Given that the government and the minister are fully aware of the impact of this definition on the Canadian economy, is he willing today to commit his government to withdraw from the North American free trade talks and not to sign the agreement before this definition is agreed to?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is aware that in the Uruguay round negotiations there has been a good definition of subsidy. It is more extensive than I think had been considered by my hon. friend and his colleagues prior to the announcement of the December 20 Dunkel paper. It affects subsidies by other countries that affect our markets in third countries. I think that is a substantial step forward.

It also affects subsidies that are provided by state governments in the United States that again adversely affect our markets in the United States. There is a major step forward here if we are able to get a successful Uruguay round negotiation.

I can assure my hon. friend that if we get that we will be carrying it through as much as we can into the NAFTA negotiations.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Ahmed Hassan Diria, Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Co-operation for Tanzania.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow, Tuesday, March 31, 1992, as an allotted day.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 81 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table the fifth report of the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations.

This report recommends that the Public Service Commission adopt regulations under the Public Service Employment Act to protect the rights of parties to appeals under sections 21 and 31 of the act. The report reaffirms the committee's earlier recommendations contained in its ninth report in 1988.

The committee finds that for our public servants there is an absence of procedural safeguards to ensure that the appeal process contains the basic requirements of fairness and equity.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-340, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (disqualifications of electors).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

• (1510)

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, historically those sentenced to imprisonment in penitentiaries have been prohibited from voting. Recently, however, the courts have cast some doubts on this historic penalty. This bill is introduced with the intention of clarifying this fact and provides that any person convicted of an indictable offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary is not qualified to vote in a federal election, unless the person is granted full parole or a statutory release or is no longer imprisoned on account of a remission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Redway moves that the bill be now read a first time and be printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia.

They point out that a Vancouver based company has announced its intention to divert the water of a British Columbia river through a medium of canals, pipelines and other river channels into the San Diego, California area.

This petition is simply requesting the federal government to state categorically the terms of policy that our fresh waters will never be dammed and diverted into the U.S.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on an unrelated matter, another topic, the petitioners are again from Kamloops, British Columbia.

They call upon Parliament to take immediate steps to specify that accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules do not constitute employee misconduct under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by residents of Calgary, Toronto, Halifax, Edmonton, Montreal, Ottawa, Bowmanville, Deep River—

Mr. Boudria: Any from Hawkesbury?

Mr. Milliken: I do not see any from Hawkesbury but they are also from Vancouver and Kelowna, B.C. and from Thornhill and Unionville, Ontario. I may say that this petition clearly has been round the country.

These petitioners are concerned about crimes of violence against the person. They request that Parliament recognize crimes of violence as being serious and abhorrent to society and request that an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act be made by this House to reflect that concern.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present this petition on behalf of my constituents who urge the government to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to present a petition on behalf of First Nations, many of whom have signed this particular petition against the dreaded GST.

It asks that the government be responsible to the citizens of First Nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiency of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nations both on or off reserve lands and those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserve lands.

The First Nations of Canada are immune from such taxation by virtue of their aboriginal treaty right and the GST affronts that right.

TRANSPORTATION SAFETY

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition to the House today that deals with the question of the transportation safety system on the coast of British Columbia. It involves the lighthouse system.

The petitioners urge that the government, now that it has cancelled the ill-founded program to destaff lighthouses, begin the process of lighthouse program upgrading.

This petition comes from a large number of people from Port Hardy, British Columbia, and has resulted from meetings in Prince Rupert, Port Hardy, Campbell River and on down the coast of British Columbia.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 223.

I ask that this response be made an order for return and if so, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

*Question No. 223—Mr. Flis:

With respect to Canadian participation in the trade show held in Monterrey, Mexico in January 1992 (a) who were the participants (b) were any of their air tickets paid for by the government, and if so, how many (c) was External Affairs involved in the purchase and distribution of tickets and, if so, for what reasons (d) how much was spent on accommodation, air fare, floor space and signs (e) were profit making companies attending the show subsidised by the government and, if so, for what reasons?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You will know, sir, as will all colleagues in the House that a question has been standing in my name dating back to last September. The question asks for the expense accounts of deputy ministers.

I would ask my colleague across the way, given his undertaking of some weeks ago now, that the matter would be addressed in the near future, whether or not he will undertake to respond to that question no later than tomorrow?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised this question on a number of occasions as you well know. I have given him an undertaking to check this answer out and to see what I could do to speed it up.

In that vein I had two or three conversations last week asking that the answer be finished and delivered to the hon. member as quickly as possible. I had hoped I would have been able to table the answer today. I am not able to do that obviously, and I cannot commit to tomorrow. I can assure him I will do everything in my power to get him an answer as quickly as possible, because he does deserve it.

Mr. Boudria: I thank the member for his answer. The member and the House will know that as long as that question is on the Order Paper I cannot ask another one, that is to say that the Order Paper is loaded. We are only entitled to four questions each.

An hon. member: Let us change that.

Mr. Boudria: I am not in any way blaming the member across the way. But I do want to state that had I asked that question of ministers, I know I would have received the answer a long time ago. I find it particularly puzzling that an answer that is requested of deputy ministers takes such a long time to come.

Again I do not blame the member across the way. But I would invite those who read Hansard to bear it in mind.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEBT SERVICING AND ACCOUNT REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Nickel Belt concluded his remarks right at two o'clock and I wonder if it is your intention to offer a period of questions or comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments are for the first two speakers. I am sorry.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on third reading of Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

This bill is very important for our country and it is very simple. Mr. Speaker, this morning and last week you heard, unfortunately, the opposition criticize this bill as usual.

In practical terms, the purpose of this legislation is to establish a special account in which the net revenue generated from the GST, from privatization and from the donations made by Canadians will be accounted for. When we talk about net revenue generated from the GST, we mean all the revenue that the government gets from the GST, minus the moneys given back to low income Canadians, through the annual tax credits that we know, and that Canadians know. This is what we mean when we refer to net revenue generated from the GST. When we talk about net revenue generated from privatization—that is the sale of corporations that belong to the government—the sale price, minus the expenses linked to the sale, gives us the net amount.

The opposition is criticizing this special account. One of the comments made against this good piece of legislation is that the government does not have any money, whether the revenue generated from the GST is in a specific account or in a general account. When we implemented the GST, the people in my constituency of Trois-Rivières and across the country wanted to be sure that this government, or another one in five or ten years—maybe, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think so—would not be able to use the revenue generated by the GST for purposes other than the payment of interests on our debt and the payment of the debt itself. Canadians wanted to make sure that this revenue would not be used to set up new programs and spend even more money. That is the primary reason for this special account.

The opposition always wants more money, more programs and more spending, because it has no idea of the economic reality of this country, no awareness of the national debt that we inherited from the Liberal Party. That is why they want us to continue spending. The purpose of this bill is precisely to ensure that the net revenue generated from the GST will be used only to pay interest. The same goes for the revenue generated from the sale of Crown corporations.

Last week the opposition criticized the sale of government owned corporations. I can tell you that in 1984 as well as in 1988, in my constituency of Trois-Rivières, people approved the federal government decision to cease competing, through corporation XYZ, with the private sector. The federal government is there to manage a country, not to compete with the private sector. The only negative comment that I heard from my constituents regarding privatization is that maybe we have not sold enough corporations since we were elected. I had to explain to my constituents that the former government left us with corporations that were in the same state as the government, that is they were in debt and it is not always easy to sell companies that are in debt and that lose money. You have to first set them back on their feet, so that they have a positive financial sheet, and then try to sell them.

The third element in this bill is donations from Canadians. I want to emphasize the fact that since we first announced this legislation some 10 months ago, the federal government has received $375,000 in donations from Canadians. Those Canadians sent money strictly to help us pay the interest on our debt and, eventually, to pay the debt itself. Mr. Speaker, it is important to mention this fact: to this day, the government has received $375,000.

I want to take this opportunity to invite Canadians who believe in Canada and who have the financial means to make a little donation to help our country pay that high interest on our enormous debt. I can hear my colleague talk about the debt that we have created. Allow me to remind him of the economic realities.

When the 1974–75 budget was tabled, the debt stood at $27 billion. That was the national debt and the party of my colleague, the Liberal Party of Canada, was in power.

In 1984–85, the fiscal year during which we were elected, the debt was $206 billion. What did they do in 1984–85? Well, it was easy. They had an operating deficit of $16.5 billion, in other words, the Liberal government at the time spent $16.5 billion more than it received in revenue. On top of that, the Liberal government paid $22 billion in interest. For every tax dollar received, the government had to pay $1.33 to service the debt. That was the kind of fiscal management we got from the Liberal government in 1968, 1974–75, whatever, until 1984–85.

This year, we will have an operating surplus of $10 billion, which means, for the benefit of the people watching us, that in 1984–85 we took an operating deficit of $16.5 billion and in eight years turned it into a surplus of $10 billion. In eight years we actually were able to turn a $16 billion deficit into a $10 billion surplus, which means a difference of $26 billion. How we did it? The opposition will say we increased taxes. Yes, there have been some tax increases since 1984, but there has also been some real management in this country.

The average increase in program spending by the Progressive Conservative government has been 3.9 per cent annually. The average increase for the Liberals was 13.8 per cent per year. In other words, the Liberal government increased its expenditures and increased budget spending but ignored the other side of the balance sheet. There are two sides: expenditures and revenue, but it conveniently ignored the revenue side and in the process left the country with a debt of $206 billion.

Members are going to say: you Conservatives doubled the debt. That is just not true. If we look at what the debt was in 1984, and it was $200 billion, and if we calculate the annual interest this government has had to pay on the debt, and if we add the interest paid annually, we have today a debt that has doubled, but 50 per cent of that amount is interest, interest on the debt we inherited.

Mr. Speaker, you will often hear people say the GST was not a good idea, and that it should be suspended for a couple of years. Or the Liberal Party says it would get rid of the GST and tax something else. What would it tax, Mr. Speaker? Nobody knows.

I say the GST was not necessarily popular, but something we needed. I do not think this government was elected to be popular. It was elected to make economic and administrative decisions that are right for this country. In 1992, being a politician and a federal member is not a popularity contest but a contest in effectiveness. Unfortunately, the opposition seems intent on making it a popularity contest. It does not understand the problems involved in managing and putting in place an economy that is sound, that will attract investment, and that will create jobs and prosperity.

That is important. The GST gives us significant income every year. It is also good for business. We know that both those who produce and sell in Canada and those who produce and sell abroad benefit with the GST compared to the former federal sales tax. Mr. Speaker, you will remember the old federal sales tax that was in effect for 65 years. For 10, 15 or 20 years, people had been saying that it was a bad tax for the economy. It helped imports and hurt exports, it should be abolished, it had 22,000 exemptions and applied to only 75,000 businesses across the country. It was a tax that had to be changed. We were the only country in the world that still had such a tax. We had to get rid of it. The best thing would have been to get rid of it completely and not talk about it. But due to the incompetence of the previous Liberal government, we had a debt to pay. When you have a debt to pay, you must have income. That is why the GST was implemented. It is a reliable source of revenue and needed to stop the haemorrhaging that we inherited in 1984.

I often hear people on the other side of the House say that we should stop talking about 1984, because it was seven or eight years ago. I would prefer not to talk about the debt if there were none, but there is one. We must tell the people where we are. To explain where we are, we must see where we came from. The starting point is what we inherited. Well in 1984 we inherited a huge debt. Over the years, we have had to pay interest on that debt. Over the years, we have turned a $16-billion operating deficit into a $10-billion operating surplus. Even if the opposition shouts and makes a fuss, that is a reality we have had to live with and this government is working on. It is meeting its responsibilities and doing things—

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is nearly up. But I would like to emphasize the debt problem and what goes with it. It means that this year the federal government will spend $41 billion on interest. On interest alone, we will spend $41 billion this year. The biggest expense item in the federal government's whole budget is the interest on the debt. Even with lower interest rates, it is more than total spending for old age security pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance and veterans' pensions. My point is this: can you imagine how lucky and pleased we would be to govern if we did not have the $41 billion interest burden to pay? Mr. Speaker, can you imagine how much more we could do for Canadians if we did not have to pay $41 billion in interest on a debt that we did not even create but that we inherited, and I do mean inherited?

Even if the hon. member opposite does not like it, in Trois-Rivières where I come from, we have a saying, "The truth hurts." He looks offended, so that means it is true.

Mr. Milliken: I am shocked.

Mr. Vincent: Truth is often shocking, but one must live with it.

That being said, we have taken difficult measures in almost all sectors, almost all departments, to streamline government operations, to bring government operations in line with Canadian economic reality. People often complain that the federal government spends needlessly and does things it should not. They are right, Mr. Speaker. On the other hand, I defy any Canadian family or business to demonstrate that nowhere does their budget reveal expenditures totalling 1 per cent which are considered an honest mistake, an unconscious extravagance. One per cent is a very small sum, in a family or business budget which might have been used differently.

If one takes for granted a 1 per cent margin as acceptable, I would suggest that he or she refers to the federal government estimates which one might set, for our purpose, at $150 billion. Mr. Speaker, 1 per cent of $150 billion is $15 billion. I therefore say to Canadians that, unfortunately, 1 per cent of government expenditures probably escape our control for one reason or another, for lack of resources or because monitoring costs in the 40 departments, in all agencies and across Canada would be greater than the sums involved. We are still talking of $15 billion, a large sum for Canadian taxpayers. It is easy to spell out $15 billion, but if we were writing the figure, how many zeros would be required? It would be too long. So we agree that $15 billion is a lot of money.

However, it is a reality which one must accept. This is part of an enormous system in a huge country which must live within its means and make do with whatever good or bad we do have. In closing, I hope that my hon. colleagues from the opposition—whether from the Liberal Party or from the New Democratic Party—will think positively for a change, instead of criticizing all the time, while never coming up with a solution.

Mr. Speaker, when you go to your doctor with the flu and he tells you: "Well, you should not have gone out without wearing something on your head. You should have put on your boots. You should have worn a coat but I have no pills for you, no remedy, nothing." Only a very peculiar physician would act like that! That is somewhat like what is going on with the opposition here. We never have the right cap, the right footwear, the right coat, but at the same time they never have remedies to offer, Mr. Speaker, no constructive suggestions to get this country moving again instead of advocating, as the Liberals do in particular, that the GST be abolished and that taxes should be collected from other sources. It is easy to say "we would collect taxes from other sources", but that is not what the Canadian people want to hear and it does nothing to help the government either, Mr. Speaker. What does help is constructive ideas.

The criticism from the NDP does not help either. They keep saying that many people do not pay taxes. That is absolutely not true, Mr. Speaker, and we know it, you and I. Companies pay their fair share of taxes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was allowed more time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is a 10 minute question and comment period and the time allowed for the debate is 20 minutes. Is there unanimous consent to let the parliamentary secretary complete his remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues. I must admit that I was under the impression that I had an unlimited time as second speaker.

Mr. Milliken: The standing rules were changed for 40 minutes. In any event, you are not the second speaker, nor the first.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has only 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments. The Minister of State lost his turn. Then the number two speaker had 40 minutes. There were two 40 minute speakers and now you are the number three speaker which is 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments. I regret it but I think that is the way we are going to have to go. We will let you have two more minutes and then questions and comments.

• (1540)

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to conclude by thanking my colleagues for allowing me to prolong my speech and by urging them to vote in favour of Bill C-21.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the speech astounds me. If I can summarize quickly my understanding of it, it says everything in the world that is wrong has been the responsibility of the Liberal Party. Although there is some truth to that, the rest of the argument is: "I would rather be unpopular than follow any other advice that is given in here".

I have to say that the Conservative Party is truly unpopular and from that point of view it is an outstanding success. It would rather impose the GST than be popular. It would rather impose the Canada-U.S. trade agreement than be popular. It would rather impose the North American free trade agreement than be popular. It would rather be unpopular and not reduce the interest rates. It would rather be unpopular and not allow the dollar to go down. It would rather be unpopular and not put in a municipal infrastructure system. It would rather be unpopular and not put in an inheritance tax or a minimum corporate tax or a fairer corporate and income tax. These things were all positive ideas and suggestions put forward in the House. It does not accept them.

He wonders what we can offer from this side of the House to a party that has been as successful as the Conservative Party in this government in becoming the most unpopular government in the history of Canada.

We could offer an election and that will solve the problem. I wonder if he understands, and even the Prime Minister understands, what democracy is? Democracy relates directly to popularity which means enjoying the confidence of the people. This government does not enjoy the confidence of the people. It is four years into its mandate and it is time to go to the polls before it destroys anything else.

There was a beautiful line put forward by the member: "I look forward to campaigning against these people when they stand up and we would rather be right and unpopular". My God, they are truly unpopular, but the only problem is they are not right either. When one does not enjoy the confidence of the people then one is wrong by definition. The majority of people in this country do not want that trade agreement. They do not want the North American trade agreement. They do not want high interest rates. They do not want the dollar so high. They want to get rid of the GST. They want a municipal infrastructure system and they want a fair tax system.

This government has failed to deliver all of these which have been constructive suggestions from this side of the House. The government has been a fiasco. Its operating principle comes from when the Prime Minister stood up and said: "I would rather be right than popular". Damn it, Mr. Speaker, he ain't right and he ain't popular.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, certainly I wish to reply to my colleague. He says the people did not want free trade. I would like to remind him that in 1988 we were elected on that very platform. My colleague says there is no minimum tax for companies. I must remind him that it is just not so; companies are subject to a minimum tax. He also says there is no minimum tax for individuals. I must also remind him that there is a minimum income tax for individuals; therefore, everybody in Canada, companies and individuals, must pay their fair share of taxes.

My colleague says it is abnormal and undemocratic to be so unpopular. A politician's mandate is to be elected in order to administer his country. We were democratically elected and we are managing the country; some of our measures do not necessarily please everyone. Mr. Speaker, a strong politician must do whatever is best for the good of the country and that is part of democracy.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I will state, in answer to my colleague saying he was eager to campaign against us, that I am eager to see how the New Democratic Party does in Trois-Rivières. All I wish is that this time they round up enough players for a game of rummy.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to speak on this bill at second reading. I stated then what a silly piece of legislation it was. I am of course convinced that statement was true then and it is still true today.

[Translation]

I am surprised by the remarks of the hon. member who just spoke because I believe the bill to be great fraud. It is simply a document prepared for the next election campaign. It is very appropriate for the Conservative Party for there is not one ounce of sensibility.

[English]

It is a ridiculous bill, Mr. Speaker, and I invite you and the Solicitor General, who I know is very attentive to speeches in this House, to consider what this bill can be used for. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, if you were a person with a debt. You have a bank account. Your banker is deducting your monthly payments from the bank account. Suppose you go to the banker and say: "I can set up a special account at your bank, open a new account and deposit all my pension income into that account. Out of that account I would like you to pay the interest payments on my debt and in fact, retire the debt out of this special account that I am going to create". The banker says: "Yes, that sounds like a great idea. It is a duplicate set of bank charges, but no problem, we'll set up the account for you and you put your pension cheques into the account and we'll deduct the payments from it".

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, your payments are $1,000 a month. You open this account and you know $1,000 is going to go out to the banker every month. But suppose that you do not tell the banker in advance that your pension cheques are only $250 a month. Clearly there is not enough then in the account to pay the $750 balance that is owing to the bank every month. What will the banker do? He will take it out of your original account, the big one. You will not notice. He will just keep taking it out of both. It will not have made any difference that you opened the account.

That is exactly what the government is doing in this bill. The only trouble is that the Canadian people are the bankers. They are the ones who are being hoodwinked by this nonsense. Even the Solicitor General is laughing. He knows this bill is a complete fraud.

It has been introduced in this House and Parliament is being used as a Tory propaganda printing operation. All the government is going to do is run around the country with this bill saying: "We have set up a special program so that all your GST dollars will go to reducing the national debt". Of course it will.

Let us listen to the figures. Here are the government's estimates for this year. This is the spending authority it has asked for from Parliament. How much does it want to service the public debt? Forty billion, 200 million dollars, $40 billion in round figures. How much has it raised from the GST this year, the money that is going into this special account to pay the debt? This is the deficit reduction account. Bill C–21 is entitled the debt servicing and reduction account act.

Well there will not be any reducing. There will be absolutely no reducing as a result of the passage of this bill. The debt will stay the same because there is not going to be enough money in this account to pay the interest, the $40 billion a year that the government has asked for in this year's spending estimates.

Let us look at the latest financial statement published by the Government of Canada, dated March of this year, for the first nine months of the financial year ending on March 31, 1992.

Goods and services tax revenues during the period, if I am reading this correctly, and the minister I am sure will correct me if I am not, is $11,000,000,190 and the government is going to spend $40 billion in interest. Where is the correspondence here? Where is the reduction of the national debt going to be from this account? Where is the other $30 billion coming from?

Let us be generous for a moment and assume that another $4 billion in the GST will come in in the first three months, that is, January, February and March 1992 which will bring us to the end of the financial year.

Unless there is a lot coming in tomorrow, I assume that the government is not going to get much more than $4 billion in that period. Maybe I am wrong. Perhaps there is some unexpected windfall on the way, but let us assume it is $4 billion. That puts it up to $15 billion, less than a third of the amount required to pay the interest alone on the public debt.

If we look at Bill C–21, it says that the amount from the sale of Crown corporations is going to go in there, too. That might last for a year, but given the way this government has been selling off our Crown corporations at fire sale prices thanks to the Minister of State for Privatization and his incompetent management of the sale of these things, we are ending up with less money than ever from the sale of Crown corporations. There are not that many left to dispose of.

A lot of them are being wound up. A lot of them are going bankrupt, just like this government is going bankrupt, both in ideas and in cash. It has overspent for seven years, and now what it is saying to Canadians is: "Let us try to hoodwink you into thinking that we are going to do something at last about the national debt".

It has gone up by leaps and bounds, ever since the Tories took office. They never got the deficit on an annual basis under control. They have doubled the national debt in their term in office already, and it is going beyond that now.

Now they come to Parliament and say: "Pass a special bill to create a special fund into which all the GST revenues will go. Then in the election campaign we can run around the country telling Canadians that we have committed ourselves to putting all the GST revenue to the national debt."

Great promise that is, when the GST revenues will not even cover the annual interest payments on that national debt. The statements amount to nothing but a complete fraud on the Canadian taxpayer.

This bill is being printed at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers in order to convince them that something is happening which is not happening. It is a game of smoke and mirrors. People are going to be duped by this. This will be an effort. The government will boast all around the country that it has done something with GST revenues to make sure they are not spent on other things.

What is the real restraint? Suppose the government tomorrow decides to go ahead with some new policy on handing out money as it does to its advertising agencies to advertise something about the Government of Canada. How much is it going to spend advertising this new fund? I wonder.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast is familiar with government advertising procedures. He used to be a supporter of the government, and he knew what it used to do. He must realize it will commit all kinds of fraud with this advertising campaign. It will spend millions of dollars handing out advertising contracts to Tory fat cats.

Mr. Lewis: Naturally.

Mr. Milliken: Naturally, says the Solicitor General. Of course they will. They have to advertise this bill. They have to convince Canadians that their money is being spent wisely and it isn't.

This is a sheer public relations exercise, a smoke and mirrors game that the government is involved in at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. How much is the government spending to get this bill through this House? How much is it costing in terms of time wasted in Parliament dealing with such a silly bill as this?

It was months in committee.

Mr. Lewis: Sit down.

Mr. Milliken: The Solicitor General invites me to sit down. I know that he will want to participate in this debate too, so I will wait until he is finished his notes.

Canadians realize that this bill is not something worth while and that money is being wasted in putting it through here. There will be a further advertising campaign as there was for free trade, for the GST and for all kinds of unpopular measures introduced by this government. We get it every time we turn around.

Canadians will say: "Why is this money being spent to establish a fund that does absolutely no good?"

I put a question on the Order Paper today asking how many person-years are going to be set aside in the Public Service to administer this fund which will do absolutely nothing to assist in reducing the deficit or the national debt of Canada. I will get an answer, I suppose, in due course.

But the government must have projected somebody to cook the books every year to figure out how this is to be done. There will be somebody from the Auditor General's office doing an audit on it every year to make sure that the government has lived up to the terms of this act by making sure the money is transferred into this phoney account and then back out again to pay the interest on the debt.

I suppose we will go through all this bookkeeping exercise in order to give the Conservative Party some kind of campaign brochure, some kind of document that it can run about with during the election and say it has actually done something about the national debt when in fact all it has done is make it worse.

When looking at the record, the litany, in fact, of broken promises of this government and thinking particularly of child care and the hullabaloo that was made about that, one can only imagine what this bill represents in terms of promise.

I well recall during the last campaign the Prime Minister ran around the country saying that we would have had child care if it were not for the evil Senate. It was the Senate, the Liberal-dominated Senate—and thank goodness it was Liberal-dominated at the time and it is a shame that it is not any more. I know the Solicitor General regrets that. The Senate at the time of course blocked the legislation, according to the Prime Minister, that would have implemented a child care scheme in Canada.

The Senate offered to sit all weekend to get the bill through but the Prime Minister would have none of that. No, no. He dissolved Parliament instead. He then went to the people saying that child care was killed because of the Senate.

Now we know it was never the government's intention to proceed with it. It has never proceeded with it and the Minister of National Health and Welfare just the other day said there would be no national child care scheme.

That had just been another fraud on the people of Canada. They had been deceived and duped by a government that never had any intention of proceeding with such a scheme. It simply used it as a convenient vehicle during the election campaign and then dropped the whole idea once it got into office again.

That is what this bill represents. It does nothing substantive. It does nothing whatever to reduce the debt. It does nothing whatever to ensure that Canadian taxpayers' dollars are spent wisely because the government can increase its expenditures in any area and then just claim that the deficit has gone up.

Whatever the GST revenues are, they will go into this special fund. But what difference does it make, because if the debt keeps getting bigger it does not matter how much goes into the fund. It has to match and it does not match. It will not match. If they doubled the GST it probably still would not match the interest payments required on this debt. This is not the solution. It is merely posturing for the purposes of an election campaign which Canadians want just as soon as it can be arranged.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I find this bill something of a real farce because when we talk about reduction of the debt, reduction means diminishing the debt. Our debt at the present time is around $420 billion. This year's deficit is over $30 billion.

So as the hon. member said, what does this bill really do? It opens another account, an account that will simply serve the purpose of paying out money. Instead of having one account, there will be two accounts. There will be auditors, jobs for accountants, jobs for bureaucrats.

The whole problem of this government is it never faced the problem of Canada's debt in 1984. Up to 1980 the net debt of Canada was very small. It increased after the 1980 election, but before that it could be handled.

Since 1984, one-third of Canada's debt is foreign-owned. This is another of those tragedies because before that the debt was owed to Canadians, now it is owed to foreigners. We have to follow orders from the International Monetary Fund and from the World Bank. We are no longer masters in our own house.

This bill is a ploy to win elections or the government thinks it can win an election with this bill. Can it? I do not think so. Canadians have been fooled many times, but this time they will not be fooled. They will be able to see through this bill and see that this money is simply more revenues for the government for more spending.

When the GST was introduced, at that time the compliance cost to small business was calculated to be about $4 billion.

Because of the GST we are now in a recession. I remember the Minister of Finance just a couple of months ago saying that there is no recession, that we are progressing, that we are doing very well. The reality is that at the present time in certain areas of the country we have unemployment of 20 and 30 per cent. Industry is not moving into Canada; it is moving out of Canada.

• (1600)

A recent report of a study done in Montreal shows that Canada is losing a thousand jobs a day. It is unbelievable. We are losing jobs that go out of Canada into the United States or elsewhere in the world.

Instead of addressing the problem of industrialization, of creating new jobs and new opportunities for young Canadians, we are simply bringing in a bill that says:

> An act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

It is a simple bill, only four pages. This bill is going to create jobs for accountants, for auditors, but it will not reduce one penny of our national debt.

I believe that in the next federal election this government is going to go around the country telling us that the GST serves to reduce the national debt. But, as we know, the interest payment on the national debt is around $40 billion. How much does the GST collect? It depends on the activity of the economy, but let's say on the average around $15 billion, a little bit more than one-third. This money will go simply to service the interest on the national debt. Whether we put it in the general account or in a special account makes no difference.

I would like to go back to 1984. At that time we were collecting $70 billion from the taxpayers and we would spend around $110 billion or $40 billion more than we collected. Between 1984 and 1991 we took in $40 billion more through taxation, through the taxation of average Canadians. Now we are collecting around $110 billion, but we still spend $30 to $40 billion more a year.

This legislation will not serve the purpose of reducing our national debt. You know that, Mr. Speaker, because if you had the same type of administration in your house you would be bankrupt. But, no, what we are doing is that we are going outside the country to borrow money. We borrow money on the world market. I have to say that up to 1984 we used to borrow money, but we used to borrow money from Canadians, from their savings. Now Canadians do not have enough money. They cannot lend the money so we have to go outside the country. We are not masters of our own house any more. This is the tragedy of this administration.

It did not address the problems when it was first elected and now it tries to solve the problem through a system that is not going to work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, when I examine Bill C-21 concerning the deficit, I was struck by the simple fact that the deficit has become an incredible burden for all Canadian taxpayers.

My colleague from Alberta mentioned that from 1984 to 1990-1991, the government of Canada had a revenue surplus from Canadian taxpayers. It is true that in a period of prosperity the Government of Canada could get much higher revenues that expected. Despite that, we found ourselves with an increased accumulated debt.

I am not trying to say here that the Conservative government is totally to be blamed for the deficit. That is not what I am trying to say at all.

There has been a lack of fiscal responsibility in this country for a good 15 to 20 years. I do not blame solely the Conservatives. I simply want to show that the problem is mainly in the way that Canadians are taxed. Is there something more fundamental in a democracy than the way in which we tax individuals and companies?

Twenty-five years ago, here in Canada, we had the chance to get a royal commission, the Carter commission. At that time, Mr. Kenneth Carter was the person responsible for that royal commission, which mandate was to modernize, if you will, the tax system in our country. That document was considered revolutionary in those days; it was even used as a taxation model for modern countries in classes at Harvard University in the United States. Afterwards, many parts of the Carter commission report were used by Scandinavian countries wishing to rejuvenate their taxation systems, to improve their fairness and equity.

And what did we do in Canada? We did not even publish the report. Why? The answer is simple enough: the financial elite did not find it favourable enough. Therefore we never heard about it. It was never published and Canadians never had access to a most remarkable document. Kenneth Carter, that great Canadian, offered a tremendous service to our country but, his work was still not published.

Where is the problem? It is quite simple: in this country the financial elite protects its own interests; good for them. It does not protect your interests or mine, nor those of most of my colleagues, but it protects its own. That is why the middle class must compensate, it must make up the remaining tax revenue the government needs to operate.

And then comes Bill C-21; some sort of camouflage which I fail to understand. We know quite well that all revenues are added to the Consolidated Revenue Fund at the federal and provincial levels. Will we solve the debt problem by creating this other fund? No way. What we need is a thorough reform of our taxation system to make it be fair and equitable. Naturally, such a reform would improve the people's confidence and I am sure it would contribute to getting us out of our present situation.

As my colleague from Alberta mentioned, it is very unfortunate that, in recent years, we have had to go abroad to borrow. It is most regrettable because ever since the Confederation, and that means more than 120 years, we always could count on Canadian savings to finance government operations. Now, as my colleague was saying, we are forced to go abroad and we are no longer even masters in our own house. That is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. There should even be a law preventing the government from going to the international market if it is unable to finance its own operating costs. It should be done internally. We are not a banana republic; we are a sophisticated country.

We have money markets in our country. We should not have to go to the international market, except of course for capital spending, which is quite different, because this spending would generate revenue. However, there is nothing forcing us to go to the international market.

Finally, this whole deficit issue is creating a climate of fear in the country and people are right to be worried. We have seen the effects of free trade on our economy and on industry in this country. The government is continually using the deficit as a bogeyman to frighten everyone. Instead of frightening us, it should submit concrete measures. As I said, such a concrete measure would be a real reform of our tax system. People have been demanding it for years. I believe that it is essential. Without it, we will not regain Canadians' confidence in this area.

Moreover, when we look at the deficit, we see that interest rates do a great deal to raise it. That is something else we should look at as a government, because we are part of it here. If we are not part of the solution, of course we create problems here. We must understand that. The deficit is not due to a single thing, as our illustrious Prime Minister often tries to have us believe. He blames us for the deficit and says that it was created when the Liberals were in power. But that is so simplistic it does not even deserve a reply.

The deficit problem is due to several things. First, there must be a real reform so that all Canadians, especially the middle class, who are paying more than their share now, know that they are not being victimized. We know that is happening now. We must deal with that issue because it is a matter of trust.

Second, we must at all costs protect the gains we have made here in Canada, especially our industrial infrastructure which has been very hard hit since free trade. I say that by the next election, this question of free trade will again be an issue, because many have suffered from this hurriedly signed deal. Recently I read that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, especially the Quebec branch, did a study and now says that after the fact that it realizes that before we signed the free trade agreement, there should have been a transition period of at least five years so that we could adjust to it.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my speech on Bill C-21. If there is one thing I would like to see instead of the fund mechanism, knowing that all revenue goes to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, it is to ask the government to deal with the problem that is undermining the confidence of all Canadians, namely the unjust and unfair tax system. That is what we should deal with first. If we show our good faith by making the system fair for all Canadians, we will see all taxpayers regain hope and confidence.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, like all members of this House I was very impressed by the hon. member's speech. His ideas were so well expressed, his arguments so incisive that I was amazed. I would like to ask him a question. On the subject of the deficit, does he think the budget brought down by the government about a month ago will increase or decrease the deficit? I would like to refer to a small item in the budget which consists of reducing the tax on dividends paid by Canadian companies to their parent companies abroad. The tax was reduced from 10 to 5 per cent for dividend payments paid abroad. Does the hon. member think this is fiscally responsible? Does he think it will increase foreign investment in Canada? If the answer to the last question is yes, does he think it is a good thing for Canadians to increase the level of foreign investment in this country?

Mr Assad: Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's first question, I am not convinced—and my opinion is based on a number of articles that I read on the subject—that the budget brought down by the government will decrease the deficit. Certainly not. And that is because the expenditures it must cover are not capital expenditures. Since it is going to continue in the same vein, it seems to me there will be an increasing number of people who will find it difficult to pay their debts, and there will be less revenue going into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I do not see how that is going to help reduce the deficit.

As for the hon. member's second question, when we realize that every hour, twenty-four hours a day and seven days a week, $4 million is leaving this country in dividend payments and that the government has the nerve to reduce the withholding tax on these dividends, it is incredible. I think Canada is probably one of the few countries in the world where so many dividends are paid abroad, supposedly to pay for investments made in this country. Of course there is investment in this country, but certainly not as substantial as the dividend payments that leave this country. The government's way of dealing with these dividends is strange to say the least. You tell me the tax was reduced from 10 to 5 per cent. In the circumstances, this is unacceptable. I think all these factors would merely aggravate the financial situation in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the debate today in this House has focused around the legitimacy of the objective in the Conservative bill that would see GST revenues allocated to debt servicing and hopefully the reduction of the debt. I think it has been clearly established from the opposition side of the House that that is a fiction.

• (1620)

I would like to expand the debate into the goods and services tax to talk about the impact on the debt. Of course we cannot examine that question in detail unless we take a look at the debt. In this country I think Canadians believe that the goods and services tax is a tax which destroys business opportunity, business enterprise, consumer confidence and is a deeply regressive, repressive tax on Canada's lower income Canadians. A consumption tax in those lower income brackets truly harms Canadians. It is extremely difficult to come up with the cash to make purchases when you must add an extra 7 per cent. It cools out the business activity in local economies right across Canada. It creates unemployment. It creates reduced business activity and over all it has been a very harmful and repressive tax in Canada.

It is not the only source of our debt. It is interesting to watch how that debt is mounting. The Conservatives assure us that they are taking measures that will reduce that debt but that is not the case.

I would point to the Canada-U.S. trade agreement as one of the great debt generators in Canada. That is an agreement to move Canadian factories to the United States from a high-wage area to a low-wage area. It puts Canadian workers on social assistance. It is so much harder now to collect unemployment insurance because the Conservatives, instead of assisting people through that mechanism, have actually just put it beyond their reach.

The Canada-U.S. agreement is an agreement to move Canadian jobs to the United States. We have now 1.5 million people out of work and it will continue to increase. In the area in which I live, we are going to watch newsprint be manufactured in the United States instead of Canada. We are watching harm come to us through the softwood lumber and the fishing industry. These are all Canadian jobs that have moved to the United States. That is a new source of debt, and an enormous one. That agreement is the agreement to make Canada the Puerto Rico of the north.

The debt in Canada is of course growing. The bill before us today to allocate GST revenues to service the debt is of course nonsense. This government is forging ahead with a North American free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico. That agreement is nothing more than an agreement to move Canadian jobs all the way to Mexico and not stop in the United States.

Those jobs in Canada would pay $14, $15 or $16 per hour with maybe another $8 to $10 benefit load for life insurance, medical and dental care. One expects this for producing quality goods. These jobs will go to Mexico where they will pay 80 cents per hour or about $6.40 per day if they manage to achieve an eight-hour day. There will not be any benefits so the load above that will not be very much. There will be no environmental or other standards or any health care provided.

At 80 cents per hour we do not have a chance as Canadians. More Canadians will wind up on social assistance because by that time it will be extremely hard to continue to provide an unemployment insurance scheme. It will also be very hard, if not impossible, to provide a health care scheme, social assistance and all the other income nets and supports that we expect in this country. That is because of the Conservatives' goal to create a North American trade agreement with Mexico on a playing field that is extremely unfair.

It is those three things. The GST is a very harmful tax that this government has inflicted on Canada. The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement is a very harmful agreement that is gutting the economy of Canada and will continue to do so as long as it is in existence.

The true folly of this government is going to of course be the North American trade agreement in which it hands over the balance of jobs in Canada to Mexico at 80 cents per hour.

