

I understand that there may be an additional announcement, although it does not come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Environment, during the course of the next few days but I think you can appreciate, Madam Speaker, that it would never be politically wise for a parliamentary secretary to upstage any minister in making such an announcement.

POINT OF ORDER

REPLY IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, during Question Period I raised a question with reference to judges' salaries as opposed to cutting the Court Challenges Program, the increase in salaries versus the cutting.

The minister stood up and said he could not answer the question because there was a bill before the House of Commons.

I would like clarification on this matter. I draw your attention to Beauchesne's, page 132, of the fifth edition, and I quote:

> (12) Questions should not anticipate a debate scheduled for the day, but should be reserved for the debate.

Likewise, in the new edition of Beauchesne's, the sixth edition, page 121, it states:

> (12) Questions should not anticipate a debate scheduled for the day, but should be reserved for the debate.

We are not debating the judges' salary bill today. We are debating an environmental bill. Does that mean we cannot ask questions on the general environment, that we cannot ask questions on pensions because there is a pension bill somewhere in the works of the House of Commons?

Point of Order

With respect, Madam Speaker, I would like a ruling on this. I believe that the minister was wrong and that he should have answered my question. He used the wrong way of ducking a good question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we can certainly have a debate about whether that was a good question or not.

Quite frankly, the provisions of Beauchesne's and the experience of the House is that when a bill is before the House, it will come up for debate and that is the proper time for members on all sides to express their opinion and to vote on it.

The use of Question Period to engage in debate which can merely be repetition of what will come later while the bill is under discussion is an abuse of Question Period.

Finally I would remind the hon. member that there is no requirement that any question be answered. So the point of order—

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, it is also out of order to shout down the person trying to address the Chair.

There is no requirement that in fact an answer be provided to any question. Therefore, it is not in order to raise as a point of order an objection to the answer to a question that he received during Question Period. He may not have liked the answer but that is the way it goes. You do not always get the answer you want.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the government House leader, the fact of the matter is that he did seek to hide behind procedure or, to put it more charitably, use a procedural argument in order not to answer the question of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

If he is able to do that without the Chair saying something to the contrary then that would set, in my judgment and I am sure the judgment of many other members, a very new precedent, a very new rule with respect to Question Period. To this point the rules are quite clear that questions cannot anticipate an Order of the Day.

Point of Order

I would ask you, Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and to the minister.

At that point in time in Question Period when the minister answered that the subject would be coming up for debate, as you know at any time the government can change whatever is being—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The government can change the Order of the Day. The Speaker could not know whether this had been changed for later on this afternoon so I could not in any way judge the hon. minister's answer.

On the other hand as the minister did say, and on this point I think we will all agree, a minister is not obliged to answer a question. But I do agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and with the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam that Beauchesne's does say that when it is something that is to be debated later on in the same day, but I could not presume what would happen at the time.

I think tomorrow will be another day for Question Period. I would like us to proceed with the business before the House.

Mr. Murphy: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this on the same point of order?

Mr. Murphy: Yes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that all that can be said about it right now has been said.

Some hon. members: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I beg your pardon. I do not understand, even though this is St. Patrick's Day, the reason to scream at the Speaker. I will not allow this in the House. My respect for this House and for this institution is obviously higher than what some members would like it to be.

I will listen to the hon. member for Churchill, but I do hope that he will keep his voice down.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I apologize for shouting, but you had cut off debate. I think this is a very important item and I had stood quietly three times previously on it. In your last intervention you said that there was no way of knowing what was coming up today in debate.

• (1510)

In fact prior to the lunch break a House order was passed saying that we would be dealing with third reading of Bill C-13 on the environment. That was a House order agreed to by all the parties.

We knew that the question raised by the member from B.C. was completely in order. We know what questions we are going to ask during Question Period. We know what the issues of debate were. The member had a completely appropriate question. He made a request, which was to have the Speaker rule on whether or not an issue could be raised in the House. Just because there is a bill which may come up one month, two months or three months hence—

Mr. Althouse: Or never.

Mr. Murphy: —or never, as my colleague from Mackenzie said, does not mean that the minister can refuse to answer a question.

We have to be in a position to be able to ask questions. Just because there may be legislation or may not be legislation before this House should not prevent that from happening.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am quite ready to listen to members all afternoon if they want. What I do not understand from the hon. member for Churchill is that I did agree with him. I did say that Beauchesne's says that we cannot anticipate something which will be debated today. I admitted not knowing what was the subject to be debated after the vote this afternoon. I do apologize. I was not in front of my television set, nor was I in the House of Commons, when the motion was passed earlier today. I had some other business to attend to.

I did agree with the hon. member. I really do not see where we are going now and what are the benefits of going on with this point of order. I would much rather the House proceed with the vote as it is expected and then we go on to debate the third reading of Bill C-13.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to your intervention. I concur that you have agreed with my colleagues from the New Democratic Party.

From time to time all of us may make a mistake, but I do want to raise with the Chair for possible reflection at another time that the question put by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam was a supplementary question, and the supplementary question I believe was on an entirely different matter as I understood it.

Mr. Waddell: No.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member says no, but perhaps the Chair might want to take that under advisement to see whether or not that was the actual case.

In terms of asking questions on the subject matter which may or may not be before the House, I would hope that the Chair would always give the benefit of the doubt in circumstances such as that to the questioner in that particular case.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I would just like to say that you have done an admirable job of pointing out where you yourself were in error, and we all respect you for having done that.

What we are seeking is some statement on your part about the extent to which the government House leader was in error in wrongly citing this procedure as a reason for not answering the question.

You said that the minister is not obliged to answer the question. That is true, but the minister is obliged to either not answer the question or, if he wants to give a reason for not answering the question, to give a reason that is true to the rules of the House and not something which distorts the rules of the House. That is what we want the Chair to say.

Until the Chair says that, that particular sentence by the government House leader stands and stands as a bad precedent and a precedent which distorts the rules of the House. We want the Chair to say otherwise, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not see why this hon. member would raise his voice to me.

Mr. Blaikie: Don't take it personally.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not see what mistake I have made apart from not knowing that a motion had been passed earlier this day. Even at that, the government could have changed its mind.

An hon. member: But there was a mistake.

Madam Deputy Speaker: You may not agree with the minister's answer and that is the hon. member's prerogative. I fully agree with that, but I did give the benefit of the doubt to the member, as the hon. member was suggesting, and I think that now we should proceed.

This point of order has to end at some point. There is nothing more that the Speaker can do at this time.

An hon. member: A point of order—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have just said that to me this point of order has now been listened to very thoroughly and completely and there is no way that I can change anything at this time.

An hon. member: Let's go to the question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we will now go to the question.

An hon. member: Point of order—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would really ask that the hon. member find another way of wanting me to change whatever decision I have taken, which is no decision except to go to the question.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am listening to you.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I appreciate that you want to get on with House business and I appreciate that you heard my point of order. As you know, we are not yelling and so on. We both appreciate that the Speaker is the servant of the House.

We are concerned with some perhaps bad procedure. We think that the minister could simply have said: I am not going to answer your question or some other answer, but instead he raised a technical point that we think is against the orders of the House.

We would ask the Chair and other members of the House to reflect on that, and I will raise this again tomorrow after Question Privilege as a matter of privilege.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I do appreciate the fact that he realizes that the Speaker cannot be held responsible for answers that are being made nor for questions that are being posed in this House.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the motions at report stage of Bill C-13, an act to establish a Federal Environment Assessment Process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gagliano: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Léonard on a point of order.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I think that you will find unanimous consent to apply the result of the vote we have just taken to Motions Nos. 18, 19, 29, 31, 32 and 33.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Comuzzi: Madam Speaker, I apologize to the Chair for being late for the vote, but had I been here I would have voted with my colleagues on this side.

Mr. Walker: I make the same apology, Madam Speaker. I would have voted with my party also.

Madam Deputy Speaker: So those two votes can be added on.

[Translation]

Mr. Berger: Never two without three. I join my colleagues and make the same point.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I missed the original vote, for which I apologize. I wonder if I could have my vote recorded with the other members of my party with respect to the remaining votes which are being applied.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The next vote is on Motion No. 18, standing in the name of Mr. Caccia.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The next vote is on Motion No. 34, standing in the name of Mr. Charest.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment) moved:

Motion No. 34.

That Bill C-13 be amended by adding immediately after line 40 at page 49 the following new clause:

"72. (1) Five years after the coming into force of this section, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act shall be undertaken by the Minister.

(2) The Minister shall, within one year after a review is undertaken pursuant to subsection (1) or within such further time as the House of Commons may authorize, submit a report on the review to Parliament including a statement of any changes the Minister recommends."

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would all those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would all those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in at report stage.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? According to order made earlier today, now.

Mr. Andre (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Debate. The hon. member for Brandon–Souris.

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Madam Speaker, point of order. This afternoon, during Oral Question Period, I referred to a list of documents that the department is making available on breast implants. With leave of the House, I would like to table these documents here in the House, as I indicated during Oral Question Period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Debate. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, let me express, once again, my regret for the error I made earlier during Question Period when I referred to you as Mr. Speaker. That was simply due to my failure to look at the Chair.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That was not the most difficult part of my day, I can assure you.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): It is an honour and privilege to be able to begin third reading debate on Bill C–13. Once again I would like to begin by expressing the regret of the Minister of the Environment that his previously determined schedule prevented him from being present on this very important and happy occasion. As you know he is participating at this moment in very important meetings in Vancouver with respect to the proceedings of Globe '92, a significant international environmental conference. He is also meeting with his colleagues of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment. That is certainly a very significant undertaking.

The legislation before us is very significant and has been marked by an immense amount of co–operation from all the parties concerned during the various stages which have brought us to this point today. I would like to begin by officially thanking the members of my own party who have participated in the various committee stages. There were two such stages because this bill was once known to the House as C–78. It was subsequently reincarnated in the form of C–13. Members have served very diligently over that period of time and their names are part of the Hansard proceedings.

I would also like to thank the members of the opposition parties who were equally diligent and helpful during the course of their participation.

In addition I would like to make note of the constant guidance and assistance provided by a number of FEARO officials as well as the Department of the Environment staff. We could not have made the progress we did without their assistance.

I would also like to note that the committee handled its responsibilities in a different and perhaps unique way. In one instance the Minister of the Environment made an unusual effort and offered to attend the committee during clause–by–clause. In fact he rearranged his schedule so he could be present for a very extensive period of time.

Unfortunately our own schedule did not permit him to be present as often as he had wished, but he was present during clause–by–clause more than is normally the case. I think all members of the committee were appreciative of that. At the suggestion of the Minister of the Environment, the committee decided to secure the assistance of two distinguished extremely able environmental lawyers, Bill Andrews of the West Coast Environmental Law Association, and Brian Pannell of the Canadian Environmental Network.

I found their guidance to be exceedingly helpful. They were present during all of our clause–by–clause negotiations which went on for several days. I think the other members of the committee would agree that they were able to bring to the table not only a level of competence, but a very thorough understanding of the bill and the law pertaining to the area of environmental protection. So I would like to take this opportunity to thank them for the contribution they made.

What we have before us today is the result of some four years of labour, going back to when the bill in the form of C-78 was initially commenced and the consultations which literally took place from coast to coast to coast began. I think it is the result of an immense amount of labour and I am very pleased with what we have accomplished. I am very pleased with the degree of unanimity we have been able to bring to the issue at hand in this House. As we have just demonstrated, there was a division of opinion on certain amendments. I think we have made very significant progress in terms of trying to draft a bill that will have widespread support throughout this House and the country as well.

I see before us today in Bill C-13 a beginning and not an end. We have already passed amendments which provide that the minister will report back to the House on his assessment after some five years of its operation.

I am certain this will be an area of ongoing legislative activity. I believe I am speaking today at the beginning of a process that will obviously be a continuing one and will presumably go on for generations and generations.

This process we have put in place is a significant one and will have an impact on virtually every Canadian whose life and environment might be altered for better or for worse by any development project. It will give them the opportunity and the forum in which to voice their concerns with respect to such development.

In my opinion the bill will bring increased efficiency, more consistency and more cost effectiveness to the way we evaluate the environmental consequences of economic development. It will make environmental factors equal partners—and I think that is worth stressing—with social and economic concerns in the process.

Before I explain the provisions of this act I would just like to take a moment or so to talk about the terms of the historical context under which this legislation has evolved. The history of the Canadian environmental assessment process is relatively short. Just 19 years ago in 1973 environmental assessments of federal projects were formalized by a fairly loosely worded cabinet decision. This decision was followed and reinforced by several cabinet directives during the 1970s.

A regime under which we study the environmental effects of proposed projects today was established in 1984. The Environmental Assessment Review Process guidelines order in council or EARP, as we know it, was written as a guideline. Several court decisions however have given what was meant to be a guideline, the force of administrative law. As a result this guideline became the law of general application.

A further result of these court decisions was to breed uncertainty in the environmental assessment review process itself. As we all know, uncertainty can cause credibility to decay. For an environmental assessment process to be effective it must not only be credible, it must also be seen to be credible.

For all these reasons and indeed for more, we welcomed the Supreme Court decision on the Oldman River project. It has brought much needed clarification of federal jurisdiction over the environment. By recognizing the constitutional right and responsibility of the federal government to conduct environmental assessments when it makes decisions, this ruling has removed much of the uncertainty previously associated with such reviews.

This high court also recognized that the responsibility for the environment is shared between the federal and provincial levels of government. Its decision will help to clarify the respective role of each. The Oldman ruling will ultimately have the effect of encouraging a co-operative approach among the jurisdictions involved in environmental assessments. This is an approach which has been embraced wholeheartedly in the legislation before us. You will find there is room for increased co-operation and participation in the environmental assessment process. Indeed that is one of the key underpinnings of the act before us.

I must tell the House at this point that even before these court decisions, the federal government recognized the inadequacies of EARP, as we knew it, and had begun to take steps to reform it. The genesis of this reform was in 1987 when the then Minister of the Environment released the discussion paper entitled "Reforming the Environmental Assessment".

I note for the hon. members of this Chamber that the release of the minister's green paper was coincidental with the release of the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development which, among other things, called for a strengthening of environmental assessment procedures at all levels of government.

• (1600)

Over the following year, a series of regional meetings and a national consultation workshop afforded opportunities for the public to scrutinize and comment on the proposals. The public input so gained was incorporated into the first draft of the proposed Canadian Environmental Assessment Act which was first tabled in this House in the spring of 1990.

Subsequently during 1991, individuals and organizations from across Canada made submissions to the all-party legislative committee reviewing the proposed legislation.

I would note by the way that the chairman of that committee is in the House, as indeed is the chairman of that committee's successor.

This past fall, the Minister of the Environment tabled a revised bill based on the public input before the committee. That brings us to the present.

What we have before us today in Bill C-13 is the result of four years of very significant labour by Canadians who care for the environment. It has been subject to and benefited from three separate rounds of public consultations.

Together, the opposition parties proposed a total of 135 amendments. After consulting with Canadians, the government itself proposed 60 changes to the legislation, some of which I shall make specific reference to in just a moment.

Even beyond these three opportunities for public comment, in a most unusual step before being tabled in the House today, the final version was poured over by lawyers from the Canadian Environmental Network during clause by clause. I have already referred to the efforts of Mr. Pannell and Mr. Andrews earlier in my remarks.

Consequently, the bill that is before us now is a synthesis of the knowledge, expertise and opinion of as broad a spectrum of environmentally knowledgeable and sensitive Canadians as one could hope to find.

That, however, does not suggest that Bill C-13 is the ultimate environmental assessment legislation. It is not and indeed it could not be at this particular point in time. I would suggest that Bill C-13 is literally miles ahead, if I may still use the term miles, of what we would normally regard as the status quo.

If the current environmental assessment procedures can be characterized as uncertain and unclear then the proposed reforms must be described as definite and precise. What is before us today is modern legislation intended for a modern world.

We have before us legislation which provides a strong foundation for environmental assessment procedures for the 1990s and indeed for beyond. As I have said before in this chamber, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will give us assessment procedures that are more efficient, more consistent and more cost-effective than what we have now.

It will do this by ensuring that the adverse environmental effects of a project under study are identified, evaluated and addressed early in the planning stages before decisions are irrevocably cast. All of us would applaud that. It will do so by strengthening public participation in the assessment process and by providing the opportunity to and encouraging those who may be affected by a proposal to influence federal government decisions about it.

Where there is disagreement over the value of potential environmental changes wrought by a project, these new and improved review procedures are designed to facilitate a consensus agreement among the stakeholders.

When implemented, the new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will give substance to the principles of sustainable development. It will ensure that environmental factors are studied as diligently as economic and social considerations.

The new environmental assessment procedures will encourage the federal government to make decisions that integrate environmental and economic considerations and move us closer to our stated goal of achieving sustainable development.

All proposals with the potential to change the environment that require a federal initiative undertaking or activity will be studied for environment effect.

I will conclude by telling this House that after some of the most extensive consultations between Canadians and the federal government, my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, incorporated several key amendments to the bill which is before us today.

These amendments, in my opinion, strengthen the assessment process. They increase the clarity and the effectiveness of the process and they respond to the very specific and expressed needs of Canadians.

First of all, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that this bill no longer talks in terms of "balancing" environmental and economic goals. Instead, this outmoded concept has been succeeded by the more realistic philosophy of integrating these complementary objectives.

We feel that using this more positive definition of sustainable development will result in assessments that are based on more modern environmental principles.

We have also proposed the term "comprehensive study" to replace "mandatory study" in order to lay to rest the misconception that if a project were not on the mandatory list it would not be assessed.

It is important for Canadians to realize that those projects likely to have significant adverse environmental effects will be subject to broader and more in depth studies. This amendment and the wider definition of project the government has proposed will allow the assessment process to focus on those activities and those undertakings which warrant closer scrutiny while avoiding unnecessary or frivolous examination.

Under these amendments native concerns will be better accommodated as well. We are proposing that both "traditional aboriginal uses of the land" and "heritage resources" be included under the definition of "environmental effect" in assessing projects.

Some Canadians expressed wariness at the use of discretionary language in the act and suggested that it was an attempt by the government to court-proof this legislation. Nothing could have been further from the truth.

Nevertheless, in response to this concern we have removed as much of the discretionary language as we possibly could.

We also removed the double standard, or potential double standard which was suggested by the terms "significant" and "serious." Significant environmental effect is a term now used throughout the bill. Significant is a sole threshold level in the United Nations Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a transboundary context to which Canada is a party and which we would hope to ratify in the near future.

Another issue which was raised in the course of our consultations was the absence in this legislation of the need for and alternatives to projects. The amendments which we have proposed give the Minister of the Environment power to include these and any other appropriate factors in an assessment.

Just prior to closing I would also like to refer to one additional amendment if I am permitted to do so.

The government has proposed amending that section of the bill which deals with mediators and review panels so as to include guidelines for their selection and appointment. This amendment responds directly to those environmental and industry groups and associations which had underlined the need for stated criteria to ensure high standards for mediation and panel review.

As a result of these amendments and others to which I think some of my colleagues will be speaking during the course of third reading debate, we have before us today legislation which will give this country an environmental assessment process which speaks to the express needs of Canadians, individuals, business, industry, and governments alike. It is legislation in which we can all take pride.

In closing, because this is indeed for me the closing moments in what has been a very long and on occasion somewhat protracted process, I would like to say I am very pleased to have been able to participate in this process.

I echo the words of many of my colleagues as expressed earlier that indeed when we are talking in terms of protection of the environment we are today speaking to the concerns of Canadians which perhaps are more significant and certainly more clearly expressed than they have ever been before.

Some colleagues opposite in the course of speaking to specific amendments made reference to the fact that young people have a very strong and genuine concern for the protection of the environment.

I would agree with that. I would echo those words because I think younger Canadians today are very conscious of the fact that it is to them that our generation is leaving a great deal. In some of it we can take pride in terms of what we pass on to other generations.

In other instances we might wish we had done a better job than we have done to date. I would say that without in any way laying blame to other administrations that have been before us because that is an inadequate explanation for what has transpired.

All of us in this House and all of us who have been here for some time have had a responsibility to ensure that this type of legislation indeed is law. Perhaps what we could say is that at long last we are on the verge of making it law.

I personally would express a desire that we could have been able to move more quickly than we have.

• (1610)

Our deliberations at the time were time-consuming. At times they were particularly frustrating for the two chairmen who are sitting here near me, the chairman of the committee studying Bill C-78 and the chairman of the committee studying Bill C-13. Although the deliberations were perhaps a bit more time-consuming than they anticipated or indeed, on occasion would have wished, the legislation which is before us now is better as a result.

It is better as a result of the witnesses who gave us testimony. It is better as a result of the co-operation which was most marked and very commendable within the committee. Again, I reiterate my thanks to all who were party to that process. It is better legislation as a result of departmental officials who gave us the advantage of their advice.

I present Bill C-13 for third reading. I am pleased by what we have achieved. I recognize that the task is far from completed. Other members will be standing in this place in years to come. They will be ensuring that this legislation improves with the passage of time.

I feel that what we have before us is a good piece of work. I ask members of the House to not only give it their serious consideration but also reasonably speedy consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what was said by the parliamentary secretary, and I think he is to be commended for his very balanced and very honest speech.

[English]

We have now come out of a long tunnel which, measured in terms of time, has been almost two years. What is before us here today represents a small step in the right direction. The parliamentary secretary has quite effectively managed to describe it as a great step and that goes to his credit.

He went out of his way in committee to accommodate and to facilitate the interventions and the ideas that were put forward both by colleagues of my party and of the NDP, wherever possible, so that the process became meaningful in a manner that I can recall very rarely happened in the history of other legislation.

When and where these suggestions that came from the opposition side were not accepted, it was certainly not because of lack of trying on his part. It was because of lack of political will upstairs. One has to recognize, and I gladly do, the phenomenal effort on the part of the parliamentary secretary in facilitating the process and in making it meaningful in a manner that is unique in the history of parliamentary committees.

In that sense, I want not only to recognize it but also to thank him and congratulate him on his very fine, thoughtful, perceptive role laced with frequent humourous interventions which at times were an enormous help in diffusing tension.

Having said that, one must conclude that unfortunately the government did not seize on this unique opportunity of practising sustainable development.

The bill, although it attempts in its introductory, theoretical portions to set out the framework that is reminiscent of sustainable development, particularly in the clause dealing with purposes, when it comes to the nitty-gritty and the substance it does not manage to do that.

This is probably one of the reasons the Canadian Environmental Law Association, in a statement issued today concludes: "CELA, Canadian Environmental Law Association, cannot support Bill C-13 as amended and we recommend that even at this late stage, the bill should be substantially amended to address the major deficiencies identified therein".

One has to put this in a broader international context. Canada is making very strong commitments abroad to the concept of sustainable development. The Prime Minister of Canada at the United Nations in 1987 or 1988 committed himself and the nation to the implementation of sustainable development in the Brundtland report. In 1989 in The Hague, the Prime Minister again made a very clear strong commitment to sustainable development. Yet when it comes to the test of introducing such an important measure, we do not see the political will that corroborates the theory and puts it into practice.

The Government of Canada appears to be strong on promotion and exhortation of sustainable development but non-operational when it comes to the practical, the implementation of that concept and reinforcing the theoretical framework within which sustainable development finds its expression. Let me be more precise and explain what I am trying to say.

In the Brundtland report of 1987 there were several priority areas which were outlined as areas where institutional and legal reforms were identified. They went from the concept of moving downstream to going to the sources of environmental damage. They dealt with the effects of environmental damage. They saw the need for reform in the assessment of global risks and the need to change institutions to make informed choices in the area of providing the legal means. That is where we are right now with Bill C-13. Finally they saw the need for measures that would invest in our future.

The Brundtland commission recognized environmental assessment as the key mechanism, as the instrument to initiate some of these very important reforms. Therefore this exercise on Bill C-13 at third reading becomes so important because it will be at the root of so many important decisions.

In Canada we have had a process of environmental assessment since 1974. It was an administrative process. Then in 1984, under the Liberal administration, cabinet modified this process and set up certain guidelines under the name of the environmental assessment and review process. They were issued by means of an order in council which became publicly known. Under the Conservative administration, the guidelines were interpreted as being discretionary. In April 1989, a Federal Court ruling on the Rafferty—Alameda dam case interpreted these guidelines not as discretionary but as mandatory and treated them as federal law. It was that decision by Judge Cullen which understandably triggered the production first of Bill C-78 and then of Bill C-13. The government had to take certain legal initiatives.

Let me take you back to 1987 because it is important. At that time there was a national task force on the environment and the economy. To its credit the government of Canada was one of the first to move on the Brundtland report to produce an analysis of our modus operandi in its recommendation in the September 1987 report. I am quoting now from section 24 of that report of the national task force where it reads: "All ministers must become directly responsible"—I repeat, "all ministers" because this is important in the analysis of the over-all bill. "All ministers must become directly responsible and accountable for the environmental and economic consequences of the policies, legislations and programs".

The task force also recognized the cost effectiveness of assessing the sustainability of policies and so on and went on to say: "Sustainable economic development would minimize environmental input and future cleanup costs by advanced and integrated planning. In the phrase the remedial reactive approach would be replaced by anticipate and prevent as the dominant concept underlying environmental economy integration.

The political and economic structures of Canada and the world are awakening to the need to make economic development sustainable. Decision-making has not yet adapted to fulfil this need. Change is necessary and it must occur now". This is what the task force wrote in 1987 and that is where we were at that time. Please remember the stress on ministers in the plural.

We then went through an experience with Bill C–78 which at this stage belongs to history. It was a very weak bill and that was repeatedly stressed by environmental organizations, witnesses and the opposition. The government listened to these interventions because it then produced Bill C–13.

In presenting this new rewritten Bill C–13, it became clear that there were still many problems and many changes had been made. The parliamentary secretary is quite right in dwelling on and stressing the positive aspects and changes that were made which one must recognize. There is no doubt about that.

I must recognize, as the parliamentary secretary did, the presence in this House of two chairpersons who very ably conducted the hearings on both Bill C–78 and C–13. We were helped by Brian Pannell and Bill Andrews, two young and very competent environmental lawyers, who served as expert advisers to the committee during the clause–by–clause study of the bill. That was a first. Credit for that initiative goes to the parliamentary secretary who allowed everybody in committee, on both the government and opposition side to call for an opinion on a moment's notice from the two experts. They were then able to tell us how to treat a certain amendment, how to word it, or how to improve the existing language.

Having said all that I must now take you through a very important conceptual flaw that exists in this bill. It will be followed by some points of disagreement that we have.

The conceptual flaw with Bill C–13 is that the bill is designed on the basis that everything is out unless it is defined as being in. In other words the legislation does not require the application of the environmental assessment process to any project that requires federal government approval unless the act of approval, licence or permit is specified in the regulations as triggering the review process.

Many environmental groups, experts and witnesses recommended instead environmental assessment legislation that would be based on a concept which is the opposite side of that one, namely that everything is in unless it is defined as being out. You can appreciate that if you adopt one principle, everything is out unless it is in or everything is in unless it is out, you draft completely different legislation, of course.

The legislation that would have been written under the principle, all is in unless it is out, would require the application of the assessment process to all projects that require federal approval unless they were exempted by regulation. We believe the procedure adopted by the government will be complicated to administer and has the potential for projects to slip through the cracks if the list of triggering mechanisms is not thoroughly compiled. We had some good debate yesterday particularly when it came to section 37, I believe.

Now this is the conceptual flaw. Putting that aside, I would move now to points of disagreement. First of all that has to do with who has the power to be the final decision–maker. It is true that in Bill C–13, unlike C–78, the Minister of the Environment has a significant role in the environmental assessment process. However the final decision–making responsibility for the fate of a project remains in the hands of the minister who is responsible for the project. It would be the Minister of Transport if it is an airport, the Minister of Fisheries if it is a wharf or the Minister of Transport if it is double tracking in British Columbia along a river which has high salmon resources and so on.

This approach is not a desirable one because the minister responsible for the project is also a proponent or at least a strong supporter of the project itself. It then becomes all too easy to use the escape hatch provided in section 37, about which we had a long discussion yesterday, whereby a project can "be justified in the circumstances" even if it will cause, and I quote again from the bill, "significant adverse environmental impact". I described that yesterday as an immense loophole and it still remains as such.

In his rebuttal yesterday, the parliamentary secretary waxed very eloquently about self–assessment. No one could do better than he does on that. Self–assessment does not necessarily mean self–regulation. There is a big difference between the two and he appreciated that. I doubt very much the minister will practise self–assessment and self–regulation at the same time at this stage. I will have something to say about that later.

We on this side proposed an amendment that would have changed this section 37 so that the final decision-making responsibility would have been given to cabinet as a whole. A collective responsibility would be better than leaving the responsibility to the proposing minister who has a mandate to do that, including the Prime Minister, of course. We tried, of course, and we did not succeed. We did so because we felt that by giving the collective responsibility for the decision to cabinet and the Prime Minister, the purposes as spelled out in clause 4 would not be compromised but would be carried out in a good way.

Another point of disagreement has to do with the role of the Environmental Assessment Agency. This is a very important area of disagreement. The proposed federal environmental assessment and review office, which we had in the past, is now being turned into the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency, which will promote uniformity and harmony, conduct research, environmental assessment consistent with the act, and ensure opportunity for public consultation.

We in the Liberal Party support a different approach for this agency. We want and are committed to an independent agency that has a legislative mandate not only to administer but to enforce the federal environmental assessment process. This agency would report directly to cabinet in the same way that the National Research Board does, or the CRTC, the Canadian Radio and Television Commission.

The proponents would prepare the initial environmental assessment of the proposal and submit the report to the agency for a review. After being satisfied with the scope and content of the assessment report and so on, the agency would have the authority to approve the initiative or refer it to mediation or a panel for public hearings or deny the approval.

I will spare you, Madam Speaker, the various steps that we have envisioned for this agency because of time limitation. It seems to us that this agency should have the same status and the same powers as is given to the National Energy Board and the CRTC so that it can fulfil its mandate fully. When necessary, when cabinet approval is required, the agency would review the proposal, express its opinion to cabinet which then has of course the final and ultimate responsibility to approve or reject the proposal or, if it wishes, to constitute an independent panel to hold public hearings. Should the cabinet in the end approve the proposal, the opinion of the agency or the panel would be made public with the announcement of the cabinet and the public would know. The whole process would be out there in the open with the ultimate responsibility, of course, on the political masters who are the elected representatives and who should be responsible in the end.

That would be the Liberal alternative.

Finally, on the point of disagreement, we on the Liberal side believe very strongly in the creation of a commissioner for the environment, or a federal ombudsman if you like, modelled on the very successful New Zealand experience. This commissioner would be given the power to review the implementation of the environmental assessment process, report directly to Parliament, and therefore through Parliament to the public, to Canadians. It would have powers of investigation similar to those that are invested in the Auditor General, or expand the mandate of the Auditor General to include this kind of responsibility. You can see that here there is a convergence of responsibilities which would well serve the public interest, I submit to you.

Moving on, I would then try to pull together some of these thoughts by saying that we all know, at least in theory, although not in practice, that the integration of the environment into the economic decision-making process is of enormous importance. The failure of having done so this far has created the mess that we now face. I will not elaborate on the various aspects: acid rain, toxic contamination, ozone depletion and climate change.

We want to protect future generations from the staggering cost of clean-up of pollution in comparison to the relatively modest cost of examining and changing proposals a priori to ensure the prevention of environmental harm. In order to do that, we have to apply a comprehensive and effective environmental assessment. We cannot escape it.

In that sense Bill C-13 begins to realize that necessity and makes a small step in that direction. This has to be done at an early stage.

There is enormous evidence through various polls that Canadians expect a sound and good process, one that will indicate and prove that we have the well-being and the health of present and future generations at heart.

In Prince Rupert in May 1990 the leader of our party put it rather well when he said: "We must set national standards and vigorously enforce federal laws. We must also pay attention to the urgent necessity of integrating the environment into economic decision making. We must examine development projects before they are undertaken". The Leader of the Official Opposition went on to say: "I want the Department of the Environment to play the same watchdog role with respect to the environmental impact of decisions as the Treasury Board does in regard to spending impacts. A Liberal government will apply the federal environmental assessment process the way it is meant to be applied, the way Canadians want it to be applied, with full public participation".

These are important conclusions on the part of our leader. They are in contrast to the expectations that were raised and the failure to implement such expectations by the former Minister of the Environment. In June 1990 the then Minister of the Environment made an announcement. We were all pleasantly surprised by that announcement regarding policy proposals to cabinet, not just projects, policy proposals. This is quite a wide ranging statement and not just the construction of an interprovincial bridge or the widening of railway tracks or the construction of an airport. The then Minister of the Environment of the present government in 1990 went public and said that policy proposals to cabinet would be assessed for their environmental impact.

We were all cheering. We were enthusiastic. We thought this was the beginning of a new era. This was almost the environmental millennium we had been hoping for. We cannot find the evidence of that statement in Bill C-13. When we pressed the present minister on the implementation of this commitment, the present minister said that he did not have the methodology to assess policy and environmentally sustainable development.

He went on to assure us that somehow the North American free trade agreement is or will be assessed for its environmental impact. Nobody is quite clear on that aspect.

Here, as you can see Madam Speaker, we have moved from a general commitment to have proposals, government policies, assessed from an environmental point of view to a much narrower field, namely projects, what the Minister of Public Works may propose or the Minister of Transport, you name it, but certainly not the totality of governmental decisions. Of course, the difference between the two is enormous.

Today, in response to a question on the Order Paper, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs informed me and the House that despite the fact that the constitutional document was a cabinet approved policy document and the proposals to entrench property rights is part of that document, the minister said: "It is premature to consider the question of an assessment of the environmental impact". What is premature about that? Is it premature to make a policy statement and then to have the policy statement assessed environmentally once it has been approved? It is a very peculiar way of thinking.

It makes me conclude that conceptually this government has not yet come to grips with the implications of sustainable development. It has the capacity to theorize about it, to exhort and to promote it in theory, but when it comes to practice it falls flat.

This is why one can understand the comments made by the member for Western Arctic which were pretty incisive when she said on March 10: "The fact is that Canada's own environmental regulations have proved so far to be totally ineffective in stopping environmentally damaging projects despite court orders for federal review". The Oldman River project in Alberta and the Rafferty—Alameda project in Saskatchewan, and one might also add Kemano II, were recently built without prior environmental impact assessment by the Government of Canada.

The member went on to say: "The people of Canada want strong and independent environmental legislation which must bind government." She went on to say: "My party is committed to the concept of an Auditor General of the Environment which would provide a buffer against the crass, political manipulation which presently occurs in Canadian environmental review processes". She is dead on and I congratulate her for having made that very strong and courageous statement. That assessment, unfortunately, is accurate. It is true.

I submit to you that if in this Bill C-13, not the proposing minister, but the entire cabinet were to be made responsible for that decision then these incidents to which my colleague from Western Arctic refers would not likely happen or would be much less likely to take place in Canada. This is the relevance of her statement in the context of the debate here today. I really applaud her statement because it is dead on.

Yesterday, we talked about the enormous loophole in clause 37. I must say that reality is with us now. It is not good to have a bill in which the minister can proceed even in the knowledge that significant adverse environmental effects could be the consequences. Therefore, the project can be justified in the circumstances. This obviously gives a strong political stamp of approval which should not have been allowed to be given. It is not good legislation from that point of view and it is unfortunate because it weakens the credibility of the bill.

I refer also to the review of the legislation after five years. As you know, we debated that point earlier. We had three different approaches to it. They all focused on how, five years from now, we should examine the good and bad features of the bill and make recommendations.

The compromise solution of the government that emerged is silent on the fact whether or not the public will be a participant in it. Let us hope that the minister of the day will include public participation in the process very early, rather than leaving it to the discretion of the minister.

I would like to make a reference to the collective responsibility but I would be repetitive on that because I think I stressed the point, too much perhaps. As to the delegation of responsibility, giving authority to an agency or an individual or a body to carry out an assessment, the bill is silent as to whether the minister can revoke such authority. But on that I must say the parliamentary secretary yesterday gave a very thorough and convincing reply.

In conclusion, and making sure that one does not become repetitive, I would say that we have here a measure that does establish a federal environmental assessment process. It claims to be within the intellectual framework of sustainable development. Unfortunately I cannot see it that way.

I hope that despite the weaknesses of the bill, the purposes set out in clause 4 will be implemented not only in the letter but also in the spirit. I hope that the loopholes will not turn out to be as large as they seem to us to be at this stage.

It will be good to have this legislation proclaimed as soon as possible so that we will be able, in 1997, to review it and draw from the lessons of the five years the conclusions that are necessary to make it a truly sustainable development measure.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River—Human Rights; the hon. member for Don Valley East— Shipbuilding; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries; the hon. member for Drummond—Cross-border shopping; and the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Lumber industry.

[English]

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, as has been said at report stage, the environmental assessment bill before us today is the single most important piece of environmental legislation ever to face this country.

The bill represents a significant step forward from the existing environmental assessment legislation under EARP. It reflects a great number of changes presented not only by myself and my New Democratic colleagues but also members of the environmental community as well.

The bill is not perfect. We said that at report stage. It is not the bill that we would write if we were on the other side of the House. It is not the bill that I would write if I were the Minister of the Environment, and it is not the bill that I would expect if my colleague from Skeena were the Minister of the Environment in a New Democratic Party government.

Some of the problems with it are not known and will only be discovered through years of working with the new law.

• (1650)

The government's acceptance of my suggestion for a five-year review or at least the pieces of the proposal that I put together for a five-year review go a long way to ensuring that in the future some of the unforeseen problems can be addressed. Some of the problems are obvious even now, and I hope to have the time today to mention some of them.

My New Democratic Party colleagues and I are committed to improving this act and the process it outlines for environmental assessment.

The bill still tends to reinforce the primacy of development over the environment, and thus reinforces the old trade-off between development and the environment, a trade-off under which the level of environmental destruction demands that we do away with it.

Environmental legislation in Canada should be far-reaching and ensure that environmental considerations are accorded the importance they deserve. Bill C-13, even with all its improvements, still comes up short in this regard.

Let us outline the elements of the legislation dealing with environmental assessment as to what they should include. What are the ingredients to developing an environmental assessment process that will truly aim at preserving and enhancing the environment for our children?

It must be reviewed by an independent agency, resulting in a final and binding decision. It must contain a broad definition of environment and must apply universally to a variety of initiatives, including government policy making.

Discretionary decision-making within the assessment process must be minimized and the accountability of those decision makers must be ensured. Proponents of undertakings must demonstrate that the purpose of the project is justified and that there is an environmentally acceptable need for the undertaking.

Proponents should prove that their undertaking is better than alternatives to their proposal in terms of environmental protection. There should be a significant public role early and often in the planning process and thus must contain provisions relating to public notice and comments, access to information and participant funding.

The final decision must be implementable, enforceable and subject to terms and conditions where necessary. Future monitoring of the environmental impact of projects, especially when combined with other projects and activities, must be accounted for.

The government, in response to pressure I believe from our side of the House and many representatives in the environmental movement, did respond to amendments which moved us closer to environmental assessment legislation which incorporates many of these needs. Others were fudged and some were ignored completely.

Yesterday and earlier today during report stage discussion, the government had the opportunity to respond to the right of Canadians to a safe and healthy environment. It could have accepted amendments which would have allowed for regulations to be reviewed by this House. It could have adopted an amendment which would have insured that this piece of environmental assessment legislation was thoroughly reviewed every five years and not just once five years hence.

In fact, during committee discussion, the minister and other government members said time and time again how important the regulations are to this bill. Yet when it came time for public scrutiny, it decided that it could not happen.

The government often mentions that this bill deals with a very new process and we will not know many of its weaknesses until it is put into practice. The acceptance by this government of an amendment calling for a five-year review does go a long way to putting a mechanism in place to address many of the weaknesses.

While environmental assessment needs to be enshrined in federal legislation, there remains a weakness right at the beginning of the bill. The government refused to include wording in the preamble of the bill which would have reflected the constitutional authority of the act. Including a peace, order and good government clause would have given the bill the stature it is due, providing certainty as to the constitutional basis of the act.

Unfortunately, this omission may open the door for more and more court challenges on behalf of provinces trying to attract industry and sacrifice the environment in the process. The Canadian Environmental Law Association states: "The failure to do so causes us to question the government's profane commitment to achieving a new and meaningful environmental assessment program for Canada."

The New Democratic proposal to include an environmental auditor was also not included in this bill. The government should move on this matter independently as quickly as possible. An environmental auditor can be established in independent legislation and would go a long way to protecting the environment, allowing for a proper monitoring of the policies and projects of the federal government and putting Canada in the lead internationally on issues relating to environmental assessment.

As Mr. Ian Motherwell, assistant general counsel to Ontario Hydro said during committee hearings: "Doing an environmental audit of anything in the environmental area is a beneficial concept".

The government also had the opportunity to protect the environment by ensuring that mitigating measures to deal with ways in which the environment is harmed by some undertaking were strong and effective. However, this bill still may allow for environmental harm to occur and let be dealt with by a pay-off. By leaving compensation as one of the options for mitigating environmental damage, the government is allowing megaprojects like James Bay to proceed as long as money is paid out to compensate for the damage. Cash does not compensate for environmental destruction.

Under the purpose of this act, the government also refused to require that the responsible authorities take action to promote sustainable development. By leaving it as encouraging responsible authority, the government once again caved in to business pressure to put forward a weaker bill than they could have. The preamble should have focused on environmental quality and not played the developmental environmental trade-off.

As Mr. Gertler, chair of the national environmental law section of the Canadian Bar Association said to the committee concerning the preamble: "It should say something like whereas, the government of Canada seeks to protect and enhance environmental quality. After all this should be the primary goal and focus of an environmental assessment regime".

The government also missed an opportunity to be crystal clear that this bill sets out to protect Canada's environment. I submitted an amendment which would have spelled out in the purpose of the act, a requirement to ensure that no project is allowed or assisted by any federal authority unless and until the proponent has demonstrated the project will cause no significant adverse environmental effects or will promote sustainable development.

The government had the opportunity to ensure that when screening is done the purpose of and need for the project were considered. The government also refused to ensure that alternatives to the project were included at the screening stage of the process.

On the other hand, they went a long way in accepting our amendments to ensure that alternatives to a project and the need for a project are explored at other levels of the assessment process.

There is still a lot more work to be done. The government knows full well the damage done to our earth, the communities in which we live and the air which we breathe has already been damaged irreparably to some extent. The government knows that no policy or undertaking or megaproject should be given the green light if it is going to harm the environment.

Professor Robert Gibson from the Faculty of Environmental Studies at the University of Waterloo has stated: "Environmental assessment requirements must impose a test well beyond the usual regulatory demand that proposed undertakings meet specified standards for environmental acceptability. The expected results should not be merely acceptable undertakings, but undertakings that are the most appropriate and positive means of responding to a recognized problem or opportunity. They should be, of all the practical options, the ones most in accord with the principles of sustainability and broad public interest".

The federal government also refused to move on the New Democratic Party recommendation that policy itself should undergo environmental assessment. Specific projects and undertakings are usually done in the context of federal government policy. If this policy itself flies in the face of environmental protection, then there can be no question that time after time, projects and undertakings will be proposed that would harm the environment, sometimes in minor ways, sometimes significantly.

For example, the government's lemming-like drive to hurl itself off the cliff of international free trade agreements speaks to the need for federal policy itself to undergo environmental assessments. Free trade with Mexico is part and parcel of the industrial world's ongoing move to develop an international division of labour and production. This ongoing form of so-called development treats the Third World as not only a pool of cheap, easily exploited labour, but as a pollution haven encompassing most of the globe.

I see you signalling, Madam Speaker. I hope to continue when the bill is called again.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Of course the hon. member will be able to continue.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved that Bill C-322, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act (change of political affiliation) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: This private member's bill, Bill C-322, presents to the House a very simple proposition for consideration. That is that members of Parliament who choose to leave the party affiliation under which they were elected to this place or who choose after having been elected as independents to take on a party affiliation, should be required to put that important decision to what essentially is a ratification vote by their electors through contesting a by-election to be held within 90 days of the date on which they change party affiliation.

Now this is something that has arisen really in my case as a result of many interventions made to me on the part of constituents who expressed great concern of the fact that members of Parliament, once they arrive in this place, seem to feel that they are not accountable to their electors for their party affiliation and that they can, at will, choose to sit on either side of the House, either with other parties or as independents, without consulting their electors.

I have done a little bit of research on this. I have discovered that in recent years there have been not an insignificant number of occasions on which members of Parliament have changed party affiliation.

According to the research that has been compiled for me by the Library of Parliament since 1940 to date, we have had 56 members change party affiliation. Some of them have crossed the floor, some of them have sat as independents, some have indicated very privately what their intention is through telephone calls and so on.

Many of them have perhaps disappeared into history with no other footnote beside their names than the fact that they did change parties. Others are quite well known, I am sure, to most Canadians. Some have distinguished themselves in their new parties; others have not. I suppose of all of the British tradition of parliamentarians who have changed parties and have done so on a matter of conscience to great distinction, none is less notable than Sir Winston Churchill who, I understand, changed party affiliation on two occasions.

In raising this matter before the House, I am in no way suggesting that a change of party affiliation is a wrong thing to do or that it should never under any circumstances be countenanced or that members of Parliament should be obliged to ignore their conscience and the will of their electors and simply toe the line offered to them by party leadership.

On the contrary, I am recognizing by proposing this bill that indeed the conscience of a member of Parliament is a very important thing.

There are circumstances in which a change of party affiliation subjected to as I call it, a ratification vote by the electors of that member of Parliament, rather than playing as some have suggested into the hands of the party leadership by acting as a deterrent to changes of party affiliation, may in fact provide an independent-minded member of Parliament with a tool to encourage greater responsiveness on the part of party leadership by virtue of the fact that the member believes that his or her electors will undoubtedly uphold the decision of changing party affiliation.

The essential issue is that in modern Canadian politics the choice of who to vote for is one which Canadians make on the basis of a variety of considerations. When they enter the polling station and put a mark on the ballot, they bring into play a number of considerations, certainly the issues that have been debated both nationally and locally in the context of the campaign.

Of course, they consider the individual candidates who present themselves in that constituency for election. They may consider a variety of other factors that come into play. But a very important one for each elector in Canada is the party affiliation that the candidates on the ballot bring with them.

The political scientists have told us and sometimes as individual members of Parliament we do not like to hear this, that in fact, as individuals we may sway as little as 10 per cent of the vote in any given election campaign. Some have said less, some have said a little bit more.

I know we all like to think we have been elected on our own merits. But it seems that most Canadians probably consider very heavily the issue of party affiliation and perhaps the leader of a party in coming to decide who to vote for.

The proposition I am putting to the House in this bill is very simply this. If an individual member of Parliament decides on his or her own account for whatever reason, be it conscience, disagreement with the leader, disagreement on a point of principle, that that member of Parliament must change party affiliation, renounce the affiliation under which he or she was elected, then that decision should be approved or disapproved by the electors of the district from which that member has come.

It should not be left entirely open-ended. As we know under the Elections Act, there can be a very long delay between the time of a vacancy in the House of Commons and the calling of a by-election. I have therefore suggested in this bill that in these circumstances, and I happen to believe in others as well, the by-election should be held within 90 days of the vacancy.

That deals with a couple of things. First of all, it relieves some of the uncertainty that would otherwise be upon a member making this very important personal decision to change party affiliation. There is at least an understanding that within a finite period of time, a reasonably short period of time given the difficulties of holding by-elections, that that vote will be held. The member will either be returned with his or her new or perhaps no party affiliation or at least a verdict will be delivered.

Second, it imposes on the party leadership an obligation to consider very carefully the views of a member of Parliament who has come to this very important decision in that member's political career, namely of changing party affiliation.

Surely if that member can be returned with no or with a different political affiliation, that in itself is an embarrassment to the party leadership. It suggests that before letting a member leave, to go out on an adventure such as this, the party leadership should make every effort to take into account the point of view of that individual and also take into account the views of the constituents that person was sent here to represent.

In the final analysis, we are here fulfilling a number of very important functions as members of Parliament.

• (1710)

I am not one who believes that we are simply here as delegates, sent by our electors to vote without regard to our own point of view, opinion or conscience. On the contrary, I believe that when we act in the House of Commons, in committees, in our caucuses, we must bring to bear not only our own points of view but also our understanding and judgment based upon the work that we invest in understanding important public policy issues, as well as the views of our electors.

I believe that our first obligation as members of Parliament is to try to influence our own party caucuses on policy issues.

That being said, there may well come a point in time where our conscience dictates that we disagree in a very fundamental way. Frankly, there has been much written—and this is not the point of this bill—that we in Canada have gone too far in promoting a view of party discipline which is extremely rigid. That is another issue and I think that there can be many reforms brought about along those lines that will create fewer situations in which people feel compelled to leave the existing party.

Some may disagree with this but I believe that the measures I have proposed will further the cause of greater independence of members of Parliament as individuals. It does provide a means clearly sanctioned in the law for them to withstand the pressure and have the support of their electors on important issues of conscience or public policy.

The proposition is very simple. We are here to represent the people who sent us here. They have chosen us, perhaps in some cases because of wit, intelligence, or other reasons. Somebody across suggested good looks. I do not think it was directed at me; I think it was directed at the member for Western Arctic, from what I could gather. But whatever the reason, in most of our cases, I am afraid, the party affiliation and the positions that our parties have taken on issues in general elections have been key to the decisions that our electors make when they go into the polling station.

That consideration being so important, it is very simply my view that if our democracy is truly to work well then on this all–important crucial matter of party affiliation the change between elections should receive the ratification upon consultation of the electors of a member's own district.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Ottawa South and what he had to say about his Private Members' Bill, Bill C–322. I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate, and this is not to say that the hon. member's concept is a negative one. In fact, I think it is very interesting, but I wonder to what extent the philosophy of this bill is in line with our parliamentary tradition, with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the criteria that are already provided by law when a Canadian decides to stand for election at the federal level. These are points we must consider when we analyse this bill.

I agree with the hon. member that when one takes the trouble to run for a given political party, to a certain extent one has to support the party's campaign platform as well as the party's leader and policies, because of the British parliamentary system. And according to the rules of this particular game, the more elected members one has, the better one's chances of forming the government, and vice versa. In our parliamentary system, our political affiliation does limit our independence.

But this hardly means that once a member has been elected under a party's banner, he can no longer think for himself, no longer disagree with his party or with a government policy and that otherwise the House of Commons will force a member to resign his seat so a new election can be called. I think that is going a bit too far.

First of all, this goes against the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. What about freedom of association and freedom of expression? Do we want to further restrict the freedom of expression of parliamentarians? I think debate is healthy, and if for some reason a member, whatever his convictions, wishes to cross the floor of the House, the only possible sanction should come from his constituents when an election is called and they let him know whether the parliamentarian made the right choice.

I do not think this kind of legislation would make it any easier for members to work effectively. We are elected to this House to work to the best of our ability and serve certain principles we believe to be right and also to serve the interests of our constituents. When we are elected in an electoral district, we do not necessarily need an absolute majority. Often we can win with 2, 3, 4 or 5 per cent. There are always plenty of people who do not share our views. If people do not have to agree with the member they elected, why shouldn't the member be allowed to have opinions that go against the principles of his party and his government? Why, in a democratic system like ours, should we prevent a member from changing his mind or changing his seat, because he wants to work with a new political party or even create his own? Why should we prevent him, just because he was elected under a given political banner, from taking this kind of action, when freedom of expression is one of the foundations of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Freedom of association is one of the cornerstones of our charter. We must never forget that. I think that the hon. member, well-intentioned though he may be, should realize that this is not just an amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act or the Canada Elections Act. It would be a constitutional amendment. We could not exclude a group from the charter just because they are parliamentarians, because they were elected under a political banner, and we can not do that because we cannot predict what will happen in the future.

Who knows? In two or three weeks maybe a new political party will be formed, and maybe I will not like its philosophy. I do not know what will happen, any more than the hon. member, which is why we have freedom of expression, the basic right of every Canadian.

We fought to maintain this principle and include it in the Constitution. Are we going to jettison it today? I don't think so. We cannot do that, because if we start telling members of Parliament they do not have the right to cross the floor once they are elected, we are taking away their freedom of expression and freedom of association. First, members of Parliament—and where will it all end? That is the problem I see in the hon. member's arguments, and that is why I object to this kind of legislation. The political implications go far beyond a member's affiliation to a party, and, in fact, they go against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That is why, as the member for Champlain, as an elected representative who believes in the value of freedom of expression, I must inform the hon. member that I am not in favour of this bill, and if there were a vote, I would vote against it.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to rise, albeit for a short time, to discuss Bill C-322. The member has basically pointed out that if an elected member of Parliament crosses the floor and joins another party there should be a vacancy and he or she should run for office.

• (1720)

I rise to support the spirit of the bill and the idea behind it. I actually want to congratulate the member for his candour in this regard. Certainly one could see it as a vicious attack on one of his colleagues, the member for Edmonton Southeast. Whatever is going on in the Liberal caucus, the dissent there or whatever, this may be part of a drive to run one of its members out of its own caucus. I am not sure if that is the intent of the member, but it may be indicative of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. He is imputing motives, and I do not think that this has its place, especially in private members' hour. It is not allowed during Question Period and I cannot see how it can be at this time.

I would ask the hon. member to withdraw and continue in another line, please.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I think the member's bill is pretty clear. I am really citing from my experience in British Columbia. We have had a tremendous amount of experience with this particular situation. I will withdraw if the member thinks I am suggesting something negative about an attack on his own colleague. But I can say very clearly that we from British Columbia have had a lot of experience with Liberals on this kind of deal where they have crossed the floor from different parties and the appalling approach they have taken to representing their electors and the views of voters in their ridings on it.

We have had some experience with this and it is not good. That is why I am so concerned about this issue. I think the member certainly did a bit of research on this, but he could have taken a look at the track record of his own party in this regard.

When we are elected to our Parliament and to our legislatures, it is important that we indicate as fully as we can to our constituents where we stand on our views. Members belong to different parties for different reasons. They get elected on a platform and they get elected on their ideas. We now have a proposal which I said I support in spirit, but I am expressing some concerns because of the experience we have had in this regard. I had hoped that we would take a look at how this might have applied historically.

Let us take a look at the experience we had in British Columbia. At one time a dramatic change in policy and direction was taken when in fact three Liberal members of the provincial legislature—Mr. Garde Gardom, Allan Williams and Pat McGeer—joined the Social Credit Party and really changed the course of political history in British Columbia. It is perhaps a big example of what the member is getting at. In that case those three Liberals really changed the face of politics in British Columbia at that time.

We have had other members in this House who have crossed the floor, some to sit as independents, some to maintain their party label but to be considered independent. We have had a group that has left other parties in this House to pursue the whole question and notion of an independent Quebec.

I think the member may have thought this was an innocuous idea and a wonderful pious idea, but I think he has touched a raw nerve because of the experience that many of us have had with this view. I can tell the House how people feel in their constituencies when the person they elected on a certain set of values says: "To heck with you, I don't believe that any more. I am crossing the floor and sitting with a different party".

I think the member is right. I think this bill should be allowed to pass so that those people who have done that can go back to their constituents and put their case. They may get re-elected in that new position. As the member said—he is quite right—we can do that, but I think those elected persons, those politician, owe it to their constituents to go back and say why they crossed the floor and why they changed their party affiliation, and to account to their constituents for that.

If I tallied it up we probably would have had seven to ten by-elections by now in this House if this bill had been passed. It might have been okay for Canadians to see the exact intent of this bill and how strongly those members felt about their views on different issues. It might have been okay for them to be required to go back to their constituents to account for the change. I think the member has raised that important issue with this bill. If we take a look at the political history of British Columbia, what the Liberals did there in joining with the Socreds, we see that it changed the face of politics in British Columbia. I wished at the time that those Liberals had resigned their seats and had said: "I am not a Liberal any more. I am really a Socred". Socred, Liberal, Tory are all the same anyway. However, it changed the face of political history just as we might have in this House with the number of members from the Liberal and Conservative parties who have left their parties and continued to sit in the House.

I think they owe it to their constituents and to Canada, if they are going to do that, to resign their seats, run in a by-election, be accountable to their constituents and recognize their views. If they can win the day again in a by-election, so be it; back into the House they come.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to start by saying that I have the deepest respect for my colleague from Ottawa South.

One of the most amazing things within the Liberal Party is that we can openly debate and have differing points of view. That should not generate a situation in my view where because we disagree we necessarily would have to take an independent course.

Even though I agree with the spirit of where my colleague is coming from in the sense that he is trying to generate much more accountability to his constituents, I personally do not think that this bill will serve that purpose. I agree with my colleague from Ottawa South that when we are running under a party banner and are really aggressive in our campaign we might be responsible for probably not more than 5 per cent of the vote. I agree with my colleague on that particular point. Therefore, if we are running under a party banner we should realize, if elected, that 95 per cent of the reason is probably because of our leader and the party.

When we come to the House of Commons there are moments within our party caucuses when we are debating issues on policy. It could be anything from constitutional debate to tax reform. I believe there are times when we may have profound disagreement. Some of these disagreements develop after we have been elected because policy is an evolving situation.

I would be a little concerned that if this bill were to pass it might cause too much timidity. There might be an apprehension on the part of members to really go to the wall in their own caucuses.

Listen, it is is no secret. In every caucus in the country there are Whips. Sometimes when you do not fall into line they change your seating or you are not put on Question Period or they try to send you a signal that you are not necessarily following the party line. You might agree with 75 per cent of the other party policy, and because you have a particular disagreement on that one issue you should not be put into a position where you are basically an independent. If this bill were to pass, it could make life almost unbearable for honest debate from within a party. If the party basically decided that you were on the right track, it would say: "Never mind your conscience. This is the party line. If you don't agree with it you are gone; you are an independent".

Then you have to go back to your electorate 90 days later. Sometimes when members of Parliament make a decision to disagree with their leadership and even if they take the route of being independent, the judgment of their decision or the realization of what they are trying to achieve might not register to the electorate for a year or two down the line.

The full meaning of some of the differences that we have in here are not realized. Let us just take, for example, the government's position on the GST. The government has taken a position which obviously we on this side of the House disagree with. We believe that this is a regressive policy measure. I am sure there are Conservative members over there who are saying: "Gosh, I would like to be an independent. I would like to cross the floor because my constituents do not necessarily agree with the leadership of my party in this tax thrust that it has taken us into".

They are basically telling their constituents: "Let us wait and see, because we believe that over 18 months or in two years it will be a good thing for Canada".

With all the deep respect and feeling that I have for my colleague from Ottawa South, and I tend from time to time to have differing points of view, I think that I would be a prime candidate for someone who might be a little bit independent. The next thing you know, I would have to go out and face a by-election and in 90 days, taking on all of my colleagues, I do not think I could ever make my point.

If we follow the logic of the member's point that you are only responsible for 5 per cent of the vote, it would seem to me that if we followed this course to its natural conclusion, if I became an independent or if I was kicked out of my party and I had to go to the people 90 days later by this law, I probably would not be back here.

Again, I repeat that in the Liberal Party we can have these open debates in the national boardroom here of the House of Commons. I know that he will not take this personally, but on this particular bill, I cannot support my colleague.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I find this a very curious bill to be sponsored in private members' hour by a private member of the House of Commons.

If it had come from one of the party whips, I could better understand its intent. When the hon. member for Ottawa South says as he did 15 minutes ago or so that party discipline is another and separate issue, I entirely disagree.

This bill has everything to do with one of the serious problems that is strangling this place, and has been for several decades. I am referring to the rise of partyism in Parliament. This bill which goes straight to the very norms of our political behaviour in the House of Commons would require that a member resign his or her seat, that it be declared vacant upon sitting as an independent or crossing the floor to another party and that there be a by-election within 90 days.

When I heard that and heard the member for Ottawa South saying that this would then be a ratification vote by the electors of that MP's decision, it took me back to the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. Whenever a cabinet minister was appointed, they had to get re-elected because they had assumed an office of profit under the Crown. They had to go to the people to get that kind of ratification.

That was such an encumbrance on this place in those days that they found all kinds of inventive ways to get around it, including one famous time, the double shuffle when everybody was moved from one portfolio to another to avoid going out to these by-elections.

It reminds me in another way of what Sir John A. was all about when he was trying to round up what he called the "loose fish" who swam around here in the House of Commons. The "loose fish" were the people who were not necessarily aligned with any one of the political parties. He wanted, as he was then building a national party, to bring everyone inside the comfortable ambit of that party. That was fine in the late 19th century when we needed to create national political parties. In the late 20th century the role of the political parties here in the House of Commons has gone so far, it has gone too far, that this bill is the ultimate statement and indeed the ultimate denial of our role as intrinsic and authentic members of Parliament. This is the quintessential statement of partyism in Parliament.

At this time we are trying to get a debate going in Canada between two different concepts of what an MP might be, perhaps the Burkean model when we come here and give only to our constituents the benefit of our best thinking and our conscience or on the other hand the Jeffersonian model where we come here as delegates from our constituents to do their bidding here in our national Parliament. When we are trying to sort out between those two schools and perhaps come up in fact with a synthesis or a blending that is appropriate to Canada at the end of the 20th century, what do we get here in Private Members' hour? We get a bill that says that the minute that I would decide to sit as an independent, or anyone else here, or to cross the floor, we would have to go and have a by-election and the country would be put to that expense.