I consider that we are in a period of choice. We are virtually four years into the term of this government and people have to start making choices. The choice that is being offered by the previous speaker is as clear as I have ever heard it articulated. This is the choice of the previous Conservative speaker in this House who said: "Our government, the Conservative Government of Canada, in this Parliament would rather be right and unpopular". It was pointed out that being unpopular means that you do not enjoy the confidence of Canadians. Canadians do not believe you are right sending their jobs to the United States. They do not believe you right sending the factories to the United States. Canadians do not believe that you are right imposing a tax that destroys business opportunity and business activity and which is a repressive, harsh tax on Canadians.

The Conservatives are truly unpopular. Canadians do not believe that a government is right to join in a trade agreement which would export Canadian jobs in the forest, auto, or textile manufacturing industry, which pay $10 to $15 per hour, to Mexico to be worked at by Mexicans at 80 cents per hour without protection and without human rights. It is a disaster.

This government is not only extremely unpopular and absolutely committed to ignoring the will of the people, but it is absolutely wrong.

There is a fundamental flaw in the way the choices are being laid out at the present time for Canadians. I think that Canadians have to realize that this problem is also going to happen with the election or the choice of a Liberal government in the future. The Liberals believe in the GST. They have indicated clearly on each public occasion that they will keep the GST which is a harsh, repressive tax which destroys business activity and opportunity—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. House leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken may be suffering from a timely illness and perhaps his medication has overtaken him. He should, in making interventions on the floor of the House of Commons, at least attempt to try to have one scintilla of truth in the remarks that he is making on the floor of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will listen to the hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I expect the Liberal Party to protest this matter loudly and across the country, but that is the state of the matter. It is that the Liberal Party will not reject the GST.

The second thing that has occurred concerns a matter of choice. When members of the Conservative Party stand up and say: "We support the GST, we support the Canada–U.S. trade agreement and we support a North American trade agreement," it is clearly on the record in the House of Commons and in every media outlet across Canada that the Liberals will retain the Canada–U.S. trade agreement. It is a harmful, destructive agreement that creates additional debt in Canada which this GST bill today is supposed to pay.

We have a situation where that destructiveness and that export of Canadian jobs is a policy of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Dingwall: Will the hon. member entertain a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think you will have an opportunity to entertain a question after questions and comments.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague from the Liberal Party, the one that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order please. There will be an opportunity for questions and comments. I would hope that the hon. member would give him an opportunity to complete his speech and then we can get into questions and comments.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly oblige with the Chair's direction but perhaps the hon. member, in reflection when he is making his comments, could indicate to the House if he is deliberately misleading the House in terms of what he has just said.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, of course the acid truth of this is to have the leader of the Liberal Party stand up and say: "We will cancel the trade agreement, we will end the GST and we will not sign a North American trade agreement". That is not what they are saying publicly.

In this House of Commons the Prime Minister indicated during debate one day that no country which has a bad human rights record should receive Canadian aid or trade. The Liberals moved an amendment to delete that so that the trade agreement could go ahead.

We have a very clear choice in Canada today. As much as my colleagues in the Liberal Party protest it, their position is no different from that of the Conservative Party. Canadians wait with bated breath to hear them say that they will get rid of that trade agreement with the United States, that thing that destroys our sovereignty, hands control of our energy over to the Americans, allows complete buy-out of Canadian industries and watches Canadian factories and jobs go across the line.

It is clearly on the record. There is an understanding that the Liberals cannot give up the corporate donations. They are badly in debt and badly damaged from the last years wandering in the wilderness. They have no policy that appeals to Canadians. Unfortunately we have a situation where they say that they will tinker with it and make it better for people, but in fact they will keep the GST, the trade agreement with the United States and the trade agreement with Mexico.

Every Canadian stands and waits for members of the Liberal Party to stand up and say that they will abandon these destructive instruments of the Tory government. To date they have not done that. They say they will keep them and use them as well as the Conservative government has done.

On the other hand, the NDP says that if we are elected they are over: the GST will end, the Canada-U.S. trade agreement will end, and there will not be a North American trade agreement.

It is a matter of fundamental choice for Canadians. We have the Conservative Party that says it will not be deterred by the fact that it is the most unpopular government in Canadian history and that it would rather be right than enjoy the confidence of the people.

Then we have the Liberal Party that told Canadians in 1974 that it would not impose wage and price controls. Then once in power it imposed wage and price controls. People in Canada know and understand the Liberal Party as the purveyors of untruth and fiction.

Today we have an opportunity for those who moan and bellow in the House, those who have been wounded by the truth, to stand and tell Canadians that they will get rid of the GST because of the destruction it has wreaked on Canada, they will get rid of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement because of the destructive impact it has had on Canada, and that they will not participate in a Mexican involvement in a North American free trade agreement because of the tremendous unfairness to Canada and Mexico.

Their leader runs and hides every time these critical questions come up. At least the leader of the Conservative Party, the Prime Minister of Canada has no qualms about standing out there and saying: "I do not care what you think. I am right". But the leader of the Liberal Party waffles and shifts. Nevertheless, when his members are cornered they make the statement that they are in favour of the GST, in favour of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement and in favour of the Mexican agreement.

On the other hand, the NDP believes that these instruments of the Conservative government are among the most destructive things that have ever been inflicted on Canada. Once elected, an NDP government will banish those from the land.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, what a glorious opportunity it is today to hear an hon. member from that particular party stand on the floor of the House of Commons and quote from a bible, and it is gospel. The only one he has to refer to is the hon. member who happens to be the premier of the province of Ontario. I guess he wants those of us in this Chamber, on this side of the House as well as on that side of the House, to follow the prescriptions of the premier of the province of Ontario.

Perhaps he would be kind enough to indicate whether or not he concurs with the steps that have been taken by his colleague, the premier of the province of Saskatchewan, when large numbers of hospital beds have been closed as a result of the actions of that provincial government. It was not less than 48 hours ago, in terms of House time, that the hon. member and his party condemned other provincial governments.

Let us see if he has the intellectual honesty to stand in his place and throw blame at the provincial governments in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Ontario.

To the three specific questions the hon. member posed, let me say to him that his medication—and it is obvious that he has taken an overdose today—has affected not only his brain, which one has questions about, but his thinking ability. The hon. member is dead wrong not on one issue, not on two issues, but on three issues. Whether you play for the Blue Jays or the Montreal Expos, you are out. We have said very clearly, I say to the hon. member, time after time after time that when it comes to the free trade agreement with the United States we will renegotiate it.

Now to the hon. member in the NDP it is called catch-up time. Bob White picked up the phone, called the leader of the NDP and said: "You really bummed up last time. You had better watch it. You had better be against this agreement. You have to tear it up and you have to get rid of it". That is the position of the NDP.

With regard to the GST, the leader of the Liberal Party responded very clearly on the floor of the House of Commons. I do not want to question the attendance record of the hon. member because I know he is probably here all of the time. Perhaps on that particular day he must have missed the interventions of the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada who responded clearly and unequivocally to whoever asked the question on the floor.

With regard to the North American free trade agreement, the hon. member must be in a trance. He must be completely out to lunch. We are the party that has been challenging the government opposite to produce the necessary documents, to provide us with the information, and to inform us as to what the substance of that agreement is going to be. We have set the preconditions it must meet before there can be a consummation. We have looked at this as an opportunity to open up the free trade agreement.

I say to my hon. friend that before he stands in his place on the floor of the House of Commons and deliberately misleads—and I use those words—the House, he should check the written word in Hansard to see what has been said not only in this party but on that side. Before you rise, Mr. Speaker, we know the real reason why the hon. member makes those assertions. It is because of the polls which he reads continuously. He sees that his own party in his own province is continuing to go down the tube.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I think what we have had is a demonstration of the proof that everyone is entitled to a defence. There is no better person than a lawyer to provide that defence, no matter how flimsy and ineffective it is.

I congratulate the hon. member on the bombast and the defence of the miserable position of his party. There is no unequivocal statement on the part of the member that they will abolish the GST. He did not stand in the House and say that. I would just have the public and the others reflect on the matter that he did not say that.

He did not say that they would get rid of the GST. Anyone would certainly want to negotiate a better agreement with the Americans, to terminate this disgusting agreement we have now. Of course the weak and miserable position of the Liberal Party, defended so eloquently by the counsellor from Nova Scotia, falls on its face. He failed to make the key point that they will get rid of that Canada-U.S. trade agreement.

They stood in the House in the debate. They changed the motion in order to eliminate the North American free trade agreement. They have joined with the NDP in this House asking for the Prime Minister to provide the details, the sectorial arrangements that have been made. We have all asked for that. They stand up, knowing the record of Mexico and knowing the destruction of Canada, and they will not take the position that they will not participate in that disgusting, destructive agreement.

In spite of the bombast, the member failed to deliver like his party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In his my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight as the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Burin—St. George's—Fisheries; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Buy Canadian; the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—Thalidomide victims; the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast—Natural gas industry; the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries.

For those who are listening on television, perhaps their secretaries could advise members that it may be possible to enter into the adjournment debate much sooner than later. Maybe they could have members here as soon as possible so we can carry on.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is a wonderful opportunity here today. I am sure the hon. member will return to the Chamber, because he will want to ask me a number of questions in terms of public policy to which I would be happy to respond at any time anywhere in this country.

It is the height of hypocrisy of the NDP, particularly the hon. member from Saskatoon who is trying to leave the Chamber.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know it is a long established practice in this House and I am hoping the member will apologize—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I really did not hear what the hon. member had to say but, whatever it was, if he wants to leave the Chamber that is up to him.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hypocrisy of the New Democratic Party is evidenced once again in this Chamber as we have seen across this country and in provincial jurisdictions. Its members are the first group to stand in their place to criticize each and every one who occupies a position of responsibility, whether it be at the federal level or at the provincial level.

However, when it comes to its bailiwick in terms of provincial jurisdiction, we could take for instance the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Ontario. Look at the broken promises that have occurred in the province of Ontario under the leadership of Bob Rae.

Mr. Keyes: It is a litany.

Mr. Dingwall: My colleague has made reference to it being a litany. There is no question that it is a litany of broken promises by the NDP. Its new-found interest in Atlantic Canada—and I am sure the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs will want to agree with me because he is a reasonable man—shocked me. It really shocked me to find that the NDP, a land based party as referred to by an hon. member on the opposite side, now has a new-found interest in Atlantic Canada, and in particular the province of Newfoundland and the fish stocks off its coast.

What a hypocrisy. It is unbelievable to think that New Democrats would raise that particular issue when they have been asleep at the switch for the last number of years as it affects the fisheries.

The hon. member talked about trade and our policy as it relates to trade and the free trade agreement. We have said clearly on the record that as a government, should we be given the opportunity to form the next government of this country, it will be our public policy to renegotiate the free trade agreement because that is in the best interest of Canadians.

It is not an irresponsible position like that of the New Democratic Party after the consummation of this agreement which many of us, in fact all of us, have opposed. Nevertheless it has been consummated by two sovereign nations: Canada and the United States. Business people have made substantial investments in order to try to gear their particular business and their sector to this free trade agreement. I do not like it, but that is the reality we have in Canada.

They say: "Now we are going to abrogate. We are not going to renegotiate". They are dreaming in Technicolor. We are dealing with the United States. We are not dealing with some banana republic where we are going to waltz in and say: "No way, Jose, you have to renegotiate".

The Liberal Party of Canada has taken a responsible position as evidenced by the comments of our leader on the floor of the House of Commons as well as across this country.

That was his first point. With regard to the GST, what did NDPers do in Ontario? What have they done in Ontario? Where has the opposition been for Mr. Rae on the GST? Where is the opposition from honourable Roy in Saskatchewan, or Mikey in British Columbia? What have they done on the GST?

Have you seen ads on television? Have you seen ads in the newspapers? Have you heard radio clips? Have you heard them debate in the provincial legislature what they think of the GST?

In fact Mikey in B.C. would not even call the House back to listen to the views of members on the subject matters of the day.

Mr. Speaker, is that not hypocrisy? Perhaps it is not hypocrisy in the mind of the hon. member. That may be the case, but I suggest to him through you, sir, that it is hypocrisy. It is hypocrisy in its best as Canadians will demonstrate clearly when the next election rolls around.

We have said we will eliminate the GST and we will put something in its place. But when the New Democratic Party is asked what it will do in terms of eliminating the GST, the members hide underneath their desks. They run under the pool tables. They jump into the pool. They talk fast. They run away. They will not respond to the question.

But when you are an irresponsible third-party rump which is losing its appeal across this country, no wonder you would do that. And if any respectable individual would not accept what I have just said they should stand in their place and refute me in debate.

If not, they lack the intestinal fortitude and should not be afforded the opportunity to be re-elected to this Chamber of this House under the banner of a New Democratic Party member.

Finally, the North American free trade agreement. As I said earlier in my comments our trade critic, our associate trade critic, our critic for external affairs and our leader have clearly spelled out our position with regard to the North American free trade agreement.

What the problem is for the hon. member to the left is that he does not like that particular opinion but he knows that Canadians believe us and believe us to be responsible as shown most recently by the various polls that have been produced. They are quite nervous about it.

I can understand that because the leader of the NDP, notwithstanding the divisions in her own caucus, notwithstanding the attack from internal labour sources and labour representatives, cannot go down to the United States and meet with the President of the United States as the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada has done, and say "Mr. President, business is business and friendship is friendship".

That is what scares the New Democratic Party members because they know in their heart of hearts and in their minds that we have carved out the appropriate public policy measures for this country to pursue.

We do not have the answer to each and every question that may come up on any given day on any particular topic, but we are not the NDP. I do not want to be the NDP because as I said earlier they practice hypocrisy at its best.

So I am going to stop now and give the hon. member an opportunity to pose a question and I will respond in kind.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting thing that in this House noise seems to replace the truth at times. When the hon. member stands in his place and creates a noise at the decibel level that he did he certainly missed several points.

I for one would be extremely pleased to hear the Leader of the Official Opposition stand in his place and say that if his party is elected he will end this Canada-U.S. trade agreement. It will end. He has not said that. If it is irresponsible, as one of the Liberal members says, to end an agreement that is so destructive in Canada, then I think Canadians have a choice. I think the polls will actually change as long as the Liberal members say: "I believe it is irresponsible to cancel that agreement".

What I am proposing is a choice: stick to your position. Clarify your position. We are not overly concerned about the Conservative Party of Canada because it sticks to its position, as insane as it is. At 11 per cent in the polls the Conservatives are not a problem at this point in time.

Clearly the problem right now in the minds of many Canadians is a clarification of the Liberal position, a position that says that the next federal election will not be the last federal election, that by the process of an economic union with the United States through this trade agreement, by a trade agreement which replaces Canadian labour at reasonable wages with benefit packages at 80 cents an hour, that the Liberal Party of Canada will not let that happen.

At this point in time, in this House, in debate, member after member over there stood up and said they would continue on with those negotiations to an agreement with Mexico. A statement that they will renegotiate the agreement is not good enough in the minds of Canadians, they honestly need a statement that the agreement we have is unacceptable and must be terminated. The negotiations that follow could produce a reasonable agreement. We could deal with the trade imbalances by negotiation, but we cannot keep this agreement and keep Canada.

The GST must go, Mr. Speaker. If they make that statement publicly through their leader I think that we will all move forward a great deal.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, when they are throwing softballs across the way, you know you can hit them out of the park. I mean, this is just absolutely ridiculous.

As I said earlier in this debate, and perhaps there may be a new viewing audience who are watching television right now, but the hon. member's medication has taken hold. I am very certain that it has gone very deep into the mind and into the soul and into the heart, into very fibre of the hon. member, because he is living in a completely different world from reality.

On a Canada–U.S. deal, our party has said very clearly that we will renegotiate the deal. The hon. member says that that is wrong, that that is terrible. If the hon. member feels that way, I am confident of my leader, of my party, of my caucus, and those men and women who will run for us in British Columbia. I am very confident of them. Let's go to the polls. Let the voter decide. Let your constituents decide which is the most appropriate measure to pursue at this point in time.

But to say that when an agreement has been consummated between two sovereign nations, has been put into place and is operating, much to the discredit if you will of Canadian industry, that we as a nation upon election will immediately abrogate the deal without attempting to renegotiate some of the more substantive parts, I will allow the average and ordinary Canadian in British Columbia, in the member's own riding, to determine which is the most responsible public policy to take. I am very confident of the outcome.

With regard to the North American free trade agreement, the hon. member must realize that this issue has been debated in this House time and time again and we have said repeatedly that this is an opportunity for Canada through that particular vehicle to renegotiate the free trade agreement. There are some major measures which I am sure the hon. member would want to see renegotiated, such as the energy provisions. He would want to see something on that. He would want to see something clarified in terms, I am sure, of monetary policy. He would want to see things clarified in terms of social programs. That is an opportunity.

The hon. member does not understand that because he does not want to understand it. He is part of the NDP, the typical old CCF–NDP, criticize, criticize, criticize until one day, because of a freak accident in Canadian history, you wind up and you become the premier of Ontario. What happens then? You break every promise that you every made and every position that you ever took. It is the same in Saskatchewan, the same in British Columbia.

I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member that the best test as to who is the best and who is right and who offers the best public policy is let us go to the polls and stop cosying up to your Tory colleagues across the way. That is the problem.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the two opposition parties that are seen this afternoon on the floor of this House of Commons to be arguing over the government policy.

Fiscal responsibility, of course, is why we have been elected since 1984. The free trade agreement was negotiated to protect the workers. At least I respect the fact that the Leader of the Official Opposition says that he will renegotiate the agreement. But what parts of the agreement will they renegotiate?

The GST, which they wish to throw out, as Canadians know we have to keep our social net of programs that we have. They will replace it with what?

I would say in the short time you allow me that when these gentlemen from the opposite side—and I do say gentlemen—ask the government and when they are talking to the Canadian public about this, our answer very clearly since 1984 is that we must face up to reality. For them to put in the smoke and the mirrors is not good enough. I would ask the Leader of the Official Opposition concerning the GST, what percentage would he put in with a new tax and how would he impose it?

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is concerning the bill, Bill C-21. I would like to ask the hon. member whether he believes that this bill is going to solve Canada's debt and deficit problem? How would he address that problem? It is a very simple question.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on a very intelligent, a very prudent and a very wise question. I will be equally wise and prudent as the hon. member and respond to him in this way. No, it will not. This bill will do very little, if anything, in terms of the debt.

I want to thank the hon. member opposite, who stood in this place, like I, and condemned those socialists, those old CCF-NDPers coming in this House, full of hypocrisy, as I am sure the hon. member would want to agree to, and making scandalous comments about the role of the Official Opposition and, to a certain extent, that of the government.

I want to say to my hon. colleague, he should be aware that when he talks about the GST, that it was his government which inherited a debt, they say, of some $187 billion and the debt today is well over $400 billion. So something must have happened over the last eight years.

We have had the proliferation of taxes, numbering in excess of 32, on Canadians. The Tories said they were putting those taxes in to raise additional revenue but the deficit has doubled under the Conservatives. The minister of tourism has entered the Chamber. Perhaps he will want to say a few words as well, but this is the government which promised in 1984 and 1988 that they were going to be prudent managers of the public purse.

We have seen anything but prudent management of the public purse. We have seen all sorts of examples of waste in this government which we have brought to the attention of this House of Commons. I would only hope that members opposite would amend their ways as soon as possible. Give Canadians the opportunity that they seek so overwhelmingly and that is the opportunity to go to the polls so that the government will then be in a position to prove that its case is right and our case is wrong. I would love that opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, can there be anybody left in this country who has not heard that the Atlantic fishery is in a very deep crisis, that our fish stocks are being pillaged, that men and women by the thousands in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia have had their source of income cut off through no fault of their own?

As I suggest, there cannot be anybody left in this country who does not know that this is the case, that the fish are being pillaged by foreign overfishing and that men and women are being put out of work right, left and centre through no fault of their own.

If we are going to correct this situation two lines of attack are required.

First and foremost, or else nothing else matters in so far as this subject is concerned, we have to find a way to stop the rape of the fish stocks off the coast of Newfoundland. We have to do it. There is no time left. It has to be done now.

That is why that armada of seven trawlers at this very moment is making its way out to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We have to send a message to the world community that this overfishing, this pillaging, this wanton rape of the fish stock has to stop and it has to stop now.

Second, the government has to lend a helping hand to those who depend on that resource for their livelihood. They are the men and women on the south and southwest coast of Newfoundland and elsewhere in Newfoundland, the men and women in parts of Nova Scotia who also depend on that resource. The government has to find a way to help these people bridge the gap. Not in the context of handouts. The reason these people are not working today is not because they are lazy; it is because they cannot find any fish to catch.

Today, just for the moment or so left to me, I want to talk about that second element, the need to help those who, through no fault of their own, are without a source of income: the fishermen, the trawlermen, the inshore fishermen, the plant workers, the men and women who cut, split and package the fish for market.

That is what I was talking about last December when I raised with my friend, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the issue of unemployment insurance as it affects those people.

I appealed to him in particular to review the program's guidelines. When I say the program, I have in mind the Atlantic Catch Failure Program itself. I asked him to take into account that the program, as well intentioned as it might be, was not meeting the need that it was intended to meet, that whole populations of people were being excluded on technicality and technicality does not buy groceries.

Those people, first of all, want to work. In the absence of work, work which has been snatched out from under them, they ought to be given a helping hand. That helping hand ought to be given in a fair way.

As an example, let me use the gear-up program that the minister of fisheries announced some weeks ago. That had a good objective. But whoever came up with the rules must have sat down and said: "How can I make this as unfair as possible?" Mr. Speaker, if you have ever seen anything as warped in your life as those regulations, I challenge you to show me.

There are people being excluded just in terms of where they live along the coast, not in terms of how bad a fishing season they had.

My appeal to the government is to use the resources available to it to give some help to those people. It should do it in a way that is fair, so those people are not left out on technicalities, so those people are helped to put bread and butter on the table until they can get back to doing what they really want to do in the first place and that is to go out there, catch some fish and prepare it for market.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic fisheries emergency assistance program, announced on October 4, 1991, was based on a particularly set of circumstances. Many people who would normally have taken part in the coastal fishery during the summer of 1991 were not able to do so or hardly caught anything at the local level. There was a lot of ice and the consequent cold temperatures translated into poor landings of cod and capelin.

This special program provided funds for the creation of jobs and specified the eligibility criteria. Those criteria were necessary in order to make sure that the program benefited those for whom it was created, namely the fishermen and the plant workers that have been depending on fish for a long time and that did not fish for a sufficient number of weeks during the summer of 1991 to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

In the Atlantic region, 249 job creation projects have translated into more than 41,000 weeks of employment for 5,864 fishermen and plant workers. This assistance was mainly provided in Newfoundland, where 4,092 fishermen and plant workers participated in more than 100 job creation projects. The projects undertaken in numerous regions were linked to fisheries and helped improve the local facilities.

People who were receiving unemployment insurance benefits and who no longer do also tried to participate in that program. Those people are not eligible because they could get UI benefits and, in fact, many of them were already receiving such benefits. The case of people whose employment opportunities are limited is being reviewed by the Department of Employment and Immigration. Interested parties can contact their local employment centre to see if they are eligible to other programs run by that department.

BUY CANADIAN

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about you, but regularly I get complaints from my constituents about plant closings, manufacturing job losses and Canadian businesses moving to the United States.

What can we do about it? Some say we should cancel the free trade agreement. Others say scrap the GST and others like the Minister of National Revenue say we should tax Canadians who cross-border shop.

The United States also has its plant closings, its manufacturing job losses and its businesses moving to other countries. In fact, between June 1991 and January 1992 there were some 350,000 industrial, retail and service jobs lost in the United States. General Motors is laying off some 74,000 American employees and closing 12 United States auto plants; IBM is reducing its American staff by some 40,000; 22,000 American jobs are disappearing at Pan American Airlines.

It did not just start recently. Between January 1989 when the free trade agreement went into effect and December 1990 the U.S. lost one million manufacturing jobs alone.

Were these American job losses the result of the free trade agreement, the GST, cross-border shopping or a made-in-Canada recession? I hardly think so.

What then can we do if we are truly concerned as Canadians about Canadian manufacturing job losses? Clearly there is one obvious answer at least and that is to buy Canadian. If you buy Canadian and you buy a Canadian-made product you create income for other Canadians to spend. Unlike the Americans and the Japanese, Canadians too often forget that their jobs depend on their Canadian neighbours having jobs as well.

Obviously, in addition to individuals buying Canadian, there is a role for government too. Back in 1962 the Ontario provincial government, under the then Premier John Robarts and an initiative started by the Hon. Bob Macaulay, there was a buy Canadian campaign. It is time that our government instituted a campaign like that as well. Also, it is time to publish a list of the companies that actually manufacture goods in Canada.

A few weeks ago I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if he is prohibited by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement from initiating a buy Canadian campaign. He did not answer my question at the time. I hope he does tonight because Canadians are watching and listening carefully.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to my hon. friend's question is no, there is nothing in the free trade agreement to prohibit such a campaign being carried out any more than there is anything to prohibit the United States from carrying out a buy American campaign.

Mr. Redway: Are you going to announce one tonight, Jim?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. member asks me if I am going to announce one tonight. I regard my hon. friend as a free enterpriser and I think that the appropriate thing is that Canadian industry and the Canadian consumer associations have a role for themselves to play in this regard, rather than having the heavy hand of government intervene.

I do not believe that buy American campaigns in the United States are sponsored by the United States government. I believe that they have their origins among the consumers and perhaps even among unions. Trade unions would be a very appropriate vehicle for that.

Mr. Redway: Do not forget the Progressive Conservative government under John Robarts.

Mr. Edwards: My friend says remember the government of Ontario. It was a different age, an age of government intervention. I think the less intervention we do, the better.

I would remind my hon. friend that back on February 7 when he posed this question, the minister did respond by saying this: "When we look at housing, transportation, food, health and education and we compare with the Americans, the cost of living in Canada is lower than that of the United States".

As this House knows, Canada must be able to answer concerns from other foreign governments about any special treatment we are perceived to afford Canadian-made goods and services in comparison to foreign-made goods and services offered for sale in the marketplace.

There is another level of concern. What, for example, constitutes a Canadian suit or dress when the component materials originate outside this country and are made into garments by Canadian workers? How would one answer the question of what, in fact, constitutes a Canadian automobile? There is intense international debate about these matters.

The domestic content of automobiles, for example, is currently a matter of discussion between Canada and the U.S. as both countries try to maintain vehicle production levels.

Finally, like consumers in most countries, Canadians are first and foremost price conscious and have a demanding sense of quality. Value for money is of paramount importance. Budget conscious Canadians undoubtedly base their shopping decisions on value rather than country of origin and because pricing is considerably competitive, that will advantage Canadian companies.

THALIDOMIDE VICTIMS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on March 18, 1992, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare to review decisions made by an unqualified official in his department, Mr. Greg Smith. These decisions legally and medically affect three thalidomide victims in my constituency, Darcy Petkau, Mrs. Cheryl Wood and Laurel Webb. The minister's response in the House to my question was irresponsible and arrogant. He simply said no.

I would like to remind the minister that on February 13, 1990, when this program was announced in the House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare the minister said: "This program would be on the basis of compassion and understanding and not liability". As well, he went on to say: "I would like to assure everyone in the country that the funding I am announcing today is over and above the settlements the victims received from the manufacturer of thalidomide".

He also indicated that the government estimated that there were only 75 to 100 people living in Canada who were affected.

I dispute his numbers because I was practising medicine at that time and I know how many people were prescribed thalidomide at that time. Basically what the current minister is now saying is that the victims must either have been on the original list which the department compiled in 1963, or have received a settlement from a drug company.

There are many additional victims who can and are producing legal medical records as proof, like my three constituents, for their eligibility for the program. However, the minister and his departmental staff are stonewalling.

I would like to quote a letter from one of those constituents, a letter written by Dr. Boyar on October 18, 1991, to Mr. Greg Smith, Director, Extraordinary Assistance Plan, here in Ottawa:

> Dear Mr. Smith:
> This is to confirm that I did deliver the above patient on 07 May 1962 while still in general practice. His birth defect is a classical thalidomide defect involving his left hand. This has been recently documented for you by Dr. Fowlow, plastic surgeon.

The doctor admits that he had prescribed thalidomide to the mother during her pregnancy.

Another medical record is that for Cheryl Wood and it is from the Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children, dated June 16, 1965. It says:

> Deformity of the left forearm and left hand, duration since birth. The mother was extremely sick during the early part of the pregnancy and used thalidomide tablets.

This is medical and legal proof that those people had been prescribed thalidomide.

I believe there is a tragic injustice being committed by the department of health and welfare and the minister. The minister refuses to take his ministerial responsibilities seriously. I ask him to be fair and honest and if he cannot be that way, he should resign.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in June of last year the final arrangements were made for an extraordinary assistance plan for Canadian thalidomide victims and I am pleased to put before the House information on the implementation of that plan since that time.

The plan provides initially for $4.5 million to be divided equally among all eligible recipients and another $4 million to be paid on the basis of placement into one of three disability categories.

To this date 105 individuals have been confirmed to be eligible and the government has made payments to 101 of those for a total of $42,400 per person.

Medical evaluations to determine the level of disability category have been progressing well. Two-thirds of the evaluations have been completed and the rest are to be completed by the end of April. At that time payments will be calculated and paid to the recipients.

Sadly not all those who applied to the plan could be confirmed as thalidomide victims but the criteria for the program are clear. There must be proof of maternal consumption of Kevadon or Talimol, the two brands of the drug available in Canada at that time during the first trimester of pregnancy. There is no other means to determine whether someone is a thalidomide victim.

There are a number of ways of attesting to whether that is—Mr. Speaker, are you allowing me to conclude or telling me to conclude?

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am allowing you to conclude.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will be quick.

Anyone who received a settlement from the drug company already proved the question of maternal consumption of thalidomide in that context. Others were identified, as my colleague has said, during a major national research study in 1962-63.

The government has also taken steps to provide non-monetary support, providing up to $1 million in funding for services needed by thalidomide victims.

In summary, the extraordinary assistance plan is a significant response to Canadian thalidomide victims, and the delivery of the plan to eligible Canadians is progressing well.

NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, natural gas is a vital part of the economy of my province as well as Canada's energy future. The region enjoys a large surplus of natural gas reserves which has allowed us to extract this very clean burning fossil fuel for export. More gas projects are under way and there has been very heavy competition between two pipeline consortia for rights to build a new export pipeline out of Alberta to the southwestern U.S.

Natural gas exporters from our province have been fair in their trading activities with our friends to the south beginning last year. However we saw that these exporters had to deal with certain regulators in the state of California who were not interested in playing fair. To put it bluntly those regulators, the California Public Utilities Commission, chose to take advantage of our suppliers by blackmailing them for shorter term supply contracts.

In late November of last year those regulators ordered the largest utility in northern California, Pacific Gas and Electric, to dump its long-term contracts with western Canadian gas producers.

It is a clear violation of article 905 of the free trade agreement. I rose therefore in this House on December 5, 1991 to ask the minister of energy if he agreed. He spoke of joint press conferences, consultations with western provincial energy ministers and consultations with the U.S., but he would not give a simple undertaking to support the claims of our suppliers.

The question was simple: would the minister lend support to groups such as the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada? A review of the matter was held in front of the National Energy Board. Speaking personally I hoped that this issue would transcend partisan cleavages between the minister and myself. I was mistaken, because when the minister rose to answer the supplementary question he said that he could not even bring himself to speak to the question.

He said in the House at the time:

> I mean I don't know where this guy is, except that he just wants to make a point in the House.

That is a former teacher talking. It was very confusing. Why else would one want to speak in the House if one did not want to make a point? The minister obviously believes that any member who rises in the House and does not sing the praises of the government is some type of an obstructionist nuisance.

The interventions in this dispute over natural gas are based on a sincere desire to see it resolved as quickly as possible. I hoped that desire might converge with that of the minister of energy. If it did, I hoped that our converging desires would have an impact on the California Public Utilities Commission, but it seems that this government, as in so many other issues, would rather see our natural gas industry twist in the wind as far as its most profitable export market is concerned than actually presenting a united front in opposition to those moves in California.

I had written to the governor of California on the matter in mid-December. A reply has not been received, but since the letter was sent 190 western Canadian gas producers and distributors are no closer to receiving fair treatment from the California Public Utilities Commission. The action of the commission has had the effect of exerting downward pressure on the already depressed price of natural gas. Furthermore, in an age of deregulation its demands that California utilities purchase only short-term contracts has the effect of distorting fundamental conditions in the marketplace.

Our Natural Energy Board has made a good attempt in trying to mediate and resolve this state of affairs. Unfortunately the NEB has no regulatory authority over the actions of the California commission.

It would seem to any reasonable person, I suggest, that the consultative mechanism for energy matters in article 905 of the free trade agreement will have to be used. Unfortunately the government has yet to inform the House whether it has chosen to use this option to resolve the dispute which puts into jeopardy several thousand jobs in Alberta and British Columbia. If it has, it has refused to inform the House about any progress in the consultation.

I would therefore ask the parliamentary secretary or some parliamentary secretary, to rise in the House and deal intelligently with the question.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast I would just like to review some of the facts.

In December 1991 the Governments of Canada, Alberta and British Columbia and the Canadian natural gas industry agreed on a three-party strategy to respond to the California Public Utilities Commission's capacity brokering decision.

First, it was decided that consultations should be initiated to convince the CPUC of the need to rely on commercial negotiations.

Second, regulatory options would be examined to maintain the integrity of the first export agreement until a commercial restructuring by the commercial parties was concluded.

Third, our options and remedies under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement would be carefully examined.

That consultative process commenced immediately and the representatives from the governments of Alberta and British Columbia and staff from the California Public Utilities Commission were invited to attend the regularly scheduled Energy Consultative Mechanism, the ECM-gas trade talks meeting between the Canadian and American federal government officials.

Discussions have continued under the umbrella of these special gas talks for the past few months with favourable results to date. It is important that we note that these discussions are intended to promote a regulatory environment that will facilitate a commercial solution. They are not intended to substitute for commercial negotiations.

In the interim the Canadian Petroleum Association, with the support of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, requested the National Energy Board to review the 1989 decision to extend the Alberta and Southern natural gas export licence. As a result, the board adopted interim measures to prevent the potential erosion of long-term contracted natural gas exports to northern California. These interim measures are subject to the outcome of the board's public hearings which are conducted in Calgary.

At this time I believe it is preferable to continue constructive dialogue with the CPUC as a means of resolving this dispute. The value of such a non-confrontational process should not be discounted. Nevertheless, should these talks not prove fruitful, we would still have at our disposal the ability to seek recourse under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I might add that I am cautiously optimistic that these talks will lead to a successful conclusion that will be mutually beneficial to the energy trading relationship and for it to continue in the future.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question on the lobster fishery back on December 4, 1991 and my supplementary question was on quota. I want to deal with both of them.

At the time, I was asking the Minister of State for Transport, because of the opening of the season, and because of the crisis as far as price went in the lobster fishery, whether she would ensure that there would be cargo space available for York, which is a very lucrative market for the lobster fishermen from Nova Scotia and, for that matter, for other areas that ship their cargo of lobster to Europe.

At the time she said yes. It is now four months later and I have never heard back from the minister. Maybe tonight I will hear from the parliamentary secretary what will be done in the future in order to ensure, particularly when the season starts, that there is access to cargo.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the price back then was probably around $2.50; today it is a hefty $7.95 or $8-and-something. On the weekend it was said it might even go up as far as $10. If it is priced that way, the market is probably hard to fill at that price, but at the same time the number of lobsters has gone down.

The other question I raised at the time had to do with quotas, whether or not the groundfish would see an increase in quota for 1992.

At the time, that question was addressed to the parliamentary secretary. He is here in the House today and he answered: "I can tell the hon. member opposite yes, we will look into that immediately".

As a result, there were no increases for the sectors in groundfish. The only thing that has increased that I can see, and I think it is of grave concern, is the number of licences that have been issued for gill nets. I heard on the weekend that there are now 900 gill net licences in Scotia-Fundy, in one area. It is an incredible amount.

There will be a meeting on April 14 to see if these gill-netters can go to George's to set their gill nets on quota. A few years ago there was an over-capacity in one sector for groundfish and all of a sudden there are 900 licences that appear for gill-netting fish on the east coast. It is a real crisis.

If there are no fish and the boats are not able to fish, why the abundance of licences? Why are they going to George's Bank? When the UN has banned gill-nets, why is this government now opening up a gill-net fishery that never existed in the past in the ground fishery?

When you cannot find more quota there should not be this enlargement of activity that is going on out there. I wonder what the longliners think about all the gill-netters who will be fishing where they are. I think of the numbers that have been reduced in the dragger sector with all the gill-nets that are going to be there. I think of the poor stocks on George's Bank and in the Bay of Fundy that will be hurt because of loose gill-nets floating around the bottom and capturing the sea life there. Gill-nets are very harsh.

Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might want to bring that matter up. Since then, there has been no issue of additional quotas in the groundfish sector. But all of a sudden, there is an addition. When the quotas were announced in January, there were no additional quotas given, but there were these numbers of licences given.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite is covering a wide range of subjects.

She asked about the amount of freight space on airlines going to Europe. The hon. member should remember that the government does not control any of the airlines that travel back and forth to Europe. It is not under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport who set the regulations in place for how the airlines operate.

More particularly, with respect to the groundfish quotas for 1992 for the Scotia–Fundy region, the groundfish plan on December 23 was released for the coming year. The total allowable catches for the Atlantic groundfish were set at the level scheduled within the multi-year groundfish plan which was introduced in 1991. The decisions announced for 1992 were based on the advice of CAFSAC, the Canadian Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee. They are also the product of consultations throughout the year with the fishermen's organizations, the industry and the provincial government.

The management measures introduced in 1991 for the 4VN winter cod fishery will continue to protect the juvenile cod and control dumping and the discarding of fish and enhance the data base for assessing the stock. Observer coverage, which had reached about 70 per cent the year before will be raised to 100 per cent and a program of observer-estimated catch will be established for 1992. As well, to alleviate the concern about the migration of the 4T cod to division 4VS, catches in the 4VS between January to April will be limited to 12,000 tonnes, based on the 4VS catch average of recent years.

For 1992 the fishermen will not be forced to transfer quotas. Under the current system transfers of fish are only acted upon after they have been requested by licence holders. At no time are fishermen requested to transfer quotas to companies.

The future of the Atlantic groundfish industry rests on responsible fisheries management. This means looking at the issues in a careful, open manner. It also means reconciling the needs of groups and communities for economic benefits today with the overriding duty to conserve and sustain the resource for future generations.

CRIMINAL CODE

TABLING OF DRAFT REGULATIONS

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to subsection 116(2) of the Criminal Code, as enacted by subsection 28(4) of an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, and pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) I would like to table, in both official languages, the following draft regulations: cartridge magazine control regulations, firearms acquisition certificate regulations, prohibited weapons control regulations, restricted weapons and firearms control regulations, storage, display, camping and transportation of certain firearms regulations, and genuine gun collector regulations.

PETITIONS

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Mifflin: Well done.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I thank my gallant and learned colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for his very kind words, and my other colleagues of course, but I could hear the words of the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

• (1010)

I want to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston in my riding of Kingston and the Islands who are concerned about crimes of violence against the person as being intolerable and constitute an abhorrent crime. They request that Parliament in recognition of that fact amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to rise once again, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of the Moravian Indian Reserve which is in my riding of Kent.

The petition states:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.
> Humbly sheweth;
> Whereas the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for the very young adolescents and;
> Whereas chapter 15 of the charter of rights guarantees equality rights,
> Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to:
> Revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lowered maximum of age 13 years.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of hundreds of employees of Canada's railway systems who are concerned that railway employees who were suspended for accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules are presently being unjustly penalized under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

They are calling upon Parliament to take immediate steps to specify that accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules does not constitute employee misconduct under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

May I simply add that this is about the 10th petition on this particular issue that I have presented.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition on an unrelated but nonetheless very important matter from the residents of Little Fort, British Columbia. They are concerned about the proposal to divert the North Thompson River into the San Diego, California area and point out that it appears to be part of the NAWPA plan. They are asking the Canadian government to simply state categorically that our rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to stand under the provisions of Order 36 and present a petition signed by several residents of the interior of British Columbia who are also very, very concerned about the possible sale of Canadian water, that is the diversion of Canadian rivers to the United States for commercial purposes.

The petitioners urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

IRAQ

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition in this House from concerned residents of the area I represent.

Their concern expressed by way of petition is over recent proposals that the President of the United States, Mr. George Bush, is considering once again bombing Iraq, allegedly to bring it into compliance with the United Nation's policy.

In fact, the threats by Mr. Bush are simply to improve his poor performance in the polls in the United States presidential campaign.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be moving this motion, seconded by my revered and hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands, but I am disappointed yet again that there is a need. There is a great need to talk about government policy vis-à-vis the women of Canada because policy, as presented by the most recent budget, has proven to be a major and unmitigated disappointment to the women of this country.

Piece by piece, the government is ensuring that the obstacles that Canadian women have fought long and hard to remove are once again being placed in their paths. This year, it is true, we did not suffer the same frontal assault we have in the past when institutions faced severe cuts in funding. However, the cuts that were announced this year are just as important in terms of their long-range consequences.

In the budget document, the government gave its answer to a battle that it is losing with female civil servants. There will be no retroactive payments for pay equity prior to November 1990. No matter what the courts decide, no matter what the courts say with regard to this issue, there will be no retroactive payments prior to 1990.

On the same page of the budget, we find the same sort of response to a court challenge it may also lose. "Should substantial amounts of money be involved to broaden the current program, the government will seriously reconsider the basis of the program itself." This alone, without any other added statements, is enough to create a huge sense of despair among Canadian women. The government claims to be committed to equality but only gives lip service and not action because by every one of its actions, it removes the building blocks that women may take to some form of true gender equity in this country.

The day after the budget we heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare announce that he had the privilege of killing the national child care program, a telling description, if ever I heard one.

Another major blow to the rights of women, a blow to the heart of the battle for agenda equality in this country was the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. That is a disgrace, something that Canadians as a group should hang their heads over, but this government, most particularly, should hang its head.

The Court Challenges Program was one of the most innovative and progressive programs sponsored by this government. In other words, in a desert it was one of the few plants that was bearing fruit to benefit the people of Canada. It was a low cost program, $8.5 million over five years. That is not a lot of money.

I say to the hon. chairman of the justice committee it is not a lot of money when you are talking about equality rights. The hon. member thinks it is a lot of money. I wonder if he would think it was a lot of money if he were one of the disadvantaged that could take advantage of this program to right their wrongs, but the hon. member, being a white, I presume, Anglo-Saxon, and I presume again on his religion, Protestant or Catholic, in this country does not have to deal with the discrimination that women and visible minorities and the physically challenged and other disadvantaged groups in this country have to deal with. Yes, he turns his head. I am not surprised.

It was a low-cost program. Its cancellation will mean little for deficit reduction but the implicit message underlined by my hon. colleague over there is that this government is not prepared to help those least able to help themselves in the struggle for equality. What does this say about us as a country? What does it say about our heritage and our history in the realm of human rights? It says that the government laboured and brought forth a mouse.

Without the funding that this program provided, equality for women is a hollow concept in most instances. The charter is a mechanism for striking down discriminatory laws, but it is not one that grants access unless you have the money to pay for it. It does not guarantee access to the courts so that individuals or groups of women may challenge laws that are indeed discriminatory.

Going on in this same vein, women make up 52 per cent of the population. How many times have I said this in this House? How many times have others of us said this in the House ad nauseam? We are the majority in this country, but we are the majority who do not have either a voice or indeed the ear of the most powerful at this point.

Without the money from the Court Challenges Program, the vast majority of Canadian women are struck speechless in the fight for equality. That is what it means; women have been muffled and silenced in their fight for equality.

Must we, therefore, as the Minister for Multiculturalism and Citizenship said, rely on the provinces to defend and promote our constitutional rights? He must have overlooked the fact that in the financial arena, again many of the provinces, my province for one, are particularly hard pressed and unable to grant to their citizens the kind of funding that has long been within the responsibility of the federal government to grant. What the federal government is doing here is abrogating its responsibility and denying that it has historically and constitutionally been the repository as the guardian of rights.

This is a national tragedy.

The Court Challenges Program was important to the advancement and the outcome of a number of significant equality cases. The Andrews case is one I could cite. The Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the main purpose of the equality rights section of the charter was to benefit those who have been historically disadvantaged. Surely, surely, there is no one in this House—well, almost no one—to whom I have to explain the historical disadvantages suffered by women. We could probably start back in the garden of Eden when Eve took the rap for Adam's original sin.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, indeed; yes, indeed. I am prepared to argue the theology and I am quite certain that my colleague from the New Democratic Party and my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, would agree with me. If the rest of you theological—well, I was going to say theological illiterates, but I am sure my colleagues would agree that that term is a little too harsh. As I check the House I do not see that any persons of the cloth are here.

An hon. member: Except yourself.

Ms. Clancy: Well, no, no, I cannot make that claim. I include in those who would agree with me on this matter the hon. member for Don Valley North, chair of the subcommittee on the Status of Women. I know she would agree with me on this, too.

Mr. Milliken: She may not have read it recently.

Ms. Clancy: Well, perhaps not, but most of us remember the story. It was the first time that we got blamed for a multitude of sins.

Further to that, to get back to the seriousness of this issue, we have the Butler case where the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the obscenity provisions in the Criminal Code, arguing that while they were a contravention of the freedom of expression provisions, they nonetheless constituted a reasonable limit under section 1, a reasonable limit prescribed by law that can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. That may sound like a legalism but there is a tremendous sense of freedom in that phrase.

It was recognized that the violent and degrading acts in pornographic material are harmful to the equality and dignity of women. Does anybody in this House disagree with that? No, I do not think so. I am sure not. I do not think there is anyone in this House who would stand up and be a proponent for the kind of garbage in pornographic productions that we have unfortunately seen in this country, and I do not think there is anybody in this House who does not realize that this kind of garbage is harmful to women, both in a general sense vis-à-vis the way men will deal with women in general and in the particular sense of making a direct attack on the dignity and the equality of women.

If there had been no Court Challenges Program there would have been no Butler case. What would the answer be? We would be faced with the continuing inequality.

Then we have the Albrecht case. The courts ruled that upon separation or divorce, a woman is entitled to share her spouse's Canada Pension Plan benefits. How many of us have dealt with that as from time to time governments of both stripes made mistakes when they amended the legislation.

The Liberal government amended it first and then, the second time it amended it, it knocked out the provision. The Conservative government amended it, and the second time it amended it, it knocked out the provision.

Finally, the Supreme Court of Canada, through a Court Challenges case, made the definitive statement and those women are protected. Again, without the Court Challenges case, we would have been on a continual legislative merry-go-round.

Fourth case, the Canadian newspapers case. The Supreme Court upheld the right of Canadian women and children who have been raped to have their names withheld from the media. Again, it is a fundamental question of individual privacy. It is a fundamental question of choice.

I could go on and on, but it is enough in this particular area to say that the Court Challenges Program was crucial, fundamental to the advancement of women's rights. Many cases have yet to work their way through the courts. Many discriminatory laws have yet to be struck down.

Ten years after the inception of the charter, in the words of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the news is not good. Women are initiating few cases and men are using the charter to strike back at the hard won protections for women and the hard won benefits.

The Advisory Council continues by stating that much has yet to be done: "The barriers to women's access to the courts must be removed", and interpretations of equality which are meaningful to women must be advanced more often in the courts.

I do not know how you could say it more plainly. I do not know how it could be more evident that what has taken place here is a travesty and an attack on the rights of the majority of the population in this country.

Basically, it is a shame. We use that word in this House. Sometimes we use it lightly, but in this case, we do not use it lightly. It is with heavy hearts that those of us on this side of the House look to the government and say: Shame.

Unfortunately, the Court Challenges Program is not the only program cut which will adversely affect women. The national child care program has also been sacrificed on the altar of deficit reduction.

We all know that certain issues wax and wane in popularity in this country. We all know that it is our duty as politicians, as representatives of the people, as members of this historic House not to let ourselves be swayed merely by public fads and short-term aspirations. Child care and a national child care program is not a public fad. It is not a short-term aspiration. It is absolutely integral to employment equity for women and, in the long run, to over-all gender equality.

When Madam Justice Abella, as she is now, completed her landmark report on employment equity, one phrase became a clarion call for Canadian women and for those men, many of whom are here today, who support this philosophy that child care is the bridge to employment equity, absolutely and totally.

We all know that domestic responsibilities fall unfairly in proportion upon women. Certainly, every woman who sits in this House who is a mother knows that. It is the way of the world. What we are attempting to do is change the world to make the laws and the institutions somehow reflect the reality of all our lives.

It is incumbent upon us, it is a duty—I hesitate to use the words sacred trust but I will try them—to remember that our first responsibility in this Chamber is to the weaker, those who cannot protect themselves and those who are the disadvantaged in this society. Our responsibility is not as much to those who can protect themselves. Governments are here to protect those who are the weakest members.

It is clear in our modern society that the weakest members, those who have the least ability to protect themselves, are the economically disadvantaged and children. Who forms the largest segment of economically disadvantaged in this country? There is no prize for knowing the answer to this question. The answer is women.

If women cannot work outside the home, frequently the only survival for them is on the social assistance rolls. If there is not affordable, accessible, quality child care then they cannot work outside the home. It is as simple as that, particularly when their children are pre-schoolers.

There has been some sort of a groundswell response in this House, particularly on the government side, that child care is no longer important. Did I miss something? Did people stop having babies? Are there fewer children in Canada than there used to be?

No, Mr. Speaker, I did not miss anything. As a matter of fact what I have not mentioned is the fact that a million Canadian children go to food banks. Why do they go to food banks? Because their parents cannot afford to give them the proper nutritional daily meals. Why can they not afford this? Because most of those one million children who go to food banks are in single-parent families headed by women and they are in single-parent families headed by women where child care is unavailable, where child care is inadequate or where child care is not existent and where mothers are unable to get the training they need, the jobs they need, the level of income they need to deliver for themselves and their children a decent way of life.

I am not suggesting that a national child care program is a total panacea and the answer to all our ills, but it would be one major giant step in the social development of this country. It would be one major liberating step for women who need to feel at least a modicum of security about where their children are so they can devote their considerable talents and energy during the working period to their jobs so that they can feed, clothe, and house their families. Does anybody really disagree with that? I do not think so. But do we have a national child care program? No, no we do not.

Canadian women will continue to face the same situation and the same dilemma, to leave their children in less than suitable situations and continue to work or to stay home to take care of them.

As I say, with the pre-school child it is not even a dilemma. It is simply the fact that if you cannot find child care you cannot go to work. It is equally troubling that a million children in this country are latch key. The children are old enough to go to school, but I do not think any one of us would think that those children are old enough to be left alone.

I recall in my other life dealing with the Children's Services Act in Nova Scotia and looking at the definition of a child in need of protection. A family court judge of great renown in Nova Scotia, who happened to be the author of the act, Judge Louis E. Moir, said to me that if you look at those definitions, there is not one of us nor one of our children who has not fallen under that definition at some time or other. In other words, in every family, in every situation there are lapses. He said that is the reason parents go around with a heavy load of guilt over something that has happened to a child who was left unattended or something like that.

For most people who are not economically disadvantaged and who have access to quality child care, those situations are rare and thus worries about children at least in that sense do not happen all that often. But for the single mother attempting to break the cycle of poverty, attempting to get herself retrained, attempting to find the good life in Canada, those things happen all too often.

Mr. Speaker, you give me the signal that my time is up. I have only one comment to make.

[Translation]

In concluding, I would like to repeat that what the women of Canada receive is well below what they deserve to receive. It is time we listened to what women are saying. We represent 52 per cent of the population of this country, but our needs and priorities are always put somewhere on the backburner. We have the money. Let's spend it to ensure that women's needs are not ignored.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, women deserve better. This government should pay attention. The gender gap lives.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax on her very eloquent remarks.

She dealt in particular with the cuts in the Court Challenges Program which have affected not just women's groups, but also linguistic groups and other minority groups in our society, many of which relied on the Court Challenges Program. Native groups also come to mind.

Does the member feel that perhaps part of the reason for the cuts in this program that the government has implemented so cavalierly in the most recent budget were motivated by a desire to minimize criticism of the government?

In addition to the Court Challenges Program we had things like the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada slashed. Both of them, potentially at least, could be critical of the government. In fact, the Economic Council was very critical in some of its reports, understandably with the mess the government has made of the finances of this country in the last seven years.

I am wondering if perhaps in its decision to slice all these programs away, the government is simply trying to minimize criticism of itself. Does she feel that that was the principal motivation behind the cuts to the Court Challenges Program in particular?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands for his question. I want to reassure the Minister of Forestry that being a woman I never, ever, ever anticipate chickens before they hatch.

In any event, with regard to my learned colleague's question, in the dissolution of the Economic Council, the Science Council and I might say also the International Centre for Ocean Development, which was cut and was of great importance to my own city of Halifax as well as to Canada's role in international ocean development, he is absolutely right. The government in that case was attempting not only to minimize, but to muffle, indeed to silence criticism, the kind of silence that Judith Maxwell in the report of the Economic Council broke and broke most eloquently on government policy.

With regard to the Court Challenges Program, it is a little different. In a sense, it is almost more sinister because it betrays a lack of awareness of the importance of the program.

An example is the pornography case, the Butler case. When these matters are brought to the attention of members on the other side and they are asked to look at them, I cannot believe that there is a single member on the other side of the House who does not see the importance of that landmark decision to the equality of women. It is not just to the equality of women I might add, but to a basic ambience in our country that Canada will not be a dumping ground for that kind of garbage.

What is the answer? What can be the answer? That is what I believe my learned friend is asking me. My response is that far too many people in this country, far too many people on the government side still do not get the point. There is still some sort of belief that disadvantaged women are some sort of minority or subgroup.

We know, the minister, my colleague from British Columbia, myself, we are all aware of the battles that we have fought individually on the question of violence against women. There is still a great amount of belief out there that the situation only relates to a subgroup, that it is not a broad base situation. We are diffusing that myth, slowly but surely.

But we are not diffusing the myth that disadvantaged women are a subgroup as well. It does not matter how many times you say it. I am not sure how many people really believe that women only make 67 cents for every dollar that men make.

I am not sure that people really understand viscerally that there are one million children using food banks, that there are one million latchkey children, that child care even for those who are financially well set is not that easy to find.

The long-range difficulty will continue to be a long-range difficulty until the make-up of this House and every legislature in the country reflects the population. Until 52 per cent of legislators, provincially and federally, are female we will still have that difficulty. There are none so blind as those who cannot see.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax for the eloquent speech and come back to a topic that she raised in some detail in her speech, and that is the child care program.

I also am a supporter of her point of view that a national child care program is a necessity. I quite agree, as she has stated, that it is not the total solution to the problem but it would certainly go a long way.

I would like her to comment on the existing programs that are available. More specifically, this time of the year is income tax time and Revenue Canada has provisions with regard to child care. I would ask the hon. member her opinion on whether she thinks that these regulations are biased in favour of those who have money, the rich, and do nothing for those who are disadvantaged at the low level of the scale, many of whom are women.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from New Brunswick for his very cogent question.

In answer, we know that the government has removed more than $3.5 billion from the child benefit system since 1986, $3.5 billion. The government's blueprint for child benefits reform is inadequate as an anti-poverty measure.

Single mothers on social assistance will receive no additional benefit from this measure. Let me underline that, no additional benefit. Single mothers with annual incomes of between $30,000 and $40,000 will receive only $44 more a year. The child benefit is not fully indexed to inflation and therefore its value will decrease over time.

It is misleading for this government to tell Canadians that a choice had to be made between child care and programs aimed at children at risk. Glenda Simms, president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, clearly identified the gap in logic. Child care prevents children being at risk. Why is the government therefore attempting to pit abused and hungry children against Canadian children who are in need of safe and affordable child care? It is a disgrace.

We have a problem right now with the situation as it stands. The provinces have varying and different programs. Some provinces have better programs than others; some provinces have more money to spend than others. There is no standardized child care across this country. A parent who is looking for child care has very little in the way of quality control to understand what it is. If I have time I would just like to illustrate with a brief example.

I was president of the board of the largest child care centre in Atlantic Canada, St. Joseph's Children's Centre in Halifax. I was on the board for about eight years and president of the board for three. This was an excellent facility. Through our work there we dealt with other excellent child care facilities as well.

I had a colleague, another lawyer, who was involved with another child care organization. Indeed, he was on the board. Midway through his term on the board it was discovered that the standards at the other child care facility—not the one I was involved with but the other one—had fallen well below provincial regulatory levels, that there were indeed serious problems. What had happened, as frequently happens, is the people in charge were frightened. They were afraid of losing jobs, et cetera. We all know the scenario. I remember my colleague being absolutely flabbergasted that he could be involved with this and not have known right away. It did not go on very long. It only went for about a month, but to have children in inadequate care for even a month is not a very good thing.

This sort of thing goes on over and over again. The only thing that is going to cure it is national standards and a national program for all Canadians.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to participate in this debate and to discuss with my colleagues in the House the unequivocal and firm commitment of our government to equality of women in this country.

I would like to start actually with some points of agreement with my hon. colleague who has raised this motion today. I think it is important in this House and for Canadians to see that there is agreement in some areas of discussion of this nature. Certainly one of the areas of agreement would be the issue my hon. colleague raised, that the historical inequalities faced by women go back to the story of Adam and Eve. I would agree with her. That kind of historical reality has been fundamental in our western society.

Indeed it has only been realistically in this last century that we have been able to address and redress some of those significant inequalities. After almost 2,000 years or many more the kinds of changes or the acceleration of change is something we should feel very good about. It is the many Canadian women who have worked so hard during this century to make some of those changes that we would like to honour. That is one of the reasons earlier this month I announced that in October we would be celebrating women's history month, something that I hope will be established right across this country.

I do believe it is important for us to understand our roots, to understand the contribution women make to our society. I hope that all members of the House will join with us in their ridings to promote activities, whether it is honouring the famous five or many other wonderful women in Canadian society.

The second point I would like to agree with that my hon. colleague raised is that I too would dearly love to see 52 per cent of the members of this House being women. That is a goal I am sure all members would agree with.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Collins: Don't you think? I think we might get some agreement. That indeed would be a more accurate reflection of the reality of society. It is something we are all working on in upcoming elections. That in itself—and I have talked about this in the House and with my colleagues—might help to change some of the way in which we undertake our business. We should to try to find more consensus around issues rather than the constant adversarial approach we are locked into. I think the Canadian public would find that much more acceptable as well.

It is also interesting at this time that many people still have difficulty understanding what we are talking about when we are talking about still having to look at issues relating to women's equality. They say: "Well, you have the vote and you have all these wonderful things. We do not need this any longer".

Recently Time magazine ran an article about how feminism is dead. It is important to remind people that although we have made significant advances there are still measures that must follow. We must all work, men and women together, to address those.

Often people say they do not want to be identified with feminism. It has had a host of labels and definitions going back to 1913. This concern about it is not new. Rebecca West, a well-known English author and critic, lamented the public's perception of feminism with this memorable quote: "I only know that people call me a feminist whenever I express sentiments that differentiate me from a door-mat". I think in that instance all my colleagues would be feminists.

One of the most interesting definitions I saw recently was one from Nova Scotia in a report done by the Nova Scotia Advisory Committee on the Status of Women in a very nice book it put out. It comes from a grade 10 student. Sometimes we have to go back to the wisdom of our children who often see things in clear terms. She wrote: "A feminist is an intelligent woman of the nineties who believes she can do or accomplish anything a man can do. She knows men and women are equal". Hear, hear. I think that young woman captured feminism in a nutshell. More than that, it indicates an awareness hopefully among young people of the issues we are dealing with as well.

Let me return to the subject we are debating today about fundamental equality and again on the positive side. I have had the opportunity in recent months of visiting with my counterparts in different countries. They have visited Canada and sometimes I have visited their countries in international meetings. One thing they say almost consistently is how lucky we are in Canada, that women here have advanced whether it is the economic sector, whether it is in the political sector or whether it is in the educational sector. We have had structures in place in Canada starting about 20 years ago with the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the various mechanisms to support particularly the activities of women's organizations and groups that have helped us advance. It is something that does not exist in many other countries.

Often we have delegations coming to Canada that sit down and meet with my officials at status of women, meet with the Canadian Advisory Council, and meet with NGOs, and then go back and try to formulate their own plans. I think we have provided a real leadership role internationally in this respect.

The other issue I also want to raise today, because to me it is of great primacy and one I know my colleagues feel the same way about, is the issue of violence against women. I see it as fundamental to women's equality that we address this issue and that as a society we take the steps that are going to be important to reduce, and I would like to say eliminate if I could be that optimistic, the kinds of violence that occur in our society: physical and emotional violence. Of course that is the mandate of the panel which is undertaking its work across the country. I know that I am very much looking forward to its final report in December of this year and an interim report in May.

Again I compliment my colleagues who sat on the parliamentary committee—the chair of that committee is here and other members—for their work on The War Against Women, a very important landmark report. In the response from the government last November we indicated our agreement with almost all of the recommendations and are seeking ways to work toward their implementation.

As we heard earlier today, my colleague, the Minister of Justice, tabled the regulations which go along with the Gun Control Act that was passed in this House. It is one facet of addressing of this issue.

Last December my hon. hon. colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby put forward a motion that was passed unanimously in this House designating December 6 as a day of remembrance and action on violence against women. We know that led to a tremendous amount of activity throughout this country and a heightening and an awareness of these issues, an awareness to which the panel is now adding in its work.

We have also seen the introduction of legislation on sexual assault in this House which will be coming up for debate I expect shortly. Many groups have spoken to me about it. They really think it is landmark legislation. I hope we will have the full support of members in this House when that comes to debate and goes to committee. For women it is really significant in terms of changing the concepts. Often I think it is hard for men to understand in this issue, as well as when we get into issues of sexual assault, just how important that is to women. It involves our very being and our physical sense of ourselves which we want to ensure we can protect and cannot be violated.

We have also been very active in international forums. The Prime Minister attended the Francophonie last year and there was work done with respect to women at the Commonwealth. It was not only on the issue of violence against women, but the heads of government adopted the Ottawa declaration, to which the status of women ministers had agreed in their meeting, with respect to structural adjustment and ensuring that as structural adjustment occurs in countries it does not adversely affect women. That is very important for women throughout the world, both the north and the south. Most recently discussions went on in Vienna in the last two weeks at the UN commission on women in which Canada again played a major role, not only in the recommendations, for example, to increase the number of women within the United Nations organization and in management positions, something we have been really working on, but more important in a Canadian resolution with respect to violence against women, which was accepted unanimously by all countries. That was not easy, as I am sure the House can imagine. This means we can now move forward with working out the details of that and hopefully bring that back to the full United Nations General Assembly and then on to the world conference on women scheduled for 1995.

All these actions can start to make a difference for women not only in Canada but around the world. Women do feel a strong allegiance to their sisters and we know we have a responsibility to be of assistance.

There are other areas too that I think are important to remind ourselves of when we look at the progress of women in Canada. It is within the mandate of the federal government to ensure that women are getting their fair share of appointments. We are seeing women taking on increasingly responsible positions. In the Public Service we have seen a tripling of the number of deputy ministers who are women. Certainly the judiciary is an area that is important to women. They want to see themselves reflected in the judges. Only two weeks ago we were able to announce the appointments of not only Chief Justice Catherine Fraser as the first woman to head up a provincial Supreme Court but also the appointment of Madam Justice Rosalie Abella as the 100th woman judge in the federal sphere.

That has taken a lot of work because judges do not retire; they stay on. It is only as the vacancies come up that we are having to make these kind of changes. In all the appointments the government has responsibility for, we have doubled the percentage of women appointed. We are continuing to address that and continuing to make improvements.

Let us turn to some other areas. Education, for example, is one of the critical areas as we look at the opportunities for women's advancement. We know it is critical that women first of all complete high school, that they have opportunities to go on to post-secondary education, and that they do not drop out of areas such as maths and sciences which are so critical in terms of future employment opportunities. The ministers of science over the past few years have been working on this. The Canada Scholarships Program has been an important incentive for young people to study maths and sciences at the post-secondary level. Some 50 per cent of those scholarships go to women so we have this core of young women now going into those fields. We are seeing increasing numbers in the sciences and engineering professions. We also have been working closely with our provincial colleagues and our ministers of education to encourage them to ensure that young women are provided with the information and the support to ensure that they not only stay in school but that they pursue areas of science and technology.

The good news too as we look at statistics relating to women is that women are a growing influence in all sectors of society: economically, socially and politically. For example, between 1984 and 1991 the number of women in managerial and administrative positions climbed by 82 per cent. These kinds of positions account for almost one-third of all jobs that women have entered into over the past seven years.

There are some very bright spots in the professions. If we are looking at the issue of women being able to earn more money, being able to make choices and to look after their families and the future, we should look at things like the law and medicine where women are increasing in number, in some cases over 50 per cent.

Between 1981 and 1986 women were responsible for more than two-thirds of all employment growth in the professional categories listed by Statistics Canada. I think that is a figure that probably a lot of people are not aware of. It is a very important trend, one that we have to ensure occurs.

Indisputably—and I hope no one would argue about this—the participation of women in the paid labour force has become vital for our economy. We are 52 per cent of the population. It is expected that we will be 50 per cent of the labour force by the end of this decade. As a participant in a more closely integrated and more global economy, which we all know is the direction we are going in, Canada must draw upon all its resources, particularly the creativity and productivity of all of our citizens. They have come to realize that the efficient involvement of all of our human resources is essential to our continued social and human development.

I am not sure we have all the answers about how to do that but certainly through the number of strategies, prosperity strategies and human resources development strategy, we are trying to find those ways.

I come back specifically to the budget because my colleague has raised that. Although we have had debates in this House over a period of days on the budget, I would like to speak about some of the measures which I think are important advances for women, why I believe the budget is good for Canada in terms of getting our economic house in order, and why it is also good for the women of Canada.

Canadians have indicated to us that they want the deficit to be cut. They know that higher debt means higher taxes and they want an end to rising taxes. Those were clear messages received when women's groups were consulted in this process and many others who were consulted.

They also want the burden of government reduced. They want less government and better service. We have to look at ways that we can accomplish that. They also want to ensure the development of Canada's resources, our human resources specifically. They want better opportunities for people to improve their skills and they want steps taken to ensure that our social programs meet our basic needs as well.

I think most of all Canadians have indicated they want a renewed basis for confidence, confidence that jobs will be created and maintained.

It was these kinds of views that were expressed right across the country that led to many of the measures in the budget and responded to these concerns. I think the equation is simple. The budget reduced government spending and directed the savings to tax cuts that will help individual Canadian women, men and families and support economic growth. That is what in the long term obviously is going to be important for women.

At the same time the budget we enforced is a responsible and a prudent fiscal plan that will hold the deficit to $31.4 billion in the coming year and reduce it substantially as the recovery takes place.

My colleague raised the issue of the new child tax program. This would be a point where I would disagree because I think that is a very important move. I think by taking what were three programs, including the old family allowance program and the child tax credit, combining them into a package, enriching it by over $2 billion over the next few years and targeting it to the families who need it most, we can help to make a substantial difference, not only in alleviating poverty but in helping the many cases of women-led families to start becoming more economically independent and have those resources that are required.

I think that the proposed new child benefit is responsible as well for changing family circumstances because programs that were developed at one time are not necessarily appropriate today. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the new benefit can be as much as $144 per month per child, tax free, for a total of $1,733 per year. That is a lot of money to put into the pockets of women that they will have the discretion to spend for their children whether it is on food, clothing, or day care facilities.

Of course for low-income families with children this new child tax benefit also includes a new federal earned income supplement of up to $500 a year which provides additional support to the low-income working parents, the very people who indeed my hon. colleague has talked about, and I agree with her. This is the target group, particularly the women in that group, that we need to focus on and provide support for and help, assist them to get off social assistance and back into the work force. That indeed is why this program is targeting what is called, and I do not like the expression, the working poor. I think it is people who are trying to better themselves and help to provide those extra dollars. That is combined, of course, with the many programs that I know I have had the opportunity of being involved in through my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, of funding, not only for language programs for immigrant women, but training and retraining programs for women, to help to give them those skills to get into the work place and then, through these kinds of programs, help provide the support to them.

As well, this program is simpler. I think it is fairer because it is based on total family income and not on individual incomes. It also rewards the work effort of low-income working families, as I indicated, many of which are headed by women. It will also assist them in balancing work and family. As my colleague mentioned, that too is an important issue that we need to address; how to ensure that women and men are able to find that more appropriate balance between work and family.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my time is through. I have many more issues that I would like to address with respect to the budget. I know other colleagues will have an opportunity to speak later in the day, but I would like to say again that this budget is an important step forward in terms of dealing not only with the future and a healthier economy of Canada, but also in ensuring and working toward equality for all women in Canada as well.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for her comments today. There are, as she said, a number of issues that we all agree on, at least the women in this House. But there are a number of issues that we feel very differently about and we have strong differences on too.

I would like to ask the minister to react to a quotation from the leader of her party, the Prime Minister, who said on July 28, 1988: "We will implement and build on our national child care program, the most innovative social advance in Canada since the Canada Pension Plan a quarter of a century ago". That is what the Prime Minister said in 1988.

I would like to ask the minister to respond to that quotation by her Prime Minister in view of what her colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, said when he indicated he had the privilege to kill the child care program that they had talked about since 1984.

I would also ask the minister for her feelings on the Court Challenges Program that has been dropped in this budget, and how she can relate that action of her government in terms of the things she was talking about in her speech today on advancing women's equality in this country; and also the action of her government in reneging on its commitment to pay equity for women in the Public Service of Canada in setting an arbitrary date of 1990 as being the time when women in the Public Service were deserving of pay equity, and that those years in which they were underpaid and undervalued have no kind of validity or honour to those years when women were also underpaid.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to respond to that as I did not get to some of those issues in my speech.

I will start with pay equity because I think it is important. As my colleagues know, that legislation was originally passed by a previous government. It was only when this government came into office that we started to work toward the actual implementation of pay equity within the Public Service. There were discussions and there were studies that went on over a period of years. There were legitimate differences of points of view between Treasury Board, the employer, and the unions on this.

Finally, rather than just going on forever, the Treasury Board announced that it would make a settlement of $317 million. That is of course primarily to women in a number of occupations. It felt that was a fair assessment and settlement. There would be ongoing payments of some $81 million a year. That has meant, in fact, that there were lump sum payments made in the category, for example, of secretaries and clerks of between $3,500 and $5,900 a piece of sort of lump sum payments. It is now actually providing on average about $1,289 additional a year for secretaries and about $994 for clerks.

Following that settlement, the union, and it has every right to do so, said that it did not agree, and there was a dispute.

The method in the legislation for resolving that dispute is under the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the tribunal that has been set up to deal with that. That process is ongoing. It is not expected that they will reach a decision until probably some time next year at which time, obviously, we will see whether they agree with one party or the other or come out with something in the middle. One does not know.

In the meantime, though, I think from the government's point of view, to have had unlimited retroactivity, the costs would have been horrendous. One of the options would have said there would have been no retroactivity. That in fact is the case in many of the provincial acts that deal with pay equity. They are only forward-looking. They have no retroactivity clause in them. I think because governments have recognized that there is such uncertainty there that the potential costs that they cannot calculate makes it very difficult.

What we agreed to was a bit of a saw-off and said as of the date the case was filed with the Canadian Human Rights Commission, November 1990, that would be the date the government would then agree to pay retroactive settlements based on the decision of the Human Rights Commission.

I would just like to draw to colleagues' attention that not all provinces yet have pay equity legislation. The federal government was indeed the leader. For example, Ontario has no retroactivity and in fact adjustments are paid on a percentage-forward. They are not necessarily all paid at once. Nova Scotia has no retroactivity. Adjustments are divided equally over four successive years. Manitoba, in a similar vein, New Brunswick, P.E.I., Yukon and Newfoundland, all phase in. If a decision is made, they phase in.

We are doing a lot better than that. We have said that based on what the judgment would be, we will indeed provide retroactivity. Not everyone is going to be happy with it, I understand, but I think that is fair because with almost anything you do in life, there is no unlimited retroactivity.

For me, the important thing is to move ahead, to ensure that there is a fair and balanced approach in dealing with pay equity and that we can move ahead at this time.

My hon. colleague asked me as well about child care. I am sure she is aware that the federal government now does contribute about $1 billion toward child care throughout this country. That is through a variety of initiatives, both through the provinces and through those women who are into training under the various training programs that we have. Of course, we also have the tax reductions which help another group of women, a very important group of women. We have, through things like Treasury Board, programs for establishing employer child care.

We have been working closely with my colleague, the Minister of Labour, on the whole issue of work and family and focusing on how we need to encourage employers to be more sensitive to this issue. One way is through the provision of employer-supported child care which, for many women, they see as as the appropriate response. Certainly we are working in that area as well.

I hope we will be able to do more because I believe that child care is an important component for many women in this country. I think it is not, as my hon. colleague would agree, only a federal responsibility. It is primarily within the provincial area with our focus being, as we have seen in this budget, on trying to help make it more affordable. That has been the focus, affordability, putting more money into the hands of women through the new family benefits package. By putting more money into the hands of women through the Income Tax Act and the child care tax deductions, we are indeed making significant progress toward that end.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, through you to the hon. minister, I was reminded in her comments of two things. One, she talked about pay equity and the provinces. I agree. She is certainly correct in the question that retroactivity is not exactly thick on the ground, particularly in the have not provinces, many of which she mentioned, for obvious reasons.

I was also reminded, to a degree, of what my mother used to say to me when I would say: "The kid up the street is allowed to do this and the kid next door is allowed to do this". My mother would say to me: "That is fine in those houses, but in this house, the child is not allowed to do this". I would ask the minister, understanding the difficulties inherent in this question of pay equity, does she not agree that what we have here is a long-term series of inequalities that the government has an opportunity to right? The women in the Public Service in particular are not subject to the employment equity law yet, and the pay equity provisions have been, in a sense, twisted out of their grasp. They originally thought they were going to get one package and later found out they were going to get another. Would the minister not agree there is an inherent fairness there that we should all be trying to achieve as soon as possible?

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I would agree with my colleague that there is unfairness. The fact that we have pay equity legislation and are proceeding with its implementation seems eminently fair to me.

There will be different points of view on the technical criteria of how we relate one job to another. Obviously there are going to be different perspectives between employers and employees' representatives. That is why we have a mechanism for resolving those differences, which in this case happens to be the Human Rights Commission. In other jurisdictions they have other mechanisms for resolving differences. I think that indeed is fair.

The provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia do not have pay equity legislation yet but will soon introduce it. Governments introducing pay equity legislation now should recognize that it probably should be done from this day forward. We cannot go back and redress all the inequities of the past, whether it is in this issue or many other issues. It is important now to find mechanisms to ensure that women are paid equitably and, as my colleague has said, also have the kinds of opportunities that we want to see come about through things like employment equity.

Quite honestly, this is an area where we have a good record at the federal government level, in so far as women are concerned. We have in fact seen a 50 per cent increase in the promotion of women in management over the past few years in those areas. I can see some really good progress taking place there.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate on the budget and the implications of it on the women of Canada.

Unfortunately this budget continues in the same direction as previous budgets brought forward by this government. It puts the burden of deficit reduction on the shoulders of those who are least responsible for that deficit, and least able to pay for it. Unfortunately it is a continuing trend.