Being the bookish kind of guy I am, I looked in the book by John McMenemy, The Language of Canadian Politics where he defines what crossing the floor means. The author has a rather stark description of this event. He says: "It is an act by which a legislator leaves his or her party and sits across the floor from former colleagues as an independent member or as a member of another party. This action results from an irreconcilable difference between the member and his or her former party leadership and it is usually preceded by obvious signs of disaffection. It is a rare event for a member to become an independent because elections and House procedure, including recognition by the Speaker to address the House, are based on party affiliation. It is uncommon for an independent candidate to win against party-affiliated candidates. It is also rare for a member to change parties because though the person may be welcomed to another party, he or she might not be re-elected as a candidate of the new party".

It is evident that what we are discussing here is a very serious matter for the member who crosses the floor.

The member for the New Democratic caucus a few moments ago was referring to the member for Edmonton Southeast. I would like to pick up on that point from a different context. The member who is sponsoring this bill said he had done a little bit of research on this subject. So have I, Madam Speaker.

When I was first elected here, the member for Edmonton Southeast had been elected as a Progressive Conservative and then he sat as an independent. Under this bill that would institute a by-election. Then he came back to the Progressive Conservative caucus, a second change and a second by-election. Then we went through the general election of 1988 and then for the third time he left and sat as an independent, a third by-election. Then he left being an independent and joined the Liberal caucus, a fourth by-election.

I can almost see where he is sitting there, two seats to the left and two rows in front of the hon. member for Ottawa South. This is what the cost of his general election in 1988 was, costs incurred by Elections Canada for Edmonton Southeast, $276,602.67. That includes the printing, the preparation of lists, the rental of polling stations, the printing of the ballots, all the notices, the fees of the returning officers, the assistant returning officers and staff.

I have heard the member for Ottawa South speak eloquently in this House about fiscal restraint and national finances. I have been impressed by his message. I suspect that on this bill he has not taken the effort to look into the financial consequences of what he is proposing. In the case of the member for Edmonton Southeast alone, the taxpayers of Canada would have had to spend over $1 million to fulfil the obligations under this bill as this member for Edmonton Southeast was earning his place in the Guinness Book of Records of taking the most circumlocutious route to ever cross the floor of the Canadian House of Commons. That figure of over $1 million for the necessary four by-elections that would be required by this bill is only the cost of Elections Canada. It has nothing to do with the party costs that would have been incurred in those four votes.

It seems to me that this bill is an attempt to penalize a member for what is probably one of the most difficult decisions of his or her political life. A private member does not leave the party fold lightly nor join a new one without being fully aware of both the personal and the political consequences.

We all know that there are occasions, however, in the life of a politician when the dictates of conscience must be followed and difficult decisions made. That is the issue here. That is what the member for Broadview—Greenwood was referring to when he spoke about the conscience.

Many times when I have had differences with the government, people have asked how I could continue to be a supporter of the government. I said: "It is very simple. I put my country first, my constituents second and my party third, in that order". This bill is a total denial of that order of priority I have established and I will live with and fight for the right to continue to live with.

In conclusion, just consider a further implication of this member's bill that would require a member who sits as an independent to be involved in a by-election instead of being here.

Last November I found that I was in an irreconcilable position with the position being taken by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs because last May the government which I seek to support had announced in the Speech from the Throne its decision to bring enabling legislation before this House to permit the men and women of Canada to participate directly in the process of constitutional change, in short a bill for a national referendum or plebiscite on the Constitution.

I was delighted by that because since July 21, 1988, I have had such a bill before the House of Commons and I believe that is yet going to be done. It has to be done for the future of our country. Therefore, I sought to support the government and the minister.

By November when I saw his delays and change on that policy, an attempt indeed to reverse the policy of the government, it put me in a position where I had to ask:. "For what conceivable reason do I still sit here and support the government on that issue?" I gave very careful thought to sitting as an independent Progressive Conservative member of this House. In thinking about it and taking advice I then realized that the important thing to do was remain within the caucus and join the issue with those who were opposing the full and necessary role for the Canadian people in ratifying the process of constitutional change. For that reason I decided to stay in the caucus for the time being to deal with this issue.

I conclude with this point. If the bill of the member for Ottawa South had been in place at that time and I had chosen to sit as an independent member and deal with the issue that way, I would not have been able to be here on the floor of the House of Commons where I have been sent by the electorate of Etobicoke—Lakeshore to deal with that very issue which is of great and transcending concern to our country.

Where would I be? Because of the bill of the member for Ottawa South, I would have been out on the hustings in Etobicoke—Lakeshore fighting a by-election when that issue was going here without the representation in caucus and elsewhere where I felt it needed to be.

I think this is a strait-jacket on the role and the conscience of independent members of the Canadian Parliament and, therefore, deserves to be defeated.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker we may agree or disagree with with the bill but this is one of those few occasions when we actually have a real private members' bill in this House. I see members from various political parties speaking profoundly on this bill, sometimes disagreeing with members within their own caucus and, in fact, speaking very profoundly on how they feel about the issue.

To Canadians watching this debate today, I think there is some comfort to be had from what is going on right now. This is how private members should work every single day in the House of Commons. Members of Parliament should look in good conscience to what is proposed by a colleague and say whether he or she likes it or not and give the reasons, instead of rising as they do from time to time during private members' hour, and reading a text which sure looks like it was prepared by a government department, or minions inside some government department. Today we have not seen that. We have seen members participate. Obviously they have done their own research and have had few notes. We have seen them reading from library books and so on and speaking, all around, very eloquently about the issue at hand.

I don't think there is any doubt what is intended here. It is trying to make members of Parliament more responsible and responsive to their constituents who sent them here. That is indeed very laudable.

I do have grave concerns though about the proposal myself. My concerns are as follows:

[Translation]

When they elected us to the House, our constituents expected us to speak on their behalf, to inform this House of their grievances, their needs. They elected us because they wanted us, as individuals, to sit in the House of Commons. Because of our political affiliation? Yes, partly, but to what extent? It is impossible to know. Because of our personal experience? Some of us had been elected to some other office previously. This is my case, I was an MPP, I sat on municipal council for a number of years. Others have different personal experience. Finally, we are elected for our stand on some issues. Is the candidate for or against a major project within a given riding? Is the member, or rather the Liberal candidate, for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell in favour of a new bridge in the riding? What is he advocating on a given subject?

It is based on all these considerations that constituents choose to elect or to reject a given candidate.

[English]

Having said that, we parliamentarians in the House of Commons are faced with the situation where a member may cross the floor. It is not something that happens very often, considering the number of people in this great chamber, but it does happen from time to time. If a member crosses the floor under this bill, then that member would have to go back to the electors and ask for their consent for having crossed the floor.

I have some concerns about that proposition. First of all, we have what is known as responsible government in this country. That is not an adjective to describe certain qualities of the Prime Minister. Responsible government means a very specific thing in the kind of parliamentary system that we have, as we all know. It means a government that stays in power so long as it enjoys the confidence of the majority of members of this House. I believe it is important that Parliament be structured this way.

Let us remember what happened in the United States, for instance, in the 1970s when a certain president finally resigned from office and virtually had to be taken out of the place kicking and screaming. Under our parliamentary system, if a particular Prime Minister was no longer wanted by members of his own party to such a degree that they would be willing to risk their own seats on it, then they could collectively vote non-confidence in the government.

That of course would get rid of that particular government if members felt the government was that bad. It is possible under the system we have now.

This bill does the exact opposite. It structures political parties in an even tighter knit than they are already. Someone asked a while ago in a speech what happens if a political party expels a member. That is certainly a possibility. It has been known to have happened in the past. There are other concerns. What happens if a member's views cannot be reconciled with the political party? Then, some say, he or she should go back to the electors and ask permission to sit in a different caucus.

Let us extend that a couple of notches further. What happens if the particular political party has changed its views but the member has kept the same views that he or she had before? He may not have made any change at all. Why should that particular member have to resign his seat and ask the consent of the electors to continue to do what he or she was doing already?

It is a difficult situation and a very fascinating one to be discussing. I am pleased we are having this non-partisan debate. It is not a structured one in any way and is a very healthy one. Perhaps we should use this day as a model for future debates, real private members' debates.

I am concerned about anything that changes or upsets the delicate balance we have in Parliament. We as members can, by a simple majority vote at virtually any time, defeat a government in this country if that is our wish. I am not going to describe what my particular wish would be at the moment. You could probably guess that and so could most Canadians. That is not the point in this debate. We are describing the balance we have in terms of what can or cannot be done with supporting or not supporting the government.

It is a balance that has evolved over 700 years for parliamentary democracy here and in Britain. It started from the Magna Carta and has developed to what it is today. I fear that this bill, although it is a minor piece of legislation for certain people, could upset that balance. To that extent it does concern me.

In closing, let me reiterate my respect for those who bring bills like this to the attention of the House of Commons. It permits all of us to have a very frank exchange of views as we have had this afternoon and which we do not have often enough in the House of Commons. It also gives Canadians a good opportunity to see and listen to this important exchange of views.

Finally it shows as well that members such as the member for Ottawa South deserve to be congratulated. They are not fearful of bringing the heartfelt controversial issues to the House of Commons as we all should. We were sent here to take those views we think are good ideas, expose them to the judgement of our colleagues in this Parliament, and then adopt or reject them once they have been so exposed and debated.

That is exactly what we have done this afternoon. That is why I want to offer my sincere congratulations to the member for Ottawa South.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is the first time I have seen someone who wanted to speak on a second occasion on a bill.

If the hon. member is going on article 44, I think he has read himself what it is, he cannot bring any new aspect and he is closing the debate.

There are five minutes left. The hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I certainly appreciate the right of reply afforded under the rules. I would indeed want to use it in order to reply to some of the points that have been raised.

Perhaps in doing so I will address those I consider less serious first. I think of all of the points raised, surely the least serious has to be that of the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who cites fiscal responsibility as a reason for defeating this bill.

If he thinks we should have an eye to fiscalism as part of our parliamentary system then I suggest he propose a bill that would extend the life of a Parliament beyond five years. Perhaps if we did not have elections more than once a decade we could save a lot more money. If we did not have elections at all think of the money we could save.

I think his suggestion that we ought to take the cost of democracy into account is so typical of a Tory attitude, that you understand the cost of everything but the value of nothing is indicative of how spurious that point is.

With respect to the charter of rights I certainly beg to differ with the interpretation suggested that somehow this bill would interfere with freedom of expression or association. In no way does it do so. It simply recognizes the fact that electors vote. In fact on our ballots in modern times the party affiliation is indicated.

I suggest to the member who raised that point that if those who choose a party affiliation come here under that affiliation without considering the gravity of putting that affiliation beside their name on a ballot, they falsely represent themselves to the people of their electorate.

By far the most substantive concern raised with the bill is that it impedes the ability of members of Parliament to express their points of view. It would limit their willingness to express points of difference freely with the leadership of their parties.

The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore said quintessential statement of partyism in reference to the bill. That may be going a little bit far but I would be very concerned if that view were commonly held.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell raised the same point with less rhetorical flourish I think and I would be concerned if indeed that were the interpretation.

I look at it this way. First of all it is in no way a repression of the right of disagreement. Disagreements can and will occur. In the context of a relaxation of strict party discipline on votes which are not matters of confidence, I am sure no one would disagree that a measure such as the one I am proposing would become a restriction on people voting against their parties.

In the current context and with the experience of the present Parliament, it has been seen that on certain matters some parties have expelled members for voting against the party on certain issues. I do not think this bill would be triggered in any way by those who merely disagree with their party even on some important issues.

If it did result in a rupturing of the party relationship for that member, the people of that member's district would have a right to pass judgment. They can pass judgment in favour or against the member.

I think that is a contribution to the accountability of members of Parliament against the arrogance that assumes we only know what is best for our electors in this place.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, on February 21 of this year, following a working visit to India's Punjab state, I asked a question in relation to Canada's position on human rights issues there.

That visit to India by three parliamentarians of this House, one of whom was myself, had three purposes. One of those purposes was a review of human rights issues in the context of the political conflict in the Punjab. The full report of that visit will be made public tomorrow, but the principal findings of that visit are that the political conflict there has generated extreme violence. For example, in the last year over 4,500 people have been killed and over the last 10 years, over 15,000 people have been killed. There is also evidence of torture of detainees by the police in that area.

In the context of that violence, there is a failure by the government of India to assure to all of its citizens the human rights set out in the international conventions to which both Canada and India are signatories. I note that the government of India specifically excludes Amnesty International and other human rights monitoring organizations from India and consequently, we do not have internationally an objective standard of review of precisely what is happening there in very difficult circumstances.

I also would acknowledge that in that working visit the Government of India was most co-operative and helpful and did not impede our review of any of the circumstances.

My question for the Prime Minister at that time was answered by the minister for external relations. Asked whether or not Canada had made human rights part of its bilateral relations agenda with India, the minister replied that it does take human rights into consideration, both in terms of foreign aid and in terms of general policy. She did not answer specifically for the India situation or provide particulars.

The problem of convention human rights abuses in the political conflict in Punjab state bears relevance to Canadians in three ways. The first is Canada's foreign aid decisions. The second is whether or not the political circumstances there can generate large or larger numbers of political convention refugees. Third, is the right of Canadians to engage in political advocacy and dissent here without fear of unwarranted surveillance under section 2 of the CSIS act.

I asked whether the minister would agree to submit this issue of human rights accordance in India to the external affairs subcommittee on development and human rights. She did not provide an answer to that; I believe she should have. I believe that is precisely where this issue can and should be dealt with and I commend that to this House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised a question of universal concern. As we all know, the Prime Minister has shown bold leadership, putting the sensitive issue of human rights on the agenda in such forums as the Commonwealth and La Francophonie. Progress has been made, and we can hope to see much more in the future.

Of course, each case is specific and involves a different set of circumstances. In this case, we are talking about human rights conditions in India and Canada's relationship with that country. We must recognize that, serious as they are, human rights violations do not appear to be part of a deliberate policy. Rather, they are the product of a society that has neither the funds nor the expertise to train and discipline the very large number of security personnel required to maintain law and order in a country as poor and vast as India.

We must give full credit, as well, to India's freely elected government for moving strongly in the direction of economic liberalization and fundamental policy reforms.

Since coming to power, Prime Minister Rao has consistently tried to de-escalate the situation, to cool passions, to reduce confrontation and build consensus. The prospects for human rights improvements thus seem reasonably good.

Canada does not support projects in Punjab or in Kashmir-Jammu. We regularly encourage the Government of India to find solutions to the difficult problems in these states.

Much of our current assistance to India tackles such human rights problems as poverty, health and women's rights.

Our over-all program with India is shifting further to strengthen our support to good governance via economic and social policy reform and greater focus on human rights.

The government's policy is to review the human rights situation on a continuing basis concerning each country receiving Canadian assistance and to take constructive action where we can. That applies to India, as to other countries, and we will certainly continue to review each case carefully.

SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, you will recall, as I do, the furore that arose in Canada in 1985 when an American ship, the Polar Sea sailed through Canada's Northwest Passage.

Canadians at that time reacted with outrage at what we considered an attack on our national sovereignty. You will recall as well that the government reacted to that situation with three initiatives.

First of all, the government introduced legislation to clarify our claims to the Arctic, to extend our base lines as is said. Second, it reacted to remove the self-imposed ban that had been put in place by the former government against taking matters of sovereignty to the World Court.

Third, it reacted with a decision to build one of the largest, if not the largest, ice-breakers in the world, the Class 8 ice-breaker, Polar 8 in order to reinforce Canada's sovereignty in the north.

That Class 8 ice-breaker, as you recall, the Polar 8 was to be built at a cost of some $650 million. Unfortunately, the project had to be cancelled because of budget and deficit problems, but not before we had already spent some $30 million on designing that particular ice-breaker.

Almost simultaneously, at the time all of this was happening, Canadian naval architects in Calgary designed and then subsequently directed the construction in Sweden of a Class 7 ice-breaker known as the Oden.

Then last year on September 7, members will recall that the Oden reached the North Pole. In fact, it was the first non-Soviet ice-breaker and the first non-nuclear vehicle of any nationality to reach the North Pole.

That Oden, a Class 7 ice-breaker and just one class down from the Class 8 that was going to cost Canadians some $650 million was designed and built for a mere $55 million.

Canada, on the other hand, had to cancel the Class 8 ice-breaker after spending $30 million. We are proceeding now with the refitting of a 21-year old Class 4 ice-breaker at a cost of $140 million, all of this while rejecting the Canadian design Class 7 Oden which has proved that it can do something that no other Canadian designed ship has ever done, it reached the North Pole.

I have to admit to a little soft spot in my heart for Canadian naval architects. My own great grandfather came here as one of the first naval architects in Canada after training in the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, England. He came here with his family in 1884 and designed and built ships on the Great Lakes in Canada and actually in British Columbia for a while. But those are not the issues here. There are really two issues involved in this matter; one is Canadian sovereignty and the second is the effective spending of Canadian taxpayers' dollars.

• (1810)

Why, in heaven's name, did we choose, as a nation, to spend $140 million to refit a 21-year old Class 4 ice-breaker when we could have built a brand new, more powerful Class 7 ice-breaker designed by Canadians for only $55 million at a saving of some $85 million? Frankly, it is embarrassing. Can anyone out there explain it to me? I cannot.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Don Valley East for his question and for the way he has elaborated on the decisions that have been made.

While he talks about the Oden, yes much of that work was financed by the Canadian government, particularly to the oil industry doing work in the Beaufort Sea. It was with the assistance of the government programs that the offshore exploration at Canmor was able to design and build during the late 1970s and early 1980s.

In looking at the over-all questions, our largest ice-breaker, the Louis Saint-Laurent, was in need of a refitting.

Mr. Redway: Class 4, 21 years old.

Mr. Belsher: As the hon. member says, it was a Class 4 and 21 years of age, but by refitting you can also get a good many more years out of it.

The proposal that was submitted to the government by HDIL to complete an extensive refit of the Louis Saint-Laurent was priced at $71 million and was scheduled for completion within 28 months. Had we replaced the Louis Saint-Laurent with a new one, the figure we were given at the time would have cost us $240 million.

Had the Louis Saint-Laurent contract been completed by HDIL on time and within budget, there would be little to second guess. However, the shipyard experienced difficulties in removing all the asbestos from the ship during the early phase of the project and a second significant delay occurred when unforeseen deteriorated steel work had to be renewed and replaced.

Members will recall that this government had examined the feasibility of constructing the Polar 8 for year-round operation in Canada's high Arctic and then, as the hon. member has alluded, for budget constraints we had to back away from that.

The Coast Guard have decommissioned the Terry Fox, a ship designed and built by Canadians for operations in the Beaufort Sea, and to have been chartered by the Coast Guard. There have been 10 major vessels which have been decommissioned. The remaining vessels will be asked to do a lot more work than they now do. This all has to be done within the framework of the budget constraints that each department has to work under.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question that I put to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on February 24. It had to do with compensation.

I just want to review what it is we are faced with and the reason I wanted to zero in on it this evening. I think everybody in the House by now is aware of the fact that the recent announcement in the reduced northern cod quotas means a reduction in jobs, lay-offs, and reduced plant operations. For many people, it means no income at all. In the face of this, at various times, even really dating back from last year when the fishery was pretty dismal as well largely because of ice but for other reasons as well, there were promises made and commitments that were interpreted by the bureaucracy differently than I think the intention that was put forward by the politicians.

The end result was confusion, anxiety, and I am not over-stretching or dramatizing, downright fear in some cases. When you have no income that is a pretty reasonable thing to be afraid of.

Let me give an example of a plant worker. I was in the riding on the weekend and I discussed this. It is wrong to get into people's salaries, but I had to for reasons of the point that I want to make here. These people do not make a lot of money, to begin with.

Let me take a plant worker, a cutter, who probably makes maximum around $11 an hour. With the number of weeks they have, their salary probably would get to about $21,500. If there are bonuses in a good year, it may get to $25,000. That in itself is a pathetic income.

Let me take it a little further. If they have to go on unemployment insurance, that income reduces to around $17,000 or $18,000 a year, which is well below the poverty line. I would suggest that it is not even subsistence allowance. But even that is not the problem. The problem is those people who do not even qualify for that $18,000 a year. This is the crux of my argument here this evening.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I think well-intentioned, have said that anybody who has a reasonable attachment to the fishery will be looked after. But last year, Madam Speaker, that was over 10,000 people—10,300 people. There was $25 million allotted to that. That worked out to $2,500 per person. The catch here is that the criteria that was used last year and the year before, and the year before that, is the same, despite the promises of the minister that there will be a lot of flexibility used. Essentially what we are looking at is this. To qualify for 10 weeks, if that is the qualification, you must have either had 10 weeks or three weeks with last year all your stamps in the fishery alone.

If you cascade that effect, essentially it means that there will never be any qualification at all.

What the minister in fact has promised in his answer is the real reason I am here this evening. I want to just restate what he said. I want confirmation from the hon. parliamentary secretary, my friend who is working overtime this evening, that this is the case. The minister said: "If there is need for any additional assurance programs, assistance programs, they will be forthcoming".

The other thing he said was: "When we know later in the year exactly what the effects are, other programs if necessary will be put into place."

That, to me, is a very firm commitment. It does not talk about flexibility, it does not talk about interpretation by the bureaucracy. It says to me essentially, and I would like confirmation from my friend, the member from Fraser Valley East, that those who need it will be looked after.

If I can get that assurance, I will go home happier tonight and I think a lot of my constituents will be as well.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, to the hon. member opposite from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, the announcement the minister made on February 24 concerning the northern cod catch was indeed a very significant announcement and something that no minister ever wants to have to make, particularly as it is dealing with people's livelihoods.

The minister's response was very comprehensive with the primary goal that of the sustainability of the northern cod.

The member opposite is talking about whether or not the government will be there to assist the people who fall between the cracks. I can tell him that this government has taken significant initiatives during the last several months to assist the Atlantic region of Canada, and this government will continue to be responsive to the needs of the people of Atlantic Canada whose livelihoods depend on the northern cod.

With the shutting down of the directed fisheries for cod by offshore vessels until the fall and the limiting of the catches by the inshore mobile fleet to the average of recent years, the traditional fixed gear inshore fishery will continue to operate without quotas or other limits on its catches.

The trawlermen and the offshore plant workers who are immediately affected by these measures are almost all eligible for unemployment insurance. Beyond that, assistance is available pursuant to the $584 million of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. As well, the minister has made it clear that those affected by the lowering of the total catch this year will be assisted.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that our own conservation matters can only go so far in trying to get this problem corrected, and it is going to take us several months to get around it as far as getting the fishery back up to the levels that we have enjoyed in times past.

I also want to thank the hon. member for his continued and persistent questioning on these things on behalf of his constituents and other constituents who are in like circumstances from the province of Newfoundland.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, I am glad to rise tonight to follow up on a question I put recently to the minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding cross-border shopping.

Cross-border shopping is increasing constantly and is becoming a real problem. The question I am asking, and that we have the right to ask ourselves as Canadians, is: Have we seen enough stores closing and employees losing their jobs to do something to correct the situation?

Daniel Forgues, in an article in La Tribune de Sherbrooke, says and I quote:

> The number of travellers entering the country and declaring goods purchased in the United States has increased tremendously at all border-crossing points in Eastern Townships during the last 10 months, that is from April 1, 1991 to January 31, 1992. The increase is 151.3 per cent for the custom offices of the Stanhope area and 103.1 per cent for those of the Rock Island area.

People from Quebec alone have spent hundreds of millions of dollars creating jobs and wealth south of the border while slowing down our economic recovery; Montrealers, for example, patronize in large numbers American stores. One Montrealer out of five has spent $640 in the United States this fall. The store owners in Windsor, Ontario, also suffer at lot from this. But what shall we do to curb this financial drain? Are we proud enough to take a stand?

Recently, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have announced measures in response to concerns about the impact of cross-border shopping and of the smuggling of tobacco products in many Canadian communities. This announcement contained five major points, including the elimination of tariffs on consumer goods not produced in Canada and the levy at the border of provincial taxes on alcohol and tobacco, on imports shipped by mail or courier into Canada as well as on smuggled tobacco products. This government initiative is most commendable. More needs to be done, however. We must change Canadians' perception, their attitude. We have to foster a sense of belonging such that Canadians will buy products made in Canada over anything else.

Canada had put forward such a strategy a dozen of years ago, but only as a promotional feature similar to a campaign to promote tourism. Never has such a program been entrenched in a piece of legislation like the "buy American" policy has in the United States. The Americans have that sense of belonging and the feeling of pride that goes with it. It is obvious, judging from all the signs on their cars and the slogans on their bumper stickers. We are facing structural problems. That much is true. Store owners remind us regularly that taxes of all kinds are preventing them from lowering their prices to match those of their competitors in the United States. Americans enjoy important comparative advantages such as cheaper manpower, economies of scale, more flexible hours, and lower fixed cost.

Can our government do anything to make our products more attractive? A lower dollar, lower taxes, changes in social costs. If our citizens shared a feeling of belonging to their country as strong as that of the Americans, we would have made progress. The lack of such a feeling, the lack of solidarity among Canadians have caused us economic as well as political problems. The constitutional issue could have been settled by now if we had developed some feelings of belonging to Canada.

So, I want to know if the minister intends to implement a strategy for a promotion campaign or to encourage us to develop a feeling of pride and belonging so that Canadians buy domestic products. Will there be a similar promotion campaign of high quality for our domestic products? For example, will our groceries which represent—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but I must interrupt the hon. member. I think he was able to put his question, and his time has expired. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Drummond for his pertinent question and one that affects my riding as well, being along the border.

He has suggested that the government launch a promotional campaign to encourage Canadians to buy Canadian. I would ask him if he would consider the view to the question from a slightly different perspective. That is, we know that Canadians shop in the United States for a very simple reason. They believe that they will get better value for their money.

It seems to me, therefore, that to effectively alter Canadians' opinions in this regard we have to convince them that there is equal value for their money in Canada.

Canadians must be reminded not by government but by the private sector that many goods and services in Canada are equal in price and often less expensive than those in the United States and that the quality of goods and services in Canada in every way equal that available that in the United States.

This message must be repeated again and again, not just in advertising but in every contact between the buyers and the sellers in this country.

We need to see the message of competitive prices and competitive quality in flyers, posters, store window displays and paid advertising of every kind. We must also hear the message at the point of sale in every transaction between the buyer and the seller.

This is the only kind of buy Canadian campaign that would be of real value, not an advertising campaign based on some government certification of Canadian content in consumer products and services which would pose difficult problems and result in increased costs to be passed on to our consumers.

LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): On November 22, 1991, I asked a question of the Minister of Forestry about a very important issue regarding our lumber exports from Canada, in particular the maritimes and Quebec to Europe and the effect then that the potential ban on green lumber imports from Canada might have on our lumber exports from the country.

I know that we have made some progress in that area. Without going on a great deal more I would be interested and look forward to hearing the comments from the parliamentary secretary to outline just where we are with this issue. I think we are all hopeful for some progress in this regard on really what is another trade dispute that we have. I look forward to the parliamentary secretary's comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, let me assure the House that the Government of Canada has made the strongest representations possible to our European counterparts on the Pinewood Nematode issue. We are well aware of the stakes involved, almost $1 billion of our trade in unseasoned softwood lumber.

We have obtained a one year extension to the European Community directive which would require the drying of our current lumber exports to eradicate the Pinewood Nematode. The Canadian softwood lumber industry can continue to ship green lumber to Europe until December 31, 1992.

We have looked at various ways of eradicating this pest in a joint research program with the European Community. We have still to work out a joint report with the Europeans on these research results. It is expected that this phase will be completed by march, 1992. The European Community should then draft its new plant health regulations which are scheduled to be ready in june 1992. Due to the production adjustments that might be required, the industry might need additional time to implement the new control regime.

A month ago, the Minister for International Trade, wrote to commissioner Macsharry to urge the commission to accelerate the timing of its decision in order to give our industry the most lead time as possible.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion that the House now adjourns is deemed adopted. Consequently, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.29 p.m.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, we are all most grateful for the positive yes response to yesterday's referendum question in South Africa.

The majority yes response encourages people worldwide to continue to believe in the generous and just nature of humanity which so often is buried in the negative.

Yesterday's white South Africans voted overwhelmingly to support the end of apartheid. Seventy per cent of South Africa's 3 million white minority have given Mr. de Klerk the mandate to proceed with the CODESA reforms on behalf of all South Africans including 30 million black South Africans.

We look forward to a rapid negotiation of a new constitution enfranchising all citizens. We look forward to a speedy implementation of an interim government which will include blacks for the first time.

Most of all, we look forward to the achievement of these goals which will bring South Africa back as a full participant in the community of nations, sanctions lifted and freedom and prosperity for all, as the new goals for an international community.

ALBERTA CHAMPIONS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, once again the province of champions does it. I ask this House to congratulate three new champions.

The ladies Canada West Ringette team from Alberta won the world's ringette championship in Helsinki, Finland.

During the same week, the Wetaskiwin Relics won the COHA international hockey tournament in Las Vegas for the second time, having previously won the world cup division in San Diego.

Of course, the whole nation watched the University of Alberta Golden Bears as they captured their eighth Canadian intercollegiate athletic union hockey championship in Toronto on Sunday.

The Golden Bears exemplify the winning tradition of the University of Alberta and all three teams exemplify the true ideals of excellence. As the Golden Bears say: "It is amazing what you can accomplish if you do not care who gets the credit".

Congratulations to all three teams and continued success.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, all over the world men and women who love freedom will rejoice at the result of the referendum in South Africa yesterday.

State President F. W. de Klerk, his Nationalist Party and his allies in the Democratic Party have achieved a result that gives him a free hand to continue the nation building work that he and the majority of other political parties in South Africa have been engaged in for the last several months.

Canadians have urged this course of action on South Africa for many years as have countless other countries around the globe. Freedom is the only solution to lasting peace in South Africa. The CODESA talks represent a significant movement toward freedom for all of South Africa's races and an opportunity for the state president and his political colleagues to build a new, stronger and better country.

King George VI said here in Ottawa over 50 years ago: "Without peace there can be no enduring freedom, and without freedom no enduring peace". These words ring true for South Africa today and the referendum represents a giant step toward freedom for the majority of its citizens.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, the results of Tuesday's referendum in South Africa show resounding support for President de Klerk and other moderate leaders for the process of reform which has been initiated to end apartheid.

Having just returned from South Africa, I have seen firsthand the significant changes which have taken place in South Africa this past year and feel that the widespread support which President de Klerk's reforms received yesterday should be encouraged and rewarded.

If the aims of achieving a non-racial and democratic South African society are to be successfully reached, we must show support to the government and representative moderate leaders. I commend the Prime Minister of Canada for his prompt telephone call to President de Klerk and the announcement this morning allocating further official development assistance for activities in support of democratic development in South Africa.

Hopefully, as soon as possible the federal government will restore full economic and cultural ties with South Africa, including the establishment of a trade consular office. I encourage Canada to urge other countries to do the same.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, yesterday South African whites voted by a substantial majority to give President F. W. de Klerk a mandate to continue on the road to dismantle the evil of apartheid.

We welcome the outcome of this vote and hope that it will in fact accelerate the pace of change in South Africa toward irreversible true democracy and genuine majority rule.

While significant progress has been made it is very important however that Canada and other nations of the Commonwealth and elsewhere not lift trade and economic sanctions until there has been irreversible change and the black majority is fully represented at all levels of decision making in South Africa.

Canada must also speak out strongly on the tragic levels of violence in South Africa and call for firm and independent action to end the violence and bring those responsible to justice.

Let this be the last whites only vote in South Africa and let it lead soon to a free and democratic South Africa with an end to poverty, injustice and racism.

Finally, let us pay tribute to Nelson Mandela and the black leadership and the black majority of South Africa for the courage, dignity, and strength they have shown in the struggle to end apartheid.

ISRAEL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the world learned of yet another chilling terrorist attack against Israel.

This time an explosion destroyed the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires, Argentina. At least 11 people, including children, were killed and more than 100 were injured in this brutal and senseless attack.

Israeli Prime Minister Shamir said the blast was part of a war against Israel.

Our Prime Minister sent the following message to Prime Minister Shamir yesterday: "Canadians were shocked and outraged today at the news of the bombing of the Israeli embassy. We join with civilized people everywhere in condemning this further brutal violence against the state of Israel".

I believe this latest terrorist attack is not only vicious and vile but, worst of all, cowardly.

PARTY FUNDRAISING

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, last week the Reform Party was maliciously attacked without provocation for some reason by the NDP member for Churchill as well as other members in this House.

He stated that a Reform Party fundraising letter was a "slick, sophisticated, and sleazy step by step guide on how to abuse the tax system".

I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that his own party, the NDP, has also used this method of fundraising so it is not new.

I have in my possession a copy of a document, a B.C. NDP fundraising letter, which reads: "Hans, here is my tax creditable contribution to the grassroots initiative 92. I am interested in finding out about donating to the B.C. NDP through my will, life insurance or other bequest. Please send me your free pamphlet".

This smacks of hypocrisy unfortunately.

I believe that Canadians are also repulsed by this kind of behaviour and the reaction of Revenue Canada.

Anne, the donor in question, has stated clearly that she did not enter this arrangement with Revenue Canada uninformed. I think what we need to do is say that the official who spoke to her contrary to what we may have heard in this House said there was nothing illegal or wrong about the arrangement—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE ROGER LEMELIN

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, as I watched a few clips from The Plouffe Family yesterday on Radio-Canada, I remembered how families across Canada, literally glued to their TV sets, had become very fond of this family from lower town in Quebec City. Roger Lemelin's novel marked the birth of popular television in Canada.

The man who died Monday morning was a gifted author and an outstanding and sensitive communicator. Throughout Roger Lemelin's career, his work gained him many awards, both in Canada and abroad, particularly from the Académie française and the Académie Goncourt. At 30 he was the youngest member ever elected to the Royal Society of Canada. In 1989 he received the Ordre national du Québec and finally, two years ago, he became chevalier of the Légion d'honneur.

Roger Lemelin has given us some of our best descriptions of everyday life in Canada.

PARTY FUNDRAISING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the member for Beaver River just rose and read part of a mailing from the New Democratic Party of B.C.

Let me assure that member and the House that not only have I read that document, but I also read the entire package. I talked to the Hans in question and there is no way, shape or form that we are asking those people to use the political tax credit to pay premiums.

As I stated in the House on March 11 when I raised this issue, "Canadians will want to know the answer. It is perfectly legal for individuals to give through their wills or through their insurance policies to universities, to political parties and to charities. It is the abuse of the political tax credit that is in question".

I did my homework. We are not guilty. If The Reform Party feels very guilty at death's door, we understand why.

TOURISM INDUSTRY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, at this time when jobs are at a premium, one of the fastest growing industries in our country has been given a boost.

Recently the minister of western economic diversification announced a project to develop job standards and certification programs for 27 tourism occupations. Now the tourist industry will be more prepared to meet the challenges of tomorrow's international tourism market.

Congratulations are due to the minister and everyone involved for their vision and dedication in improving and strengthening our market on the world level.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Saturday, March 21 marks International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, a day to remind us that ending racism is a long process whose cause all of us must take up daily.

Last night unfortunately we were reminded again that the ultimate act of racism is terrorism with the bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires, Argentina, that killed 11 people, injured 120 including many children, smashed windows for blocks and trapped survivors under the rubble.

It is clear the bombing was intended to scuttle the Middle East peace talks or to intimidate the government into closing recently opened files on Nazi war criminals living in South America.

Let us not allow that cruel act to change the course of history. Let us be sure that the meetings continue to move the world toward peace. This incident also reminds us of the ultimate consequences of racism here at home and around the world.

In Canada our fight against racism and hatred go hand in hand with our tradition of tolerance and respect for individual freedom of expression, be it Salman Rushdie's or Mordecai Richler's right to free speech. Racism must be eliminated.

AIR QUALITY ACCORD

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, exactly one year ago last Friday, the Prime Minister and President Bush affixed their signatures to the historic Canada–U.S. Air Quality Accord.

With the signing of the accord, both countries took a major step forward in undoing some of the damage we have both inflicted on the environment. We still have a long road to travel before the scourge of acid rain is eliminated from our midst. We must remain vigilant to ensure the terms of the accord are rigorously implemented on both sides of the border.

However, I believe the accord is a classic example of what two great peoples can accomplish when they act in the spirit of goodwill and co-operation.

The many individuals who worked to make the accord a reality, including the Prime Minister and you, Mr. Speaker, are to be commended for their tenacity and diligence in helping to ensure a healthier and cleaner environment for all.

CO-OP HOUSING

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, all people in Canada have a basic right to shelter. For the poor, co-op housing has been a saviour, putting a roof over thousands of heads, 5,000 in Winnipeg alone. It allows people shut out of the housing market to have choices and to live in dignity.

In Winnipeg North, a pioneer in co-op housing, there are three such units, but likely there will be no more. The federal government has killed the program though 164,000 families remain on the waiting list and more than 4,000 jobs hang in the balance. This is yet another example of classic Tory betrayal.

Somebody has to provide affordable housing to people in need. Federal responsibilities cannot be unloaded on to the backs of the provinces.

I ask this government: Did you kill co-op housing because it is a social safety net, a Liberal legacy, or because the needs of the poor carry no weight with you? Is it the Tory mandate to let food banks feed them and to let the slums house them?

Bring back co-op housing and address the needs of the poor.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the recently announced export tax on cigarettes of $8 per carton has caused great anxiety and consternation in the tobacco growing communities in and around Tillsonburg and in my riding of Oxford. As a result, the hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk and I have received a petition signed by about 4,500 constituents.

We acknowledge the need to take action to stop the smuggling of cigarettes into Canada, but a way more appropriate than the export tax needs to be found. Not only will this tax seriously injure tobacco producers, but also the support services in those communities, all the way down to those who operate duty free shops at our border crossings.

The Minister of Finance has made it very clear that he is not trying to increase his tax revenue from tobacco sales. It remains for producers, manufacturers, politicians and officials to come up with a more acceptable and effective way to reduce the smuggling of cigarettes into Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the indulgence of the Chair to say a few words on the historic vote in South Africa.

It was a victory for equality of all people, a victory for democracy and a victory for South Africa. On this issue, the House has spoken most of the time with only one voice and I am sure that the Prime Minister will convey on behalf of all members of this House and all Canadians our congratulations and best wishes to President de Klerk and the people of South Africa.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, coming back to the national scene, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In the budget papers, the Minister of Finance referred again and again to low interest rates as providing the basis for economic recovery. Since the budget, interest rates have been going up. Yesterday the minister said that it was not his fault; it was the uncertainty over the Constitution.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. Does the statement of the Minister of Finance yesterday mean that the budget projections are already wrong?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Only time will tell, because we have seen the projections of his predecessor wrong all the time, so I wanted to be on the record right away.

[Translation]

The Bank of Canada's policy is merely intent on raising interest rates. This idiotic policy will increase the bankruptcy rate, substantially increase unemployment and poverty in this country and accelerate the deindustrialization of the economy.

Why does the Conservative Government always bow to the Bank of Canada? Who is responsible for this country's economic slump, the government or the Bank of Canada?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to his comment about the former Minister of Finance being out in his projections, in fact, I think the record will show that from time to time he was out by approximately $100 million. However, that is not in the league of my hon. friend who was out by about 100 per cent on a regular basis when his party was in government. Nobody could match the record of my hon. friend and I do not think anybody would ever want to try.

[Translation]

Interestingly, the Leader of the Opposition deplores what he calls a high interest rate policy in the middle of a recession. The minister just explained the reasons for such a modest increase. Interest rates are now at their lowest level in nearly 20 years a major achievement for Canada.

• (1420)

And speaking of raising interest rates during a recession, does the Leader of the Opposition remember the recession in 1981–82, when his government raised interest rates to 22.75 per cent? Perhaps he should think about that for awhile.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): I would remind the Prime Minister that the recession did not occur in 1981–82 but in 1983.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

[English]

Yesterday the Minister of Finance very courageously said that it was not his fault, that it was the fault of somebody else if the interest rates were going up. It was the fault of the Bank of Canada.

This morning the Governor of the Bank of Canada said it was not his fault; it was the fault of the market.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. Who is running the economy of Canada? Who is going to take the responsibility for the mess we are in today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the minister indicated that the modest rise in interest rates was the fault of the Bank of Canada. That statement is false.

He then says that the Governor of the Bank of Canada says that the rise in interest rates was the fault of the market. That statement is false.

What can one expect? My hon. friend says that the 1981–82 recession did not take place in 1981–82, that it took place in 1983.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Before beginning it, I invite him to look at his own budget papers. They say that the recovery period in 1983 and 1984 was much stronger than the recovery period right now. He should look at his own budget papers.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance tried to blame the current economic mess on constitutional uncertainty, but Canadians know that this recession began long before this current uncertainty. Even the Prime Minister back in 1990 said that his government "had induced a slowdown".

Will the Minister of Finance stop looking for scapegoats for his failed economic policies and look at himself in the mirror and take some steps to reverse his unnecessary return to high interest rates and the unneeded unemployment that goes along with it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was responding to the hon. member's questions regarding the recent interest rates.

I said that there was volatility in the financial markets and that it had been caused by a number of factors, including the constitutional issue. I repeat that again. I think that all learned observers would share that view.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada held a press conference and, although invited to do so by journalists, he declined to agree with the Minister of Finance that the current constitutional uncertainty was to blame for the government's return to high interest rates.

Why does the minister insist on an excuse that even his buddy, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, refuses to accept?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about high interest rates.

I remind him that we have the lowest interest rates in 19 years. They are certainly a heck of a lot lower than when the hon. member presided over here on the treasury benches. At that time, five-year mortgages for homes was 19.75 per cent.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada did not deny that the constitutional issue was a factor. As I said yesterday, there are many factors that affect the markets. Whenever there are uncertainties in the markets, it creates a certain amount of volatility, both in the exchange market and in the money markets.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, with the same forbearance and indulgence you gave the Leader of the Official Opposition, I have just a few comments on behalf of our party.

I want to say how pleased we are with the outcome of the vote in South Africa, and I want to compliment the Prime Minister for consistently sticking to a matter of principle at the Commonwealth conferences regarding South Africa.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: And that is that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Back to normal.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question about the North American free trade agreement. I was interested in the fact that both the old line parties blamed each other's recession on each other's bureaucrats and any other excuse they could find. Neither one of them spoke about the damage to the economy of this country done by the free trade agreement. None.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade this question. Considering our experience with the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, has this government made up–to–date impact studies, sector by sector, of what the draft bracketed agreement will mean to jobs here in Canada, from textiles to automobile parts and automobiles themselves? Has this government done impact studies, sector by sector? If so, will it make them available to the members of this House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for his question, the first part of which is one of the finest he has asked in this House.

I should tell my hon. friend that in a conversation this morning with President de Klerk of South Africa, I conveyed the congratulations of all members of the House of Commons for the excellence of his courageous leadership in bringing this about.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: As my hon. friend points out, it was on Canada's behalf, with the Commonwealth, a lonely battle from time to time and the government was sustained throughout by the overwhelming majority of the House of Commons. This was a policy that was consistently followed by successive governments over many years and I think it says something about some of the fundamental values of this country of which we can all be proud.

With regard to the less elegant part of the question, my hon. friend asks about the North American free trade negotiations that are presently ongoing. My understanding is that there was the offer of a full briefing for my hon. friend and others tomorrow.

Ms. Copps: Secret.

Mr. Mulroney: No, it is not secret. My hon. friend says it is secret. It is not secret. How could it be secret if we offer to brief the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: That is an oxymoron, but I invite my hon. friend to come to the briefing. He will find that the Government of Canada will be full and forthcoming in its sharing of information. I look forward to having the opportunity of briefing my hon. friend and then having the House get the benefit of his views thereafter.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is making an offer to committee members that they are free to discuss anything they heard in the briefing, I will accept the offer. However, if the conditions remain that we are sworn to confidentiality, when I am sworn to confidentiality, I keep my word. Therefore, I will not go into a secret meeting, sworn to confidentiality.

I asked the Minister for International Trade a specific question about impact studies. My next question is also for the Minister for International Trade. Congresswoman Marcy Kaptur in the United States Congress has made a thorough study of the impact of NAFTA on the United States economy. She has determined that over 100,000 jobs have been lost in the U.S. automobile industry alone, many of them shifting to Mexico. General Motors has recently decided to shift the Moraine Engine Plant to Mexico with a loss to the United States of some 1,000 jobs.

I ask this government whether or not it too has done any specific studies. Has it heard or seen from General Motors that their over–all strategy is quietly to shift its production to Mexico while the negotiations are going on and at the end of the negotiations voilà, be almost out of Canada, significantly out of the United States, with the jobs all going to Mexico because of the North American free trade agreement?

• (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just comment on my hon. friend's point on the access that we have offered members of Parliament with regard to negotiations on the North American free trade agreement.

The committee members, through the committee chairman, came to the government and requested access to the document and the opportunity to have briefings. We, as consistent with the United States and Mexico, have offered confidential briefings to the committee members. It was on that basis that the offer was made.

I believe it is the first time this type of access and involvement in the making of treaties has been offered to opposition members in the House of Commons. My hon. friend—and I believe it is the case with the Liberal Party—has chosen to forgo this opportunity to participate in making policy in order that they can participate in Question Period and in politics of the basest sort. It is that sort of approach that I do not think is becoming of members of Parliament when this unprecedented offer has been made.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the question for the Minister for International Trade is not whether the confidential information is available or not. The question is basically: When is this government going to share with the Canadian people its objectives in the North American free trade negotiations? It is a simple question.

The minister refers to the committee being given information. Many months ago, a year and a half ago, the committee called for the closest possible consultation with Parliament so that the people of Canada had the opportunity to understand what was happening in the negotiations.

Is the minister now saying that the confidentiality rule will not be attempted and, rather, that we will have an open discussion in the committee of the government's policies in this vital issue?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have made known our objectives in the committee hearing about three weeks ago. I have made a number of speeches where I have set out quite clearly what the objectives of the Government of Canada are in the North American free trade negotiations.

What we have offered to both opposition party members of the committee is access to more detailed briefings on a confidential basis so that we can gain the benefit of their judgment on how the process should proceed. It is similar to the process we have under way with the International Trade Advisory Committee and the industry advisory committees where we meet with them on a regular basis, together with the provinces, in seeking broad sources of advice on the specific elements of the negotiations.

As I have said in my previous answer, this has never been done in the House of Commons. Quite frankly I am disappointed in the hon. member and his colleagues in not allowing this process to proceed in that open way.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, what benefit does this bring to the Canadian people? Am I supposed to spend my whole time talking to the member from the New Democratic Party about the deal behind some sort of closed doors?

The question is: What is this government doing to inform the Canadian people? What is it doing about the 50 per cent rule in automotive products? What is it doing on a subsidy code? What is it doing on a dispute settlement mechanism that will be prompt and binding?

These are the questions that we should be having answers to. When is this government going to share with the Canadian people what it is doing in these negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that in the previous rounds of multilateral trade negotiations or in the auto pact negotiations his party, the governments that he supported in the past on the Liberal side, gave no information to members of Parliament and gave precious little information to Canadians who were going to be affected by the process.

What we have done on our side when we have been negotiating treaties, the free trade agreement, the North American free trade agreement and the multilateral treaties, is that we have opened up the process.

My hon. friend is very well aware that during the process the government is provided information by industry that is confidential, that is commercially important to other countries if that confidential information is provided. It is on that basis that we have to draw a line. I think my hon. friend is well aware as a member of the private sector before he got to the House of Commons why we must draw that line for commercially confidential reasons.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The minister knows Canadian fruit and vegetable farmers already feel that they have been sold out under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. These farmers do an incredible job ensuring food security for Canada, and all they want is to be assured by this government that they will be able to continue to provide this food security for all Canadians.

Why does the government refuse to give this guarantee to Canadian farmers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the position of the Government of Canada has been extremely forthright and firm as far as the farmers of Canada are concerned.

The positions we have taken in both the multilateral negotiations in Geneva and in the North American free trade negotiations have been developed in concert, in full discussion with the farmers of Canada. It is a position that is supported by the farmers of Canada in both the North American as well as the Uruguay round negotiations.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The government knows that a system of tariffication will not provide the same level of protection for Canadian dairy, egg and poultry farmers as the present system. Yet reports out of the United States say that NAFTA negotiators are discussing a system of tariffication.

How can the government say that it is working against tariffication at the GATT negotiations and at the same time negotiate tariffication at the NAFTA negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple fact is we are not negotiating that.

My hon. friend knows—it is an open secret—that a number of countries in the negotiations like to see tariffication without exception. That has been presented. But are we negotiating it with them? No, we are not negotiating it with them.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this past Monday the Minister of National Health and Welfare rose in the House and insisted that breast implants were not available to women in Canada because of the voluntary moratorium. Yet, in the March 9 edition of Maclean's magazine in an article called "Beauty and the Breast", it is reported that an Ontario woman ignored the controversy and had implants the first week in March.

Will the minister investigate and advise the House about this incident as well as how many other incidents of implant surgery have taken place since the moratorium?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in the statements I made on breast implants in the last press release, I said that we had asked all concerned, surgeons as well as manufacturers, to refrain not only from using but also from obtaining silicone based breast implants. Of course, if my colleague refers to a specific case which can be investigated to determine exactly what happened, we shall do so and inform her accordingly.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would assume that was a yes, that the minister will look into this incident and see if there are any other incidents as well.

Yesterday, the plastic surgeons of Quebec held yet another press conference on breast implants and Dr. Roland Charbonneau said that studies have shown women who have breast implants in their body "are getting frightened and it is not justified". He also said that women who want breast implants are "psychologically disabled. They are not happy about their image".

I want to tell the minister that I like my image just fine, and I want to ask the minister if he shares the views of this plastic surgeon that I along with 150,000 Canadian women who are implantees are psychologically disabled?

• (1440)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the member asked me that question. She knows very well that what she said was said by somebody else. I never used those words. I always said that the health of women was paramount in terms of how we should deal with that.

I totally agree that there are women who need implants. They need all information available to make their own decision which we must all respect.

In that respect she knows that even if there were requests by the Plastic Surgeons Association in Quebec I did not put out the moratorium. I do not intend to do that as long as the committee agrees.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, today, at the request of this government, GATT is looking into the softwood dispute between Canada and the U.S.

Our softwood industry cannot afford a long, drawn-out process. Does the Minister for International Trade feel that we can get an early resolution through GATT? When does he expect a decision?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are two processes under way. There is one process, the countervailing duty process, which is under way in the United States. Following that process there could well be the dispute settlement mechanism, the binding decision by a panel on the process in the United States.

The second process is the GATT process to which my hon. friend has referred. We may well see some decisions on the GATT process some time this summer.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and it concerns the softwood lumber industry.

The government has recently told us on many occasions about the virtues of the bi-national dispute settlement mechanism in the free trade agreement the minister just mentioned. By the time we get a resolution with this process it can take up to two years. In the meantime the damage would have been done to many of our mills, particularly our smaller mills.

If the government believes that our softwood industry is not being subsidized, what programs and options is it considering? Will it provide interim relief to this industry while the dispute works its way through the process?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is referring to some of the same elements as the previous questioner did.

It is quite right. We have taken action against the United States on the softwood issue, on three different elements of the decision or the action it took. As I indicated, we should see the first indications of those decisions some time this summer; not the two years my hon. friend has referred to.

Let us see what happens with the process as it unfolds. As the member from Winnipeg drew to the attention of the House a week or so ago, certain options are available to us. I think it is important that we complete this process in the strongest possible way and try to win the decisions as quickly as possible.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister answering for agriculture today.

Late last month it was announced that farmers would immediately be able to truck their grain to the United States without off-loading at country elevators and without the regular charges.

This came as a shock to the grain companies. Clearly it was done without consultation. Clearly it was a political directive and clearly it undermined the independence of the Canadian Wheat Board.

What possible explanation does the minister have? Is it one more step toward dismantling the Canadian Wheat Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains, I will take note of the question and make inquiries on it.

It is in the interest of us all including Canadian farmers to sell as much wheat as possible as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister responding for revenue today.

Until recently Canadian farmers trucking grain to the United States were required to fill out what was called the B-13 form for customs officials at the border. I am now advised by customs officials in the province of Manitoba that this practice has been dropped. This raises the possibility that some farmers will neglect going to the elevator and acquiring an export permit. They will simply cross the border, no questions asked.

My question is what possible motive lies behind the elimination of customs inspection of grain shipments by truck?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, once again I shall note the question, which is technical, and answer my colleague as soon as possible.

THALIDOMIDE VICTIMS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health and welfare regarding the extraordinary assistance plan for thalidomide victims.

I brought three thalidomide victims cases from my riding to the minister's attention in November 1991. All have legal medical proof that their mothers took thalidomide during pregnancy. However, the bureaucrat in his department is stonewalling, refusing to grant hearings, and making unqualified decisions.

As the program expires on March 31, is he going to take his ministerial responsibilities seriously and look over those decisions and ensure that my constituents receive all the benefits they are entitled to?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I always take all my responsibilities seriously.

I just want to say that the member is right, those decisions were made by the office, but they were made in collaboration with all organizations dealing with the problem of thalidomide.

Moreover, it was done in a way that today all those who qualified as victims are satisfied with the settlement we proposed. We are very close to making the final announcement. Those who were not considered were not considered because they were not qualified under the policy we recently put forward.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am not happy with the response of the minister. He tells me that the decision was made by his bureaucrat. My information is that the bureaucrat had no consultation with physicians or legal people. Is the minister going to take his responsibility seriously and review those cases instead of letting them be handled by someone who is not qualified? Yes or no.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No.

ATMOSPHERIC CONTAMINANTS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister of health.

A delegation of B.C. New Democrat MPs has just returned from a tour of the Hanford nuclear bomb plant in Richland, Washington. The scientists at Hanford confirmed that residents of southeastern British Columbia were likely exposed to atmospheric radioactive contamination from the years of both accidental and deliberate releases of atmospheric contaminants from Hanford. What we do not know is how much or whether there have been any long-term health effects.

Will the minister recognize the need to send a Canadian team of scientists to Hanford to work with the scientists involved in the Hanford Dose Reconstruction Project in order to better determine the extent to which Canadians may have been put at risk?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member he would know that the Atomic Energy Control Board is responsible for radiation as well as radiation limits.

The agency works very closely with health and welfare in terms of any crossovers relating to health risk. I will be in touch with the president of the AECB later today and ask him for an update on the issue that the member has raised.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's response.

On another item, the U.S. authorities are currently undertaking a wide ranging epidemiological study to investigate the increased incidences of thyroid disease and cancer that may be associated with radioactive Iodine-131 releases coming from Hanford.

Should the American studies indicate that significant levels of radioactive contamination did in fact cross the U.S.-Canada border, is the minister prepared to initiate similar epidemiological studies to investigate possible long-term health effects to the Canadian population?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will not speculate on the issue that the hon. member raised. My first answer applies also to his second question. If there is scientific evidence, if there is direction from the AECB, we will follow that up.

• (1450)

I think it is very important, and I know that the hon. member did it in good conscience when he asked his question, that in these areas we do not speculate, but we base our information on science. I am sure that is what he is interested in and that is what I am interested in.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Our government showed the way by imposing sanctions against South Africa. The overwhelming yes response to the referendum has opened a window of opportunity for new economic relations between our two great peoples. Will the Prime Minister now seize this opportunity to place trade officials in South Africa so that business, trade and investment in London—Middlesex, and indeed across Canada, may flourish as partners in the rebirth of this great nation before the window is slammed shut?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for an important question. As the House knows, the government, as an indication of the regard that we have for the importance of the decision taken by President De Klerk, committed $5 million today to assist black and white South Africans, particularly black South Africans, to participate economically in development in that area, particularly in regard to the democratic process.

Sanctions that we have followed from the very beginning have been followed jointly with other members of the Commonwealth. The Secretary of State for External Affairs presently chairs the Commonwealth Committee on Sanctions. We met earlier today and agreed that the government will, in co-operation with our Commonwealth partners, seek to send a further signal of confidence to underline the tremendous contribution and leadership shown by President De Klerk at this most critical moment in the evolution of the life of South Africa.

We have always worked together with our Commonwealth allies and we would not want to break ranks now. We will be communicating with members of the Commonwealth to urge them to take some actions now which would send a very positive signal to the President of South Africa and to trading partners around the world and would have the effect of achieving some of the objectives requested by my hon. friend from London a few moments ago.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The most recent figures show the number of daily car trips by Canadians to the U.S. is continuing to increase. Committees of mayors, reeves and business people in border towns attribute this tendency to the wide discrepancy in the price of gasoline between Canada and the United States.

Why will the minister not announce immediately that he is eliminating the 8.5 cents a litre federal tax on gasoline to reduce the number of day trips by Canadians to the U.S.?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question which covers a number of different portfolios. May I just say to him that the difference on diesel on the federal excise tax in Canada now is lower than that of the United States. That was done by our government and that should be kept in mind.

Second, we have done a survey of taking the federal excise tax on gasoline, as compared to the American, and we are higher on gasoline, but if you take a look at a comparison as well of a province, say my own province of Manitoba and the neighbouring state of North Dakota and compare those two figures in every province and every state, you will find that if there is room and if there would be any change at all, there would have to be very close provincial co-operation.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): I appreciate that answer, but most of the trips that are made in my community are not made by diesel operated vehicles. I think that is a bit of a myth.

In any event, will the minister conduct a study to compare the amount of revenue generated by the federal tax on gasoline as opposed to the cumulative loss caused by cross-border shopping through unemployment, bankruptcies, a lowered municipal tax base and all the other negative effects that one day cross-border shopping trips are having on border towns across this nation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was making the case of diesel where, if you look at some of the diesel sales even where we are lower, some of the very arguments that he uses still apply.

I only say to the hon. member that we have used our tax structure, both at the national level and at the provincial level, in a different manner than the Americans have. If there is to be a review, that would be up to our government.

I say to him that there are other factors as well. If you take a look at the over-all tax structure in the United States as compared to Canada, there are for example areas relating to the cost of university fees—I give you that—health care fees, or estate taxes which we have eliminated. Those are all differences as well.

One cannot simply look at the one area, though I know he raises it from a very specific perspective. All of those areas have to be looked at as well.

TERRORISM

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Over the past three weeks we have watched tragically five separate terrorist attacks taking place against Israeli nationals. There were three in Israel itself, one in Turkey and the tragic bombing in Argentine yesterday. The result is over 15 deaths, 125 wounded and many of them schoolchildren, which is something that I think we all abhor.

What action is the Government of Canada taking to protest against these terrorist actions and trying to mobilize international opposition in an effort to stop them while the peace process is gong on?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a point of view that all of us in this House share.

Yesterday the Prime Minister sent the following message to Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir of Israel: "Canadians were shocked and outraged today at the news of the bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires. We join with civilized people everywhere in condemning this further brutal violence against the state of Israel".

There are a number of steps that we are taking. One is our activity in the multilateral round of the Middle East peace talks where we are chairing the working group on the very sensitive issue of refugees.

We have urged all sides to take confidence building measures while these negotiations are going on and to cease acts of violence that lead to the kind of things that we saw yesterday. We do not want to see any repetition on any side at all.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we certainly support sending a letter of condolence to the Prime Minister of Israel.

We are really asking if the Government of Canada is taking action with other countries in the Middle East to ask them to also raise their voice of condemnation especially at a time when the Middle East peace process is so important?

Will the Government of Canada be asking the governments of Egypt, Syria and Jordan to also join the international community in protesting against acts of terrorism so that there can be a total agreement and consensus among all countries in the Middle East that terrorism is not the way to peace?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a consistent part of our message to all of the countries in the Middle East.

In the multilateral round concerning the peace process that was held in Moscow, I had a first-hand opportunity to speak to many of the countries on both sides of this issue and explain to them Canada's very strongly held views considering terrorism and violence among many of the other things that we talked about, but that certainly is a key part of the message that we portrayed then. We will continue to make it not just in the case of this instance but on a consistent basis.

ENERGY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It focuses on the indications of the Saskatchewan Romanow government that the energy agreement between Canada and Saskatchewan and the nuclear agreement between AECL and Sask Power will be ripped up.

What does the minister see as the potential impact of this premature action by the NDP Government of Saskatchewan? What will it mean for the future of energy for the people of Saskatchewan, including our aboriginal community in my province?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we were very much involved in the agreement that AECL entered into with the Saskatchewan government on behalf of Canada.

With the diversification which I as a member coming from from the prairies know has to take place, we thought we could get diversification in Saskatchewan because it has a world class uranium industry. In fact, it is the single largest private employer in Saskatchewan today.

We also are willing to have an examination. We were not forcing a Candu III on them. We were looking at an ability for them to get the engineering, the research, the technical help and also research, for instance, at the University of Saskatchewan. All those things were included. In fact, we were ready to transfer up to 170 people into Saskatchewan. That has all been stopped by the recent announcement of the premier.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Minister of Veterans Affairs that the merchant mariners of World War II have been asking for justice since 1945 and still do not have it.

Last October the standing committee tabled a unanimous report recommending that merchant navy veterans be recognized as full veterans entitled to all veterans benefits, that an appropriate memorial be erected for merchant seamen and that a Book of Remembrance be placed in the Peace Tower.

The minister's response consisted of a letter to the chairman saying his reply was going to take another month.

When does the minister expect a report from General Smith, his so-called adviser? Will he table his recommendations in this House? When does he expect to report further to the House? Will he do it by making a statement in this House or is he going to continue the callous disregard and indifference to merchant seamen by every government since 1945?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly I and all of my predecessors, and I am sure every parliamentarian here, agree that the merchant mariners underwent some very difficult conditions during the war supplying our troops and so on.

For that very reason, not only this government but previous governments as well, gave them a whole array of programs. There is a misconception out there that they are not getting anything. They get disability pensions, Veterans Independence Programs in some circumstances, civilian war allowance, prisoner of war allowance, campaign medals except the CVSM, attendants' allowance, clothing allowance and exceptional incapacity allowance.

I do understand that the merchant mariners want their access criteria widened to other programs the veterans have. In response to that, I might say that this government has undertaken, with veterans groups, the most comprehensive review of this issue since World War II.

I indicated on February 28 that I would have an answer shortly. When the government has a response, we will make a response in the House or elsewhere.

PRIVILEGE

REPLY IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Question Period I put a question, answered by the government House leader, in which I asked him why the government was continuing to index judges' salaries—they are making over $147,000 a year—and freezing other salaries. One hundred thousand PSAC people make less than $25,000 a year.

The minister answered my question by saying he could not answer because there was a bill before the House with respect to judges' salaries.

Ironically, on checking, I found that the bill does not deal with indexing at all. However, that is not the point. The point is that a minister can answer in the House by saying that there is no answer and he cannot give an answer because a bill is before the House.

I made reference to Beauchesne's in which it clearly says that when we are talking about a bill before the House, we are talking about a bill to be debated that day. The Deputy Speaker, Mr. Speaker, in your absence, indicated that she did not know that there had been a ruling in the House that day, a House order, that the debate for the afternoon would be on the environment, not on a judges' bill.

I raise the matter because I am concerned that we might fall into a bad practice in the House. I think this matter needs clearing up because it affects future questions. If a minister can simply stand up and say: "Well I am answering by saying I don't have to answer this question because there is a bill before the House", a pension bill, an environmental bill or whatever, it would seem to me that the government could duck answering a lot of questions. I think this should be cleared up.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear further, but I think it is important if there is going to be any discussion on this to understand clearly what the issue is.

The first issue is whether or not the question put by the hon. member yesterday is out of order because it anticipates an Order of the Day. That is the first question.

If it is, then the second matter of whether or not the minister has to answer does not even come into play. Of course a minister does not have to give an answer if the minister does not wish to do so.

But I think the issue we really have to look at here that the hon. member has raised is this: Is the question in order?

The hon. member may want to address the Chair further on that, because that really is the question.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I understood the question was: Is the answer in order? But, of course, a question has to be in order before an answer can be in order.

I would submit the question was in order, in that no Order of the Day was anticipated because the Order of the Day was to discuss an environmental bill. There was before the House sitting on the table a bill on judges' salaries which, of course, did not even deal with indexing, which is what my question was about. But even if it had dealt with indexing—I do not want to stray from the point—my submission is that I could still ask the question because we were not debating that bill.

There are a whole slew of bills before the House and we can still ask general questions on those bills.

The question clearly dealt with what was the government's priority, where it was granting indexing to one group and freezing salaries and not granting indexing to another group?

I am in perfect agreement with the minister and with the Speaker that the minister could stand up and say he was not answering that question. He has a perfect right to do that. But I submit that he cannot stand up and say that he is answering the question by saying: "I don't have to answer the question because there is a bill sitting there on the table", which may or may not deal with the subject matter, but certainly was not dealing with the subject matter on the day when I put the question.

So the question is in order. I ask the minister to simply stand in the House and indicate that he was wrong. I do not think we should establish a bad precedent like this.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, talk about a tempest in a teapot. The hon. member stood and said this was a point of privilege but I have yet to hear any evidence from him or any suggestions that it is a point of privilege. So I hope you would acknowledge that it is not a point of privilege.

Second, he described his question as a supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I think checking into the two questions shows that it was not supplementary in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Waddell: That's not the issue.

Mr. Andre: Now he says that is not at issue. Whether his question was supplementary or not is not at issue. He acknowledges that there is no obligation on the part of the government to answer the question anyway, so how can he suggest that an unsatisfactory answer somehow reflects on his privileges, since no answer is a satisfactory answer, or anything else.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could help the hon. government House leader? The hon. government House leader has remarked that this probably is not a question of privilege. It is not a question of privilege; it is a point of order.

But, now that we are into it, I am certainly going to hear it. The hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: As I was saying, I think it is a specious point of order anyway.

Perhaps the hon. member will also withdraw his comments where he says "the government has awarded some indexing" and appreciate that in fact the indexing of judges' salaries is a result of an act of Parliament and not a decision by this government to do anything, not something that can be changed. That is another reason why the question was inaccurate because of its implications or imputations that somehow a decision was made.

I well acknowledge that I was of the opinion that questions, which do occur frequently on here, that deal with legislation that is before the House were out of order. Frankly I think they should be. I think that Question Period should be restricted to what Beauchesne describes Question Period as, namely an opportunity to seek information from the government that cannot be sought in other ways, such as questions on a bill then before the House. I do not think Question Period should be used for that purpose.

But we can talk about those rules at another occasion.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member has raised a matter by way of a question of privilege and I have pointed out that it is not a question of privilege, it is a point of order. Surely his colleagues ought to allow the government House leader to respond. The hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: As I was saying, I was of the opinion that a question dealing with legislation ought not to be put in Question Period. That is why we have debates. Question Period is not described in Beauchesne and ought not, I believe, be an addition to the debates we have here on legislation.

As to the question of the quality of my answer, all right, I will concede it could have been a higher quality answer. I get back to the comments I made yesterday which the hon. member heard. In fact no answer is required. I was mistaken in suggesting that I did not have to answer. Instead of this answer, please take it out and say my answer is no answer.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the government House leader, if I understand him correctly, has done what needed to be done, that is acknowledged that the answer he gave in using a procedural argument for not answering when in fact all he had to do was not answer. That is what is at stake here. We acknowledged yesterday that no minister, according to the rules of this House, has to answer a question when it is asked.

What we took issue with yesterday was the minister using an interpretation of the rules of the House which was subsequently not validated by the Speaker in order to not answer the question. What we needed either from the Speaker was an instruction that this not happen in the future or an admission by the government House leader that that was not the way he should have dealt with it. I think that is what we just got and perhaps the matter can rest there.

It was certainly never the case that the admissibility of the question was at issue. Whether or not the question was in order was not what was at issue yesterday. Certainly if that had been the case, Madam Speaker would have said something about that. She did not.

What was at issue was whether or not the answer was in order, because it gave what we thought at the time, and still do, and what Madam Speaker appeared to think yesterday, an interpretation to the rules of this House which we felt set a bad precedent. If I understand everything that has been said here today, we agree on that and perhaps the matter does not need to be pursued any further.

Mr. Andre: Except for one thing, the hon. member's question was out of order. It was not a supplementary to the previous question. It was a total distortion.

I will say this about the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. I want to congratulate him for not screaming and yelling at the top of his lungs today like he did yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member rises further, I will hear him.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I want to wind up the matter. I see the government House leader has left. I just want to point out very quietly that he is not the Speaker, he is the government House leader and maybe he should remember that.

I want to thank you for hearing me on the point. I accept the government House leader's acknowledgement that he has a different view today than he had yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

CANADIAN GRAIN COMMISSION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1990-91 CROP YEAR

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, I am very pleased to table, in both official languages, the annual report for the 1990-91 crop year of the Canadian Grain Commission, pursuant to section 15 of the Canada Grain Act.

Pursuant to Standing Order 32(5), this document is deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

BILL C-61

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE C

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of Legislative Committee C on Bill C-61, an act to provide Borrowing Authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992, without amendment.

I would also like to acknowledge the fine co-operation I received from the members of all three parties who participated on this committee.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a series of petitions signed by over 300 residents of northwestern Ontario, Red Rock, Nipigon, Schreiber, Terrace Bay, Marathon, Heron Bay, Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay.

All of those citizens lost their rail services two years ago. They call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990, particularly those services eliminated along the north shore of Lake Superior, maintain and upgrade Ontario's services upon which many residents rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

I hope the government is listening.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, since August 1991, colleagues of mine have been presenting large numbers of petitions in the House dealing with the Nina de Villiers murder in August 1991.

Today I have 24 sheets signed by petitioners who claim that the current criminal law does not require bail hearings in crimes of violence to be presided over by judges and that the risk to society posed by the early release of a violent offender appears to be of secondary consideration to the rights of the individual criminal.

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

I humbly present these petitions to Parliament.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by electors in Quebec who deplore the fact that for over half a century there has been an illegal trade in Haitian workers between Haiti and the Dominican Republic and that these human beings, who are treated like cattle, are confined within the bateys and obliged to cut sugar cane under conditions that fly in the face of human rights.

Consequently your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to impose diplomatic, political and economic sanctions on the Dominican Republic, until such time as the rights of these Haitian braceros and their families are respected in accordance with the universal declaration of human rights.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present two petitions from hundreds of residents all across the country, petitioning Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have the honour to present two petitions in the name of my constituents.

On the first one, my petitioners indicate that the government is denying equal financial benefits to those who are at home caring for their children as opposed to those who have receipted day care receipts and they want that corrected.

They wanted, as well, that married couples enjoy the same tax benefits and opportunities as common-law couples, but that has changed in the reverse direction in the last budget. They deplore the fact there are many programs that are often confusing and work against the family. They would like to see all of this changed.

RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): With regard to the second petition, the people of my riding want the CRTC to regulate foul language on radio and television.

They see often their efforts as parents being eroded and undermined by the language that is often used on radio and television programs. They find that foul language in any language is simply unacceptable. They want the CRTC to enforce strict rules of language conduct on radio and television.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a number of petitions this afternoon.

First of all, I have a petition from residents of Alberta and British Columbia, who point out that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison.

They have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole. The cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample ground for the government of Canada to seek a remedy on their behalf and that remedy is expulsion.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to their homes in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Quebec City who point out that Canada enjoys an international reputation as a leading defender of human rights.

Considering the fact that for over half a century there has been an illegal trade in Haitian workers between Haiti and the Dominican Republic and that these human beings, who are treated like cattle, are confined within the bateys and obliged to cut sugar cane under conditions that fly in the face of human rights, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to impose diplomatic, political and economic sanctions on the Dominican Republic and to take the initiative by raising this issue at the United Nations to ensure that the UN makes it one of its priorities.

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, as well, I have a petition which is signed by hundreds of residents of North Burnaby who note that Canada Post is continuing to close and privatize postal stations and that the counter service at the North Burnaby postal station on South MacDonald Street in Burnaby has been closed down.

Therefore, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to stop the closure and privatization of postal services and to reopen the counter service at the North Burnaby postal station in its same location run by the Canada Post corporation.

PENSIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition which is signed by hundreds of residents of the lower mainland of British Columbia and in particular, by Agriculture Canada employees at Royal Avenue in New Westminster, British Columbia, who are members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

They point out that indexed pensions for all Canadians are essential. They are concerned that linking pension benefits to increases in the cost of living at least allows pensioners to maintain the value of whatever pensions they receive. They are concerned about the government's decision to restrict and remove full inflation protection.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to maintain full inflation protection for federal public employees as a demonstration of the government's commitment to full indexed pensions for all Canadians.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by residents of Ottawa and Montreal, which points out that the National Film Board Studio D is recognized world-wide as a production centre for films pertaining to and made in the interests of women.

They point out that it is very dependent on federal funding but it must be independent in its production of films, and that one such production of Studio D, The Burning Times, has been subject to public pressure by small groups.

Therefore, they call upon the Government of Canada to continue its funding of the National Film Board Studio D and to permit film makers to make films and maintain freedom of expression without the pressure of Government.

IMMIGRANTS AND REFUGEES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by more than 1,000 individuals who came to Canada from eastern Europe as self-exiled individuals under our refugee and immigration legislation and whose applications have been delayed for hearing up to three years.

These petitioners ask the government and the Parliament of Canada to co-operate in speeding up the processing of their outstanding applications, to remove the quotas which have been implemented without regulation or Parliamentary approval, to apply the traditional sunset provisions in the processing of outstanding self-exiled applications, to allow these self-exiled applicants in Canada to work and to go to school during the traditional period and to accept all persons registered in the refugee backlog who are established in Canada for landed immigrant status at their pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents from all parts of Canada—Winnipeg, Manitoba; Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; Kingston, Ontario; Kirkland Lake, Ontario; Comox, British Columbia, and many many other places too numerous to mention.

The petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and call upon this House to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act in order to ensure that these crimes are reduced as far as possible in this country.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition from 186 residents of Canada in Grand Falls, Newfoundland; West Lorne, Ottawa, Chatham, Val Thérèse, Nepean, Thornhill, North Bay and Belleville, Ontario; and Quebec City who are concerned for the spouses and children of people who have been accepted for landing as either members of the refugee backlog or as refugees.

They urge Parliament to call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a number of petitions that also deal with the concerns of many Canadians, mainly from Quebec, on the continuing trade in humans and indentured labour between Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

The Canadian Institute of Human Rights and Democratic Development is studying this issue and holding a conference on the subject on Monday, March 23.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to use their good offices to encourage the government and the United Nations to take action on this disregard for human rights which allows the trade in human beings.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I have a petition certified correct under Standing Order 36 wherein the petitioners note that the goods and services tax applies to female sanitary products such as tampons and pads. These products are necessities for women between puberty and menopause.

The government has decided that the goods and services tax should not apply to certain foods because they are necessities. Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 217 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 217—Mr. Fulton:

Do Revenue Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have paid informant programs and, if so, how many people have received payments (a) in what amounts (b) how many were residing outside Canada (c) how many were non-Canadian citizens (d) how many were government employees (including RCMP and CSIS)?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the departments of revenue and fisheries and oceans as follows:

Revenue Canada, Taxation does not have paid informant programs.

Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise has a paid informant program. A review of their files between April 1984 and November 1991 indicates payments to informants totalling $836,078 with an average payment of approximately $2,900.

Under this program statistical data are compiled based on the number of payments. The department cannot be categoric about the actual number of informants for two reasons. One, a single payment could be split between multiple informants and, two, a single informant may furnish information on numerous case each warranting separate payments.

The department does not specifically record the citizenship of informants. Residency is not known in all cases: However, in at least 30 instances payments were made to non-residents. To their knowledge no payments have been made to government employees. Furthermore, departmental policy prohibits any award to members of Customs and Excise or the RCMP (including CSIS).

Fisheries and oceans does not have an ongoing paid informant program.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Questions Nos. 193 and 226 could be made Orders for Returns, these returns would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Starred Questions Nos. 193 and 226 be made Orders for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 193—Mr. Fulton:

Since September 1984 has the government paid informants and, if so, for each department (a) what was the total amount paid, (b) what the average payment, (c) how many charges were laid as a result of such information, (d) what steps have been taken to ensure public accountability for such expenses?

Return tabled.

Question No. 226—Mr. Althouse:

With respect to Transportation Talks, a public forum on grain transportation, (a) how much money has Agriculture Canada and the government spent in their involvement in that forum (b) how many Department of Agriculture officials were involved in the over-all project (c) how many private consultants or contractors were hired to work on Transportation Talks project (i) what are their names (ii) how much were they paid (iii) when were the contracts for this program signed (iv) what were the directives given to the contracting agencies by the department or the minister (v) when was the contract to be completed?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I was wondering if the parliamentary secretary could indicate whether or not there is some likely date when questions that I have had on the Order Paper for quite some period of time, whether or not they could be answered in the near future.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to Question No. 193 standing in his name. This question involved dealing with several departments. It is my understanding that we have just about completed the process and we should be able to give him an answer in the not very distant future. I will certainly check on it to see if we can speed it up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could indicate when the papers I have requested to be produced could be?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as I understand it, the hon. member has two motions for the production of papers. One I understand that the department or officials will be in touch with him to speak with him about it. The other one is again being finalized right now. I would expect that perhaps as early as next Wednesday we would be able to answer it.

As I say on the first one, I understand somebody will be in touch with him to discuss it and to see if they can resolve the question with him.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I would also like to ask the parliamentary secretary when he intends to produce a response to my Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers with respect to research contracts awarded by the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am sorry, I do not have any information on that particular motion. I suspect that is because it has not yet reached the 45 day time period. I would not have the information unless it was late. I will certainly check on it and see what I can do.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Charest that Bill C–13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has eight minutes remaining in debate.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, yesterday afternoon when the time ran out on the debate, I was discussing the matter of policy relating to environmental assessment. At that time, I was talking about the free trade deal with Mexico as being a matter of policy that should be discussed. I will continue that line of debate that began yesterday.

In order to bring in foreign investment and appease International Monetary Fund and World Bank demands, the future of our planet is being, quite simply, sold off at bargain basement prices. Stephen Hasell addressed the committee on behalf of the Canadian Environmental Network. He said: "We think the assessment of the environmental effects of policy and programs should be subject to the over–all legislative framework of Bill C–13".

The essence of our case made by the World Commission on Environment and Development, known as the Brundtland report, can be summarized as follows: human stresses on the planetary ecosystem are now endangering the basic integrity of the system. A good part of the current problem and a worsening concern for the future is the rising numbers and desperation of the world's poor. The living standards of the poor must be raised substantially if population is to be stabilized and environmental abuses resulting from economic desperation are to be eliminated.

Even if the needed economic improvements are achieved quickly, the human population will increase from the current 5 billion to at least 8 billion before stabilizing. The development effort needed to ensure sufficiency and security for all these people is substantial. For many goods, production levels several times higher than current levels are required.

At the same time, development must ensure environmental sustainability or the economic gains will not last.

Finally, development with environmental sustainability can be achieved only if growth is accompanied by strenuous efforts to improve efficiencies and minimize negative impacts, replace environmentally destructive technologies with relatively benign ones, and respect carrying capacities.

The federal government has refused to respect the urgent case made by the World Commission on the Environment and Development. As a result of the fact that current human demands and practices are not sustainable, steps to combat poverty through sustainable development in poor regions and nations must be accompanied by a sizeable over-all reduction of resource use and environmental impact, especially by wealthy nations and regions like Canada. Otherwise, global deterioration will continue.

At the same time it is important to give credit where credit is due. The federal government agreed to include a commitment to sustainable development in the preamble of the bill before us.

The government also agreed to an amendment which significantly expands the definition of environmental effects to include physical and cultural heritage. There was also agreement to include the Brundtland definition of sustainable development as development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

The government also agreed to amendments that would establish public participation at many important steps within the bill. Unfortunately, the legislation itself does not establish adequate intervener funding, that will be left to the regulations. However, there is no question that room has been made for public involvement in the federal environmental assessment process.

There is also no question that there have been significant improvements to the environmental assessment process itself. With the glaring exception of the screening stage, I was able to win support for amendments which ensure that when a project is to be assessed by a more thorough comprehensive study, a mediation, or an assessment by a review panel the following factors must be taken into account: the purpose of the project, alternative means of carrying out the project that are technically and economically feasible, the environmental effects of any such alternatives, the need for—and this is important—and the requirement of any follow-up program with respect to the project, and the capacity of renewable resources likely to be significantly affected by the project to meet the needs of the present and the future.

The government is to be commended, as is the process during the committee's clause by clause review, for strengthening this important part of the bill.

Another important step the government agreed to in the committee's deliberations was to take into account the impact of any mitigation measures on the decision-making process. Also, the government agreed to examine not only the project being assessed but the cumulative impact of the project and other projects on the environment.

For example, if there was a proposal to build a pulp mill which would discharge a certain amount of effluent into a river and also a proposal to reduce the flow of that river for energy purposes the cumulative impact of the effluent on the reduced flow would have to be assessed.

The government also agreed to extend the protection of aboriginal lands in the proposed legislation. The inclusion of several changes, most notably including consideration of lands in which Indians have an interest and aboriginal lands to which claim has been laid, improves the way in which the bill includes these territories in the scope of environmental assessment.

When all is said and done, Bill C-13, an act to provide for a federal environmental assessment process, represents a major step forward. The existing EARP guidelines are tremendously flawed and inefficient. The court cases dealing with Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman Dam attest to that. As well, the inability to effectively assess projects such as Kemano and Point Aconi further underscore the serious shortcoming of EARP's assessment provision.

When this act was first introduced as Bill C-78 and then reintroduced as Bill C-13 was worse than the existing guidelines. The bill was drafted to please major developers and made it permanent open season on the environment. There is no question that the acceptance by the government of so many of the amendments brought forward during the committee stage went a long, long way toward developing the type of environmental legislation more appropriate to the needs of this country.

The recent acceptance of the concept of the five-year review represents a further step in this long journey toward a delicate and important environmental assessment process.

• (1540)

However let us make no mistake, as I have said earlier there are serious flaws with the bill. It is not the bill we would write if the New Democratic Party were the government in this country. Many of these flaws were consciously put in the bill by members of the cabinet. This government refused to accept attempts to move amendments to further protect Canada's environment by fixing these flaws.

I serve notice to the government and the members of this House that I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party will work, and work hard, to introduce changes to this legislation in the period during this five-year review to leave Canadians with a better environmental assessment process and, we hope, therefore a better environment for the generations that will come after us.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my colleague who just made an eloquent speech. I know that he worked very hard at the committee regarding the report stage of the bill that is now in third reading, and I want to ask him what he thinks of the consideration of this bill. At a time when there is a lot of talk about constitutional issues, at a time when we wonder, for instance, about the degree of jurisdiction that the provinces should have, at a time when the three main federalist parties all say that they are open to a constitutional renewal, would the hon. member not prefer that this debate take place only in a few months, so as to avoid this whole issue of federal-provincial jurisdictions, and instead give serious thought to what should be a true environmental bill in terms of exclusive federal jurisdiction, and to leave to provinces their own jurisdiction? Like the Canadian Electrical Association says, this bill deals with just about everything but it does not solve the environment problem in a thorough manner.

This legislation will only delay hydroelectric projects and other initiatives that have no impact on the environment. Because of all those delays, and I am talking about delays that are not fixed but that can be extended as much as we want, in the context of the bill this could affect investment planning and those investments might well be made in other countries precisely because our jurisdiction is not clear. We already know that with such a bill, and Minister Paradis from Quebec said so yesterday, we open the door to all kinds of judicial procedures in order to determine which government must intervene: the provincial or the federal.

Does my colleague wish, as a champion of the environment, for this debate to take place in a few months, once we have defined what kind of Constitution we will have in Canada? Are we heading toward sovereignty in Quebec, with two governments having important central powers and with joint economic arrangements? Or are we heading towards a redefinition of Canada, as the three federalist parties hope, with a well defined distribution of powers, for example in the energy sector, like the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee was told? Since this whole debate is not over yet, are we not throwing oil on the fire with such a bill? Are we not thwarting the legitimate aspirations of some provinces like Quebec, which has always wanted better jurisdiction as regards the environment, a full and comprehensive jurisdiction, without constant interference from the federal government to slow down its economic development?

I ask my colleague if he has given some thought to that issue and if he is prepared to share his views with us.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I am happy to try to answer this question. On numerous occasions in this House I have expressed my belief that the environment is a matter that knows no provincial boundaries, it knows no political or historic boundaries created by humans. The environment extends beyond those artificial boundaries, whether they are created by politics, history, heritage or whatever.

I have always looked at the development of this bill first in terms of the protection of the environment and second, in terms of the way in which the various players in this country would fit into it.

I was not surprised by the remarks of Mr. Paradis that appeared in the media this morning. However, I was a little surprised at the time it has taken for those remarks to come to our attention.

The bill has been with us for over two years. It is a bill that has had considerable attention inside and outside the House of Commons. If I am not mistaken it is a bill that was originally drafted when the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was the Minister of the Environment. It took into account a number of jurisdictional areas.

The bill, as I read it, goes no further on the environment than what was recommended by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Oldman Dam decision. As I recall all judges were of the same opinion on the jurisdictional issues regarding the environment. This bill simply reinforces the Supreme Court decision.

I listened very carefully during committee hearings when the Council of Ministers of the Environment, then represented by the provincial minister of British Columbia, was heard. The Council of the Ministers of the Environment is now headed by the federal Minister of the Environment. At that time there was a fairly strong representation about the ability of the various jurisdictions to work hand in hand.

Although it has some faults, the decision of our committee on the joint review panels very successfully dealt with this area of jurisdiction. While the federal authority is in essence paramount, the joint panels have a significant participation from within the provincial offices. The joint panels, when they are convened, will serve the environment and provincial needs quite well.

Therefore, at least in this part of Bill C-13, I feel quite comfortable with the direction that has been taken. I feel that the government and the committee have taken the correct steps in this regard.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are two and a half minutes left in the debate. Does the hon. member for Richelieu wish to speak?

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, the previous speaker stated that the environment is neither a federal nor a provincial matter, that it knows no boundaries. That is fine, we all agree on that, but this does not mean that the environment is not managed as well when it is managed provincially rather than, federally. That is my point.

Why this overlap, this duplication of efforts, as it is referred to by the Canadian Electric Association, by the Quebec government—because this encroachment Mr. Paradis talks about would have an impact—when there are very well defined provincial jurisdictions which are, indeed, very well managed? This environmental clause will empower the federal government, upon granting any amount as a result of its spending authority, to get involved in them environmental assessment of the operations of small and medium sized businesses despite the fact this is a matter over which Quebec has exclusive jurisdiction. That is why Mr. Paradis expressed concern although he is a known federalist. He says the same thing happens with regard to energy, forestry, transportation and so on. We could go down the entire list of ministries. He calls it a real Trojan horse.

• (1550)

The point I wanted to get across to my hon. colleague is that federal involvement in environmental matters does not mean a better environment. Everybody wants a better environment, but when the province is perfectly capable of providing this better environment, why would the federal government get involved, thus doubling the costs?

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, the specific example the member points out, which is that if the federal government wants to get involved in a matter of environmental assessment with a province it can simply grant money to that area and then require an environmental assessment, stretches the point to a considerable degree.

We have been critical of the government's approach in the regulation making process, which is that there will be exemptions and there will be inclusions. As the hon. member for Davenport said the other day, you are either in or you are out or you are out or you are in. Those sorts of matters, as far as the regulations are concerned, have been of great concern to us. However it has been on the major bigger projects that we have expressed concern.

As for the matter of granting funds strictly for the purpose of conducting an environmental assessment, the federal government has many other ways in which it can participate in an environmental assessment process if there is a fear that the environment will be compromised.

The essence of this bill is to ensure that the environmental assessment process is available to us should we need it. Regardless of how we get to it that is the bottom line and what is important in this case.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure and some feeling of personal satisfaction to rise in the House today to speak during third reading of Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

I have the honour of being the chairman of the committee which pre-studied this bill. I am pleased and proud to see that there were so many positive changes made to the bill while it was in committee.

The quality of the witnesses and the expertise of the department staff was most impressive throughout our long study period.

It is the view of this government that the legislation before us today will help us to take a major step forward in our nation's campaign to anticipate and prevent environmental problems before they happen.

Bill C-13 is central to the over-all goal of Canada's green plan, which is to secure for current and future generations a strong and prosperous economy and a safe and healthy environment. In fact, the government believes that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will result in an environmental assessment process which is more powerful in its impact on decision making than any other environmental assessment legislation in the world.

During various speeches in the House over the last couple of days, and certainly in some of the comments made in committee, various individuals or groups were quite critical and some remain quite critical of this bill. It is important to examine what other environmental leaders around the world think about what is happening with this legislation in Canada.

I would like to refer to a letter which came from the head of the environmental assessment group in Holland. This is an unsolicited letter written to Mr. Ray Robinson, who was the former chairman of FEARO.

The contents of this letter were read into the proceedings of the committee at an earlier date, therefore I only want to highlight a couple of sentences. The letter is from Mr. Jan Jaap de Boer, head of the environmental assessment department of Holland, which has one of the best—if not the best—environmental legislations in the world at the present time. He writes:

> We, the whole EIA-department, would like to congratulate you and FEARO with this milestone. These new elements will bring Canada back to the lead in E. I. A. regulation. And give us inspiration for new developments.

This hardly sounds like some of the comments that have been made at various times by certain groups here in Canada. He goes on to list some of the new developments in the Canadian act that are particularly important in the development of environmental assessment legislation on a world-wide basis.

I think we can say that this is now the best, or one of the best, pieces of environmental legislation in the world.

For the first time the act will entrench in legislation this government's desire and obligation to integrate environmental factors into planning and the decision-making process in a manner that promotes sustainable development. It will empower decision makers to make practical, responsible and informed choices.

As such, the act sets out clearly in law the roles and the responsibilities of all participants in a project development. It provides additional opportunities for public participation in all phases of the process, especially in the assessment of major projects. It requires that the process be administered before a federal decision can be taken to proceed with the project.

The intent of this legislation is not to stop development but to ensure that it proceeds with full knowledge of the potential impact of a proposed project on the ecosystem—our air, water, land and living organisms. The process helps factor environmental effects into project proposals in much the same way as cost resources and labour are regularly considered.

In fact, one of the greatest benefits of this legislation is that it will streamline the federal environmental assessment considerably and make it more efficient and effective.

As many hon. colleagues are well aware, efficiency is very important. If we are to make environmental assessments central to our process of decision making then it goes without saying that this process must identify environmental impacts as expeditiously as possible. This is important to both business and governments alike.

I would like to add that just because it increases efficiency and effectiveness does not necessarily mean that it is just a rubber stamp for projects. The importance is that environmental factors will be considered early. A decision will be made and the process will then either proceed or not proceed.

In the time allotted to me today I want to highlight just a few of the features of the new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. First, the act ensures that resources are focused where most needed by dividing projects into categories according to their degree of environmental risk. In this manner the act ensures that projects posing the greatest environmental risk receive the most attention.

The act also requires that the cumulative environmental effects of a project in combination with other projects or activities be reviewed. As well, the act ensures that public comments and concerns, and technically and economically feasible measures for mitigating any environmental effects are considered in the assessment.

The act also introduces features to streamline the public review process.

• (1600)

The act introduces, for the first time, mediation as a means of making the public review of major projects more efficient. Mediation ensures that all environmental facts are reviewed, but without the formality, length and cost of a panel review.

We have also listened to the concerns of provinces regarding efficiency. In the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act this government has provided measures to permit joint assessment with the provinces with the intention of minimizing the duplication of assessment processes.

Another way in which this legislation will streamline the federal environmental assessment process and make it more effective is by giving review panels, for the first time, the power to subpoena witnesses and information required for the assessment. Currently review panels rely solely on the good will of participants.

Further, to ensure that the new process is effective it incorporates a requirement for feedback programs. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act requires that follow-up and monitoring plans be prepared as part of the final assessment report on major projects.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is a product of more than four years of broad consultations with a wide spectrum of Canadians. The act has benefited from the contributions of governments, the private sector, native peoples, environmental and other non-governmental groups, the legal community, environmental assessment professionals and individuals.

Common sense tells us that an efficient and effective environmental assessment process saves time and money in the long run. By integrating environmental factors at the planning stage business and governments avoid expensive and sometimes controversial remedial action programs.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is an expression of this government's commitment to a healthy and competitive future. It will help us to sustain an environmentally sound and economically prosperous future for all Canadians.

As I have followed this bill for the last year and a half or more there have been many stages and many changes during the activities of the committee. The evolution of this bill reflects at least two things.

First, it reflects a willingness to change and be progressive in the development of environmental policy within the government. It also reflects the very rapid advancement of environmental legislation on a world-wide basis.

The changes that were made in committee keep this act at the forefront of environmental legislation in the world.

In summary, I hope that hon. members in this House and in the other house will see the benefits of this important piece of legislation and be able to support the passage of Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I just have a short question for my friend. I know that as chair of the committee he has a great body of knowledge in relation to this legislation. I am particularly interested in his views on the regulatory powers because, as he knows, the majority of witnesses who appeared on this legislation were concerned that the sleeping giant of Bill C-13 is really the 15 sets of regulatory powers. I would like to hear from the member whether he thinks it would be appropriate to have a regularly scheduled process or a regularly legislated method by which members could get at these regulations. As he is probably aware, the proposals for exemptions would include major linear development such as highways, transmission lines, pipelines, airports—those are all exempt from comprehensive evaluation—abandonment of rail lines, and twin tracking. There could be an initial environmental evaluation but no comprehensive review.

Now we have the parliamentary secretary trying to cause trouble. I am addressing my questions to the member who just spoke.

New rail lines of less than 100 kilometres in length would be exempt, port facilities, certain kinds of industrial facilities, including the decommissioning of them, nuclear reactors of less than 30 thermal megawatts would be exempt; mines of less than 10,000 tonnes per day, regardless of what they are producing, dams that would restrict at less than 100 cubic metres per second, the modification of national parks as long as the government is not going to take more than 10 per cent out. That would be exempt from any kind of comprehensive review.

I do not want to list too many, but I wonder if the hon. member could comment on whether or not he thinks exempting those classes of projects through regulation is appropriate, and whether or not he believes that there should be an opportunity for regulations to be brought before Parliament so that they can be properly reviewed if, say, for example 20 members felt that such a requirement was necessary.

Mr. Stevenson: I think the hon. member used the term that these things "would be exempt". I think possibly he, as usual, could have used the term "could be exempt" because at any time when there is any public concern over any particular project, the Minister of the Environment has the power to call a panel to examine any project that he feels warrants an examination. Certainly if there was any significant public concern about a project, I have no doubt that in the future the minister would take the appropriate action. There are a number of options that the minister has under the current legislation.

In addition, it is quite possible that some of the projects that the member raises could be handled, or would be handled, under class assessments. Further, if there are any escapes, if you will, of things that in the public view possibly should be reviewed, the five-year review process that is part of the act will certainly allow for changes to be made in the not too distant future.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Durham whether Quebec's objections were given any consideration. As you know, the Quebec environment minister, Mr. Pierre Paradis, sent a telegram on Monday to his federal counterpart. There have been some major objections from the Quebec government, which incidentally, just passed a resolution to once again inform the federal government that it would not consider talks with 11 and certainly not with 17. The National Assembly's resolution specifies the need for bilateral negotiations, either with the federal government or the provinces.

My question is this: Is this one more attempt to make matters worse and cause a complete breakdown of relations between the Quebec government and the federal government? Is that the ultimate objective?

It was said earlier that several months or perhaps years ago, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, tabled this bill in the House of Commons. I may add that the bill was modified since that time. Meanwhile, the Meech Lake Accord was shot down.

• (1610)

I wonder whether the hon. member could tell me whether he realizes that once again, the Quebec government's rights are being violated and once again, the Government of Quebec is objecting. Remember, this is not a separatist government, this is Robert Bourassa's government objecting through Environment Minister Pierre Paradis, who is not known as a sovereignist.

I would like the hon. member to tell me whether he is aware of what is being said about this in Quebec City and whether the government intends to wait before proceeding with the final stages of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Stevenson: Madam Speaker, I was somewhat surprised at the nature of the press report of this morning relating to the statement from the Quebec government. Certainly, while I was chair of the pre-study committee, the committee sent out a notice to all individuals and groups across Canada, including ministers of environment for all provinces and territories, that we were holding public hearings and inviting anyone who wished to appear at those hearings, and stating that we would be pleased to hear from them.

The minister of the environment for the Northwest Territories chose to appear and the minister of the environment for British Columbia, who at that time was chair of the Canadian Committee for Resource and Environment Ministers, appeared on behalf of the ministers of environment across Canada.

They expressed the concerns of their respective groups at that time. Indeed, the chair of the Committee of Environment Ministers brought with him a number of amendments to the bill, some of which were accepted in one form or another in the new legislation. Certainly, there has been ample opportunity over the last many months for Quebec to state its concerns. I am quite confident that there have been bilateral meetings along the way between federal officials and provincial officials and I would think between the federal minister and the Quebec minister of the environment on this bill through its development.

The bill as it is written today reflects the differences which exist from province to province in the provincial environmental assessment legislation. In the provision for joint panels, where they are necessary, that sort of flexibility is written into the current act to adjust for the unique situations from province to province.

As a federal government, it is our obligation to assess projects that are being funded by federal tax dollars. One could not consider a situation where federal taxpayers' dollars were going to projects in any part of Canada with some environmental implication and the federal government would choose to ignore the assessment of those projects.

It seems to me the bill is adequate as written for the situation at hand.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, Bill C-13 provides a framework or structure for procedures which I hope will be improved as the legislation is implemented. Although it does not respond to all the concerns of Canadians, it describes an environmental assessment process, which is a significant step but does not, I repeat, does not specify which projects will be subject to assessment and how the legislation will be implemented. We will get that when the Governor in Council has had a chance to look at the regulations and as soon as a thorough and, I imagine, complex study of the appropriate regulations is published.

These regulations may establish which projects will be subject to environmental assessment, unlike the present bill which does not provide that information. They will also tell us what decision will set the environmental assessment process into motion and how other levels of government will be involved, and this may answer one of the concerns of my friends in the Bloc québécois. For instance, how will aboriginal governments be involved? I do not know. I do not know yet. That will depend on the regulations.

[English]

I am pleased to have the opportunity to address the House on this important bill which establishes, in my view, a more effective environmental assessment process which replaces the EARP guidelines that we had for some time.

As I said in speaking on its predecessor bill, Bill C–78 from the previous session, the principle behind this bill is a good one. No one can dispute the importance of determining the environmental impact of projects before they are begun.

The federal government and other levels of government must be leaders in this area. As we have learned, much to our distress sometimes, and it should be something that all Canadians understand, it is easier to avoid environmental disasters, environmental damage, in the first place than to try to repair it later. That is essentially the purpose at hand.

Too many environmental mistakes have been made in the past because of our collective negligence. Because I have been, like many members in this House, preoccupied with other committees, I have not had a chance to sit on this committee, but I have an interest in it because in my riding it is the number one issue.

When I ask constituents to list the number of issues and the priority in which they see them, they list environment and their jobs as being those two preoccupations to which they think we should attach importance.

Bill C–13 which is before us on third reading has come a long way in my view from its predecessor bill, Bill C–78. It is significantly improved, although I admit it still has some flaws. I want to give credit to those who worked on this committee and pay tribute to a member of this House, the member for Davenport, who has in my view, brought forward his work, his expertise, his advice and his concerns. He has improved this bill by being very much interested in environmental questions. Yesterday the Canadian environmental assessment caucus stated in its press release: "It is best to look at this legislation as a glass half full rather than half empty".

This group which includes environmental lawyers and advocates from organizations across Canada noted in its press release that there are still many improvements that can be made to this legislation.

I want to list some of the issues that the Canadian environmental assessment caucus put forth. First, it said that the environmental review process should apply to government programs and policies, not just projects which would include the North American free trade deal.

Second, the definition of federal authority should include federal agencies such as the Harbour Commission. I will come back to that in a few minutes because I have some suggestions of my own to make.

Third, the right of the public to participate in the process should be less discretionary and spelled out in more detail.

Fourth, every screening and study should include determining the purpose of and need for a project, the alternatives to the project, and ultimate means of carrying out the project.

Last, the bill should contain stronger powers to enforce compliance with the assessment process.

The bill still leaves the minister in charge of a project rather than the Minister of the Environment with the power to decide whether a project should go ahead. This leaves the process open to possible political interference.

The environment should not be sacrificed for political gains.

[Translation]

On a loftier plane we could say that the environment is a moral and social responsibility. Each and everyone of us is aware, now more than ever before, of the importance of preserving our environment and, especially, of being wary of polluting substances which have often been a source of environmental problems.

In Ottawa—Vanier, in my riding, for instance, I have had some experience with projects that were environmentally harmful and had not been examined or assessed for the impact they would have on the environment. However, thanks to a local organization, which I mention here because they are people from communities in my riding, we were able to prevent construction of an incinerator in Overbrook, which the regional government had planned to locate right in the middle of a town. The plan was to build an enormous stack, burn waste and in the process cover the community with all kinds of toxic substances. The project was cancelled because people got involved. They held public meetings, they had consultations, and they managed to make their point.

It is possible to improve the consultation and co-operation that takes place as part of an environmental assessment process. In my riding, I had problems with interprovincial transport, with trucks usually bound for Quebec, from one of Ontario's industrial areas. These trucks use the Queensway-Dalhousie-Besserer-Cumberland-King Edward corridor and cross the Macdonald-Cartier bridge on their way to deliver their goods to one of the pulp and paper mills or one of the organizations or industries on the Quebec side. The different levels of government must be able to agree on solutions for the shipment of materials and other goods that can be dangerous, toxic, et cetera. The municipal, regional, provincial and federal governments must be able to agree that we face a serious environmental problem. One accident is all it would take.

Every day in my riding, between 2,200 and 2,500 trucks use the route I just described between the Queensway and the Macdonald-Cartier Bridge right in the national capital, Ottawa. Between 2,200 and 2,500 trucks a day means that about four heavy trucks spill pollutants, make noise and are a safety hazard and they can have accidents. One unfortunate incident and people will scream murder. They will say that we were negligent.

If I understood right, this Bill C-13 gives us an opportunity to work together, to decide together, to ask the various levels of government to agree on solutions and alternatives, for example so that future generations do not have to bear the financial burden of cleaning up when we here today can take the required regulatory action to ban pollutants.

Some claim that the bill before us gives too much discretionary authority to the minister and that it even protects the government from legal challenge. To be sure, Bill C-13 will change some of the things that some governments and agencies do. It may even change the behaviour of the federal government itself, which is not above reproach on this issue.

I remember that in 1987, in this House, the Bank of Canada was found guilty of negligence in choosing an illegal carrier to dispose of its toxic wastes. We will remember that. As a result of this negligence, the selected carrier dumped 45 gallons of paints, varsol and other solvents down a sewer on Power Road in Gloucester. As we know, this sewer is connected to the Green Creek Pollution Control Plant, which empties into the Ottawa River. The departments of Transport and Supply and Services were also accused of breaking the law by dumping toxic waste and chemicals in the Ottawa River.

Listen to what happened later. Instead of accepting the courts' verdict that the federal government was guilty, the federal government went to court claiming that the provincial law and provincial legislation in general did not apply to the federal government. That was in 1987; that was not centuries ago, but barely four or five years back.

It is important for us in the federal government not only to preach by example but also to implement environmentally friendly measures. We must regulate but also implement administrative measures to choose wisely in awarding contracts so that departments do not do things like what happened in 1987.

Similarly, Public Works Canada, an important government department, should involve my constituents so that they can express themselves and consider not only the environmental dangers but also the public welfare when it decides to do certain things like sell land. In Carson Grove, which is located in my riding, not far from here to the east, Public Works plans to sell and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is actually selling land for housing development or other purposes without knowing what impact the future use of this land will have.

If Bill C-13 is passed, departments and agencies such as these will be subject to a strict screening regarding the purpose of the project and its environmental effects, if the minister so decides.

Take the Vanier Parkway, in my riding. Many people oppose a project to make it connect the Queensway to the Macdonald-Cartier bridge to ease the interprovincial traffic. For years now, twenty years for sure, this matter comes to a head at every election. Someone raised the question of whether we should extend, complete the Vanier thoroughfare. For one thing, it is a parkway, not a thoroughfare. Second, the land was sold to the regional municipality by the federal government, through the National Capital Commission. The NCC sold the land for the purpose of building a parkway with restricted access to trucks. No trucks over five tonnes were to be allowed. Go and see if the police and the municipal authorities are enforcing that provision of the contract.

As I said, if a link is created by extending the Vanier thoroughfare, or parkway rather, to facilitate interprovincial traffic, it would be totally unacceptable that the federal government be party to a deal that is going to destroy the quality of life in my riding. What for? To allow dangerous materials and other goods to travel through the city of Ottawa, when many other alternatives exist. Bill C–13 calls for, suggests and provides that not only the impacts but also possible alternatives be investigated.

[English]

If there is a hook in that proposed extension of the Vanier arterial which has a federal implication, I can say right now that we will fight that project, and I think we are right to do it.

I notice you are giving me a signal, Madam Speaker, that my time is just about up. I have two minutes.

The stated purpose of the bill mentioned in clause 4 includes ensuring that environmental effects projects receive careful consideration, encouraging responsible authorities to take actions to promote sustainable development in order to achieve and maintain a healthy environment and a healthy economy, and ensuring opportunities for public participation in the environmental assessment process. These are certainly worthy objectives. It is my hope that this government will take them to heart when it applies legislation to projects. I hope it will ensure that the regulations have teeth and are strong enough that we are caring for our future and making sure we do not pollute.

I want to make sure that the NCC, the National Capital Commission which is an agency of this government, a Crown corporation, is covered by this bill. I know clause 8 of the bill says Crown corporations within the meaning of the present administration act are covered and it refers to another clause for the regulations. The regulations are very important to us because they will give us the direction the government wants to go in.

I end this short comment by saying that Bill C–13 is an important, positive step in joining concrete actions to symbolic commitments for a better protection of our environment. I hope the regulations that go with this bill will carry enough weight, as I said, to ensure an effective and much improved environmental assessment process.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, the member for Ottawa—Vanier made an excellent speech, particularly since he wanted to protect the interests of his constituency. At one point, he also talked about the political stakes of this bill. He said that this legislation would keep provincial and federal governments from doing too much politics with the environment because, in his opinion, the environment is very important. He added that everybody was interested in the environment and that it was necessary to keep politicians from making politics with that. He also said that the federal government must not interfere in his constituency in Ottawa. There is a bit of contradiction in that.

I believe that this bill is probably acceptable for the small provinces that do not have the resources to tackle the environment issue. However, the larger provinces such as Quebec and Ontario should be the first to decide, because they can afford to conduct their own environmental assessments. That would keep the federal government from interfering and bothering businesses that want to settle in those provinces, as well as delaying economic projects, for instance in the province of Quebec.

This is the big problem that the bill will create by enabling the federal government to encroach on provincial jurisdictions such as Quebec, which has its own department of environment, as well as the resources to conduct its own assessments, in the same manner, to protect the environment. Why would the federal government again interfere and take on more power in Quebec if the government of that province objects to that? I want to tell you, Madam Speaker, that the Quebec National Assembly just voted, five minutes ago, on a motion which says: "That the National Assembly strongly disapproves of Bill C–13 of the federal government, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, because it is contrary to the higher interests of Quebec, and that the National Assembly opposes its passage by the federal Parliament". I just received that motion which the Government of Quebec approved unanimously just a few minutes ago.

I say to the member for Ottawa—Vanier that we who represent the Bloc Quebecois and who are here in this House strictly to defend the interests of Quebec, believe that this bill is unacceptable for Quebec. We considered this bill to be unacceptable for Quebec even before the vote taken by the National Assembly. The Quebec government just confirmed our opinion and Premier Bourassa, who is not a sovereignist, says that this legislation will harm the economic development in Quebec, adding that Quebec is quite capable of solving its environmental problems. I have a question for the member for Ottawa—Vanier. First, what does he think of all that? Second, he said earlier that there were some political stakes and that the bill would keep politicians from making politics with the environment because the environment is very important. I personally consider this to be a very important issue as well. However, I believe that just the opposite will happen with this bill. There will be chaos again regarding powers.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I did not say the bill was the invention of the century. I did not claim either that it satisfied everybody. I simply said that it was a step in the right direction. If the hon. member thought that I was taking it out on the federal government, he was mistaken. The federal government should support the environmental assessments which, maybe, could show us that a project is not good or that there are alternatives to it.

If I fully understood the bill—and I admit that I have not examined it clause by clause, like several of my colleagues, but rather that I read it and examined it in my own way—one of the positive aspects that I recognize and see in it is certainly the establishment of a formal assessment process and a joint review mechanism in the case of conflicts between levels of government.

I talked about my riding which, being situated in the national capital region, occupies a key place in interprovincial transportation. I think that the Quebec side cannot go it alone and say: "Too bad, but we do not care about making it easier for trucks to carry materials into our province. We are not interested in finding out whether it is a good thing or not to allow such a road link between two places". I think the bill suggests a framework for different levels of government, federal or provincial, native or provincial, federal or foreign. I refer particularly to the United States.

Today reviews are undertaken on an ad hoc basis. Somebody makes a decision but there is no structure, no formal framework. That is precisely what the bill provides, a framework for the process, but we have not seen the regulations. I ask hon. members to wait a while, like we all do, until we see the regulations. We will have an opportunity to discuss them further in the House. Reviews will be made regularly and five years from now maybe we will look at the bill and realize that it was not appropriate, that it did not help to solve the problem. We will see. But we should not say today that the measure is bad because it provides a framework, and I feel this is a positive aspect, as it allows the establishment of a formal process for joint consultations between different levels of government.

If the Quebec government or the Quebec legislature voted against Bill C-13, I will wait to see the results. I did not understand why, but perhaps I missed something, I admit.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary-Northeast): Madam Speaker, I agree that the environment is extremely important for our society but, nevertheless, it is up to the provinces to determine whether they have the means to go ahead with a given project.

I would like to quote, for example, Mr. Klein, the environment minister for Alberta, who appeared on November 19, 1991, before the Legislative Committee on Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process. I would like to quote what he said on page 10:

Very simply, we believe the federal government should recognize, if the provinces have in place a process, and if that process is as good as or better than the federal process, that as a legitimate process to adjudicate the environmental worthiness of various projects.

I think that is the key. If a provincial government has a department of environment, it should be capable of deciding what is good for the province. Otherwise, we will have a conflict between the federal and provincial governments, and I would like to quote the minister again: " By getting into those kinds of issues, we think the federal government would be clearly intruding on the province's constitutional rights to determine destiny over their resources".

This is fundamental. Provinces should have jurisdiction over environment—obviously with some co-operation from federal experts if necessary—and should have the last word.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I understand the interventions of the members for Longueuil and for Calgary Northeast. I should not have to repeat that way back in 1984 we started talking about the possibility of bringing in legislation to try to implement a better framework. It has been quite a while. Now we have reached the last stage, the third reading of the bill, and some members would like to start over, to have this House re-examine all of that legislation. I am not a government member. I am part of the opposition, but I want to tell them that this bill is not all bad. I simply want to say that I can feel a possibility for co-operation among all levels of government—federal, provincial, municipal or regional—with a view to coordinating efforts in order to ensure a more complete and more efficient evaluation of all environmental projets. That is all I said today.

I understand that some provinces might say: "Our environment is our business; the air we breathe is our business; the water we drink is our business". I understand, but it just so happens that our country is huge and that we must take into account the relationship between provinces. All I am saying therefore is that there might be in Bill C-13 a begining, a step in the right direction toward a better co-operation between all levels of government. What to do about those who do not agree? Pray for them.

[English]

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, in light of the discussion that has gone on in this debate with regard to the attention paid to the bill now before this House by other legislatures and by other jurisdictions, I thought it was important to address some of the concerns with the press release that has just been released by the Minister of the Environment in Vancouver.

Generally the release outlines some of the background of the bill and some information that I think is very pertinent to the debate. Much of the controversy, as we know in the parliamentary business, is sometimes based on misinformation or a lack of information. So I would like to take this opportunity to just go through the press release that was released in Vancouver today and perhaps it will resolve some of the questions put before this House.

The Minister of the Environment disagrees with Quebec's reaction to the bill on the federal environmental assessment process which is presently at its third reading in the House of Commons.

The minister reiterated that the purpose of the bill is to assess decisions that are to be made by the federal government within its own jurisdiction and that it only applies in these circumstances.

In his public statements, Quebec's environment minister raised a number of issues which must be addressed.

With regard to the background, in 1987, having recognized that the federal guidelines order for the environmental assessment of federal decisions was seriously flawed, the Government of Canada initiated the preparation of a bill to regulate the environmental assessment of its decisions.

The proposed legislation was frequently discussed in federal-provincial meetings and in June 1990, the government tabled Bill C-78 concerning an environmental assessment process. Discussions with the provinces were then intensified in the context of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment.

The bill was reintroduced as Bill C-13 in May 1991 in the new parliamentary session. All the provinces and territories, including Quebec, were kept informed of the progress of the bill and the contents of the amendments were the subject of several multilateral and bilateral meetings.

On December 9, 1991, the legislative committee responsible for reviewing the bill tabled its report in the House after having heard a number of witnesses including provinces.

The bill has now passed all stages of the federal legislative process and today is in third reading before being forwarded to the Senate.

• (1650)

Regarding the question of federal jurisdiction, it is the duty of a modern responsible government to equip itself with tools to assess the environmental implications of its own decisions. In the Oldman River case the Supreme Court of Canada unequivocally concluded that: "The Constitution Act, 1867, has not assigned the matter of environment sui generis to either the provinces or Parliament. The environment, as understood in its generic sense, encompasses the physical, economic and social environment touching several of the heads of power assigned to the respective levels of government". That is from page 62 of the judgment. The Supreme Court also firmly established that the federal department responsible for the environmental assessment process could not use it: "as a colourable device to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction which are unconnected to the relevant heads of federal power".

The minister noted that this bill was drafted carefully to respect jurisdictions and the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. It will be applied in the same fashion.

With regard to agreements with the provinces, contrary to the existing guidelines order the new bill recognizes the environmental assessment processes of all Canadian provinces. It will be possible to negotiate framework agreements with each province and territory to avoid duplication and encourage joint approaches in cases of shared responsibility while being respectful of the decision-making powers of each level of government.

With regard to spending powers, the existing guidelines order, as well as the new bill, covers all the decisions that the government may be called upon to take in respect of a project or an activity. The federal government continues to ensure that environmental assessments are completed before projects are financed. However, money transfers, made within general federal-provincial agreements which may generate projects, may be submitted to provincial procedures. In all other cases it is always possible and desirable to adopt an approach which encourages joint assessments involving both levels of government.

With regard to the application to the James Bay Northern Quebec Agreement area, this agreement is one of the claims which provide for an environmental assessment process. The Inuvialuit Agreement is another example, and agreements applicable to Yukon, the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut territory and the Gwiichin territory are also being negotiated. To avoid duplicating the federal process provided for in all these agreements the government provided itself substitution powers which it could use when required.

The issue with respect to the James Bay Northern Quebec Agreement is not to overcome federal-provincial duplication but rather duplication which is internal to the federal government, and the government provided itself with the tools required to avoid such situations.

With regard to native territorial claims, the bill does not cover the lands claimed by native people as it has been suggested. The selected lands mentioned in the bill refer to lands selected by both levels of government after a claim has been negotiated and an agreement concluded between all parties involved in order to transfer these lands to the native people.

On the issue of transboundary projects, the bill gives the federal Minister of the Environment the power to exercise his responsibilities in cases in which more than one province or territorial authority are involved. However, when two provinces agree on an environmental assessment of a transboundary project the federal government is not involved.

The federal involvement in this area of federal jurisdiction is triggered only if the provinces concerned are unable to reach an agreement. However, if requested to do so by citizens whose property rights are affected by the project the federal minister has the duty to review the situation and ensure that the ongoing environmental assessment complies with the basic criteria specified in the act.

The minister is convinced that the decision-making system which permits the integration of the environmental factors proposed by the government to guide its own decisions, complements the assessment procedures that all provinces and territories have instituted. He encourages Quebec and all other Canadian provinces to initiate the necessary discussions to conclude the administrative agreements necessary for efficient management when projects involve shared responsibilities.

That is where the press release ended. In summary, the intent of the bill is not to overstep provincial jurisdiction but simply to foster and facilitate a new era of provincial and federal co-operation. Responsibility for the environment does not end at the boundary of a province.

The environment does not know provincial boundaries. In fact, the environment does not know international boundaries. Just recently the Government of the United States of America joined together with the Government of Canada in agreeing on a historic acid rain agreement.

This is but one example of governments taking leadership in developing partnerships to resolve environmental issues. This is a very important example demonstrating the way to resolve problems that are of a global nature. Many of our environmental problems are not isolated or limited to provincial, municipal, or for that matter national jurisdictions.

They are of a global nature and require global solutions to solve them. The first step in achieving these solutions is forming partnerships. As for the concerns expressed by some of the members, it is important for them to consider that partnerships would have to be forged between provinces and between a province and the federal government.

The old style and the old approach of confrontation is them against us and me against you. That has proven not to work. That is the old way and not what Canadians and citizens of the world are looking for. The citizens of the world are looking more and more at partnerships, shared responsibilities and co-operation.

I believe this is an important bill. It is a bill that clarifies some of the concerns that have been expressed in the past with regard to environmental assessment. The bill does not intrude on provincial jurisdiction. It simply applies only to those areas in which the federal government has a defined role.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, we all know that the environment is a major issue. Nobody questions the fact that we must do everything in our power to protect it. But with Bill C-13, and it is one of the main reasons the Bloc Quebecois is here in this House, it is a matter of protecting Quebec's best interests.

In this case, Quebec's National Assembly has unanimously passed a motion this afternoon which says: "That, as required by an unanimous motion of the commission for development and facilities, the National Assembly strongly disagrees with the federal government 's Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, since it is contrary to Quebec's best interests, and objects to its passing in the federal Parliament".

Earlier our colleague from Alberta north east mentioned that last November the Alberta minister of the environment made similar remarks to the effect that since the provinces are powerful enough, have their own ministers of the environment and the capacities and the means to manage their own department and their own affairs, we should avoid this duplication, this overlap. Right now in Quebec, the minister, Mr. Paradis, is speaking out against Ottawa's totalitarianism. If Bill C-13 is passed in the House, it will allow the federal government, for instance, to conduct its own environmental assessments in several areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. That is an obvious encroachment on provincial jurisdictions, and in Quebec a motion was unanimously passed against such a thing. It is not of question of partisanship. Our role here is to tell the House that this is not a constitutional issue, like those being discussed by the federal government and the provinces. It is about one jurisdiction, the environment.

We have to recognize that no boundary circumscribes the environment. As everyone knows, you cannot build a wall to prevent bees from flying over to your neighbour's backyard. But when you talk about encroachment, Mr. Speaker, you have to remember what happened last year. Mr. Paradis has spoken against this federal bill before. Besides, his colleague, the minister for energy, Lise Bacon, once accused Ottawa of hiding behind the environment banner.

• (1700)

I would like to ask the previous speaker this: Is he aware of Quebec's firm opposition? Will he ask his government colleagues to postpone this bill as long as there is no agreement between the Canadian provinces, in particular with the province of Quebec, for which we are fighting in this House?

[English]

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the questions and the comments with regard to my previous intervention in this House. The member from the Bloc Quebecois suggested that his party was here simply to defend the interests of Quebec and said that was the primary reason for its members being here and that they had no other responsibilities whatsoever.

As a member of the legislative committee on Bill C-13 I was curious as to why neither he nor any members of his party attended any of the hearings on Bill C-13. If the interests of Quebec were so important why did it take until this time before he or any of his party members made representation before that committee?

In addition, the Government of Quebec was, as were all provinces, invited to participate in the legislative hearings on Bill C-13. Certainly we did not hear from any representatives of the Government of Quebec on this bill. I am not doubting the hon. member's word but if his responsibility to defend the interests of Quebec is so paramount why did he wait until now to express those concerns or interests?

With regard to the concern about intruding on other jurisdictions, the Supreme Court confirmed that the role of the federal government is legitimate in areas in which the Constitution authorizes the federal government to be involved. I would like to reiterate the fact that Bill C-13 is built on the need for co-operation. The whole intent of this bill is to foster and facilitate co-operation. It is not us and them. It is not me against you. It is we together working to resolve environmental problems which know no provincial boundaries, no jurisdictional boundaries.

I think it is important for the member, and indeed for all of those who have concerns about jurisdiction, to realize that partnership is the essence of this bill. Certainly that is what the bill was intended for and I am sure that is what it will result in.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, the hon. member accused my colleague of not having taken part in the work of the legislative committee. I want to tell him that we are not welcome as members of the legislative committee nor as members of the various standing committees of the House of Commons. We cannot be blamed because we are not allowed to speak at committee meetings.

We can intervene but we cannot vote. Sometimes, we are forced to wait all day before being given a brief opportunity to speak at the very last moment. That is why it is not very interesting for members of the Bloc Quebecois to sit on a committee. That is why we try to do our work in the House of Commons and to work with the Quebec government since the only reason for our being here is to stand up for Quebec in Ottawa. It is in that context that I blame the hon. member for accusing us of not sitting on committees, because when we do we are not allowed to speak.

[English]

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, as I said, I had no intention of doubting the sincerity of the members opposite. My question was with regard to why none of them had appeared at the committee.

What the member said just now is not necessarily 100 per cent accurate in the sense that committee meetings are open to the public. They are open to all individuals who have any interest at all. We have other tools in the parliamentary system such as Standing Order 31 where members of Parliament of all parties of all political stripes can stand up and make representation on behalf of their constituents. We can ask questions in Question Period of ministers.

Not once have I heard the members of the Bloc Quebecois stand up under Standing Order 31 on a statement in the House of Commons before Question Period and express concerns on this issue. Not once have I seen any of those members in the committee even though they are open to the public.

I have some questions about why now do they express this concern.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a few words concerning this piece of legislation before the House before it passes into final reading.