The budget is harmful to women, and particularly to poor women with children. It ends universal family allowance and replaces it with a two-tiered system based on income. Instead of giving the most money to the poor, the government in many respects is going back to the future with this outdated and Victorian notion of separating people and children into the deserving poor and the undeserving poor.

It is an insult to separate children into the two camps of those whose parents do have jobs, and those whose parents do not have jobs. It is an insult to reward the children whose parents have jobs with this small supplement of $500. It is an insult to call this bizarre gesture an incentive to work.

Why does this government not understand that hunger and deprivation are in themselves incentives to work? Through its own mismanagement, this government has caused and exacerbated a recession which has put 1.5 million Canadians out of work in this country.

The government has again in this budget cut training programs for people on welfare. The government has turned its back on the one million children in this country who are in need of child care.

Without child care, poor parents cannot enter the job market. They cannot keep a job. The poor people whom I know and have met want jobs, training, education and adequate care for their children. Instead they are being pushed into a spiral of desperation. Sixty per cent of these poor are women.

When the government says poor parents do not work because they are lazy or unmotivated, it is really saying that women with children are lazy. It has no idea how much hard work is involved in taking care of children and raising them.

I was a young mother who struggled with a chronically ill two- year old child and newborn twins at the same time. I know how difficult it is to be at home with limited resources and try to provide for your children the best way you can. This government has made it much more difficult for those women who are in the home trying to cope with raising children by cutting back on the resources available to those women.

How dare this government infer that kind of a daily struggle is laziness? Unfortunately, a lot of members of this House of Commons have no understanding of the reality of women's lives. They have no understanding of the reality of some women who line up at food banks with children crying and hanging on to their jackets. That in itself is an incentive to work, as is watching your children grow up without the ordinary things that other children have, and become statistics as high school drop-outs.

The minister, in her remarks, talked about how much better some women are doing in our educational institutions. It is true. More women are entering post-secondary institutions now, but all of us in this House must remember that 30 per cent of the children who enter school in Canada do not finish school. Thirty per cent of our young people do not graduate from high school, and that is an incentive to work. Feeling like the world is going to cave in on you unless you can change things for yourself and your family is an incentive to work.

Just for once I would like to be able to take away money, education, training, and connections from the ministers on the other side of the House. I would like to see them live on the level of income of many people and many single women with children in our country, and see if they would then come up with these kinds of policies. I think then they would have a lesson in reality and would perhaps be more sensitive to the needs of women, children and the poor in our society.

The minister also talked about the new child benefit. Well it denies benefits to the poorest of the poor. Only people earning $10,000 to $20,000 will get the extra $500. Those whose incomes are in the range of $3,750 will not see a single extra cent. How can anyone be expected to raise children on an income of $4,000 a year? The benefit itself is not indexed. Every year that benefit will be worth less and less, until one day it will probably disappear altogether.

Universality is being axed. That means money given to help maintain children is again a charitable policy of this government and not a right.

The government is also spending $500,000 in newspapers across this country to advertise this new child benefit. The minister said it is new, improved, simpler and fairer. I am not sure about that. I do not think all the families denied these benefits will see it as being newer, simpler, fairer or more generous.

The government also promised a homemaker's pension in 1984. We have not seen any evidence of that. The child benefit, which is a bit of charity thrown to some families, is a large step away from recognizing the value of child rearing to our society. The universal family allowance was in some families the only money that a woman received in her own name. We know, and statistics tell us, that one in ten women is abused by the man she lives with. More often than not, this abuse is more than physical and sexual abuse; it is usually also economic and social control. The woman does not share in the family finances.

In addition to choking off funds from the Canada Assistance Plan, which funds shelters for battered women, the cancellation of family allowance means fewer economic resources for women to get away from and out of abusive relationships. The issue of children was used by our Prime Minister during the United Nations summit on the rights of the child in 1990. Article 18(2) of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child requires Canada to "render the appropriate assistance to parents and legal guardians in the performance of their child rearing responsibilities and shall ensure the development of institutions, facilities, and services for the care of children".

Section 18(3) requires the Canadian government to "ensure that children of working parents have the right to benefit from child care services and facilities for which they are eligible".

The new child benefit does not create one single child care space. It does not ensure quality care for Canadian children. It provides no greater access to care at all.

Before the budget we knew that one million Canadian children were in need of child care. After the budget nothing has changed, and we do not have even one new child care space.

This budget also contains another blow to economic equality for women. Between 1985 and 1990 women in the Public Service earned significantly less than men. The government promised that unfair situation would be rectified. Instead, the government has abandoned its promise to honour its pay equity commitment dating back to 1985. I remember, in the leaders' debate on women's issues, the Prime Minister standing up and responding that the money was there. It was in the bank and had been put aside for that pay equity legislation. Where has it gone? Did that bank account just disappear?

Seventy thousand women lost $1 billion which they had already earned but never received.

The government has also promised to ignore a human rights tribunal ruling on this issue if it does not like that ruling. I suppose this is the only promise the government will keep.

This budget also attacks legal and social equality for women. The cancellation of the Court Challenges Program is a disaster for women. It is a disaster for aboriginal people, visible minorities, and the disabled.

Disabled women are far more likely than any other women to be sexually assaulted. Disabled women tend on average to be even poorer than disabled men who are also extremely economically disadvantaged. Disabled women have fewer economic resources to leave an abusive situation. Their physical options are also limited.

Many shelters for battered women do not have money for major renovations to make them accessible to the disabled. Disabled women have fewer housing options when they try to leave an abusive situation. Disabled women are bombarded with societal messages about inadequacy. They are disbelieved, treated as less than adults, patronized, and often have poor self-esteem as a result of social and economic discrimination.

This low self-esteem can also keep them trapped in abusive relationships. Disabled women are sometimes advised to stay in a physically or sexually violent relationship because "at least they have a man".

The government has chosen to cut back on funding for this group this time around. This is one of the disadvantaged groups cut back and hurt desperately by the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

Aboriginal women have witnessed the disintegration of their own communities. They and their parents are survivors of residential schools where many were physically and sexually abused. They were beaten if they spoke their own language or practised their own religious beliefs and customs. They went back to communities without sufficient skills to survive in a white world. They were met with racism, name-calling, battering and rape.

They went back to communities without sufficient skills to practise their traditional way of life. Residential schools broke up families and supplanted healthy relationships with sick ones.

Many aboriginal children grew up in these schools without affection and knowing only sexual abuse as a model for relationships.

In the general population, women who are raped are six times more likely than other women to commit suicide. Alcohol and drug use is also a symptom of childhood sexual abuse.

• (1130)

Aboriginal communities across Canada are beginning to deal with that legacy of pain. They are trying to reverse that cultural genocide. They are angry at the social and economic state of their communities and are organizing to change it. They are trying to build a life to heal the many wounds.

Aboriginal women are trying to keep their children off the streets. Again, this is one of the groups in our society this government has chosen to punish, a group that is just now gaining enough strength to continue fighting for their rights and to define a distinct place for themselves.

Aboriginal women and men and the generations to come are affected by the complete shutdown of the Court Challenges Program. Only those who can afford them can have rights is what this government is saying. This action of cancelling the Court Challenges Program, in effect, makes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country meaningless. Unless the people who most need access to those rights have the means to access them, it is useless to have a charter.

This is a time when the government has implemented a racist and sexist regulation to keep foreign domestic workers, particularly women of colour, from ever becoming Canadian citizens. What the government is saying is that no matter how many years one of these women can prove she has worked in Canada and been a good Canadian citizen, this is no longer good enough.

She must now meet the Canadian immigration point system which disadvantages women. Close to 60 per cent of the women entering Canada through the Foreign Domestic Movement Program in 1990 were from the Philippines. Now domestic workers from the Philippines and elsewhere will have to have the equivalent of a grade 12 education to come to Canada. The problem is that in the Philippines the high school system does not go that far and very few women have access to what would be the equivalent of a grade 12 education in Canada.

This government is telling women of colour that they are good enough to clean up after others but not good enough to be Canadian citizens no matter how hard-working, no matter how productive or responsible they are.

Many times when we talk about access to equality, we look for ways that disadvantaged groups in our society can seek that equality. With the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program, there is no recourse to seek equality except for those who can afford it. Guess what? Big surprise to this government: Groups who can already afford it already have those rights.

I feel I am standing here today repeating the same things I said one week ago, one month ago and one year ago. I am sure that there are many Canadians who are just as tired as I am of these same policies. These policies are not just words on a piece of paper, they affect the lives of every woman, every child, every man in Canada.

There are one million children in Canada in need of child care. If I were to attach names to all of these children, I would still be standing here tomorrow. If I were to tell you about their lives, we would be here until next week. Some are children whose mothers are on welfare, unable to look for work because they do not have adequate care for their children. We know that welfare is not enough for a family to live on.

Forty per cent of the users of food banks are children. Seven hundred thousand children in this country rely on food banks for their daily food. The Prime Minister stands in this House and argues about how many children are poor, how many people have been raised above the poverty line and how many children are in fact living in poverty. The fact of the matter is that we have 700,000 children who rely on food banks for their food. He does not see their faces. He does not see thin children trying to laugh while their tummies are empty. He does not see the grades at school or hear their teachers scold them for not paying attention.

Those of us who think that hungry children are not our problem are being selfish. We are also being very, very wrong. For this is the future of our country. These children wear a gaunt and a grim face. It is the face of a child who is unable to finish school. Thirty per cent of the children who enter school in this country do not go through to graduation.

Montreal's rates of low birth weight rival parts of the developing world. In Manitoba, we know that children have died of disease related to malnourishment. Children are poor because their parents are poor. Sixty per cent of the poor in Canada are women and this budget entrenches again the feminization of poverty.

I urge this government to do something positive for women. Reinstate the Court Challenges Program. Reinstate the money for training programs so that people can learn how to do the jobs that are out there, instead of being stuck in a rut with no skills or skills that are no longer needed. Implement a child care program that meets the needs of Canadian children.

This government is always talking about competitiveness. If that is the only term that the government understands, why does it not look at how we are falling behind European countries in terms of child care, parental leave, education and training?

Let us get competitive with the Europeans on those issues. They are becoming more and more competitive because they do understand that workers have children, that workers need skills to do their jobs and that people are not born just to serve business interests but that business must also take the needs of people into account.

This budget, like this government, fails women. During times of restraint it is especially important to maintain and enhance equality rights. To do any less is to foster hatred and resentment.

Canadians need each other now more than ever. We have to work together to overcome these hard times. We have to learn about each other, respect one another and help each other. We need to care about each other and not just about our own pocketbooks or our own children.

All children in Canada no matter where they live, no matter what their colour, no matter what their physical abilities, are all our children. They are our present and our future, they are our responsibility and we cannot afford to fail them. We cannot afford to fail their parents. To do so is to put our future and the future of this country at peril. We will be judged by the choices we make.

I urge this government to start making the right choices, choices that offer women, children and the men of this country hope. This is a budget that says to the women of Canada: "No pay equity. No Court Challenges Program. No child care". In fact, it says to the women of Canada: "Know your place".

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby with regard to poverty and food banks because that is, of course, a particular interest of mine. Having spent two years struggling with this problem on the subcommittee on poverty, one of the issues we need to resolve as a country is the issue of the responsibilities of the provinces versus the federal government.

We recommended that there be national standards for welfare in this country and we also recommended an expanded program of subsidized day care which I believe the member fully supports.

I know that the minister is in a very difficult position because imposing standards on certain provinces is, first of all, something they are absolutely opposed to. Second, it could be extremely contentious given the current constitutional agreement.

Right now the provinces have full authority to implement food programs under the Canada Assistance Plan for poor children, either on an area basis where they know there is a concentration of poor children or on an individual needs tested basis. Those programs are permissible under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Similarly, they can implement day care programs. There are three provinces that in fact are affected by the Canada Assistance Plan limit of 5 per cent; Ontario, B.C. and Alberta. However, neither B.C. nor Alberta was previously spending anywhere near the 5 per cent. Ontario was the only province which was substantially increasing its expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan at rather dramatic levels, up to 14 per cent in certain years. There was certainly a commitment by the Ontario government to both expand subsidized day care and to expand welfare.

What then is the answer? We have an NDP government in British Columbia with a commitment just as strong as that of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

Will the hon. member tell me what she thinks is the appropriate role of the British Columbia government? Of the other provinces, does she think they should initiate these programs? I know she disagrees with the 5 per cent cap. It seems to me she is saying that the federal government should take over and fund all these programs. However, given the current constitutional crisis and the attitudes of the provinces, which I understand are absolutely opposed to a national day care program, does she think that the federal government should be doing this against the wishes of the provinces? What role does she see for the provinces in this country?

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, it is a long and convoluted question, but as a member of Parliament in this place, I see a responsibility to all of the children of this country, not children in certain sections, not children in certain provinces, but all of the children of the country.

The member spoke of the Canada Assistance Plan and said that provincial governments could access funds through that to feed children. I want to remind the member that the Vancouver School Board, which has instituted at the municipal level, at the school board level, a lunch program for hungry school children in that city tried to access the Canada Assistance Plan funding and were denied any funding by this government.

There was a long and hard struggle to try to access those funds for school lunch programs in British Columbia which was led by my colleague, the member for Vancouver East, who had many questions and many meetings with ministers on that side of the House to try to feed these hungry children. They were denied that by this government.

When she talked about the Canada Assistance Plan as only affecting a small part of the budget in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, I would like to remind the member that the Canada Assistance Plan funds shelters for battered women, funds welfare systems and programs. It funds the very programs of the people she claims to care about.

It funds all of the child care shared-cost programs. I would say that most provinces with the financial ability to pay would be more than happy to access funds under that program, to build more child care spaces. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

I have not heard of any province saying that it is opposed to a national child care program where there are funds coming from this government to share in that expense.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged having the opportunity to speak on this motion that was put forward by my colleague from Halifax.

I have been reviewing and reading a lot of the work that we have done in this House and in committees across this country. I would like to cite the report that my colleague from Don Valley North put out in June, the "War Against Women", which is a very good report. We all have read different works that have been done by the researchers in the Library of Parliament.

About three weeks ago, I was given a short note by a lady in my riding. Her name is Christina Benson. It is on this issue of violence against women. I read it, and I believe she puts this issue forward in a way that I certainly could not improve upon.

I would like to read Christina's notes because I think they reflect the feeling and the knowledge of someone who is very close to this issue. She titles this:

Notes on a Women's Country

There is a place in Canada where women and their children live.

It is a hidden landscape we never show on our maps. It is no place but it is every place. Even more that we pretend there is no such place, we pretend that we do not live there. I call it women's country.

Sometimes there are oblique references to this place. We mention "domestic violence" and "child sexual abuse". We build a shelter here and there. We have a trial of some man for murdering a woman or abusing a child. We hold a candle-light vigil. Most of the time we mark this as incidental and accidental.

Occasionally it is impossible to pretend there is not a women's country. The Montreal Massacre happens. We concentrate on the excuses. That is when we best see how much we guard the lie about the women's country.

Occasionally, someone tries to talk about the women's country. In 1988 June Callwood wrote about the women of Mothers on Trial. "For pity's sake" she started her series in The Globe and Mail. Someone put the heat on. The last column was different. Instead of revealing the lies, the excuses appeared. For the indomitable June Callwood to back down the heat must have been very high. The heat still remains very high. There are few stories about women's country even though women go on disappearing all the time.

All of us know women who have "disappeared". Any woman can disappear, become lost; mothers, sisters, daughters, grand-daughters, friends. Women who once lived with us; visited us; women who were our family, friends and neighbours. Women we saw at work, meetings, church, on the street. Women we do not see anymore. Women we sometimes hear a vague rumour about but more often nothing at all. Lost women, gone women, missing women.

The women's country is a frightening place. It is bleak, dark, pierced by warfare, pain, humiliation, hurt, injury, terror and death. Women's country is a cold lovelessness, close to formlessness, a world without kinship or naming, bound in cruel words and deeds.

In the women's country, terrible things happen. Men throw women against walls hard enough to snap bones and leave holes in plaster. In the women's country, men throw steel kettles, hot irons, cast iron frying pans at the heads of women. In the women's country, emergency room doctors spend hours stitching up faces, wiring smashed jaws and noses; longer hours removing splinters of teeth shattered in soft mouths.

In the women's country, men come into bathrooms and take small, soapy, wet, pink children's bodies and stick fingers, engorged penises, broken beer bottles into every orifice possible. In emergency rooms, doctors spend hours taking shards of glass out of baby girls' vaginas. The same doctors spend hours repairing the ripped larynges of infant boys.

In the women's country, ugly voices fill the landscape with rageful threats, threats so obscene they cannot be printed. There are no censorship rules for minds. Here the threats imprint forever, make everlasting bruises, leave everlasting scars.

In the women's country, the emergency rooms of hospitals record tortures all the time. Nurses and doctors salve the burns of curling irons and acid etched wounds; repair the holes of drill bits worked into fingers, toes, skulls, eyeballs; resuscitate collapsed lungs in chests caved in by steel-toed boots; deliver babies with holes in their hearts from bullets aimed at pregnant abdomens; fuse spines crushed by blows from crowbars.

In the women's country, nurses and doctors in emergency rooms bag bodies of women riddled with bullet holes; bag bodies of women whose missing limbs, eyes, noses will never be found in the sewers they were flushed into; bag masses of pulp that were women.

Their final identification is a feat of twentieth century forensic science.

In the women's country, children are tied up with electrical cords to watch the dismembering of their mother. In the women's country children see their mothers shot on the school steps. In the women's country, children see their mothers pushed out of cars, off balconies to death. In the women's country, children worry about their mothers all the time. In the women's country there are many orphans.

In the women's country, women and children run and hide a lot. They hide in the night from raging, rampaging men who charge with words, fists, knives and guns. They flee in snowstorms, in rain, in cold, in sheds, in barns, under porches, running away in pyjamas, shoeless. They run away to hide in house after house, town after town. They hide with friends, in hotels, in motels, in shelters and refuges. If they are very lucky, they get passed along a thin network of brave women who hide them from a predatory man.

Life narrows to a small single focus of running, exhausted flight, a landscape of shattered windows, broken doors, a rain of bullets— Sometimes there is safety for a while, a respite that lets hands and bodies stop trembling, lets a child finally dare to close its eyes for sleep. There is never safety for long. Someone finds a disembowelled cat, rabbit, dog, something on the doorstep. There is a threatening note. Bewildered friends ask "Please leave. This is too much". Another phone call, a new destination, another flight. Another prayer for hope and safety. Then the bullets come through the door again. A bleeding woman tries to hide a child, fails, falls as the door breaks down and the last round empties loud death into her. The child stares. The man picks up the telephone, calls the mother, friend, shelter, whomever it will hurt the most, gloats and leaves.

There is another vigil. Another woman, mother, friend, shelter worker becomes a candidate of the therapy for survivors of violent deaths. There is another orphan. A shelter renames itself for the last woman to whom this happened. The story falls as a silent pebble into a still pool. There is no ripple. Now you remember that silly question. If a tree falls in the forest and there is no one to hear, does it make a sound?

In the women's country, women die without inquests or memorials. They die in cold lakes; in cold bathrooms letting slashed blood flow down dirty drains; in cold rooms they swallow pills that take the pain away along with their lives; in cold rooms they hang themselves.

If you wanted to, you could find the women's country. There are lots of places to go looking. Find a hostel. Bag ladies can draw routes to the women's country. Every homeless woman once lived in a house on a street next to you too.

Go to the psychiatric wards. Mad women know the routes to the women's country too. Every mad woman once lived in a house on a street next to you.

• (1150)

I realize that my time has expired, but I want to conclude by saying that I believe one of the most difficult issues we have in communicating the problems women are having in this country today, especially violence against women, is that too often we just do not want to talk about it openly. If we did start talking about it openly a little more often, I believe we might institute the kinds of policies that would prevent a lot of this from happening.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand in support of the motion of my colleague from Halifax:

That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

In this year's annual report of the Human Rights Commission, three aspects of discrimination against women are highlighted: the sex biases in the justice system, the systemic economic disadvantages, and various forms of violence.

The 1992–93 budget has done nothing to promote security of person for women. However, it does include measures that will actually facilitate sex biases in the justice system. Worse still, this budget promotes and even authorizes systemic economic discrimination against women.

In the introduction of his budget speech the finance minister claims that one of his aims is to support the well-being of Canadians and their families. Instead he has made women and children the primary targets of his cuts and fiscal mismanagement.

The child benefit is one aspect of this budget that has been widely promoted by this government. Perhaps mother's disadvantage would be a better term. The average family gains very little from this proposal. Since it is not fully indexed to inflation, in three years the value of the benefit will decrease by 10 per cent, and within 10 years this benefit will deprive most families of all meaningful assistance.

Single mothers on social assistance fare even more badly. They receive no additional benefit whatsoever. Already over 60 per cent of single mothers live in poverty in this country. Last year 700,000 Canadian children stood in line at food banks. Without increased benefits to their mothers these children will stay in that food bank line.

At the same time child care has been completely neglected. This is from a government that has been promising better child care and actively campaigning on that promise for over eight years. Without child care single mothers cannot find employment that will help them escape the social welfare trap.

By denying single mothers these two fundamental forms of assistance, this government has chosen to perpetuate the cycle of child poverty.

But food on the table is only one necessity that this government is attacking. By severely curtailing the CMHC's social housing budget, and by shutting down the Co-Operative Housing Program altogether, the government will deprive many single mothers and their children of a roof over their heads. Over one million Canadians could be left homeless by this mercenary measure.

Working women will also suffer under this budget, especially if they are employees of the federal government. Equal pay for work of equal value is still a dream for most women. Over the past 20 years the male–female wage gap has closed by only 8 cents. Women's wages, on average, are still 32 cents lower than men's for comparable work.

Our toothless pay equity legislation puts the onus on the employee to prove that discrimination exists. The Pay Research Bureau, which collects and provides information to help set pay, benefits and conditions of employment for the Public Service, was one of the few resources for women trying to establish evidence of discrimination. The government has used the budget to eliminate that essential resource.

Retroactive pay equity settlements prior to 1990 have also been eliminated, even though women have been entitled to equal pay since 1977. This move will deny 80,000 public servants earnings which are rightfully theirs. I call that almost stealing.

The elimination of the Court Challenges Program is perhaps the most fundamental example of this government's failure to protect the rights of Canadian women.

This program provided funding to allow disadvantaged groups to go to court to defend their rights according to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Many landmark decisions could not have been made without the Court Challenges Program.

More recently the program allowed the Women's Legal Education Action Fund to argue successfully that the obscenity provisions in the Criminal Code are indeed constitutional in that they reasonably attempt to prevent harms that affect the dignity and equality of women.

The elimination of the Court Challenges Program will silence the voices of many Canadian women before the law.

Along with minorities, seniors and children, this budget is directly attacking the fundamental rights of women all across Canada. An attack on women is an attack on families. It is an attack on children. It is time that this government stopped paying lip service to the women who make up over 52 per cent of the population of Canada and give every Canadian her full entitlement of rights and freedoms. I would like to read into Hansard a few comments from the Toronto Star made by Carol Goar. She says:

> Why, after seven and one-half years of Conservative government, has the number of food banks in this country risen from 75 to 292? Is it right that 700,000 Canadian children, one out of every nine, should have to depend on charity to eat?

She goes on to ask:

> Why, during the devastating recession of the past two years, has the federal government reduced its support for low-rent housing by 46 per cent? Does the Prime Minister realize that thousands of families in urban centres go hungry each month so that they can pay the rent? What has changed since the summer of 1988 to convince the Prime Minister that child care is no longer a fundamental right? Does he realize that most single mothers cannot enter the work force to build a better life without affordable child care? Does the Prime Minister remember saying in Toronto 10 years ago "There is nothing I see that is more painful to me as a citizen of one of the most blessed nations on earth than the continual fighting and bitching—

The Prime Minister's words.

> —that is going on among and between just about every major group in our society.". Can the Prime Minister explain what he has done to improve the mood of the nation?

> Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to speak here in the House on women this morning. I believe nothing has changed. I have been here almost three and one-half years and I seem to be saying the same things over and over again. I hope this government will start to listen to those of us who are most concerned about the rights of women in this country.

> Thank you.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, a number of questions have been raised in the House relating to why the federal government has abandoned its promise to initiate a national day care act.

I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight. Hon. members have couched their questions in a manner that is very misleading. Their questions would lead one to believe we have turned our backs on day care and no longer believe that day care is an important service needed by many Canadians.

This is just not so. The House will recall that the federal government put forward a day care bill, Bill C-144, that would have spent $4 billion over a seven year period. You will also remember that both of the opposition parties did everything in their power to defeat this bill. Their stalling tactics were almost unprecedented.

Nevertheless the federal government persevered and finally, when the opposition members had exhausted all of the avenues open to them, the bill was passed and sent to the Senate. The opposition members were still not content with their previous efforts to frustrate the will of the majority of Canadians, and urged the Liberal-dominated Senate to further block and delay the bill.

The Senate decided to hear from further witnesses. They knew full well that almost every individual and association from every part of Canada had already been extended the opportunity to appear before the parliamentary committee. This was also after a lengthy task force on child care heard from interested parties from every region of this country. There was no question that the Senate was going to prolong this exercise for as long as it could. Given the Liberal-dominated Senate skills that had been sharply honed over the years to frustrate the work of Parliament, this could be a very long time.

Now events took over and an election was called. It seems strange that these two opposition parties, which have done everything in their power to prevent a National Day Care Act, are now attacking us for not introducing the bill once again. The public will not be fooled by these antics. Now let us look realistically at just what the federal government promised. It is true that during the election we indicated the bill would be reintroduced. However during the course of the election and immediately following it, many citizens concerned about day care urged us not to reintroduce this bill.

I am not talking only about those who did not believe the federal government ought to be lending its support to influence parental decisions as to whether or not parents should enter the work force. I am referring to groups which have a strong and continuing commitment to day care services. They argued that a different approach ought to be taken.

In addition to these concerns expressed by many in the day care community, the federal government found that the economic climate facing us was also very different from that of 1988. We had been hit with an economic slow-down. Falling revenues and rising expenditures were leading to a dangerous situation that, if not controlled, would have threatened the well-being of Canada.

Any citizen who found himself in such a situation would of course have taken prudent action. This was exactly what the federal government did. It recognized that our deficit was too large and was growing at an alarming rate. Therefore it took an aggressive approach to deficit reduction.

It knew full well this approach would involve some pain, but if also knew the long-term benefits demanded these actions. Consequently the federal government announced that a number of plans, including those for child care, would be put on temporary hold.

During this same period we listened carefully to the various new points that were being put forward relating to day care. You will recall the government stated on numerous occasions that it would consult with and listen to the views of Canadians.

The minister of the day responsible for day care frequently assured the House and all Canadians who made inquiries that a strategy would be in place during this government's current mandate.

The minister of the day, as well as other members of the government, made it clear they were not committed specifically to reintroducing another bill, Bill C-144. Our position was that Bill C-144 might be reintroduced, but another approach could possibly be taken, depending on further consultation and serious reflection on the information being received.

Our government would determine the exact nature of the strategy to be announced and implemented. It is also very clear that contrary to what the members in opposition would have us believe, promises were not specifically made about day care. The federal government listened to Canadians from every walk of life and knew that the problems being addressed were broader than day care.

That is precisely why the federal government steadfastly used the term child care rather than day care.

I want to speak to this further in a moment. However I want to speak about the situation that currently faces Canadians. Certainly the situation in 1992 is very different from that of 1984, when the government first announced its intention to launch a national child care program. Every major western country is feeling the impact of the recession. Every government, regardless of its political ideology or leanings, has had to come to grips with this new reality.

All members of this House recognize that Canada is not an isolationist country. Our own social and economic environment is directly influenced by what happens to our major trading partners. Any government that does not recognize there is a new spirit of competition abroad, affecting every country, will soon be left in the abyss of a stagnant and deteriorating economy.

The federal government does not bemoan these changing circumstances. It firmly believes that Canadian physical resources and personal expertise are second to none, however like any wise country, we need to streamline and modernize our competitive edge. The rewards will go to those who are not fearful of competing in climates of increasing excellence and are willing to make the adjustments necessary to forge ahead.

Certainly this means getting our own house in order. It means we cannot have our strengths toppled my an excessive deficit. This belt-tightening exercise is being undertaken by every level of government in Canada. Dutiful and painful decisions are being taken, as I said, by every level of government. It is not a partisan issue.

Municipalities make headlines daily as they struggle with the types and levels of services they can afford. They too have to make decisions about the balance between increased taxation, expenditure cuts or going even deeper into debt.

Most municipalities recognize there is very little room for going back to the hard-pressed homeowner for further increases in taxes. Pressing too far brings an inevitable backlash and turns citizen against citizen. If we go to the well too often we will find the well dry. This is obviously a non-starter.

Going deeper into debt has its limits as well. The debt load soon strangles all initiative and allows even less room to manoeuvre. It is nothing short of folly to reach the point where the interest charges become the number one budget item.

The provinces are in the same boat. It does not matter what provincial party is in power; Progressive Conservative, Liberal or NDP. Once it is in power it soon finds that it faces the same economic climate as everyone else. There are no magic solutions. It can bite the bullet and constructively confront the challenge, or hide its head in the sand and make the problem worse by procrastinating.

The federal government is no different. It faces the same problems. It cannot pretend that the changed realities are not there, or that hard decisions do not have to be taken. The line of attack we are taking is not essentially different from the action ordinary Canadians would take.

For example, recent polls have indicated a change or shift in Canadian attitudes and priorities. It is not that Canadians no longer think that day care is important. They obviously do. The shift reflects a changed environment, requiring new responses consistent to the new realities.

We all know what these changed realities are. The recession has brought about increased unemployment and higher levels of social assistance. Canadians perceive these problems differently now. They realize that they are no longer the problems of a small minority.

Traditionally, the typical Canadian was not worried about job security. Now middle income families know of middle income neighbours who have lost their jobs. Adjustments to the work force have affected professionals, white collar workers and blue collar workers.

Levels of education and technical abilities are no longer a cocoon of artificial protection. High-tech professionals are just as apt to have their positions terminated as the labourer. Hospital nurses, teachers and other professionals experience similar anxieties and concerns about their future.

Food banks are commonplace and the beneficiaries are not only those with low incomes. Many who have never previously thought it possible that their family might require these kinds of services now know that no one is completely free from the uncertainties that exist in a changed environment.

How have these realities changed our perspectives and therefore our priorities? For one thing, the level of awareness about poverty is much higher than it used to be. Canadians know that the number of families living in poverty is much greater than they previously believed. They are now more aware that poverty can and most often does come about through no fault of the individual affected.

The socio-economic forces at work are beyond the control of individual families. The typical Canadian has confronted the fact that many of their fellow citizens are facing hardships and want the government to take action.

If a typical Canadian is asked to priorize the following problems: a 10-year old requiring day care, a physically abused child, a sexually abused child, a hungry child, there is no question that day care will no longer be at the top of that list. No person of conscience would turn their back on the hungry or the abused child. Neither could we.

The number of children living in poverty in Canada is just not acceptable to us. The painful decisions that have to be made must be shared by all. It cannot be inordinately carried on the backs of impoverished children. Consequently we have done what most Canadians would have us do, we have opted to ease the conditions faced by children living in poverty.

Given that there are no magical sources of new money to address these problems, what can be done? First of all, it is important to streamline expenditures and the administration of expenditures so that money reaches those who need it most.

The objective of the child benefit is to create the best possible program for families with children. To do this, the new benefit puts resources where they are needed. The new child benefit puts resources where they are needed. The new child benefit provides more generous benefits, an additional $2 billion over the next five years to low and middle income families. The new child benefit is fairer. It is based on family circumstances, it rewards work and it supports low and modest income families.

The new child benefit is simpler than the patchwork of measures it replaces. Currently 600,000 family allowance cheques are sent each month to high income families and the money is then recovered.

• (1220)

The new system will calculate automatically and deliver a single monthly cheque to over three million families. Thus the new child benefit becomes a major step in improving benefits for families with children. Under the new system, a low income family with one child can receive as much as $1,520 per year, an increase of almost 50 per cent.

Child benefits will be increased by $2.1 billion over the next five years. However, money alone is not enough. We will be consulting with provincial colleagues and key groups on a related package of initiatives directed more specifically toward helping young children as risk.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise and speak on this motion introduced by my colleague for Halifax which reads:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, why? The answer is best summarized by the statement issued by the president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, Miss Judy Rebick when she stated: "This is not a direct hit like the last time", that is referring to the 1991 budget, "but it is a much more profound attack on women—it is more global".

Why is that? Immediately I will set out before the House the reasons and outline them. First, the Tories have abandoned their promise to introduce a national child care program. Second, the government has eliminated the Court Challenges Program which was introduced in 1985 and has provided funds for women, minorities and disadvantaged groups to mount court challenges under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms would be a hollow document if the rights contained in it were not exercised. The Court Challenges Program ensures that those rights are exercised. Witness the recent example of a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada on the constitutionality of the federal obscenity law through the help of the Court Challenges Program. The decision rendered is crucial to our understanding and recognizing the harmful effects of pornography on women and children.

The third reason why this budget reflects poorly on women is that this budget attacks the spouse's allowance. The majority of low income seniors that would benefit from this allowance, those between the ages of 60 and 64, are women. Fourth, this budget has attacked the Pay Research Bureau, and thereby indirectly attacks the pay equity principle. Last, this budget has cut back on social housing on which many single mothers rely for shelter.

In February 1991 I was part of the Liberal task force on the recession of the economy when it met in Winnipeg. A hotel in the southeast end was the venue on a bitterly cold day in the depths of winter. At that time we thought the recession, like all prairie winters, was showing the worst of itself. Well, we were wrong. There was still much more to come. We learned how much lack of money and human tragedy have in common. On that day in the hotel room the testimony I heard shocked and saddened me, especially the words of the women.

Three witnesses particularly stand out in my mind. They were representatives of the Native Women's Coalition who told us simply with a stark forcefulness about the hell in which many natives live. We were told that on most reserves women have no shelter from abuse in their homes. Because of this it is not uncommon for teenagers to get pregnant in order to qualify for enough social assistance to move away from their families and into the cities to their own apartments.

My horror grew when in the months that followed I heard more and similar stories of abuse, poverty, neglect and despair of women, young and old, of every age and race.

Taken separately these stories seem unrelated, distanced by circumstance. But woven together they form a cloth of shame the federal government must wear.

Imagine a 12-year old boy in Toronto who suddenly became troubled and aggressive. His parents, who both work outside the home, sought counselling from a psychologist. The problem they found was that the boy was stretched out of shape with grown-up responsibilities because the family could not afford or find proper child care. The boy spent four hours a day caring for his younger brother and sister. His boyhood was fast fading as a curtain of burden was drawn around him.

He did not have time to play with his friends. Private time was beyond his reach. Even his parents, exhausted from their jobs, bills and commuting were too tired to realize his needs. This boy has become the face of the government's oft-promised national child care program that a few hours before the budget was introduced, the Minister of National Health and Welfare had the courage to boast he was not introducing. It was really a sad day for Canada.

Let me quote from the opening paragraph of the Winnipeg Free Press editorial of March 1 entitled "Retreat from day care":

> It is tragic for parents of young children and young people who hope to raise families that polls say Canadians no longer view a national day-care program as a priority. Health Minister Benoit Bouchard claims he has polls which tell him as much.

It continues:

> To use that excuse to abandon government promises advanced to woo voters in 1984 and in 1988, however, is cynical and harmfully shortsighted.

Let me quote from the column of Mr. Leonard Shifrin in the Free Press of March 13, 1992. He said:

> Cutting the surtax rate to give $450 benefits to $100,000 earners and $40 benefits to $25,000 earners will cost the treasury $1.2 billion next year—three times the price of the child care plan.
> A government that can afford such largess for the rich doesn't have to choose between increasing day care spaces and fighting child abuse.

In Winnipeg a single mother on welfare went on trial for the death of her young son. She was acquitted. The judge apologized for her suffering. The boy, one of two children, had died when he climbed on to the stove when his mother left to do laundry. Police found an apartment that was clean and tidy, with play things but with very little furniture. The woman's background showed she had once been caught stealing diaper ointment and that she had pawned her furniture to buy food for her babies. This is a sad story indeed.

How many of us would wish to grow old? Do you stand before the mirror and ask the lines on your face to deepen and the seasons to pass more quickly? Yet there is a legion of people in Canada who anxiously await old age so they might be able to climb out from under the weight of their poverty. These people are mainly women in their late 50s and 60s. They are often without job skills or are at the mercy of the marketplace that hungers for youth. Usually they are alone, their husbands dead and their children unwilling or unable to help. They have lived through wartime. They have contributed greatly to the prosperity of Canada, yet they have no share of it. Most do not qualify for Canada Pension Plan benefits. Some are eligible for spouse's allowance which is not a great deal of money, but it means a great deal to those women who have nothing. It helps them to preserve their dignity in the face of abject poverty.

For most people age 65 means retirement. They can pick up those books they always meant to read, start new hobbies, golf, visit with grandchildren and travel. These times are the golden years. To the women who wait to grow old, age 65 means an old age pension.

Last week members of a federal seniors organization travelled to Ottawa to meet with members of the Liberal caucus and relate their fears. One of the women told how difficult it was for seniors to pay for the upkeep of their homes. Previously they were able to apply for home maintenance grants from CMHC, but the granting program was cancelled. Once seniors cannot pay for the upkeep of their homes they are usually forced to sell them. Then where do they go? Where will they go when the government pulls back from commitments to social housing which is often the only alternative left to many, many seniors?

In conclusion, let me say that the pay equity program is another problem. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equality today but not tomorrow. If the government was to respond, it would respond with vigour. Women in this country need the government's help, yet with this budget they got less than zero. The child benefits package is a fraud. Child care has been killed. The Court Challenges Program was cancelled. The spouse's allowance has an axe hanging over it and pay equity is being ignored.