I note that there is a restriction in the legislation in that it is restricted to projects, projects being defined as a physical act, as some sort of physical activity. Of course this means that a great many things are excluded under this piece of legislation.

In fact, when it comes to an assessment being made of the environmental impact of decisions by the Government of Canada, the major decisions of the Government of Canada that impact adversely upon our environment will not be covered under this legislation. In fact, it will be so limited as to involve only projects that are built in a certain place and that are built under a certain authority. Very restrictive defines what federal lands are, what federal authority is. I note that it even goes so far as to define the authority under the act for a project that extends out to the edge of the continental shelf. It says either to the economic zone of 200 miles or beyond out to the edge of the continental shelf, whichever is the greater of the distances.

My observation that I make while this bill is passing third reading is that it is very limited in its scope. It does say, I know, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process. In the actual title and in the preamble to the bill it talks about environmental assessment, about an effective means of integrating environmental factors into planning and decision-making processes. It talks about achieving sustainable development by conserving and enhancing environmental quality, and by encouraging and promoting economic development.

• (1710)

The reason I say that this bill is too limited is this. The very department that is sponsoring this bill is the federal Department of the Environment. The federal Department of the Environment passes judgment all the time on things that are of great danger to our environment, that destroy our environment; destroys our environment in our forests and in our lakes and streams and in the ocean. The Department of the Environment, the very department that is bringing in this bill, allows no public process in its determination of whether or not a chemical can be used to eradicate an insect in the forest. It makes no reference to that. It has no jurisdiction.

In other words, whereas it enables the government to set into motion an assessment process that involves public input, that allows interested parties to comment on and to make decisions upon whether or not a project, so to speak, shall go ahead for environmental purposes, it makes no such claims for great decisions, very large decisions that are made by this very government department in its every day activities influencing our environment.

I want to give one example, which is a prime example this time of the year.

The Department of the Environment sits down with two other federal government agencies, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Health and Welfare. They sit down from time to time and determine whether or not to legalize herbicides or pesticides in Canada. They sit down and determine in that committee, in that review process, whether or not to license or to recommend to the Pest Control Division of Agriculture Canada, that would make a judgment based upon an act of Parliament, whether or not to legalize a substance for use in our environment.

Let me give an example. If you were today to ask the Department of the Environment what substance it approves for use on all of our forest lands in Canada, it will say to you one word: fenitrothion, a chemical which has proven to kill birds, to not allow them to reproduce, killing the very things that eat the very insects that they are trying to get rid of.

Imagine, aeroplanes up in the air dumping down in big crates, in big enormous barrels, chemicals to spill all over our magnificent forest lands in British Columbia, Ontario, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, all over the place and the Government of Canada comes up with this bill. Here we are talking today about an environmental assessment process. An assessment process? About wharves, about breakwaters, dams?

We know that this government department says that you can dump thousands upon thousands of gallons of chemicals all over your forest land, all over your rivers, all over Canada. Just imagine. There is only one other thing they allow for use in our forest lands to get rid of these pests. You go around with a little squirter and you squirt and you get rid of insects in trees. But the way we do it in Canada is we dump it out of aeroplanes over incredibly large territories. The National Research of Canada has a report in its possession which shows that this chemical destroys harmless insects, spiders, bumblebees, and destroys the reproductive cycle of birds. You can go to most of our forest lands in Canada and you cannot even hear a bird sing. I wonder why. I wonder why. They have got chemicals dropped down from away up above, from aeroplanes, approved by the Department of the Environment, the very department that is coming in here today and saying "Oh, we are going to give you an environmental assessment process for public works". For public works, Mr. Speaker.

There is only one other thing they licence that they say is legal, this panel set up by Environment Canada, Health and Welfare. It used to be the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, but they dropped out last year. They are no longer on the panel. You see, they could not justify, I do not think, dumping oil, which is the agent that brings down the chemical to destroy everything in the forest. They just could not sit there because all of those chemicals were going into our rivers and our streams and destroying our salmon and our spawning grounds for our trout. No. Has that also violated the Fisheries Act or our Clean Water Act?

The very action of the Department of the Environment, the process which is closed, not open for public assessment, not a review process like this is, is for them to sit down and make that decision.

There is one further agent, not a chemical but a bacteria agent that is licensed for use. It was developed in the Quebec region of the Canadian Forestry Service by some of the finest scientists and biologists that we have in this country today. They developed a non-chemical substance for use to get rid of such things as the spruce budworm, the balsam woolly aphid, the hemlock looper and all of these various insects which are predators in our forests.

That particular substance is called BT. It stands for Bacillus Pherengensus. That is a substance that is a bacteria which will also kill these insects, but costs more, as I understand it, than the chemical that is used in our forests. So the chemical is preferred by our paper companies and by our provincial governments in Canada. Of course, then the paper companies and the provincial governments can turn around and say: "Who licensed the chemicals for use in all of our forest land? Why, it is the Department of the Environment". They licensed it through the federal Department of Agriculture because they have a review process which is not open to the public, but they license the material for use in all of our forest lands.

Now, the environmental assessment process. I understand that all of these acts are under review by the Government of Canada. They are reviewing the Pest Control Act and various other acts of Parliament with the view to opening up the process to allow more public input into what we do in our environment and the review procedures that are in place for various government departments. I understand that the procedure is being opened up for the use of herbicides and pesticides and that a new act is in the works for the Government of Canada to present to the Parliament of Canada to allow for a review process. Of course, this allows some people in Canada who want to even have more chemicals used in our forests, more chemicals dropped out of aeroplanes from on high to destroy insects in our forests. That review process, which is being suggested by the Government of Canada, should be watched very closely by the legislators in the Parliament of Canada.

All in all I do not see any problem with the legislation, I must admit, but it seems rather strange to me that they would so restrict this legislation to deal with only one aspect of environmental assessment and that they do not refer to anything else.

We have allowed the Government of Canada, through its policies, to destroy our marine environment. That has been adequately destroyed through policies of the Government of Canada which allow in large ships from foreign nations, massive factory freezer trawlers utilizing the ultimate in new modern technology, to destroy all of our spawning grounds and to destroy our cod fishery for generations to come. We have allowed that and that happens today.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced yesterday some more foreign quotas inside the 200-mile zone: 55,000 more tonnes of fish to be taken by seven foreign nations which will further destroy our marine environment, along with the fact that the Department of the Environment itself is a contributor to the destruction of our wildlife and our forest lands in Canada by allowing and encouraging the use of chemicals.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to ask my hon. friend a question.

I just had a group of European journalists in my office in an attempt to provide them with some facts about our forestry practices, our green plan, the way we worry about our environment, and our sense of obligation to the rest of the world as stewards and custodians of 10 per cent of the planet's forests.

I asked a journalist from Germany where he would have got the information that appeared in an article he had written in a particular paper. He said: "Look, we are here every day looking in on the debates of the House of Commons". Now I know where he got the information from. He received it from my friend, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

When did the member last see squadrons of hundreds of aeroplanes flying over huge areas of forest land in our country, killing everything in their sight with Agent Orange? Everything in its path would be destroyed recklessly. That is what we read in European newspapers. That is why there are promotions for boycotts on our lumber products, for God's sake, in Europe.

Does the member not know that he has a responsibility to stick a bit closer to the truth? Does he not know that our forest industry uses 10 per cent of the chemicals used in the food chain in agriculture in Canada and that is 10 per cent of what the Europeans use in their agriculture, having destroyed all their land? Does he not feel a sense of responsibility to be factual about what he says? Does he know that the chemical of which he speaks, incidentally, is the same chemical that mothers use to eradicate head lice on their children's heads and use to spray on their plants inside their homes? Does he not know that the forest industry no longer uses chemicals to the extent that it did 10 or 20 years ago?

BT is actually 80 per cent of all the sprays that are being used to eradicate some of the insects that destroyed, incidentally, all the forests on Cape Breton Island and other forests in his own province. Does the hon. member know that? If he does not, could I ask him to inform himself? And, after he has done that, could I ask him to be a bit more responsible and sensitive to the fact that what we say in this House is actually repeated by people in other parts of the world to the detriment of our industry, our workers, and our communities?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, if people repeat what is said in this House then I can imagine what they are going to repeat after listening to the hon. member. They are going to repeat this: that the very thing that is used to eradicate head lice is being sprayed in all of our forest lands. That is what the hon. gentleman just said a moment ago.

As far as Europe is concerned and how it gets rid of the problem of forest insects, the hon. member should take a very careful look at woodlot developments in Europe where bird hatcheries are sometimes encouraged. Instead of killing birds that are the very predators of the insects we are trying to get rid of in our forest lands, perhaps we should be following the record of some woodlots in Europe and developing bird hatcheries.

Let us turn to this business of using fenitrothion on only 20 per cent of our forest lands. He mentioned Agent Orange. That has nothing to do with fenitrothion. That is 2,4–D. That is what he is talking about. I am not talking about herbicides. I am talking about fenitrothion. If BT is as useful as fenitrothion then why is BT not used throughout this country to get rid of these insects?

I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker, but you have to go a way back. Once upon a time we used DDT in our forests. That is what the Canadian government was recommending. We used DDT until the investigators found that it was destroying everything. Then we switched to other chemicals. We are at the point now where in Canada we are the proud owners of one of the most effective means of getting rid of forest insects, Bacillus Therengensis, BT, developed in the Quebec region by a brilliant man. His last name, I recall, is Mr. Smirnoff and he developed BT. It had an effect right around the world. In Japan it was welcomed. Countries right around the world said: "What a marvellous discovery". This man who dedicated his life to getting rid of the use of chemicals in our forest lands, as any sensible government should do, devised the method of using BT.

I would suggest to the Government of Canada that we should use BT 100 per cent. If there is a deficiency, if there are companies that say it costs too much money, then perhaps the Government of Canada should put some money where its mouth is and stop this destruction of our environment.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in the final reading of Bill C-13. One thing I do find regrettable—and it is perhaps the symptom of the political priorities of some members of this House—is that there are two ministers responsible for the environment and neither has participated in the third reading process this week.

I do recognize why the Minister of the Environment is in Vancouver. As a matter of fact there is some history I am interested in noting. A federal contract was released to Burson-Marstellar Canada Limited in the amount of $189,524 to implement the media relations and communications program for Environment Canada at Globe 92. I am sure the minister wanted to make sure that he got good mileage out of that almost $200,000 expenditure with Burson-Marstellar of Bhopal fame.

Similarly I find somewhat less than amusing in this part of the debate that neither of the Liberal environment critics could find the political will or political priority to participate in a debate which the Minister of the Environment described when he appeared before the standing committee as follows: "In this case we have legislation that is complex. I think it is one of the most important projects to be introduced in this Parliament".

That is the minister's view on the priority, regrettably, of a very important and very complex bill, one that I regret to say truly is only a half full glass. That extra effort could have been made to make this the kind of legislation that would withstand the test of time. We have seen how quickly the 1984 cabinet guidelines order has come apart, or in some people's minds came together as an administrative law, as a result of the various and many court rulings there have been to take it from an Order in Council to the administrative law it is now recognized as being.

• (1730)

As I said, it is regrettable the two political parties that frequently go out and try to sell themselves as the great answer on serious environmental issues have taken the most important phase of this legislation so abominably laxly.

Out there, there is concern. Members from the Bloc have been raising on a regular basis the fact that this afternoon in the Quebec assembly a unanimous motion was passed opposing this legislation. It is also worthy of note that the province of Quebec—and I quote from today's press coverage of it—is not calling for withdrawal of the bill.

Let us keep in mind this day that Bill C-13 in its final stages is being used as a political lightening rod and as an opportunity to create focus in the province of Quebec on a constitutional issue. As the member for Elk Island and others have pointed out, there has been an abundance of opportunities for members of the Bloc and for other Quebec members to have appeared before the Bill C-13 committee.

We must keep in mind that this piece of legislation has been moving for four and a half years. It was introduced for debate by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. The bill, without change, was transformed at the end of the last session from Bill C-78 and given new light so that it could be Bill C-13. The words that were there on the last day of the last session are the same words in Bill C-13. It is precisely the same bill.

The kind of brinksmanship, or perhaps more properly put, brinkspersonship, that is practised a bit too often on some issues is being applied here and it should not be. Anyone who truly understands and has taken the time to understand what the Brundtland commission said in the spring of 1987 on sustainable development and on how we can perhaps, and only perhaps, achieve a sustainable environment for human life and for the life of most other species would not be playing these kinds of political games on a piece of legislation I personally do not support because it does not go far enough. I ask my friends in the Bloc Quebecois and every member of the National Assembly in Quebec today to keep in mind not only what was said in Brundtland but what is going on in the environment of this planet.

This is not an issue to play politics with. Birds fly between boundaries. Fish swim between boundaries. The air above us is seriously affected by global warming and by the hole in the ozone. We have recognized, perhaps for the first time in this century in just the last few years, that the exponential rate has climbed in the extinction of species. For the first 50 years of this century it was one specie a year. It has now accelerated to 10 species per hour. Entire species are becoming extinct: 10 within this hour of debate. We have the extremely unusual, naive and opportunistic politics that are being practised to try to go after this piece of legislation, saying: "Here is the big, mean hand of the feds coming into Quebec".

Mr. Paradis, a Quebec minister, has had many opportunities to communicate with the federal minister and with any member of this House on Bill C-13; similarly any member of the National Assembly. Groups from Quebec came. There was support from all across the country for this kind of an approach on a very important piece of legislation.

On January 23 this year the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada, including the three justices from the province of Quebec, unanimously on the Oldman decision made it very clear that this kind of legislative approach was totally constitutional, totally appropriate. It is not a colourable device. The justices warned that the feds should not be inappropriately or unethically intervening in areas of clear provincial jurisdiction, and this does not do that. No members on the committee that I am aware of attempted to force legislation that intervened specifically in the provincial jurisdiction. I warn the members of the Quebec assembly and I warn members of the Bloc that this issue transcends normal partisan debate.

This is an issue of enormous future consequence to the lives of all humans, to the nature of this land, and the biophysical nature of this nation. Quebec in that sense will always be part of Canada. No one for a moment can ever suggest that biophysically Quebec will ever be located anywhere else than where it presently is. The birds will fly, the fish will swim. The lives of people will continue to be affected by this kind of legislation.

The real test of the intended ineffectiveness of this bill has been clearly established though by this government. It is only appropriate in third and final reading that Canadians have a sense of why this bill does not meet the real test of where it should be as a piece of legislation.

We have examples in every province and in every region of the country but let me just point out a few. There is Kemano II, Alcan's project in British Columbia; there is the Oldman River dam, an Alberta government project; Rafferty-Alameda in the province of Saskatchewan; the Great Whale in la belle province; and Point Aconi in Nova Scotia.

On the other hand, we can look at the 15 sets of regulations which are in the government's hands and not in the hands of members. Because of the result of a vote yesterday, we have been refused the opportunity to bring those regulations before the House, even though it is good enough for firearms regulations but not when it comes to the most important issue in Canada. We can see regulations on firearms, but we cannot see regulations and scrutinize them in the House of Commons.

What kind of a government would do that and what is it hiding? I intend to come to what it is hiding.

Let me deal with the exercise and the expression of government will on major projects. This is a source of great frustration to many Canadians. It is a situation which has brought many Canadians I have met to the point of openly exerting violence to try to get some kind of democratic procedures in place to deal with serious environmental issues.

On Kemano II, the Order in Council exemption has already been found to be unconstitutional and it has been found to be illegal and was quashed by Mr. Justice Allison Walsh last year and it is back before the courts. The Kemano settlement agreement similarly was quashed by the Federal Court because of the questionable way that it had been produced behind closed doors.

The Oldman River dam on January 23, 1992 the Supreme Court found affirmative regulatory duty. The Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport know full well that they have an affirmative regulatory duty. They should make an order that the valves at the dam should remain open so that the reservoir does not fill. I quote from a letter from Martha Kostuch, the vice-president of the Friends of the Oldman River, dated March 10, to the Minister of Transport. She states:

> It is clear from the January 23, 1992 Supreme Court of Canada Ruling that the Alberta Government requires approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the Oldman Dam. Since approval for the Oldman Dam under the Navigable Waters Protection Act was quashed on March 13, 1990 by the Federal Court of Appeal, the Alberta Government is clearly in breach of the Act.
> On behalf of the Friends of the Oldman River, I request that pursuant to the Navigable Waters Protection Act you direct the Alberta Government to keep the valves and the spillway gates open until such time as the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Panel has completed their report and you have made your decision based of their recommendations.

I could carry on and read the rest of the letter, but it is abundantly clear the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada ruled unanimously in terms of affirmative regulatory duty. Here is the expression of political will by a government. It broke the law and violated the Constitution of Canada to make a special deal for Alcan on Kemano II and there is still no review taking place in British Columbia in federal jurisdiction.

In Alberta, the highest court in Alberta quashed a permit allowing for construction. The dam itself is illegal. It was constructed illegally. To allow it to fill is a violation of an affirmative regulatory duty. Does the government express itself in its affirmative regulatory duty, either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of the Environment? No. The reason that I raise these is that the public has a right to take a look at a piece of legislation from both ends. One must look at how a government deals with major environmental issues as a new piece of legislation is approached because the same kind of political behaviour can be expected once the legislative tool is in place.

• (1740)

That is why I was shocked to read the secret cabinet memoranda on this new legislation and to discover while we have 20 panel reviews in place right now, this new legislation will allow so many exemptions that there will probably only be a couple of review panels per year, according to the memorandum.

Everything else will either be exempted or given permits or go through a mitigative process. That to most Canadians will be viewed as an entirely inadequate approach.

With Rafferty–Alameda, the Federal Court of Appeal ordered the minister to comply with the international river improvement act. Since then we have had four ministers, Minister MacMillan who cut the original deal as a land trade, Minister Bouchard now with the Bloc Quebecois who failed to live up to the law, Minister de Cotret, and Minister Charest, all Tories, all four of whom have done nothing to live up to the laws as passed by this Parliament.

They violate in each of the western provinces on a regular basis the laws and statutes passed by this Parliament. And Parliament acts as though we are entirely neutered, that we can do nothing, ministers of the Crown flagrantly violating the Constitution and the laws. Would any rational Canadian think that they would do anything other with Bill C–13 than to use it as a game of snakes and ladders, to use every loophole that they could find?

Let me come to some of those loopholes. The Great Whale project, the Grande Baleine project in Quebec, again is another example where the Minister of the Environment had to be practically bludgeoned, had to be dragged through the courts to live up to an existing trilateral agreement between the Cree, the province of Quebec, and the federal government. He had to be dragged through the courts to live up to that, simply to get the review process going. Agreement between the Quebec and federal Ministers of the Environment is just finally getting underway. It is a process that we will have to wait and see how it works out.

With Point Aconi in Nova Scotia, the wrong minister was made the minister. The minister of fisheries and the Supreme Court of Canada have found there is no trigger mechanism under the fisheries act to require the minister to go beyond an initial environmental assessment.

The minister of fisheries says, "Well, Point Aconi is not going to affect fish". Well, every scientist in the country knew that Point Aconi was going to affect the atmosphere, not the warm water outflow. It was the atmosphere.

Did the Minister of the Environment who was taking this legislation through committee bother to do anything about Point Aconi himself? No. Even though the previous Minister of the Environment had told me to my face that that was precisely what should have been reviewed because it violated Canada's sacred commitment in Geneva from a year ago to at least stabilize carbon dioxide emissions at 1990 levels.

That project will violate without any opportunity for mitigation or mediation a solemn commitment that we made to more than 100 countries.

What about this legislation? Will it bring about integrated economic environmental decision-making? I do not think so, particularly when looking at the regulatory loopholes.

Let us take a look at some of them because as witnesses told the committee one after the other, Mr. Bruchet from the Canadian Petroleum Association said: "It is not necessarily the legislation but the regulations that have the greatest impact".

There are 15 sets of regulations, like a telephone book, being hidden in the minister's office at this very moment so that members of the House cannot see them when we are voting on the legislation, so the public has never had a chance to see them. I will outline why that is so important.

Bill Andrews from the West Coast Environmental Law Association stated: "The regulations themselves are an important if not the most important part of the bill".

Professor Morse from the Canadian Bar Association stated before committee: "About the importance of reviewing regulations before the passage of the bill is that it is very important. There is just too much scope left for regulations".

Even Ms. Brown from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office stated: "The regulations will define a comprehensive study list and the exclusion list".

So any Canadian who naively believes that this legislation when passed would indicate what the comprehensive study hit list would be, what projects for sure would be studied or which ones would be excluded, is dreaming in technicolor.

Let me give some examples. The proof is really in the pudding. This was kindly prepared by Franklin S. Gertler, chairman of the national environmental law section of the Canadian Bar Association.

Let me give some examples of things that will be excluded by regulation. This really tells it all. Airports, major linear developments, highways, transmission lines and pipelines will be exempt. Any new railroad extension of less than 100 kilometres will be exempt. It does not matter where it is in the country, if it is less than 100 kilometres, it will be exempt.

There is no understanding of ecosystems or biophysical reality demonstrated there. That 100 kilometre section of railroad could be in the most sensitive environment in all of Canada. There is a review for a 500 kilometre one in an area of the country where is does not affect anything, but it is exempted in a highly sensitive area. Railroads would be built 99 kilometres at a time. It is pretty obvious what it is planning.

An exemption for the abandonment of rail lines, the exemption of twin-tracking, the exemption of new nuclear reactors, slow-pokes, anything under 30 thermal megawatts would be exempted. Can you imagine? A nuclear reactor is put in a hospital and it is not necessary to assess the impact of bringing the radiated materials into or out of the hospital. Give me a break.

Mines are exempted, as long as they are less than 10,000 tonnes per day. It does not matter whether they are high arsenic, high acid content, they are exempted. There will be a lot of mines producing 9,999 tonnes a day so that they can be exempted. It does not matter whether it is asbestos or whatever.

On dams, as long as not more than 100 cubic meters per second is being taken, they are exempt.

On a final point, Mr. Speaker, this is an exemption that I know you in particular would be concerned about. That is the exemption to reduce the size of national parks in Canada so long as it is done in increments of less than 10 per cent an environmental assessment is not required.

I look forward to questions, as members can probably tell. I am interested in this topic. There are some serious problems that can only be addressed by a redraft of the bill.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. critic's remarks especially when he mentioned Rafferty-Alameda dam.

I served the area that has the two projects in it. One of the problems that came up during this project—and there has been a lot said about the Rafferty-Alameda dam in this House—many of the people who pass judgment on the project have never seen the project. They simply pass judgment for political benefit. They knew nothing about it. At times they tried to indicate that the farmers or the people in that area were less environmentally conscious of what was going on. It was just for plain political rhetoric. It had absolutely no benefit to building sound environmental direction that would be sustainable for the future.

I recall sitting in committee when various members of the opposition, who came from centres that were spewing out all kinds of pollution and polluting the environment in an unlimited manner, passed judgment on a project that was going ahead and was as environmentally sound as could possibly be.

All three governments that were in, including the NDP, the prior Liberal governments, and the Conservative government recommended study after study that the project go ahead. Just because the Conservatives built it, they were opposed to it.

• (1750)

I want to say this. Watch the NDP in Saskatchewan complete it. They are not going to blow it up. It is not going to be done away with.

It is important that this kind of legislation come through the House so that we move ahead in a positive direction on the environment. Bill C-15 brings forward sound regulations and legislation.

I just wanted to make that comment after hearing so many remarks about a project that many people know nothing about and will probably never see.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have received the question from the hon. member. The bill is actually Bill C-13 that we are debating here today.

In terms of his comments on Rafferty-Alameda, the concern that I think is held very widely among residents of Saskatchewan, whether they are for or opposed to the project, is that this government continually and flagrantly violated the laws passed by this Parliament. The courts made that abundantly clear. It was the Federal Court of Appeal, not just the Federal Court, that ordered the minister to comply with statutes passed by this Parliament.

The other point I want to make is that by the time the Rafferty-Alameda project was being actively considered for development, it was abundantly clear what direction the government agencies should be taking in terms of the 1984 cabinet guidelines order. It was not known that it was a mandatory law of general application. A lot of the administrative law that we talk about here in March 1992 on the floor of the House has come since the beginning of Rafferty-Alameda.

The concern that I think residents of Saskatchewan hold, though, is that the Government of Canada refused to hold back on the project and to use the trigger powers that it had under the International Rivers Improvement Act to allow the studies to be completed, to allow the panels to complete the process that they were required to undertake by law.

So there was the violation of the statutes of Canada; there was the violation of the government's own code of conduct, the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, which were not suddenly hatched, Mr. Speaker, in 1984; these regulations came originally from a cabinet directive in 1974. They were rewritten and became an Order in Council in 1984.

On the technical questions about the Rafferty-Alameda dam, we will find out over time that it is not an effective impoundment system that has been proposed. If one looks at the rate of rainfall in that area of Saskatchewan over a long period of time, particularly when one looks at it over multiple decades, one looks at the amount of flow that could be required in relation to the Souris, if one looks at the implications of adding coal-fired thermal heated water back into those systems, what the implications may well be, one ends up with a kind of impoundment system that will not be pleasant for boating, it will not be pleasant for fishing, it will not be particularly good for irrigation, it will not be particularly good for flood protection.

If the hon. member took more time to speak to people like the Tetslaff brothers and got a grip on the number of federal jurisdictions that have been abused and maligned and contravened by government action, including the continual slap in the face to the Federal Court of Appeal that has been taken by the Government of Canada, one would realize why a very dim view of the political behaviour of Progressive Conservatives at the federal level is held by many people, not just in Saskatchewan, on environmental issues, but in many provinces, in Quebec, in Nova Scotia, in Newfoundland, in British Columbia. Because if one continues to flagrantly crap in the nest, to say "Oh, we are passing these laws; look at us, we are great. We've got a green plan" and then, behind closed doors, to cut deals with corporations and provincial authorities, and so on.

I honestly believe that is why the trustability and the popularity of politicians generically as a profession in this country is lower than that for convicted assassins.

Mr. Gustafson: Just one comment, Mr. Speaker.

Again the hon. member is speaking about something that he does not understand. The Alameda dam in a run-off last fall filled up with water. They could boat there last fall, lots of boating. The water was several metres deep. It was unbelievable the amount of run-off that came down that dam. They were boating and they will be boating again this summer.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the member likes to pose questions and that is fine, but it seems to me that if one is ethical about these kinds of issues one would take the time to respond to the point that I had raised, the continued flagrant violation of the law.

We pass laws in here and we expect Canadians, one and all, to live up to those laws. However, when those laws apply to this particular Conservative government, in almost every province, in almost every jurisdiction, on environmental issues, and I predict it will be the same, if not worse with C-13 when it is law, the flagrant abuse of the rights of Canadians and of the ecological integrity of this country will continue unabashed because of behaviour and attitudes such as that just exposed by the member who just asked the question.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this very important debate.

I want to begin this address with some introductory remarks, putting this debate in context.

As the House is aware, this debate comes at a time which is bridging my responsibilities on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee and now resuming my responsibilities as associate critic for international environment. It is in that context that I want to begin.

As we have heard, the Minister of the Environment is not able to be here today and yet this is the most important environmental legislation to be introduced in this House in many, many years. I find it very sad that he is not able to be here. Allegedly the reason for his absence is his attendance at the Conference of Ministers of the Environment in Vancouver, which is occurring this afternoon and tomorrow.

I remind the people who are watching that this government, of which the minister is a part, has the ability to call bills at its convenience. It has control over the timing of the legislative agenda, not us. So I think a House leader's role is behind the scenes because the real reason the Minister of the Environment is not here is because this has become a political football in Quebec and he is a Quebec minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Pronovost: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made three remarks in 60 seconds on the absence from the House of another member or a minister. Everybody knows that ministers and members have numerous occupations outside this House. It is out of order and quite contrary to our rules that experienced members repeat this kind of comment two or three times in just a few seconds.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is true that our Standing Orders forbid comments on the presence or absence of other members in this House.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I note that in this practice we are simply following the lead taken by the parliamentary secretary who, at the beginning of the debate at third reading, indicated the absence of the Minister of the Environment during the debate and expressed the apologies of the minister to the House for not being able to be present.

We are simply following up on the comments that were brought to the attention of the House by the—

Some hon. members: No, no.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I request the co-operation of members on both sides of the House. I think both points have been heard and we could go back to the substance of the debate.

The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has the floor.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, to resume my train of thought, because of the priority of this legislation, I find it curious in the extreme that there are not more ministers speaking out not only for Canada but for the world's environment. I find it curious that the Official Opposition is not giving this issue the kind of priority it should. If this is the most important environmental legislation to come before this House in many, many years, where is the so-called Official Opposition? Why are they not participating in this debate?

• (1800)

I want to now go back and review a little bit of the history of this bill. Bill C-13 is much improved. The all-party committee that put forward the amendments over a 20-month period worked hard, and the legislation is much improved. My colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has achieved many, many amendments through this long and arduous process. We must remember that there was the pre-study, there was Bill C-78 and then Parliament was prorogued. When Bill C-13 came back in the new Parliament, the government had incorporated many of the amendments that had been brought forward in Bill C-78. All of that work needs to be acknowledged. I think that people who are watching this debate and will be reading Hansard need to know the kind of progress that has been made.

My colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake put forward two very important amendments to this legislation. One of them was passed, that is the five year review. The other one regarding regulations was not. The government chose to vote against it. That is an important, crucial part of the legislation. This was made very clear in committee. As was said, far more than in most legislation, the teeth to federal environmental assessment lies in regulations yet to be approved or drafted.

The exclusion list outlining what projects and what types of projects will not be required to be subjected to review will be in the regulations. The procedures governing how public participation will occur will be left to regulations. The comprehensive study list will be left to regulations. Procedures for examining written evidence will be left to regulations. Public registries will be dealt with in regulations. The workings of follow-up programs will be left to regulations. The absence of those regulations and bringing them back to the House is a real vacuum of power. We have, as I see it, a major deficiency in the bill because of the government's choice not to support that amendment from my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

I would like to turn to my area of responsibility and that is the international environment. There are two major projects I want to put forward as examples. The first is the Three Gorges project in China. Canada, through CIDA, has put forward $14 million for a feasibility study. This, under this legislation, would not be able to be reviewed. This is not a project; it is a feasibility study. Yet, this Three Gorges project will have an enormous impact on the environment in China. It will have an enormous impact on the lives of the people there. We are talking about destruction of whole ecosystems. It will change the river's hydrology. It will jeopardize a cultural heritage and $14 million of our tax dollars has gone to a feasibility study.

There has now been a ruling. The jury of the second international water tribunal has found that feasibility study far short of what should be desired. We have seen major deficiencies and yet, with regard to the Three Gorges project, China has said: "Yes, we will take that feasibility study" which says the Three Gorges project should be proceeded with, "as a rationale to proceed". China will come back to Canada and say: "You guys thought it was a good idea. Now, we would like some more money please so that we can proceed with the construction of the dam on the Three Gorges".

This is just not acceptable to Canadians. This is a major deficiency in this bill as well.

The second example is the new project on which my friend Tom Berger from British Columbia is currently doing an independent review for the World Bank. It is called the Sardar Saravor Dam in India. It is the World Bank linkages that I want to address my comments to.

This dam is a major project. The World Bank is paying about 15 per cent of approximately $6 billion for this dam. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance for Canada sits on the board of directors of the World Bank. There is no transparency in what his decisions might be and in how they might affect the world's environment. We do not know. They get into a room. They close the doors. They make the decisions. It is our tax dollars that are financing it.

Canadians need to have that transparency. They want to know when the Minister of Finance is making decisions of that type that he is making the right decisions. Bill C–13 has not got the ability to be able to call an environmental assessment on those projects. Yet it is federal money. There is a federal role. Bill C–13 says that we should be talking about federal areas of jurisdiction, federal responsibilities. Those are two major examples on the international environment front that will not be reviewed, will not be assessed.

There is also the other deficiency in this. It is something that we are going to have to work on further. This is like capital projects kind of thinking, that that is what will be reviewed or assessed.

The policies of this government are not up for review or assessment and we have got before us now the possibility of a North American free trade agreement. What will be the environmental consequences of that agreement? Will we be able to assess it? Not under this legislation. What about the GST? Would such a major policy of the government be assessed? Not under this legislation.

Ask me what kind of environmental effects that would have. When you think about global warming, you think about the kind of petrochemical products that are put into the atmosphere that cause global warning. Why are cars taxed with the GST? Obviously that is a sensible move, if you believe in the GST. But why are bikes not exempt? Bicycles are an alternative transportation but they are taxed just the same as cars.

There is no environmental sensitivity to that kind of policy. The GST and the North American free trade agreement are two policies that I am putting forward as examples that this government is introducing or has introduced that will have enormous environmental consequences. Yet we have no ability to review them. There is no environmental assessment. There is no understanding that sustainable development begins here and that we need to have a process of assessing the sustainability if we really do believe that the world's environment is worthy of assessment, not just the Canadian environment. Of course we are concerned about that, but it extends.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying let us put this in context. We are going to have the Earth Summit in Brazil in June. Canada has an opportunity in the days leading up to the Earth Summit to create the best environmental legislation in the world. I have reviewed environmental assessment legislation in other jurisdictions. There are many similarities to this. There are many differences.

Bill C–13 does not cut it. It is not good enough. It has come a long way. I once again compliment the members of the committee in the major amendments, the major changes to the legislation, but it is not good enough.

• (1810)

This planet is dying, and we have to find a way to stop it. We have to find a way. We have to put the legislation, the bill, the regulations to ensure the dying planet at least slows down that death. This bill does not do it.

I am sorry to say that I cannot support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would be interested in hearing what the hon. member who just spoke had to say about the position taken by the Government of Quebec. Early this afternoon, the leader of the opposition, Mr. Parizeau, said this was one of the most serious attempts at economic centralization, using the environment as an excuse, that we had seen so far.

In the Quebec National Assembly, the following was said: Bill C–13, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, constitutes an unacceptable encroachment on Quebec's areas of jurisdiction. Bill C–13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, will introduce an assessment process that will be unworkable. Furthermore, Bill C–13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, will lead to costly administrative duplication and court challenges. Furthermore, the federal government will be able to proceed unilaterally, and adopt Bill C–13 without considering Quebec's objectives.

I think this is entirely unacceptable to those of us who want to represent Quebec's interests. I thought a number of Conservative members who represent this government would rise this afternoon, but I have neither seen nor heard them.

My question is this: Considering the fact that the Government of Quebec unanimously passed a resolution this afternoon that the National Assembly strongly disapproves of the federal government's Bill C–13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, since it is contrary to the higher interests of Quebec, and objects to its passage by the Parliament of Canada, I fail to understand why members who claim to defend the interests of Quebec, especially Conservative members who represent the federal government, did not rise this afternoon to object to a bill that goes against the interests of Quebec and Quebec's economic development.

I want to ask the hon. member from Vancouver: What does she think of the federal government's arrogance in wanting to interfere in Quebec's affairs, since the federal government knows perfectly well the Government of Quebec can judge for itself what is or is not good for the environment?

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I find it really disturbing that a member sitting in this House is playing petty politics with the world's environment and wanting to get some points in the Quebec legislature when we are talking about a dying planet.

The priorities are mind boggling. What this government is doing by introducing this bill is a laudable goal. What we are seeing is here. Rather than having the courage to come to any meetings with either the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs or the Ministers of the Environment, the Quebec legislators are giving out their ideas on what the restructuring of our federalism should be through press releases.

I challenge the members from Quebec to come and talk. Tell us what you want. It does not seem to be an unreasonable approach. No, they do not. They sit in their houses in Quebec City and issue edicts of what is acceptable and what is not. This is environmental legislation that is crucial. It is flawed but it is crucial. We have heard from the Bloc Quebecois that it is willing to play petty politics with little maps with which it would like to be able to preserve the world environment. The world's environment is not protected by drawing lines on a globe.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, we do not play politics with the environment. What we in the Bloc Quebecois are saying is that Quebec is as capable as the federal government of making decisions about the environment with its partners, be they the United States, the rest of Canada, the maritimes, Europe or Brazil, as she said. I do not want us to be called anti–environment. On the contrary, we say that we are as capable as the federal government, that it will go much better and would be much more efficient.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: I want to make it very clear in case people have missed it. I speak for Canada. I see Canada as part of the world. I think that the Canadian government, the federal government, has a responsibility and I want that responsibility to be paramount in environmental concerns. That is why I worked hard on the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee to ensure that the residual power stayed with the federal government—peace, order and good government.

We are a nation state. Quebec is not. If it wants to change the arrangements down the road I will cry. I will weep for Canada and for Quebec because it will be bad for Quebec, bad for Canada and bad for the world. It is not just the environment that will suffer. The economy and our international reputation will also suffer.

When I say the member is playing petty politics I mean it. This is the pettiest of politics. He is going to be blamed for the amount of concern he has expressed for the environment, which is none.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the debate that has been raging for the last little while requires a little more attention. One of the things I thought every right–minded person in the world had come to realize, particularly in a post–Brundtland report world, was that the environment is not something which can be neatly circumscribed by boundaries, either national boundaries or provincial boundaries. Therefore I find the position being taken by the Bloc Quebecois to be quite questionable and reprehensible because it is asking the rest of us to accept that what happens to the environment in Quebec is none of our business.

What happens to the environment in Quebec is our business. It is the business of the Parliament of Canada, it is the business of everyone else who lives in Canada and of everyone else in the world.

Let us consider some of the things that are to be done in Quebec, particularly the Great Whale Project. It is everyone's business on planet earth that the province of Quebec wants to flood God knows how many hundreds and thousands of square miles in northern Quebec in order to create hydroelectricity. It is a fool's paradise to think otherwise, to think that this is just a parochial issue that everyone else should keep their nose out of. It is a fool's paradise but unfortunately it will not only be the fools who will suffer. Everyone suffers from this kind of myopia when it comes to the environment.

I want to make it very clear that although the NDP intends to vote against this bill because we do not think it goes far enough and because we are concerned about matters pertaining to regulation and possible exemptions, and issues such as that.

• (1820)

This is a bill which is an improvement over things as they are and a bill which recognizes the federal jurisdiction in these matters. We support that and we want to make it very clear that we do not have any association with the position which has been expressed whatsoever. The member for Skeena did so very clearly earlier on. However I think it needs some repetition.

This position that somehow the environment as it pertains to Quebec is not the business of the Parliament of Canada has to be rejected time and time again. I do not think it is an appropriate position.

One has to wonder what is really going on here. The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands said that the members of the Bloc Quebecois were playing petty politics with this issue. There cannot be any stronger evidence than the fact that this bill was drafted and once introduced by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois when he was the Minister of the Environment, back in the old days before he had done his most current thing.

The fact is that this bill, particularly those parts which pertain to federal-provincial relations, jurisdiction, et cetera—presumably those issues which the members find so objectionable, unless they feel that dealing with the whole notion of the environment is objectionable, presumably it is the federal-provincial aspects— remain untouched.

Those aspects are basically the same as they were in the previous bill, Bill C-78, that came before this House under the name of the Minister of the Environment, who now leads the Bloc Quebecois. If it were not against the rules I might ask about the coincidence of his absence during this debate.

I would not do that. Possibly members of the Bloc Quebecois might want to explain why the member for Saguenay is not here to defend the bill which he actually introduced himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief opposition Whip to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until three o'clock tomorrow afternoon when the division bells will ring for at most 15 minutes.

Would someone on the government side kindly tell the Chair if he or she wants to call other bills on the agenda or perhaps suggest suspending the sitting until the time for Private Members' Business?

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be in the best interests of the House to suspend the House until private members' hour at seven o'clock because those members who plan to participate have that time on their timetable. It would not be fair to them to move along too quickly. They would not necessarily be present. Seven o'clock, if the House is willing, would be the suggestion.

An hon. member: No.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-51, an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is kind of unusual to have this kind of an opportunity for debate. The government members obviously do not want to defend their own legislation. That is becoming a bit of a habit on that side of the House, but as you would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, this particular legislation is an act respecting the water resources of the Northwest Territories and comes with a companion piece of legislation called Bill C-52 which is an act respecting the water resources in the Yukon territory. It has been important for some time to get this kind of legislation up for debate. I am quite confident that this will have to go to the legislative committee. We will need to have the Minister of Natural Resources from the Northwest Territories down and I am sure we will want to hear from other witnesses because the Northwest Territories contains some of the largest fresh water bodies on earth and some of the larger water systems from south of 60 flow from the provinces up into the Northwest Territories.

I always like to tell a few stories as I start getting into a piece of legislation. As members know, some of the major river systems that flow out of British Columbia and Alberta flow into the Northwest Territories through Canada's largest national park.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There does not seem to be a quorum in the House.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not sure whether to count the member for Richelieu as being present or not— There is a quorum. I give the floor to the hon. member for Skeena.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is always good to get the government members out of the trough at any opportunity. I would have thought they would rather debate Bill C-51 than feed themselves, but they now get a chance to listen to my story.

As I was saying, I always like to draw the attention of members to the importance of a piece of legislation by telling a few stories. As members know, Wood Buffalo National Park is the largest national park in Canada, and the United Nations has taken a very dim view of what is happening in our largest national park. It has the largest free roaming herd of bison left on earth; it has the largest whooping crane nesting areas.

One of the problems with it results from a dam actually built in British Columbia which has a direct impact on the Northwest Territories and its ability to deal effectively with water issues. That is why I know that the government of the Northwest Territories will be critically interested in this legislation, particularly if it needs to be amended in any way.

Let me get to the story here. The water used to flow in the Finlay and the Parsnip systems, in the Rocky cordillera of northern British Columbia, an area you may not have had much time to hang around in, Mr. Speaker, but I have. As these two mighty river systems were dammed by the W.A.C. Bennett dam, it slowed down the flow of water coming out of British Columbia into a mighty river that you probably have heard of called the Peace. The Peace River flows in a easterly direction and goes into Wood Buffalo National Park.

The Athabaska flows on the eastern boundary of Wood Buffalo National Park and the Peace flows right through the middle of it. There is a gigantic estuary there, one of the largest freshwater marine estuaries in the world. This is of critical interest to the government of the Northwest Territories and that is why it is critically interested in the outcome of the debate and the legislative process involving Bill C–51.

The water has slowed down because it is impounded in the Williston reservoir. The natural flood flows which ordinarily would come in the spring, in the coming months from now, would go in and flush a lot of the various small kinds of plants and bushes and so on out of the sedimented sands that are in this huge freshwater estuary and would create an enormously important part of the biosystem, not only for birds such as the whooping cranes but also for the bison.

The government has yet to seriously address this problem. When I speak about government I include the federal government but also both the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and obviously the Northwest Territories because as the waters flow north from their point of joining at Wood Buffalo National Park they flow on up into the Northwest Territories where there are major lake systems such as Great Slave and other very large bodies of water.

One of the difficulties encountered by the duly democratically elected legislature of the Northwest Territories is that it has been unable to properly administer many of the issues affecting water, whether it is for water supply for communities or the disposal of various kinds of contaminants into water systems. In the Northwest Territories and Yukon, mining issues such as placer mining, need regulatory authority and enforcement authorities so that they can control the kinds of activities that affect their water supply. They need permitting structures and, in order to do that, they need legislation such as this.

There is serious interest among residents in the Northwest Territories to get transferred powers so that they can conduct the kind of work that historically has been done by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As members can appreciate, it is a rather difficult job for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs to conduct from Ottawa, to deal with all of the permitting and regulatory matters affecting the Northwest Territories and, as we will find in the following debate, affecting Yukon.

The majority of the water movement in the Northwest Territories is either into Hudson Bay or on up into the Beaufort. I think most members of the House are aware of mighty rivers such as the Mackenzie and others that flow in a northerly direction up through the territories and into the Arctic or into Hudson Bay.

It being second reading of this legislation, I would like to take an opportunity to assist those who might be interested in reading this debate or who are watching this debate in terms of some of the definitions that are going to be provided in Bill C–51.

In the interpretation section, "board", for the purposes of this legislation, is going to mean the Northwest Territories Water Board as established in this act. What you can see is the intent of the legislation, in the interpretation section, to develop a more territorially based administrative system.

"Domestic user" means a person using waters for household requirements, for watering of domestic animals and so on. That, of course, would involve all of the residents of the N.W.T.

"Instream user" means a person using waters otherwise than so described. The licensing provisions are going to be transferred in a similar way to the Northwest Territories.

As I was saying earlier, it is one of the more difficult issues for a small government, because administratively the government of the Northwest Territories does not have a large bureaucracy in a contemporary sense when compared with the provinces or with the federal government and the major difficulties it is now starting to have to deal with, in many cases, come from the provinces.

We can look again to western Canada to problems being created for the Northwest Territories in terms of water quality and waste being discharged into systems like the Peace and the Athabaska from some of the major new pulp mills that are being constructed there. Many of those toxic contaminants move not just hundreds, but in some cases thousands of miles up these majestic and beautiful water systems.

Not only can these kinds of toxic contaminants be carried from other jurisdictions such as the provinces on up systems like the Peace and the Athabaska to contaminate major river and lake systems in the Northwest Territories, but fish species that move up and down these enormous water systems can pick up large amounts of the contaminants in their flesh near points of contamination and move up into the system and thus carry the contamination much further.

The definition of "waste", as placed into Bill C–51, reads:

> (a) any substance that, if added to water, would degrade or alter or form part of a process of degradation or alteration of the quality of the water to the extent that is detrimental to its use by people or by any animal, fish or plant,

That sounds like quite a mouthful. However, the Fisheries Act contains some very strong provisional sections in terms of the placement of deleterious substances into water. The attempt in this piece of legislation, at least I would say at first blush, is to cover principal users of water, that being humans, animals and fish, although as the legislative committee deals with it there may well be a need to expand this particular definition to include birds and perhaps other users.

• (1840)

We see that the definition of waters means any inland water, whether in a liquid or frozen state, on or below the surface of the land in the Northwest Territories. This is a very extensive piece of legislation in that it applies to aquifer water, whether it is frozen or liquid and whether it is frozen or liquid on the surface of the land, so long as it is inland water. This piece of legislation does not apply once we go beyond the estuary of the water that flows either into the Beaufort or into Hudson Bay.

The legislation under its general section deals with the traditional clause of the legislation being binding on Her Majesty. In clause 4, in terms of a section called waters vested in Her Majesty, it states:

> Subject to any rights, powers or privileges granted pursuant to the Dominion Water Power Act or preserved under that Act, the property in and the right to the use and flow of all waters are vested in Her Majesty in right of Canada.

That is to make clear legislatively that this legislation is a delegation of authority from the Crown to another order of government. In terms of application of other acts, it makes clear:

> Nothing in this Act, the regulations or a licence authorizes a person to contravene or fail to comply with any other Act or any other regulation or order made thereunder, except as provided in that other Act, regulation or order.

This legislation is quite tight in terms of scope, even though I think it will be of considerable administrative benefit to the N.W.T.

The actual delegation section is clause 6. It is worthy of note because it is really the active part of this piece of legislation. It states in clause 6:

> The Minister may, in writing, delegate to the person occupying the recognized position of Minister of the Northwest Territories responsible for water resources any of the Minister's functions under section 10—

It goes on and lists a series of sections:

> —either generally or as otherwise provided in the instrument of delegation.

There have been many debates and arguments in this House about duplication. I think we as a Parliament and as legislators make efforts wherever possible to try to avoid or reduce duplication. There are few enough dollars to go around and large enough jobs to do in the environmental field that duplication is certainly something that should and must be avoided.

In this particular clause the delegation of authority is designed to take an administrative function that is presently handled by the Minister of Indian Affairs, and following the election of each new minister responsible for water resources in the N.W.T., and redelegate it.

It also provides in the subsequent clause for agreements with provinces and territories, which obviously is necessary. As I pointed out when I began my remarks, waters flow from the provinces, particularly from British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, to the N.W.T. Naturally there is a need for agreements and the minister to whom the power is delegated naturally requires the capacity for agreements.

That clause states: "With the approval of the Governor in Council and subject to any agreement entered into pursuant to sections 5 or 11 of the Canada Water Act, the minister may on behalf of the Government of Canada enter into an agreement with a provincial or territorial government providing for the management of any waters situated partially in the Northwest Territories and partially in a province or the Yukon territory or flowing between the Northwest Territories and a province or the Yukon territory".

The reason for this is in many cases in relation to hydroelectric developments of which there are many under consideration. As we know there has been a growing need over the last number of years for a comprehensive evaluation of the impact of hydroelectric projects on the Hudson Bay and generally not just on the acquatics but the entire biosystems north of 60, and to a certain extent south of 60.

Perhaps I could take a moment on this point. It is really very germane to this piece of legislation. If we look at a major project such as James Bay I, or if we even included James Bay II, la Grande Baleine as it is known or the Great Whale project, and then look at some of the other major hydroelectric projects that are proposed for the entire Hudson Bay—James Bay basin, we realize very quickly the cumulative impact of all these water diversions, water impoundments and reservoir systems can be major on an entire biosystem. There have not been these kinds of cumulative studies done. I certainly believe that by transferring and delegating this kind of administrative authority we avoid duplication. We also provide localized control where we can have better democratic input in terms of decisions that are going to be made on either water withdrawals or potential water contaminations. As I said in terms of potential diversions or obstructions of water systems, we should end up with a better system. But I really do urge upon the Government of the N.W.T., the provinces and Crown Canada to enter into a serious cumulative impact evaluation of alterations or modifications to existing water systems as quickly as possibly, not only of the N.W.T. but of all of this country. We can learn more from work such as that of Dr. Rudd who has been doing particular work on potential methane releases from the James Bay II, from la Grande Baleine.

As he has pointed out, his preliminary investigations indicate that the amount of methane releases over several decades from the Great Whale project would be comparable to that power being produced by thermal coal generation. That is the amount of methane that would be released if we converted it into carbon dioxide equivalents that would be released.

These extremely important matters related to water are often overlooked by people in bureaucracies who are issuing permits for people to withdraw water or to be involved in hydraulic mining such as placer mining and are concerned about fish, bird breeding areas and all other such things. They tend to lose track of the larger scope, the cumulative impact of some of these major diversion and water modification projects.

It is critical that the kinds of agreements the N.W.T. may consider entering into with this newly delegated authority take account of these kinds of major issues. I pointed out the toxification and the contamination of waters flowing from British Columbia and from Alberta up through Wood Buffalo are of great concern in the Northwest Territories.

It has every right to be concerned because contamination particularly of the fisheries can have tragic consequences as we learn only too sadly of Grassy Narrows and at other locations. In the particular case of Grassy Narrows it was methyl mercury contamination. The concerns in the Northwest Territories in terms of the major pulp projects in Alberta are about the increased loadings of organo–chlorines and dioxins into the water systems.

What happens is that the flesh of the fish gets very high concentrations of these materials and it works its way up. It called bioaccumulation and biomagnification, something that those who study water and fisheries come to understand quite quickly, that the longer fish live, the more they eat a particular diet. It is not as though they are just eating a marshmallow with poison in it and then excreting it and the poison is gone. What happens in their body systems and in the ecosystem itself is that as more toxic contaminants are put in, their body loadings continue to go up to the point where there are some fish in some systems in Canada where we would not be safe eating one fish a year. Regrettably that is the concern right now in the Northwest Territories.

Once this legislation is properly amended before the legislative committee, brought back for debate and given Royal Assent, I am quite confident that it will have been the kind of serious debate that could, should and must take place in the N.W.T. assembly as it looks at how it should, from a regulatory perspective and from a long–term development perspective, handle permits for withdrawing water and allowing waste to go in, and how it will deal with the transboundary issues of the movement of contaminants either from another territory or from the provinces into its area.

A much more serious problem particularly affecting the Canadian Arctic now is the transportation of airborne toxics. They are carried in the higher areas of the atmosphere and come down either as toxified rain or snow. A very similar phenomenon to that which we know much more about is known as acid rain.

We are starting to find in the bodies of seal populations north of 60, in walrus and other marine mammals at the top of the food chain and in the polar bear population, the increasing likelihood that they will be unable in some major areas of the Arctic because of ecosystem contamination from the atmosphere to continue to reproduce. In the principal genital tracts of both male and female polar bears very high levels of contamination have already been found leading to the incapacity and inability to reproduce.

These are the major and difficult issues the Government of the N.W.T. will have to face. There is great fear in small communities such as some of those in the high Arctic where the breast milk of mothers was sampled in the last couple of years and very high levels of PCBs were found. No one could figure out how these high levels of PCBs could be getting into the mothers' systems. It was discovered that the PCBs were moving as aerosols, not through the ocean and not being carried up and dumped in the ocean by human accident in Canada. These were severe contaminants coming as airborne aerosols from Europe, the former Soviet Union, and continental North America. These airborne toxics and acid precipitation are starting to affect the entire ecosystems of the Northwest Territories.

It has an enormous task to assume because of this kind of global contamination problems which we find are increasingly carried through our water systems. The largest solar engine on earth is the movement of water. It is lifted by the heat of the sun into the sky. It falls either as rain or as snow or hail. It comes back on to the land and then the movement of water from there back to the oceans of the world occurs through gravity. These enormous system assessments will have to be undertaken by the Government of the Northwest Territories as part of its new duties.

It is one of the things I urge upon the new minister who is about to receive this delegated authority. That new minister should look carefully at what kinds of economic instruments might best be sought to carry on this kind of nationally significant assessment of water contamination, water diversion, and the movement of these toxics through marine organisms.

I am glad to see my colleague who is an expert in microbiology and these kinds of biosystems here. He could well be of assistance to the Government of the Northwest Territories in preparing its first five-year fiscal approach to permitting regulation and assessment of these major topics.

I would hope by now that some government member would want to stand up for its legislation.

Mr. Edwards: Right here.

Mr. Fulton: My cousin is here, Mr. Speaker. You probably did not know this.

I think I have mentioned this before, but brother Edwards is actually related to me. I believe we are second cousins. We are not actually first cousins. This means that we are—I have digressed for a moment—related on my mother's side and his mother's side as well. He is a government member and I wish him well because he is going to be on this side of the House fairly soon.

Mr. Edwards: I am not joining your party.

Mr. Fulton: No. I was not suggesting that for a moment. I do not think my Uncle Bruce would approve of either of us crossing the floor. I think he is quite happy with us where we both are.

We are getting into some of the critical sections of the legislation. Under the conditions for the issue of licences—very important stuff—it is listed here. This flows right along with what I was talking about earlier. There are domestic users. I touched on that piece of legislation earlier about domestic users, such as I and others. We are there. We take out a pail of water, pump it out and use it for whatever we like.

Then there are instream users. A different kind of licence is required. Then there are authorized users. There are authorized waste depositors, that would apply to villages large and small. It would apply to individuals who might have small plaster operations or small industries of some kind who might need to make use of the water system to dispose of some kinds of material.

Then there are owners of property and occupiers of property. This is a particular area to which there should be some amendments. I do not think that the definitions are clear enough. I look forward to the legislative committee taking a look at clauses 6 and 7. In an area like the Northwest Territories there have been some substantial comprehensive claim settlements, there has been the Inuvialuit settlement in the Beaufort region.

Interestingly enough, the Inuvialuit people moved over from Alaska about a century and a half ago. They are actually Canadians now. There are other kinds of licences. There are those holding an outfitting concession. There are registered trapline holders and holders of other rights of a similar nature.

I would encourage the legislative committee to consult a little more with the representatives of the Northwest Territories and perhaps be a little bit clearer. The following section is not quite as clearly drafted—

Mr. Blaikie: As it should be.

Mr. Fulton: —as it should be, as my friend from Winnipeg Transcona properly points out. It says:

> —who were such licensees, users, depositors, owners, occupiers or holders, whether in or outside the water management area to which the application relates, at the time when the applicant filed an application with the Board in accordance with the regulations made under paragraphs 33(1)(d) and (e), and who would be adversely affected by the use of waters or deposit of waste proposed by the applicant.

Mr. Blaikie: There you go.

Mr. Fulton: That is quite a mouthful. It should be more clearly drafted here.

I see my friend from Newfoundland is nodding in agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being seven o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I was just wondering whether my colleague had managed to complete the entire 40 minutes that was allocated because I think that many in the House would be anxious, if he were not finished, to hear him finish his speech.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If he wants to resume speaking on the bill, the hon. member for Skeena will have nine minutes.

CANADIAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

ADVISABILITY OF ESTABLISHING

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a Canadian Council on Education, funded in part by government and the private sector, which would provide independent research and policy advice on education for the benefit of governments in the development and implementation of national goals for education.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if you have been perusing the newspapers across the country, as I am sure you have, and observing what has been discussed in the media you will understand that education at all levels—training, even day care as an educational function—is being increasingly widely discussed in Canada. This is because people are beginning to understand that the development of skills—education, literacy, the number of scientists, engineers and mathematicians that we produce, and the number of technologists we produce—is fundamental to our economic future. It is fundamental to prosperity.

For all that one might say about the government's prosperity and initiative one of the documents that accompanies that process that has been initiated is entitled Living and Learning. Both documents place a great deal of emphasis on education, on learning. There is a very sensible reason for that. Quite simply, it that when one examines the Canadian economy our capacity to create value added is fundamental to prosperity. The creation of wealth is directly related to the knowledge that we can invest in our products and in our services.

If one were to examine the fundamentals underlying any future prospect of Canadian prosperity, for all the analysis we have heard, one would see that our future prosperity depends upon creating opportunities for Canadians. Rather than talking about the competitiveness agenda we should be talking about the opportunity agenda. Yet, one of the things that can be observed about Canada, it was cited some time ago by the OECD and has been repeatedly cited by a number of observers, is the complete absence of any national framework for policy definition that would relate education and training to our economic development.

This turns out to be one of the key deficiencies that we face. In spite of the government's citation of training and education in connection with its prosperity agenda there have been few initiatives that would correct that situation. Even in the United States, which shares the same kind of jurisdictional divisions we have with respect to education, there is a department of education: the department of health, education and welfare. There was the President's commission on education. There is the President's panel on educational goals, which continues to operate. There is the Carnegie Foundation and the Hudson Institute. As well, a number of other initiatives have looked at the question of educational goals, educational policies, curriculum, teaching techniques and all of those things as fundamental to the educational process there as they are here.

When looking at the situation in Canada where we have a number of jurisdictions acting, it seemed to me that it was necessary to find some way of reconciling those jurisdictional differences with the absolute need in this country to have some national focus on education, to address certain problems that we have.

Among the problems we have is in the recent international testing results it was revealed that in spite of the fact that Canada spends more on education than almost any other industrial nation, our students ended up in about the middle of the industrial nations with respect to both science and math which are obviously two critical areas of educational or intellectual performance.

Serious questions are raised with respect to what we are getting out of the educational system and how we are going to tune in our educational system to our economic needs.

In fact, a number of organizations have suggested that there should be some kind of national council on education. At first the focus was on post-secondary education.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Federation of Students for example had suggested that there be an advisory board on post-secondary education on the premise that there was a federal involvement in post-secondary education as there is, until now, no federal role in primary and secondary education, although recently there has been some discussion of federal initiatives in the area of day care.

With respect to day care we only have to say that it is increasingly to be regarded as a significant part of the educational process for young people who are more and more brought up in families in which both parents work and in which they are deprived significantly of the development of learning skills necessary for their future ability to thrive in whatever educational stream in which they may find themselves.

More recently it has become obvious that even as was suggested with respect to my comments on day care that there is a continuum in education that relates to all levels and all kinds of education. There is no real clear distinction to be made among training and education and post-secondary education, all of which are options that young people may pursue.

As I have said, of late there has been concern from a number of agencies that there be some kind of national focus, some national capacity to look at educational policy, to look at teaching methods, to look at some of the problems that we have in our educational system.

Among others, the Canadian Federation of Teachers has suggested that there be a Canadian office on education with an advisory board associated with it to carry out studies of benefit to the various jurisdictions involved in education.

The National Advisory Board on Science and Technology had made suggestions that there be a national task force for example that would involve the various governments and the various elements which have an interest in education, from industry, the academic field, labour, and so on.

There was a recent joint conference between members of Parliament and the scientific community that suggested very strongly that there needs to be some kind of national advisory council on education, that would fulfil the role that we define here for the body that I am proposing. The Science Council suggested a national council on science education.

• (1910)

However, on close scrutiny one has to conclude that there is no real distinction to be made between science education and any other kind of education in terms of what kinds of problems, policies, teaching techniques, curriculum and so on that need to be examined.

The Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology in its report Canada Must Compete proposed that there be a national council on education.

The government responded by pointing out that there was a great deal of work presently being done by the Council of Ministers of Education in Canada and posed the question whether a new national body such as a council is required in these circumstances. It would require careful consideration by all stakeholders. The merits of the proposition that I advance here have to some degree been recognized by the government and taken under advisement.

The difficulty with the Council of Ministers of Education is that this is an ad hoc arrangement among politicians that can get intertwined with all kinds of political and jurisdictional considerations. It is not the kind of body that is necessary in this country if we are to look at education within the context that virtually every other country has managed to do, especially those countries that do not have the jurisdiction divisions that Canada and the United States have.

We have to look for an approach to the question of a national council on education which will avoid the implication that the federal government is stepping on provincial jurisdictions. Rather, a body is needed that will provide the studies, recommendations and so on after carrying out or commissioning studies which will help the responsible bodies, whether these be provincial governments or even school-boards, in carrying out their responsibilities.