Social housing also took a direct hit and suffered a funding cut while the Co-op Housing Program was eliminated. Indeed, the 1992 budget fails to meet Canadian women's dreams and aspirations. They will continue to face the inequitable and grim realities.

Therefore, through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask this government to resign.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is quite simple. The member opposite in the Liberal Party condemned the government for cutting funding to the Court Challenges Program, social housing and some other programs.

I would like to ask the member what taxes he would raise to fund those programs.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the government member would ask such a question. He assumed the Liberal caucus would like to see taxes raised. It is such a fallacious premise that his question does not deserve an answer. It is an insult to Canadians. There is a beautiful principle expounded by the United Nations that when resources are limited, you have to reallocate resources and make priorities. Our priorities are the children and women of this country.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, under the Conservatives, an increasing number of women and children have joined the ranks of the poor. It is a fact that if poverty strikes parents, it strikes their children as well, and it is also a fact that a disproportionate number of women are found among the most economically disadvantaged in our society. No form of poverty is acceptable, but the alarming number of single-parent families headed by women that lack the bare minimum to survive is intolerable. The Canadian government told Canadians to expect a realistic budget. The Tory reality is that 2.3 million people in this country are on welfare, 1.5 million are unemployed, 3.8 million, including one million children, do not have the bare necessities of life and more than 60 per cent of mothers who are on their own, divorced, separated or single, are poor.

The 1992 Tory budget does nothing to deal with the problem of poverty in this country or to improve women's quality of life. In fact, the budget contains a number of measures that are particularly hard on women and children. Let me explain.

First of all, the Mulroney government broke its eight-year old promise to implement a national child care plan which would have given women and children a chance to get out of the poverty cycle. The government is misleading when it tells Canadians it had to choose between child care services and programs for children at risk.

The president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Glenda Simms, exposed the flaw in the government's reasoning when she said that child care services are a way to ward off danger. Why does the government see abused and poor children as different from those who need safe and affordable day care? We know the government has cut more than $3.5 billion from the family allowance envelope since 1986. Its child benefit measure will not help fight poverty. This benefit will be of no use to abandoned or single mothers on welfare. Since the child benefit is not indexed, its value will go down, and we have the same amount of money we had before, except that the packaging is somewhat different.

Another item. The budget scrapped the Court Challenges Program, implemented in 1985, which gives women, minorities and disadvantaged groups the funding they need to defend their cases before the courts, as provided under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Since the program was established, there have been a number of landmark judgments, including the Forest case which led to the reinstatement of language rights for Franco-Manitobans.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms is merely a mechanism that can be used to abolish discriminatory legislation. It does not guarantee individuals the resources they need to challenge legislation that prevents them from exercising their rights before the courts. Without the funding provided under the Court Challenges Program, the rights in the charter have no real meaning for disadvantaged groups.

[English]

Bertha Wilson, the very famous and renowned judge who just left the Supreme Court this past year said that the Court Challenges Program, which was axed in this budget, was an imaginative and worthwhile program and should be saved.

Wilson recently wrote the Minister of Justice to express dismay and distress over the cancellation of this program which has an annual budget of $2.75 million. She said:

> It is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them, and I assumed that the expansion of the Court Challenges program was an effort to address this problem. While I fully appreciate, of course, that all governments are currently in a period of financial restraint, I must say that I have difficulty with a policy that places the burden of that restraint on those who can least afford to bear it.

As a member of the Supreme Court, Wilson said she witnessed how invaluable the program had been to minority groups and the disadvantaged. She went on to point out: " I believe I can say with complete confidence that the public has unquestionably received full value for its money on this particular program".

That program provided funding of up to $35,000 at each court level to individuals and non-profit groups for test cases challenging federal laws and policies under the charter's language and equality guarantees.

The Conservative chairman of the all-party committee, the member for Oxford, has written to the Prime Minister to protest as well. He said: "We are optimistic we might be able to persuade the government to find some other ways of providing this kind of service".

But the multiculturalism minister and member for Pierrefonds-Dollard said the program has outlived its usefulness and the provinces will have to step in to fill the gap. While this program was established in 1978 to help fund minority language rights cases, it was extended in 1985 after the powerful equality section of the charter was proclaimed. I recall being part of the committee that reviewed that particular section 15 of the charter and made the recommendation to enlarge the challenges program.

The third point I bring to your attention—

—is the spouse's allowance program that was meant to help disadvantaged older people under 65 until they became eligible for Old Age Security benefits and the guaranteed income supplement.

Page 101 of the budget papers shows the government's intention to seriously reconsider the spouse's allowance program if the courts ruled that it had to be extended to divorced and single people. If this government acts, this measure will affect the most vulnerable and economically weakest people aged 60 to 64, largely women.

In addition, I would draw attention to this month's increase in Old Age Security benefits. The amount of 37 cents is really insulting; the previous increase was 75 cents. Certainly that is not enough. You cannot buy a cup of coffee or even a slice of bread for that amount.

Another thing that I would mention is the downgrading of pay equity. Finally, I would call attention to the cuts for social housing.

On the subject of salaries, not only did this government abolish the Pay Research Bureau but it also announced a reduction in back pay for public servants. Indeed, the government does not intend to grant more compensation for the period before November 1, 1990, and it will take the required action in Parliament to implement this decision. This means that if you don't like something, you abolish it. For 80,000 public servants, this is a rejection of the principle of pay equity.

Finally, there is the subject of isolated or single mothers who need social housing. This government announced that the growth in spending on social housing would be limited to 3 per cent until 1997. On that point, I would mention that this government not only reduced the number of social housing spaces by nearly 50 per cent but it also abolished the co-operative housing program, which nevertheless was cost-effective and made it possible for seniors, one-parent families, the disabled and the poor to live in affordable housing.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I again draw to your attention that this budget is disgusting for women and certainly for people in financial difficulty.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, as I listen to the hon. member for Mount Royal, the first thing that comes to my mind is that it would be absolutely necessary for the government to be able to print money in order to solve the numerous problems that many Canadiens are facing.

It is absolutely absurd to hear things such as: "If the government must review the allowance program for widows, this could be applied to divorced people and others that might need that money". It sounds as though the government is no longer capable to act because it is always subjected to the decisions made by the Supreme Court of Canada following the implementation of the famous Charter of Rights and Freedoms that the Liberals left untouched.

I would like to ask a question of the member for Mount Royal. I approve of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but I often wonder if it would not be possible to amend this famous charter in order to avoid excessive recourse to the courts, thus preventing the government from acting selectively when a certain group has a particular need. The member is aware that 50 year old people now want to have access to the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, just like the 55 year olds. If the government agreed, you would then say: Why not make the 45 year old workers eligible? Surely, the government must impose some limits.

When the Liberals were in power, they set up a scientific research program that was a national scandal, a fraud of $1 billion through a program that had been decided by the former finance minister of the Liberal government. Just imagine if the government had that one billion dollars. Programs such as Canada Works, and all the others; the tap was open. The Liberals had money and there was no problem. We got here in 1984 and we inherited that legacy. Of course you inherit serious problems in times of recession. It is very nice to make statements of principle and to try to make political capital on the backs of children and women in difficulty, but what is our capacity as a nation to pay? The Liberals from the other side of the House never answered that question.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, it is a rotten thing for a member of this House, regardless of his party, to say that he or she does not like the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The hon. member is not pleased that we made changes, that we gave Canada a Charter of Rights and Freedoms to protect the most needy, a charter that gave them the opportunity to present their case and seek justice before the courts. This is really a sad, lousy and unacceptable attitude.

Also, regarding the needs of the most needy, a choice was made by the minister of National Health and Welfare, who said that he was the killer of two important programs: one in the transport sector, and now this one which was aimed at providing day-care services to families.

When you govern, you have the opportunity to make political decisions. It is sad to see that the political decisions made by this government were to help the rich; now the gap between the rich and the poor has become totally unacceptable. If this government, through its policies, was not able to choose another option, it is truly time for Canadians to do what is necessary to change this government. That is what we need: a change of government.

If the government had wanted to do so, it would have made cuts in office personnel, those people that eat out of the public through, and then it would really have been able to eliminate the advertisement and the publicity surrounding all its projects to try to fool the public. Indeed, this government is really trying to deceive Canadians.

There are political decisions to be made, such as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the program that helps me and the needy to go before the courts, as well as older and younger women, mothers, and especially children who live in poverty. None of these groups have been served by this government and its new budget which abuses the public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments have now ended. Debate.

[English]

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on this very, very important issue, the government's commitment to the equality of women. I am pleased because I believe the government has repeatedly shown its commitment to improving the position of women in Canadian society. It has shown determination in addressing issues which are of concern to women and which hinder the advancement of women. Of course, more could always be done and we are working on doing more.

• (1250)

In no area is this more evident than in the area of the issue of violence against women. This is not just a recent concern of the federal government. This government has been working hard to understand this issue since the early 1980s, to develop and to implement effective responses to this complex, devastating and costly social evil.

No government has worked harder at listening to women. No government has worked harder to involve women and other sectors of society in developing solutions.

No government has worked harder to bring home to Canadians the realization that violence against women costs our society dearly and that we all share the responsibility to address it.

The federal government has accepted its responsibilities to send the unmistakable message that violence against women in all of its forms, emotional, sexual, physical abuse or the denial of women's rights is never, never acceptable.

We are committed to act in areas which are clearly a federal responsibility. We are committed to supporting community action. We are convinced that action is needed across many fronts. We are convinced that all the tools available in a modern society need to be employed in a co-ordinated and comprehensive fashion to prevent, to reduce and to one day end violence against women.

This approach of reaching out and working with women and other partners of society is succeeding in shifting the political and social momentum on this issue. This approach is helping women to galvanize other groups and institutions to examine their response to this problem and to take action.

Even as we speak today, the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women is at work crossing the country listening to women. It is reaching out at the grassroots level to improve our knowledge of the problem, and to produce solid recommendations for preventative action.

Announced in the Speech from the Throne in May of 1991 and launched three months later with a $10 million budget, the panel is evidence of the depth of this government's commitment, not only to ending violence against women but also to ensuring that women are fully involved in developing the solutions.

The panel came into being as a result of the unwavering vision of thousands of Canadian women who insisted on a society in which they could live without fear.

We as a government received petitions and requests from women all over Canada asking for a national inquiry into this issue. I personally was petitioned by many women from my own constituency who wrote and called me on this issue.

Women wanted greater public awareness and a chance to speak out about their own experience. They wanted to share in a process of discovering what needs to be and what can be done to end the violence against women and to heal the wounds that it causes.

The members of the panel were chosen in careful consultation with representatives of women across Canada. This consultation has resulted in a panel which exemplifies the finest in knowledge, experience, sensitivity and leadership.

It is a panel which collectively represents the perspectives of the various regions of Canada, urban and rural, as well as a first-hand knowledge of the unique needs and concerns of aboriginal women, immigrant women, and visible minority women. Above all, it is a panel with the front-line experience which is so critical to the understanding of this issue.

The panel has a comprehensive five-part national mandate. First is to examine violence against women in all of its dimensions, be they physical, psychological or sexual in nature, and whether they occur in the home, the workplace, the street or the media. It will examine the violence as it occurs in trusted relationships such as those involving physicians and clergy, in dating relationships and including cult and serial violence. We read about these problems every day in the newspaper. The panel is examining them right now. It will also document the incidence, root causes, effects and links among various forms of violence.

Second, it will identify the issue and name the violence from the perspective of the woman's experience.

Third, it will heighten public awareness about violence against women.

Fourth, it will seek solutions relating them to the root causes of violence against women and it will emphasize prevention.

Fifth and finally, the panel will produce recommendations designed for governments at all levels, the non-governmental sector, business and organized labour, churches, schools, communities and individuals.

It will devise a plan of action with concrete timeframes for federal government action. The panel functions at arm's length from the government and it has an enormous task to complete in a relatively short period of time. The final report is due at the end of this calendar year.

At the present time the panel is fully engaged in the first phase of its mandate. It is holding a series of grassroots, largely private consultations in five nine-day tours to over 100 communities across Canada. So far, the panel has visited British Columbia, my own province of Alberta, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. It is presently holding meetings in Ontario.

The panel is taking that approach to ensure that it is accessible to women everywhere in the country and to make it possible for women to come forward and speak about something which is so terrible and so sensitive that for years women have borne it in silence and in fear.

The panel expects to complete this first phase of its mandate next month and to issue a preliminary report by May 27, 1992. It will then enter its second phase which will involve a series of public consultations.

The very fact that this panel is at work examining this issue is already furthering the objective of public education and helping to send out the message that violence against women must be of concern to every man, woman and child in this country.

It is helping to get the message out to institutions, companies, professional organizations and labour unions. It is providing a forum and a focus for all sectors of society to come together to deal with this issue.

The panel's work is being well received across the country. Women and front-line experts are responding to the panel's call for involvement. We must remember that the panel itself is, for the most part, comprised of these front-line experts.

People have been involved in this issue for many years. The media has been receptive to the work of the panel, and the momentum for change is being maintained by the very presence of the panel in communities all across the country.

It is partly through this kind of continuing public awareness that we, as a government, believe that we can build zero tolerance of violence against women in society.

The more people who know that such violence exists and how to recognize it, the fewer people will tolerate the social, physical and political factors at work to perpetuate the abusive power in Canadian society.

The more intolerant society becomes toward abuse and violence, the more understanding it shows for the victims of the abuse, the easier it will be for women to stand up to the abusing.

Some have suggested that we already know enough about violence against women and that we need not study it further. Research has been fragmented and scattered leaving individuals, groups and communities to grope for information and solutions. More often than not, they have found that the answers have often posed more questions rather than solutions.

The panel's work will do much to remedy this situation. It will bring together what we now know about the issue of violence against women and will make it readily available to all those who need it. The work will add to what we know. It will point out what we do not know and what we still must find out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we should call it one o'clock and the hon. member will then have 10 minutes remaining in his speech plus 10 minutes for questions and comments, once we return to debate after three o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

IRAN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, Nathan Abramowitz sent me a picture of a stamp being issued by the Iranian postal service to mark the UN International Day of the Child.

I was deeply disturbed by the stamp which pictures a young boy throwing a rock through a Jewish Star of David on an ocean-blue sheet of glass. This stamp exploits innocent children, using them to promote and incite violence and hatred toward Jews.

Iranian officials must recall this stamp and stop inciting violence against Jews.

External Affairs officials have told the Iranian ambassador that Canada strongly objects to these stamps. We must continue to pressure Iranian officials to stop this intolerable anti-Jewish campaign, especially in the name of the world's children.

PARLIAMENTARY FORUM ON DISABILITY

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, something absolutely extraordinary happened here on the Hill.

An assembly of CEOs, union leaders and Canadians with disabilities listened and applauded Justin Dart, an American civil rights leader, as he praised Canada's record on equality and freedom. He challenged us to protect equality and empowerment as basic tenets of democracy.

Equality and empowerment must be fostered by our collective sense of who we are as Canadians. They must be protected by government.

The values of our society, equality and empowerment, must not be compromised by ignorance nor eroded by economic excuse. Chopping programs such as the Court Challenges Program and Silent News is not the way to go.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for bringing business and labour together in your Parliamentary Forum on Disability. With your support, equality and empowerment will become a reality for all Canadians.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in spite of my repeated warnings and countless appeals over the past two years to ban the gasoline additive MMT, this government continues to ignore the health risks, especially to young children, environmental risks and the damage to pollution controls by continuing to allow this insidious neurotoxin to be added to unleaded gasoline in Canada. This compound has been banned in the United States since 1978.

In January of this year, after the direct intervention and appeals of five major car manufacturers, three automobile parts manufacturers associations, environmental organizations and academics and medical specialists, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency again rejected an application to allow MMT in U.S. unleaded fuel.

Why are Canadians not being afforded the same protection as our neighbours to the south? Why is this government willing to ignore the evidence and willing to continue to risk the health of Canadians, especially our children?

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, traditionally our educators were our elders who taught us the way of managing and prospering in harmony with the natural world.

I therefore ask this House to endorse today, March 31, 1992, as National Aboriginal Languages Day in order that we may promote and enhance an awareness and revival of our aboriginal languages.

I also encourage all aboriginal people to participate in activities that will help recognize this unique day and recommend that they all learn at least one word a day.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Cree]

As one of our elders said: "If we can speak and understand our language, our elders can then tell us who we are".

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, today marks the fourth anniversary of Aboriginal Languages Day.

There are 11 language families, 53 languages and over 200 dialects which embody our unique relationship to the Creator, reflect our traditions and our values.

We ask all peoples to use March 31 as a day to celebrate our survival as a peoples and to promote and preserve our aboriginal languages so aboriginal children in generations to come may proudly speak of their culture in their mother tongue.

GYPSY MOTH

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, Canada is facing a potential crisis because of the arrival on its shores of the gypsy moth. This moth is normally native to eastern Asia and has been transported to our shores by freighters. Although localized right now, it can spread swiftly throughout B.C. and possibly other parts of Canada.

We have been working in co-operation with the U.S. to find a solution. They have taken action to deal with their problem. We have yet to deal with ours. The objective is to prevent further infestation.

The Department of Agriculture is planning aerial spraying in Vancouver next month. It is imperative that we proceed. If left unchecked, this infestation will have a devastating effect on Canada, economically as well as environmentally.

POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, while it should not come as a surprise, doctors are now stating publicly that Canadian children are dying from malnutrition, dying because they are poor.

Canada's 377 food banks are unable to meet the demands of the hungry and social assistance rates across the country are inadequate to meet the nutritional needs of Canada's poor.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare recently told a Vancouver audience that child poverty has been on the decline. This is an appalling error on the part of the minister responsible for children. In fact child poverty is on the rise in Canada.

Less than two years ago the Prime Minister told heads of state that "funding is important but it is not, in the end, the decisive factor in the war on child suffering. Political will is".

I challenge the Prime Minister to exercise political will and ensure that all Canadian children are properly fed. It is time he stopped listening to John Crow and started listening to Canada's hungry children. What Canada needs is not zero inflation but zero child poverty.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, the government has been subjected to opposition harassment that we are off-loading. A decline in the increase in transfer payments is not off-loading.

I am deeply concerned for the taxpayers in my home province of Saskatchewan. Just last week the Saskatchewan NDP announced a 15 per cent cut in transfer payments to municipalities, a 5.5 per cent cut to hospitals, and a 4 per cent cut to education. These actions are absolutely unprecedented and unacceptable.

These actions are off-loading in spades.

The people of Saskatchewan have begun to ask if the harmonized tax system begun by the previous government was all that bad after all.

JOEY SMALLWOOD

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, 43 years ago today Newfoundland and Canada became one nation. Let me note the occasion by saluting the memory of the man who was most responsible.

A bit of each of us died with Joey Smallwood last December. He embodied our stubborn will to hang on to our way of life while improving our lot. Much of Joey lives on with us. His crusade to smash the curse of isolation transformed a thousand pockets of population into a closely knit community whose culture is intact.

Many of Joey's battles are still ours to win. We are still the poor cousins of Confederation though great strides have been made, thanks to his vision.

Joey Smallwood, a great Newfoundlander by birth, a great Canadian by choice. Newfoundland, a proud partner in Canada.

MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, even as a land-locked western Canadian, I was delighted that our wartime merchant seamen received such good news last week. Many red herrings were produced over the years to deny them equal footing with those who served the country in the army, navy and air force.

Merchant mariners were not subject to military discipline it was said. They were free to sail or to stay ashore. That makes the contribution of our merchant mariners all the more admirable. They did not have to, but they climbed aboard their ships and voyage after voyage faced the perils of torpedoes, shells, bombs, and gales. They had the option of staying ashore but instead they continued the vital work of sustaining the supply lines, the lines that ensured victory.

I am proud that my government is going to be bringing in legislation giving our high seas mariners their full due. As the Minister of Veterans Affairs told them last week: "Welcome aboard".

FISHERIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government once again cut the budget allocation for west coast charter fisheries officers.

These budget cuts will destroy the management in the west coast salmon fishery. There will be no fisheries officers to supervise the commercial, sports and food fisheries. There will be no fisheries officers to make spawning fish counts, to estimate escapement.

Without these counts, it is impossible to estimate the expected salmon return. Without this information, a fishing plan cannot be developed. Without the information, fisheries management is impossible. The government must supply sufficient funding to hire enough charter fisheries officers to carry out proper fisheries management and enforcement.

The government must know you cannot save money by destroying the west coast fisheries resource.

WELLFUND AUDIO VISUAL LTD.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of reporting some very good news to the House today.

Last week, I attended a sod turning ceremony for the construction of a new television manufacturing plant in my riding of Delta, British Columbia. With the help of a $3 million loan from this government's Western Economic Diversification Program, Wellfund Audio Visual Ltd. of Hong Kong is establishing the $14 million dollar plant on Annacis Island.

Due to the free trade agreement, this new project will be able to produce low cost television sets to compete in the U.S. market which is now almost exclusively dominated by Asian imports. Besides creating new manufacturing technology and spin off benefits for the local electronics industry, this new plant will use components from Ontario and the U.S.

I am extremely encouraged to see this type of investment in Canada and, more important, to see the creation of up to 250 jobs for my constituents, a significant portion of which will be in research and development.

This new plant is a real winner for Delta, for Canada, and for the free trade agreement.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, 1992, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced the 1992 allocation of developmental species.

It is my understanding that the minister received applications from the Canadian fishing industry totalling 300,000 tonnes. As part of those applications for developmental species, applications had to contain a three-year business plan. This was beneficial to the industry as it allowed it to have stability and planning in the under-utilized species.

However, when the minister approved the applications, they were not for the full amount of the unassigned quotas, and they were allotted only for a one-year basis. This means that, one, we will continue to see foreigners catching fish within our 200-mile zone and we have applications to develop all that these foreigners can catch. Two, our own companies cannot shore up their developmental plans for those under-utilized species as they are not sure if they will be given under-utilized species for more than one year.

People in Nova Scotia cannot understand why the minister has acted in such as way to the detriment of Canadian communities which are so dependent on developing new processing for these under-utilized species.

COMPOSITE MATERIALS

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I recently visited the composite materials centre at the Saint-Jérôme CEGEP. This centre makes state-of-the-art technological expertise available to various industries. Composite materials combine a fibre core and a covering made of polymer, inorganic material or metal.

The Saint-Jérôme CEGEP Centre focuses its expertise on technology transfer and the development of new industrial products. In particular, it contributed to the channel tunnel joining France and England. In addition, the Saint-Jérôme composite materials centre co-operates with various universities throughout the world.

It must be emphasized that this is a centre of innovation that is available to all businesses. I therefore invite interested entrepreneurs to use its services.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, people keep writing to me with excellent advice.

For example, Bill and Joanne Stanzeleit write: "My, and my family's, future is in the hands of politicians. We think Canada is the greatest country on earth and we are afraid that it is falling apart. I have lived in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and think one step toward a brighter future would be to educate Canadians about their own country".

Eitel Hippler of Campbellville writes me: "I have lived in this country for 41 years, done my best, was well compensated and learned to live within my budget. A rich country like Canada, with good qualified leaders should do equally well. I compliment the government on a fine job."

Finally, Dr. Dean Axelson, not a constituent, from Willowdale writes:

> I believe that we as Canadians have to be less socialistic and cut down on what we give for free. We must be more concerned about the needs of Canadians and less concerned about aid to other countries—We have to find ways to lower our tax burden and give employers an incentive to create jobs. Employers are losing more rights all the time.

FIREARMS CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada today tabled the regulations on the control of firearms. These regulations deal in particular with the capacity of loaders, collectors of restricted firearms, firearms acquisition permits and the storage and transportation of firearms.

These regulations will help better protect the public by reducing the number of thefts and accidents caused by firearms. Interested groups that wish to comment on the regulations should let Parliament know their opinions before these regulations take effect. The dates of coming into force will be set later and advance notice will be given.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. First of all, I would like to say that we on this side of the House congratulate the Prime Minister on the speeches he made last week in Quebec, where he defended Canada so vigorously. We also appreciate what was done by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs on the weekend in Alberta, where he was not afraid to stand up for his country, despite threats that he might lose his riding.

My question, however, is this: When will the Prime Minister instil the same courage in ministers who have been in his cabinet for seven years? The responsibilities of a minister in the Canadian government include defending Canada in Quebec and making Quebecers understand that the future of the French fact in North America depends on a Canadian solution.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his comments. It must be disappointing for those who are trying to destroy Canada to realize that despite the attacks, insults and fabrications, it is clear from the polls that if you ask Quebecers whether they want a separate and independent Quebec or a renewed Canada, every time they will opt for Canada and a renewed Canada. I think this is a very important point.

As for Mr. Parizeau's option, which offers independence— but wait, I want to keep the Canadian dollar, I want to keep my Canadian citizenship, I want to continue to enjoy the benefits of a Canadian economic union, I want to keep the Queen and the flag— it just goes to show that even Mr. Parizeau, deep down, wants to remain a Canadian.

As far as we are concerned, I have no hesitation at all in sending a federalist message throughout Quebec and across Canada, and I am supported in my efforts by the members of my team and by others on the other side as well, and more recently by the Minister of State for Agriculture who made two extraordinary speeches in the Quebec City area, in favour of Canada, and there were many other ministers. They cannot all make the speeches on the same day, but I can assure you they all share my enthusiasm for Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Prime Minister, in case he did not know, that yesterday on television, the Minister of National Defence said once again that he did not want to defend the Beaudoin–Dobbie report, which was produced by this House and which, according to the Prime Minister, is the best offer Quebec has had in 127 years. Furthermore, his Quebec lieutenant, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, said he would not go and defend Canada unless he had something better than a pocket knife, even if according to what the Prime Minister said just a moment ago, the Canadian option is still the best option open to Quebecers.

When will the Prime Minister finally ask these two ministers, who took an oath to defend the interests of Canada, to do their job or else go home?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is not being quite fair to the ministers and certainly not to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, the newspaper Le Soleil reported that "Benoît Bouchard said quite frankly that Quebec's separation would have certain consequences and entail certains costs for Quebecers. When someone says there will be a price to pay, when federalists say that, it's blackmail; but if someone says it will be all moonlight and roses, everybody looks incredulous".

I believe that in their own way, the ministers from Quebec and the Quebec caucus are truly and deeply committed to Canada. There are ministers, and there are quite a few, who would prefer to be able to defend a specific plan. That is why we have been trying for some time, on behalf of the government and the Parliament of Canada, to put together a constitutional program we would all be proud to defend in Quebec around referendum time.

I will tell you what I told Jean–François Bertrand. When Mr. Bertrand told me that sovereignty was a clear option, I answered: Sure, provided you can keep your Canadian citizenship, the Canadian dollar, Canadian currency and the benefits of the Canadian economic union. He said: All right, but what do you have to offer? I told him: Mr. Bertrand, you already have it. Canada already exists. It already is something quite extraordinary. Canada is one of the great civilized countries, one of the modern, dynamic and prosperous countries on this planet. As for me, first and foremost, I am pround to be a Canadian, I am proud to live like a Canadian and a Quebecer, and until the day I die, I intend to be able to say to the world: I am proud to be a Canadian and I am proud to be a Quebecer. Both go together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Prime Minister. I have done it for a long time in my life. I intend to keep doing it.

The gap between those who proclaim and those who talk about sovereignty—they never use the word independence and separation—is narrowing. When will he do what a Prime Minister should do, tell his ministers from Quebec, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to do what is required of ministers of the Crown, to go to Quebec and tell them what the Prime Minister just said to this House and not chicken out in front of these two ministers who are afraid to take their responsibilities.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend should be a little more discriminating in the people he seeks to reject. I do not have it with me, but I can remember that just about Christmas time last year, the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the The Journal during a profile of him made a statement which was as moving and as poignant in favour of Canada that anyone would ever want to hear. My hon. friend should support and applaud that.

Let us just take a second. On two occasions the Minister of National Health and Welfare stood as a federal candidate in elections on behalf of a federal party seeking to improve Canada. In 1980 the Minister of National Health and Welfare was one of those who voted on the other side. What he is learning and what he is in the process of appreciating is the magnificence of a larger vision, of a greater Canada.

If we just say to those who voted in 1980 on the other side: "Be gone. We don't want to have anything to do with you and we are going to establish your degree of patriotism", I would suggest to my hon. friend that what we should be doing is reaching out as we have been.

I can tell my hon. friend that the statements that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been making have been most supportive of Canada. He remains a strong believer in a powerful Quebec within a strong and united Canada. I believe we should encourage all of the Quebecers and all Canadians to support what we believe is in the best interest of all Quebecers and Canadians, namely that which has brought us prosperity and unity and strength for 125 years—Canada.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It follows up the questions that the Leader of the Opposition just asked about this uncertainty which seems to prevail among some of his ministers from Quebec.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether cabinet has taken a clear and definite position on the constitutional offers that will be made.

On reading this morning's newspapers, it seems that two Quebec ministers still do not know what the Canadian government intends to propose to solve the constitutional crisis and in particular to give Quebec what the government of that province has been demanding for quite some time.

Can the Prime Minister tell us today whether the government has made progress in that regard or is it still completely in a fog and does not know what to offer Quebecers to solve the constitutional crisis?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend knows very well that we inherited a complicated situation. We inherited a situation where Quebec did not endorse the Canadian Constitution in 1981–82. We also inherited an amending formula that requires the presence and approval of the premiers.

It is not only the position of the Canadian government or Parliament that counts, but now the provincial premiers as well. In the past, they were not always inclined to support openly Quebec's traditional or historic demands. Some of them are less "hot" on Quebec's position. I think that at least one of them belongs to my friend's party; perhaps he could talk to him about it at an appropriate time.

As far as the ministers are concerned, there is no uncertainty about the fundamental commitment to a united Canada and a strong, modern, dynamic Quebec within a renewed federation, and all ministers without exception support the positions that I set forth as Prime Minister of Canada and which I defended in favour of Canada.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Prime Minister confirm for us that the Beaudoin-Dobbie report is now the basis of the discussions that his government is having with the provinces?

Obviously, the Canadian government must know now, at practically the eleventh hour, I would say, where it is going and must show conviction in order to convince the premiers on a constitutional proposal. The surprising thing today—and that is why the Leader of the Opposition asked those questions—is that some ministers in the Conservative government still seem to be uncertain about a proposal that would be acceptable to Quebecers. Obviously, the Government of Canada must know now at least where it is going. If some provincial premiers do not know what must be done, at least the Government of Canada must know where it is going and try to convince these premiers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend is raising quite a different issue.

The proposal in question must come from an agreement between the Canadian government and the provinces. If it were only the Canadian government's position, we would know right away what position to put forward. But the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs must deal with the reality imposed on us by the 1982 Constitution, that is, the provinces and now the native leaders as well. That is not easy. It is one of the results. The 1981-82 strait-jacket is there. We must deal with this reality and that is what the minister is doing.

• (1430)

I can tell my hon. friend this. If at some point we cannot obtain the desired agreement, if, for example, it were impossible to convince the premiers of the validity of a parliamentary report or the urgency to act, we will know what to do. I will not hesitate to come before the House to announce all that to my hon. friend.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, certainly those of us on this side of the House, the New Democratic Party, will agree that the Constitution and the unity of the country is a very key issue.

I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister there is also an ingredient of unity which is very important and that is the faith that Canadians have in themselves and whether we have faith in this country.

As I travel around the country, I see Canadians saying that they feel insecure. The high unemployment, the results of the high interest rates, the results of the high dollar are creating that insecurity in the Canadian people and this is a factor in unity.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that what Canadians see is this country either being sold off or given away piece by piece. Last week it was oil and gas resources opened up to foreign investment. Then it was the proposed Mexican trade deal. We are perhaps looking at selling off our water resources. Today we see a possible sale of Canadian Airlines to American Airlines.

I know the Prime Minister is concerned about the unity of this country. I want to ask him when is he going to come forward with policies and show he has faith in the Canadian people, in the Canadian economy and work in the interests of Canadian labour, Canadian business and Canadian consumers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, little wonder that ordinary Canadians are confused and perplexed when the leader of the NDP persists in making abusive statements like the one that she just made.

Every question is prefaced with these kinds of criticisms, some real, most imagined, not a single solid word of confidence in Canada in the process, in everybody from all political parties who are working so hard to keep Canada together. My hon. friend should recognize that there are great difficulties that we are confronted with. It is not easy.

I was in Quebec this weekend, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out. I want to tell my hon. friend it is tough going and we need all the help that we can get. All of those who believe in Canada, who believe in federalism, including my hon. friend, would be welcome in Quebec fighting the fight on behalf of Canada. She is held in high regard and I know that she would be welcome as a voice of reason in federalism.

What is important is that my hon. friend begin accentuating some of the positives of Canada instead of always wallowing in the negatives.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, surely we have a responsibility and this government has a responsibility to the unemployed of this country. Surely the Prime Minister will acknowledge that our nation's economy is built on our natural resources, on our transportation links, on our communication, not just north and south but east and west. Surely the Prime Minister will agree that people, to feel good about a country, have to feel that we have the spirit and the faith in each other to make sure that we can build the economy.

It is the Prime Minister's government that has opened up our oil and gas resources to foreign ownership. It is the Prime Minister's government that is selling off parts of Canada. What is the Prime Minister prepared to say to Canadians that this government has faith in them and will work for business?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty hard to deal with my hon. friend's question which is traditional NDP griping. My hon. friend would perhaps be interested in pointing out that there was today the announcement of a modest growth in the economy, in the real GDP, small, but for the first time in some months.

Manufacturing output rose almost 1 per cent in January following three months of decline. Export oriented industries grew nine-tenths of a per cent in January. Forestry output and automotive and resource-based manufacturing showed the greatest strength. Retail trade advanced four-tenths of one percent.

There are difficulties in this economy as there are difficulties in France, the United Kingdom, the United States, Japan and around the world. We are all living in a recession. If I could wipe away everybody's troubles and problems tomorrow, I would be happy to do it. I cannot do it. All I can do is continue to work as hard as I can to try to create an environment wherein jobs and new prosperity can be created.

I would not want her to make a habit of it but my hon. friend could contribute to that and to the cause of national unity by from time to time underlining some of the positive things about Canada and the growth that is now taking place in the economy.

CANADIAN AIRLINES

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, all that Canadians are asking is that this government not continue to create problems.

I want to ask a specific question because the Prime Minister has spoken generally. There are a number of Canadians who are concerned, particularly many of us who live in less populated areas served by airlines. People in areas such as Whitehorse, Saint John, Brandon, or Trois Rivieres are concerned as they see the possibility of Canadian Airlines being taken over to a large degree by American Airlines, that this will lead to the high profit areas going to those American airlines and the low profit ones left which is not in the Canadian interest.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to assure Canadians that the Canadian interest, transportation within Canada and those communities I have mentioned, will be well served?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the leader of the NDP that what we are faced with at the present time is an announcement by Canadian Airlines that it is entering into negotiations with American Airlines to try and forge an economic strategic alliance. No deal is there.

The NTA act is there to make sure that the Canadian legislation that was adopted years ago to the effect that 25 per cent foreign ownership must be respected and effective control by Canadians be respected.

If there is a deal at the end of the day it will go through that process.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Forty-three years ago today the people of Newfoundland and Labrador of their own free will became Canadians. They became citizens of what remains, despite the difficulties and disappointments of the day, still the most privileged nation on the face of the earth.

By that act of union, Newfoundlanders brought to Canada a clear and compelling case for what is now recognized as the 200-mile economic zone.

My question to the Prime Minister is the following. In light of the efforts by Newfoundland fishermen today to make Canada's case off the the 200-mile limit, how long must the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, indeed how long must all Canadians wait for this government to move to unilaterally extend custodial jurisdiction of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks and to stop the international slaughter of north Atlantic cod stocks?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the government has been going all out in its efforts to try and ensure that this resource is saved, not only for Canadian fishermen who are most important to us, but also to present to the Europeans that the destruction of the fishery is not in their interests either.

The best way to do this is through a multilateral effort and co-operation through working in Europe, through NAFO, through UNCED where we will be making a major presentation in June and the Prime Minister will be attending personally to help highlight this issue; through building support internationally for our view of the jurisdiction on the high seas and the preservation of this resource.

I was encouraged last week by my meetings with the Germans who are going to help us in dealing with some of the other Europeans.

• (1440)

As I have said before in this House, this is the way that is going to resolve it on behalf of the fishermen of Newfoundland and the fishing industry. We will leave no stone unturned until we get this done.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, the member for St. John's West, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, did a fly-past today over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, indeed the people of Canada, do not want a fly-past by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. They want him to pitch down and to declare on behalf of all Canadians our custodial jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Why is the Government of Canada encouraging, because that is what is happening, Canadian fishermen to symbolically declare ownership of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks when this government is not prepared legally to declare our custodial jurisdiction over that same area and to halt now, not next year or in future years, the slaughter of those important cod stocks, an important contributor to the food basket of the world?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the hon. member that this is indeed part of the food basket of the world. That is why we need multilateral action in order to preserve it.

The actions that the government has been taking are not only appropriate but they are effective. The fact that the Newfoundland fishermen have decided as well to create their own symbols is exactly another tactic that is useful as long as it is done within the jurisdictional ambit which they are honouring as they do their sail out to the 200-mile limit today.

I cannot think of any better way than to have the government work at the diplomatic, political and official levels and have the fishermen demonstrate their own interests and the industry demonstrate its interest in this. That is a co-ordinated Canadian effort and at the end of the day that is what is going to resolve this issue.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has to do with the Canadian hostage being held in Lebanon. On five occasions in the last six months, the minister has refused to admit that Henriette Haddad had been kidnapped in Lebanon. All other governments do their best to free their hostages. The Canadian government is the only one that refuses to acknowledge that one of its citizens has been kidnapped, and it refuses to take measures for her release. Why has the minister refused, on five occasions, to acknowledge that a Canadian, Henriette Haddad, is being held hostage in Lebanon?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not true to say that I refused to acknowledge Mrs. Haddad's problem. I am very sympathetic to the families, but this situation is not like that of hostages from other countries.