There is no paucity of issues to be looked at within the Canadian educational context. For example, the government has looked at a number of problems such as those I cited earlier which have been so widely reported, for example the deficiency of industrial trainees in this country, the high level of illiteracy and the high dropout rates in our schools.

The government suggested among other things that it would double the number of scientists, engineers and mathematicians that were produced in this country. It would eliminate illiteracy, quadruple the number of trainees and would increase the number of graduates coming from schools.

Those in fact are goals that are stated as a part of the prosperity initiative of this government and things that are being studied in these rather useless fora that constitute the prosperity initiative.

I have to say that all of us are extremely disappointed not to find any evidence of any of these initiatives or any other initiatives having to do with training and education such as those that it was suggested were government goals for action in the area of learning and education.

Should the government decide to do any of these things one of the questions that would have to be asked is: How is it going to do it? In which policy framework could this be done? How will we go about evaluating to what degree it has been accomplished after a period of time?

There is a good deal more that such a body could undertake including looking at the question of educational techniques. It is true that we have a very high dropout rate in this country. We should be asking why that is so. We should be asking questions about why so few of our students manage to enter into mathematics, engineering and science.

We should be asking whether the old teaching techniques still make sense. In spite of the fact that there has been a great deal of experimentation, particularly with students who are disadvantaged, with new information and teaching technologies, we are still burdened with the old-fashioned techniques that have been used since time immemorial.

It strikes me that one of the things that might be looked at is whether we are using our resources efficiently for students. We have had a change in the ethnic make up of our country. That is an issue that could be looked at.

There is the question of curriculum content, about which there has been little done in this country, while numerous studies have been done in this regard in the United States.

There are a great many areas of education that require some national focus for which the national education council that I propose would be a significant step forward in accomplishing.

However, I cannot evince a great deal of confidence in the capacity of the government to understand how useful it would be to it to have an independent source of policy studies, curriculum studies, methodology studies, in the sphere of education when just recently two significant bodies that have called attention to the issue of education, the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada, were eliminated by this government presumably because those two agencies were capable of and did criticize government policy.

And so I stand here before you proposing yet another independent arm's length organization that would have an analogous role with respect to education that the Science Council and the Economic Council had concerning science and economics respectively.

But the nature of the council would be such that it would be funded by the provincial governments, the federal government, private sources, industry and labour. It would have as its role the initiation of studies such as those I described earlier without any regulatory or other powers except to provide information, to provide studies, to provide policy proposals, to carry out research within its own walls or to commission research in the universities and other institutions that are capable of pursuing it.

To summarize, Canada stands alone among the industrialized nations of the world in having some capacity to develop education goals and means of achieving those goals which are coherent with the educational goals of the country. Canada desperately needs it. We have delayed it too long. Our prosperity depends upon it.

It is clear that if we are to become competitive, it is through the capacity to invest our skills, our knowledge, our capacity to create in our products and services so that we can produce those things necessary to sell.

That means that the economic agenda should be an agenda of opportunity. We should exhibit a commitment to that agenda of opportunity by having a means by which education throughout this country can be improved.

I submit that a national education council is an appropriate means. I hope that this House will support that proposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to thank my colleague from Laval-Est, the parliamentary secretary, for kindly letting me speak first on this motion.

I heard my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair talk about education. I am a father and it made me think of my three daughters, Marie-Ève, who is ten, Pascale, seven, and Gabrielle, six. I wonder if my children, when they are older, will ask themselves whether today's adults really fulfilled their responsibilities for education. They will probably wonder if it was another federal-provincial quarrel on whether to have national education standards or not. Will we have another fight about that, especially between Quebec and the federal government?

• (1920)

And I told myself that there are few children in Canada and in Quebec who think in terms of constitutional battles; rather, they want us to preserve their future. I believe that the role of this Parliament is to preserve that future by establishing national standards for education. The role of this government and of this House is to work towards that goal.

Allow me first to discuss the motion of the member for Windsor—St. Clair. I want to tell him as well as the House that the quality of education in our country is, and has always been, one of the main concerns of the government. Nobody in this country can claim that having a school drop-out rate of 30 per cent is an acceptable figure. Nobody can claim that our literacy rate as well as the rate for basic calculus knowledge are sufficiently high. And, Mr. Speaker, nobody can claim that in the field of education you can simply maintain the status quo to face an increasingly stiffer international competition, and to rely more on industries and occupations that are based on knowledge.

More and more Canadians think that we must take a serious look at our attitude as regards education. We are all aware that we must review our objectives, our training programs and our priorities in the field of education. However, it is also clear that the challenges that Canadians are facing in education can only be taken up through defined, coordinated and joint initiatives.

It is only too obvious that we must act through partnership and consensus, given the primacy of education among provincial responsibilities. We have already told the member for Windsor—St. Clair that we understand his concerns regarding the future of education in Canada and that we support his desire to promote a reform of education at the national level.

I want to tell all the members of this House as well as the Canadian population that this problem is at the top of the national issues on our agenda. We have set up partnerships with businesses and unions, with the field of education and with social services, in order to make all Canadians aware of the great challenge of our times: the development of our human resources to foster a modern economy.

The present government recognizes that Canadians would like to see, by the year 2000, in eight short years from now, with the approval and the cooperation of the provinces, objectives for all of Canada. I can already hear the Bloc Quebecois members say that education is a provincial matter. We fully agree with that. However, I must tell you that in Quebec 30 per cent of students drop out of school. The rate is the same in Ontario. In western Canada, it is between 30 and 40 per cent. In Newfoundland it is a little bit higher but, over all, it stands at 30 per cent.

This means that whether the education is in French or in English, whether you live in the distinct society or elsewhere in Canada, there is a national problem that remains the same. Thirty per cent of students drop out of school. We must stop closing our eyes and pretending, like the members of the Bloc Quebecois do when they say that education is a local problem, a provincial issue. This is a provincial problem, yes, but it is also a competition problem and a national problem because we find the same problem in every Canadian province.

I would like also to tell Canadians that the efforts currently undertaken by the provinces to create a uniform system of educational educators is supported by the federal government. Even the Quebec government agrees with this objective.

At their last meeting in August 1991, the premiers asked the Council of Ministers of Education to pursue their efforts in that direction. This government commends and strongly support this initiative. It is also of the opinion that this body is the best qualified for this kind of national educational objectives. We fully understand that if we fall seriously behind on training in comparison with other countries—and those are our real competitors; they are not the anglophones and the francophones in Canada, but Canada, both the Canadians and the Quebecers, against the other industrialized nations—our manpower and our industry will be badly equipped to fight against our competitors in a world economy based on information.

Those are the reasons, that prompted the federal government to achieve this national consensus among the provinces whose collaboration we will be asking and whom we will be consulting before taking decisions.

On October 29, my hon. colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, sent out a discussion paper on learning entitled "Learning Well—Living Well". This paper is part and parcel of our national strategy which is to move toward life-long learning and toward developing national goals. The first one—there is no harm in that, but it is important that it be attained in Quebec as well as in the rest of Canada—is a 50 per cent reduction in the illiteracy rate and ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians get a high school diploma or the equivalent. What difference does it make, Mr. Speaker, if you require this from a Quebecer or an Ontarian? We can have that kind of national standards without encroaching upon provincial jurisdiction regarding education.

We also want to double, in Quebec as well as elsewhere—and I think it is a worthwhile goal that we could pursue—the number of post-secondary graduates in science. We want to increase fourfold the training provided by employers to their employees. Training could be given in French in Quebec and in English in the rest of the country, but it will all be co-ordinated nationally so that we can compete with the Americans, the Germans, the Japanese—

Mr. Della Noce: The Italians.

Mr. Pronovost: —all our competitors on the international scene, including the Italians.

As part of our latest prosperity initiative, we are consulting on the subject of education and training throughout the country, including in Quebec. All the stakeholders in the learning system are invited to discuss the national goals in this regard. This action plan will call upon all levels of government, the private sector, the workers, the teachers as well as all Canadians.

We are firmly committed to building a world-class labour force and we are on the right track, but this is no small task. A recent survey by the Hudson institute shows that 66 per cent of businesses expect problems in recruiting personnel with technical skills by 1996. Employment and Immigration Canada reported that 300,000 jobs were not filled in 1991 due to a shortage of skilled workers. This problem is as prevalent in Quebec as in the rest of Canada. It is nation-wide.

I will end, although I would have much more to say, by saying that I can assure all Quebecers and all Canadians that this government is looking into these problems very seriously. As a matter of fact, we are in the process of developing, in conjunction with the provinces, the communities and the major stakeholders, an action plan to enable every Canadian to meet the learning standards required to maintain and increase our standard of living in the years to come. Our economic survival as a nation depends on this initiative.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to thank my two colleagues for their comments on this bill. I support most of these arguments. What I will try to do now is add a few details and explain my point of view.

[English]

We are here to discuss the possibility of establishing a Canadian council on education that would be funded by governments and the private sector, that would provide independent research and policy advice on education for governments in the development and implementation of national goals and education.

[Translation]

This will not be easy if we really want to meet this objective. I happen to be in favour of respecting provincial jurisdiction over education. I have no problem with this, because it has always been my policy, even when I was deputy minister, and I maintain that view. But there is no law against co-operation, and I would even say it is absolutely essential. Take Europe, for instance. In Europe we have a large number of countries with different languages which realized they had to co-operate, they had to work together. Why? To strengthen their assets, to give their people a better education, to ensure that their training and upgrading programs and research and development projects are among the best in the world.

You may have guessed I support this particular trend.

[English]

I support it. It is in line with two of the policy papers I have developed with the help of some colleagues. It is also in agreement with some of the comments and some of the initiatives that my colleague, the member for Ottawa Centre, has undertaken.

• (1930)

Why do I support it? I have already mentioned that I think it is essential to co-operate and co-operation does not mean threatening anyone's autonomy. Quite to the contrary, I think it respects it.

There is a relationship between education and prosperity. If you look at the high standards of living in the world, you will find some important investments in education broadly defined: training, retraining, research and development, additional impetus, a focus on the sciences and technologies. So there is that relationship and we need to be aware of it. We may not like it, but it is real.

If we want to be leaders as opposed to followers, we really have no choice. We are living in a changing world. I am not always particularly enthralled with all of the changes, but they are there and I think it would be irresponsible to suggest otherwise. We talk about——globalization, but what does it mean? We talk about it a lot, but what does it mean to us? We have to study these issues. We have to understand what is involved. We all know that despite the tremendous progress made in certain countries, there is far too much poverty in the world, especially among young people.

We also know the environment is in serious trouble. We need more education and co-operation in this area as well. We know that when we look at the international scene people are still far too inclined to try and resolve their conflicts. How? By going to war, by using very powerful weapons that could destroy the planet, let alone the countries involved. We really have no choice. We have to decide one way or the other. We can say we do not need our neighbours, but in the end, we realize it is probably easier to co-operate with them. To co-operate does not mean I lose my autonomy, my sovereignty or my independence. In fact respect for autonomy and co-operation go hand in hand.

[English]

The project, as proposed, has raised a number of questions and a number of important questions which I would like to deal with. Before I do that, I want to stress that we often talk about education and economic development. I have no difficulties with that. I think that is very, very important. We talk about it in terms of increased competitiveness and more productivity, and that is important too. I applaud that, but let us also talk about it as the development of the human being, the realization of the potential that each and everyone has within us. It is more than making more for more money, although that is interesting. It is also about trying to develop that human being to his or her fullest potential. That is terribly important because those people who I suspect are the happiest in the world are those who have been fortunate enough to realize a great deal of that potential. They have in fact been able to utilize that to the welfare of their immediate community and sometimes the larger community.

Let us talk competitiveness, globalization, increased competitiveness and all of those other terms, I have no difficulty with that, but let us not forget the human dimension of education which makes me more of what I am as a result of education.

The question that this particular project raises is what is the role of the Canadian Council of Education Ministers. That is not quite the accurate term. I think the term is CMEC. If I were to think just for a few moments I would probably get it correct, but it is really an organization that permits all of the ministers of education to get together to talk about education and some co-ordination.

What would happen to this particular organization, the Council for the Ministers of Education Canada? What about research. This project has a lot of emphasis on research and I think that is great, but what about the research on education that is already going on in universities? How would that fit in. How would that dovetail with this particular kind of initiative?

When we talk about the private sector I think we have to define it a bit. It is composed of what exactly? Are we talking about the total private sector, larger elements of that private sector or are we talking about small business? We need some definition there.

We need, as well, to recognize that the moment we talk about private sector it gives a dollar connotation. It gives a bottom line message. That may sour it a bit. As I indicated just a few moments ago, it is all very well to talk about more education for more wealth. It is also very important to talk about more education to deal with some of our social problems and l'épanouissement de la personne.

If we look at our problems in Canada today, we have serious economic problems. There is no doubt about that. We are talking about large unemployment, social assistance, people who are being fed at food banks. We are talking of 1.5 million to 2 million people, poverty of roughly 5 million people. If we look at it, it is an economic problem but there are also serious social problems. We must never forget that.

[Translation]

When we talk about violence against children, women and the elderly, when we talk about poverty and people who do not have enough to eat or who are homeless, these are economic problems. Yes, they are, but there is a human dimension, a social dimension which is extremely important.

[English]

I would hope that if we were able to go forward with such a project that we would not just have projects that are focused upon the economics but also focused upon the human dimension and the social problems.

Let me just come to a conclusion very shortly because I think that my time is almost up. I have to raise the question: Where do we go from here? What happens now?

If we were to do a poll and ask Canadians: "Do we want this kind of initiative?", I suspect that most would say yes. There are a number of well placed powerful individuals who say: "Yes, but only so far". We have got to break through that kind of elitism. We have got to take that extra step forward.

I think the people of Canada, all regions, all provinces want it. I think the government needs to take a serious look at this proposal. It needs to refine it, if it wishes to do so. It needs to discuss it with the various stakeholders, that is the provinces, the territories, the private sector and the people of Canada. Then the government needs to go forward with something extremely concrete.

Again, I must say that I am delighted that this project has been brought forward. I have said it and I am going to say it again. Education in the broadest sense of the terms is really a cornerstone of the modern, progressive, dynamic society. If we can learn to work together and synergize that which we do, then we will all profit from it, from an economic as well as a social, human dimension perspective.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I want to say that I hope the government will give this motion serious consideration and perhaps have it brought before the House again.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the proposal made by the member for Windsor—St. Clair with respect to the establishment of a Canadian Council on Education.

We all know how important education is for the future of our country, for its development and above all for its prosperity. Our standard of living, current and future, depends on our capacity to develop educational resources which should be efficient, attractive and accessible as well. Providing services is not enough for in order to do so, we must also have a thorough knowledge of all facets of this complex issue which is education. In this ever-growing and more complex world the needs in this area are increasingly varied.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to turn a blind eye to that reality. That would practically amount to suicide for our society.

More than one hundred and twenty-five years ago, Charles Darwin, the naturalist, stated a fact that is still very real when he said that one has to adapt to be able to survive.

To be able to survive as a prosperous nation and as a nation whose standard of living is directly related to its competitiveness, Canada must adapt to new realities in the field of education. And those realities are as numerous as varied.

One of them, which is not the least, is that trades are increasingly specialized. In less than a century, our society went from a economy largely based on the primary sector to an economy especially based on industry, that is the processing of raw materials into finished products.

• (1940)

As we said in those times, you don't need a degree to become a farmer. Later on, since industrialization created needs, it became significantly more compelling to gain expertise in the various sectors associated with the production of goods. The incredible technologies that have developed over the last few decades have created a very different world. Today, it is obvious for everybody that in the 21st century we will have a service-based economy. There is a good reason why this is obvious for everybody—we already live in this futuristic world.

Mr. Speaker, this is a world of computers, aerospace and biotechnology. In short, it is a high technology world. That is precisely where education matters. Canada must have the capacity to train people for these jobs, to further knowledge in this area, and to understand clearly the social, economic, and cultural changes brought by high technology.

If we are to fulfill this ambition, our education systems must absolutely develop, they must progress more according to the new requirements that we now face. In that context, research on education would have all its meaning.

In that spirit, the federal government has tabled a paper entitled "Learning Well—Living Well", to initiate, on the national level, a discussion on Canadian objectives and priorities in learning and training, which will lead to a consensus. It is the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is responsible for holding this discussion with national organizations, communities and different sectors concerned with education and training. Learn Well— Live Well recognizes among other things that, in order to remain internationally competitive, Canada must enhance knowledge and have an environment where millions of Canadians will commit themselves to making education and training a lifetime endeavour.

Earlier, my colleague from Saint-Maurice corrected the record, and I would also like to do it so that my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois, on the other side, will be happy. It is true that education is a provincial matter, a good responsibility, which I think extends beyond the Quebec border or any provincial border, because everything that is related to the development of such a great country as Canada is also related to the federal government. I think that to better coordinate education, while giving rights to the provinces, and we are living a very typical moment in history, Canadian unity is important. But it is not why I say that; it is because I really believe that Canada must have a special interest in the education of all its citizens.

A while ago, my colleague was talking about certain countries, and about how Canada compares with Germany and France. I even noted that Italy had the same problems. They make good progress, so why satisfy ourselves. For myself, as an immigrant, as an Italian Canadian, education is much more important. One language is not enough for us, neither are the two official languages. We would like to have three or four languages. For us, three is a minimum. Why? Because for our people, education means respect. For instance, in Italy, when a teacher or even certain politicians walk down the street, people stop to greet them. That shows how important education is. Professors have the title of doctor, whatever their subject. It is like in French, when they say "maître" to a lawyer. Why? Because education is very important for our people and we do not see that only in one area of the country, but everywhere. It is also because the development of education is of vital importance for the future of our businesses. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, who is also Minister of International Trade, recognized this explicitly in Prosperity through Competitiveness which was made public, I think, at the same time as Learning Well—Living Well.

This opinion is in fact shared by most countries around the world. Everyone is now aware of the absolute necessity for the education system to adapt to the skilled labour requirements of the business sector in order to satisfy its needs efficiently.

The Governor General of Canada provided us with several disquieting facts in his throne speech last May. Three out of ten students drop out of high school before graduating; four out of ten adults cannot read or count well enough to perform everyday tasks; Canadian industry spends than half as much on training as American industry, a fifth as much as the Japanese and an eight as much as the Germans.

He confirmed that the time has come, without infringing on provincial jurisdiction in this field, as I explained earlier, to reach a national consensus on performance, goals partnerships and priorities for learning. We are well aware of the challenges this will create.

This government has for many years recognized that drop-outs, the high cost of employee training in industry and illiteracy pose very serious problems.

To conclude, one can only applaud the member for Windsor—Lake St.-Clair's initiative in creating a Canadian Education Council. Such an agency, jointly funded by government and the private sector, which would provide the government with independent advice on research and action programs, is of obvious interest.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for the time allotted to me. The federal government intends to make every effort to support this essential cause.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this motion and, above all, to say how surprised I am to see Conservative members from Quebec speak with such eagerness in favour of a motion that gives the federal government more power in the area of education.

If there is an area that, historically, Quebec politicians wanted unanimously to keep under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, it is education. We can go back to Duplessis, who did not want the federal government to give money to universities because it was outside its jurisdiction.

Let us not forget the great struggles lead by Lesage in the 1960's, by Bourassa, by Bertrand, by Lévesque, and again recently by Bourassa who condemned, by means of a unanimous resolution of the National Assembly, that is a resolution supported by both the Parti québécois and the Liberal Party, the federal government's intention to establish national standards for labour training as expressed in last May's Speech from the Throne.

Today, we see Conservative members from Quebec say yes to a motion presented by a member of a party in favor of centralization, say yes to a motion that would allow the federal government to take charge of an area that, historically, has been under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Quebec government. It is unbelievable. They seem unaware of what they are doing recently, those Tory MPs from Quebec. We saw them say yes to a motion, to a Speech from the Throne that talked about interfering in the area of labour training. We saw them applaud the Minister of Communications who wanted to interfere in the area of telecommunications, an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Again Quebec expressed its disagreement.

We saw the same thing in the debate we had today on the environmental bill, an area that Quebec wants to have under its jurisdiction.

• (1950)

Today the Quebec legislature unanimously condemned the federal government for trying to intervene with this environmental legislation, Bill C-13. What will it be tomorrow? Will we see Conservative members from Quebec voting against Quebec, as the Liberals did in 1982 when the Constitution was brought home? You will recall Quebecers call these 73 Liberal members noodles them. How would they call the Conservative members now. There is no doubt that they will be treated just like the Liberal members were treated then. When I watch them reach with their big hands into such sacred areas of jurisdiction as education, I think: Never have the Conservative members so openly said such stupid things.

I am deeply shocked, to see the support those two Quebec members just lent to such interfering in education. I recall all the motions which were unanimously passed by the Quebec legislature, whatever party was in office, and which said: No interfering in education, never in such a sacred area of jurisdiction. Manpower training is also a sacred area of jurisdiction, witness the fact that agreements have been reached in all the areas of manpower training so that Quebec can keep its powers.

Again I am flabbergasted to see these two members accept such a thing. Whether we are talking about manpower training or training in the primary and secondary industries, education is under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government and the federal government should never interfere in that field, as we have done in the past and as we are trying to do right now, as I mentioned earlier, in the areas of education, communication, and whatnot. Let us not forget that during previous and current constitutional discussions and during all the debates which took place, there has never been any questioning about the fact that education is a provincial responsibility.

But today, on a motion presented by a member of a party in favour of centralization, two Conservative members from Quebec rise to say that, from now on, education should be a federal responsibility. The federal government should take up sacred jurisdictions. The federal government should administer everything, and the provinces should become large city councils. They should not have any responsibility in areas such as communications and education, in all areas where Quebec performed so well.

I remind the hon. member for Laval-Est that when you talk about vocational training you have to remember that the needs are different. The needs in Quebec are not the same as the needs in the east where the economy is based on fishing, or in the west where it is based on agriculture, or in Ontario where it is industry, especially automotive industry. We have diversified. I remind the two conservative members who just spoke that during an employment forum held in Montreal, with the Conseil du Patronat, all the Quebec unions, opposition members, provincial liberal members, there was unanimity to demand exclusive jurisdiction in that field in the constitutional talks. Quebec should have sole jurisdiction over education, including vocational training. There was unanimity. When Mr. Bourassa was touring Quebec a year ago he was saying: "There is one priority, one area where we will never give up, and that is getting back sole jurisdiction over vocational training".

This is what people from Quebec expect from their members, that they rise, like I did today, and that they uphold the superior interests of Quebec, that they prevent the federal government from interfering in areas as sacred as education, and not—

[English]

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously is interested in protecting the interests of his province, even though he is not really interested in having it as part of Canada.

In his speech, he has made reference to Ontario and how we have a very narrow automotive industry as our only industry and that Quebec is so much more diversified than the rest of Canada. Since he is demanding members stand and rise, I would like to rise and point out to him that Ontario has a very diverse economy.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I again give the floor to the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Plamondon: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will add the time that the hon. member just took, since it was not a point of order but an opinion that he expressed. He talks about diversification. I admit that Ontario has diversified, and has diversified greatly throughout Canada's history. It does so by doing its own occupational training. It is an example for industry where a province has developed industries by using its own powers.

In Quebec today, occupational training is very diversified because no industry is larger than 10 per cent of Quebec's economy. This very diversity means that the needs are often very specific to a region and cannot tolerate interference from a central government in terms of national standards. I was about to say how much all Quebec governments recognized this. Every government of Quebec has recognized this point. The Premier of Quebec has been saying so for a year, his ministers too, his Cabinet, the opposition as well, the Conseil du patronat, all the unions say the same thing. Quebec's interests will be well defended in Ottawa if we take back all responsibility for occupational training. It is unacceptable for Conservative members from Quebec to prostitute themselves in the same way as Liberal members in 1982 to cut services that Quebec already controls.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With all due respect to my colleague and hon. friend, I would like to say first of all that I do not feel included in that category of traitors of which he spoke earlier. I invite him to read again the two speeches and also to say the truth. On top of that, I would like to remind him, concerning the environment bill he defended, the one before this one, that it was his chief, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On debate, the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but this is not a point of order. I will now recognize the hon. member for Ontario.

[English]

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on this very important occasion. What you have heard from the members today on this motion of the member—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Richelieu rises a point of order, but if he only wants to know whom I will recognize next, I will interrupt him immediately.

Mr. Plamondon: I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, how you decide which members will be recognized. Do you recognize those who rise first or do you have a list?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair tries to see to it that all points of view are expressed in the House. According to tradition, after having recognized a member on one side of the House, the Speaker looks on the other side of the House. That is what I do by recognizing the hon. member for Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity that you are providing.

To make sure the member understands, I did make a point of advising you that I was most anxious to speak on this motion on education. Education is extremely important, not just to the province of Quebec or to the province of Ontario. It is obviously very important to everyone in this country and it has been very important to this government as we have indicated in our past actions. It continues to be a very prime concern on actions that we are involved in.

I hope that nobody, not the members opposite nor the members on our side, can be happy that we have a 30 per cent drop-out rate from our high schools. No one pretends that our literacy and numeracy rates are adequate because they are certainly not.

No one pretends that the educational status quo will do in the face of increasing competition globally and our growing reliance on knowledge based industries and occupations. In fact there is an emerging consensus that we in this country must seriously reassess our current approach to education in Canada. We all appreciate that we must reconsider our education goals, our training programs and our teaching priorities.

However, it is also clear that the challenges that confront Canadians in education will only be resolved through a measured, co-ordinated and co-operative program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

[Translation]

It being 8 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

1991 PUBLIC REPORT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages and under Standing Order 32(2), copies of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service public report for the year 1991.

I would ask that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

NOMINATION AND REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table, in both official languages, a nomination recently made by the government and, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(2), it is deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ANNUAL STATEMENT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, a year ago the government announced that the Solicitor General would begin in 1992 to make an annual statement to Parliament on national security.

[Translation]

I am pleased to deliver the first such statement today.

[English]

In my remarks I want to address three dimensions of national security: first, the changing international environment; second, the security intelligence challenges that Canada faces in the current period of international transition; and, last, the government's firm commitment to safeguard fundamental liberties while assuring Canadians their security.

• (1010)

Canadians today are engaged in an important debate on our country's future. We have before us decisions on some of the most fundamental questions that people can ask themselves. We are privileged to have institutions such as this and traditions of public consultation which allow us to consider these questions in an informed and democratic way.

We are privileged in another respect as well.

[Translation]

For the first time in a generation, we can consider our future without also having to worry about the cold war.

[English]

We have entered a new era in the affairs of nations. The cold war is over. The iron curtain is gone. The Soviet Union has disintegrated. Countries of central and eastern Europe are finding their own paths. It is a time of hope and expectation. Canadians share these hopes and we have pledged to do everything that we can to bring them to fulfilment.

But we know from history that periods of international transition are also periods of potential danger. In recent months the long list of regional conflicts has grown longer, with the outbreak of fighting in Yugoslavia and in parts of the old Soviet empire. Dictators still impose their will in many parts of the world, practising terrorism against their enemies and scheming to acquire even more sophisticated weapons.

International competition for advanced technology, including weapons technology, continues unabated.

[Translation]

In brief, Canadians are right to judge the future to be more promising than the past.

[English]

While we hope for a brighter future, we have to take precautions against current and potential threats.

Our origins, our diverse population, and our national interest mean that we will continue to have important links with the world beyond our shores. In light of those changes that are taking place in the world, I have asked the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to prepare and submit to me an assessment of how the evolving security environment might affect the service's mandate over time.

The review will consider future security intelligence needs, examine how the service ought to be structured to meet those needs, and determine the resource implications of any measures that might be recommended.

I have instructed the director to be mindful of budget realities and the government's commitment to improving the efficiency of government operations. Canadians can be reassured that public safety will be the government's highest priority in the national security sector. We will continue to place a high priority on protecting democratic rights, freedoms and institutions; ensuring economic security; promoting international peace and security; and safeguarding those human intellectual and physical assets that the government manages in trust for the people of Canada. These priorities are long-standing.

[Translation]

The service's primary mandate is to investigate suspected threats to the security of Canada. These can take many forms, including espionage, terrorism and attempts by foreign governments to exert clandestine influence in Canada against Canadian interests.

[English]

The service also has a mandate to provide security assessments to departments and to provide security advice on applications for immigration and citizenship.

Last August an attempted coup in Moscow offered a pointed reminder of the fragility of democracy in Russia and eastern Europe and of the need to remain vigilant. Until the situation clarifies, we will be faced with many questions.

Will the former servants of Soviet imperialism be content to fade into obscurity? How will the new governments in the region use the offensive intelligence services that they have inherited? Will they restrict themselves to open sources, or will they engage in espionage? Will they target only neighbouring countries or more distant states such as Canada? Will governments that have inherited economies which have been devastated by decades of mismanagement use their intelligence sources to acquire other scientific and technical data?

In the meantime we know that governments elsewhere have continued to mount offensive intelligent collection efforts against us. High-tech industries, especially nuclear technology, appear to have been attractive targets. The proliferation of sophisticated weapons and delivery systems is a global concern. When the arsenals of dictators include chemical, bacteriological and perhaps even nuclear weapons, we cannot be complacent.

Clearly we will need a capacity to defend ourselves against foreign intelligence services as long as people are prepared to use deceit and deception to their advantage.

The political and economic discontent found in so many parts of the world has also had consequences for us which warrant close attention.

[Translation]

One such consequence has been terrorism.

[English]

Last year after a period of decline there was a resurgence of international terrorism, prompted in part by events in the Persian Gulf. Fortunately Canada has never been a target for terrorism the way some European states have been, but neither have we been immune.

[Translation]

Over the years, lives have been lost and injuries suffered. To deal with the problem, a national counter-terrorism plan is in place.

[English]

It is consistently being updated to take into account the events of the day. The plan co-ordinates the efforts of all relevant departments and agencies, both federal and provincial. Despite these precautions, our first line of defence remains accurate and timely information about the activities of political terrorists.

A further consequence of international unrest has been the movement of millions of people seeking a safe haven and a more prosperous future. Many of them have come to Canada. A few of those new arrivals have sought to pursue their ancestral disputes by violent means, ignoring our peaceful and democratic political traditions. Canadians can be assured that measures are now in place to uncover those applicants for whom violence is a political option.

Meeting the challenges of the new international environment will test our national security and its institutions as never before. With the passage of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act in 1984, the government created CSIS to provide the government with information on threats to Canada's security. In companion legislation, the Security Offences Act, Parliament affirmed that the RCMP would retain primary responsibility for security related law enforcement and the protection of persons and property. Functions assigned to CSIS and the RCMP are distinct but complementary, and the two agencies have coped well with institutional change since 1984. The effectiveness of these measures was never more evident than during the gulf war last year.

[Translation]

CSIS and the RCMP worked hard to ensure that Canadians were spared from terrorist attacks.

[English]

I want also to talk about what will not change, and that is our regard for the fundamental rights and freedoms while we are assuring national security. Canadians expect their security system to be effective. They also want to be assured that security will not be achieved at the expense of the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals.

Through the CSIS Act, Parliament ensured that both objectives would be met by the legislative and institutional arrangements it put in place. Parliament provided that CSIS could use its extraordinary powers of investigation only to the extent strictly necessary to perform its duties. The most intrusive powers could be used only after they have been approved by the Solicitor General and by the Federal Court of Canada.

Their use is also subject to review by the Inspector General of CSIS and by the Security Intelligence Review Committee. Control and accountability arrangements for CSIS include ministerial direction on a wide range of activities. These cover the services annual priorities, the operational methods, co-operative arrangements with domestic and foreign agencies and reporting requirements. Ministerial directions and approved operational policies are in place to ensure that investigations are pursued with due regard for the rights of individuals under investigation.

• (1020)

CSIS and the RCMP recognize and understand the central role of such measures in safeguarding fundamental rights and freedoms in Canadian society. This is because they share the essential values, principles and convictions of a nation united in respect for law, the rights of individuals and the collective well-being of all.

A few months ago the Prime Minister pointed out that there is no map to help chart the course of world peace in these changing times.

[Translation]

We have only our values, he said, and the hard-earned lessons of the past to go on.

[English]

I believe that Canada's national security system, so recently conceived and developed, reflects and embodies this nation's values and experiences in pursuit of the twin goals of security and liberty. I am confident that Canadians can continue to enjoy a degree of security and liberty that is and will remain the envy of the world.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada to respond to the statement made by the minister.

Before I begin my substantive remarks, I want to take a moment to thank the minister personally for his courtesy in providing a copy of the report and a copy of his proposed remarks well in advance of 10.10 a.m. today so that I would have an opportunity to review them.

This is something that is much appreciated by myself, and it is something that is of course difficult for the minister because he must expect that I am going to be criticizing the remarks that he made on the report. He is not going to be disappointed. However having said that, I do appreciate the courtesy extended by the minister.

The minister began his remarks by saying that in 1991 he announced that he would make an annual statement to Parliament on national security. Today is an historic day in Canadian history because this is the first statement of its kind ever delivered to the House of Commons.

We have to ask ourselves, is this just something that the minister thought up on his own or was there something more behind it? Of course there was something more behind it, and I think it is important that Canadians know exactly what it is that, if I may put it this way, prompted the minister to bring in his report.

A special committee was struck by the House of Commons on June 27, 1990 and its mandate was to undertake a comprehensive review of the provisions and operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act and report back to the House. It was a very comprehensive report entitled "In Flux but not in Crisis".

I want to pay specific tribute to the members of that committee, particularly the chairman, the hon. member for Lethbridge and two members from my party, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and the hon. member for Moncton. They worked very hard to come up with many, many recommendations. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, my colleague, is also at the present time the vice-chairman of the subcommittee on national security and takes a particular interest in these issues.

This document produced 117 recommendations. For all intents and purposes, only one of those 117 recommendations was accepted in whole by the Solicitor General. That was number 47 which reads: "The committee recommends that the Solicitor General require the director of CSIS to provide the minister with an additional annual report that can be tabled in Parliament".

In the ministry response to those recommendations, entitled "On Course", the minister had the following to say. It is on the basis of the minister's own words that I will be commenting on the statement today: "The government agrees with the special committee that the annual release of a report on security intelligence matters which could be tabled in Parliament could contribute significantly to informed public debate.

Therefore at the time of tabling the main estimates, the Solicitor General will provide Parliament, beginning in 1992, with an annual statement on the national security issues that face our country. This statement will discuss the major national security issues that were dealt with during the previous year and highlight directions for the year ahead. The minister's statement will be accompanied by a public annual report from the director which will include a discussion of the threat environment."

It is on that basis I propose to examine both the report and the minister's statement today.

After listening to the minister, my first reaction was to remember that commercial of a few years ago where the lady is looking into the camera and shouts, "Where is the beef?" That is exactly the problem. There are many generalities but no specifics. Where is the beef in this statement and indeed in the report?

The minister said we must take precautions against current and potential threats. What threats? What precautions? They are not mentioned. He reminds us that Canadians can be reassured that public safety will remain the government's highest priority. Is public safety threatened? If not, is public safety likely to be threatened in the foreseeable future? If so, why? No answers.

The minister refers to counter-espionage. He asked many questions concerning the intelligence service remnants of the fallen Soviet Union. But there are no answers.

He says without explanation that governments have continued to mount offensive intelligence collection efforts against us. But there is no further information. How does any of this contribute to informed public debate, which the minister told us his statements were going to do?

In referring to counter-terrorism he told us that there is a national counter-terrorism plan in place. Indeed that is reassuring. However, there is no mention whatsoever in his statement that the special emergency response team SERT, which is a branch of the RCMP and was specifically set up to deal with terrorist attacks, is being disbanded to be replaced by a group within the armed forces, no discussion that that has either occurred or is occurring smoothly and the armed forces are ready, willing and able to take over this responsibility. Is this contributing to informed public debate?

He refers to security screening. He says it is the job of CSIS to screen potential immigrants for violence and people who would ignore Canada's peaceful and democratic political traditions. There are no details of how this is being done. I might add there is no discussion how Mr. Al-Mashat, an ambassador of an enemy state, got past this screening.

Referring to the CSIS act itself, he reminds us that CSIS was created to provide government with information on threats to Canadian security. Has CSIS fulfilled its mandate? The minister does not say. Is this contributing to informed public debate?

He refers to human rights and the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals. Thankfully the minister reassures Canadians that these are being respected by CSIS.

We have to look at the following question. Does the minister's statement today fulfil his own promise as I read it a few moments ago? In my view and in the view of the Liberal Party, the answer must be a profound triple no.

First of all, does it contribute to informed public debate because there is little or no information provided, only many generalities and platitudes. Does it discuss the major national security issues dealt with in the previous year as promised by the minister in writing? Absolutely not.

There is no mention even in the broadest terms of actions taken to protect Canadians prior to, during, and after the Persian Gulf War. There is no mention, even though security clearance of immigrants is a part of the mandate, of the Al-Mashat affair and the CSIS role or lack of role in it. There is no mention of the allegations that certain foreign intelligence services are operating clandestinely in Canada and what, if anything, CSIS did or is doing about it. The CSIS report itself contains no specific discussion of the "threat environment" in Canada as the minister promised that it would.

In conclusion, the Liberal Party recognizes that this is the first report of its kind in Canadian history and I have already applauded the mechanism by which this became the fact.

We also acknowledge the truism that a baby must crawl before it can walk. We call upon CSIS and the minister to ensure now that they can crawl, future annual statements and reports contain more information, as promised by the minister himself, so that Canadians can have an informed public debate, be aware of the national security issues which face our nation, consider the major national security issues which face our country from year to year and how we are to handle them.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I stand with mixed feelings this morning because the minister has just presented a statement to the House based on a report by a special committee of this House that had 117 recommendations, and as my friend has just said, this is the only recommendation in its entirety that has been really accepted.

Having listened to what the minister had to say this morning, I doubt very much whether our time was well spent, to say nothing of the minister's time, because there is virtually nothing in this statement that will enlighten or inform either Parliament or the Canadian public.

First of all, I want to refer to the preface of a document published about a year ago, February 1991 entitled On Course, National Security for the 1990s and signed by his predecessor the Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux.

Toward the end of the preface of the introduction the former Solicitor General says: "But confidence in the system, that is the security system, can be improved by providing Parliament with more information on security issues".

All I can say this morning is that this statement by this minister is a profound disappointment. There is virtually nothing in here that will inform Parliament or the Canadian public on matters referring to intelligence and security.

I say that knowing full well there are certain matters in the intelligence and security system that cannot be divulged either to Parliament publicly or to the general public as a whole. Quite frankly most experts, most good books on the subject, will argue very forcefully that upwards of 80 per cent, to 90 per cent of the information that security and intelligence services have world-wide in democracies could be released to their legislatures, and through their legislatures to the public, without any diminution whatever in maintaining the security of those democratic countries.

I offer that to the minister. I hope that in his next report in a year's time if we are still sitting here—and I said if we are still sitting here—that he will come forward with a document that has more substance to it, that will clearly inform not only this side of the House but his own members on matters of national security. Having said that, I want to get to the substance of my remarks which will be brief.

We in the New Democratic Party welcome this first of 117 recommendations made to the government by an all-party committee some two years ago.

As my hon. friend across has said in his ministerial statement on national security, the world has indeed changed in the last 24 months. But complacency still remains one of our worst enemies in the face of the very real threats of terrorism and industrial espionage.

This statement on national security and all others that will follow in the years to come must remain part of the process of government accountability as well as publicity.

A year ago the parliamentary Sub-committee on National Security was created and the first problem it confronted was disclosure, tight-lipped government officials hiding behind the argument of national security in order to dodge questions of accountability.

There is a way to keep our country safe, while at the same time preserving the fundamental principles of openness in a democracy. It has been done elsewhere and it can be done here.

This document is more interesting by what it omits than by what it contains. This government has the duty and obligation to disclose to the committee all arrangements made between CSIS and foreign countries.

What memoranda of understanding does CSIS have with its American counterpart, the FBI, or the National Security Agency through CSCE, or the CIA for that matter, or any other foreign intelligence agencies, namely Mossad, if there are in fact any memoranda of agreement or understanding with those agencies.

Does the government not know that foreign intelligence services are operating in Canada? The Victor Ostrovsky/Mossad affair is a case in point. Israeli intelligence officers entered Canada and intimidated a Canadian citizen, chased him around this city, followed him to Toronto and harassed him. Despite a dozen appeals by this citizen, CSIS took no direct action to protect this individual, or at least we do not know whether CSIS did or not. Only a municipal police force showed any willingness to assist him. All the government did was to slap an Israeli diplomat's wrist over the whole affair. This government must answer for this particular negligence.

We must also demand accountability on how the CSIS Act has affected us at home. Does CSIS share information about Canadians with Employment and Immigration, External Affairs or National Health and Welfare, to name only some departments?

Canadians know barely anything of the Canadian intelligence system through no fault of their own. What about the most secretive of all agencies, the Communications Security Establishment? There is not a single law that regulates it. What does it do, what powers does it have, whom does it serve, what method does it use to gather information, what is its budget, who makes sure that it operates legally? In other words, why is it there? On whom is it spying? Is it spying on Canadians indirectly through NSA to avoid Canadian law? And is the NSA spying on Americans through CSE to avoid American law? We do not know this. And yet we are a democracy. Again, it is part of a government that is too closed and too secretive.

The gulf war proved to us that law-abiding citizens in this country can still be intimidated by the force of government. A knock on the door late in the evening by CSIS officers, two hours of questioning, no rights explained, no one to turn to for help.

Allegations have been made that the Israeli intelligence service used the confusion and hysteria over the war to interrogate Canadians while posing as CSIS officers. The government has failed to reassure Canadians that this did not happen, nor that it can prevent it from happening again.

I include this allegation because that is precisely what Mossad did in Norway. In Norway the head of its security and intelligence system was fired as a result of it.

The Supreme Court of Canada recently demonstrated how senior bureaucrats and secret agencies still have total control over the security assessment of ordinary Canadians. CSIS looked into some 65,000 such requests last year alone.

According to the law, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, the public watch-dog and the only public watch-dog we have of CSIS, has no powers to overturn negative security clearance decisions for federal employees. How many honest Canadians did CSIS turn down? How many then realized there was no appeal process to turn to? What about their future job prospects?

The SIRC has done a good job on balance over its history, but it is pretty toothless. It is far too restricted by statute. Parliament recommended two years ago that this be changed. The government replied that there was no need to be alarmed, and nothing has been done about it.

I can recall the meetings we have had with SIRC members, putting questions to them. They make every effort they can to inform the committee, at least that is my impression. Yet we know that they are circumscribed, they are restricted, they are prevented from giving us the information we want as a subcommittee of this House and an elected body. The time has come, Mr. Speaker, and I say this through you to the minister, to put an end to this, to take the Sub-Committee on National Security into the government's confidence. I can assure you that we will act in a responsible way.

• (1040)

The CSIS Act still needs to be amended. SIRC must be given more weight and influence in the appeals cases. It must be able to investigate the operations not only of CSIS, but of all government intelligence branches, from external affairs to defence, immigration and also CSE.

The Sub-Committee on National Security must be briefed on all arrangements made between CSIS, the RCMP, CSE and all countries with which we deal in the intelligence world. I am not asking for all of the minute details, but in general, what are those agreements and why? What are the purposes?

Above all, the public must know that someone somewhere is working to protect them from the secret intelligence machinery of government, any government, in this country.

Two years ago, we made 117 recommendations to change our policies and laws in the field of national security. So far, the government has implemented about one and one-half, perhaps two at the most.

The system is far from perfect. The government's attitude towards the whole issue needs to change now. It is its responsibility to listen to criticism, to implement recommendations and to account for its decisions. Otherwise, there will be no rights and privileges for CSIS to protect.

In conclusion, I am not satisfied with pious platitudes. This document could have been released a week ago and nobody would have ever dreamed of leaking it. There was nothing in there to leak. It is a profound disappointment, as I said at the outset.

I know the minister is acting on instructions from his senior bureaucrats in the security and intelligence field and that is a two-edged sword. I know that ministers have to take the best advice they can get, but I would hope that ministers would also exercise their independent judgment as well.

I also hope that this government will break out of this secrecy and inform the parliamentary Sub-Committee on National Security of a great many more facts relating to the activities of CSIS. In that way, we would then truly have the best arrangement in the free and democratic world.

Routine Proceedings

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petition has been certified to be in its proper form and it has been signed by numerous Ontario residents of Kingston, Odessa, Newburgh and other communities in the vicinity.

The petitioners are concerned about violence in our society and they call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent and they call upon this House to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act in order to minimize violence.

LABELLING OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTAINERS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present petitions that have been signed by 6,983 persons in British Columbia.

These petitioners ask the government to acknowledge that alcohol is a drug and that many people are unaware of the health risks posed by alcohol because it is so widely accepted in our society. This is especially true of pregnant women, many of whom do not even know that drinking may lead to birth defects. Alcohol consumption has also been linked to impairment of a person's ability to operate machinery or automobiles, to hypertension, liver disease, cancer and other addictions.

Warning labels on alcohol have already been put in place in other jurisdictions, including the Yukon and the United States. In fact, alcohol produced in Canada for export to the United States must be so labelled.

These petitioners ask that Parliament consider requiring labels on all alcoholic beverages to warn consumers, including pregnant women, of the health risks involved in the consumption of alcohol.

I would also like to pay tribute to the woman in B.C. who organized the petitions, my constituent, Joy Gilmore, who has worked very, very hard. I know that all members of Parliament in this House have heard from her on this issue.

TAXATION OF LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE CALLS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present this petition signed almost exclusively by residents of Burns Lake, B.C. in my riding. Really it is a petition on behalf of all northerners in British Columbia.

The petition expresses concern on the additional cost by the taxation on long distance calls. People living in rural and northern communities are much more dependent on long distance telephone calls for services like health and information.

These petitioners call on Parliament to ensure that we have a fair tax system for northerners.

JAMES BAY II PROJECT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present to the House, certified pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians who are concerned about Hydro Quebec's plans to proceed with the project known as James Bay II.

They are concerned that the project has not been subjected to a full federal environmental assessment review process and that the health, livelihood and culture of the Cree people of northern Quebec would be adversely affected if the project was allowed to proceed as proposed.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to conduct a thorough and full environmental review of all portions of the James Bay II project that fall under federal jurisdiction.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 103, 210 and 222.

[Text]

Question No. 103—Mr. Holtmann:

1. With respect to the Canadian consulate in Kiev, USSR (a) what is the status of credentials of the Consul-General (b) how many officers are there and what are their specific duties (c) what is the citizenship of each staff member (d) what is the operating budget for the Consulate?

2. How do the staffing positions in Kiev compare to (a) other Canadian consulates (b) German, French and U.S. consulates in Kiev?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The former Consulate General in Kiev was raised to the status of an embassy on January 27, 1992. It is accredited to Ukraine. There are currently three Canada-based officers at the embassy: a chargé d'affaires, responsible for managing the embassy and for the political and trade programmes; an immigration officer, responsible for the visitor programme; and an administrative officer. The 15 locally-engaged staff members are Ukrainian citizens. The estimated operating budget for the embassy in the 1991-92 fiscal year is $220,000, not including salaries of Canada-based staff.

2. The staffing level of the Consulate General was comparable with that of consulates in major European cities such as Munich, Dusseldorf, or Milan. It is now being expanded in connection with upgrading to embassy status. Plans call for 11 Canada-based staff members to be deployed in Kiev. The timing of their arrival will depend on the progress of chancery renovations and availability of housing. Locally-engaged staff will also be augmented. The staffing levels of the USA and French missions, previously two officers each are also being expanded. The German mission last year had a staff of 15.

Question No. 210—Ms. Phinney:

How many disabled persons are employed by the government?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): As of December 31, 1991, there were 6,480 self-identified persons with disabilities employed in active status under the Public Service Employment Act. Persons with disabilities are represented in all occupational categories: 91 per cent are indeterminate; slightly above 3 per cent work part-time, less than the Public Service-wide average of 3.5 per cent. Persons with disabilities represented 3 per cent of the Public Service in 1991 compared to 2.6 per cent in 1987.

Question No. 222—Ms. Callbeck:

What are the guidelines or terms of reference used by Canada Post Corporation when deciding upon the closure of post offices?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Canada Post is constantly reviewing its network of postal outlets to ensure that they best meet the needs of our customers.

In rural communities, the review of postal services in a community begins following a natural opportunity, which is defined as:

A vacancy in the postmaster's position, such as resignation, retirement, promotion, transfer, etc.;

The unsuitability or unavailability of the premises housing the post office; or

At the request of the community.

The purpose of the review is to determine the best way to continue to provide postal service to the community. This review could result in:

The re-staffing of the postmaster's position;

Conversion to a retail postal outlet;

Amalgation of retail postal services to a nearby community; or

The opening of a retail postal outlet in the community and re-staffing of the corporate outlet.

In every case, however, local mail delivery and the community's postal identity are maintained.

Factors that influence the decision include:

The size of the community;

The demographic trends of the community and area;

The current method and level of service;

The distance to the nearest community;

The revenues earned and the costs incurred at present;

The business base of the community;

The facility currently housing the post office; and

The need for the outlet in Canada Post's mail processing and delivery network.

In urban communities, changes are made with service to our customers as the first priority.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Skeena, on a point of order.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the parliamentary secretary tabled question No. 217 in my name from February 3, 1992, which was a question on the Order Paper regarding Revenue Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans paid informant program.

Regrettably part of the answer is inaccurate and false. It states:

> Fisheries and Oceans does not have an on going paid informant program.

In fact, on February 13, 1992, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans wrote to me laying out the paid informant program that has been operated by his department since 1984, the amount that has been paid out per year, the number of payments that have been made and the results of the information obtained from those informants.

I would ask that the parliamentary secretary give an undertaking to the House that the inaccurate and false information contained in the return be remedied, either through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans or through the tabling of a further and accurate response to a question placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I will have to verify the information that the hon. member has put before the House. We will certainly do our best to make certain he does get an accurate and honest answer to his question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATERS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Siddon that Bill C-51, an Act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, be read the second time and referred to legislative committee B.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended today by 33 minutes, beginning at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 32(2)(a).

[English]

The hon. member for Skeena, I was wrong last night. You have five minutes left in the debate.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall last evening I had the remarkable opportunity to enter into the debate on Bill C-51, legislation to amend the water act in terms of the Northwest Territories. It was a peculiar circumstance because the government introduced the legislation and then did not put up any speakers. In fact, for awhile they all vanished. It was truly an unusual state of affairs.

Certainly the residents, the Canadians who live north of 60 in the Northwest Territories are very interested in this piece of legislation. It is a piece of legislation that delegates the authority presently held by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, a piece of legislation that is administered by the bureaucracy here in Ottawa. As you would know, Mr. Speaker, even if one lived in a large community such as Yellowknife, having to wait for licensing and permits to come all the way from Ottawa to deal with water issues in the Northwest Territories is a pretty ridiculous state of affairs. Certainly with the major advances that there have been in terms of the structure of democratically, locally controlled and elected government in the Northwest Territories now led by the hon. Nellie Cournoyea, it is an entirely appropriate time for this kind of delegation of authority.

As I warned last night, the governments of the Northwest Territories, and consequentially with Bill C–52 the Government of the Yukon, should be very alert to obtaining the necessary federal funds to continue to conduct the kinds of nationally significant programs that there need to be in relation to water. As I pointed out, there are major water systems flowing from the provinces into the Yukon and, in this case, into the Northwest Territories. River systems that have been dammed, diverted, contaminated, polluted, sedimented and so on in other jurisdictions come into the Northwest Territories and are going to have an impact on their capacity to administer this legislation.

It is a similar situation with the growing understanding of the movement of airborne toxins through aerosols. In many jurisdictions in Europe, in what was formerly the Soviet Union, and in continental North America, through the process in some situations of incineration, the placement of materials that historically would have gone to a landfill site or to some kind of recycling process are in many cases now being run through an incineration process. They go into the atmosphere. They are moving up through the atmosphere and back down into the water systems of the Northwest Territories.

As I said last night, we are suddenly starting to realize the magnitude of the toxification and the pollution problems affecting the Northwest Territories which is, as we all know, the largest single jurisdiction in Canada and soon perhaps to become two provinces along with the Yukon. So there would be three provinces north of 60 ultimately dealing with these major and significant water issues.

I just flag this for the government members of the Northwest Territories, that members of this House generally agree the delegation as proposed in Bills C–51 and C–52 is a good idea is long overdue and this matter should go to a legislative committee for constructive evaluation to hear witnesses from the Northwest Territories.

Members should be very careful in evaluating the amount of expenditure going on presently at the federal level to deal with this particular jurisdiction and the kinds of international and national responses that are going to be needed to be to evaluate not only the waters that are flowing from other jurisdictions into the Northwest Territories and the impact that will have on their licensing and utilization regimes, but also on the fish, birds and wildlife, the impacts that any modifications to these water systems will have, the implications of international phenomenons such as airborne toxins, not the least of which continues to be airborne acidification, SOx and NOx that come down as acid precipitation and the bio–accumulation and bio–magnification of these toxins up into the life cycles that come to affect particularly the more rural aboriginal and First Nation communities in the Northwest Territories.

There will be a need for a cumulative impact study of the effect, not just of methane releases from large dam reservoir projects, but the importance of the impact evaluation of the reduction at certain times of year of flows of fresh water from the Northwest Territories and from the bounding jurisdictions of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec on the whole watershed of Hudson Bay and James Bay. Already there is growing scientific evidence that the reduction of freshwater flow into Hudson Bay and James Bay is having a potentially negative and deleterious effect on the Quebec fishery, the Newfoundland fishery and the maritime fisheries.

This is a great opportunity for a small, growing government and administration in the Northwest Territories to take on a jurisdictional task that is truly theirs. They must assure themselves that they acquire the appropriate fiscal instrument from the Parliament of Canada to properly do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind hon. members that the length of speeches is now 20 minutes maximum, with a question and comment period.

[Translation]

I may remind hon. members of the Standing Orders. Since the minister presented the motion, even if he did not speak, according to the Standing Orders his speaking time is deemed to have expired. Consequently, the Chair must then recognize a spokesperson for one of the three parties. That is why I am recognizing a spokesperson for the opposition. Subsequently, I will recognize a government member but I repeat, this is a technicality. The government side had a chance to speak yesterday when presenting the bill but did not take advantage of this opportunity. I will now conclude the first round by recognizing a member for the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would hate to allow this to be a precedent. I realize the argument could be made that the government by moving the motion has thereby been deemed to have spoken.

The rule is quite clear. I believe it is Standing Order 76 which states that the first two speakers are to be allowed 40 minutes each. I am not suggesting that the hon. member for Labrador is going to go on for anything more than possibly 10 minutes. He is a very concise and erudite speaker and he will not need 40 minutes to express his views on this bill.

On some future bill that is perhaps more contentious, I think there is an argument to be made that 40 minutes is an appropriate length of time.

I would like to reserve the point to argue this at another time. I do not think it is appropriate today because I do not want to make a mountain out of a molehill but I am concerned that the right to speak for 40 minutes is an important one. The rule is quite clear, I suggest, for the first two speakers.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair was of course careful to check this technical aspect. The first speaker was for the government and is deemed to have spoken, even if he did not actually do so. The government presented a motion to table this bill. So that was the first speaker, and his 40 minutes speaking time has expired, although technically, the 40 minutes were really only 15 seconds.

In any case, I can reconsider and check again with the staff of the House regarding the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who is an expert on the Standing Orders of the House. However, this is the information I have so far. Consequently, I am prepared to recognize, for not more than 20 minutes, the hon. member for Labrador, even if it means checking again.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. As the member for Skeena just pointed out it was a rather unusual procedure that happened last night as a result of rushing into this bill and it created a few problems for the House.

Speaking on behalf of our caucus, we would certainly be willing to give unanimous consent to allow the member 40 minutes if he needs that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am the servant of the House. Is there unanimous consent to give 40 minutes to the next speaker? I have no objection.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I assure you and my colleagues that I will be able to confine myself to 20 minutes.

I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak in this second reading debate on Bill C-51, the Northwest Territories Waters Act and Bill C-52, the Yukon Waters Act.

I am pleased to indicate on behalf of my party our support in principle for these bills. These bills replace the Northern Inland Waters Act which was passed by this House in 1970 and came into force in 1972. They modernize and update the water management regimes in northern Canada.

• (1100)

The Northern Inland Waters Act was developed to protect and conserve the water resources of Yukon and the Northwest Territories. At the time the bill was introduced it seemed as if the north would be undergoing some major resource development. The bill's objective was to prevent environmental damage from development.

I will quote from the second reading speech of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at that time, whom I am sure the House will recognize. He said:

> Major industrial development is about to get under way north of 60. By acting now, this region can be spared the disasters of environmental mismanagement that now plague other parts of Canada.
> By acting with determination and decisiveness today, we may ensure that 20 or 30 years from now we will not be faced with settling another tremendous debt as the price of indifference and mismanagement of the water resources of the north.

That minister is now the Leader of the Official Opposition.

The Northern Inland Waters Act aimed to achieve a comprehensive and co-ordinated water management regime in the northern territories. It vested the property and the right to the use of surface and ground waters in the Crown. It provided that the right to the use of waters or the right to deposit waste would be granted through the issuance of a licence or through regulations pursuant to the act.

It established quasi-judicial water boards, one in Yukon and one in the Northwest Territories, to issue the licences with the approval of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Until now there have been no changes to the act except for some amendments in 1978 when the Northern Pipeline Act was passed. Despite the worth-while goals of the legislation, problems have been experienced in practice. Shortly after the act was proclaimed the water boards were overwhelmed with applications they could not handle. Consequently the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs used a provision of the act permitting the authorization of specified minor water uses by regulation.

Authority was provided through the regulations for a controller of water rights in each territory to approve all minor water uses which met the specified non-licensing criteria. The result was that over 90 per cent of water applications were approved by the controllers.

In 1981 the Dene nation and the Métis Association of the Northwest Territories filed a claim with the Federal Court. They challenged the legality of the department's non-licensing practice because of the lack of public input. The Federal Court ruled in 1984 that the practice was ultra vires the act.

The department then amended the regulations to exempt certain water users from any approval process. This situation was equally unsatisfactory. The 1985 report of the federal water policy inquiry recommended several changes to the current system. The report said that the arrangement for authorizing minor water uses in Yukon and Northwest Territories should be revised and clarified in consultation with the territorial water boards and other interested parties.

New procedures needed to be established to ensure that all uses of water would be authorized in some way. The complexity of the procedure for processing applications for minor water uses would be commensurate with their importance. Those water uses that may be exempted from the full licensing procedure would be clearly identified in regulations. The water boards would have the power to require a full licensing procedure when they believed it was appropriate. Finally procedures for approving minor as well as major uses would be open to the public and responsive to its concerns.

In 1986 water management concerns in Yukon led to the establishment by the department of a task force on placer mining. Its final report also made recommendations to amend the Northern Inland Waters Act. It recommended that the Northern Inland Waters Act be separated to create two separate acts, one for Yukon and one for the Northwest Territories, and that the regulations also be separated for each territory. It also recommended the establishment of a two-licence concept, class A and class B licences. As well it recommended stop work orders in situations where non-compliance licence conditions pose serious and imminent dangers.

A consultation process was initiated by the department in response to the growing number of calls for changes to the act. The department produced a discussion paper in May 1987. In October 1990 the Yukon Mining Advisory Committee was established. Its report to the minister was submitted in April 1991. All its recommendations except one have apparently been included in the proposed legislation before us which was tabled in the House last December.

It is important and relevant at this time to point out that the Auditor General's 1990 report was extremely critical of the management of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and particularly its water management. The Auditor General noted, for example, that although the department does have some information on water quantity, it has very little information on water quality.

The Auditor General also indicated that the department does not carry out water licence inspection and enforcement vigorously and that several significant water contaminations persist in the north. The Auditor General found that:

(1) The department had not documented water resource management objectives in terms of conservation and development priorities for water management.

(2) The department needs more data to manage water resources.

(3) Knowledge regarding airborne pollution is insufficient.

(4) The department needs to know if water boards are meeting their statutory objectives.

(5) Enforcement responsibilities are not adequately fulfilled.

(6) The department needs to more thoroughly screen projects for potential damage to the environment.

(7) The department has not adequately responded to the recommendations arising from the 1981 Mackenzie River basin study.

The bills we have before us today are meant to address at least some of the concerns expressed by the Auditor General in his 1990 report. We will be examining very closely how these bills respond to the Auditor General's concerns.

On this side of the House we want to acknowledge the consultation process that is being carried out with respect to these bills. Several years of discussion have taken place and the result is an improvement over the existing system.

That is not to say that everyone is totally happy with these bills. While there is a general support in principle, there are some concerns of which we have been made aware that we hope will get further review and discussion in the committee process. These bills essentially split the existing Northern Inland Waters Act into two acts: the Northwest Territories Waters Act and the Yukon Waters Act. I will briefly enumerate some of the bill's provisions. A two-tiered licensing system is established. Minor and major water uses will be dealt with differently. The purpose is to create a more expedient licensing system for minor and non-controversial water use licences.

The criteria to be used in determining whether an application constitutes a major or minor water use application will be set out in regulations. Mandatory public hearings for minor licences are waived, but water boards will have the power to require one if the public interest so warrants.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will have the ability to issue binding policy directions to the water boards. Water boards will have to issue reasons for decision. Domestic and instream water users are recognized in these bills. Water licences will be able to address closures and abandonments of works. Licence conditions will be able to include legally enforceable site specific effluent quality requirements. Compensation and security provisions are sanctioned.

These and other provisions we want to study carefully in committee. The issue of northern water resource management is important and complex.

About 30 per cent of Canada's fresh water is located in the north. A variety of federal departments has water responsibilities in the north including the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and Environment Canada, but the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs has the legislative responsibility for co-ordinating all government activities in the north. The territorial governments also have major responsibilities and aboriginal people in the territories have significant rights and interests in these waters.

• (1110)

Water is a part of proposed land claims agreements both in Yukon and in the Northwest Territories. I note in this regard that the minister has said that future comprehensive claims settlement legislation may set out aboriginal rights and management roles concerning water resources. Where there is any inconsistency between the acts before us today and future claim settlement legislation, the claim settlement legislation is to prevail.

In conclusion, we look forward to discussing these issues further in committee. We want to ensure the legislation reflects the concerns and interests of the residents of the territories and enhances their ability to have more control over the use of water in their regions.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address the House on Bill C-51 and Bill C-52 which are two pieces of legislation that amend the Northern Inland Waters Act.

I listened with care last night to the words of my hon. friend from Skeena, and I must say that it was a lesson for all of us as to how one can synthesize a career full of knowledge on related subjects and somehow annex them to another project before us. I was somewhat amazed and somewhat impressed.

I listened with care to the comments of my hon. friend from Labrador who has shown, as always, careful application of his intellect and his wit to any given subject. I congratulate him on his speech.

The north is known for its resources and no resource is more important than water. In 1970 Parliament acknowledged the value of the water resource by passing the Northern Inland Waters Act. This legislation authorizes the Crown to regulate the planning and use of water resources in Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Parliament at that time created the Northwest Territories and Yukon Water Boards which issue water use licences with the approval of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Two decades have passed since the Northern Inland Waters Act came into force. Circumstances have changed but the legislation has not. The original act met the needs of the time, but a number of weaknesses and inconsistencies have been identified in recent years. It is therefore incumbent upon the House and a commitment of the government to bring the legislation into the 1990s.

Toward that end the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development introduced two separate bills that will replace and update the Northern Inland Waters Act. Bill C-52, the Yukon Waters Act, repeals the existing legislation and replaces it with a system of water resources management that reflects the realities and needs of today. Bill C-51, the Northwest Territories Waters Act, establishes the same arrangements in the Northwest Territories.

There are a number of practical reasons for splitting the current legislation into two separate bills. First, this step acknowledges that the Northwest Territories and Yukon are two separate and distinct territories. It recognizes that each territory has its own particular water issues and geographic characteristics as well as different needs, priorities and economies.

Splitting the act will allow water management systems to evolve differently in each territory. In the longer term it will also facilitate the eventual devolution of responsibility for water management to the territorial governments, should this be desired.

Having said that, I want to make it clear that the two bills before the House today are based on the existing Northern Inland Waters Act and in fact maintain many of the same provisions. They both contain essentially the same amendments, and I will be addressing them as a single entity. The only significant difference between the two bills is that the Yukon Act repeals the existing legislation. This step is necessary in order for the new legislation to be enacted.

A number of problems have been identified regarding the Northern Inland Waters Act. Concerns about the legal certainty of the licensing process, the accountability of the minister and the rights of domestic and traditional users have been expressed by many stakeholders.

Our objective with the new acts is to correct these inadequacies. We are not establishing a completely new system for water management north of 60, rather we are building on existing structures and processes in order to strengthen and clarify the system. The amendments we are proposing will help streamline water use licensing, which in turn will contribute to economic development and job creation in the north. The amendments will also respect the overriding need to protect the environment, human life and health.

It is important to recognize that these proposals are generally supported by all interested groups in the north, including environmentalists, aboriginal people, the territorial governments and industry. In fact, the legislation before us today is the product of lengthy and exhaustive consultations with the many groups concerned with northern water management.

In particular, I would like to draw members' attention to the role played by the Yukon Mining Advisory Committee to which my friend from Labrador has already referred. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development established this committee in October 1990 to review the proposed changes to the Northern Inland Waters Act as well as changes to the lands legislation affecting mining. The detailed examination it performed is a fine example of the government's commitment to consult on important issues such as this. On behalf of the minister, I am pleased to say that the committee has done an excellent and thorough job. It conducted an extensive review of the proposed changes and provided important feedback that has enabled us to improve and strengthen the legislation.

The advisory committee has representation from all major stakeholders in the Yukon, including non-mining groups. Despite its name, the committee's representation includes aboriginal people, the territorial government, environmentalists, the mining industry and of course the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I congratulate Mr. W. A. Dunbar, the chair of the committee and all those who participated in the committee's work.

Bills C-51 and C-52 strike an excellent balance between addressing the needs of industry, aboriginal groups and the federal and territorial governments. The balance comes about as a result of consultations with the Yukon Mining Advisory Committee and other concerned parties in the Northwest Territories. The results of this process are an excellent example of what can be achieved through consultation.

We are proposing a number of changes that will modernize and expand legislative controls for managing freshwater resources in the territories. These amendments have three principal objectives: first, to streamline the licensing process; second, to provide greater protection to all persons who may be adversely affected by a water use; and third, to ensure that licence holders comply with terms and conditions through strengthened enforcement measures.

To streamline the water licensing process, we propose establishing a two-tiered licensing system for major and minor water users. For major users the existing water board licensing system will remain in place, including the requirement for public hearings and licence approval by the minister. As well, public hearings which are currently mandatory will be waived when the amendments do not affect the use, flow or quality of waters or the term of the licence.

However, a new speedier process will be established for licensing minor non-controversial uses of water. The territorial water boards will have the authority to issue minor licences without the approval of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Public hearings will not generally be required but the water boards will have the authority to hold hearings if this would be in the public interest.

The water boards will advertise all applications for licences. As well, the amendments will require the water boards to give reasons for their decisions to grant or reject a proposed new water use. If a licensee will be significantly affected by the new water use, the water boards will not be able to issue the second licence unless both parties agree.

The streamlined mechanisms seek to address the regulatory and administrative burden on minor licence applicants. In so doing, we are simplifying the assessment process while ensuring the opportunity for full review when necessary.

The new legislation will also give the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development explicit authority to issue policy directions to the water boards. This amendment is not intended to give the minister new authority or to limit the independence of the boards. Rather, it will simply clarify the minister's existing accountability which is vague in the current legislation.

The new bills will also give the minister the authority to delegate his responsibilities in relation to the water boards to the appropriate territorial minister. Although there are currently no plans to do so, this new provision will allow delegation at an appropriate time in the future. This would be an interim step prior to devolution of water management to the territorial governments.

Another major improvement over the existing legislation is the proposal to make domestic and instream water users eligible for compensation should their interests be affected by a licensed operation. As a word of explanation, an instream user is someone who uses water to earn income or for subsistence, but who does not actually take water or alter the water's flow. For example, aboriginal people who depend on fishing for income or food would be considered instream users.

Although domestic and instream users are not eligible for licences, under the proposed amendments, the water boards will consider their interests when licence conditions are being developed. This is an important measure because the status of domestic and instream users is unclear in the existing legislation. This is a reasonable and effective means of recognizing the interests of all water users.

I am especially pleased to inform the House that these new acts will allow the federal government and the territorial water boards to take a much stronger stance on environmental issues than in the past. For example, they provide explicit authority for the water boards to address closure and abandonment of licensed operations. As well, the inspection and enforcement provisions of the legislation have been strengthened. Inspectors will be able to enforce licence conditions by issuing stop work and clean-up orders where there is danger to persons or to the environment. All licence conditions will be enforceable.

Under the proposed amendments, the list of potential offences has also been broadened. For example, these bills will make it an offence to violate any licence conditions or to fail to report a deposit of waste and penalties have been expanded and modernized. The new bills increase the maximum fines for major licensees from $5,000 to $100,000 and for minor users the increase will be from $5,000 to $15,000. The bills also introduce the possibility of jail terms.

Finally, in relation to the environment, Bills C-51 and C-52 confirm that the territorial water boards can set water quality conditions that are more stringent than those set out even under the Fisheries Act.

Hon. members should also be aware that the new legislation provides for compensation to be paid to anyone who suffers losses as a result of a water use. As I mentioned earlier, this provision includes domestic and instream users.

The provisions of the legislation relating to security deposits have also been strengthened and clarified. Under the proposed amendments, such deposits may be used to guarantee compliance with licence conditions, to remedy violations or to pay court ordered compensation.

The remaining amendments contained in Bills C-51 and C-52 are minor and essentially administrative in nature.

I want to reiterate that these proposals are for the most part supported by all key stakeholders in the north. They were developed after extensive consultations. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has taken special care to ensure that the Yukon Waters Act and the Northwest Territories Waters Act respect the interests of northern natives. In this regard, we are particularly pleased with the environmental stewardship components of the legislation. The amendments that clarify instream uses of water and compensation for damages are also extremely important to aboriginal people.

It has been suggested that changes to the administration system for water management should be postponed until the major land claims in the north are resolved. We cannot agree with that approach. Changes to the Northern Inland Waters Act are long overdue and have been in the works for a number of years. The amendments we are proposing will result in improved legislation for water management regimes that are established under claims settlements. Where there are inconsistencies between future claims settlement agreements and this water management legislation, the claims settlement legislation will take precedence.

In closing, I would like to remind members that these amendments are fully in keeping with the government's policy on northern political development. They provide for decision-making to be moved closer to the people and they will facilitate the eventual transfer of legislative responsibility for water management to the territorial governments.

As well, the amendments address our commitment under the Arctic environmental strategy, the green plan, and will enhance our ability to protect the northern environment.

Finally, by streamlining administrative arrangements we will encourage sustainable, environmentally responsible economic development. This will translate into jobs for northerners and increased economic prosperity for all of Canada.

In short, this is an excellent example of a situation where everyone wins. I urge hon. members to join with the many other Canadians who support these legislative amendments.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief on this bill. As you know, our community has had a very active campaign going to bring to people's attention the importance of the management of our water resources in this country. I too would like to support the government in bringing this legislation up to date.

As the member for Calgary Southwest said earlier in his remarks, there are people out there who believe that maybe this legislation should wait until some of the land claims, et cetera are settled. I tend to share his view that when it comes to this issue, time is of the essence.

I believe it goes well beyond the land claims issue. I believe that right now if there is one issue in this country that can still galvanize us as a nation, it is the issue of the water resource management. It is very important that the national government take a lead role in making sure our legislation is right up to speed.

As time evolves here, if the position of the national government in terms of water resource management is not crystal clear, we are going to get into all kinds of jurisdictional disputes. I see this bill as being very important in sending out a strong signal that even though we respect the territorial management of these water resource management bills, at the same time we should never forget that the national government is ultimately the body responsible for managing the environment in this country.

It seems that in the last few days we are getting conflicting signals, that different provinces are suggesting for example that Bill C–13 is somehow an infringement on provincial responsibility and authority.

We should set the record straight right now. If we cannot have national environmental standards, and if we have a situation where the national government is subservient in an environmental act to a provincial standard, then what kind of a joke are we going to be to the rest of the world. If there is one thing that we all agree on today, it is the fact that we must do what we have to do to save the planet. The last thing that we need is a situation where coming from Canada we have seven different voices and seven different standards as to how the environmental standards of this country should be set, or managed, or administered.

• (1130)

When it comes to this particular issue, I believe it is the one issue on which Canadians want us to speak with one voice. We have been talking a lot for the last few months about referendums. We wanted to have referendums on the Constitution, we wanted to have referendums on different aspects of our economy. If there is one area on which we should consider a national referendum it should be the environment.

If we had a national referendum in this country as to what body of government should ultimately be responsible for setting national standards, I would venture to say that 90 per cent of Canadians would say the national government should be the ultimate spokesman in this area.

I want to commend the government for putting these bills on the agenda, moving them through so quickly and making sure there is a clear–cut signal sent that our environmental house will be in order in the not too distant future. As I said earlier, it is the one issue on which all Canadians will get behind us in this House if we say that we are ultimately going to set national standards.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I would like to make a comment and maybe ask a question of the hon. member.

This act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories is certainly an act that would be acceptable. What bothers me is that we do not talk about the water resources in Canada and the implications to the North American continent.

The Americans have been interested in Canada's water for a long, long time. I remember seeing a program on American television in which Californians were talking about their problems with water. They said the problem is going to be solved once they get the water from Canada, from the Northwest Territories and other rivers.

We had a free trade agreement and if I remember correctly, the government said that water was not included in this agreement. Now the government is negotiating what it calls NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement. We, as members of Parliament, have not been consulted. Other members in the House have asked questions of the government. They wanted information because they say the Mexicans know how the negotiations are progressing. The American Congress is involved but Canadian parliamentarians are not. We are being set aside and in one moment, maybe next week, the government is going to present an agreement and ask us to support the North American free trade agreement which might sell our water to the Americans.

I remember a former member in this House, Mr. Desmarais, the brother of the famous Mr. Desmarais, was heading a company that was supposed to sell water from Canada to the United States. I, as a member of Parliament, have problems with a bill that comes in, looks nice, but is one of which we do not know the implications. The government does not answer the fundamental questions such as how we are going to deal with our water resources in the new North American free trade agreement.

I am asking the hon. member whether he could elaborate on this point.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague because he is so right when he identifies the fact that some of the best lawyers in this nation have stated categorically that there is potential, under the free trade agreement, for water to be sold to the Americans.

We have asked the government many times to request a one-page special protocol agreement from the United States saying that water is not part of the free trade agreement. I have even written Clayton Yeutter myself asking him for a clear-cut position on whether he believes water is part of the free trade agreement and he has never answered me. I have written him several times.

I am concerned about the water and free trade agreement connection. I think it is one part of the hidden agenda of the Americans in the free trade agreement.

I want to address the point about the Grand Canal, the great recycling and northern development project. In chapter 9 of Premier Bourassa's book Power from the North, he describes that project in detail.

I had a town hall meeting in my riding with the gentleman, Mr. Thomas Kierans, who conceived the idea of recycling the lower end waters of James Bay and channelling them down through into the Great Lakes and ultimately through Lake Michigan into the United States. It was a hotly contested debate.

The point is that there is a lot of concern and most important is the environmental concern.

We will pass in this House today Bill C-13. With it, anything and everything related to the environment in this country will have to go through this process. Make no mistake about it. In a newspaper article I saw that the provincial premier of the environment for the province of Quebec thought this was some kind of a totalitarian bill. That language was a bit aggressive. Make no mistake about it, and he should not make any mistake about it, the provincial environmental system will be subservient to the national government's environmental procedures after Bill C-13 is passed today.

That is something that the people of Canada will welcome.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the details on the Grand Canal. I would like the hon. member to answer and give his opinion because he wrote to the negotiators on the free trade agreement on whether the water was included. I understand that he did not get a straight answer.

What is his personal feeling? Is water included in the free trade agreement? In the new free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States will it be included? It is a hypothetical question but he could probably answer it.

Mr. Mills: Obviously I cannot deal with a hypothetical question in terms of Mexico. We do not know what is going to be included.

In terms of the free trade agreement with the United States, the answer is categorically yes. Water is a part of the free trade agreement.

I am not an expert on water law, but I have gone to lawyers who are experts and they have verified that.

• (1140)

I believe that water is the secret part of the agenda as to why the Americans really want it. I sincerely believe this, I say to my friend from Calgary. By the way, if you do not believe that, then the government should get a one-page special protocol letter from the United States government saying water is not a part of the free trade agreement. Remember that Clayton Yeutter, who was the chief negotiator of the free trade agreement, did his PhD thesis in North American water management. His whole thought process his whole life has been on North American water management.

We possess enough water in Canada to look after the entire world. I am not against sharing our water with the United States, but I do not think we should just be giving it to them. This is a separate debate and a separate discussion. In the future, rather than have people die of thirst, our friendly neighbours to the south, it may be that we can use water as a way of trading for bringing jobs back here. I am not paranoid about trading water with the United States, but we should get something in return, whereas right now we have given it away.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put a few words on the record about the bill that we are debating now, Bill C-51, the act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories.

I would like to make two general comments. The first is to share the concerns of the member for Broadview—Greenwood about water exports.

In British Columbia there are a number of water export plans and in particular a plan known for sometime now as NAWPA, the North American Water and Power Alliance. It is almost science fiction, the whole question about the flooding of the Rocky Mountain trench. It would flood part of my riding.

I want to rise and share the concerns of the member because it is one of those things mulling around in somebody's mind down in the United States and if we are not cautious I fear that our government may be ambushed, if you like, or certainly will allow itself to go down the wrong route and we could be very seriously hurt on this issue. It is certainly important to flag this issue for the government and for the Canadian public.

There is also a project very much in the news just north of Kamloops that my colleague, the member for Kamloops, has been raising in this House on a regular basis. Water seems to have an essence to it that people get very concerned about. We are concerned about our forests and our fish, but water is a very emotional issue and we want to ensure that our government is aware of that.

My second point relates to the Northwest Territories. We are now debating a bill that in essence is a positive approach in terms of the development of local authority and giving, in this case, the emerging government of the Northwest Territories more responsibility for administering local affairs, in this case water. We support that.

I would like to add a bit of a British Columbia perspective and a suggestion to the government. Water does not reflect the artificial boundaries that we draw on maps. I am thinking here specifically of the Peace River, which flows from British Columbia, north of my riding, through Alberta and up into the Northwest Territories. There are reports that we are now starting to see the very negative impacts of what is called the WAC Bennett Dam, let alone the environmental effects of the creation of Williston Lake and the large body of water that has been created there.

Some are suggesting, particularly in the Dawson Creek, Fort St. John and Mackenzie areas, that there will be quite a change in the weather by the creation of this large body of water and the downstream effects in the Peace River now being affected by the WAC Bennett Dam and its impact there and its eventual impact in the Northwest Territories.

My plea and advice to the government and to the committee when it considers this bill is obviously to hear witnesses. This is a good example of a piece of legislation where bringing witnesses to the committee would provide all members with an excellent opportunity to hear the technical arguments of how important this legislation is.

I would urge that not only officials from the Northwest Territories but also people from Alberta are seeing the impact of this as well as those from British Columbia. As you know, the former government in B.C. had this mindset about Site C, another dam on the Peace and I do not think any consideration was given to what the downstream effects would be.

I would urge the committee when it is reviewing this bill to also call witnesses from the Government of British Columbia, who have done some studies and have reason to be concerned about what authorities may do in our province and the impact it is going to have in Alberta and when this bill comes into place in the Northwest Territories.

I would hope that the government would hear these comments when the bill is before committee and that it would consider bringing these witnesses in. This would be an excellent opportunity to hear these concerns because, of course, as I said at the beginning of my comments the very concern that all of us have about our water is that it flows cleanly and wherever possible without restriction. When we do have some of these projects, we must make sure that they undergo the strictest assessment possible.

Of course, the whole question of the Kemano project on the Nechako River comes immediately to mind and how this government has done everything it can to thwart the rules of the land when it relates to that particular project. To the committee, I say: Please hear some witnesses on that. Hearing from those witnesses would really add to some of the debate on the bill. They may have some excellent advice to give all members of this House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member's remarks carefully. I too, share many of his concerns and also his constructive amendments to this bill. I want to ask him something philosophical.

I have always believed that the environment is the one area where, if we had a national standard, that would allow us to develop a national will which would assist in this process of galvanization that we need so badly in this country right now when things are so fragile.

It seems to me that when we are putting so many different environmental bills through the House of Commons right now that we are getting reaction from different legislatures. We are getting different types of reaction. Some are supportive of our Bill C-13; others are not as supportive.

This is one area where the general public does not need a mixed signal. I believe the general public wants a clear understanding that it is the national government which really sets the standard and leads the way when it comes to the environmental standards in this country.

My question to the member is this: What does he think of the idea of having a national referendum on the environment? I am not the expert on referendums here. Of course, the expert is the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore whom I do not think we utilize as much as we should in this House with his expertise and all the work he has done. So I do not know how it would be structured.

• (1150)

The idea behind this referendum would be to hear from Canadians whether or not they want their municipality to speak on the environment, their province to speak on the environment or if they want Canada to be the ultimate voice of direction and authority when it comes to this issue.

I was wondering if the member could give me some remarks on that.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments by the member for Broadview—Greenwood. First I have a couple of comments and then I would be pleased to address his question.

My experience and view from the little travelling I have done across the country is that in their own way I think the member is right that Canadians do look to Ottawa and to the national government as the last stop gap in terms of degradation of our environment. Even regardless of party and office, there is a sense among Canadians that maybe Ottawa is the last bulwark of attempting to solve some of these problems.

If we think of political science courses, the argument from some instructors is that we will vote one way provincially and another way federally basically to try to balance the different levels of government. Maybe it is part of that. It is my sense that that is what Canadians feel.

I would strongly endorse the view on national standards. I think we have been relatively lucky in Canada so far and that we have not had a situation where one province plays off the other by saying: "You're a big polluting company, come to our province and we won't tax you or we will build all the roads for you". I do not get the sense that we have done that quite as much as say, in the southern United States where a great deal of that is heard of.

Certainly, in Canada there is the unfortunate part where we have done it in terms of labour legislation. I think of the Michelin bill in Nova Scotia, negative and bad labour legislation so that companies think they can then have a free hand in that area.

That is not to say that there have not been problems in the environment as well. I think of the former government in British Columbia and the then minister's appearance before the committee here where he was expressing some concerns about this bill. Actually, the environment minister from Alberta comes to mind as being particularly backward in his thinking, as I recall, on this legislation.

The member asks about a national referendum on the environment and he makes reference to the work of the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I spoke on that member's private member's bill on referenda. I said that I was not particularly opposed to the idea. My comments that night were to express some caution, that we do not want to use referenda to beat up on anybody, to beat up on Quebec, Don Getty, or our First Nations people. That is not what I would see as the role of a referendum.

I would say this, if my comments are right on the mark about how Canadians feel about the national government needing some direction and support from Canadians about national standards, my sense is that on a referendum question that we would likely get support of most Canadians.

In fact, the comments that the member for Skeena made last night when debating Bill C-13 about some of the positions that members from Quebec were taking, that Quebec will still be there, the fish will swim, the birds will fly and whatever boundaries we talk about or whatever governments and institutions we set up will not mean anything.

If anything, we need to buttress national standards of the federal government. If a referendum somewhere down the road will help achieve that goal, then I do not have a particular personal problem with that.

Let us not just do something for the sake of doing it. We can achieve a lot more through community groups and by having governments that actually do something to protect the environment.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on national referenda as far as water is concerned. As you know, I had two bills, one in this House and one in the previous House on national referenda.

I am a firm believer that we should consult people on major issues. It is essential that people have input. I am in favour of a referendum and I think it would unite the country.

As well, I would like to mention that the PC caucus in 1988 before the election had a water policy and I would like to quote from that water policy. As we know, water is included in the free trade agreement. But what does the water policy say? I quote: "The PC government's new federal water policy specifically prohibits the export of Canadian water by interbasin transfer—the diversion of lakes or rivers. At the same time the government's conviction that the free trade agreement does not in any way put Canada's water at risk of being traded to the United States is supported by trade and legal experts".

That is what was being said before the 1988 election. The quote continues: "Moreover, the trade legislation has been amended to explicitly rule out any large scale water transfers".

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have listened with care to what has been going on here with the questions and answers.

I think that the hon. member opposite, with all due respect, is endeavouring to drag in an issue that has absolutely no relevancy to this debate at all. What we are talking about is the Northwest Territories and Yukon Waters Acts amendments. It has nothing to do with this old canard of alleged water exports to the United States, which I thought the hon. member would have abandoned a long time ago and found something new to talk about.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I have to take exception to what the member said.

We are talking here about an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories. That has everything to do with some of the ideas that have been discussed broadly across North America about water diversions, interbasin transfers.

It is important that we make it crystal clear to Canadians that this bill we are debating will prohibit or prevent any province or any free trade agreement from ever getting involved with something like the Grand Canal.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments has now expired. I simply would like to add that it is always difficult for the Chair to determine relevance, and I think that in this respect, both sides of the House made their point.

Before resuming debate, since the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands seems to have some reservations about the ruling I gave earlier today that the hon. member for Labrador was the third speaker and was therefore entitled to not more than 20 minutes, I just want to mention one of the sources on which I based my ruling. I am referring to the Précis of Procedure of the House of Commons, Fourth Edition, which says that the Speaker may subsequently recognize the mover if the latter so desires, and otherwise any other member. However, the mover must speak first, if he wishes to speak, because by the very fact of presenting the motion, he is deemed to have spoken—this is important, he is deemed to have spoken—and the Chair will not be able to recognize him again later on. So even if last night the mover did not speak, according to the Standing Orders he is nevertheless deemed to have spoken because he presented the motion. Technically, the hon. member for Labrador became the third speaker. I just wanted to add this clarification to the ruling I gave this morning.

[English]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, since I was interrupted I will take this occasion to continue my thought process on the water issue. Bill C-51 deals with water in the Northwest Territories. Water is one of the main resources of Canada and, as a nation, if we want to survive, we have to be careful what we do with it.

• (1200)

As members know, at the present time Canada has a resource-based economy. We have water and we have natural resources. I would like to quote from "Canada West Fact Finder". In 1990, Alberta exported $15.6 billion of goods. Of those goods, energy was 58 per cent; forest products, 4 per cent; agriculture, 16 per cent; and manufacturing only 6 per cent. The same thing applies to British Columbia where forestry was 56 per cent and the manufacturing sector only 6 per cent.

As members can see, all of our economy is based on resources. This is why the United States and Mexico are interested in having a free trade agreement with Canada. They want our resources. We have no manufacturing base, or very little. The one that exists is being destroyed in Ontario and Quebec. So water is one of the other elements that the United States and Mexico want.

The question is, are we going to have a bill, Bill C-51? Is it going to deal with the control of our water resources or not? I believe that the government has failed because it has sold out to North American business interests, especially in the United States with the signing of a free trade agreement that includes water as well. Even so, in their promises on water policy before the last election, the government was very explicit in stating that water was not included.

We are facing a dilemma as a nation. Do we want to be simply the suppliers of the raw materials for the world or do we want a nation that respects itself and develops a manufacturing base? I think this government has fooled not only me, because I did support the free trade agreement, and this is one of the votes that I do regret. The promises that were made to us were somewhat different than what the reality is.

I hope Bill C-51 goes to the legislative committee, where appropriate witnesses will be called and amendments will be put forward.

Mr. Speaker, this is the only thing I wanted to say as I was interrupted in my comments by another member here.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to interrupt the hon. member. What I was seeking to do earlier on, as you so wisely observed, sir, was to get some pertinence to the debate. I value this opportunity to strive to bring us back to that.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was quite correct when he underlined the fact that this pair of bills, C-51 and C-52, have absolutely nothing to do with any alleged export of water to the United States. He was quite correct in pointing out that they do relate to water matters in the two territories.

But I would draw to the attention of the member for Calgary Northeast that the Canada-U.S. International Boundary Waters Treaty, which I think has stood for some 70 years now, forbids the diversion of water to the United States or to any other country. So the protection exists.

I am somewhat amazed that the hon. member, as a member from Alberta, rather than throwing up his hands and suggesting that we are being raped or we are about to be raped, would not work for value-added industries in our province. He should be working for diversification of our economy, rather than cry, as Chicken Little did, that the sky is falling in some way or another.

This gentleman campaigned for the free trade agreement and now he appears to have become an opponent of free trade. He has missed the Reform nomination and perhaps now he is seeking the New Democratic Party nomination. Mr. Speaker, I think that we have not had a constructive contribution to this debate; rather, we have had a red herring dragged across the floor of the House and it has no pertinence and is just appealing to some of the baser instincts of Canadians.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that Alberta faces a crisis. Alberta has lost 70,000 jobs in the oil and gas industry since 1985. This is a fact. We hear about lay-offs every day in Alberta. The gas and oil industry is in big difficulty. This has happened under this administration. It is this administration, the Conservative government that came to power in 1984, that promised prosperity for Alberta.

At least we have a responsive, responsible provincial government that seems to try to help the people of Alberta but the members from Alberta certainly do not represent the interests of Alberta in this Parliament.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I know the member for Calgary Northeast had no intention of misleading this House with his comments. Jobs have been lost in the oil and gas industry which is a market-wide industry now. It was this government that removed the National Energy Program. Regarding water, it was this government through the free trade agreement that ensured that water would not be on the table, with the exception of bottled water.

I feel very strongly that diversification throughout Alberta, and indeed many provinces, is extremely necessary. I wonder if the hon. member might like to inform the House just where he has been, and why he does not go back to his riding and find out exactly how the province of Alberta is diversifying.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I am looking at the statistics and I can see that Alberta has 4 per cent of manufacturing. I do not think it has changed in the last five years.

I have been trying to bring new industries into Alberta. But the fiscal policies of this government do not permit that. The fiscal policies, the transportation policies of this government have been a complete failure. It even cut the VIA trains, so that Canadians could not move from one province to another and see the beauty of this country. This is the government that sold out to the interests in the free trade agreement to the United States.

• (1210)

I am really sorry this is happening. I hope this government will have the courage to go to the people and call an election.

Mrs. Sparrow: Why don't you go back to your riding Kindy?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just did not want this debate to continue with the impression left by the hon. member that things were that bad in Alberta. As my hon. colleague from Calgary Southwest noted, had the hon. member ever had the occasion to visit his own riding, he might be more encouraged and less pessimistic than he is.

We hear this gloom and doom consistently from the member for Calgary Northeast. I appreciate that if you stayed in Ottawa all your life or spent the rest of your time in eastern Europe, you might see gloom and doom. But come out to Calgary once in a while I say to the member for Calgary Northeast, and you will see a vibrant, booming economy, a diversified economy. I look in my own riding at the Foothills Industrial Park. I see innovative technology, work ethic, high-tech, new jobs created, not just in the oil and gas business, but a vibrant new economy with an open market in the United States for Calgary companies who are transporting goods to the United States into new markets. It is a booming, optimistic economy, the result of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I think the statistics are somewhat different. As I mentioned, 70,000 jobs have been lost in Alberta since 1984 in the oil and gas industry. That is reality.

I am a physician. I have a lot of friends in my riding who use to be my patients. They are losing their jobs. They are losing their houses because of the policies of this government. It introduced the goods and services tax that has put this country into a depression, not a recession. The Government of Alberta is fighting the goods and services tax in the courts. And what are those members from Alberta doing? They are not supporting their provincial government. They are supporting the centralists here in Ottawa.

I am really amazed at this attitude of some of the members from Alberta who do not work for the interests of Alberta. Once they come here, they drink water and they become stooges for the federal government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member that Bill C-51 is on study now in the House.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I wonder if it would be possible for the House to ask you to review the "blues".

I do think I heard the member for Calgary Northeast make a statement which suggested that members of Parliament come down to Ottawa to drink, which is absolutely not true.

Mr. Rocheleau: To drink water.

Mrs. Sparrow: I would ask you to review the "blues". If that is what he said I think the member should be asked to withdraw those words.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I said they come to Ottawa and drink the water here. I did not mention any other substance, just water.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking clarification. It was my understanding that we were going to Bill C-52 at this point. I know what you have called, I would just—

An hon. member: It is on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member that the projected order of business is subject to change without notice. It is the order of the day. I have no option than to take note of that bill.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain amount of chagrin that I rise to speak on this bill because there have been so many occasions when I have spoken in this House on this very matter.

This bill is an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Those are two areas that most particularly in my province of Nova Scotia we are having some difficulties with. I represent, as most members of this House know, the city of Halifax. Within the larger area of the city, my riding and the riding of Halifax West, we have five universities. These are respected and historic institutions of higher education and learning.

We have indeed in the city of Halifax the oldest university in the British Commonwealth outside the British Isles, that being the University of King's College.

We have the largest university in Atlantic Canada with professional schools famous world-wide, Dalhousie University. We have the only women's degree-granting institution in the British Commonwealth of Nations, Mount St. Vincent University. We also have the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, the Atlantic School of Theology, and of course, St. Mary's University.

Every one of those institutions is suffering. Our universities across the country are suffering, but most particularly in the Atlantic region. We are suffering from the highest tuition fees in the country from the oldest physical plants and from the lowest salaries to our faculty and staff.

There is a great and historic tradition in the province of Nova Scotia with regard to higher education. Indeed, we say with pardonable pride in Nova Scotia that it is graduates of our institutions who have gone across this country to staff other universities.

I see my hon. colleague across the way from Calgary and the president of the University of Calgary, Murray Fraser, was my dean at Dalhousie Law School.

The University of Victoria Law School was founded by Dalhousie graduates. The University of British Columbia was founded by academicians from Nova Scotia.

• (1220)

We have our graduates in schools and institutions and hospitals and legislatures right across this country. So we have been providing a valued service to the people of Canada for a long time. We are very proud of this tradition. We are proud of our graduates. We are proud of our students.

But our students in Nova Scotia are taking a beating that they just cannot sustain much longer. Dalhousie University had to increase tuition fees this year by 10 per cent. A lot of us in this House have children who are in university or are getting to the age to be university students.

Ten per cent is a large amount of money, particularly in the midst of the worst recession that this country has seen since the depression of the 1930s, particularly when unemployment is soaring. It is soaring most highly in Atlantic Canada, particularly when it is impossible for students to earn enough money either in summer employment, part-time jobs or a combination of both, even along with student loans and bursaries, to keep themselves in university.

What are we doing by bills such as Bill C-60, which continue the cuts to post-secondary education? We are effectively saying that post-secondary education in this country is the purview of the wealthy. This is not a Canadian tradition. This indeed is anathema to the Canadian tradition of post-secondary education.

In the province of Nova Scotia, the children of fishermen, farmers, coal-miners and steelworkers went to university because successive Canadian governments ensured that a university education was accessible to everybody. It was not just accessible to the children of the wealthy classes.

Indeed, the Alma Mater of the Prime Minister of this country, St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish has a tradition of educating those people from northern Nova Scotia, the vast majority of whom descend from the coal-miners, the steelworkers, the fishermen and farmers of Cape Breton Island.

How can we sit by and let this happen to our educational system? We hear and talk all the time about competitiveness. We talk about the globalization of our economy. We talk about the need for Canadians to be able to compete.

Is there one person in this Chamber who does not believe that we can produce competitive and well-educated people for our labour force? No, there is not. We have the potential to do it.

If we effectively shut off post-secondary education to those people who were not born with silver spoons in their mouths, then any idea that we may be competitive in a world market can just be thrown out the window.

Those universities with such great traditions, such great histories will soon be unable to function at anything close to what should be their capacity.

What is the reason for that? The reason is that this federal government has decided to shut down to a great degree the kind of funding that is necessary to keep those universities functioning. Along with the inability to function as institutes of education, we have a similar problem in the area of research and development. Where is research and development done in the main in Canada? In universities.

I look again at my own Alma Mater, Dalhousie University with its great medical school that has provided doctors for this country and internationally, as my colleague from Winnipeg would agree. The kind of research that Dalhousie University has become famous for has been cut back, cut back and cut back. What is the end result in that? It is twofold.

First of all, this country loses the opportunity to be home for the kinds of developments that Canada has become famous for. Second, our universities lose the kind of vibrant, creative talents who would have gone there to teach and to do research, but because the money is drying up, where do they go? They go to the United States.

I can understand some people on the other side of the House who would say, yes, because in the United States the money comes from the private sector and from big business, et cetera. That is their tradition. It is also a country with a population of 250 million plus. We on the other hand are in a country of—I have not heard the latest census statistics—but we are somewhere in the area of 27 million.

It is just utterly unrealistic, not to say foolish, to think that we could possibly compete in the development of private donations to research and development, particularly within the university context in the same manner. It is not possible. We do not have the population base.

It therefore is incumbent upon the government to do the best it can to ensure that the standards of education, research, development and the physical plants where this is carried out at least maintain a level of acceptance.

Let me talk about those physical plants for a minute too. Last fall, I was invited to a meeting by the students of Dalhousie University on this very tuition hike that Bill C-60 is making necessary.

I walked into the student union building, two blocks from my house, and the lobby of the student union building was filled with concerned and frightened young people.

One young woman got up and told the assembled group that she was in a 100-level class as a freshman at Dalhousie University in a classroom that was built for 50 people. There were 150 students crowded into that room. It was a fire hazard and it continues to be a fire hazard. Because of the cutbacks epitomized by Bill C-60, our universities are being forced to educate our children in rooms that are unsafe. That is merely a small example of what is going on.

Surely we are not so blind in this Chamber as to see what we are doing to ourselves by refusing to grant the kind of money that universities need to succeed, that they need to make Canada or keep Canada on the competitive edge in this globalized economy.

Are we really that blind not to understand that if we are going to take our rightful place as competitors in world markets we can only do this with young people trained and educated and ready to take on the kinds of jobs that will be necessary to keep us there?

There is a second aspect to this bill and that is the health contributions aspect. This is something that we all have to be very careful and very serious about.

If there is a jewel in our social service network in this country that jewel is medicare. If there is something that truly makes this country different, more compassionate, more caring and indeed more of a desirable place to live for its citizens and more of an example in the international community, it is medicare.

Medicare has been with us for 27 years. It is something that all Canadians, everyone of us, no matter what your political stripe, take as a benefit of absolutely amazing proportions. There is not a person in this House who cannot tell a horror story of what happened to either a member of his or her own family or to someone they knew in the days before medicare.

I recall one evening shortly after I came to this Chamber having dinner with two of my colleagues from two other parts of the country. Each one of us had a family story in the pre-medicare days of how illness or accident had caused tremendous financial hardship because of the cost of medical services before Canada brought in medicare under the great Allan J. MacEachen of the other place.

We cannot allow for the erosion of medical services. I have just come back from a visit to Washington with the Sub-Committee on the Status of Women. I have listened to Americans in the field of health care talk about that system. We hear the figure that there are 36 million Americans not covered by some form of medical insurance. When we were in Washington last week, we learned that figure was incorrect. In fact, the number is closer to 96 million.

There are 96 million people who are either not covered or not covered enough for medical care in the United States, the land of the free and the home of the brave. I was really glad last week to realize that I lived in a country that would not allow that to happen.

This is a very precious gift we have and we must be very careful and jealously guard the existence and the continuation of our medicare system. There is no question that costs are escalating in the area of medicare and that we must be very careful to watch those costs.

I was a part of the health and welfare committee which did a very long study and made some recommendations to this House. I do not know where those recommendations are with regard to government policy. I see the minister across the way shrug his shoulders. I am sure he has read the report and is very familiar with the recommendations.

There were some good recommendations in there that related to the modernization in the realm of communication, which is an area I know the minister is very familiar with, and in the realms of the medical profession and the health care delivery systems. There were some good recommendations about prevention.

The hon. member from Calgary sat on that committee for part of the time with me and she agrees with a lot of those recommendations. We should not be looking at the question from a purely financial point of view. Every one of us knows that there is a problem with government spending. We have a deficit that we have to look after.

As a government we have to lead—when I say as a government I mean the whole House of Commons—in pressing the health care system in this country to come into the latter part of the 20th century. We have to talk about prevention. We have to talk about community clinics. We have to talk about making our population healthier, thus costing us less money in the long run.

We should not be putting the cart before the horse and talking about things like user pay or private insurance companies vis-à-vis the public system. Those matters will push us into a situation similar to the United States, where again I say 96 million people do not have the benefit of the kind of medical care and medical treatment that we have.

I say in closing that this bill has disastrous implications for my own province, for my region and for this country as a whole. We have to realize that one of the things that keeps us together are those traditions in education and health care which are sacrosanct to the vast majority of Canadians.

For the federal government to back off from those commitments, to start withdrawing in a significant way the funding for those programs, is a betrayal of trust. It is a contribution to the break-up of this country.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I intend to participate in this debate, but I have a question for the hon. member for Halifax.

It is encouraging always to see a member stand up and defend her province as a major contributor to this country. I think we will all admit that the province of Nova Scotia, through its educational institutions, has been a major contributor. It is nice to see the member stand in her place and defend her province and its right to continue that wonderful tradition.

It would be somewhat helpful if the hon. member would actually look at the facts of the particular transfers that take place to her province. I would like to remind her and all those who listen here today that if she looked at the figures, the over-all growth at an annual rate of 5.6 per cent since 1984-85 to this day is not a negative growth; it is a positive growth; it is additional moneys to her province every given year since 1984 at a rate today which is significantly higher than inflation. She will admit, as her party did, that inflation has been wrestled to the ground and clearly, we are all happy about that.

Look at the other facts. Her province has received the highest increase in the fiscal years 1991-92 to 1992-93 of the equalization payments of 11 per cent. For goodness' sake, there is no restriction for her provincial government to use these moneys toward program financing such as education. All levels of governments, we will admit, have cash flow problems, but to suggest that this government is responsible for less moneys going to education is purely ridiculous and nonsense.

In excess of $1 billion is flowing to the province on equalization alone this year, the highest increase compared to any other province. This government clearly did not see that the province should have received less. The hon. member's argument should be with her province because it could reroute a good part of this additional money.

If you look at the facts, the moneys from this government of Canada count for 43 per cent of all of Nova Scotia's revenues, not insignificant, for a total of $2, 000 per capita, per year, this year. That is 55 per cent higher than the national average.

With all due respect to the province, and we all think it has great places of learning, how can she stand in her place and suggest that this government is at fault when it is the provincial government of Nova Scotia?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain amount of mournful feeling that I reply to the hon. member from Portage—Interlake. Even the devil can quote Scripture.

It has been, shall we say, an activity of the federal government to constantly bring up the figures and say: "Look, we are giving you x number more dollars than we gave you last year". Perhaps if I explain this very slowly, my hon. friend will catch my drift.

What has happened with the universities in Nova Scotia and with health care are not just raises in inflation. I am sure everyone of us would hope that universities are not static institutions. Neither are health care institutions. Things grow, they increase, they attempt to improve and costs rise. Even without those changes in the development of programs larger number of students, et cetera, which have outstripped the inflation rate and the rate of increase to the province of Nova Scotia, you also have long-term capital costs which are not figured into the statistics that my hon. colleague represents.

The Sir Charles Tupper Building in Halifax, which is the home of Dalhousie Medical School, has major problems requiring major renovations. The magnificent fund-raising effort that went forward from the university and helped to build the fire-devastated Dalhousie Law School, which is now finished, also has ongoing problems. There are hundreds of people going in and out of buildings every day. There are repairs, there are upkeeps, all of which are not figured into the calculations.

On top of that, we have the whole question of increases over inflation vis-à-vis increases due to actual costs. In general, the rising costs of universities outside these other points I have mentioned also outstrip inflationary levels.

I would like to know, given that the hon. member comes from one of the western provinces which receives transfer payments, if the government of Manitoba is equally happy with the cuts in these particular areas. My hon. colleague from Winnipeg says no.

As to my argument with the premier of Nova Scotia, my party in Nova Scotia is doing everything it can with the greatest of alacrity to change the government in Nova Scotia and the problems will be significantly less under a new government.

• (1240)

When that happens there will be more voices added to mine, my colleague from South West Nova and the other four Liberal MPs from Nova Scotia who stand and vociferously defend our position and attack the position of the government with regard to the cuts to Established Programs Financing. My hon. colleague will hear those voices loud and clear for many years to come. A grand tradition not just of education, not just of health care, but equally of liberalism is re-established in an absolutely impressive way in the province of Nova Scotia to join the other Atlantic provinces of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, just before I present some ideas with respect to what I think is a very important piece of legislation, I want to say to my colleague, who was making more of a political speech, that I was trying to debate some straight facts.

The numbers were not reduced. We did not cut back the numbers transferred to her province. They went up, and in the particular EPF area, although not as high as the hon. member would have liked, they went from $680 million to $684 million. That is not a cutback. That is exactly the opposite. It is an increase.

Members opposite cannot chide the fact that these figures are correct. It should not be suggested to anybody in this country that when you go up $4 million it is a cutback. No fancy words will change that.

In this of second reading debate of Bill C-60, which amends the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, let me say that I find this bill to be very promising. I know there is some scepticism by members opposite but I would like to explain what it proposes to do.

Mr. Milliken: A bunch of broken promises.

Mr. Holtmann: It involves the renewal by this government of the equalization program which earlier addresses from all sides of the House correctly recognized as the cornerstone of the Canadian fiscal federalism.

We have not taken our responsibilities and walked away from what we all consider to be a very important issue.

Mr. Milliken: You have shirked them completely.

Mr. Holtmann: The member says we have shirked them. I have just talked about the billions of dollars going into this program, and that is shirking. To the ladies and gentlemen who watch the opposition from time to time in this House, this bill does exactly the opposite as was suggested. It does renew what we intended to do, and that is to assist provinces which are far less affluent and far less able than others that are very industrious, such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. It concerns some transfers which we agree need to be done.

The renewal follows more than a 20-month consultation with the provinces at both official and ministerial levels. We have engaged in significant consultation on the preparation of this bill. It was not done totally in-house by the Minister of Finance. There was a lot of consultation and it took a long time. We have what is generally an agreement, although the opposition members will scream and yell, as they do every day, that the Government of Canada has not contributed enough money.

As long as I have been here, since 1984, it has never been enough money. They always have demanded that the government indebt itself further for this particular program. Our Minister of Finance has taken a most reasonable approach without significant cutbacks to continue what we as Canadians feel is a very important part of our Constitution.

I believe hon. members will recognize that it was important to get the equalization renewal right. Now it is important to get it done. Our very real deadline of March 31, when the current five-year program expires, tells us that this particular bill will and shall go through.

This bill also proposes to confirm that the government has the authority to enter into agreements with the provinces to improve and simplify tax administration in this country. There is no argument, I am sure, from any member of this House that the taxation system does need revamping because it can be extremely cumbersome. The bill will therefore facilitate co-operation between federal and provincial governments in mutual administration and enforcement of each other's taxes, and will simplify the payment of taxes for taxpayers and government.

Let us talk about equalization, which the hon. member from Halifax made a major statement about, concerning how it affects her particular region. Honourable members will be aware that the commitments of equalization payments which are enshrined in section 32(2) of the Constitution exists so as to enable provincial governments to provide reasonable comparable levels of public service at reasonable comparable levels of taxation.

This is paramount as a country that wants to stay economically sound and allow opportunities to exist from coast to coast and within the territories. I believe that our commitment to continue in the way we have demonstrates in a very formidable way that we are prepared to continue that to the benefit of Canadians.

The benefits of equalization programs flow to the less wealthy provinces and it is therefore the most progressive of major transfers to the provinces.

In 1992-93 the government will provide about $8.5 billion in equalization payments to less wealthy provinces. To anyone watching this today on TV, that is a huge amount of money at a time of recession, which we are hopefully now moving out of. It is not a lesser amount, but a greater amount than was previously given to the provinces in this program.

Let us take a look at my province, for an example. The member for Halifax mentioned her province. I am not going to stand up and say that our province would not have liked to have received a little more. I see my colleague from Winnipeg is likely going to jump up and ask why his province did not receive more. He will say that I, as a Manitoban, should be demanding more from this government. I am also a member from the province of Manitoba who sees common sense apply, and not the attitude of grabbing the money and leaving the deficit to somebody else or to our children. We want common sense to apply. The Manitoba government, by the way, does not fare too badly under the present arrangement as proposed by this bill.

Our growth rate was 6 per cent since 1984-85. We will expect to get this year $1.9 billion into the provincial coffers, which is 40 per cent of all of Manitoba's revenue. The federal government plays a major role in the finances and the activities of the province of Manitoba. It is expected to exceed $1,750 per capita this year.

Our equalization growth rate will be 9.8 per cent. That is not quite as high as the province of Nova Scotia, but very significant. When you compare the three transfers that will take place on the EPF and the Canada Assistance Plan, we are looking at 5.1 per cent, well above the inflationary rate.

There is no doubt that provinces are equally responsible for providing education and health care. It is not the federal government alone that is involved in this.

• (1250)

We all have deficits in the provinces as a result of a bit of a difficulty in our financial activities across this great land. Other countries do, we all recognize that, and we are striving very hard to bring back greater employment.

We have some other political parties hovering around the countryside that would like to reduce the amount of government intervention by 15 per cent. The Reform Party would do that. Now the opposition members should be standing on their feet. If we take 15 per cent away from the equalization payments to the provinces, I suspect we might have civil war.

That is the fear because this party that is going to save everyone in western Canada, the Reform Party, is advocating major reductions in spending by the federal government and this I am sure would be one of them.

When we see what 15 per cent does, hon. members in this House will clearly admit that our growth of 5 per cent, 6 per cent and in one case, 8 per cent, is not a reduction in transfer payments. It is our commitment toward this very important part of our federalism which I can assure members we have no indication of discontinuing. We do ask in a very reasonable and consultative way that the provinces also look very closely at their budgets and their programs. They have to contribute equally with the federal government to programs for which the funding is short.

There is no argument that there is less money coming in when you have a recession. There are demands on money all the time. As we know, none can deny it, even the wealthy province of Alberta finds itself with deficits. At one time it had such a tremendous growth in its heritage.

We are living in the real world. Those who jump up to condemn this government on this issue are not telling the facts and are not responsible to all Canadians when it comes to looking after the finances of this land. Canadians are telling us more and more to spend less. This present government, very wisely by the minister, reduced some of our personal income taxes because it is an incentive to work hard and maybe save some money.

When we look at these figures, I would really ask members opposite to consider that we have acted very responsibly. The members opposite are prepared to jump up and say: "You have cut these poor people out of education and you have cut them out of health and they cannot get a bed". That is not the case at all.

This government has lived within its fiscal framework, recognizing that we are in a downturn economy, hopefully to move it upward. We have interest rates at a reasonable level, albeit they bounced up one-quarter or one-half a per cent and mortgages went up three-quarters of a per cent and everybody panicked across the way. I think it has to be realized and demonstrated that we have inflation, which is very damaging to any economy, at a level which is acceptable. We have interest rates still at reasonable rates. When we compare the last 15 years, we have them at very reasonable rates. There is an indication that the budget has created housing starts far exceeding what we expected. Opposition members will jump up and say it is not enough. We have the right thing going with regard to this piece of legislation.

I heard the Leader of the Opposition state that we should deficit further for some short term gain in employment.

I have seen opposition in government and when it deficits, not by a few billion, but by many billions of dollars to get the economy going, it is only a short-term gain and a long-term pain for all the future people of this country, the young people. That attitude just does not wash today. The days when we have major extensions to our deficit to try to persuade the economy are not in the works any more. Canadians will not tolerate it.

Our party does not intend to raise the deficit at any kind of an alarming rate as it was done in the past. That is not the way of the future, it is not the way you run any business and it is not the way you run a country. I would like to see our country remain strong and remain a most desirable place to live, as was expressed by the United Nations. It is not deficit spending that will allow this to happen.

With those few words I hope that I have brought some sense to the argument on Bill C-60. I want my colleagues to know that we can take some criticism from time to time, but for goodness' sake do not stand up and say: "You should throw more money at it. It is not enough. It is too little too late." I have heard every story going in here; it is always too little too late. We still have a fairly good economy. We have a lot of unemployment, there is no doubt about that, and it is serious, but we believe that this too shall pass if we stick to the way our finance minister has set out for us. It may need adjustment from time to time, but it is not a Liberal adjustment. It will never be a Liberal adjustment. It may be a Conservative adjustment.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a few questions to my colleague.

The member started by saying that the intention of his government is to assist provinces. The government, over the last many years, seven years at least, has failed to assist provinces. If provinces had been assisted there would be no cry from provinces about the actions of this government. The facts speak for themselves.

The hon. member then indicated that this is a renewal and that the equalization provision is enshrined in section 32(2) of the Constitution. Is he telling us that he can refuse to proceed with the equalization payment? Is he telling us that the renewal of the equalization payment is a gift from this government? I submit that this government has no choice. It has to proceed with the equalization payment because it is enshrined in our Canadian Constitution. Do not give a false impression that this is a gift from this government. It has not done enough. That is the issue at this time.

The member was speaking about common sense. Common sense tells us that we should take into account excellent studies done by the Senate of Canada. The Senate study of January 1991 on the poverty issue indicated that if you spent some $5 billion today to help the poor children and youth in the country you would be able to recoup some $33 billion two decades later because we will be able to prevent some school dropouts across the country.

The hon. member from the government side would say that is deficit spending. I do not think he understands the difference between deficit spending and investment. In both instances it may well be that you may have to borrow money, but deficit spending is when you spend it on something out of which no good comes at the end, whereas investment is when you borrow and out of it comes excellent things, including a profit, a return.

• (1300)

The Senate of Canada has told us that if we spend $5 billion today, in 20 years we will be able to recoup $33 billion. By any common sense definition that will be an investment.

I would like to ask the hon. member a couple of questions. The transfer payments, the Established Programs Financing, includes both transfers for health and education. Could the hon. member indicate to the House why combine the two and not have them separate? Would he indicate to the House what the four ingredients are necessary for economic recovery that his government has failed to do?

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to the hon. member from Winnipeg. I would like to answer his last question first.

The blueprint for economic recovery is, quite frankly, to put your financial house in order; try to get the government of this country out of its woes of debt upon debt. We have had some real growth years in those eight years. We have had great employment and we have had great industry activity, far exceeding what happened before.

We now have program expenditures in control with revenues, and that is how we influence the future development of this country. I understand by the member's statement that he is going to support the legislation because it gives the transfer payments which he says are in the Constitution. How would he dare vote against his Constitution if this is what this bill does?

It enshrines something in the Constitution. It gives Manitoba a 5.1 per cent growth rate. I am glad to hear today that he is going to support this legislation because it is going to put money in the province of Manitoba. It is going to put money in every province in this country through the payments.

Otherwise he would be in contravention of the Constitution. I would not want the hon. member from Winnipeg to get that crazy idea.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very attentively to the debate.

I was concerned about the degree of partisanship that seems to have entered the debate on such an important issue as transfer payments and meeting the very important needs of our society.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he recalls, during the recent first ministers' conference, when the Liberal premier of New Brunswick indicated that there should be a new structure for health care servicing in his province and in provinces right across the country.

He was indicating that it was time to recognize the fiscal limitations on governments at all levels. In a recent newspaper article, the headlines indicated that the NDP government in Ontario has recognized the need to limit expenditures in the area of health care as well.

The old ways of political partisanship on issues as important as transfer payments have proven to be less than productive. As Liberal premiers in New Brunswick and NDP premiers in Ontario now recognize, deficit spending and the deficit way of operating the budget compromise the capacity of future generations to meet the needs of society.

There seems to be some misinformation here, and I would just like the hon. member to clarify. Has there been an increase in recent years? Will there continue to be an increase? Or has, as some of the members opposite suggest, there been a decrease or a cut?

Mr. Holtmann: I would also like to comment on behalf of my colleague on this particular issue.

Let us get it absolutely straight. The transfers of moneys from the Government of Canada to those in these programs have increased.

The argument being made opposite is that they have not increased to the level we would have liked to increase them to, which would obviously have driven our deficit that much higher. That is the argument. It has increased.

Let me say something and my colleague opposite from Winnipeg would agree. It is not nice being in a have not province. I would like Manitoba to be a have province. I resent being called a have not province. We have great things going for us in Manitoba. We get some great benefits in the province of Manitoba through these programs and so do the maritime provinces and so does Quebec.

The idea of sometimes being self-sustaining as a province or all-contributing to the benefit of this country is what I work toward as a member of Parliament from Manitoba. I sometimes think that when some provinces like Alberta and B.C. make some contributions through their tax structures that end up in other provinces it is a Robin Hood scenario.

We should not be ever and ever dependent on transfers from provinces. We should somehow find ways of allowing us to somehow grow and flourish. If there is any policy left in this country which favours development in different areas, that is what I would like. We live in a part of Canada that should allow us to grow and function no differently than Alberta, for example.

We may not have all the natural resources, but I will say that the goal here is certainly one to use these transfers in an effective way. It may not be the amount we would like to spend. We have to live within the means. The statement always said is: "Live within the means of your income". Governments have all lived beyond the means of their incomes. We have to live as a country within the means of the prosperity of this land. If it is not as prosperous as we like to spend, then we have to realize that and adjust.

I think we all agree that it is an important program to continue.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to rise and join in this debate on Bill C-60.

To take a look at it one has to put it in the context of what has been happening in this country in the last number of years.

First of all, one has to look at the economic situation that this country has found itself in and how the federal government has prepared for the economic downturn that it precipitated.

Prior to the country going into a recession, the dramatic rise in unemployment insurance demands and the dramatic rise in demands on income assistance, the federal government changed the rules on unemployment insurance. It made sure that it was no longer responsible for putting any money into unemployment insurance.

The government started its off-loading. That is the key to this government; it is off-loading its responsibilities on others.

In the unemployment insurance field, it off-loaded its responsibility by pulling out any federal government contribution from the unemployment fund and off-loading it on employees and employers.

That has had a devastating effect on many small businesses. They were not in a position to function as well when the economic downturn came along. One wonders whether the federal government did not anticipate this.

It also cut back on the eligibility for unemployment insurance, meaning that many people who would have qualified are now dependent on income assistance and are going to the provinces. This drives up income assistance costs of which the federal government is paying 50 per cent under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The federal government took care of this. It simply said in the three wealthiest provinces, which have well over 50 per cent of those receiving income assistance, that it would limit its responsibility by putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan to 5 per cent.

• (1310)

The federal government talks very much about the need for economic competitiveness and the need for education. It takes a stand, however, that has cut back on the transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education, and at the same time has cut $200 million out of the Canadian job strategy program.

This is the context in which Bill C-60 comes before this House. The federal government has systematically off-loaded its responsibilities on the provinces, on to employers and on to employees. The impact on the provinces has been horrendous. It is worthwhile to spend a few minutes taking a look at each of these areas in terms of the impacts.

I will refer specifically to my own province of British Columbia. In the current fiscal year, the B.C. government is facing a deficit of $1.7 billion, of which $1.1 billion is directly the result of cutbacks of federal transfer payments.

The cap on the Canada Assistance Plan this year alone will cost the province of British Columbia $156 million. One has to remember that these are the funds being transferred to the provinces to help the most disadvantaged, those who not only have lost their jobs but who no longer qualify for unemployment insurance. This is the money that is transferred to the provinces to help children, not only poor children, but children who are abused and neglected. This is the government that talks very nicely about fulfilling its obligations to the UN charter on the rights of the child, while at the same time cuts back the funds to the provinces which improve the standard of living and protect children. That is one program.

The other program is EPF. The cutbacks on EPF were started, not by this government, but by the previous Liberal administration. When block funding was brought in there was a formula. It had nothing to do with expenditures. The federal government was to transfer money to the provinces based on the growth, the GNP and the growth in population. It was not based on expenditures or on any mythical amount based on the growth of the economy. It could afford to make those transfers.

In 1982, there was a forced attack on it by the Liberal government in the elimination of the 2 per cent tax point transfer. Then there was the six and five program. Then the federal government brought in limiting the escalation to 3 per cent and finally freezing it.

From 1992 to 1995, the province of British Columbia will lose $6.8 billion in transfer payments under this. Out of that, $2.6 billion is the result of Liberal cuts and the balance, about $4.2 billion, is the result of cuts by the federal Tories.

What is this money used for? It is to sustain our health care system at a time when the provinces experience not only escalating costs in health care, but increases in population, particularly British Columbia, because of the inward migration of people and the immigration into Canada.

It is also the money for post-secondary education, at a time when everyone knows that in order for Canada to be economically viable we must increase the number and quality of our graduates from our post-secondary educational facilities.

The federal government seems not to understand that we are in the middle of a debate on national unity and one of the things that holds this country together are our social programs such as health care, Canada Assistance Plan, income assistance. It has been the leadership of the federal government that has made for a national program. It is one of the things that makes us quite distinct from the United States.

The United States is mainly a Balkanization of states with varied programs that are not applicable as a right of an American citizen. In the States there are many Americans in every state who have no health care coverage at all. The Americans are increasingly looking at Canada for developing a national health care system that would provide coverage to everyone. This is ironic because at the same time we have a federal government that is reneging on its responsibilities by increasingly pulling out of the funding and leadership role in our health care.

There are other areas in which the federal government has pulled back in terms of the equalization or transfer payments to the provinces. Some of them are not large programs, but they have a significant impact on each of the provinces. The federal cuts have raised British Columbia's costs in the farm income stabilization program, crop insurance, economic development, reforestation, policing, social housing and correctional facilities. The federal government has again off-loaded its responsibility on to the provinces. These costs this year amount to $100 million.

What we have is a systematic attempt by this federal government to say it is not responsible for social programs, for the services to people across this country, that it is simply going to off-load these responsibilities on the provinces.

At any time in our history that would be regrettable. At this time, when we are debating unity and the holding of this country together, it is not only regrettable, it is downright malicious and almost criminal because it has the impact of making Canadians ask: "Why are we involved in a federal state if we have a federal government that can unilaterally pull out of its obligations financially and in terms of leadership?"