[English]

Mrs. Haddad disappeared in 1985 at a time when Lebanon was in great crisis. There was no stable environment in which to try to find her. No group has claimed credit, which is unusual. There are 17,000 people who have disappeared in Lebanon. We have left no avenue untrod in trying to find Mrs. Haddad or to find evidence of what has happened.

We have taken every single thing that we have been told and followed it right to the end of the road. Unfortunately, most of those roads have turned out to be dead ends.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement in this House today is absolutely outrageous. When Terry Waite was detained no proof existed, nobody claimed him.

In fact, we know today out of press reports from Beirut that the United Nations has recognized Mrs. Henriette Haddad as a hostage. The Middle East Watch has recognized that she is a hostage. The Hostage Action Worldwide in London, England has recognized that she is a hostage.

There is only one government that has not recognized her status and that is the Government of Canada. For that, the minister owes the Canadian people an apology. I would like to ask the minister if she would render that today.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member well knows the circumstances surrounding Mr. Waite's disappearance, which was not even a disappearance. He was abducted in full view as were some of the other hostages that were taken.

The important point the hon. member is missing, which happens fairly frequently, is that the disappearance of Mrs. Haddad is a personal tragedy for the family. There is no question about that. Her disappearance should be followed up whether or not she is a hostage. That is not relevant to trying to find her. What is essential is that we follow up every single lead we have.

If the hon. member actually has a real one, perhaps she would like to tell us.

FIREARMS CONTROL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice who today tabled part of the regulations on firearms control. We did not get any information on the orders listing the prohibited weapons. We still do not know when this list will be published and when these regulations will take effect.

[English]

Is the minister aware that while she and her department fret over the list and regulations, Canadians are receiving catalogues like this one from the International Firearms company which offer for sale as non-restricted guns with 30 and 75 round magazines paramilitary weapons like those used in violent attacks by the Marc Lépines of this world against women, against other Canadians.

Can the minister tell us when these regulations will come into effect and when the list of prohibited weapons will be completed?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is strange for the hon. member to say that we did not finish our work because I said this morning in a press conference that I hope to be able to publish the list of prohibited firearms in June. We are now consulting the provincial attorneys general to determine what criteria to apply in prohibiting firearms. My advisory committee on firearms has given me a list of characteristics and a point system to determine which firearms should be prohibited. Once our consultation is complete I hope, as I said this morning, that we can publish the list of prohibited firearms in June.

The important thing is that the regulations have to be tabled in the House. Members of the House of Commons have 30 days to study them, but the other regulations prohibiting firearms are not subject to this 30-day period. So, in June, I will be able to publish the orders that will come into effect immediately.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, surely the minister must be aware that she has to be faster because these paramilitary weapons are flowing into this country, pending the government bringing in these Orders in Council.

I want to ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the January 1992 issue of Canadian Handgun which suggests to the members of the Ontario Handgun Association that they should pick off members of Parliament who support gun control by stacking their nomination meetings.

If I might quote, they claim that they picked off the previous member for Vancouver Centre and they say: "It is time to send some more shivers down their backs". They say further: "For those of you who wish to support the Reform Party you can belong to as many political parties as you wish. This means you can still support the Reform Party while you are causing havoc in another".

What does the minister think of those tactics? In view of those tactics and in view of the paramilitary weapons flowing into this country, why is she delaying bringing down these regulations and these Orders in Council which Canadians demand?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, long before this House voted on the legislation to enhance our gun control legislation, I put in place a consultative committee in the spring of 1990 to advise me and the government on criteria for prohibiting weapons. Those regulations and Orders in Council will be ready in June and we will act.

I can tell this hon. member that no one on this side of the House will subvert the well-being of Canadians, will abdicate their duty, because of the kinds of threats he is reading from that particular magazine. The proof is in the pudding in the support that members on this side of the House and in fact members on all sides of the House have given to that legislation.

We are not afraid of controversy. We are not afraid of tough decisions. We will defend the public interest of Canada. People can write whatever they want.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, likewise my question is for the Minister of Justice.

In bringing down her regulations today, the minister stated in her press release that the regulations would take effect at a time to be determined.

The minister has been working on these regulations and on this question for two years. As she can appreciate, Canadians want stronger gun control immediately.

When will these regulations come into effect? When can Canadians get the stronger gun control that they demand?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. members question. I will be publishing a list of implementation dates.

As the hon. member will understand, some of the regulations require some co-operation with the provinces in the putting into place of administrative schemes and the training of firearms officers.

I can tell the hon. member simply from memory that the last implementation date will be the date for the implementation of the training provisions. That requires us to complete negotiations with the provinces about what the kind of curriculum will be, et cetera, and to train as many as 4,000 instructors across the country. That will be the last implementation date. That will be July 1993.

All the other provisions will be implemented sooner than that. I will be very happy to make public our proposed dates within the next couple of weeks. What I have done, in discussing this with my officials and with my staff, is to press to have the implementation date as soon as possible. What we are trying to do is simply reconcile that sense of urgency with the ability of ourselves and the provincial authorities to deliver on those promises.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for being forthcoming on that request. I hope the list will be coming forward as soon as possible.

I would like to ask her about one of those areas, that is mandatory training for firearms users. As the minister knows, Canadians, both those in favour of stricter gun control and those who use guns themselves, wanted mandatory training for firearms users not only as a means of informing and helping those who are going to use firearms but of screening out those who would be inappropriate for a firearms acquisition certificate.

When does the minister feel that we can have this mandatory training program in place? She obviously has been meeting with the provinces. When can we expect to have that training program in place? It is very important and an integral part of gun control.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said, the implementation date of the mandatory training should be July 1, 1993.

The first mandate that I gave to the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms was to bring forward a blueprint for implementing the training provisions which in fact have been in the Criminal Code since 1978 and never put into force. It developed a curriculum which I have circulated to the provincial attorneys general.

Just as provincial governments have the responsibility for administering the Criminal Code in terms of the trial process, they also have the responsibility of implementing the firearms regulations, supported financially by the Government of Canada. The provinces have taken this under advisement. We are working to implement it as soon as possible.

As I say, that is the last of the provisions that will be implemented. I want to say to the hon. member that of the regulations tabled today there are regulations that are part of that package. When those regulations come into force there will be no legal impediment to carrying out that commitment in the statute by all members of the House who supported Bill C-17.

As I say, I think that by July 1, 1993, just over a year from now, we should have the system up and running—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa South.

TRANSPORTATION SAFETY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Ever since the report on the Dryden air crash came out last week, the Minister of Transport has been giving Canadians the same vague assurances about safety in the skies as his predecessors did.

We now know from government documents that officials in the federal aviation administration in the U.S. told this government in 1985 and I quote:

> As you deregulate economically, it is vital that it be made abundantly clear to industry that safety regulation is going to be beefed up.

Why did the government fail to act on this clear advice? Why did it ignore the threat to safety that was posed by airline deregulation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is trying to lead the Canadian public into believing.

I can assure him that in its interim report the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation referred to the amendments that had been made to the Aeronautics Act and said: "The federal government has introduced in 1985 sweeping changes to the Aeronautics Act designed to give Canadian aviation its most progressive safety legislation in more than 60 years and to implement the major recommendations of the inquiry into aviation safety headed by Mr. Justice Charles Dubin".

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to get this government to answer the very strong findings in the report by Mr. Justice Moshansky issued last week. So far there has not been a single response to the findings of the judge.

In a memorandum delivered to the Minister of Transport in December 1986 the minister's office was advised:

> Because of the number of inspection personnel available, and limited financial resources, Transport Canada is seldom able to completely achieve the desired target.

Why were successive Ministers of Transport telling Canadians that the skies were safe when they knew within their own office that there were problems in the department and that it was unable to ensure safety?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question a few minutes ago by demonstrating that all Ministers of Transport who have occupied this portfolio since the advent of this government have always been preoccupied by one major concern: the safety of all modes of transportation in Canada.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that after three years of investigation of the Dryden accident, on the day after he tabled his report Mr. Justice Moshansky reiterated in several interviews in the press, on the radio and on TV that the Canadian sky and aviation safety system is one of the best in the world.

FIREARM CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, the firearm regulations have been tabled this morning. It is too bad that people are treated differently whether they live in the city or in a rural area.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. Why make an exception in the regulations regarding the mandatory safety lock-up for people who live in the country on the pretext that they may need their weapon to protect themselves from predators or other animals?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the provisions under which people who live in rural areas are allowed to store their firearms without locking them up are only temporary. The regulations state clearly that this does not allow people living in rural areas to keep their firearms permanently without locking them up. It is only meant to allow them to use their firearms if need be and in a safe way.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I understand that the Quebec government is neglecting highway 117, the Trans-Canada Highway, in Abitibi-Témiscamingue. However, further to the First Ministers Conference on the Economy, held on March 24 and 25, it had been agreed to give priority to proposals regarding the national highway system.

Will the minister confirm today that highway 117 from Louvincourt, Val-d'Or, Malartic, Rivière-Héva, Cadillac and Rouyn-Noranda all the way down to the Quebec-Ontario border will be seriously considered with a view to rebuilding it completely to ensure road safety and make commuting easier in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue, a remote area.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague will certainly be glad to know that for the past three years the Ministers of Transport of every province and the federal Minister of Transport have been looking at the issue of a national highway system. A final study on this issue has recently been presented to us and we will meet shortly. My hon. colleague the Minister of Finance has announced that we will examine the matter very carefully, keeping in mind that Canada already gives several hundred million dollars to some provinces for the upgrading of the highway system.

AVIATION SAFETY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport stated in this House last Thursday that the total number of inspectors increased from 456 in 1985 to 569 in 1991. According to the Deputy Prime Minister, when he was Minister of Transport back in 1985, the actual number of inspectors was not 456, but somewhere over 600.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport who is telling the truth.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I am, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Then we can assume that the Deputy Prime Minister was not telling the truth back in 1985.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to pose his question in such a way that we do not get into these difficulties.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, the minister also failed to mention that the total number of accidents increased from 1985 to 1991, that accidents involving commercial aircraft increased between 1984 and 1991 and that the near misses involving Canadian registered aircraft increased by roughly 400 per cent between 1985 and 1989.

Why is the Minister of Transport manipulating the figures and withholding other crucial statistics?

Mr. Speaker: That is an allegation and is just not appropriate.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

I recently met with Mr. Alvin Starr who is a partner in a small business in Markham that specializes in software development for the medical and defence industries. He is having great difficulty trying to do business with the Government of Canada.

As the minister knows, the United States have a set-aside program whereby a specific percentage of business is set aside specifically for small business. Is the minister of state for small business thinking seriously about such a program, which is so effective in the U.S.?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his thoughtful question. We do not have a small business set-aside program and, in fact, I would not be in favour of it as it presently stands. In the United States it develops more into a ceiling than a floor.

Sixty-one per cent of all procurements through DSS go to small business—over 85,000 of them—plus the large contractors are subcontracting all the time to smaller businesses.

We also have an open bidding system. We have the Electronic Procurement Opportunities Board. The Procurement Review Board is opening up procurement to small business, and effective tomorrow we will have a new policy on Canadian content to help small businesses, but it will not be the same as the small business set-aside program in the U.S.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca that I apologize for a mix-up. Perhaps the hon. member would like to put one question.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, with some difficulty I will incorporate my question and my supplementary into one question and I will give my own answer if the minister cannot answer.

Yesterday the government produced a pamphlet entitled Negotiations for a North American Free Trade Agreement. On the bottom part of the pamphlet it says: "But how can we compete with lower Mexican wage rates?" and then it goes on to say: "Wages often represent only a relatively small percentage of the total cost of production".

I would ask the minister of trade this question. Does he have any specific studies, sector by sector, on the manufacturing production in this country that would prove that wages are not a factor? For example, the only study known on auto parts manufacturing shows—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I will put my question tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that would be the best thing.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of the Hon. John Penner, Minister of Energy and Mines from the Province of Saskatchewan.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Clancy (p. 9052).

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, when we rose at one o'clock, I was speaking about the panel on violence against women, how important its work was, how it would add to the research and how we could use that research.

One gets a sense of how much there is still to learn and how difficult an issue this is when one realizes that a recent survey by the Canadian Labour Congress shows that nearly 50 per cent of Canadians believe that women are responsible for their own sexual harassment because of their dress or behaviour. This is outrageous. We have much to overcome in Canadian society.

Why people believe these things and how they act upon them is still imperfectly understood. We know in a general sense that the victimization of women is linked to the relative inequality in society, that there is a strong relationship with patterns of behaviour based on power and rooted in our early socialization.

We also know that many factors often cited to explain violence, such as economic hardship, alcohol and drug abuse, and sexual stereotyping do not in themselves account for why violence occurs in the first place.

Until we understand the causes and how to treat them, the effectiveness of our actions to deter, prevent and end violence against women will be hampered. The work of the panel will move us forward on the path toward better understanding of the causes of this social evil. Let there be no mistake about it, the work of the panel is not a substitute for continuing action to end violence against women.

When the panel makes its recommendations there will be a call to further action by the federal government. But the federal government is not waiting for the panel's report to take a broad range of actions directed at prevention and protection of women, as well as treating the effects of violence against women.

I will only mention a few of the continuing federal initiatives which respond to the determination of women to end violence against women.

The 1991 Family Violence Initiative builds on previous efforts and doubles the resources committed specifically to domestic violence and violence against women. The Minister Responsible for the Status of Women has announced plans to co-ordinate a prevention-oriented public education campaign aimed at changing attitudes which give rise to and condone violence against women.

The minister is working hard to involve provinces, the territories, the labour movement, the business community and others in this campaign.

The Minister of Justice has begun what amounts to the beginning of a revolution in the attitudes of our justice system toward this issue. Legislative initiatives in this field include tougher laws to keep sexual and other violence offenders off the streets longer and more stringent gun control laws. The regulations were tabled earlier today, and legislation that makes it clear that no means no and prevents women from being abused and unnecessarily victimized once again by an insensitive court process.

This government has shown its commitment to women and its determination to help them achieve the full equality they seek in its approach to this issue of violence against women.

I would like to touch, for a minute, on the insensitivity of the court process. In Edmonton I, and other members of Parliament, have been working with the victims of Larry Takahashi. Six women came forward to protest the fact that he was given day passes, where he was released from prison in Vancouver to go out on these day passes to play golf.

One of them, in a hearing before the justice committee in Edmonton, said that two years after the police had confiscated sheets, pillow cases and a nightgown as evidence from her home, a policeman showed up at the door unannounced, rang the doorbell and handed over the sheets with huge holes cut out of them and said to her: "Here is the evidence back. Thank you very much.". That was grossly insensitive and is something we must combat. We must sensitize our policemen, our judges and the court system to the issues and to the emotions which have been affected by terrible violence toward women.

The government has embarked on a long-term course of action which it is determined to see through to its conclusion. That goal will not be reached as long as any violence against women exists. As the Prime Minister put it in August last year: "One Canadian woman suffering violence at home or elsewhere is one too many."

There is much we can do. The panel is well on its way to accomplishing its goals. I support their efforts and I think the House supports their efforts. We would like to do more and we hope for some fruitful recommendations.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his speech the hon. member spoke about the government's commitment to women. He went on at some length, saying how much the government had done, how enthusiastic it had been in its work in supporting women in spite of the manifest cutbacks to which my colleagues who have spoken in this debate have referred.

The view he has taken is that everything is coming up roses in this area, which he started out by saying at the beginning of his speech, and I admit he changed his tune as he came closer to reality a little later on. Does he not agree that perhaps describing things in that way does not help the situation?

What needs to be acknowledged is the fact that despite the efforts the government has made, and it has obviously made some progress in this area and I do not deny it, the cutbacks are seriously undermining that progress. They are damaging the reputation and the progress of the government in dealing with these issues and really he ought to be objecting to the cutbacks that the government has put forward in the budget.

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has failed to realize that in my speech I dealt with one issue and that was the violence against women. In that area, we have increased resources. We have a $136 million initiative.

In 1986 the government launched a $23 million child sexual abuse initiative. In 1988, it followed that with a broader $40 million family violence initiative and this, in turn, was expanded in February 1991 to a $136 million initiative on violence against women.

We have taken legislative action in Bill C-36 to extend the amount of time a convicted person must serve, from one-third to one-half of their sentence for those offenders in the violent and dangerous offenders category.

We have embarked on the panel on violence against women. These are concrete initiatives. We fund women's groups, community groups and many others. We have increased resources on violence against women.

Certainly we can do much more in areas. The recent budget increased the tax deduction for child care and so on. We are well on our way to helping women. I agree that there is much to be done, but in many areas of our society we will never be finished. We must work as hard as we can with what resources we have and add more resources when we can. We will be well on our way to accomplishing some of the goals we have stated.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on the matter before us today, equality of women, I would just like to ask the previous speaker if part of the government's equality of women initiatives includes initiatives from the Minister of Labour and the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women.

In Powell River, British Columbia, there are 22 women who have been driven out of their jobs by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. The bank suddenly decided it no longer wanted to negotiate with them to renew the contract and basically said: "We are large enough and wealthy enough that we do not have to listen to you. You can stay out on the street over Christmas and you can stay out for a year or two years. If we choose, we will simply close this branch and set an example for our other small number of unionized branches".

There needs to be some initiatives in terms of the equality of women taken by this government. A good start would be anti-strike-breaking legislation and anti-scab legislation that protects women who are in a tremendous position of inequality when it comes to 22 people going after a chartered bank.

It is also affirmative action on the part of the Minister of Labour when women find themselves in a tremendous situation of inequality, where the office of the minister takes positive affirmative action and attempts to get both parties back to the bargaining table and to reach a settlement. In the search for equality for men and women, in many cases particularly women, the best guarantee for equality is a job and the best guarantee of equality through a job is through a unionized job.

I am asking the hon. member if he believes that the Minister of Labour and the government could be involved with and play a useful role in bringing these people back to the table as well as all women who find themselves in this unequal situation by putting some anti-strike-breaking and anti-scab legislation in place.

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question on that issue in Powell River. I would note he has brought that up in the House before with the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women in Question Period. She answered at that time that it was a contractual dispute. It was essentially a labour-management dispute. I am sure that her department has carefully looked at that. I would not be surprised if there had not been consultations between her department and the Department of Labour.

I join with the member in deploring the action of the management of that institution. I only hope that the dispute is solved so that these women can return to their jobs, have some opportunity and are able to live their lives with dignity.

On the question of affirmative action, I would hope that we as a government continue in our efforts in that respect. We have done quite a bit in the past and I am sure there is more we can do in the future.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

I noticed that the previous member spoke with a great deal of praise for the government's actions on violence against women. This country has become increasingly concerned over the plight of women with respect to violence against them over the last number of years. This motion is very appropriate. When we take a detailed look at the government's action in this area, we see that last year the government announced with much fanfare a $137 million program to deal with violence against women. But when we looked at it closely, we found out it was actually going to spend something like $15 million last year and $20 million this year for a total of $35 million spread over two years. The balance of the program spending was going to take place somewhere in the future, when everyone in this country knows very well that the Conservatives will never be the government in that period of time.

• (1520)

At the same time the government announced changes to the Canada Assistance Plan. It limited the payments to the provinces of Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia. What amounts of money were involved in that? Was it $15 million or $20 million? No, it was not.

In the first year the province of Ontario lost $415 million. In the second year, $1.2 billion. In the first year the province of British Columbia lost $200 million. In the second year it lost $900 million. The total losses to those two provinces for two years was $2.7 billion.

On the one hand we have the government announcing a $35 million program with much fanfare to fight violence against women. At the same time we have the federal government taking $2.7 billion away from two provinces.

We have to take a look at the programs funded under the Canada Assistance Plan dealing with violence against women. First, the Canada Assistance Plan is used to fund transition houses or safe homes. That program provides women with first-line protection when they have to leave their homes because of violence. We have the government giving $35 million on the one hand and taking back $2.7 billion, affecting transition houses.

It provides support programs in the form of income assistance for women who are forced because of violence in the family to flee their husbands or partners and take their children with them. What is the government doing? It is offering a nice PR program of $35 million but it is taking away $2.7 billion, affecting basic income assistance programs that support women who had to leave families in which violence has taken place.

Programs of counselling for women who have been traumatized and immobilized because of violence against them assisted these women in recovering their dignity, regaining their self-assurance and getting them back into the labour market. Here we have again the government announcing with much fanfare its glitzy $35 million and cutting $2.7 billion from the very kinds of programs that could assist women.

It cuts out programs for sexual abuse, not only sexual abuse for youngsters but also counselling services for adult survivors of sexual abuse. We have this situation where the government gives a little and takes away 90 times more in programs that directly affect women in violent situations.

It cut out child abuse programs.

The government says it only affects three provinces, but 50 per cent of the children in Canada live there. It reduced programs that involved protection services to children as part of a family structure by $2.7 billion over two years in order to make some PR announcement of a little money spread over a number of years.

Probably the most ludicrous program is the Canada Assistance Plan. It is used to fund child care for those on low incomes or fixed incomes or those working but not earning enough to afford to pay for child care.

The government talks a lot about how it is going to help women in a variety of ways. It is going to have this nice program and look at the causes of violence against women and how it can provide solutions. At the same time it has cut back dramatically on the availability of services such as child care, child protection, sexual abuse programs, counselling for trauma caused by violence, income support programs and transition houses or safe homes, which would assist women in violent situations.

This motion is very much in order because it clearly points out that the government has not only failed to protect, but has failed to promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women. The biggest right a woman should have in this country is a right to personal safety; to not fear for her own personal well-being either within her own family or on the streets.

We also should take a look at some of the other budgetary measures this government introduced that directly impact on the ability of women to protect themselves and their families. There are many, but two are particularly troublesome to me.

One is the cancelling of the Court Challenges Program. Under this program we were going fund people who were disadvantaged, disabled, from minority groups, aboriginals or women, in order to ensure they could go to court to protect their rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This government has said it is going to cancel that program. It is simply going to make their rights as they exist in law meaningless because they will have no capability of going to court to pursue them. That is the impact on women.

There is another major cut within the co-operative housing program. Co-op housing has not only been a valuable and economical way to provide affordable housing for families, it has also been a way of providing supportive communities, especially to women who have had to flee from family violence or violence of another kind. When they are just getting their lives back together, they need a variety of support services and experiences that can help them regain their equilibrium. Co-op housing has provided an amalgamation of these services. It has provided them with affordable housing so they can afford to live with some dignity. It has also provided them with an environment of supportive people where they are able to develop their self-esteem, get themselves back into the labour market and start making a contribution to the total community as well as to themselves.

I guess I have grown accustomed to this government playing the game of PR with a number of vital issues, but I am deeply troubled when the government takes a PR approach to such fundamental things as the rights of women to safety and protection from violence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. There are four minutes left in his questions or comments. The hon. member from North Island—Powell River on a question or comment.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the equality of women and the government's record on this issue. I would like to raise the record of Canada Post as it relates to the equality of women for the consideration of the hon. member.

Canada Post is one of the most regressive and repressive employers in Canada and follows that in partnership with the government. I would point to its privatization of post offices and postal services and termination of employees.

In most cases it is eliminating women who have union jobs that run $13 plus an hour, benefits, and the protection of a union contract. When the privatization of services and postal outlets goes ahead, those women are hired on by the private outlet at minimum wage with no contract, no benefits and no protection.

I wonder how the government justifies its position that it is concerned about the equality of women when it destroys the opportunity of many women to earn a dignified wage and enjoy the protection of a union contract. It places them in jobs with no contract, no protection and no benefits, at $4 to $5 an hour.

I wonder if there is a short comment from my colleague on that matter.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the question is very appropriate to those of us in Surrey where we have experienced what happens when there is privatization of post offices.

We had a Shoppers Drug Mart that had a postal service in it. Some of the women had worked there for up to 11 years. They were earning $9 an hour. It was not much, but was better than $5 an hour. A new owner took over and disregarded these women who had worked there for up to 11 years. He said they would have to take an across the board cut in wages. Their hours would be controlled so that long-term people would only get part-time work, and friends of the owner would be brought in to work the other hours.

These women organized and went on strike. To teach these women a lesson and make sure other postal outlets did not organize, the drug store company left them out on strike for nine years. It finally closed the entire branch of the drug store in order to ensure that women did not gain the fundamental right of free collective bargaining within the postal service.

That is going on repeatedly across this country.

I would agree with my hon. colleague. If we are really going to protect the rights of women, we have to protect their fundamental right to free collective bargaining and adequate wages.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is not hard to stand in this House to support its resolution condemning the government for its failure to protect and promote fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

If this government intended to enable women in this country to have the rights and protection they are entitled to, and be able to pursue opportunities of employment they are entitled to, it would develop a plan which would ensure this would happen.

That plan would ensure there was an adequate child care system across this country so that women who are raising their children would have the opportunity to put them in accessible, quality child care over which they would have some control, so they could then explore opportunities in the work place.

In 1988 in this House, the Prime Minister recognized the importance of child care in this regard. He said that one of the most important factors contributing to the persistent and persisting inequality of women in this country is the lack of affordable, flexible, quality child care.

He said later on that same day in August 1988 that by creating an additional 200,000 quality child care spaces, many more mothers will have the opportunity to participate in the labour force. Yet what does this government do in this budget? Does it even make the pretence of saying it is still interested in child care? Does it even begin the process of implementing the national child care strategy in Canada as promised in 1984, so women can take their rightful and full place in the work place?

In this budget, the government finally said what most of us have known for a long time. It has no intention of introducing a national, quality, accessible, affordable child care program. Indeed, the Minister of National Health and Welfare responsible for this program acknowledged in this House: "I have the privilege to be the killer of child care". He is not the builder of child care.

We have a long-term commitment on the part of this government from 1984 to introduce a child care program which everyone, including the government from time to time, recognizes is critical to the enhancement of the rights of women in Canada.

The final death knell from this government regarding child care has received the sort of criticism you would expect from across this country. One child care worker in the city of Vancouver said: "This announcement does not surprise me at all. It frustrates me to no end that the Tories just do not understand what is really happening to children and families in this country."

A single mother with a 4-year old child from Winnipeg said: "I guess it really does not care. If it was concerned about children, it would be doing something to help us."

The director of the Manitoba Child Care Association said: "Now we know exactly where it stands. It chooses not to support working women."

The final death blow to child care is a clear illustration this government does not protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women. The Tory regime has indicated, by not going ahead with child care and putting the last nails in the coffin of child care, it has no interest in protecting and promoting the fundamental rights of women in spite of its long-term rhetoric.

On the matter of pay equity, one would have thought that any government, party or person interested in promoting and protecting the fundamental rights of women would ensure they would be paid the same for their work as men across this country. One would have thought the government would make strenuous efforts to ensure that within its own area of responsibility and power, the Public Service, it would clearly ensure that pay equity for women was a priority, if that government was concerned about protecting and promoting the fundamental rights of Canadian women.

In spite of much rhetoric on the government side, it has indicated in this budget that it refuses to recognize its commitment to pay equity for women in the Public Service. For years and years, women have been underpaid for their work in relation to men, but the government seems to think this is acceptable. It even prepared to introduce legislation, if necessary, to ignore a human rights tribunal decision on this issue if it is not in their favour, if it does not allow them to continue this dreadful, inequitable treatment of women.

No government that was committed to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women would back off from pay equity for women in the Public Service. It would move forward strenuously to ensure that women are fairly paid. Not this government. This government is prepared to pass legislation to ensure that a human rights tribunal which may decide on the basis of the facts and the evidence that this government is remiss is overruled. No government that was committed to protecting and promoting women's interests would do that.

The last matter I would like to raise with regard to promoting and protecting women's rights and women's interests is with regard to the Court Challenges Program and the budget's implications here.

The government has in this budget decided that the Court Challenges Program would end, without consultation, without previous discussion in this House or with the groups affected. It decided that the Court Challenges Program would end. This Court Challenges Program, as we probably all know, enabled women and disadvantaged groups to take cases to court under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to make sure that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in fact did implement equality as it affected women and disadvantaged groups.

This government has decided to scrap this program, to scrap a program which would enable Canada's women a mechanism to ensure that they are indeed treated equally under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Surely any government that cared about equality, any government that cared about the fundamental rights of Canadian women, would ensure that there was a mechanism to implement the equality provisions in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and ensure that there was support for those groups which cannot find the resources to pursue their interests. Surely the government would ensure that there were resources available to them to put some meat on the bones of the charter, to make sure that the charter did in fact stand up for Canadian women.

The fact that the government has cancelled the Court Challenges Program is another clear indication of its lack of commitment to promoting and protecting the fundamental rights of Canadian women.

Instead of slashing and burning, instead of wrecking programs that are already in place, instead of ignoring previous commitments, if this government was really concerned with protecting and promoting the rights of women it would not have scrapped the national child care program. It would have made sure that a meaningful, effective national child care program would have been implemented. As the Prime Minister has said: "Without an adequate, accessible national child care program, thousands of Canadian women will be denied the opportunity to participate in the work place".

If this government was concerned at all about protecting and promoting the fundamental rights of Canadian women it would not turn its back on pay equity in the Public Service. It would strenuously push for it. If this government was really concerned about women's interests it would not have cancelled the Court Challenges Program.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Clancy (p. 9052).

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the debate by the hon. member. As usual, he has been very strong on many issues concerning women, as has been the tradition of the Liberal caucus.

I would like to make a very brief comment. Insofar as the pay equity program is concerned, we have to remind Canadians that they should listen and look and watch and hold this government accountable.

The government must be made to realize that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equality for today and not for tomorrow. A real test of the commitment on the part of the government is for the government to develop innovative programs. During these days of fiscal restraint, one approach would be to look at reallocation of resources to ensure that pay equity happens today.

I would like a brief comment from the member if he agrees with that approach.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, of course, I agree. It is a question of allocation of resources, of choices, and it is critical that the government recognizes its obligations under pay equity provisions and makes sure that women are paid fairly within the Public Service.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to pose a question to the hon. member. It goes in the way of comment. Every responsible politician in Canada must not just support the idea of equality for women, but must work actively to achieve it.

On Thursday, March 12, 1992, on television in Gibsons, B.C., the leader of the Liberal Party of B.C. said that he believed in pay equity for women, but not now. "We cannot afford pay equity for women".

It is unacceptable for the leader of the Liberal Party of B.C. or any other responsible politician to say that our society cannot provide pay equity. What Mr. Wilson is saying is that my three daughters and every other woman in Canada are not entitled to equality with men because it cannot be afforded. Mr. Wilson has said that women must remain in the job ghetto so men can continue to enjoy privilege and advantage, that women must remain in the job ghettos because we cannot afford to provide women with equal opportunity. Why? Because they are women.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand today and support the motion of my colleague: That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

I would like to preface my remarks by saying that I do very much understand the predicament of women in Canada. I, myself, was raised, along with my two brothers, by a single mother at a time when women were paid a lot less for doing exactly the same job.

I am pleased to say that in many areas they are at least paid substantially the same money now, but pay equity certainly has not come into full force.

I rise today to denounce the harmful consequences of the recent Conservative budget for Canadian women.

During the years of Conservative government, more and more women and children have swelled the ranks of the poor. The connection between parental poverty and child poverty is beyond doubt, and there is no denying that women are over-represented among the poorest segments of society.

Although poverty in any form is unacceptable, the alarming number of single-parent families headed by women who do not have enough to live on is intolerable.

Before he presented his first budget, the Minister of Finance told Canadians to expect a realistic budget.

[English]

The finance minister had said before the last budget to expect a realistic budget. The reality is that in this country 2.3 million people receive some kind of social safety help; approximately 1.5 million have no jobs; 3.8 million people, among which we have over 1 million children, do not have the basic necessities, and more than 60 per cent of single mothers, divorced or separated, are poor.

This budget will not help this problem at all. It has not helped to bring up the quality of life for women. In fact, this budget has many measures which will hurt women and children.

[Translation]

Millions of Canadian women are penalized in many areas.

• (1550)

The Conservative government has given up its promise to implement a national child care plan. Yes, Mr. Speaker, you heard right, this Conservative government has not kept its promise made eight years ago and has thus eliminated a way for women and children to escape poverty.

It is misleading for the government to have Canadians believe that they had to choose between child care services and programs for children at risk. Why does the government set poor and abused children against those who need safe affordable day care?

Canadians know that the government reduced funding for family allowances by over $3.5 billion since 1986. Its reform measure, the child benefit, will not help fight poverty. This benefit will not be good for single mothers on welfare. The child benefit is not indexed to inflation, so its real value will go down.

The Conservative budget also eliminates the Court Challenges Program, which was set up in 1985 and gave women, minorities and disadvantaged groups financial assistance needed to defend their cases in court, as provided in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Without the funds provided under this program, the rights in the charter will remain meaningless principles for disadvantaged groups.

Another blow dealt by this government to women is the calling into question of the spouse's allowance. The purpose of the Spouse's Allowance Program is to help disadvantaged older people under 65 until they are eligible for old age security benefits and the guaranteed income supplement. The government would seriously reconsider the Spouse's Allowance Program if the court extended it to divorced and single people. If the Mulroney government follows through, it will affect the most vulnerable, the poorest people aged 60 to 64, most of whom are women.

Another example of this government's irresponsibility is the downgrading of pay equity. The government announced that it would abolish the Pay Research Bureau, which collects and provides information that helps determine salaries, benefits and working conditions in the public service. It also announced a reduction in back pay for public servants.

In fact, the government does not intend to give any more back pay for the period before November 1, 1990 and will take the necessary action in Parliament to carry out this decision. For some 80,000 public servants, this is a rejection of the principle of pay equity.

Mr. Speaker, not only has this government abandoned its promise for a national child care plan, eliminated the Court Challenges Program, called into question the spouse's allowance and downgraded pay equity, but it has gone so far as to cut funds for social housing. Many single, separated or divorced mothers urgently need social housing. The Mulroney government announced that growth in spending on social housing would be limited to 3 per cent until 1997.

[English]

In 1990 this government limited its moneys toward the construction of social housing to $91 million. In 1992–93 it is reducing this amount to $70 million and it will be down to $45 million in 1996. When you speak of social housing, again in large majority it is women and children who are affected.

The Mulroney government has also cut co-op housing and this cut will greatly affect single parents, the handicapped and some of the less affluent Canadians who are able to live in these co-op housing units with some degree of comfort.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this government should simply admit that it has failed in its budget policies, which continue to create more and more obstacles for the advancement of women in Canada. Let me tell you that I share this feeling of disappointment that Canadians have about a government that is so insensitive and immoral towards the least fortunate.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to stand in this House today to talk on this important opposition motion, which in a sense can be translated as follows: to examine the negative impact of the 1992 budget on women in Canadian society.

I am particularly proud of my party for having brought forward such an important motion on opposition day, one of significant substance and of great importance to Canadians in general. When I sat down to prepare some notes for reference during this particular address, I was reminded of a response that I prepared recently to a letter that had been written to me asking whether I would consider one of the major issues affecting women in Canadian society today. I want to quote from part of that letter. It reads as follows:

> The major issue must be the recognition that women in Canada, particularly poor women of all ages, are not treated fairly. They are being discriminated against. They do not get support, financial or otherwise, which they need in order to have the same opportunities that men have.

That to me is the fundamental issue that we need to discuss a great deal. It seems to me that this year's budget is but one example of such mistreatment and discrimination.

Since 1984, as the hon. member pointed out, an increasing number of women and children have joined the ranks of the economically disadvantaged. It is a fact that when poverty strikes parents, it strikes their children as well, and it is also a fact that a disproportionate number of women are among the most economically disadvantaged in our society. I think everyone will agree that an alarming number of single-parent families headed by women lack the basic necessities, which to me is entirely unacceptable and in fact intolerable in a society like ours.

I may remind Canadians that 5 million people in this country live at or below the poverty line. One million of these people are children. More than 1.5 million are unemployed and more than 2 million receive social assistance. The situation is very serious indeed. If we look at mothers who are either divorced, separated or single, we realize that 60 per cent are living in poverty. What kind of future do they have for themselves and their children?

I think everyone will acknowledge that the 1992 budget will do nothing to alleviate poverty in this country or to improve the lives of women. In fact, the budget contains a number of measures that will hurt women and children.

I would like to quote the president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, who said that although it was not a direct hit like the 1991 budget, it would hit women much harder on a broader scale.

I would like to mention a number of areas affected by this budget. I remind Canadians that the Conservatives refused to keep their promise to implement a national child care plan. The Conservative Government also scrapped the Court Challenges Program, a decision that affects language minorities, the disabled and, of course, women.

I may also remind Canadians that the decision to review the spouse's allowance is a disgrace.

• (1600)

I also want to mention that wage parity has deteriorated, while the government's rejection of pay equity is completely and totally unacceptable.

Finally, cutbacks in social housing will further undermine the position of the poor. As I said earlier, many of Canada's poor are women.

[English]

For fear of being seen as partisan as I analyse this budget, I want to quote some people who have looked at it. The first quote is by Yvonne Peters, head litigation director for the Canadian Disability Rights Council, who responded to the axing of the Court Challenges Program and said:

> I am outraged. It is getting women who are at the bottom of the ladder.

Another woman, Michelle Salardeau-Ramsay, deputy chief commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, in talking about Ottawa's decision not to provide retroactive pay equity to its lowest paid public servants, said:

> It is the most deceptive and cruel thing coming from government that we have seen in a long time. It is a tremendous blow to the hopes of low income people.

Quoting from the same article, I want to remind my colleagues and fellow Canadians that "when governments tighten their belts it is the poorest and most vulnerable members of society who feel the pinch".

Finally another quote from the same article:

> The war on the deficit has become the cover for rolling back many of the advances women, children, racial minorities, the disabled, the poor and other targets of discrimination have made over the last 20 years and particularly since the passage of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982.

It is most unfortunate that this is happening. It is perhaps another way of trying to counteract the advances made by the charter. I believe that it in fact is exactly that.

I will go on to quote from another article an important commentary that reads as follows:

> Equality and justice are falling out of fashion.