We hear the government members get up and say: "We had no choice. It is the debt; it is the deficit. We had no choice". I would like them to consider a few facts around the debt and the deficit. This government has been in power for over eight years, and if it has not had the economic competence to deal with the debt and the deficit in that period, I am sure it does not have the nerve to ask Canadians to give it another four or five years to try to deal with it.

When the government came into power, the debt was at about $150 to $160 billion. It is now well in excess of $425 billion. It tries to make out that the debt and the deficit are the result of program spending. That is simply not true. Program spending has accounted for about 9 per cent of that debt. The biggest cause of it has been this government's pigheaded and firm belief in a high interest rate policy.

We see the government, even in the last couple of weeks, using any excuse it can to justify driving interest rates back up. That has directly hurt this government's ability to service the debt. If interest rates had been an average of 4 per cent lower, on $400 billion that is a $16 billion a year saving. That would go a long way in dealing with the deficit that we are now incurring.

The government seems to say that it has no choice. Certainly if interest rates fell the Canadian dollar would fall. That is true. I would concur with that.

I happen to be from a province that would be quite happy to see an 80-cent Canadian dollar. We are an exporting province. We would be quite happy to see our lumber industry flourishing with a reduced dollar. We would be much more competitive with our exports to the Asian market and our exports to the United States.

The other major contributor to the debt that this government keeps harping on are tax concessions to the wealthy and to the corporations. The share of taxes corporations pay has steadily dropped over the last number of years. It used to be about 50/50. It is now down to the point at which corporations pay about 20 per cent of the revenues.

We have given tax loophole after tax loophole to the wealthy. The $100,000 capital gain is costing the federal government, to the provinces, $2.5 billion a year. The bulk of these lost tax revenues goes to those making over $100,000 a year, the very high income earners.

We have changed our system of RRSPs. We have made it so that the person earning less than $20,000 has had his ability to contribute to an RRSP reduced, while a person earning $86,000 a year has had his ability to contribute to an RRSP and avoid taxes increased dramatically. This is the kind of approach that this government has taken to the deficit and the debt.

My conclusion is that the government has deliberately run up the deficit. It has deliberately run up the debt. It did not take steps when it was elected in 1984 to bring the deficit under control or to bring the debt under control. It simply escalated the tax write-offs for the wealthy and the corporations. It simply drove up the interest rates to keep our Canadian dollar high. It appears that was part of the free trade deal. It made an agreement with the United States to keep it competitive compared to us by keeping our dollar high. I can only come to the conclusion that it has done this in order to attack social programs. The government philosophically does not support the Canadian concept of a social safety net, of national social programs and national leadership in this area. Unfortunately, by doing so it is starting to destroy the very fabric that is Canada.

This is the background that must be taken into consideration when one looks at Bill C-60. It is an act concerning the transfer of payments from the federal government to the provinces. It has to be taken in the view of this government's record. It has taken the stand that it will not be responsible. It will off-load its responsibility for post-secondary education, for health care, for corrections, on to the provinces. It will off-load its responsibility to the unemployed on to employers and employees. It will off-load its responsibility for income assistance recipients and children on to the provinces through the Canada Assistance Plan.

It is because of this that Canadians have lost faith in this federal government.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): I was listening to some of the rhetoric from my hon. colleague in the New Democratic Party, particularly with regard to the accusation that the Government of Canada has deliberately increased the deficit. This is consistent with other disinformation spread by members of the NDP. The deficit in 1984 was nearly at the $40 billion level, and as he should know, it has been reduced now by almost $10 billion to around the $30 billion level.

In spite of the rhetoric, I do want to acknowledge that he and other members of his party may be speaking on behalf of a sincere interest in the present generation. However, members of the Progressive Conservative Party not only feel a responsibility to members of this generation in terms of meeting the social needs of Canadians, but we also feel a very serious responsibility toward looking after the needs of future generations.

I see in the House of Commons today some very young people. Members of this party are concerned about ensuring that future governments of Canada will have the capacity to meet the needs of future generations. I am concerned that the "live for today" attitude of the NDP and other members of the opposition seems to neglect the future and neglect the ability of future governments to respond to social needs.

Assuming that we would do what the socialists recommend, spend out of control, as we have seen the socialist government in the province of Ontario do, what would he do for future generations in terms of meeting their needs?

Mr. Karpoff: I wish the member would go down to the food banks today and ask future generations, two-thirds of which are children in the Atlantic region, what their future holds for them. When they are hungry, when they are not able to go to school because they are not properly fed, is that the future you are talking about?

It is very nice to say to the person who cannot get into a university, who cannot afford to go to post-secondary education: "Your future looks good". Where is their future?

The deficit and debt are serious problems. They are problems that this government had the responsibility to deal with in 1984. It has shown, has demonstrated for eight consecutive years, that it is incompetent, that it cannot eradicate the deficit, that it cannot start to deal with the debt. The total debt in this country has gone from $160 billion to $420 billion. Even the Tories must understand all that is happening is that they are no longer paying their way, not quite as badly as the Liberals, but they have done nothing. They have not wiped out the deficit, they have not brought it under control, and they have simply off-loaded their responsibilities on to the provinces. They have simply off-loaded them on the poor.

What have they done? They have helped their corporate tax friends. They have given tax break after tax break to their corporate tax friends.

The fact is that the average Canadian family with an income between $25,000 and $75,000 per year is paying in real terms $1,800 more a year in taxes. Those earning over $100,000 are only paying about half of that in increased taxes.

This is the philosophy of this government. Do not talk to me about what you are doing for the future generation. You have put the future generation in debt and you have put it in debt hungry.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed hearing the hon. member speak about lowering interest rates and following the policies advocated by my leader. It was encouraging.

He also spoke in his speech about the virtues of taxation of corporations. I am sure he had in his mind the big bad banks. I wonder if he could tell us if it is still his party's policy to nationalize Canada's chartered banks.

Mr. Karpoff: I belong to one of the growing financial institutions in this country, the Surrey Metro Credit Union. It is now the second largest credit union in the country. It is community owned. It is a co-operative, it is socialist movement, the same as the Vancity Credit Union, which is also one of the biggest and fastest growing financial institutions.

At this point we have to bring in fair taxation. The national banks have not been paying their fair share of taxes. We in the New Democratic Party strongly believe in fair taxes.

I can assure the member that when we are the government after the next federal election we will bring in legislation to make sure that the banks and other multinational corporations pay their fair share of taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.33 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1.33 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I call on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to reassure the veterans of Canada that the benefits and programs his department provides will continue as long as there are needy and disabled Canadians who need them.

Seventy-five years ago the Prime Minister of Canada promised the veterans of World War I that they would be cared for by a grateful nation. Today there is fear among the veteran population that this government is planning to abandon them and abandon the department in the name of cost efficiency.

I understand that at least 250 positions at Veterans Affairs Canada will be declared surplus under the work force adjustment program in the coming year. I further understand that the department is undertaking joint studies with Health and Welfare about the future and about amalgamation.

It is time for the government and the minister to make a clear commitment to the veterans of Canada.

CHLOROFLUOROCARBONS

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the environment minister has chosen to follow my suggestion made last week in this House that Canada implement a ban on CFCs by 1995.

I remind the minister that it is Canada and not the provinces that must set regulations for CFC recovery. It is Canada that will negotiate changes to the Montreal protocol this coming November.

With alarming new evidence that the ozone layer is disappearing faster than anyone expected, we are in a state of environmental emergency. Now is the time for the federal government to bring in national standards for the recovery of CFCs.

Almost six months ago I suggested this government examine the CFC-sucking vampire units. With an estimated recovery market worth more than $2 billion, recovering used CFCs would create jobs in our failing economy as well as save the ozone and protect people's health.

This government has too little courage. Instead of allocating federal resources in Canadian technology that could be exported to the rest of the world, it takes timid baby steps when giant strides are necessary.

ST. CATHARINES

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the recent announcement by General Motors of job cuts was a severe blow to the people of St. Catharines.

The immediate reaction to the news was naturally one of anger, resentment and anxiety about the future of the city as well as a temptation to place blame for the situation. While understandable, these emotions are not going to help our community.

Within days of the announcement there was a meeting of business people, labour leaders and individuals from all levels of government representing the three main political parties. The tone of the meeting was one of commitment to co-operate in trying to find solutions to our economic situation.

It is unfortunate that it took a problem of this magnitude to get everyone to work together, but clearly that is how we will succeed.

St. Catharines has many significant assets, but easily the best is its people. I am confident the citizens of the garden city will prosper in the face of this setback. I know we will all continue to work together to ensure our future success.

BILL C-13

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, over the past four days, the Bloc Quebecois has been struggling to amend Bill C-13, which runs directly counter to Quebec's best interest.

Yesterday, the Quebec National Assembly passed a unanimous resolution condemning this bill. Today, Premier Bourassa, the Quebec Manufacturers' Association and the Quebec Chamber of Commerce are asking federal MPs from Quebec to kill this bill.

Here is a chance for the Conservative MPs from Quebec to fight for their homeland instead of for their party. They must refuse to destroy Quebec's economy and to personify domineering federalism.

FRASER RIVER DEBRIS CONTROL BOARD

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the commitment by the Department of Transport to continue federal funding of the Fraser River log trap located in the heart of my constituency.

Some 11 kilometres up the Fraser River from Agassiz in my riding of Fraser Valley East the log trap clears debris from the Fraser River ensuring the safety of river traffic downstream.

There was some concern that the federal commitment to this operation would lapse. I joined my B.C. colleagues and with much perseverance we persuaded the Department of Transport to reconsider its commitment to the Fraser River Debris Control Board. As a result, the $180,000 annual federal contribution to the Fraser River Debris Control Board will be maintained for the next five years.

The debris trap collects 100,000 cubic metres of debris each year and contributes to the bulk of the board's operations. I trust that this addresses any concerns as to the federal government's commitment to navigational safety on the Fraser River.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, how insensitive and incoherent has our immigration policy become? And how unreasonable the decisions of our department of immigration and its refugee determination board? Their decisions deal with people as just so many ciphers, and Canada's reputation for understanding and humanity is suffering as a result.

The plight of the Rees family is a case in point. Keran and Gale Rees have been ideal parents of an ideal Canadian family since their arrival in this country in June 1988. Keran became a valued part of the production team of CFM-TV, and Gale a nurse. Both are community minded volunteers. Four of their children are exemplary students as these letters of support indicate.

However their family's claim for refugee status has been denied four years later. Worse, the department has issued notices and made travel plans for all but the youngest member of the Rees family, a Canadian born two-year old. What does the minister propose to do to advance the interests of this young Canadian who will be deprived of his parents? Is it not time for the minister of immigration to become involved in the issue?

ISRAEL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, on March 18 yet another terrorist attack was carried out by enemies of Israel, this time against the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires. More than 11 people were killed and over 130 wounded.

Terrorist attacks such as this do not intimidate the Jewish people. They only serve to identify the perpetrators as inhuman cowards, consumed with blind sadistic malevolence.

The Jewish community and friends of the Jewish community once again feel the searing pain of racist acts of hate and once again experience a sense of revulsion and renewed solidarity against such acts and such people.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, for some time I and many other Canadians, including members of this House, have been concerned about the plight of Christine Lamont and David Spencer.

Recently the archbishop of Sao Paulo has written to the Canadian government, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, urging the minister to do that which is necessary in order for these two young people to be released from the terrible predicament they are in, and that is to make a formal request for their expulsion from Brazil.

The government has yet to do this. It is a strange situation where we have almost a consensus in Brazil, and particularly on the part of the church, that these people are innocent and they do not deserve what is being meted out to them in a foreign country. Yet it is their own government which refuses to act.

I hope the Prime Minister will intervene, as it has been suggested he might, and make sure that this expulsion order is given and given soon so that these young people might be returned to Canada.

VERY HIGH SPEED TRAIN

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec business community feels an act of faith is needed to make the construction and operation of a Quebec-Windsor very high speed railway line a reality and many are those who have acted already.

The office for the economic development of greater Quebec has been given the mandate to monitor this project closely. To this end, the office thought it would be advisable to join the very high speed train service benefits office to allow its members to gain access to strategic information. It will also encourage essential alliances for technology transfers, business linkage as well as the establishment of new firms to take advantage of the vitality of our region. It is with that in mind, that the Quebec urban community and the city of Quebec have decided to sponsor the very high speed train service benefits office. This project will be a determining factor in our social and economic development as we enter the 21st century.

PEACE BRIDGE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have received two letters re special clearance lanes and their success at the Peace Bridge in Fort Erie. The one from Mayor Teal in part reads:

• (1410)

> As spring break approaches, you will no doubt recall the grid lock situation that occurred on the bridge one year ago. The changes that were put in place in response to that event and to the traffic problems being experienced on the bridge have been extremely successful.

The second is from the bridge authority and reads:

> We would like to take this opportunity to thank you and the federal Government of Canada for their initiatives in instituting the "Special Lanes" at the Peace Bridge last year. From our perspective, the implementation and continued operation of the "Special Lanes" had a definite positive impact on the movement of traffic on our facility into Canada—From our perspective, the positive results continue to enhance the economy of the Town of Fort Erie and the Niagara Region.

COMMENTS OF MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, three months ago the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans made comments which were insulting and offensive to women at a fund-raising dinner on Prince Edward Island.

I, along with other groups and individuals from my province, wrote to the Prime Minister that month urging him to elicit an apology from the minister for the remarks. To date no response has been received.

Last week we acknowledged International Women's Day and the contributions women have made to our society. I feel the least the Prime Minister could do is to distance himself from the minister's comments and demand an apology.

To do less is to demonstrate that this Prime Minister is not prepared to demonstrate a serious commitment to ensuring that women are treated with dignity, respect and equality.

Let us see some leadership on this issue. Let us see if the message put forward by International Women's Day has actually been received by the government.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada is in the forefront of the battle against ozone depletion.

Last August the government launched a $25 million green plan initiative to accelerate the domestic regulatory control program. Canada has reduced its consumption of CFCs by 50 per cent since 1986 and is committed to eliminate their production and import into this country no later than 1997.

The government is also working with the provinces to develop a comprehensive national action plan to promote the conservation, recovery and recycling of ozone depleting chemicals. Also the government will provide Canadians regular updates on the status of the ozone layer and on implications for the level of the sun's ultraviolet rays.

PENSIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, there was a case in Winnipeg recently where a 58-year old woman was denied a survivor's benefit. Her husband lived with another woman for a year before he died.

The Department of National Health and Welfare ruled that the other woman is entitled to the pension. In this case the man's wife lived with him for 18 years and received nothing. There was no divorce.

Had this happened prior to 1987 and there were contesting applications, the minister of health could have made a judgment on such a situation. Now an individual only has to prove that he or she has lived with another person common law and be entitled to such a pension.

Surely there must be a fairer way of settling things. Not to do so would be a callous disregard this government has shown for Canadian families and this situation in particular.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as was announced earlier this week, Ontarians will soon enjoy a privilege previously known only in the west.

Starting in May, Ontarians will be able to purchase ethanol blend gasolines. Thanks to the forward looking partnership of Sunoco and United Co-Operatives of Ontario—you gotta love those co-operatives, Mr. Speaker—Ontarians will have a whole new market for some of their produce and Ontario consumers will be able to fuel their cars with same ethanol blends already labelled an "environmental choice" product at Mohawk Company pumps across the west.

Hundreds of thousands fewer tonnes of new carbon pulled up from underground and introduced into the biosphere every year and 30 per cent lower carbon monoxide emissions are the boon of ethanol fuels.

Congratulations, Sunoco and United Co-Ops of Ontario, and welcome to ethanol fuels, Ontarians.

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, Saturday, March 21 is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

In 1986, Prime Minister Mulroney announced that Canada would participate in the second decade to fight racism and racial discrimination. In 1989, the federal government launched its first national March 21 campaign.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of what my government has done and the leadership it has shown.

Together with police departments, businesses and unions, educators and academics, municipal or voluntary organizations, broadcasters and many others, we have begun the process of change so that one day, all Canadians can participate fully and on an equal footing in the life of our society, as the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all members of this House will agree with me that the sooner that day arrives, the happier and more prosperous all Canadians will be.

SYRIAN JEWS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in 1989 the world watched, tears of joy flowing, as the Berlin wall came tumbling down, bringing with it an end to 50 years of fear and oppression.

Now the world must turn its attention to others in need to a people who are tortured, imprisoned, humiliated and stripped of basic rights and freedoms, the Syrian Jews. Now we must bring down the walls of Syria and free the Syrian Jews from captivity.

President Hafez el-Assad is not immune to pressure. He must know that he can no longer hold 4,000 people hostage in their own country. Nor can he track their every move with secret police or imprison them without charge.

Let us send a clear message to our government that it must become a link in the armour against anti-Semitism. Our government must add its voice to an international choir, along with the governments of the United States, Japan, Britain, France, the whole world speaking together to Syria. Imagine how strong the voice will be.

We shall attain freedom for the Syrian Jews.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Today, the women of Canada are relieved, but not because of this government. For the past two years we have seen ministers of this government rise in their places and state unequivocally in this House that the silicone gel breast implant was a safe product. Yet time after time we in the opposition have brought forth the serious safety concerns of the scientific community and the women of Canada who have had these implants.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell this House today and finally explain why this government has never, never come forward to ban this product in either a preliminary or a final way?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this morning I circulated a press release which I think summarizes the government's position on the question from the beginning. If you allow me, I would like to read a paragraph which summarizes the government's position from the beginning as well:

[English]

"Our main priority remains to be the health of women who have this prosthesis. I have consistently stated that women who have this prosthesis should obtain the best possible medical and scientific information on the health and safety implications of these devices. The independent advisory committee on breast implants chaired by Dr. Cornelia Baynes —"

Mr. Dingwall: Don't be patronizing.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Could you listen when I have to deal with a serious issue to Canadians, please.

An hon. member: It's a long time coming.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. This is the lead question of the hon. member on behalf of the Loyal Opposition. The minister is responding. It is an important question or it would not be the lead question. I ask hon. members to allow the minister to respond.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. "The independent advisory committee on breast implants, chaired by Dr. Cornelia Baynes, which was established on February 17, 1992, will help us in making information available. Dow Corning's decision does not change the need for the critical information."

There are three categories of women that we have to serve. The first group is those who have had the breast implant and do not have any problems. If there is any problem, they should be referred to their doctors. Those who have problems with the breast implant should also go to their doctors and make a good decision in light of the information that they can share. The third one is the future of the breast implant. We have a moratorium. I said it will not be back on the market unless I have the assurance there is no problem. I believe my predecessor and I dealt with that issue the best we could. We are trying to do one thing and that is to help Canadian women to make the best decisions.

• (1420)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): To the same minister, Mr. Speaker. After years of repeated requests, the minister finally tabled some documents in the House two days ago. I find it very odd that excluded from the package were four key studies I had already obtained under Access to Information from his own department. I find this is bordering on deception. This is totally unacceptable to me and the members on this side of the House.

Will the minister re-examine the situation carefully and table the full and comprehensive set of documents before the end of this week?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what I said two days ago, and I repeat today, is that all documentation available in the Department of National Health and Welfare which is not protected as private information is available and will be available. If there are any documents that my colleague has that were not in the package, it could be that because those documents were already public they were not presented in the package.

I will repeat what I said. If there is any information available in the department which is not protected and I can make it available, I will. As I said, nothing has to be hidden and I never hide any information from Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the minister is embarrassed about this issue because it is a classic example of a government that has not protected the health of women and continues to put the health of women at risk.

Today in the United States, Dow Corning announced a plan of a $10 million fund to be set up to help the women of the United States, but said in its statement that there would not be a penny for the women of Canada. I ask the minister what specific action he intends to take today to go to the limit to sue Dow Corning to ensure that Canadian women are protected in this very important issue?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As usual, Mr. Speaker, the member for Hamilton East is wrong. Dow Corning in Canada said it will respect the commitment it made in terms of research.

Second, the member should know that any surgery or any operation requested by doctors would be covered by the Canadian Health Act. She knows that, but she wants to play politics.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Why, Mr. Speaker, should the Canadian health care system pay for a mistake by Dow Corning that was kept covered up for 20 years?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, further to the minister's meeting in February with the group called "I Know", he promised that he was ready to go as far as suing Dow Corning. I therefore ask the minister whether he is prepared to demand for Canadian women the same rights that were announced today for American women. Why a double standard for Canadian women?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton East has understood nothing, as usual. No action has yet been taken and she has already decided that the government and the health system would pay for it all. The provinces are responsible for applying the system. If they decide to negotiate reimbursement with Dow Corning, it will certainly be in the company's interest to reach agreement with the provinces concerned. But again, all the measures taken in the United States have been taken in Canada, except that the Americans do not have the system of universal health care that we have here in Canada. I am quite prepared, and we have already started to contact the provinces to ensure that this issue is treated equally.

The information about suing is false. I never made a commitment to Ms. Marsolais-Tardif—although you did not give her name, I am giving it—to prosecute any company whatever.

I said that I would help the "I Know" organization, if it needed help. That is all. That is the information.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the minister of health and welfare is not prepared to table the documents as the hon. member for Nepean suggested, maybe she would table them for Canadian women on his behalf.

In view of yet another company pulling out of the implant market, I reiterate my call for a judicial inquiry into health and welfare department of medical devices for its handling of the breast implant issue. In the face of the complete failure of leaving the testing of breast implants in the hands of manufacturers, will the minister assure Canadian women that no new implants will come on the Canadian market without government testing for their safety.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said already that those implants were not available on the Canadian market. I said too that before they could be back on the market, I would need to have the assurance that there is not even a little problem for Canadian women. I believe that is what Canadian women want to know.

Once again I refer to my colleague and my predecessor. At least I believe she knows what she is talking about. She knows very well. We have had conversations and I have said to her many times that I will not put in danger the health of women in terms of breast implants. That is what we are doing. That is what we will do.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. minister was not listening. I said new implants. Second, he has talked several times this afternoon about his concern for the health of Canadian women and he in fact consistently endangers the health of Canadian women by his lack of action.

What is the minister going to do for the 150,000 Canadian women who are left with unanswered questions about the safety of their implants, about the safety of their health. Will the minister meet and work with provincial ministers of health to ensure that women breast implantees have the kind of information and the kind of support they need to know they are safe or that they need medical help?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member asked me what I will do for the 150,000 women who have breast implants. I already said that we are trying to get the best information available through Dr. Cornelia Bayne's committee from the United States and Canada. They will report to me some time in April, and will provide all information they have in terms of the choice that women should make regarding the breast implants they already have, or for those who would like to have those implants.

In terms of the provinces, I have already had three meetings with the ministers from the provinces. On any request, I will do that again. I believe Canadian women know increasingly that I am doing what should be done to protect the health of Canadian women.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I really do not want to stand here and insult the minister by suggesting that I do not believe that he has done exactly what needs to be done for the health of these women.

Dow Corning not only admitted when the new president took over that there are some problems with these implants, but now Dow Corning has withdrawn the implants from the market and said it will consider recompense in the United States where women do not have access to a medical plan, and in Canada for any women who do not have protection. Dow Corning will give some recompense to those women for the cost of explantation.

I believe that Dow Corning should repay the Canadian medicare system for any costs associated with explantation or difficulties as a result of the implants. Will the minister discuss with the provincial ministers the requirement of Dow Corning and Surgitek to reimburse Canada's medicare system for any costs incurred because of failed implants or for explantation?

• (1430)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member knows that unlike what is going on in the United States, we have a medical system in Canada which pays for all costs relating to an operation requested by a doctor. It is what we will do for those who believe that with the agreement of the doctor the breast implant operation has to take place.

In the future, any negotiations with Dow Corning will have to be made with the provinces. It cannot be at the federal level because we do not provide the money.

Ms. Copps: Sue them. Who put it on the market?

Ms. Langan: But you will not initiate it.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): If the provinces want co-operation and terms from the federal level for discussions with the companies, of course we will be there. But we will wait, if she wants, for this reality. It is not here yet but we will follow the case. The provinces have already said to me that in many cases they want to collaborate. This is exactly what we will do.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

For months we have been asking the government about developments in the free trade talks between Canada, the United States and Mexico, and we have yet to get an answer. We do not know the government's objectives. We do not know whether the government has done any impact studies and we do not yet know what the Canadian or North American content for cars will be.

I wish the minister would tell me what he has to hide from Canadians. Don't Canadians have a right to know about developments in a process that will have a tremendous impact on their economic well-being?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is not able to get to committee meetings. I discussed the objectives of the Government of Canada at a committee meeting on international trade two or three weeks ago.

This afternoon we have offered to his trade critic the opportunity to come to a briefing by the chief negotiator of the North American free trade negotiations, to provide access to the text, as well as a two to three hour briefing on the specific elements of the text.

My hon. friend is very well aware that we have provided briefings on an ongoing basis to members of the advisory groups involved. They have provided us as well as the provinces, with advice on the trade negotiations.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we know that the Prime Minister is talking this afternoon with the Wall Street Journal.

I know the press will ask him about this, because it is a very important topic in the United States at this moment. What will be the treaty with Mexico and Canada on free trade? I would like to know from the minister if Canadians will be obliged to read in the Wall Street Journal what will be going on tomorrow rather than knowing from this government. We want to get the facts to the Canadian people.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have been as open with Canadians as the United States government is with Americans.

Mr. Barrett: Nonsense and you know it. Read Bosley's report.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend at the other end says nonsense. Let me read what Mr. Gephardt, the majority leader of the House of Representatives said in a letter to Mrs. Hills. "While the U.S. negotiated position and documents have been provided to Canadian and Mexican negotiators, the public is being—that is the U.S. public—is being kept in the dark". Congress is asking for the same information as members on the other side are asking.

The simple facts are that we are not going to undermine our national negotiating position and we are not going to provide to members of the public on an open basis with matters which are subject of commercial confidentiality. We will continue to do the briefings on the basis I have offered to the House committee. That offer still stands. It is unfortunate that the members of the opposition have put politics ahead of their country's national interests.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, for two days in a row the Minister for International Trade has said that he would not offer commercially confidential information about the free trade negotiations. No one is asking for such information. No one is seeking commercially confidential information.

What Canadians want to know is what this government's minimal objectives are in these negotiations. For example, the existing United States-Canada free trade agreement has shown itself to be flawed because there is no definition of subsidies. Will this government be part of a trilateral agreement which does not include a subsidies code and which does not include a prompt and binding dispute settlement mechanism? That is the sort of question we want answered, not whether it is commercially confidential information.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I responded to that type of question quite precisely. The question of subsidies is the subject right now of negotiations under the multilateral trade negotiations. We have made it very clear it is the result of that negotiation that we will apply, both to the free trade agreement with the United States as well if we have one with Mexico, to the Mexican negotiations.

As far as the dispute settlement mechanism is concerned, my hon. friend is very well aware it was absolutely critical to our going through with the free trade agreement with the United States and the maintenance of that, on a binding basis, as my friend has reminded us, is also absolutely critical to a North American free trade negotiation.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The minister knows that those answers are the sort of questions which should be answered in committee in an open discussion and not in some sort of confidential briefing that is the best that the minister can apparently offer.

The Canadian people have many other questions that this government has failed to answer. Other countries, for example, Chile and Costa Rica, want to be part of a free trade agreement in the western hemisphere. Canadians will want to know whether it is one of the objectives of this government to open the way for other western hemisphere countries to join the agreement. Specifically, is this government seeking an accession clause in the final agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend is asking some very specific questions and, if I might say so, they are good questions. It is unfortunate his colleagues in the committee meeting I was at were braying like donkeys and not asking the sort of questions which went anything like to the point of the objectives of the negotiations that my hon. friend is trying to do today. I compliment him on that.

As far as the question of accession, we have made it clear that this is a matter we think should be discussed on a very careful basis with the Americans and the Mexicans. Precisely where we are going to end up on that particular issue I cannot say at this point, but I would be happy to go into it in more detail in the committee if he wishes to.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister who will have noted that Helmut Kohl is flying to Washington tomorrow to discuss the German position at the renewed GATT discussions.

Five weeks have passed since the Prime Minister was instructed unanimously by this House to hold similar meetings with Presidents Bush and Delore in order to secure their support for a clarified and strengthed article XI(2)(c)(i) at the GATT. Can he tell us what arrangements our Prime Minister has made to comply with that request?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The Prime Minister, as the House knows and as farm leadership knows, has had discussions with international leaders, with Chancellor Kohl, with Prime Minister Major, with Prime Minister Mitterrand, with President Delore and with President Bush, putting forward Canada's position.

The Prime Minister spoke to Chancellor Kohl before his meeting this weekend with President Bush, putting forward Canada's position and attempting to garner support from Chancellor Kohl for Canada's position. We will continue to do that. It is a matter of the timing as to when it would best serve the interests of Canada that the Prime Minister take further steps, but the Prime Minister was deeply involved in this process well before the House instructed him. He was involved in the interests of Canadian agriculture over the whole round of GATT for the last five years.

• (1440)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would table in the House the dates of the meetings that he says occurred with President Bush and President Delors.

Mike Gifford, who was our senior negotiator at the GATT talks told the publication Ontario Farmer that while Canada has not offered tariff equivalents for the supply managed industries, Canada's tabled offer has followed the Dunkel paper.

Since the Dunkel report does not mention anything about article XI(2)(c)(i), how is supply management protected with the government's position?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is coming into the debate a little late.

We informed the supply management farm leaders, we informed the SAGIT, which advises the government, that when Canada tabled our access along with other countries, we would be following the Dunkel text with the exception of those industries which were supply managed.

We informed them that in fact we would be tabling no tariff equivalents for supply management but that we would in turn be tabling Canada's position which is to have supply management recognized, article XI recognized and operational or clarified and strengthened. We tabled that as Canada's position.

We have followed the Dunkel text with that exception. That was knowledge that was given to the SAGIT and supported by the SAGIT.

TRADE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Considering the unprecedented loss of jobs following the signing of the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States, can the minister give this House the assurance that his government has completed the requisite impact studies to prove that an agreement with Mexico will not have the same disastrous consequences for Canada? Furthermore, is he prepared to publish those studies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just draw my friend's attention to the fact that our exports are up over $5 billion since we entered into the free trade agreement.

Our trade surplus with the United States is up about 10 per cent. The net flows of foreign direct investment have moved from a negative position of $2.5 billion to a net positive of about $5 billion or swinging $7.5 billion, all of which are helping this economy.

My hon. friend is cherry picking statistics when he talks about job loss. He is not looking at the net bottom line of what the positive benefits of this agreement are. As far as the impacts are concerned, I have commented on the impacts on a number of occasions.

We have two-way trade with Mexico of $2.5 billion. With the United States, it is over $200 billion. If all trade is added in, it is $256 billion, so there is a tremendous difference. Therefore, the impact of different industries are considerably less than any impact that would have to occur with the free trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot deny the thousands of job losses that have occurred by firms in Canada moving south of the border.

Surely Canadians have a right to know that they will not be sold down the river if Canada embarks upon a North American free trade agreement. Has his department completed the impact studies on the sectoral effects of a NAFTA agreement? Will he make those impact studies public? Will he commit his government to ensuring that this time adequate adjustment provisions are in place for Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my friend again that some 70 per cent of the exports that come from Mexico into Canada come here free of duty already. There will not be the impact that my hon. friend is talking about.

My friend also talks about the job loss that he knows is directly caused by the free trade agreement. What any reasonable economist will tell you today is that there is a recession, there is adjustment related to free trade, there is adjustment related to change that is going on internationally that is affecting all countries.

It is this combination of things that is affecting our economy today. We are going through a period that is unprecedented in our history. For my hon. friend to draw these simplistic conclusions is misleading the Canadian public.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade, and it will be frank and forthright.

Will the government promise not to sign a North American free trade agreement, in the absence of parallel agreements that oblige all three countries to have common standards for the environment and health and safety in the workplace?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, today in Vancouver, at a meeting of the Canadian Council of Environment Ministers, the Mexican deputy minister responsible for the environment was asked to speak on the subject of a possible environmental agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States.

He will tell the ministers today what he has already told me several times, namely, that in Mexico they have environmental standards similar to those we have in Canada, but without the same emphasis on enforcement.

Furthermore, he will inform them of the fact that on February 25, the U.S. Government and the Mexican Government announced a special initiative targeted to the Mexican-U.S. border area. The Mexicans will spend over $450 million in the next three years, while the Americans will also invest in various infrastructures.

In concluding, I would like to say that one of the positive results of this potential agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States will be to ensure that in all three countries, which means the entire continent, the environment comes out the winner.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again to the Minister for International Trade.

What the minister's colleague has told us is that the Mexicans have stated publicly what their objectives are and the Americans have stated publicly what their objectives are. What we are asking in this House is would this government tell the Canadian people what its objectives are?

First of all, I am asking the Canadian minister for his objectives. Will the NAFTA agreement contain threshold provisions specifically geared to the enforcement of a common set of environmental standards and a common set of work place safety and security standards for Canadian workers?

Second, will violation of these standards constitute unfair trade practices?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was in this House that we stated what our objectives were for environmental matters in relation to the free trade agreement.

If my hon. friend would take the time, we will take him through exactly what those are. What my colleague has said is that we, on a parallel basis with the free trade agreement negotiations, embarked on a number of discussions on ways that we can assist the Mexicans with the enforcement of what are widely regarded as very good standards of environmental protection. Their problems are enforcement.

So as my colleague and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have announced, we are already proceeding on an agreement and this will proceed. That is one of a number of things that we have done on the environmental side.

I would be happy to sit down, as I know my colleague would, to make sure that my hon. friend is well aware of everything that we are doing on the environmental side.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The export tax imposed on tobacco products has caused great concern for the tobacco farmers in my riding, the riding of my colleague, the member for Oxford, and the riding of the member for Haldimand—Norfolk. At a time when farmers should be concerned about seeding their crops, many are wondering if they will have a market to sell to at harvest time.

While this measure was implemented to counter smuggling of tobacco products, farmers in my riding fear that this tax will put them and not the smugglers out of business.

Emotions are running high on this issue. Can the minister tell me what efforts the government has made to ensure that Canadian tobacco farmers will have a market for their 1992 crop?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern and the concern of other hon. members. I particularly appreciate the fact that he and other members have made representations to me.

As the member indicated, the export tax was put in place to curtail the smuggling and the illegal entry of Canadian cigarettes into Canada. I can assure the hon. member that it was never the intention of the export tax to be applied to legitimate exports of tobacco products into other countries. I can assure the hon. member that is the case and that is the intention. He can also assure tobacco farmers that the export tax was aimed at containing and smuggling and not applied to bona fide legitimate exports of tobacco products.

• (1450)

I can tell the hon. member that discussions are ongoing with the tobacco industry and I am satisfied that we will be able to resolve it in a manner satisfactory to the producers.

POVERTY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The recession continues to take the toll on the most disadvantaged Canadians, those who are unemployed and who are relying on public assistance.

This morning a report out of Nova Scotia documents that municipal welfare offices often arbitrarily disqualify applicants and violate the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan. Further, welfare rates for single people vary from 61 per cent of the poverty level to only 30 per cent of the poverty level.

Will the minister meet immediately with officials of the province of Nova Scotia to ensure that they comply with the Canada Assistance Plan and stop the arbitrary disqualification of people who need necessary public assistance?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was informed about the matter my friend has raised. It has been raised in other instances. The Department of National Health and Welfare is investigating the matter. Of course, all the provinces have to comply with the rules of the Canada Assistance Plan. If there is a problem, Nova Scotia will have to be corrected.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): My supplementary question is to the same minister.

It is now reported that two thirds of all recipients of food bank services in Atlantic Canada are teenagers or children. What action is this government intending to take to see that children in this country receive adequate assistance and are not dependent on charity and food banks?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday and the day before that we all deplore the fact that children particularly have to count on food banks to be fed.

Having said that, I believe the last package of child benefits we put forward, particularly for low-income workers will help and will relieve those families. Maybe it will not be able to do all my friend asks for, but there is a real willingness to do the best we can to relieve those people.

In light of the capacity we have to improve the economy we will be able to put more resources to the services of those people.

GENERAL MOTORS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

To the obvious disappointment of the president of local 222 of the Canadian Auto Workers, General Motors employees in Oshawa voted yesterday to reject a request from the company which would have made that facility more competitive.

Can the minister tell the house how serious he considers this action to be and if he will ask CAW boss Bob White to discuss other ways of maintaining the viability of these 4,000 jobs?

Mr. Speaker: The minister may answer if he wishes, but the question is not directed to the administration of government. It is out of order.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to say that the matter of GM Oshawa and the difficulties it is going through now in terms of the discussions it is having with Detroit on the future of the plant is something that is very, very much a matter of concern to the government.

I have spoken to Mr. Peapples, I have spoken to Bob White and other union leaders in Oshawa. As well, I visited with Mr. Stempel in Detroit.

There is a difference of opinion between the union and the company. I hope that they will be able to resolve this in a way to support the ongoing operations of the company's plant in Oshawa.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was the minister stating his government's position when he said, and I quote the Canadian Press here: "Even if they have been asked to, francophones outside Quebec will not take part in the constitutional talks as natives will. There are a million Italians, but they do not ask for anything."

In his statement, the minister makes French Canadians and Acadians feel they are no more than one group among many others. In so doing, he wipes away an historical national policy and renounces linguistic duality. I ask him this: Was he quoted accurately?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as a rule I do not comment on newspaper articles and today is no exception. I think that the House is a great forum and I take this opportunity to reiterate my opinion on that subject.

My position has not changed since the days when I was Secretary of State responsible for the issue of francophones outside Quebec for one year. The federal government is and will continue to be, responsible for the protection of all linguistic minorities in Canada. We have spent a lot of money on this and will continue in the future.

With regard to their participation in the constitutional talks, what I said, was that the number of people they represent does not constitute, in my mind, a criterion on which to decide whether or not a certain group should be represented, but rather that the francophone minority being represented though governments, with the Quebec government representing the francophone majority, while the federal government is responsible for the francophone minority, the representation of native groups is based on their existence as a founding nation.

I have total respect for francophones outside Quebec, and this government continues and will continue in the future to protect their interests.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of respect and affection for my Italian fellow citizens, but that is beside the point. I am not talking about minority language groups. I am talking about the Canadian duality.

I want the hon. minister to tell me whether he is stating government policy or not when he portrays the French Canadian community as nothing more than a minority like any other minority. I put the question to him.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said earlier. The francophone minority outside Quebec is part of one of this country's three founding nations, namely the francophone community, the majority of which is represented by the Quebec government, and the minority by the government of Canada.

That is my position and it reflects that of the government on this issue. The question was about representation at the constitutional table, and my answer was that it was not a matter of numbers. But I will say again, that I never comment on newspaper articles, and that is not about to change.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for exceptionally allowing a second supplementary question.

The question of my colleague, who is probably the greatest expert in this House on such issues, was to find out from the minister whether or not he was misquoted. If he was, it is easy, let him tell us; if he does not believe he was misquoted, let him say so. But given the emotions aroused, there is enough emotion in this country and in my province, which is also his. This has nothing to do with our respect and friendship for our friends of Italian origin.

We want to know if from now on the French Canadian community is to be considered as one minority among many others. That is what my colleague asked. This article stirred emotions and the minister must tell us whether or not it represents his views and that will allay our concerns about it.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat what I said before.

The French-speaking community, whether it is in Quebec or not, is one of the founding peoples of this country. As such, it has a special status compared to other communities which are not called founding nations of Canada. As a majority, it is represented by the Government of Quebec in Quebec and as a minority, by the Government of Canada in the other provinces. Therefore it is up to the Government of Canada to fulfil that responsibility and role in the constitutional discussions and that is the position which I defended.

I have a great deal of respect for my colleague, who rarely asks questions and when he does, it is because he has some concern, I think. Therefore I repeat as honestly as I can that the French-speaking community, wherever it is, is a founding people of this country and as such, depending on its situation, must be defended accordingly. That is exactly what I did, and I will continue to do so, Mr. Speaker.

AIR ONTARIO

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Just over three years have passed since the tragic Air Ontario crash at Dryden, Ontario. The government has had the report of the commission of inquiry in its possession since last week.

Why has the government not tabled this report in the House of Commons? What is it that the government is trying to hide from the people of Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): We have nothing to hide, Mr. Speaker. The document will be officially presented to the government within the next few days. As soon as it is presented to the government by Judge Moshansky it will be tabled in this House.

LONDON AIRPORT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport.

The minister should know that London airport has been designated to be annexed by the city of London from West Nissouri township as outlined in the dictum issued by the provincial minister of municipal affairs to the arbitrator. This airport represents 28 per cent of the revenue of West Nissouri.

What involvement did the federal Minister of Transport have in this provincial decision? Will the minister guarantee to the people of London the future safety and effective operation of this federal airport?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate the concern of the hon. member. I sympathize as an ex-municipal person with the problems that it is presenting to his municipality. But I am sure the member acknowledges that this matter is strictly a municipal-provincial jurisdiction.

The Government of Canada is responsible for the airport lands and for the safety on and outside the airport. I am afraid that he must address his concern to the province and the municipality that are responsible for municipal boundaries.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Dr. Gyorgy Szabad, President of the National Assembly of Hungary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw the attention of members to the presence in the gallery of the Committee on Regional Planning, Building and Urban Development of the Bundestag.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINTS OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Points of Order

During an answer to a question in the House today the Minister for International Trade referred to and quoted from a letter from Senator Gephardt. Under the rules of this House it is my understanding that a minister quoting from a document is obliged to table such a document, and I make that request through you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will pass on the representation from my hon. friend.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can settle this matter. I think what the hon. government House leader is saying is that he will assure it is brought to the minister's attention. The hon. member has a completely valid point of order.

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR CARIBOO—CHILCOTIN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from page 8181 of Hansard and a statement made by the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin which is both false and dishonest.

It states, and I quote, that I had been—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute, just a minute. Is there any need to rise on a point of order to make an accusation like that against another hon. member? I cannot accept that.

The hon. member for Skeena may want to put it in another way and, if he does, I will accept it. But that is a straight allegation of dishonesty and I think it has to be withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: I am perfectly prepared to withdraw that, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the hon. member who made the following statement about me would do the same. Previous Speakers have ruled that personal attacks upon the person of another member are inappropriate and have ruled them out of order. The hon. member said, and I quote, that I had been "systematically betraying and slandering the B.C. share groups". I would ask that you rule on that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I appreciate the fact the hon. member for Skeena withdrew the offensive comment.

I would ask the hon. member to let me look at the statement to which he refers and I shall consider it. If necessary, I will call upon another hon. member, but I shall come back and I shall rule upon it.

PARTY FUNDRAISING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I responded to a statement by the member from the Reform Party and I quoted from a document which relates to the B.C. party's fundraising which includes wills, and insurance policies.

I have the complete document and with the permission of the House, I would like to table it at this time. It will prove that we do not ask for political tax credits to be used to pay for any premiums.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asks for permission to table the document. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question to the government House leader is for the business for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday, and as far as he can see in terms of next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, with the hopeful completion of second reading stage of Bill C-60 today, it would be my intention tomorrow to call Bill C-52, an act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory at second reading, followed by Bill C-64, the Northwest Territories Act, for all three stages.

On Monday, we will be proceeding with the report and third reading stages of Bill C-61, an act to provide for borrowing authority for the 1992 fiscal year and on Tuesday, I would hope to call an allotted day.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I make this observation as a representation to the government House leader. Certain press reports have indicated that a move is afoot with the government in terms of denying or if you will, doing away with annual parliamentary reports being tabled in the House of Commons.

The minister will well know that would require, in many instances, an amendment to the particular statute for that department. Where there is no particular statute in play other than the traditions and the customs of this House, I am wondering if the minister would take that as representation and come back to the House. Perhaps I could share with him the article in which it was printed in order to clarify any misunderstandings that may exist.

Mr. Andre: As an experienced politician, the hon. member knows that one ought not to take everything in print as gospel. I do not know of any such rumour, but as the hon. member quite rightly points out, many of the requirements for annual reports to Parliament arise out of the specific pieces of legislation which create the mandate of the agencies and so on whose annual reports are required to be tabled.

It would certainly take a bill of this House to undertake that kind of move. It might possibly be that somewhere within government there are officials looking at the cost benefit of those kinds of expenditures and so on. Certainly, before the government would ever contemplate doing something like that, we would want to have discussions with the other side of the aisle.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my final question to the government House leader is: Can he indicate to the House whether or not there is any intention of the government of Canada to lay upon the table a comprehensive report with regard to the Beaudoin—Dobbie report which was a special joint committee? Is there an intention to table a report before the House rises in June?

Mr. Andre: Subject to correction, I believe the government needs to respond in some fashion. Obviously, given other events that have occurred and the discussions going on and the meetings with provinces, et cetera, the nature of the report will undoubtedly be affected by those discussions. But we will certainly meet the commitment, if it exists and I think it does, that we need some sort of report. In the meantime, we will get progress on these constitutional discussions and the contents of that report will not be as significant or matter as much.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I abstained from voting, but I wish to say that I think that the environment, which is a split jurisdiction with federal primacy, must remain so, as was recommended in our report. However, at this stage of the constitutional negotiations, I consider this bill to be an irritant and inappropriate at this time.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I believe that a member who is opposed to a bill must vote against it and not abstain.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may believe it but it is not a rule.

Mr. Della Noce: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise in this House to ask you where is Lucien, the father of this bill?

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am somewhat disappointed to be standing in this House once again to speak against the latest government budget, in particular when it comes to the transfer payments to the provinces.

The reason I say that is, as you know Mr. Speaker, if we are to follow the trend and look at the graphs as they relate to transfer payments for both post-secondary and health, by the year 2004 there will be no money going from the federal government to the provinces in the areas of post-secondary education and medicare.

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker, as you probably know, the issues of medicare and education have been identified by the Canadian people as the two most important issues and the issues that are closest to their hearts. The reason is because one of those issues, the question of education, deals with the future of Canadians and the other issue deals with their very existence, the issue of health and health care.

On the subject of education per se, Canada has spent perhaps more than any other country in the world. As a matter of fact, we spend approximately $50 billion on education. That includes all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal.

When we look at the return on that investment, unfortunately we find it simply is not there. At no time has one level of government taken full control over the issue of education and rightly so because the question of education has always been a joint venture, a partnership between all the different levels of government. They have come together on this issue. The federal government deals with the transfer payments for education. It spends money on education through transfer payments and the provinces match those funds. From time to time they spend more and sometimes they spend less. The municipalities deal with questions of education at the primary and secondary level.

When one of those partners who is fully responsible knows full well that our education system is not meeting the needs, when one of those partners backs off, it really comes as a disappointment to the other partners. Like any other partnership, when one of the partners is not fulfilling his or her commitment, the partnership starts falling apart. That is exactly what is happening here in the area of education. More and more the federal government is backing away from its responsibility in the field of education.

There are two segments to it. First, historically when the federal government was investing money in the area of education in terms of transfer payments, it was giving that money to the provinces which in some cases were not spending that money on education. They were spending it on other issues. That was one problem. In the past the federal government should have told the provinces that every dollar it was giving to education, it wanted to make sure that dollar was spent on education. It did not do so. As a result of that we have seen a deterioration in terms of investment at the provincial level in the areas of education.

At the present time, not only is the federal government not telling the provinces how it wants them to spend the money when it comes to education, the federal government is backing off on its commitment. Therefore, we are seeing less and less government funds going into the area of education.

That means that over the next decade or so, about 65 per cent of all jobs that will be created in Canada will require at least a grade 12 education. We are going to see a situation where we have less and less people who are equipped to enter the work force and be fully productive in our society.

Why do I say this? The statistics speak for themselves. Right now there is over a 30 per cent dropout rate at the post-secondary education level. In other words, one out of every three youths does not finish high school for whatever reason. That is one cause for alarm.

The other cause for alarm is the terrible question of illiteracy. The illiteracy rate here in Canada is extremely high. Approximately 38 per cent of Canadians are functionally illiterate. Compare that to a country such as Japan which has an illiteracy rate of about 5 per cent or to Germany which has an illiteracy rate of approximately 12 per cent or so. The conclusion is that there is something fundamentally wrong in terms of our society and how we deal with the question of illiteracy and the question of education.

It is interesting to know that not only is the question of education so important and so alarming when we look at the statistics, but at the same time, it is important when we look at the percentage of unemployed people. For ask instance, it has been found that if we have a group of people who have university degrees, we are likely to find that the unemployment rate is something around 10 per cent, which is in line with the national statistics. However, when we look at people who have a high school level of education, we find that the percentage of unemployment is somewhere around 16 per cent to 18 per cent. When we look at the lower end of the scale, i.e., people who do not have a high school education, the percentage of unemployment in that particular segment of the population is somewhere around 24 per cent or 25 per cent.

It is not really difficult to see the correlation between a good education and good jobs. The more highly educated the work force or the population is, the better jobs they will get and the less unemployment we will find.

Having said all of that, there is also a lot to say about the health of the population. If a student, regardless of his or her age, goes to school hungry, it is highly unlikely he or she will learn as much as other children might learn if his or her stomach is full. The reason I say this is because we are finding more and more in schools all across the country that we have children who are going to school hungry.

That brings me to the second segment of my discussion and that is the transfer payments relating to health care, social assistance programs, social services and everything else. Every time the federal government cuts a dollar from the transfer payments to the provinces, do you know who feels it? The child on the street feels it. It is because the provinces in turn unload part of their responsibilities on to the municipalities. By unloading part of their responsibilities on to the municipalities, we are finding that more and more municipalities are unloading their responsibilities on to charitable organizations, non-profit organizations, church groups and special interest groups.

As a result of that, every level of government seems to be passing on its responsibility to someone else. Everything nowadays is falling on the school system and on the backs of the teachers in particular. Our teachers are now finding themselves as not only being teachers but also social workers, nurses, family planners, psychologists and food bank operators. In many of the urban centres in our society that is the kind of thing we are seeing on a daily basis.

What that tells me is that not only are we failing to do our job in the most effective way when it comes to dealing with the question of education, but we are also not providing the tools necessary for the people to do the work. We are not providing them with the necessary support that they deserve and they need.

While this particular budget per se did not specifically speak in terms of transfer payments, what we have seen in a way is a continuation of previous budgets. If we were to look at the budget of last year and the year before, the same thing happened.

What we are seeing is a decline on a regular basis in the area of transfer payments to the provinces. Those cuts are going to affect provinces such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

That brings me to the province of Ontario. Everything functions from a tax base. Everything is a function of the tax base. Not only in this province do we see that the transfer payments from the federal government are diminishing, but we also see the tax base shrinking.

Simply put, this province has been hit perhaps more than any other province when it comes to the shrinkage of its industry. It is partially because of the unfortunate policies of the government in the province of Ontario that does not take into consideration the need for business in order to survive, to provide jobs and employment. It is also because of the unfortunate recession that has hit at a most inappropriate time.

Looking at those two ends one asks: What can be done? Every time the provinces, the municipalities, the school system or any segment of our society fails the people, we as the federal government have the mandate to step in.

That is the thing that makes us so different as Canadians. We always seem to be on the lookout for those who need our help and assistance. I say this because we do have a crisis situation in our communities. We have a lot of children going to school hungry, people lining up in front of churches and food banks. There are a lot of people who lower their heads and look to charitable organizations for services and so on.

Seeing those kinds of situations, I cannot help but think that we must be doing something wrong. Somebody somewhere somehow in our society is doing something wrong. We as a federal government have the responsibility to take care of our people. We have to find out which level of government is not doing its work.

If we are saying that this government is doing a great job and putting the fundamentals in place and making sure that we have all of the special rules and laws that businesses might need in order to survive, then something else must be broken. It is up to this government to step in and find out what it really is that is broken.

When I look at what the government is doing in the area of transfer payments for education, I would say that the federal government is perhaps more guilty than the provinces, more guilty than the municipalities, more guilty than anyone else. In a way it is the main controller. It is the one sending the signals.

When the federal government sends the signal to the provinces by cutting transfer payments, surely the provinces are going to cut the transfer payments to the municipalities in the areas of education, social services and everything else.

As you can see, it is one problem that has triggered a series of other problems. If we are really serious about moving toward the future and creating a future for our children that is prosperous and good, that is maintained and contained, I suggest that we have to look at the fundamentals.

Those fundamentals are the investment in the futures of those people in the areas of education and health care. I cannot say enough on that. In particular, day after day we see people lining up in front of food banks and churches, people turning to special interest groups to get the support that they deserve and need.

With that I want to end with the statement that the government has a responsibility not only to reinstate those transfer payments, but also to make sure those transfer payments are increased with the cost of living as well as with the rate of inflation.

This is an important subject and I would like to bring to the attention of the House that unless we invest in the area of education there is no way we can solve our other problems. Unless we invest and combat illiteracy there is no way we can solve our other problems.

It does not matter whether we talk about unemployment, lack of productivity, lack of business, whatever. It does not matter how you slice it. The answer to all of that is education and education and education.

There is no question about it. If we have a properly educated workforce we can deal with just about anything. The pressure on our social programs will ease. The pressure on our health care system will ease. Political pressure will ease. All of those pressures seen on a daily basis will ease off.

Simply put, with an educated population we can do miracles. That will not only put Canada in the best position to be on the leading edge in the world community, but it will also ensure that Canada will remain on that leading edge.

I was watching a program about a week or so ago on television. It was on The Journal I think. The president of one of the Asian republics was asked about the difference between Canada and Singapore, or one of those countries and to compare the difference between North Americans and the Asian population. He used the correlation that the people in his country are like a high compression engine, while the workforce in North America is like a low compression engine.

I thought that correlation between the two was really interesting. If anything he was giving us a signal that while we might be great at creation and great at coming up with good new ideas, what is needed to be done is to streamline the system and make it efficient in order to improve the area of productivity.

I began by saying the only way to improve productivity is by increasing investment in education. What we are seeing right now is a lack of investment in the area of education.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The five hours of debate are now expired. The length of speeches are now maximum 10 minutes without a question and comment period.

Mr. Blaikie: Do we still have questions and comments, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do you have a question?

Mr. Blaikie: I was going to ask the member a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona for a question or comment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the member has dwelt at some length on all the social policy questions that attend the whole question of transfer payments to the provinces, et cetera, and the way in which the federal government is cutting back on the provinces.

The member only came to this House in 1988 and I wonder if he is aware that the first unilateral cutback in federal transfer payments to the provinces happened under a Liberal government in 1982.

One of the things that has always disturbed me, amused me, and irritated me at times, is the fact that this trend toward the unilateral reduction of federal commitment in cost-sharing programs began under a Liberal government.

At the time the Conservative Party, when it was in opposition, railed against this unilateral violation of the federal-provincial agreement. It was thought to be a heinous act against co-operative federalism and, of course, it was. The only thing is that as soon as it came into power, no sooner than had it been in power, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, the member for Provencher, one of his first acts was to unilaterally reduce EPF.

• (1600)

So I find it odd that Liberals and Conservatives should go at each other in this way when both are guilty of this, albeit the Conservatives, if you want to look at the world numerically, are more guilty in the sense that they have done it more often and that they have done it more severely in the sense that doing it more often adds up.

The fact of the matter is that the principle of the federal government unilaterally reducing federal transfer payments to the provinces was one established by the Liberal Minister of Finance, who now sits in the other place and who shall go unnamed.

Perhaps the Liberal Party has changed its mind. Perhaps it has repented of its earlier disposition toward federal-provincial programs. If that is so, we would like to see a confession, some repentance and then the member could speak freely about this new-found approach by the Liberal Party on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to dwell on the past, but I want to talk about the present, the province of Ontario for example. I do not want to go back as far as 1981 or 1982 because it does not matter how far back I go, I probably would not find that we have ever had a socialist government at the federal level to compare the different governments and what they have done.

I can say this. The NDP government in Ontario is one government I can speak about because only just a year or so ago we had an election. It promised to increase funding for education by around 60 per cent. What it has done is it has increased tuition fees time after time after time after time. It has promised to give the people of Ontario public automobile insurance. And it reneged on that. I hate to do this, but he put me in a very awkward position and I have only to compare apples and apples.

What I cannot understand is that in the province of Ontario, especially in this particular region, hospitals are closing beds at a time when we have people on waiting lists for operations. Looking at those two areas where the hon. member is blaming some action that was taken by a former government in the 1980s or 1970s or 1960s, I want to bring to his attention something that happened as recently as two months ago where in the province of Ontario hospitals closed beds.

Surely the hon. member is not going to be able to defend the action of the NDP government in Ontario when it comes to health care and health care commitment, nor is he going to be able to defend the action of the province of Ontario when it comes to education.

I want to say this for the record. When the Prime Minister of this government made public his initiative on learning well, living well and the need for national objectives and so on in the area of education, that was something which my party supported wholeheartedly, the notion of national objectives for education and everything else.

Out of all the provinces in Canada, which province do you think was out in full force to oppose any kind of a national dialogue on the question of education? Guess. It was the province of Ontario.

The record speaks for itself. This is the only government we can talk about in terms of its track record.

One final word for the record, take the deficit as another example. We have a deficit let us say on an annual basis which is close to about $30 billion. Compare that to the province of Ontario. In one year, it jacked up the deficit to $11.5 billion which, per capita, probably is the highest deficit of any other state anywhere in North America.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I just want the member's reaction to this point. The only thing more outrageous than what he just said was the record of the previous Liberal government in Ontario. This was a world record. In a matter of six weeks, not a year, it took the province of Ontario with its treasurer who said that there was a surplus and that surplus became a $225 million deficit. Figure that one out.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the difference between a deficit of $30 billion and a deficit of $11 billion. Certainly they cannot blame the former Liberal Government of Ontario, which I am not defending here, for a deficit of $700 million and then turn around and incur a deficit of $11.5 billion.

Day after day after day we are hearing of closure after closure after closure. What is the province of Ontario doing about that? The NDP premier of Ontario went on national television to tell the people: "I want to hear your views about what I should be doing". My God, any one of the constituents in my riding of Ottawa Centre can do that and can do a better job than asking the people: "Tell me about what I should be doing", or saying: "I am going on national TV in order to seek your views on what the province of Ontario should be doing".

Surely the people deserve better than a premier going on national television and saying: "I am interested in finding out your views about how I should be running my business". Any constituent in my riding could do a better job than that.

We can talk about the record as much as we want, but the bottom line remains that they can turn around and put the blame on anybody they want; they can still tell the people: "Oh, sorry, it is beyond our control".

The province of Ontario is blaming all its problems on international situations, on globalization, and on the fact that we have to be competitive, which is good, but what are they doing about it in the province of Ontario?

Certainly, if we look at the two areas, that of health care and education, the Government of Ontario does not have a record that it can be proud of in the two years it has been in power.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting when people from Ontario, particularly the member, talk about the premier of Ontario going on national TV. I know that Ontarians have a reputation for thinking of themselves as co-existent with the country, but I am sure the premier of Ontario only went on provincial TV and he did not command air time in British Columbia. I would hope that in the future, people from Ontario, and particularly the hon. member, could refrain from the way in which they sometimes equate talking to Ontario with talking to Canada.

The other thing I might mention just before I get into the substance of the bill is that the member in his diatribe against the Ontario NDP government talked about the Ontario NDP government raising tuition fees time after time after time after time. Four times, Mr. Speaker. I could see the member's nose growing every time he uttered the word "time". Surely to God you cannot raise tuition fees, even if you wanted to, four times in two years. This just goes to show the exaggeration. The member must be a product of some educational system other than the excellent one that they have had in Ontario these years, or otherwise he would be able to count better than he was doing.

The Liberals cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that on the one hand everything that is happening in Ontario is the fault somehow of the Ontario NDP government and then, out of the other side of their mouths, talk about the free trade agreement when they talk about it. They do not like to talk about it much these days, but they do talk about it from time to time. Out of the other side of their mouths they cannot talk about the effect of cutbacks in EPF, for instances, to the provinces and pretend that that does not somehow affect all provinces including the Government of Ontario. On the same occasion in the House of Commons the member lamented cutbacks to EPF and the effect they would have on the provinces' ability to deliver programs. Yet, when it comes to talking about the ability of the Ontario NDP government to deliver programs, somehow that analysis fades, that analysis evaporates into the partisan political air, so to speak.

The fact is that these cutbacks in Established Programs Financing affect all provinces, and they have severely affected Ontario in particular. Ontario is not protected in the same way as other provinces are by at least having some form of equalization payments. For the longest time Ontario has participated through the equalization payment scheme by supporting other provinces. Because Ontario has been hit so very hard by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, it now finds itself in a position where it is being asked in this bill to continue for another two years to play the role economically in Confederation that it has played historically, when the economic conditions that pertain to Ontario have changed drastically.

These are all things the member could have said if he had wanted to be more comprehensive and if he wanted to be less political in the negative sense of what it means to be political and help people to understand just exactly what is going on in his home province and how difficult things really are.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication was received:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa

March 19, 1992

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Charles D. Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, March 19, 1992, at 4.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-5, An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act—Chapter 4.

Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports—Chapter 5.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Linguistic Minorities; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Regional Development; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap—Agriculture; the hon. member for Ottawa West—The Environment; the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke—Emergency Preparedness College.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I was in the process of responding in part to the comments of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre when we were asked to go to the Senate for Royal Assent. One of the remaining things I wanted to comment on was the way he thought it irrelevant that the Liberals were the first to unilaterally reduce federal transfer payments to the provinces. He thought this was just something of historical interest but did not have any relevance to the moment. I think this is a profound mistake. It is perhaps just a self-serving analysis but if it is held sincerely, it is a profound mistake.

I was trying to point out that when people are concerned about certain policy trends, if they are interested in changing those policy trends then they ought to know where those policy trends come from. The fact of the matter is that the unilateral reduction of federal transfer payments to the provinces has its origins in the Liberal government of 1982.

That is important. It is important in a number of other areas as well. The people are concerned about the free trade agreement. It would probably be useful for them to know that the free trade agreement has its origins in the Liberal government of that day when the royal commission set up by the Prime Minister of that time and headed up by a former Liberal Minister of Finance made the initial recommendation for a free trade agreement with the United States of America.

It is important if people are concerned about the effects of deregulation and transportation. They see the effects of deregulation and transportation and the negative consequences of that deregulation whether it is with respect to airlines, the current controversy about Nationair, or the fact that soon we might have only one carrier when all this deregulation was supposed to produce competition rather than monopoly. They look at what has happened to our highways as a result of deregulation of the trucking industry, et cetera.

It is important if people are against this policy to know where this policy came from. Where did it have its beginnings? What is its origin? Its origin is in the dictum of a Liberal Minister of Transport who was the Minister of Transport in the Liberal government of 1980 to 1984 and who now sits on the opposition front benches in the person of the member for Winnipeg South Centre.

I say that if people are concerned about certain policies, then we have a responsibility in this House to be truthful and accurate in what the historical origins of that policy are when it comes to deregulation, the free trade agreement, and when it comes to unilateral reductions in federal transfer payments to the provinces as well as a lot of other bad policies that were picked up, accelerated and in many cases made worse by the Conservatives. These policies had their origins with the Liberals.

One policy that did not have its origins with the Liberals as far as I know was the goods and services tax. This bill is very much about the goods and services tax. This is the other element of this bill that needs to be touched upon at this time. What this bill does in permitting the federal government in facilitating the collection of provincial sales tax by the federal government is to enable the federal government not to do just a harmless "we will help you out" kind of thing, tax harmonization, or whatever they want to call it.

The fact of the matter is that this bill is designed to help the federal government put pressure on the provinces to harmonize their sales tax systems with the goods and services tax. The federal government is saying to those provinces, the economies of which are bleeding as a result of cross-border shopping: "If you want us to stop that bleeding, if you want us to collect the provincial sales tax at the border, then what we want from you is a commitment to implement the harmonization of your sales tax system with the goods and services tax".

Therefore, many of the provinces are now run by governments the members of which ran in elections that were committed to non-harmonization of the GST with the provincial sales tax. They are now put into an incredible bind. They are being blackmailed by the federal government, a federal government which for its own purposes is willing to continue to see the blood letting go on.

It is willing to continue to see the various provincial economies being bled by cross-border shopping rather than doing the right thing and saying, given what this bill will enable it to do, to the provinces: "We are willing to collect your provincial sales tax regardless of whether or not you harmonize with the GST". That would be the right thing to do because it seems to me that the federal government should not use its ability to collect this tax, facilitated by this bill, as a lever against provinces which are responding to the democratically expressed will of their own people with respect to whether or not those provinces should harmonize their tax system with the GST, and yet that is really what is going on.

The solution, of course, lies in none of this. The solution lies in getting rid of the GST in the first place. The solution lies in realizing that the GST has been a profound mistake with respect to tax fairness, in the way in which it places an extraordinary burden on the working poor and the middle-class in particular who are bearing the brunt of this tax and who, even before this tax, bore the brunt of paying the bills in this country. It is a profound mistake in terms of the over-all effect of the tax on the economy and particularly with respect to cross-border shopping and the fact that cross-border shopping has increased so significantly since the introduction of the GST.

The Minister of National Revenue likes to hide behind figures which simply show the number of trips that are made, although they are up significantly, but the figure that he does not like to look at very closely is how much more people are buying while they are down there. This shows that the increase in cross-border shopping is in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent or 60 per cent. It is a serious problem that all border communities and even some non-border communities are concerned about. It is part of a general malaise, if you like, that I think has been created in part by the free trade agreement.

The free trade agreement is not just an agreement, in spite of what the Prime Minister likes to say. It is not just a commercial agreement that we can cancel in six months if we like, although I think we should cancel it and an NDP government would cancel it. The fact of the matter is that it does tend to enshrine a particular world view. The world view that it enshrines is that there is no border.

Now if there is no border for corporations and if indeed there seems to be no border for governments, because we find more and more examples of provincial governments and even the federal government cross-border shopping, then what is the average Canadian to think? Is he or she expected to support the Canadian economy while their own governments do not?

In other words, the free trade agreement gives a particular kind of moral sanctity or moral acceptance to something which would have previously been morally—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time is over. Resuming debate.

Mr. Breaugh: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that you are now into a period of time where debates are limited to 10 minutes. I appreciate that you just called one of our members to order as his time had expired, but I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that from this corner of the Chamber there is no clock where the members themselves could have any indication at all of what the time period is. I think that is most unfair and I would really like the Chair to take that into consideration when calling members for time.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times we have to rise in this Chamber and talk about the education system in this country. We seem to have been doing it year after year after year. Again today we have to look at what has happened to transfer payments.

My colleague from Winnipeg—Transcona is quite right that the cutback in transfer payments did not start with the present government but indeed started before they took office. That is not to say that it is right. It is not right. It was not right then. It is not right now.

I am not sure it is useful to analyse the past and look at what has happened in the past. The fact that the trend has continued is it seems to me more shameful rather than less. The effect of the cutbacks which indeed did start in the late 1970s and have continued up to the present time is disastrous not only for the whole country but particularly for disadvantaged parts of the country.

First of all my colleague from Ottawa who spoke earlier talked about the effect on secondary schools that have something like a 30 per cent drop-out rate all across the country.

This is what transfer payments are used for. Transfer payments to the provinces you can say go directly into secondary schools and help young people in schools to get the kind of high school education that they need.

The capping in a sense is a cutback. If you cap you are saying to the provinces they are not going to get the increases expected and therefore those funds must be found in their own meagre and dwindling resources. A cap is in effect a cutback. You cannot stay still. You either go ahead or you go back. The effect of a cap is the same as a cutback. It is a cutback to secondary schools.

On top of that the provinces still have a cap on Established Programs Financing. In addition to the cut on transfer payments there is a consistent cut in Established Programs Financing which goes directly into post-secondary education and health. That is used to fund universities, community colleges, and post-secondary institutions. Those are finding the pinch and still find it today.

Third, the government in the budget made very little change in the Canada Student Loans program. It changed around the edges somewhat. It tinkered with the pay back of interest payments. But essentially it did not enrich the Canada Student Loans program. It gave no incentive and no help to young people who do not have the wherewithal to get a post-secondary education and need it desperately.

This is a time when training should be at the top of the agenda in this country and indeed is at the top of the agenda in every developed country in the world. It is at the top of the agenda in the United States. George Bush wanted to call himself the education president. It is at the top of the agenda in Great Britain. Margaret Thatcher, before she left, gave top priority to education and training.

If you look around the world, at Japan, Germany, countries that are making it today in the competitive global environment, they are putting training at the top of their agenda. You cannot have training without the foundation of education.

This is a time when you must put training at the top of the agenda. What is this government doing? It is talking a good game. It is setting up a national training board to give emphasis to training in this country.

But what happened after the budget came out? The co-chair of that national training board, Mr. Gérard Docquier, formerly a prominent, eminent and well-known and well-respected national president of the steelworkers in this country, criticized the government that appointed him to that board. And rightly so. What this government has done is pay lip service to training. It has set up the national training board and brought in Bill C-21 to enrich the Unemployment Insurance Act to which it is no longer contributing. It is paying people who have unemployment insurance to get training, but if you do not, if you are in the work force and you need upgrading to take a new job, if you are about to be laid off and you want to upgrade to get new skills to take a new job, you are left out in the cold. Why? Because there is a hundred million cutback in this budget in the Canadian Jobs Strategy. A hundred million less in training dollars in this present budget.

Now that is on top of a hundred million less in the last budget. There was $200 million cut back in the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program for training in Canada for people who are on the job, for people who want to improve their skills, for employers who want to train their employees and cannot afford to do it themselves.

The government talks a good game in setting up a national training board, appointing eminent people to it and then it cuts the money. It consistently cuts the money in this country available for training, in the middle of a recession when companies cannot afford on their own to put their money into training and development. That is the kind of attitude we get and it is hypocrisy of the highest order. Countries around the world must be laughing at the kind of strategy that Canada is pursuing.

Who does this hurt most? It hurts most the disadvantaged in the country, whether they be individuals or whether they be regions. Let us take women, for example. In breaking through the glass ceiling, education and training has to be a top priority for any woman. Seventy per cent of all part-time students in this country are women. Single mothers who want to support themselves and who want to have a respectable place for themselves and their children in this country have to get education and training if they are really to have a life of their own and to become independent.

That is who this series of cutbacks affects. It affects women in this country and it affects single mothers particularly. Who else does it affect? It affects native people. I might point out that on top of the cuts in transfer payments and the cuts in Established Programs Financing, the government also, a couple of years ago, capped the funds for post-secondary education for natives.

Natives are in exactly the same boat. If they are to have equality in this country, equality of opportunity, there has got to be funds provided for them for education and training. Unless they can get through high school, unless they can get through community colleges, unless they can get university degrees, there is no way the native people in this country are going to compete on an equal footing.

This budget and the last budget affects the disadvantaged. It affects disadvantaged regions because even a region like Ontario now is having difficulty in this country. We heard the debate earlier today about the difficulty and what the government of the day in Ontario has had to do. How much more difficulty is the government of Newfoundland finding itself in? We depend more heavily than anybody else on transfer payments. So places like the Atlantic are doubly hurt by this budget.

We say this again. I do not know how many times we have had to say this in the House and I do not quite understand why the policy is so. Surely, on the government side of the House, there must be the same opportunity to learn about what is needed, to learn about what is going on in other countries, to learn that education and training has to be a top priority in 1992. This government refuses to follow the practice in other developed countries in the world with which we are competing in the global economy, refuses to give education and training a priority. Not only that, but it consistently, in budget after budget, cuts back on the amount of funds available for education and training.

We are going to vote against this bill when it comes forward. We are going to keep saying what we have been saying today as long as we have to up to and until the time that we become the government of Canada. Then we have to rectify the mistakes that the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona referred to in his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I just realized that I was in the House during the vote on Bill C-13, that I did in fact rise, and that apparently, I am not on the list as having voted against the bill. So I would appeal to your wisdom in having this problem cleared up, because I was in the House at the time. The hon. member for Longueuil can testify to that, and I just spoke to him. He saw me rise, and I am not on the list. I leave this to the discretion of Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since the hon. member raised the matter in the House, his request was heard and is now part of the record.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I want to be on the list of those who voted against the bill, since I was in the House. The procedure seems rather outdated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your request was duly noted, and the Chair will take appropriate action, if necessary.

The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious subject. I want to speak on this and at the outset to say how much I appreciated the comments from the hon. member for Labrador who has a lot of credibility in this area. He is a professional educator and is well known in Newfoundland for the work he has done on education. I may say that his family is from a group of educators. His brother is a doctor at Memorial University whom I know quite well. You might say that the entire family has been dedicated to the education of Newfoundlanders.

I appreciate the conviction with which the hon. member spoke. I wish I had the wide range of knowledge that he has on the subject. I detected in his delivery a great and compassionate concern for those who are being educated. We all share that with him. We could not substantiate it as well. It is with conviction that we speak on the lack of appreciation. I do have a certain compassion for the budget difficulties.

It is after all a question of priorities. We, as a country, have been told time and time again that there are solutions to the problem of competitiveness, which is a buzz word but it is a very important word these days. In order to be competitive, we have to do a number of things. We hire Harvard professors to tell us this. We do government studies to do this. The answer is always the same. We know what the problem is. The problem is that we need to be focusing more of our attention or giving better priority to the scientists and to science and technology, research and development. We need to be focusing more on education.

Anything that I have seen in the last year or so on the subject leads me to believe that somebody is not paying attention to the requirement to focus our attention and to look at the priorities.

We are looking at 5 million young Canadians who every year go to school in primary and secondary education. We are looking at 68 universities. We are looking at close to 530,000 post-secondary education students and we are looking for, as the hon. member for Ottawa Centre said, somewhere in the vicinity of a $45 billion to $50 billion expenditure. That is roughly the same that we spend on health. That is a large chunk of money if you look at the money as a total allocation.

I see that as an input, but what do I see as an output? I see, as the hon. member for Labrador mentioned, a 30 per cent high school drop-out rate in secondary education. For 10 young Canadians who start grade nine education, seven of them will graduate from high school. That is only part of the problem. For those seven out of the 10 who graduate, only 72 per cent of them will go on to formalized training, not just post-secondary education in a university, but apprenticeship training or vocational colleges.

You may say that 72 per cent is not bad. It is greater than 50 per cent. When you compare that to the United States, the equivalent number is 87 per cent and in Japan, it is 92 per cent. We are really off the mark on that one.

What else do I see? I see a reduction in the amount of money we are putting in research and development. We have one of the lowest inputs either per capita or as a percentage of our GNP. No matter how you look at the statistics, our record is far from brilliant and it is getting less brilliant every year.

• (1650)

What are we doing with education? With this dismal record of high school drop-outs and a very poor record compared with our competitors in the United States and Japan—and I could quote other statistics for Germany, Sweden and other parts of the world, but I think I make my point on that—we are cutting back on educational allowances to those provinces in particular that can least afford to absorb that kind of a monstrous cut.

Two or three speakers ago talked about the province of Ontario. There is no question but that it does have a problem and I sympathize with it. However, in the province of Newfoundland where I come from transfers to the provincial government make up 50 per cent of the budget. If money is cut from education it has to be found somewhere, particularly when the money in education is grouped with another high priority item like health care. They do not give a lot of hope for either the future of competitiveness or the future of health care.

I would be prepared to get into a debate in this House any time about what the priority items should be in our country. But all along one has been health care. We have had the best record in the world in health care. In education, I do not think it has been quite as good, but we have always had Canadians whom we could have been proud of in the field of education, in science and in technology.

I want to give some idea of how proud that record was. Getting into the real world and the world that I know a lot more about than education, I recall as a naval officer the innovations that were brought about by scientists who were associated with the navy during World War II and post war. They resulted in the development of some innovative features that are being used by all countries. I will give a couple of examples.

First was the development of a variable depth sonar. It allowed a sound transfuser to get below the sound gradients that are always present in the water. Essentially it allowed submarines to be detected at 10 to 20 times what they normally could be detected at with a sonar mounted in the hull of the ship.

That was developed by two Canadian scientists who worked for the naval research establishment during World War II. I am very proud that I happened to have known the family of one of those scientists. The variable depth sonar from World War II took roughly 10 years to develop. The prototype was developed, tested and put into production by Canada. Practically every navy of the world, even the Soviets when they were our fiercest enemy, employed exactly that scientific knowledge and prototype to conduct their naval operations.

Similarly with helicopters at sea. The haul-down mechanism was used and is used in practically all navies now. The rapid securing device for a helicopter that operates from a smaller ship than an aircraft carrier, a frigate or a destroyer, was totally designed, conceived, tested, trialed and produced in Canada.

Those are two examples of the things that made us competitive with the rest of the world. We were more than competitive; we were winners in that regard.

With the record we have examined, what we have seen in the last five or six years, and what we project for the future, I wonder if we will be able to have politicians who can stand in the House of Commons and boast about these kinds of achievements? I fear that the answer may not be in the affirmative.

I do not like this bill. I do not like the reduction in moneys, and I do not like the way the money for provinces that can least afford to absorb the costs is being cut back.

As a final note, this is a very timely subject for me because I met this morning with a professional educator from Newfoundland. He was here to speak as a Newfoundlander but not on education in Newfoundland. He has a Ph.D. in education and he talked about education from a federal viewpoint. Mr. Speaker, if you think the hon. member for Labrador and I are concerned by the presentations we have put forward, I can assure you it would seem very mild compared with the concern shown by the gentleman and his colleague in my office this morning. Both of them are on education boards, are professional educators and are involved day after day after day. It is their livelihood. They are very concerned.

I would ask the government to reconsider, refocus and repriorize so that education and health gets more importance.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues from the east who have spoken before me, I have to say that I have a lot of concern as to the contents of this bill as they relate to transfer payments that would be going to the east and Established Programs Financing in health and in post-secondary education.

When we talk about anything to do with equalization in transfer payments, anyone who comes from the east knows that equalization payments are very important to the eastern provinces. The percentage of their budgets is extremely high in terms of how they pay for the services that each provincial government provides to its people in the provinces.

This bill wants to change the base year for those payments from 1987–88. They calculate it over five years. They want to make the base year for two years only, 1992–93. The government says that it is because the Department of Finance wants to review the legislation on equalization and the transfer payment system and that two years should be enough time. But there is no time limit to this review. It seems to be in the hands of the officials of the Department of Finance.

We know that there are very troubled times in Canada presently. I am sure the revenues the government is receiving from the Canadian people in terms of income tax and in terms of distributing back the wealth it acquires through the taxation system should be greatly reduced this year.

I would prefer to see some type of action by this government to say why. If people were working taxes would be coming in; they could pay income tax. We are paying out far more in unemployment insurance and in social assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan than was anticipated. A couple of years ago we had a Minister of Finance who kept talking about the overheated economy in Ontario, letting interest rates go higher and having to do something about the overheated economy.

What do we have now? Ontario is almost a have not province. Forget who is in power. That was referred to earlier in debate here. The former Minister of Finance, the now Minister for International Trade, without showing us the documents, says we are going to do great under a North American free trade agreement. He is the one who was saying a year or two ago that we had to bring in legislation to cool down the overheated economy in Ontario. The government capped the Canada Assistance Plan vis-à-vis the amount of growth in Ontario for social services and particularly social assistance.

I have a lot of concern about this bill. I know it will be going to committee. I think there should be a lot of study done. We on this side have provided the government with a package of trying to get people back to work, using the unemployment insurance program and the infrastructures that are in place to get people back to work. The municipalities across Canada have said: "Provide us with the working money to keep people going. We can put up the infrastructure". This government has not listened to us.

Maybe after that meeting with the provinces next week the Prime Minister is talking about there will be something for infrastructure and getting people back to work rather than paying out for social assistance and for unemployment insurance or taxing the unemployment insurance fund.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Before going any further, I would like to inform the hon. member for Calgary Northeast that upon due consideration, his request was ruled in order, so that his name will appear in Hansard on the list of members who voted against Bill C–13.

The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, Mr. Stupich, has given me written notice that he will be unable to present his motion under Private Members' Business on Friday, March 20, 1992. Since it was impossible to arrange for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a), I ask the Clerk to drop this order to the bottom of the order of precedence.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), private members' hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to private members' hour.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INVENTORY

HISTORICAL, NATURAL AND CULTURAL PLACES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should undertake an inventory nationally, internationally and of the global commons, identifying places of historical, natural and cultural importance which may be threatened, and negotiate for their protection.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to start debate on this motion this afternoon, particularly in the context of what has occurred today with the passage of Bill C-13. This does seem to be an environmental week in the House.

We are just months away from the earth summit which is going to be held in Brazil in June. At that summit the world is going to have to examine the environment and development challenges before it.

Canada's role in the international community is a very important one. We stand as a role model for the world on many fronts. The intent of this motion is that Canada can improve that image.

I want to talk a bit about the history behind this motion. It flowed out of events that were going on in my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands, in the Gulf Islands portion of that riding which is the most beautiful part of Canada. It is an archipelago of islands off the coast of Vancouver Island, between the mainland and Vancouver Island. If members have not visited there, I suggest that they do because it is a beautiful place.

However, with its beauty there are problems, the problems of development and over-development. There are increasing confrontations between residents of the islands and developers, some on-island developers and some from offshore. Concerned with the preservation of these beautiful islands, I saw that these pressures were not going to decrease; they were going to increase. Therefore on June 2, 1991, at the beginning of Canadian Environment Week, I called for the establishment of a biosphere reserve for the Gulf Islands.

A biosphere reserve was something I had known a little bit about in my previous occupation working for OXFAM Canada, doing international work. The UNESCO program has played a leading role since 1971 in establishing a global network of biosphere reserves.

The preparation for Brazil 1992 is a logical framework for advancing initiatives which demonstrate long-term thinking. A comprehensive inventory of lands, water and resources would be conducted. A monitoring system would be put in place and the region's carrying capacity would be assessed and embodied in the biosphere system.

This motion before us this afternoon fits into that framework. It is asking that the Canadian government take on that task of providing an inventory.

I want to talk a little bit and flesh out what the concept of a biosphere reserve is. Biosphere research, pilot projects, education and training have been established in most countries through UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Sustainable development, applied research, resource management, healthy productivity and monitoring of cultural ecosystems and human interaction are integral components of the biosphere mandate.

Each of the 111 nations participating in UNESCO's Man and the Biosphere Program are asked to identify a strategy for co-operation with the international action plan. Those figures are as of 1987. I will cite what the mandate is: conserve the ecosystems of the world's natural regions; recognize people and their activities as integral parts of the environment—so this is not apart, this is recognition that human activity is part of the biosphere—encourage monitoring, research, education, training and demonstration of natural and managed ecosystems.

It should also be an example of voluntary co-operation in resource management for both conservation and human use. It should be a place where local people form the management committee. That is the criteria for a biosphere reserve.

Canada's experience in establishing biosphere reserves is regarded as a model for local participatory process. Using that experience gained in the 15 years that biospheres have been operative in Canada may help in developing a biosphere reserve in the Gulf Islands.

Of 276 biosphere reserves in 71 countries, the six in Canada include: Mont Saint Hilaire, St. Lawrence Lowlands near Montreal, Quebec; Waterton, Waterton Lakes National Park, southern Alberta; Long Point, sand-pit and dune formation at Lake Erie, Ontario; Riding Mountain National Park near Winnipeg, Manitoba; Charlevoix, the St. Lawrence River Valley near Quebec City in Quebec; and, the Niagara Escarpment on the Niagara River to Lake Huron, southern Ontario.

The officially proposed biosphere reserves in Canada include: Isabella Bay, including a whale sanctuary in the Northwest Territories; Lake Superior, jointly sponsored by Canada's Man and the Biosphere and the U.S.A. Man and the Biosphere Programs, Ontario; Lac Champlain, an independent reserve in Quebec; and, the Algonquin–Petawawa sustainable forestry model in Ontario.

I would like the people of the Gulf Islands to know that they are in very good company should they decide that a biosphere reserve is the way that they would like to protect their beautiful archipelago.

The long-range goal of Man and the Biosphere Program is to create a world-wide network of biosphere reserves, to include examples of all of the globe's main ecological systems with their different patterns of human use and adaptations to them.

The evolution of the biosphere reserve concept is an interesting one. It came out of the International Biological Program of the 1960s and the early 1970s. The International Biological Program's Conservation of Ecosystems Subprogram, whose participants commissioned the establishment of a global network of protected ecological areas for conservation and research, led to this concept of biosphere reserves.

• (1710)

The task force then envisioned that a biosphere reserve would include a core area for strict protection of natural ecosystems, surrounded by a buffer zone, where uses could be managed co-operatively in ways that protect the core area.

The description of the buffer zone has since been amplified to include two categories of multiple use areas; one for legally designated units where human uses are carefully planned and managed, and the other for areas where voluntary co-operation among agencies, local communities and the public is encouraged. This is called a transition zone.

My vision for the Gulf Islands would be a cluster of these communities, rather than one core and radiating from that one core, many cores with the transition zones around it. This would fit the needs of the people of the Gulf Islands. It would preserve the bounty that is there, both marine and on the ground. It would also recognize the international aspects of our community and how it links with the rest of the world.

The Canadian government is also on record as being committed to the completion of the national parks system by the year 2000. My motion, talking about an inventory nationally, internationally and of the global common fits in with an initiative that the government has given an undertaking on, that is the completion of the national parks system. It also fits in with the international initiative of a biosphere program.

In conclusion, Canada is in a good position to support international initiatives, demonstrating practical measures to implement local and global sustainable development and conservation. This would enhance Canada's position with regard to the biodiversity convention being presented to the Brazil 1992 earth summit.

I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs in recent meetings with environmentalists has said that the expectations from that earth summit are way beyond what is achievable. I think that the Government of Canada, by agreeing to support this motion, would be able to demonstrate that Canada does have long-term thinking on this and that there are demonstrated projects here in Canada with the biosphere reserve.

There are those that are projected, and I would like to add the Gulf Islands as another one, if the people of the Gulf Islands are in agreement that a local committee be formed and the Gulf Islands biosphere reserve could be added to the 276 biosphere reserves that the world currently enjoys.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion of the New Democrat member, who emphasized her interest in the preservation of historical and other sites.

We witness almost daily examples of destruction of our world heritage, whether in the Persian Gulf or Yugoslavia, because of war or extreme climate phenomena. It is a good thing that a member of Parliament asks the Canadian government to do its share to put a stop to that destruction. That the government undertakes an identifying places of historical, natural and cultural importance which may be threatened, and negotiates for their protection are good initiatives. These measures would certainly reflect the concerns of many Canadians.

However, such inventories already exist, thanks to the concerted efforts of international organizations, governmental and non-governmental, as well as of their member states.

The International Union for Conservation of Nature, whose head office is in Switzerland, looks after natural heritage sites, while the International Council of Monuments and Sites, whose head office is in Paris, looks after cultural and historical heritage sites.

As for UNESCO, it is responsible, through a World Heritage Sites Committee that implements the International Convention on Heritage Sites, for the most important natural or historical heritage sites.

Moreover, UNESCO sponsors the Biosphere Reserves Program, which also helps to protect those sites deemed representative of the main ecosystems of the world.

Incidently, the Canadian government plays an active role, through its financial and logistic support, to ensure the efficiency of these institutions. The green plan even provides for an increase in Canadian contributions to UNESCO's World Heritage Fund and to the International Union for Conservation of Nature, and those contributions have already been made.

The International Union for Conservation of Nature was created in 1948 at an international conference held in Fontainebleau. It is a union of sovereign states as well as governmental and non-governmental agencies gathered together to promote a sound use of natural resources throughout the world. Among the numerous achievements of that organization, one is of particular interest to us here. The IUCN, in conjunction with the World Wildlife Federation and the United Nations Environment Program, has established a world-wide inventory of natural sites. These are classified by level of protection and their status is updated regularly, with special emphasis on those at risk for one reason or another. This is the job of the World Conservation Monitoring Center operating from Cambridge, England.

To identify the dreadful state of a site is one thing, but the situation must also be corrected. Funded both publicly and privately, the IUCN can, upon request, help a country with problem identification and solving. There is even room for prevention, in the IUCN's activities as it also assists in the development of management plans for protected sites and in the training of personnel.

The International Council of Monuments and Sites, ICOMOS, founded in 1964, does essentially the same thing with fewer means and different structures with regard to monuments and sites of historical and cultural importance through its UNESCO/ICOMOS documentation center. The role of this center is to compile and maintain material on the conservation, protection, use and promotion of monuments and sites.

UNESCO, as depository of the World Heritage Convention, identifies and assigns special status to the most significant heritage sites, whether natural or cultural. There are presently 340 such sites in some 70 countries. Funds, albeit modest, are also available to provide technical assistance and emergency relief upon request.

At the present time the committee focuses mainly on heritage sites not related to western culture, such as those found in Africa for instance.

The 1990 meeting of the committee was held in Canada, and two Canadian officials have chaired the committee over the years.

Mr. Speaker, ten of these national heritage sites are located in Canada, including the Kluane National Park in the Yukon; Anthony Island, off South Moresby in British Columbia; the Nahanni National Park in the Northwest Territories; as well as the Head-Smashed-In Buffalo Jump and the Dinosaur Provincial Park in Alberta. World heritage sites, whether they are at risk or not, are well-known and properly inventoried.

• (1720)

Now, is there a case for starting negotiations to protect these sites? A record of international treaties and other agreements on the environment published by the United Nations Environment Program, lists as many as 140 international agreements.

In a UNESCO publication on conventions and recommendations relating to the protection of our cultural heritage, three conventions and six recommendations are listed. The oldest convention, which goes back to 1954, deals with protecting cultural assets in case of armed conflict.

There is no lack of inventories of world heritage sites or legal protection for those sites. However, we are too often faced with a lack of political will, resources and interest, with ignorance and extreme meteorological phenomena such as typhoons, floods, tornadoes and wars as well. The remedy demands a lot of time, money and effort.

However, there are certain threats to both natural and historical sites that cause trees and stones to deteriorate, forces against which governments have decided to launch an offensive. I am referring to air pollution, whether we are talking about acid rain or climatic change.

It is known that eminent researchers expect global warming to raise the level of the seas. In fact, the Standing Committee on the Environment tabled a very detailed report on the matter. Rising sea levels may flood many coastal sites. Venice is a good example. However, there are more, like Goree Island in Senegal and the medieval city of Thebes, that may also be flooded, or at least suffer irreversible damage.

I realize I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker, but I would have liked to mention many more examples to show that much is already being done in this respect. I hope that this information, modest though it is, will give members a better idea of what is being done at the international level and how Canada is actively involved in protecting natural, historical and cultural sites, which are indeed a unique heritage.

That is our position. We, as a government, intend to continue our positive action and remain very actively involved.

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, indeed I find it a pleasure to speak to this motion here before us tonight, offered to us by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

When speaking of the Gulf Islands in British Columbia, I know whereof she speaks and it is indeed a place that is very beautiful. I certainly encourage members opposite, particularly my friend from Newfoundland, to come out and see our Gulf Islands.

Mr. Mifflin: I have sailed out there. A great place.

Mr. Belsher: You have sailed out there. The subject we are debating tonight is one of great significance to our country and it is also one that has long been a priority of this government. I am delighted to be able to address the question here tonight. Also, I would like to propose some approaches that should be followed in the future.

During this crucial time in our history when fundamental questions have been raised about the nature of our country and the relationships between government and citizens, more than ever it is important to ensure that our precious heritage is not only protected, but it is also presented in a manner to assist Canadians to understand the nature of our country. It is my belief that only in the understanding where we have come from will we be able to discern where it is we want to be.

Let me first briefly deal with the points raised in the motion with respect to the international arena. At the international level, much has been accomplished through various conventions of which Canada is a signatory.

Work is continuing through the actions of the World Heritage Committee and like international agencies. Canada, of course, played and continues to play a significant role in the activities of that committee and likewise has taken an active role in bodies such as ICOMOS, the International Council on Monuments and Sites, the IUCN, the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and the ICCROM, the International Centre for the Study and Preservation and Restoration of Cultural Property. These are all new acronyms to me and I am sure others are not familiar with them either.

It is worth noting that Canada hosted the 1990 general session of the World Heritage Committee in Banff. In July 1991, the first ever meeting of world heritage cities took place in Quebec City. In the coming year, Canada will host the annual meeting of ICOM. This is an indication of the important role our nation plays in assisting the essential works of these bodies which are dedicated to the protection of the world's cultural and natural heritage.

But to return to the question of the adequacy of our cultural and natural heritage programs in Canada, it is useful to understand that we as Canadians are surrounded by and are part of what can accurately be described as a cultural environment within the broader confines of the natural environment.

To elaborate on the importance of this relationship between the natural and cultural environments, let me quote from the 1982 United Nations Charter for Nature. It states: "Civilization is rooted in nature, which has shaped human culture and influenced all artistic and scientific achievements".

In other words, it is logical that we are a society whose identity is tied inextricably to our natural and cultural environment. Our geography and our history define the essence of Canada. They are the influences that identify Canada and Canadians to ourselves as well as to the rest of the world.

It is essential, as I have already noted, to explain and to preserve our cultural heritage in order to make informed decisions. We must preserve and present our natural heritage so that we can better understand how we interact with the environment as individuals and as a society.

It is fundamental to recognize that the achievement of these objectives is not solely the responsibility of the federal government. Only through the concerted efforts of other levels of government and activist voluntary organizations and individuals will our goals be achieved.

Moreover, if we are to work in harmony on heritage matters, an interest whose time appears to have come, it is important that we should be able to continue to walk the tightrope linking the past, the present and the future. And we should be willing to run the risk of questioning our current vision of things.

More than ever, as we near the end of the century, it is important to make sure that the people of Canada have a sense of our history if they are to meet the challenges of the 21st century. This is obviously something that cannot be accomplished in a couple of days.

"Culture cannot be pulled out of a hat," wrote the French writer, Julien Green. Although shaped by our past, it takes on aspects of current trends and expresses the fundamental values that consciously or unconsciously guide all our actions.

For we Canadians, the challenge consists of coming to terms with the country's cultural diversity, of identifying the varied and sometimes conflicting aspirations of its people, and of providing for the continuity and renewal of values deemed to be essential. In short, it is knowing who we are and preserving that identity.

The existence of a strong sense of belonging is one of the conditions essential to the survival of Canada as a distinct political, economic, social and cultural entity in North America. It is therefore important to be well aware of our heritage, which is the tangible record of the influences that have made us what we are, if we are to have a clear picture of ourselves and share a vision of the future. As a nation, I believe that we have long recognized that fundamental requirement.

For example, the year 1842 saw the establishment of the Geological Survey of Canada, an organization that would play a determining role in the creation of our national museums. In 1927 the Geological Survey of Canada museum became the National Museum of Canada. The National Gallery of Canada can trace its roots back to 1880. The National Archives of Canada dates back to 1872.

The beginnings of the Canadian Parks Service, an agency with fundamental responsibilities for our national heritage, go back to 1885, when an Order in Council set aside land adjacent to hot springs discovered near Banff when the railway was being pushed across Canada. This 26–square kilometre area was destined to become Canada's first National Park.

Now a part of Environment Canada, the parks service exercises a shared responsibility for protection of our nation's magnificent natural and cultural heritage. The service manages some of the largest areas of land and natural resources in the world, some of the world's most majestic parks, many of which contain absolutely unique ecosystems and are recognized as such by international accords. The service also has responsibility for much of Canada's built heritage such as the fortress of Louisbourg, the fortifications of Old Quebec City, the Rideau Canal, the St. Roch in the province from which the hon. member opposite who proposed this motion and I come, and similar sites in every part of the country.

• (1730)

For more than 100 years we as a nation have been setting aside such fundamental aspects of our heritage. The Historic Sites and Monuments Boards of Canada began the process of commemorating the nation's past in 1919. The 1951 Massey–Levesque Commission on National Development and Arts, Letters and Sciences led to the formation of the board's role with the Historic Sites and Monuments Act of 1953.

In 1972, Transport Canada transferred several non–commercial canals to the parks service. The Rideau, Trent–Severn, Chambly and several others now play a role in heritage protection and interpretation blended with recreation, tourism and transportation.

The Canadian heritage river system, a partnership between Canada, eight provinces and both territories was established in 1984. It is a mechanism for preserving the heritage values of some of our great rivers. To date, 21 rivers have been nominated to the heritage river system totalling 4,342 kilometres of waterway. The discovery and settlement of our nation was made possible by these rivers and the importance of our nationhood cannot be overestimated.

Similarly, the Treasury Board policy on federal heritage buildings encourages the preservation of federal buildings that represent an important part of our national heritage.

More recently, the Heritage Railway Stations Protection Act came into effect providing an important mechanism to protect another aspect of our national heritage. Like our heritage rivers, the national railways network was a major element in the development of Canada. This legislation requires railway companies to seek government authority to alter, demolish or otherwise dispose of designated heritage railway stations.

In the field of cultural heritage, the National Library was established in 1953. It has since played a crucial role in preserving the documentation of many facets of our heritage.

Many important steps forward in the heritage field were taken in the 1960s. The National Museums Corporation was established in 1968 and for 22 years it would guide the destiny of the museums in Ottawa.

The Archaeological Survey of Canada established in 1971 has acquired an enviable reputation in the field of archaeological research.

In 1972 the museum policy made possible the creation of several important institutions and programs, including the Canadian Conservation Institute, the Canadian Heritage Information Network and the Museums Assistance Program.

In 1973 the government established the Heritage Canada Foundation, a non–profit private organization dedicated to advancing the cause of heritage preservation.

Mr. Speaker, I have about two more minutes. Could I have the consent of the House to finish?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Belsher: Thank you very much, hon. members.

During the 1980s the government continued to build upon this solid base, increasing funding for non–profit cultural organizations, developing legislation such as the new National Archives of Canada Act approved in 1987 and the proposed archaeological legislation for the preservation and development of our archaeological heritage.

Major increased funding for museums has been announced within the past year. Our museums can take pride in being at the forefront of cultural heritage in their role as places where the past, the present and the future come together.

Similarly, our national system of 34 national parks, 110 national historic sites and historic canals represent a major investment in the heritage of our nation.

The government recently added South Moresby, Ellesmere Island, Grasslands and the Bruce Peninsula to the system of national parks and completed the long outstanding arrangements for Pacific Rim National Park Reserve. Furthermore, we added the Grosse Île, Laurier

House and the Gulf of Georgia cannery to the national historic sites network.

This brings me to an initiative of this government that will have a major influence in the future development of our heritage programs. The green plan, our comprehensive guide to the perfection of Canada's environment, includes several major initiatives that will enhance the broad base of the programs that I have outlined today.

Completion of our system of national parks so that all our national ecosystems are represented is fundamental to the green plan.

Similarly, inclusion of major new theme areas in our system of national historic sites is a complementary initiative that will ensure major aspects of our cultural heritage are preserved for the benefit of future generations. Themes such as ranching, forestry, fishing, immigration, land settlement, and many others are not yet adequately represented in the system. Fifteen new themes will be added as part of our national green plan commitment.

Flowing from the green plan, Environment Canada has developed a new Canadian parks service policy that has now been released for public consultation. It includes a cultural resource management policy that breaks new ground in setting standards for the protection and management of the nation's cultural heritage.

In short, what I have been attempting to make clear is that the Government of Canada over a span of many years has been doing precisely what is suggested in the motion before us today. However, we have been doing it in a co-operative manner, both at home in Canada with a wide range of partners and abroad through the international agencies charged with such responsibilities and in concert with other nations.

I am pleased that the hon. member opposite has brought this motion to the House in order that we may review the progress that has been achieved in this very important field of endeavour and pause to consider the challenges that remain to be addressed.

However, it is my considered opinion that the appropriate course is to continue with the directions that have been set out through our existing policies and programs, to continue to seek out and to develop the partnerships that will enable us to achieve our shared goals, to continue the important work that Canada has embarked on with a number of international agencies, and to ensure that the necessary resources are provided to enable this work to be carried out in an effective manner.

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on February 27 of this year, the Conservative government abolished the Court Challenges Program. Since 1978, that program has been essential in helping clarify the constitutional rights of women, aboriginal people, racial minorities and linguistic and ethnic groups before the courts.

In reply to a question I raised in the House on February 28, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship said that even in these times of constitutional crisis, that program had to be abolished because, and I quote: "After hundreds of cases one would imagine that we now have that base of jurisprudence".

In reply to other questions raised on that same day, the minister stated that the program should be supported by other groups, maybe at the provincial level, or by non-governmental organizations. Let us examine the three cases, the three issues.

First of all, he mentioned that there was enough jurisprudence. The financial support that was given led to major decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada. The jurisprudence is far from being complete. The witnesses that appeared before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons on March 10th, 1992 pointed to that. The director of the Court Challenges Program, among others, said: "The courts have so far had very few opportunities to interpret sections 16 to 20 of the charter concerning services offered in both official languages by the governments of Canada and New Brunswick". She also said: "Because of the inherent slowness of the judicial process and of dilatory procedures often used by federal and provincial governments, the vast majority of test cases brought up by special interest groups representing women, disabled persons and minorities, as well as by other groups likely to benefit from the support given by the program, are still before the trial courts or a court of appeal". She also added that no court had yet ruled on the implementation of the language equality rights provided in section 15 of the charter.

Referring to the Mahé case now before the Supreme Court, Gérard Bertrand, chairman of the language rights committee, recognized that the implementation of section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms would probably produce numerous court challenges in the years to come. Mr. Justice Dixon of the Supreme Court of Canada then replied: "It is impossible at this stage of development of section 23 to foresee all the circumstances pertaining to its enforcement."

Given these facts, it would seem unrealistic to conclude that the case law is sound and complete.

The second observation is that the program should be supported by the provinces. It is the minister who said that. He stated that the program should be supported by others, namely the provinces. He is suggesting that the provinces play the part of both judge and defendant. However, it is those very provinces that all in all act like offenders in all the cases brought before the courts. Let us take the Mahé case dealing with the educational rights provided for in section 23 of the charter and involving the Alberta government. Let us take the Ford decision concerning the Brown shoes in Quebec dealing with the freedom of expression and the right to use languages other than French as regards public billposting which involves the province of Quebec. There is also the Forest case involving the province of Manitoba and judicial and legislative bilingualism. In 1978, again a province was challenged by a citizen.

To give provinces the responsibility of protecting minorities is somewhat the same as telling the Canadian people that we are going to put the fox in the hen house.

Now let us talk about the costs. The minister said that funds had to be cut. Well, the budget had been renewed in May 1990 at a cost of $13.75 million over five years. The expenditure would amount to $2.7 million. That is 10 cents per Canadian per year. This is not a big amount.

I plead with the Government. When the Constitution of our country is being scrutinized, the collective rights of Quebec, of native people and all the other groups and communities which will be before us should have a chance to be challenged in court.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to commend my colleague for his remarks and his concern for the cause of official language minority groups.

A question was raised recently in this House about the government's decision to stop funding the Court Challenges Program. I must commend the hon. member who raised it for his concern for the linguistic minorities of Canada. However, I want to assure him that our commitment toward our country's linguistic duality remains as strong as ever.

The Court Challenges Program was established in 1978. Its purpose was to ensure equality to linguistic minorities all across the country. Since then we have made a great deal of progress in the matter of equality of all Canadians, as evidenced by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms proclaimed in 1982.

As you might have read in the Official Languages annual report of 1989-1990, the Official Languages Act administered by the Secretary of State remains a fundamental piece of legislation for linguistic minorities. Its protection applies to both anglophones in Quebec and francophones in the rest of the country. It gives the department the mandate to support and further the development of linguistic minorities and to promote the full recognition and use of both official languages. This mandate is still valid.

The rights of these citizens are entrenched in the Constitution so that everyone knows of their existence. There is no way this government will give that up. However, the legal system is only one way to protect human rights in Canada. We must continue to develop other mechanisms, by negotiating or cooperating with other governments and interest groups in order to guarantee language and social rights.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating my time has expired. I would have liked to read the response my colleague got from the minister, which is quite clear.

[English]

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, 1991, I and thousands of other Canadians in eastern Nova Scotia came together in a march of protest at Centre 200 in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

The following day I came back to Ottawa, stood in the House and asked the Minister of Finance if he would use his discretionary authority and exercise his responsibilities to order the Minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency as well as the officials of that particular department to meet with municipalities, labour and business in industrial Cape Breton in order to provide some needed employment in that area of Canada.

Unfortunately, my request was denied. On that particular day, Sunday, November 24, 1991, "jobs and dignity" was the slogan of the marchers. I stand in this House tonight to ask the parliamentary secretary if he will make direct representations to his senior cabinet colleagues in order to provide some necessary and meaningful employment in eastern Nova Scotia.

The unemployment in Waterford, Dominion, Glace Bay, Sydney, Cape Breton county, Louisbourg and all of those surrounding communities is at a chronic level. It requires the political will of the Government of Canada. I am the first to admit that no government acting by itself can resolve the problems of chronic unemployment, nor is it the panacea in terms of creating jobs in eastern Nova Scotia but it must demonstrate political will. It must call together the partners: provincial, municipal, labour and business, in order to implement a plan which will put Canadians back to work. They are individuals who wish to contribute to Canadian society. If one were to review the history of that part of Canada, one would find clearly that those men and women made the ultimate sacrifice in World War I and World War II. There were numbers unprecedented for small communities such as those.

I ask here today, as I have asked time and time and time again for the Government of Canada, because of the plight of the unemployed in that area of our country, to come to their assistance. The first meaningful task must be to sit down with those players who are involved. It must come with a plan and to provide the necessary financing to implement that plan. I sincerely request that the parliamentary secretary give the serious weight of his consideration to this request because it is fundamental to those Canadians, their families and to the community at large that they have an opportunity to participate meaningfully in Canadian society. I ask this of the parliamentary secretary, whom I know to be an able and fair-minded individual.

• (1810)

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to his participation in the march and in a subsequent statement of his ongoing commitment, which is one I share and I think any government in this country shares, to see that economic prosperity exists even in those parts of our country that have the greatest hurdles to overcome in terms of their structure and their indigenous economy.

He said the first thing that should be done is to sit down, have some meetings and make a plan. The good news is that this has happened. After the march of concern in November, I am informed that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was among those that did meet at a follow-up meeting on December 5, which also involved labour, community as well as government representatives.

What the member is asking has happened. With respect to the second part of his question, the plan, even before these plans were established, ACOA and the government had recognized the need for special efforts in Cape Breton. In 1986, Enterprise Cape Breton introduced new programs in the area. The minister has already referred to the many millions of dollars that have been spent and further economic activity generated.

The solution that has been settled on by those who have dealt with this, most particularly Mr. Brait who had been asked to review the plan the member is calling for, recommended that the agencies all be put together into a single entity. That has now happened. The government has done that. This was part of the February budget to further implement this plan.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, some time ago, I think it was back in November 1991, I raised this question with the Prime Minister. My concern was at that time that Canadian farmers were afraid that this particular government might abandon its system of protecting poultry, egg and dairy production as a result of the ongoing GATT negotiations.

I emphasized at the time that the future of Canada's agriculture community hung in the balance. I asked the Prime Minister at that time and was answered by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, what particular measures the government was prepared to take to address this deepening crisis in our agricultural industry.

Subsequent to that question being raised in the House, we have had a number of debates with respect to the future of article XI, which is the protection of Canada's marketing boards and supply management structure within the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The concern has been raised increasingly among the dairy farmers across Canada that the government is preparing to abandon its support of article XI.

So far the government has failed to persuade the other 107 members of the GATT panel to strengthen and clarify the supply management provisions that are within article XI of the GATT agreement.

I want to reiterate just what is at stake should Canada's system of supply management become unravelled as a result of the government's lack of true commitment to maintaining article XI. We have 100,000 Canadian jobs at stake; 38,000 farmers across Canada, some 22,900 employees of those farmers and some 36,000 processing jobs. When you look at the economic impact, there is some $4.7 billion in potential losses in farm production in Canada and some $5.5 billion potential loss in processing. That could result in a loss of over $10 billion to the Canadian economy should supply management become unravelled in the near future.

I want to point out at this time that the loss of supply management through the ongoing negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will do to rural Canada what the free trade agreement has done to urban Canada. That is real genuine cause for concern in our agriculture community. If we lose our marketing boards, our producers will not even cover their costs of production and they would, in short order, be forced out of business.

The government has spun a good line in terms of its renewed commitment to article XI and the concept of supply management in Canada. But in fact when it brought down its first proposal to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade back in 1987 this proposal was not in support of supply management. This proposal was not in support of the strengthening of article XI. This proposal was, in no uncertain terms, a proposal for the tariffication of agricultural goods. Not only did the government at that time support tariffication, but it actually proposed measures for the introduction and phase-in of tariffs on agricultural commodities.

I take note, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. What I am saying is that the government seems to be duplicitous in this—

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question has not changed. Canada's position has not changed; it has always stayed the same. I do not know where my hon. colleague has been, but recently we have had many demands and trips and delegations sent to Geneva to negotiate. Some think that we changed our position, but it is still the same and it still maintains the four points that we have defended from the beginning.

First of all, we seek a major reduction in subsidies. What hurts is not marketing boards internationally but rather the huge subsidies to support agriculture and production, especially in Europe and the United States. We want to have them reduced, and the GATT negotiations deal with them.

The second point we want is access to export markets. Of course if we want access to export markets, we must be able to import somewhere. As for developing the rules of GATT to clarify and strengthen article XI, we never changed our opinion on that, or on the objectives to establish a framework of rules to avoid misuse of health regulations as a way to prevent imports, for example.

That has always been sought. We never changed our mind and we keep on because the Canadian government honestly believes that marketing boards, including those for milk and poultry, have been successful and provided protection. Therefore they deserve to continue and to be defended.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS COLLEGE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, on December 6 I rose in the House and asked a couple of questions about the Emergency Preparedness Canada Centre in Arnprior, Ontario.

I should state, first of all, that the Emergency Preparedness Canada legislation was introduced in this House with great enthusiasm by the present Minister of Communications who was then Minister of National Defence. I was opposition critic at the time and we supported the legislation very strongly. I commended the minister at the time for his initiative because this legislation was brought in to replace the War Measures Act. It dealt with many things both national and international affairs.

During the election campaign in September 1988, the government announced a new building in the upgrading of the training centre in Arnprior, Ontario for the new Emergency Preparedness Canada operation. The building, it said, would be ready for operation by the end of 1990. It is still not built today.

When I asked the question in December, the Associate Minister of National Defence was very sympathetic to the cause because she knows that this legislation deals with such items as earthquakes, hurricanes, civilian disobedience, train wrecks, bush fires, floods, and so on. She related it to her home province of British Columbia. The key thing here is that the Arnprior location is an ideal one. It is close to the national capital area. There is an airport in Ottawa. We opened a new airport a short time ago in Arnprior which is owned by five municipalities, including Arnprior, Renfrew, Braeside, McNabb township. People are very proud of that facility.

The new facility would add a great deal. People will come from municipalities all across Canada. People will come from provincial and federal departments for training in the various areas that I have mentioned. There is easy transportation to get to the centre.

My concern is this: I know that there has been work within departments on the planning of this. This is such an important centre at this time when we have crises arising from time to time. Emergency Preparedness Canada is supposed to handle all of these crises in our society in the best way it can. The best facilities we can have for training, of course, proves that we are indeed committed to this program.

Because it was brought in with reasonable agreement by all parties, I would like to see the government come forward and tell us where this is at right now, when this new facility is going to be upgraded, and when the residence is going to be built. It was supposed to cost about $5.5 million in 1988 or 1989 dollar terms. It is probably up to around $7 million by now. Will the parliamentary secretary inform me and my constituents tonight just what is happening with this project at the present time.

I want to emphasize that people from the various parts of Canada have found it very handy to get to for training. Of course, Canadian Forces Base Petawawa is not far from the Arnprior location. There is a lot of talent there and we appreciate very much that the numbers at the base are being greatly increased.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am happy the member raised this. I share his enthusiasm for the provisions under the Emergency Preparedness Act and all that that entails. I am quite concerned this building has not been constructed yet because certainly, the one it is intended to replace is below standard. It is a dated building.

I guess with a lot of other things that are said in the course of election campaigns, they are not necessarily fiction, but the time is a little distorted. What happened in this case certainly is that everybody I know associated with the program there is anxious that the college have the benefit of these new facilities as soon as possible.

The recessionary impact and the realities of that have caused the government to put on hold a number of projects that we would have liked to have seen done already. Certainly, the planning for this building has been done. Everything has been worked on and so it is really a matter of time. I think understanding that, if we can just accept that as part of the need for some patience and to get out of the economic problems that we are in, the government can get ahead with that.

I would like to say further to the hon. member that in my role as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, I would be very happy to go with him into his constituency and visit these facilities. I have a personal strong interest in emergency preparedness with the work I am doing to bring about an international green corps that can respond on an emergency basis to environmental disasters just as the International Red Cross responds to disasters that affect humans.

All of this is very important. Canada does have a leading role to play. As the member was saying when his time ran out, this is an important facility. Some 2,600 Canadian government officials, federal, provincial and municipal, go through there every year as do people from the private sector and voluntary organizations.

All Canadians can be very proud of it. I would like to go with the member to his riding to look at these facilities so that we can keep moving this forward as he would like to see it move forward.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, speaking of emergency preparedness, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to follow up on my question to the Minister of the Environment of nearly two months ago it concerned the alarming information that many of us received on our return to Parliament in early February regarding the unprecedented and unexpected rate of depletion of the ozone layer, which as we all know protects the earth's inhabitants from the devastating effects of the sun's rays.

We perhaps had the best explanation of what is so serious about this situation and what is so inadequate about our response to date when the Globe '92 conference in Vancouver opened on Monday morning. The spokesperson for the European Community said that one of the reasons it is so difficult to get international action on these issues is that when it was a southern hemisphere problem, or we thought it was primarily a southern hemisphere problem, it was impossible for the northern countries to take action fast enough to get rid of ozone depleting substances. In January of this year we realized it was a northern hemisphere problem and suddenly we could take action.

I welcomed the minister's announcement yesterday about speeding up the date for complete elimination of the production and import of CFCs to 1995. I wonder why it took two months to do that when the United States was able to do it within a week and a half of the news from Nassau and from UNEP, and when the European Community was able to do the same within a matter of days.

None the less, the announcement from the minister yesterday falls short of what is needed to address this extremely serious question, because it does allow the continued production and import and use of HCFCs until the year 2020. That is 30 years from now. That does not seem to me a terribly urgent response to a terribly urgent problem, especially given the fact that HCFCs have been shown to be up to eight times more harmful than CFCs. Allowing the continued use of HCFCs and allowing them to be substituted for CFCs may lead us to no progress on this very urgent and serious situation of the depletion of the ozone layer.

The announcement by the minister leaves untouched such things as methyl chloroform, methane and other ozone-depleting substances that are substantially and many times more damaging than CFCs.

We have the European Community saying that by 1996 it will phase out HCFCs as well as CFCs, while Canada is waiting for 30 years to do that. Obviously it is not a question of technology or the European Community would not be able to set that kind of target. We know what can be done. I am very proud of Northern Telecom, a company in my riding and in many ridings across Canada that has been able to completely eliminate CFCs in what was, just a year ago, thought to be an essential use. Northern Telecom is showing more leadership than the government on this issue by saving $50 million a year by eliminating CFCs, and also making its technology available free to any country in the world that wants to use it.

I ask the government for the same kind of leadership.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Canada has been successful in reducing the consumption of CFCs well in advance of the requirement of the Montreal protocol. The result of Canada's aggressive stance on the CFC phase-out is that Canadian consumption is down by 45 per cent from 1986 levels. This is well ahead of current requirements under the protocol.

I am pleased to be able to inform the House of the new control program for CFCs and other ozone-depleting substances that the federal and provincial governments have adopted. The control program involves initiatives and commitments at both the federal and provincial levels. The new program was announced yesterday in Vancouver at the meeting of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment.

The Canadian phase-out schedule for CFCs will be accelerated by one year. Production and importation of new CFCs will be phased out by December 1995 at the latest. Consideration will be given to possible limited exceptions for the health care industry. The new date is five years in advance of the current requirement of the Montreal protocol.

Provincial governments will begin implementing the CFC recycling and recovery programs by the end of 1992. Mandatory recovery and recycling of CFCs already in use must now become the focus of Canada's efforts to protect the ozone layer. Recovery and recycling are necessary in order to achieve the accelerated phase-out date. Recovery and recycling are also important to prevent the release of CFCs during the servicing of existing equipment like refrigeration and air conditioning and to ensure that future servicing demands can be met after production of new CFCs ceases.

[Translation]

As far as HCFCs are concerned, while we were ahead of our program in the other area and even able to speed it up, I think that we will also be able to take very great care in this area, because as my colleague said, some substitutes can also harm the ozone layer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to be adopted.

YUKON WATERS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-52, an act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, just before I say one or two words about this particular bill, I would like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Labrador and the hon. member for Churchill for their co-operation in the speedy dispatch of this bill to a legislative committee where it can be studied in all its appropriate detail.

I have just a few words. This is second reading of Bill C-52, the Yukon Waters Act. It is one of two bills, the other being Bill C-51, the Northwest Territories Waters Act, that are important to northerners and indeed to all Canadians who have an interest in water management in the north.

Northerners have a special relationship with the environment. They see it as both productive and fragile. Above all else, they are keenly aware that the environment and especially the waters must be protected. Bill C-52 acknowledges and recognizes the value of Yukon's water resources. It also acknowledges that the legislation enacted in 1970, the current Northern Inland Waters Act, needs updating to be in tune with the requirements of the 1990s and indeed the requirements of the next century.

The new bill addresses inconsistencies and weaknesses that have come to light. It would be wrong to leave these problems uncorrected.

The amendments are an excellent example of what can be achieved through co-operation and consultation. By streamlining the administrative arrangements for water use in the north and by correcting the weaknesses in the current legislation, we are addressing the expressed needs of northerners and we are focusing on sustainable development and protection of the northern environment. This should and will turn into jobs and economic growth.

I recommend this bill for speedy passage so that we can move on with that task. I urge hon. members to give their support to the amendments to provide a solid basis for future water management in Yukon.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I would simply add to yesterday's comments that we support both these measures. We feel they are long overdue and necessary measures to give the people in those areas authority over their resources.

• (1010)

In my remarks yesterday I indicated that in spite of the fact that land claims were going on, all parties felt it was important to go ahead with these measures. However, I think we should insert a caveat and say that it does not mean that we should let up at all in our efforts to settle land claims.

Land claims are an important item throughout the north. It is at the top of the native agenda and it should be at the top of the agenda of this House and of the government. Land claims must be settled and people who live in the north must have more control over their resources, over their communities and over their lives.

The fact that we are seeing Canadians paying so much attention and giving so much prominence to the rights of native people in the constitutional debate and the very positive participation of the native people in the constitutional debate simply highlights the necessity for all of us to make every effort to see that land claims are speeded up and are settled with fairness so that people in the north can live their lives not simply with control but with dignity.

So I would simply add that caveat to my remarks of yesterday. On the other hand, we do support these measures and intend to give them speedy passage.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I will not be speaking very long on this bill.

This bill is very similar to its companion bill, C–51, which we dealt with yesterday in the House of Commons. It is my understanding that the bill has been the result of extensive consultations with the Yukon government and I know that our office was certainly informed of the developments as they went on. It is my belief that the legislation will improve the situation and allow for a lot more local control over water resources in the Yukon territory.

We have insisted that this go to committee to make sure that if there are any groups that feel they are adversely affected by this legislation, they have the opportunity to appear and to make sure, even though this bill appears to have gone through a proper process, that they are consulted and will not be adversely affected by the legislation.

Again, from the knowledge that we have of this legislation and from the consultations we have had with the Yukon government and with our leader, who happens to be the member for the Yukon, we believe that the legislation itself is very positive.

If I can just add a few remarks to my colleague from the Liberal Party, I recognize that in the Yukon the territorial government has signed a very extensive and comprehensive agreement with the Council of Yukon Indians and with federal officials.

I attended the aboriginal conference this last weekend in Ottawa where, in my group, one of the negotiators for the Council of Yukon Indians, Vic Mitander, was there. It was interesting how people, both white and aboriginal, from all across the country kept referring back to the comprehensive agreement that had been signed in the Yukon. They have looked at such things as large land settlements and the impact on the different regions in different parts of the Yukon, where concerning areas, such as wildlife, they had set up joint management boards to make sure that the native people and their traditional right to harvest the wildlife was included and part of the environmental planning. So it was a very comprehensive bill.

It recognized the inherent right to native self–government. It recognized that this was a very important issue, and it made sure it was not just lip service. They actually dealt with the problem.

Another interesting aspect of that settlement was the fact that it allowed for local negotiations to carry on for a number of years, recognizing that within the Yukon territory there were different situations in its various parts. If one group signed off something in an earlier period, perhaps in the next year or two, and another native group got a much better deal three or four years down the road, then the original signing group would have the right to reopen.

That is a positive and progressive step to rights. Something that seems good in one year, something that seems adequate in 1992–93 may not be adequate five or six years later. I think what we have in the Yukon is a living agreement, and I do not believe that the legislation we are passing in the House today would adversely affect that.

With those few words, we are happy to have this bill go to committee to see if there are any representations against the work that has been done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C–64, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find the House is in agreement with the reality that we would like to move through all stages of this bill in sequence. Maybe you could check with the House. There may be people at different stages who want to make brief interventions, but that is our intention.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, yes indeed there is concurrence that this move forward quickly.

[Translation]

I just wanted to point out that as I understand it, this is the second time an extension has been sought. I am told that if a third extension were necessary, it could be very difficult. So the message has gotten through. Let us go ahead, but please let us try to solve this question as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, again it is my pleasure to speak on this piece of legislation.

I would expound upon the comments of the Liberal member that we recognize this is an extension for the Northwest Territories to allow more time to put in the required legislation.

We have a letter from Dennis Patterson to our leader dated March 13, 1992. It was written on behalf of the Yukon government and requests that this legislation be an extension for one final time. I think it is very important that the requirements of the language act be adhered to, recognizing the native diversity in the north and recognizing the difficulties that do exist in the Northwest Territories because of the number of communities and the vast size of the territories.

At the same time, I am very pleased that the Northwest Territories Minister of Justice has said in his letter to us that this is an extension for one final time.

• (1020)

I concur with the passage of this legislation. As was indicated by the government whip, we would agree to passage at all stages at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give its unanimous consent to proceed to all stages?

Some hon. members: Agreed.