That is what that particular writer had to say. It goes on to say:

> No society which has oppression functions well. Why would government choose a course which will see it having to put more and more money into violent means of control such as police and prisons instead of putting it toward addressing basic inherent injustices?

That is one of the view of the budget. I want to make sure I enter into the record this particular quotation because I think it is fundamental to Canadians and their sense of justice. It talks about equality and states:

> Equality does not mean treating everybody equally. Equality means compensating for differences so that disadvantaged people can attain true equality. Equality for one means greater equality for all.

I could talk, and I suspect I should have about the child tax credit. People have seen it. It is something that is well packaged. It will not help those who are poorest. In fact it will not help those who are at the bottom of the socio-economic scale.

I could have talked about the cuts to social housing. This will not only be reduced substantially, but co-operative housing programs will be eliminated. I am alarmed as well that other Conservative governments such as the Filmon government in Winnipeg is cutting legal aid to those who need it most.

I have not even addressed issues such as——in the media today where we read headlines like "How to guarantee women's safety" and "Aboriginal women struggle to obtain concessions". Why should they have to struggle to obtain concessions?

I want to say a few words about education.

[English]

I know a poor single mom who is at home and wants to upgrade but would have to sell her home in order to do that. She has nowhere to go and she is in fact condemned to a life of poverty.

I know of another single mom working who has two children. The children became ill recently, one at a time. They did not organize it that way. She had a great deal of difficulty getting assistance so that she could go to work. There are very few programs to support her and many others like her.

Turning to child care payments, you and I know, Mr. Speaker, as do millions of other Canadians, that there is roughly $1 billion estimated owed to parents, most of whom are women. Are courts sensitive to mothers when they have to go and attempt to get what is fair, what is just, what they want for their children? No, not too often; in fact not often enough. We know as well that payments are low and payments are not always paid on time. Not only is the mother sacrificed, but the children are being sacrificed.

I could have addressed the whole question of pensions for women. We all know that it is totally inadequate.

I am coming to the end of my remarks. I have two more points to make with respect to rampant violence and abuse that I will make very quickly. I could have talked about sexual, physical and emotional abuse. There are few supports.

We need more counselling facilities for victims of abuse, but I want to congratulate organizations such as Women's Post-Treatment Centre of Winnipeg and Plurielles for providing this kind of support.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, you and I both know that women earn much less than men. This is totally unacceptable. They are often denied opportunities because they are women. They occupy many low paying jobs with no benefits, no future.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we need a new initiative as well as a change of attitude. We must really make a commitment to helping women in our society.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this very important debate today. The motion before us is a non-votable motion, but I think it is worth mentioning here so the people back home know exactly what we are debating. The motion reads:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

That gives us a pretty broad area in which to talk about this government's position with regard to women and our responsibilities as a government.

Where I want to pick that up is in a publication that is going out in my own riding in the next couple of days. I call this publication A Citizen's Guide to the Federal Budget. We introduced a budget in this House a month or so ago. I have taken the budget and broken it down into what I call A Citizen's Guide to the Budget so that people back home will have a sense of what this government is doing for people, particularly families and women.

That document will be arriving in households shortly, probably within the next couple of days. I have used a couple of examples. I think it is important to mention that because these examples were drawn from what might be a reflection of my riding, typical families in my riding or any member's riding, for that matter.

I wanted to indicate clearly in this publication that what the government was doing in regard to the child tax benefit was a net gain for 99 per cent of the families out there, particularly in my riding. The income of a family would have to exceed $70,000 before this program of ours became a negative, before it put it in a negative position with regard to support for the family.

My argument is that very few people in my riding make $70,000 a year. The ones who do and to whom I have spoken have no problem with the new system we have brought in: a child tax benefit which will be less cumbersome for government to control and administer. At the end of the day families in my riding and ridings all across this country will be better off.

I want to point out one example that think is an important one. Today we have heard members from both sides of this House talk about single mothers and the difficulties they have raising families today as a single parent but more particularly as a single mother. In the pamphlet I am sending to my constituents I compare the benefits of Patricia, a fictional person, who is a single working mother with two children and an income of approximately $19,000 a year.

The bottom line as I step through the numbers is a net gain of $615 for that family of three: a mother and two children.

I think the important thing to remember is that these new benefits are non-taxable. When the tax implications of the old system versus the new one are considered, there is no comparison. Therefore that $615 gain could be substantially higher at the end of the tax year.

Again taking a look at the traditional family, the mother and father both working and two children, the combined income is approximately $40,000 per year. At the end of the year after everything is considered, the new system versus the old complex system, as I call it, their net gain would be $163. It is important that the Canadian people understand that.

I do not think the figures as presented in this House always reflect the realities of the budget. The reality of this budget is that we recognized the importance of families and working mothers and have responded to it very favourably.

The other thing I might mention that is important for Canadian people to understand is that for the first time we will be taxing family situations the same. In other words, there will not be an imbalance in the way that we tax a traditional married couple in relation to a common law couple.

Prior to the 1992 budget there was an imbalance. Canadian people were telling us that we did not recognize the importance of the family unit. That was recognized in this budget. It was a very important initiative and one I was happy to support.

There is an area I want to get into in relation to this government that 20 minutes certainly will not cover. It is in relation to women's equality. All budget considerations aside, I want to mention some of the initiatives we have taken.

We realize and it is being realized in some quarters for the first time that there is a lack of concern on the part of all governments in this country, particularly as may be reflected in today's motion, to respond to these women's issues, the equality of women and the basic right to security of the person.

I want to talk about the violence and fear that deprive women in Canada of their ability to achieve equality. When we talk about violence against women we are talking about that violence manifesting itself in horrific ways, everything from physical and sexual assault to psychological and mental abuse. This creates an atmosphere which is almost indescribable in words as to what it does to the family unit and particularly to women.

Let us go through some of the statistics with regard to violence to women in our society. The numbers tell us more than anything else. Statistically we are told that at least one in every ten women is battered by her husband or male partner. We are told that an average of 100 women a year are murdered by their male partners in this country.

Ms. Clancy: That is low.

Mr. Thompson: The member for Halifax is telling me that is low. I do not disagree with her. I am sure that it is very, very low. I am sure those are only the officially reported statistics.

But whether it is 100, 200, 300 or even if it was 50, it would be too many. In the discussions before the Canadian Panel on Violence against Women that is criss-crossing this country, I cannot quote exactly but one person mentioned that if we were speaking of 100 soldiers killed in the line of duty or in battle, there would be an outrage, an investigation or an inquiry as to what happened.

Somehow, this passively goes on in our society. One hundred women are murdered by their male partners, and that figure we all acknowledge is probably on the low side. There were 27,000 sexual assaults reported by the police in 1990. One of the most startling facts is that this figure has actually doubled since 1984.

It says that almost one in two women with disabilities had been sexually abused as a child, that one in four had been sexually assaulted as an adult. It tells us that 80 per cent of aboriginal women surveyed in Ontario have experienced violence. That is 80 per cent. Female victims of elder abuse outnumber male victims two to one.

The figures tell it all. It is horrific. They tell us that innocent victims suffer but it is very important to remember that the toll they pay does not end when the physical abuse stops. When the physical abuse stops, they continue to pay in countless incidents of alcohol and drug abuse, delinquency, prostitution, mental health problems, violent crime and suicide.

The figures tell us that 80 per cent of women in prison under federal jurisdiction today have had a history of physical or sexual abuse.

Putting an end to this violence is certainly one of the most pressing challenges in this country today because the problem has to be recognized before we do something about it.

These old attitudes and stereotypes have to be changed. What we are finding in this country today is that our old traditional abuse combined with a societal tolerance for violence has allowed this type of thing to continue. And continue it has.

One of the things that this government has focused on is the economic equality that has perpetuated itself in this country for years. What it does not do is allow women the freedom to leave abusive situations when they should. Most of us in our own constituencies have all kinds of evidence of that, where women tolerate an abusive situation because there is no other recourse.

One of the things I want to point out is that we are recognizing that very real problem.

One of the things I am very proud of in my home town of St. Stephen was the recognition of that problem many years ago. In fact 10 years ago we set up Fundy Transition House, which is still in existence. It was set up back in the early 1980s in recognition of that very problem where many women cannot leave that abusive situation. They do not have the financial resources to do so.

Fundy Transition House was founded 10 years ago to deal with that very real problem. I want to go through some of the numbers. We must remember that Fundy Transition House is dealing with a community of give or take 20,000 people when all the citizens of Charlotte county are considered.

Since its founding, 1,600 people have gone through its doors. The transition house very much provides a shelter, a clean and safe environment for women and children.

The clients who come in are from all age groups. There are 16-year old girls who have left their homes because of sexual abuse, single mothers with young babies, and women who need emergency housing.

I want to pay tribute to a couple of the individuals that were really the forerunners. I wish I could remember all the names. I know one of them was a man. He is still involved with that organization, Fundy Transition House. The amazing thing is he was one of the first men to recognize that problem 10 years ago. I can honestly ask that question in this House as to how many of us had recognized that problem 10 years ago. There would not be too many of us who could answer that we had.

His name is Al Corbett. He is still involved with Fundy Transition House. The woman who now is the chairman of the transition house, Jackie Matthews, brought to my attention a few weeks ago that he is still on the board.

Like many other members of Parliament in their own ridings, I have visited the transition house in St. Stephen to take a look at how it operates and just to take a look at the physical structure itself. I was very impressed. It is doing a very good job.

We have the same thing happening in the northern part of my riding. This is a part of the response by our government to that problem. It is a program that is administered by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It funds a program called Project Haven. What it has done over the last number of years is set up 450 shelters for battered women across this country and 94 of these shelters have been for aboriginal women on reserves.

Those programs are working very well. They are carried out largely by volunteers in their own communities. The haven that we opened last year in Woodstock is a glowing example of how successful that program has been.

There are many more programs. Again they have touched just about every corner of this country. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs has its own special programs, along with Health and Welfare Canada in its medical services branch. The Department of the Solicitor General has developed over 70 programs from coast to coast to deal with this problem. The Department of Justice is playing a very key role in addressing violence against women in amendments to the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.

We have done a great deal in recognizing the problem and in dealing with the problem, but have we done enough? I would say that we probably have not done enough. Can we do more? Absolutely, we can do more.

One of the important things that we are doing right now at this time is recognizing that the problem is there. We have set up our task force as I have mentioned to criss-cross this country to get the kind of evidence and public awareness generated in this country to do more in the future.

The stories that come out of these hearings that we have been holding coast to coast are just incredible. It is just so hard to believe that these types of things happen to women in a civilized society, Canada being one of the most civilized of all societies. These things are happening and they are being exposed, sometimes for the first time.

It is recognition of a problem that is long overdue. It is going to allow the government to respond in ways that it has not been able to in the past.

I look forward to a continuation of this debate. I look forward also to questions and responses from the other side of the House.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is a little surprising that some of the things the member identifies would be surprising to him. They are things that are well-known across this country and are certainly well-known to women, both the experience of poverty and the experience of abuse. Governments have not taken these matters seriously.

While it is good that he raised these issues, it is a little disconcerting that he would be surprised by them.

I would like to ask him a couple of questions. He talked about circulating to his constituents some indications of the budget and what that budget does. I wonder what he is saying to his constituents who earn less than $3,750 and who will not get an extra cent out of the government's child benefits program. Did he indicate to them that that is acceptable, that the poorest of the poor will not get one extra cent out of this program?

Did he indicate to his constituents that health and welfare officials admitted that children and families whose income is derived from social assistance, welfare or unemployment insurance will be no better off under this new system than they were under the old system? The families in the worst financial situations will receive nothing in these changes.

The member will have voted along with me in favour of a resolution put forward by my former leader which called upon the House to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. Does he think that these measures will have any impact at all on eliminating child poverty by the year 2000? In fact, is there anything here which is heading us in the right direction?

May I ask just one last question? Does the member not realize that the extra violence women are facing, children are facing and families are facing, the extra insecurity that families are living under, is the result of the strapped financial situations?

As we all know, more Canadian children live in poverty than at the beginning of this government's term. Does the member not understand that part of the reason for having to address the concerns of violence, more halfway houses and so on, is because of the poverty that this government has created over its last eight years?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, it is a wide-ranging question and observation on the part of the member. I will attempt to do justice to the question.

The best thing that we can do as a country is to develop a strong and healthy economy. That is what will pull people up. We can have a wide range of programs but the thing that will do it is a strong and vibrant economy. That is the difficulty I have at this particular point in the history of this country. We have 1.5 million unemployed in this country. The figure has not yet exceeded the last recession that we went through in 1981–82 but we cannot take too much comfort from that, can we.

The fact is we have too much unemployment and it has a huge social cost attached to it. There is a relationship between violence in the home and the hardship a particular family is facing on a day to day basis in terms of unemployment and lack of opportunity and the inability of a family to pay its bills or meet its obligations. Those are huge social costs at the end of the day.

Again I go back to the budget. The budget is not the be-all or the end-all of our problems. It is a pretty good start. It recognizes for the first time the family unit. It recognizes children as it has not in the past. That is only one component in the budget. Members have to remember that all federal programs have matching or other support programs within the provinces which help those families on the lower income scales.

I do not pretend that our budget did it all or will do it all, or will it ever do it all, but I think it is a good start. In conjunction with existing provincial programs I think they are working better now than they ever did in the past because we need them now.

Again, reflecting on that huge unemployment number out there, we hope it gets better, and we hope that the Canadian economy will grow as they predict it will. Every major think tank in Canada and internationally, including the IMF, predicts that Canada's economy will grow faster than any other economy in the western world this year. We hope they are correct in that, not for partisan political reasons but because that is the best we can hope for the citizens of Canada, a strong and healthy economy.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the member spoke so glowingly and with such feeling about violence against women that I expected him to end his speech by announcing that his government had decided to put some money in the budget for it. He did not talk about any new provisions to deal with the problem and I suspect it is because there are none.

In fact, if the member's government had not so dramatically cut funding to women's organizations that advocate and bring to public attention these issues a couple of years ago, and had not continued to cut funding to those organizations, he might not be so surprised by what he is now hearing. It has been well known to women's organizations but unfortunately they have been robbed of the means to convey that information to public policymakers like the hon. member.

Since the debate today is on the budget and on women, I have a question I want to ask.

Can he and his government tell me and tell Canadian women how much of the spending in this budget goes to benefit women—and I don't mean child care and I don't mean pay equity—but over all, in all the hundreds of millions and billions of dollars this budget spends? How many of those dollars benefit women and how many benefit men?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I want to step through some statistics. We are always hesitant to use too many statistics when we are speaking because it gets confusing for the average viewer who is trying to sort this out whether we are doing enough or not doing enough. But I want to go through a couple of statistics, if I may.

It goes back to 1986 when the government launched a $23 million child sexual abuse initiative, followed up in 1988 by a broader $40 million family violence initiative. This time last year we expanded that to a $136 million initiative.

I do not want to play at the percentages, but when you are moving from $23 million to $136 million, that is somewhere close to a 700 per cent increase. I think it is important that we get that on the record.

The other thing that I want to get on the record is that the Department of Secretary of State has funded close to 400 individual projects for women as well as community projects. They have helped support non-profit organizations and sponsored many other initiatives for women. Those all have a dollar figure attached to them, and as I said, I am not going to step through all of those. But I think we have committed as much as reasonably possible, given the times.

I wish that the Canadian economy was growing the way it should be and that we did not have a mountain of debt over us. Perhaps if we did not, we could resolve this because a lot of these problems will take dollars to resolve them, no question about it. I do not think anyone would argue that. I just wish that our economy was so healthy that we could put the financial resources into those problem areas that I would like to see put into them. Given the capability of our economy and the Canadian people, I think we will find a very healthy and prosperous economy 12 months from now. We will continue to upgrade our programs and to put the kind of resources into them that we all want to see.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I in the Liberal Party, as you have heard today, are extremely concerned about the government's budget and its failure to promote and protect the rights of Canadian women.

We know that women are particularly vulnerable to the draconian economic policies of this government. We know that most women have much lower incomes than men. We know that women make up a very large segment of the people living in poverty in this country. We know, for example, that more than 60 per cent of single mothers in Canada live in poverty. That is a shocking and shameful statistic. That kind of figure is a real embarrassment for a country which prides itself on its compassion and commitment to equality.

Knowing the situation, what kind of support did this government offer to Canadian women in its February budget? It offered absolutely nothing to help unemployed women get back in the work force. It abandoned its commitment to day care. It reneged on its commitment to pay equity for federal public servants. It cancelled the Court Challenges Program. It abandoned its commitment to the universal family allowance.

This budget has confirmed what many women have long suspected, that this government's commitment to equality for women is nothing more than empty symbolism and meaningless rhetoric. Actions speak louder than words and it is on the government's actions that it will be judged by the women of Canada.

I want to concentrate my comments on one of these measures that I find particularly disturbing, the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. The cancellation of this program is an outrage that shows a callous disregard for the rights of Canadian women. It was a unique human rights program that helped give disadvantaged Canadians access to their constitutional rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The program has helped fund court cases for groups wanting to test the equality rights section of the charter. This is important because it establishes legal precedents that help prevent discrimination. The program has made the crucial difference between access to charter rights and no access. The program has benefited all Canadians and particularly disadvantaged groups in societies such as women. Groups, such as the Women's Legal and Education Action Fund, have used the programs to bring a number of important women's rights cases to the courts.

For example, on the very same day that the program was cancelled, the Supreme Court of Canada came down with the first high court decision in the world that linked hard core pornography with violence against women and decided that this should be a factor to consider in Canada's obscenity law.

The Women's Legal and Education Action Fund intervention in this case was funded by the Court Challenges Program. This intervention was crucial to the court's recognition of the harmful effects of pornography on women. In many cases, groups like this could not afford on their own the legal costs of initiating a court challenge. The total cost of this program is about $2 million a year or about seven cents per Canadian.

According to the Canadian Bar Association, the program ensures that equality rights are clearly defined in the Constitution and enforced for all Canadians. Constitutional rights which are neither defined nor enforced are hollow and of little value. The bar association said it was a sad irony that the program was terminated the day before the release of the special joint committee on a renewed Canada which addressed the issues of inclusiveness and constitutional equality rights.

I believe that the cancellation of this program is a very negative signal to be sending out at this time in our country's history. Just as we are approaching the conclusion of important and very difficult national discussions on our constitutional rights, the government is showing that its commitment to those rights is questionable.

Women's groups were already uneasy and concerned that they did not have an adequate voice in the process of constitutional reform. They are even more concerned now.

• (1640)

Even the distinguished former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson has called for the program's reinstatement. She has written to the Minister of Justice to express her dismay and distress over the cancellation of the program. I want to quote from her letter:

> I fully appreciate, of course, that all governments are currently in a period of financial restraint but I must say that I have difficulty with a policy that places the burden of that restraint on those who can least afford it.

The government has suggested this move was made because the program has served its purpose. Enough jurisprudence has been established. Legal experts have contradicted that claim. Many significant cases have yet to be heard and many of these will not be heard without funding from the Court Challenges Program.

The Canadian Bar Association, a retired Supreme Court justice, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, and countless other human rights groups across this country seem to disagree. I am not aware of any credible legal expert who does support the government's position.

Only two years ago, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons agreed unanimously that this program should be renewed. In a response tabled by the Minister of Multiculturalism the government said:

> There are still significant areas of language and equality rights which require clarification.

The government agreed to renew the program for a five-year period. What has happened since that time to change the government's position on this program?

The Minister of Justice has suggested that the government itself could fulfil the function of the program by supporting litigation on human rights cases. I have asked the government how exactly this would work, but I have received no response. It is anyone's guess. It would clearly be a conflict of interest for the justice department to challenge and defend the law at the same time. That is one of the main reasons why this program was established as an autonomous agency.

The Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, of which I am a member, has called the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to appear as witnesses before our committee to answer questions concerning the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

The ministers have replied that they are unavailable. We have invited them to appear at any time at their convenience. They have sent their deputy ministers instead. I believe this shows a lack of respect for this parliamentary committee. I certainly can understand why they are reluctant to answer questions on this issue, because they would have to defend the indefensible. No doubt they are aware that our committee strongly supports this program, even Conservative Party members of the committee.

The Minister of Justice, who has a reputation as a supporter of women's rights, must find her position extremely uncomfortable. But as ministers of the Crown, it is their responsibility to explain and defend this decision of the government.

Members of my party have been asking ourselves the question: Why? Why has the government taken this callous step against the human rights for women and other disadvantaged groups? What is the real reason that this program has been cancelled? Let me say that no one believes it is really because of deficit reduction, or because there is enough jurisprudence. No one is buying these explanations.

I find it an extremely disturbing coincidence that the leader of the Reform Party had called for elimination of this program. It was very apparent to everyone in this House that the government's budget was carefully designed to win back Conservative supporters lost to the Reform Party.

It certainly gives an indication of the Reform Party's lack of commitment to human rights. But even more disturbing it raises the question: Who is in charge here? Who is running this government? Is it the Prime Minister or is it Preston Manning?

More and more it seems like it does not really make much difference. The two parties are not all that different anyway, the main difference being that the Reform Party is a more extreme version of Mulroneyism.

I referred earlier to the economic disparities between men and women in this country. When we see the shocking figures we realize that we have a long way to go before true equality for women is achieved. True equality includes economic equality. It means equality in everyday life, equality in practice, not just in theory.

We see very clearly the need for initiatives like the Court Challenges Program.

We constantly hear this government boasting about its record on women's issues. That is not good enough. Actions speak louder than words.

We in the Liberal Party condemn this government for its budget and its shocking lack of commitment for equality for women in Canada.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in this House today in support of the opposition motion of my colleague, the member for Halifax, which reads:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

Before I deal with that issue specifically, let me just say something with respect to the budget. As we all know, really the budget was a do-nothing budget. It was a one-day wonder that neither captured the attention of the Canadian public nor met the needs of the Canadian public.

In fact 1.5 million Canadians are still unemployed, most of whom are women. It did absolutely nothing for the people on social assistance, most of whom are women. It did absolutely nothing for small businesses which are finding themselves in very difficult circumstances and which are also headed by women. The budget in actual fact did very little to solve the economic ills of this country.

I want to focus my comments in the time that I have this evening on discussing how the budget and its attention to housing will have and has a profound effect on women.

The impact of the federal budget on women is not a direct blow aimed specifically at this segment of the population. It is an insidious one that affects numerous programs that many Canadian women depend on.

Federal budget cuts to housing programs are a perfect example of this. Many Canadians who depend on federal transfer payments to the provinces for social housing programs are single parent families, the vast majority of whom are headed by women.

These cuts also affect single seniors, many of whom are women struggling for self-sufficiency and independence as they age.

In the last budget this government cut spending for social housing. These cuts will result in more than a 51 per cent reduction in the development of new units in the next three years.

Currently only 6 per cent of Canadians receive assistance through social housing budgets. But there are still 15 per cent of Canadians, over one million people, in need of adequate and affordable shelter.

These cuts will mean that fewer Canadians will receive assistance through the Rent Supplement Program or the Non-Profit Housing Program. Fewer natives will receive assistance through the Urban Native Program or Rural and Native Housing Program. All these programs help women throughout Canada.

Women who live in the have not provinces are even more dependent on federal transfer payments because provincial inputs were minuscule to begin with and they decline as federal inputs decline.

A study conducted by CMHC in the 1980s concluded that there have been few improvements in finding affordable housing for single parent families led by women. The study said:

> Low economic status, discrimination in the job market and the responsibilities of child rearing as primarily female problems continue to affect affordable, adequate housing for these Canadian families.

Single parent families headed by women continue to face discrimination when it comes to finding affordable shelter. This problem is compounded by the drop in income this group is continually subject to.

According to the most recent Statistics Canada figures, families in which a woman is the sole parent experienced a drop in average income down to $22,000 a year. Six out of ten single parent families headed by women live in poverty, up from a year ago when five out of ten lived in poverty.

These statistics are a testament to the needs of these women and their children. These are the Canadians on waiting lists for non-profit housing, for rent supplement programs or for co-operative housing units which this government killed in the 1992 budget. Co-op housing is not a viable option for women and others because this program has been gutted by this government.

CMHC has estimated that the recent budget cuts will translate into 7,650 fewer new units of social housing in Canada this year alone. These budget cuts will mean that the vast majority of these single parent families will continue to live in poverty.

There was one CMHC housing program which had 60 per cent of all of its projects with targeting to single parent families. The Co-Operative Housing Program offered stability of tenure and guaranteed affordability. It provided tenants with the opportunity to live in a community of mixed incomes. It did not offer public housing which is essentially ghetto housing.

The Co-Operative Housing Program does not just provide shelter to these women. It provides strong community support. It is a cost efficient program with numerous benefits. It was eliminated in this government's recent budget, as I mentioned before.

Canada's first Co-Operative Housing Program was introduced in 1973 under a Liberal government. In 1986 this government was so impressed with the success of the program that it promised to produce 5,000 units of co-op housing a year, but this goal was never achieved. Instead, under this government the number of co-op units constructed has declined and funding for the program has been in jeopardy for the last two years.

Funding for the 1992 program was no different. After extensive lobbying by housing groups and Liberal MPs, the Minister of Public Works announced on December 15, 1991 that funding for the co-op housing program would be renewed with a budget of $6.1 million.

As recently as February 19, less than a week before the budget was introduced in the House of Commons, the same minister confirmed in writing that the co-op housing budget was secure. Based on his assurances, co-op groups across the country proceeded with the development of co-operative housing proposals. In an attempt to justify this broken promise the government is claiming that the co-op housing program is not targeted to those in need of affordable housing.

On March 11, 1992 the Minister of Finance criticized the co-op housing program during Question Period when he said:

> How is it that it is well targeted when 50 per cent of those who occupy these units are not in effect qualified under the provisions of social housing?

The minister is revealing his ignorance of the co-op housing program. He is correct when he states that 50 per cent of those who occupy co-op housing units are not qualified for social housing. What he failed to acknowledge is that this same 50 per cent of occupants really pays market rent for their co-ops. These units are not subsidized by the government. It is the other 50 per cent that is targeted by the funding.

This statement by the Minister of Finance also contradicts his own colleague, the minister responsible for housing who said in his December press release that the co-op program was targeted. Again I quote:

> The revised program will make more effective use of scarce tax dollars, ensuring federal subsidies are fully directed toward a mix of low and moderate income families.

These statements show that the government praised the co-op housing program a few months ago, and now the Minister of Finance is making excuses for eliminating a successful and cost effective program.

It appears that this government is willing to alter its conclusions of a program in order to justify its decisions.

In his March 11 comments the Minister of Finance also stated that the government had done enough to stimulate housing through its introduction to the use of RRSPs for down payments on homes and by allowing 5 per cent down payments for first-time home buyers.

While I applaud the government for introducing these two programs that I personally promoted for a year, along with my party, I note that these programs help those Canadians who have the savings to purchase a home.

Canadians who cannot afford to purchase homes have access to secure tenure if they live in a co-op housing unit. This program meets the needs of a different segment of Canadians: those who want to live in secure accommodations but cannot buy their own homes.

The $6.1 million savings that the government will obtain by cutting the co-op housing program may appear to be well worth while, but the consequences of the cuts is the elimination of 4,000 construction jobs and manufacturing jobs in 1992. In these tough economic times, adding to welfare and unemployment expenditures will do nothing to reduce the deficit.

The termination of the co-op housing program is really an abdication by this government of its responsibilities to provide adequate and affordable shelter to Canadians in a healthy community environment. The program is cost efficient and offers affordable housing and mixed income communities to low income earners, seniors, single parents, natives and the disabled, most of whom are women. Many of these groups would be unable to find adequate shelter in the private marketplace.

There are 164,000 Canadians who are on a waiting list for co-op housing units. The private market is not serving all these Canadians. This government must keep its promise to housing groups and provide $6.1 million for new co-op housing commitments to help those women and children.

Shelter is one of the basic needs of all humans and the private sector has failed a large group of poor Canadians.

Social housing and co-operative housing were developed to meet the special needs of various groups: single parent mothers and their children, elderly women living alone, native women and disabled women. All are looking to break the cycle of poverty.

Stability of tenure and adequate shelter are necessary to meet these goals. This is why the co-op housing program and social housing program are essential to many Canadians, particularly women and children. The recent budget cuts to these programs will seriously curtail the development of much needed housing for those Canadians most in need.

That is why we condemn the actions of this government for its lack of support in the budget for housing programs to especially help women and their children.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from London East.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, he was in the forefront when the national Liberal task force on housing worked on this issue about two years ago.

I remember this member saying that social housing ought to be the cornerstone of Canada's social policy. I agree. He indicated the tremendous benefits that this program would offer Canadians, particularly women and the poor. In fact, without affordable housing, we are condemning a family to poverty.

With such a good program as co-op housing, I would like to ask the member why he thinks this government deliberately killed this program. Is it because it was a Liberal legacy or just that this government does not care about women and children?

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that question and those kind remarks.

I think it is a bit of both. The co-op housing program was a very successful program, as acknowledged by this government because it has been committed to this program for the last five years. While it never delivered the number of units that it promised, the fact remains that there is a wealth of support from the government members for the co-op housing program.

There is no doubt that a number of government backbenchers tried to portray co-op housing as a program that was not well targeted, that it in fact allowed people with higher incomes to live in co-op housing and take advantage of certain subsidies. The fact remains that co-op housing is not only a form of social housing, it is a kind of community living.

To be able to say that the poor, especially women and children, should be relegated to public housing projects where 100 per cent of the people are targeted and receiving subsidies is to not deal with the facts that a mixed income community with positive social reinforcements would be beneficial to women and to their children.

I still believe that the minister of state for housing is very supportive of co-op housing. We believe and hope that women and men, of course, those who believe in co-op housing, will in fact pressure this government to restore the funding.

Co-op housing has existed in the world for a great many decades. In fact, it is a form of housing tenure, and it is something of which we should not lose sight. The whole concept and philosophy of co-operative living is something that we should encourage and not reject by cutting the budget.

My colleague spoke about our task force. We have put forward our support for the co-op housing program. We urge the government to restore the funding. I believe it is committed to helping people who require housing. It seems to have this convoluted perception, unfortunately, that it has no responsibility, that the private marketplace and the provincial governments should perhaps look after social housing.

That is the tragedy of this government's action with respect to the budget cuts on housing.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this motion today.

I think it is useful at this point, after a few hours of talking about it, that we just read the motion again.

That is:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as reflected in the 1992 budget.

• (1700)

I certainly commend the hon. member for Halifax for putting forward a motion which I am sure in her view is a correct and constructive one. She has spoken at length and with passion and sincerity about the rights of women in Canadian society. I would say that the spirit behind this motion is probably a laudable one.

The hon. member has heard me praise her I am sure and will remember that as well. The spirit behind the motion I think is a very laudable one and the member is to be congratulated. To further the cause of women in Canadian society is of course what we ought to be doing and devoting a lot of time and attention to.

Unfortunately, the hon. member has done two things wrong in her motion. First, I think she has picked the wrong government and second, I think she has picked the wrong target, namely the 1992 budget.

I would like to speak for a couple of minutes about some of the elements of the budget, some of the things that it was trying to accomplish and some of the ways that the budget is trying to address some of the concerns that prompted the hon. member in all her sincerity and good intentions to put forward a motion which unfortunately misses the mark.

To start with, it is important to remember that this budget cuts taxes, in fact $1.2 billion will be the reduction in 1992. Cutting taxes helps reduce or remove partially some of the burden that is placed on Canadian families and that is going to have the net benefit of putting more money into household budgets and helping. A tax cut is better than a tax increase. We have had years of tax increases for many reasonable reasons.

Mr. Speaker wishes me to conclude? I just started, sir. Will I have an opportunity to complete my remarks later?

Mr. Speaker: I wish to say to the hon. member that I apologize for interrupting the hon. member. We have had a message from the Senate and we are obligated to deal with that. The hon. member will I hope be able to continue with his remarks afterward. Again I do apologize.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Rideau Hall,
Ottawa

March 31, 1992

Mr. Speaker:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Beverley McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 31st day of March, 1992 at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General.

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1720)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-64, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act—Chapter No. 6.

Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan—Chapter No. 9.

Bill C-65, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1992—Chapter No. 7.

Bill C-66, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1993—Chapter No. 8.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Clancy (p. 9052).

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, addressing the motion of the hon. member for Halifax that this House condemn the government for its failure to protect and promote the fundamental rights of Canadian women, particularly as expressed in the 1992 budget, I would like to continue my remarks.

I had just mentioned the personal tax cut of $1.2 billion which comes into effect next year as being a significant benefit to a lot of Canadian households and therefore to a number of Canadian women.

The second point I would like to stress in terms of this budget is the child benefit plan. I know a number of members opposite have railed at this particular change, particularly because they feel that it may spell the end to universality of social programs.

Some of us do not think that is such a bad thing. The reason is that in a world of limited governmental resources, it is important that we try to target those resources to the people who need them and this child tax benefit plan change is an attempt to do that.

It is important for Canadian women and Canadian families not to lose sight of the fact that this will provide benefits for children up to 18 years of age. It is guaranteed to come every month and it is tax-free. It makes a lot of sense. We will be sending up to $144 per child to families in the form almost of a guaranteed monthly income.

We are getting off this crazy path that we were on before where we blanketed society with universal cheques and then we took the time to tax it all back, but only from certain individuals.

It makes more sense to identify those people in our society who need these resources than to target those resources to those people and not hassle them by trying to tax it back. It makes a lot of sense.

Let us not forget as well that in this particular budget, tax breaks are being increased for child care. An extra $1,000 a year in terms of a child care expense deduction is being given to Canadian families. So combined with the child benefit plan and combined with the cut in the number of taxes or the amount of taxation that that particular family pays, that is a pretty powerful three-pronged attack on some of the problems that are faced by a number of Canadian families these days.

Beyond that of course the budget brought in the home buyers plan. The ability now of a married couple to utilize up to $40,000 in terms of RRSPs for a down payment is a significant benefit to a lot of people who are trying to get into the housing market. It certainly helps affordability and for first-time home buyers this is a very important incentive for them to get out into the marketplace.

Combined with other things that are very important here, the 5 per cent down payment change which the government recently made allows that 95 per cent of the property can be mortgaged. Again, that helps first-time buyers. It helps young struggling families get into the real estate market, get into a house. It helps them to start building equity for the future, looking after stabilizing their housing costs and providing a stable environment in which to raise children. It just makes a lot of sense to help young couples get into housing.

The third element of that is today's mortgage rates. They made a little blip up there a week and a half ago but they are back down now essentially to levels about the lowest they have been in 20 years.

When those three things are considered together, using RRSP funds, 5 per cent down payment and low mortgage rates today, I think we are doing a lot to try and increase the affordability of housing for these young families.

The first thrust of the budget was to try to put more money into the hands of Canadian families, particularly those who need it. The second thrust of the budget was to help those families get into the real estate market, help them get into a house so they can build equity for the future.

The budget, of course, went beyond that in terms of measures to address concerns of families and middle class Canadians. For example, we have more tax fairness being brought into the system right now.

It used to be the case that common law couples had significant tax advantages over traditional married couples. A lot of us thought that was wrong. The budget ends those tax advantages that were enjoyed by common law couples and we applaud that.

As an aside, there are those of us who would like the government to go further. It is still the situation in this country now that if there are two families, family A and family B and both have an income of let us say $50,000 and family A has one income earner and family B has two income earners, the way the tax system is structured now family B with the same amount of income and with two wage earners instead of one is taxed less heavily than family A. A number of us think that is wrong. We would like to see the government change that at some point down the road.

Other measures in the budget that Canadian women would applaud is a $2.2 billion reduction in the defence budget. I have certainly heard a lot of Canadian women say they would rather see the government's limited precious resources spent on improving the social climate, the social environment for Canadian families rather than maintaining troops in Europe.

The government's decision to now bring those troops back and to cut defence spending is one that is going to be applauded by a lot of Canadian women.

In fact, government spending over all is going to be significantly cut, a $7 billion reduction over the next five years. Why is that important to Canadian women? It is important because we are maintaining our ability to fund our own social programs. That is the most important thing. If the government over-spends it puts at risk its ability to fund those things we really believe in and I know the hon. member for Halifax believes in and why she put this motion forward.

Reducing the size and influence of government is most important. The budget addresses this one head on. Forty-six boards, agencies and commissions of the federal government are going to be axed or merged together in what is a real common sense move.

All government departments are going to have their budgets cut de facto by 3 per cent across the board. They are just going to have to do better. They are going to have to be more efficient; they are going to have to deliver their services will less redundancy.

Grants and subsidies are being cut in this budget by another $370 million. Even the Prime Minister and members of cabinet are taking a cut in pay in this budget. Therefore, the size and influence of government itself is coming down.

As well, the budget attempts to help the economy, to help small business to create jobs. The tax rate for manufacturers and processors is being cut by 1 per cent from 23 to 22 per cent and then further by another 1 per cent next year. Equipment write-off can be accelerated by 5 per cent.

Why does that matter to Canadian women? Because small businesses create jobs and a lot of those jobs go to Canadian women. It is important to Canadian women to have a sound economy and a strong, vibrant small business sector.

Back to the motion. The hon. member for Halifax says she wants to promote, protect and expand fundamental rights for women. Let me just run through how some of the things in the budget address those fundamental rights of women.

The budget attempts to stabilize the economy to ensure that we have secure funding for social programs. That is a fundamental right for a social safety net which we are promoting in this budget for Canadian women.

• (1730)

The budget attempts to help create jobs and helps small businesses through a tax cut. That helps Canadian women by enhancing their fundamental right to secure employment, to jobs. Canadian women want to work. They want jobs just as Canadian men do and the budget helps them in that regard.

The budget reduces people's tax burdens. That increases and enhances the fundamental rights of women to have secure income, to have a reasonable amount of their own wages in their own pockets to spend for their families, for their children.

This budget helps people purchase houses. That is important. Women, the same as men, want secure accommodation. They want access to the housing market and they want to build equity for the future.

This budget targets public resources to effective child care. That enhances women's fundamental rights to assistance for those people who need it. That is very important.

This budget reduces the size of government. That is important to Canadian women. Canadian women want their rights not to be overburdened by enhanced bureaucracy. The government does that.

These are the fundamental rights for women. The right to secure social programs guaranteed by the budget's austerity; by the budget's responsibility; by the budget's adherence to ethical financial principles. It just enhances our ability to fund our social programs.

This budget enhances women's right to work. The budget enhances women's right to fair taxation. The budget enhances women's right to decent accommodation, to access to the housing market. The budget enhances women's right to assistance for those who need it. The budget also enhances the right of all of us, men and women equally, not to be overburdened by government.

The budget realizes that social problems cannot be solved by throwing money at them, especially money that we do not have, that has to be borrowed and then has to be repaid through higher taxes in the future.

It is not in women's best interests to have high tax and high spending. Canadian women are no different from Canadian men in that regard. We all want taxes to be lower to have more money in our own pockets and more money for our families.

Let me conclude by saying this final point. I am sure there are a number of Canadian women who have been watching this debate and who have found it offensive.

Members of the opposition would have us believe through their speeches that all Canadian women are poor, disadvantaged, or victims of society. They would have us believe that women are not entrepreneurial, that they do not share an interest in the economy, that they need to be propped-up, supported, helped and assisted, and that they have extra government money and programs devoted to them.

Not all women are clients of food banks or trapped in cycles of poverty. A lot of women are successful. They run their families in a very reasonable way. They hold responsible jobs in private and public sectors. There are many women who would be insulted by being lumped in with visible minorities and disabled. There are a lot of women who want this House to know that they are proud, self-sufficient Canadians who are contributors to society and who support the budget of 1992.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, if I could just ask the member who just spoke to substantiate his contention that this is a good budget for women, that in fact it will help women in the work place and help women in their ability to access adequate housing and so on.

Would he indicate how women could possibly be assisted in the work place by the resolution in this budget of putting the last nail in the coffin of the national child care system in Canada? How does that help women in the work place particularly after the comments of the Prime Minister in 1988 and many other times about how important and critical child care is for women to be able to access the employment market.

I presume on the basis of the comments he just made that he disagrees with the Prime Minister's contention about the importance of child care in the work place.

How could finally deciding not to have a national child care system help women in the work place? How could the decision to ignore a Human Rights Tribunal decision, should it rule against the government on pay equity in the civil service, help women in the work place?

On those two matters, how could the budget help women in the work place? It seems to be a very contorted view of this. Certainly from the comments of women on this side of the House and women from outside groups, it would seem to be hard to sustain.

With regard to the government's final decision to renege on its promise to increase co-operative housing to 5,000 units a year, how will ending the Co-operative Housing Program help women in the housing market?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I think the budget attempts to address some fundamentals in society, rather than throwing money at some social problems as a temporary solution.

The budget tries to find more permanent and viable solutions to some of our social problems. In terms of child care, the government has decided not to proceed with financing child care. The simplest and most effective answer to how that will benefit Canadian women is that in order to implement the child care program, it was estimated that the Government of Canada would have had to find roughly $3 billion a year to finance it.

We would have found that money either by raising taxes or diverting spending in some other areas. We are certainly open to suggestions as to where $3 billion additional can be found for that. Certainly I think raising taxes is an unacceptable solution to most Canadians.

It would appear the money would most likely be found by deficit financing, as the opposition members would encourage. Deficit financing means we borrow the money. Right now we are borrowing money to pay the interest on money we already borrowed. It is a ridiculous situation. Canada cannot continue in that way, therefore I think deficit financing is not the answer.

How does this decision help Canadian women? It helps Canadian women the same way it helps Canadian men and the same way it helps Canadian children. It will stabilize the economy, help to get our fiscal house in order, and make sure future generations do not have to pay in excess of what they should for the delivery of that day's services, the way today's taxpayers are paying a lot more than they should.

The government has an operating surplus this year of $12 billion. We take in $12 billion more in taxes than we spend, but the interest on the debt is $43 billion this year. That is a legacy from the past. It is a $43 billion monster.

It wipes out the $12 billion surplus and puts us back in the hole. If we were to continue in this way, taxpayers in the future would be even more burdened. Canadian women and children in the future would have even fewer resources available from any future government of any political stripe to help them. That is the answer to the member's question.

You have to be responsible, or else the social programs are going to collapse. You know that. The hon. member across the way is very devoted to social programs, and that is fine. I salute him for that. I have no problem with that whatsoever. But if we allow our ability to fund those programs to be shattered by financial or fiscal irresponsibility, who wins? It is not a political issue any more. It is just common sense.

I do not think politicizing the fact that we have high debt interest payments is going to help Canadian women and children at all. Let us face the facts and cut through the rhetoric here. If you go bankrupt, you cannot fund your social programs, and if you cannot fund your social programs it is the people at the bottom of society who get smacked. They are the ones the hon. member in the New Democratic Party is trying to look out for. It makes no sense.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are still a couple of minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the member just indicated it is common sense. Well it is common sense to look at the cause of the problem and not treat the symptoms of the problem as in medicine.

Abuses of children and women are symptoms of the problem. One of the major causes is the lack of an affordable, universally accessible child care program in the country. We must address the basic cause of the problem and not the symptoms.

I am glad to hear the member admit that the deficit of the day has been the legacy of the past. I think he knows the years from 1984 to now are past. He has admitted that, and I am glad.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, every nickel of the increase in the debt of Canada since 1984 can be accounted for by interest on the debt that existed before. It is called the magic of compound interest. Anyone who wants to put $100 in his RSP today and have only common interest accrue on it and look at the amount that is there in seven years will see that it has doubled.

It is the magic of compound interest and the member should look into some simple mathematical tables on it. I know he is a doctor so maybe he has not had time but it would really enhance his education.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is of special interest to me to follow the member for Halton—Peel. I want to pick up on his comment that because the problem is poverty, it is not going to be solved by throwing money at it.

I can only quote a woman I have known and admired for many years who has lived with poverty, raised her children with it, and has said frequently: "When the problem is poverty I can't think of anything better to throw at it than money".

The member spoke about women's right to social programs. We have to address in this country why we look at social programs as a woman's right. The fact is that we look at social programs as a right of women and children because it is women and children who are poor in our society. It starts from the time they are young and continues until they are old. Two-thirds of the elderly poor in this country are women. The vast majority of the working poor in this country are women. The vast majority of single parent women are poor.

We are here to talk about the budget. The budget more than any other document or bill or piece of business that comes before this House is a statement of a country's and a government's priorities.

It is a statement of its commitment to the equitable distribution of the resources that we pool as a society, to the benefit of all Canadians.

I want to address how this budget stacks up when it comes to a fair and equitable share of public spending in this country for women.

My colleague from Halifax has put forward a motion that condemns the government for its disregard for the fundamental rights of Canadian women, especially as expressed in this budget.

This debate has several dimensions and I am going to start first with those aspects of the budget that go directly to the issue of human rights. This budget is bad news for human rights, and bad news for human rights is bad news for women.

This budget, more than anything I have seen come before this House, is a direct attack on the very commitment of Canadians to human rights through their government and all the institutions that protect those human rights.

It has been 15 years since the first Human Rights Act was passed, 10 years since the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was passed and 5 years since the Employment Equity Act was passed, yet women and other groups in our society still do not enjoy full equality. This budget is a concerted attack on their efforts to ever enjoy full equality.

Under the Canadian Human Rights Act, the role of the Human Rights Commission is to make sure that government policies and programs conform with equality and human rights. If that commission rules that 70,000 women working for the Public Service of Canada are entitled to pay equity, this government will not pay it. This government will ignore the Human Rights Commission. Not only that, but this government will use Parliament to pass a new law so it does not have to respect the human rights of women.

The lack of pay equity is one of the main contributors to the poverty of women.

Second, the government has said it is not going to listen to what the Supreme Court of Canada says when it comes to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Right now the government primarily discriminates against women based on whether they are married or single in terms of their entitlement to a spousal allowance between the ages of 60 and 64. That case is now before the courts.

The government has said, even though the Supreme Court may find that this legislation discriminates on the basis of marital status, it is not going to implement a decision of the Supreme Court. It is going to change the laws so it does not have to pay attention to the Supreme Court on people's equality rights. That same decision no doubt will be applied if the government wishes to choose to ignore the Supreme Court, if it rules in favour of divorced and separated spouses, in the case of arguing for equal entitlement to pensions from the pensioners to whom they were married for most of the time the pension asset was being built up by that pensioner.

The third thing the government has said is that it is cancelling the Court Challenges Program.

As I said, it is a decade since we have had a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country, and yet most of the cases that have come to courts have served to work against equality for women and other disadvantaged groups. The only way women and others protected by the charter have been able to put forward their rights under the charter through the courts is through the Court Challenges Program. As my friends on the other side acknowledge, in our society women are poorer than men. They do not have the money to go to court and defend their rights.

There are a number of issues that affect women directly. The government has pretended that the child benefit is a benefit to women. I want to point out that page 99 of the government's budget document says quite clearly that the child benefit will save $750 million this year, and $3 billion next year. In other words, from now on the government is not adding to child benefits but is taking $3 billion out of child benefits.

Is it benefiting those who most need it? I do not think so. I have looked at the figures. A family making $40,000 will get $44 more out of this program. A family making $50,000 will get $120 more out of this program. Those earning $60,000 will lose $380, while those earning over $100,000 will lose only $237. Does this child benefit program benefit those who most need it? The figures say otherwise.

The cancellation of the National Child Care Program has been referred to sufficiently. I always hate to talk of this as a program that relates particularly to women because, as far as I know, every child born in the world has two parents, one male and one female. Nonetheless, child care is a major factor in whether women can or cannot participate in the economy and can or cannot benefit from employment.

The member who last spoke said that the government is doing things for housing. The cost of housing is the greatest contributor to poverty. Yet this government has completely cancelled the co-operative housing program which allowed a lot of families, including women and their children, a lot of seniors including a majority of women, to participate in creating their own housing communities and to know that when they moved in they did not have to worry at the age of 70 or 75 about not having a place to live.

I meet with seniors from my riding in the co-op housing development that they built. They are worried that this government's restrictions on the cost of social housing will mean that they at their age will not be able to feel secure in their own homes and will not perhaps in a few years be able to afford to continue living in the homes that they built.

What has been done to social programs is obviously not the only issue that affects women. Not all women are poor, that is true. They are disproportionately poor in a very wealthy society and that is something we should all be ashamed of. The fact is because women are disproportionately poor, children are poor. We know the results of that: increased accident rates, increased illness rates, increased death, increased suicides, four times the rate of dropping out of school. Those are the results of poverty that our society cannot afford if we truly believe that our human resources are our most important resources and that developing the full potential of those human resources is the major commitment of any civilized society.

I want to go beyond those token things that people tend to refer to when they talk about the impact on women. I want to get into, for the remaining time I have, what is the real impact of this budget. How do we take the $160 billion plus that the government will be spending this year and how can we look at how much of that money goes to benefit the female half of our population and how much goes to benefit the male half of our population. In other words, what is the gender equity in this budget? That is not a question that governments have ever asked themselves.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, the results when I was involved in a similar analysis of a municipal budget in the recreation area. The vast majority of dollars spent in recreation went to benefit boys and men, not girls and women. I suspect if we did a gender equity analysis of this budget, we would find that the vast majority of spending goes not for the benefit of women and their children or women at all.

I want to just pick up a few examples. I want to talk about the fact that program spending is going up by 4.7 per cent in the Government of Canada. Yet wage controls have said that women working for the Government of Canada, and they are our lowest paid workers by a large majority, do not get an increase this year. We can afford nearly a 5 per cent increase in spending when inflation is projected at less than 3 per cent, in fact barely over 2 per cent, but we cannot afford to pay women who are earning poverty level wages to work for the Government of Canada.

We look at downsizing that has happened in government. I want to refer to the report on the Dryden air crash that came out just this past week. Repeatedly in that report we hear about highly paid technical and professional people in Transport Canada responsible for the safety of the travelling public spending increasing amounts of time doing their own clerical, secretarial and receptionist type of work.

The reason for that is very simple. The reason is that when it comes to downsizing, the people who go first are the support services. Guess who are primarily the support services in the Government of Canada, by over 80 per cent? It is women and women earning small salaries.

We get rid of women who provide the support services and we pay three times as much to highly qualified professionals to do that person's clerical and support work. Does that make any sense in terms of efficiency and economy and productivity in government? Of course not.

We look at the RCMP. When the RCMP downsizes, it gets rid of the clerks and receptionists at its small stations. Then it has highly paid, highly trained RCMP officers doing their own typing. Does that make any sense? Of course not, but it is easier to get rid of women, is it not? That is what downsizing, what government policy has meant to women.

There is going to be further cutting of resources, further bringing in of technology. Suddenly when the typewriter is gone, the woman is gone. When the computer and the programming comes in, the man comes in.

These are the kinds of things we have got to look at when we see whether we have got a budget that is equally fair to men and women in Canadian society.

We look at increases in the Canada Pension Plan or the unemployment insurance premiums. Who pays those primarily? Because there is an income cap on those premiums, that increase is borne primarily by women because it is mostly women who are under the $32,000 or $34,000 limit on those programs. Above those limits, the premiums do not go up. You can be earning $100,000 and your premiums are still the same as somebody earning $30,000.

RRSPs. You can invest $20,000 of your RRSP in buying your first home. When you are buying a first home, and you have got $20,000 in an RRSP, I ask the House, what are you, male or female? A large proportion of the time it is going to be a male who who can benefit from that program.

We reduce the surtax by 1 per cent. Who benefits most? Those highest income earners benefit most. One per cent means more on $100,000 income than it does on a $15,000 income. Who earns primarily the $15,000 income? Women. Who earns primarily the $100,000 income? Men. This budget benefits men to a much greater extent than women.

We lift the ceiling on small business loans, up $100,000 to $200,000. Mostly men starting small businesses borrow in that range. Women starting small businesses borrow much smaller amounts.

The increase on the ability to provide venture capital loans has increased in a range that is going to benefit men starting businesses far more than women starting businesses.

The tax incentives to research and development I suggest is worth a good gender equity analysis. The reduction in the manufacturing processing tax, who is that going to benefit? Who do cuts in corporate taxes benefit mostly? Not women.

We have a prosperity agenda. We have trade expositions. We have task forces that are 90 per cent men, according to the news releases I have seen coming from the ministers' offices. Those expeditions all over the world are going to continue and they are going to continue to be well-funded. It is not women who are going to benefit from that funding.

We have a regulatory review that is going to cost a lot of money. I ask you: Who is regulation designed to protect? Generally, regulation is designed to protect the weakest and the most vulnerable. That is true if it is a regulation that has been requested by business. Most regulations have been requested by business in the 125 years since Confederation, not by consumers and not by the general public, but by business to protect business. In any case, regulation generally protects those who can least protect themselves, and more often that is going to be women than men.

I think that kind of analysis of every dollar we spend is a commitment that any government has got to make to women. Who benefits from the $165 billion we spend annually in this country? Who contributes most? Who benefits most? The lower income taxpayer contributes the large volume of tax money; the higher income tax earner gains most from public spending. If we truly want to address equity for women, the poverty of women and children, that is where we have got to start.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 37, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener) moved that Bill C-324, an act to amend the Criminal Code (firearms), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my bill is to send a powerful message of deterrence to anyone who is thinking about taking a gun along to commit a crime. This bill would toughen section 85 of the Criminal Code in that the minimum mandatory sentences would be increased from one year to five years for a first offence and raised from three years to eight years for any subsequent offences. The sentence imposed under section 85 would be served consecutively to the main offence, which means that it would be added on after serving the first offence.

Second, there would be no eligibility for parole during the five years.

Third, this bill would also specifically prevent the mandatory sentence from having any impact on the sentence imposed for the other offence.

Fourth, this bill also requires the written consent of the provincial Attorney General before any section 85 charge could be withdrawn or plea-bargained away.

I had the privilege of chairing the special committee on the subject matter of Bill C-80 on firearms. I am pleased to say that all but a few of the recommendations out of the 33 were adopted in a much improved bill on firearms, Bill C-17, which is now the law of Canada.

I am particularly pleased that both the Criminal Code and the regulations on the illegitimate use of firearms, which the Minister of Justice tabled this morning, have within them some tough new measures targeting the criminal use of firearms. There is now a 10-year maximum sentence for the possession of prohibited weapons. That also applies to possession of a firearm while under a prohibition order. Third, it applies to importing, buying or selling of prohibited weapons.

Additionally, stronger prohibition orders were implemented, meaning that the courts are now required to consider prohibition and the seizure of a firearm in all bail or release proceedings involving offences where the use or threat of violence occurs.

Finally, the duration of court prohibition orders has been increased from five to 10 years for a first conviction, and from 10 years to life for repeat offenders.

I am confident that had those measures been in place a few years ago that some Canadians would be alive today and not the tragic victims of the criminal use of firearms.

Two committees, the one I chaired and subsequently the legislative committee on Bill C-17, heard some specific comments regarding the subject matter of the bill I am proposing today. I would like to read some of them into the record.

Mr. Ronald Gladish, the first vice-president of the Canadian Wildlife Federation asked:

> Where are the minimum three to five year penalties for the use of firearms during the commission of an offence, as recommended by the Special Committee on Bill C-80?

This bill addresses that omission.

The Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters said:

> The provision for mandatory additional jail terms for the use of a firearm in the commission of a crime, must be fully enacted and enforced as mandatory.

In response to a question about a five-year minimum sentence, Mr. Dare of the Service Rifle Association answered, and I quote:

> What we are saying is that five-year mandatory would soon get the message across that a firearm is not acceptable if you carry it concealed, illegally or if it is stolen.

Mr. Beauchesne the Technical Adviser for Law and Amendments Committee of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police said, and I quote:

> All police officers and Canadians are asking that zero tolerance be given toward those who commit crimes with firearms.

Ms. Wendy Cukier of the Coalition for Gun Control remarked:

> We support the police and their call for tougher sentencing on firearm related crimes.

This bill then is an attempt to respond to those urgent calls for action, and there were many more that I have not quoted. In fact, the one item on which all groups agreed, whether for or against the legitimate use of firearms, was a call for stricter and tougher laws and sentencing of criminals who use firearms.

The Special Committee on Firearms recommended the following and I quote: "With respect to section 85 of the Criminal Code, the minimum mandatory sentences therein be increased to three years". Unfortunately, this recommendation was not accepted and that is why I have brought it forward as a Private Members' Bill and in so doing, change the recommended three year mandatory minimum to five years. I do so because I believe three years to be too short for such a serious offence.

Further, I heard that the former Right Hon. John Diefenbaker tried but failed to change the Criminal Code back in 1971 to do exactly what my bill does, that is to provide for a five year minimum. I agreed with him at that time and I decided that if I ever got the opportunity, I would argue for a five year minimum for the criminal use of a firearm.

Here I am today with that opportunity. I truly hope that members of this House will seriously listen to my arguments for this bill.

Further, we all know how our system of sentencing and parole works. Under the Parole and Penitentiary Acts a 12 year sentence can become an eight year sentence by crediting the convicted criminal with 15 days for every 30 days served, thereby reducing the 12 years by one third to eight years. Then that eight years can become four years because the convicted criminal is eligible for parole at the one third point of the 12 year sentence, i.e., the fourth year. In fact, the four years can become two years for day parole purposes because the convicted criminal is eligible and can apply after one sixth of his sentence, i.e., two years, for educational or job related reasons.

Therefore, an armed bank robber who threatened people with death by his gun and received a 12 year sentence can be on day parole after two years and back on the streets after a mere four years of that 12 year sentence.

Under the present law we would have to put a criminal away for 15 years to ensure that he spends at least five years behind bars.

That is what annoys people and that encourages cynicism toward our legal system and courts. A 15 year sentence sounds severe but it becomes five years in practice. As one witness before our committee in expressing outrage complained, and I quote:

> There's the young robber out in three years, when the young woman he shot is confined for life in a wheelchair; an innocent victim to a terrible crime.

That is not proportional justice to fit the crime. The present law beginning at a one year minimum is not enough. Three years is not enough. Fifteen years under our present Parole and Penitentiary Acts can become simply five years. That again encourages cynicism and accusations that our laws favour the criminal and not the innocent victim. Therefore, as one means to correct that problem this bill would bring in a five-year mandatory minimum with no parole for that five year period.

Many police chiefs support this bill, including Chief Bill McCormack of the Metropolitan Toronto Police, Chief Constable Bill Marshall of Vancouver, and Chief Vince MacDonald of Halifax. Chief Harold Basse of the Waterloo Regional Police, who is also president of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, wrote the following: "I am pleased to inform you that the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police fully supports the proposals in your bill".

He also wrote:

> The introduction of this bill is a very welcome change in attitude toward protecting the public rather than continuing with the trend of only being concerned with the rights of the offender. The increased minimum mandatory sentences should provide a deterrent to the use of a firearm while committing a crime.

He went on to say:

> It is also very appropriate that in this proposal it was deemed necessary to include a control over withdrawing or "plea bargaining" away these charges.

Police Chief Borbridge of Calgary said:

> I am encouraged by the serious view which is being demonstrated in putting forward this bill. Crimes of a violent nature have increased significantly across this country and it is timely that tougher and more realistic penalties are being considered to be imposed on persons found guilty of such crimes. The proposed penalties not only reflect the severity of the offence but also are reflective of the the communities concerns. The non-eligibility for parole reinforces the seriousness of these crimes.

James M. Kingston, chief executive officer of the Canadian Police Association stated:

> Please be advised that the Canadian Police Association strongly endorses the intent of your private members' bill. We trust you will secure the necessary support to pass it into law.

I have been advised that I must amend the bill regarding the question of parole. Therefore, if adopted, I would amend the bill to allow parole for any sentence beyond the new minimum mandatory of five years.

I have also been advised that if this amendment is not made this bill might infringe section 12 of the charter of rights which states that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Some even argue that the bill, as amended as I have suggested, might still be contrary to section 12 of the charter. However, I think the bill is justified under section 1 of the charter.

As former Chief Justice Brian Dickson said in The Queen v. Oakes:

> The rights and freedoms guaranteed by the charter are not, however, absolute. It may become necessary to limit rights and freedoms in circumstances where their exercise would be inimical to the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance. For this reason section 1 provides criteria of justification for limits on the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the charter.

Some people say that the charter forbids any mandatory minimum sentences in the light of the Supreme Court's 1987 decision striking down the mandatory minimum sentence of seven years for the importation of narcotics. To the contrary, Mr. Justice Lamer, in writing for the majority, said the following:

> A minimum mandatory term of imprisonment is obviously not in and of itself cruel and unusual. The legislature may, in my view, provide for a compulsory term of imprisonment upon conviction for certain offences without infringing the rights protected by section 12 of the charter. For example, a long term of penal servitude for he or she who has imported large amounts of heroin for the purpose of trafficking would certainly not contravene section 12 of the charter. Quite the contrary.

Here we have two justices of the court who clearly say that we can have minimum mandatories. There is nothing wrong with that as long as it fits the crime. I would suggest this does.

My bill proposes a mandatory minimum sentence to deal with a problem that has as much, if not more, potential to cause serious physical harm and/or death than importing drugs. That is the criminal use of firearms. I have nothing against tough sentences against drugs. In fact I would like to see them even stronger. I think the sentencing against the criminal use of firearms needs to be strengthened, and that is the purpose of my bill.

Therefore we should not argue that mandatory minimums are ipso facto contrary to the charter. My argument, and it would appear two Supreme Court justices might agree, is that the punishment must fit the crime.

Mr. W. R. Crampton of metropolitan Toronto has provided me with some truly alarming statistics of four different offences committed with a firearm within metropolitan Toronto. Let me give these four sets of statistics.

Murder committed with a firearm from 1989 to 1991, for those three years, increased by 557 per cent. Armed robberies of small businesses with a firearm for the same three years increased by 234 per cent. Bank robberies where a firearm was clearly visible increased by 313 per cent from 1989 to 1991. Assault with a firearm increased 537 per cent from 1980 to 1989, over that 10-year period. Further, robberies with a firearm in my own region of Waterloo in the province of Ontario have increased 420 per cent from 1987 to 1991, over a four-year period.

Every one of these is 300, 400 or 500 per cent. And what are we doing? We are sitting on this offence of one year only. I challenge those who are going to get up later, argue against this bill and talk it out to answer those statistics, to give us their clear reasons. I challenged them to answer what the chief justice of the court has said, to answer what Justice Lamer has said, to give me good reasons and not just a speech of 10 minutes worth of words, and to start saying something real that will speak to those facts.

Let us remember also what we are talking about in this bill. We are talking about about a conscious, deliberate decision to take a gun along in the commission of a crime. It includes a second deliberate decision: to load that gun. That gun does not load itself. That gun does not put itself in the man's pocket. He puts it there. That gun does not come out of his pocket and into his hand when he is committing another offence. He takes it out. Let us remember that when we consider the content of this bill.

The reasons for taking the gun are also very clear. They are either to threaten or shoot with the intent of serious injury or death, or to shoot at a police officer while fleeing the scene of that crime.

Yes, a five-year minimum with no parole is a severe penalty. There is no question. But so is the penalty of being sentenced by a criminal to life in a wheelchair or the greater consequence of death as the innocent victim of a shooting by a criminal in a hold-up.

A few years ago a constituent of mine told me of the tragic killing of his father in a bank hold-up. His retired father was standing in a line when two armed men came in. They robbed the bank and while fleeing opened fire and killed his father. A loaded gun taken along for criminal purposes is a serious crime that can have serious consequences and must receive the commensurate serious penalties. We must not forget why we are here and what our responsibilities include.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada in 1989 reminded us:

> The criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy. It is the instrument by which the community draws a line between the tolerable and the intolerable. Ultimately, the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment, or lack of commitment, to human dignity.
> The law does not exist for the sole or primary purpose of punishing illicit acts. It exists, as an expression, in a broad sense, of the kind of people we are. It does not merely regulate our behaviour; it articulates and symbolizes our values and beliefs.

• (1820)

In conclusion, I have given statistics which are truly alarming. I have given quotations from what we heard as a committee on Bill C-80 and Bill C-17. They were unanimous in their call for tougher sentencing of criminals when there is misuse or criminal use of a firearm. I have spoken of the chiefs of police across Canada, all of whom endorse this bill. I have spoken of the membership of the police association which also endorses this bill. I have said that it does not offend the charter, and I have quoted two justices of the court to prove that.

Therefore I ask that members consider this bill very carefully. I ask that members give unanimous consent today to allow this bill to go to the next stage, that is a legislative committee.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today on Bill C-24.

As the hon. member for Kitchener has stated, he was not only a member of the special committee on gun control but he was the chairman. I would say without any hesitation that he did an excellent job in that capacity, which was not the easiest at all times to handle. It was a very contentious subject. There was a wide difference of opinion, not only among the witnesses who came before the committee but among the members of the committee themselves. However I think in hindsight we created a report which was quite helpful.

By way of coincidence today, the Minister of Justice has tabled the first set of regulations under Bill C-17 which, as the hon. member from Kitchener said, was modelled largely on the report of the special committee. I want to commend him for his thoughtful presentation with respect to this bill. I know the concern the hon. member has with regard to lawlessness and increased crime in our communities. Certainly many of us, if not most of us, in this House have similar concerns.

There is an alarming increase in the rate of crime in Canada, particularly in our urban areas. This cannot be allowed to continue. It cannot be allowed to go on unchecked. We have to deal with it. We have to look at the situation in our country and state categorically whether or not we are going to do something about this, or are we going to continue to turn away from it? I do not think there is any question. The public is not going to let us turn away from it.

The member of Parliament wants all Canadians to be more cognizant of the increasing rate of crime in our country. In that regard he has presented a very thoughtful bill.

I have problems with some aspects of the bill. As the member stated in the special committee, it was recommended that the minimum for a first offence in the commission of a crime with the use of a firearm be increased from one year to three years and that for a second offence it be increased from three years to five years.

That developed a fair amount of debate and discussion in our committee. For the member to recommend a first offence going from three years, as recommended by the special committee, to five years and from five years on the second offence, as also recommended by the committee, to eight years is extreme and perhaps a little too far the other way. I will state my reasons for thinking that.

First I want to mention, as he has pointed out, that with parole there is a great facility and a great capacity to have sentences reduced. That is a factor, unequivocally.

However, there are other aspects we have to take into consideration, that if we do not have parole then we do not have the ability to reform and rehabilitate. We do not have the carrot to hold in front of a convicted person under this offence to offer some incentive to be rehabilitated.

A lot of people will say that these people cannot be rehabilitated, they are incorrigibles, they are a blight on society. That is not true. Not all people who are convicted of a crime are incorrigible by any stretch of the imagination. Not only that, regardless of what sentence these people are given, what minimum and what maximum and what they ultimately serve, these people are going to be back in society.

It is very important to note that we are going to be dealing with these people in society. We want these people to have learned from the experience. Not all of them will. You cannot have everybody come out of an institution, after having served a penalty, to be perfect and not commit another crime. That is just not the way it is going to happen and it is not the way the system works. What we try to do is have it as successful as we possibly can. We want to increase the odds against these people being repeat offenders.

It is important that we look at this in perspective. One of the institutions that holds our country together is our judicial system. We as Canadians have placed a lot of faith in our judicial system; in our judges and their capacity to make the right decision based on the needs and the dictates of society. We have to give these judges latitude and assume that they know what they are doing.

If we start creating too many of these minimum offences of really extensive periods of time without parole then we are tying the hands of judges to dispense justice. In other words, we are not allowing them to do their job. I think that would be a mistake because there are incidences where five years would be far too long even for somebody committing a crime with the use of a firearm and that is a serious crime. But if you had a father whose family was going hungry and needed food and the father used a firearm, be it loaded or unloaded, to get food from a convenience store, would you say that warranted five years in prison?

If a father, on hearing that his child had been struck by what was alleged to be a drunken driver and that the child was fatally injured or perhaps seriously injured and could have permanent damage, in a rage of grief took a firearm and shot at the house or in the vicinity of the house of the alleged impaired driver, would that be a situation where the person who committed the offence should be sentenced to a five year term?

These are situations that bear and deserve a lot of consideration. I do not think we can, as members of Parliament, as concerned Canadian citizens, tie the hands of our judiciary, as the hon. member for Kitchener is suggesting.

The member for Kitchener also suggests that there not be any parole during the minimum period. For instance, if someone committed a first offence with the use of a firearm and was sentenced to eight years, because of the five year minimum that person would not be eligible for parole for five years. There would be no incentive for that person.

Do not forget it is the Canadian public that is paying the expenses of that person while he or she is incarcerated. If we are not getting some benefit from that incarceration in the hope that that person will be rehabilitated to a certain extent then it does not matter what maximum we are suggesting. There is not going to be a benefit and the cost is going to be there without the inherent benefit.

The hon. member also suggested that there not be any plea bargaining without the approval of the Attorney General. The crown prosecutors are the agents of the Attorney General. The question is how much can you lay on the Attorney General who is quite busy. What is the situation? Are you going to have a backlog? Are you going to have lengthy delays while the Attorney General waits or you are waiting for the Attorney General to make his or her decision?

• (1830)

We also have plea bargaining as a tool of the criminal justice system. I agree that it is used too frequently. But is plea bargaining the culprit or is it a symptom of another greater problem, that we do not have enough judges and justices in our court system, that our court system is backed up. Should we then look at the fact that we need more judges?

We should also look at the idea of community service. Perhaps that would relieve some of the congestion in our judicial system.

While I appreciate what the hon. member is trying to do, I have some problems with the way he is doing it and what he is suggesting. The extreme nature of some of his suggestions would be counterproductive. While I applaud him for his concern, I cannot support this suggested legislation.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill as the NDP justice critic and also as someone with a background in criminal law.

My first job as a young lawyer was assistant city prosecutor for the city of Vancouver. In that job, I dealt with people who were charged with these sorts of offences and prosecuted cases where people went to jail for these offences. I might say that those who went to jail should have gone to jail for those offences.

After I served as Crown attorney in the city of Vancouver, I spent some time as a defence lawyer. I defended people who were charged with these offences. People say, how can you do that? In our system people are entitled to a fair trial and they are entitled to a fair defence.

The hon. member for Kitchener quoted a past member of this House who originally brought forward the idea of a five-year minimum penalty for an offence with guns, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. He too was a defence counsel. He could see both sides and knew that you could defend someone for these offences, but you also had to prosecute them for these offences and that they were serious offences.

I want to say right out to the member for Kitchener that I agree with zero tolerance for those who commit a crime with firearms. They should go to jail. They should go to jail quickly and they should serve their time in jail. We do need stricter and tougher laws for criminals that use firearms. I want to say that right out. It needs to be said.

Having said that, I know the hon. member chaired the committee on Bill C-80, the first gun control bill. It then became Bill C-17. As my hon. friend and colleague for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, the Liberal justice critic said, the hon. member for Kitchener did an outstanding job in chairing that committee. I do not have any hesitation in saying that. Politically, we do not agree on many things although there is some agreement here. I want to say right out he did a good job with that committee. I am tempted to say I wish the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee had been more like our other committee on Bill C-17.

He will forgive me and allow me to quote myself from the committee report because he did allow members, unlike Beaudoin-Dobbie, to sign the report but also to put in an addendum, to flag important issues. I want to quote myself on page 68 from my addendum under Criminal Misuse of Firearms:

> The special committee proposes much stiffer penalties for criminal misuse of firearms. For example, it is recommended that a minimum term for the use of a gun in the commission of an offence be tripled.

That was one year to three years. The member's bill proposes five years.

> I agree with this recommendation. However, I believe the special committee mistakenly sees longer sentences as a trade off for weakening the controls on firearms of Bill C-80. The focus on jail terms for criminals is an easy one for politicians.

Perhaps I was being a little bit harsh, but I did say "an easy one for politicians".

> In some way, it is an extension of the oft-heard phrase "guns don't kill people; people kill people". We need strong controls on firearms and tough penalties for those who misuse them. People with guns kill people.

What I was saying there and I say now is a bit of a warning. Do not think by passing a tougher law on criminal misuse of firearms that the problem of gun control is solved.

The regulations that came in today in the House of Commons really basically deal with the non-criminal use of guns which we have to deal with and I will come back to that in a moment.

I think someone said 1,400 people a year die through accidents and suicides and so on. These are not criminals, so we cannot use it as a trade off. We cannot say, as many people said in the gun control debate: "Don't have strong gun control. Just focus on criminals who use guns". I say we have to do both. I want to make that very clear.

The bill that the hon. member for Kitchener introduces does four things as I understand it.

The first one is that it would toughen up section 85 of the Criminal Code so a minimum mandatory sentence would be increased from one year to three years for a first offence.

Second, there would be no eligibility for parole.

Let me just backtrack on the first one because I want to say I am prepared to see this bill go to committee. We could seriously consider it as a piece of legislation. The increase from one year to five, I think the committee has to look perhaps at three. The hon. member from Cape Breton—The Sydneys said that. That is a matter we can debate in committee.

I accept the principle in the bill that it should be increased from the one year. As the hon. member knows, I have changed my mind. I have been listening, as I should and of course as I do all the time, to my constituents from Port Moody—Coquitlam and I am very disturbed that the ordinary person is getting disturbed, upset and scared about the increase in violent crime in Canada. To me, that is not good.

It is not good that we have the increase in violent crime. It is important that people are concerned. I say this to my constituents who may be reading this or who may be watching this that I am listening to what they are saying. That is why I am supporting the hon. member today.

Second, he says that there should be no eligibility for parole. Well, I wonder about that. I have a question mark there. We do that; it is not a precedent. We do it on murder, do we not? No eligibility for a certain number of years.

I would not want to hurt the parole system. I would want to hear more about that from the hon. member in committee. I know he said he has offered some amendments to his bill. I want to see those amendments and look at it closely and I flag that as a concern I do have.

Third, he says the bill also specifically prevents the mandatory sentence from having an impact on the sentence imposed for another offence. I think that is a good idea and I support that.

Fourth, he says the bill also requires the consent of the provincial attorney general before any section 85 charge, that is a charge of having a weapon while committing an offence, before that could be withdrawn or plea-bargained away. I want to tell the hon. member that in my court when I was Crown attorney, no one plea-bargained away a case of having a gun. I used to say to my clients when I was defence counsel: "You are charged with a gun offence. You are looking at a jail term".

The hon. member has told me that things have changed in the courts. I am surprised. It was always my experience that if you had a gun in an offence situation you got mandatory time for that. You were convicted.

I can accept that. It leaves a situation where there might be an extraordinary circumstance. I have given an example of an aboriginal person in a northern settlement. It is easy to be charged with robbery when someone with a gun has been drinking. With hunters or trappers the gun is there all the time and it would be easy to get into a situation where there would be some unique case that would be out of line. I think the hon. member captures that in his bill. I am glad he put that in.

Let me summarize by saying that I believe there should be zero tolerance. I believe that we should have tough laws with respect to the commission of an offence. I also believe that we should have good and effective gun control on other issues and that is the non-criminal element of the crime.

I do not believe that semi-automatic assault weapons, converted weapons, should be flowing into this country as they are now. This government is not acting fast enough to bring in effective regulations to stop that.

Having said all that, I would like to conclude that we do need a new look at our justice system. As a part of that we have to look at gun control and tougher penalties for crimes with guns.

We have to look at a change in the juvenile system. I am getting that from my constituents. We have to work at crime prevention. Finally, we have to look at real rehabilitation of offenders so that they do not just get out of jail and then commit another offence. That is the challenge.

This bill is worth considering. It is part of the challenge. I am prepared to sit down now and let the bill go to committee.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will not speak for very long, although it is almost dangerous to make that statement in this Chamber at the outset of one's remarks.

Like the other members who have spoken, I certainly appreciate the interest, the concern and the intense activity the member for Kitchener has given to this matter, not just in the bill but in the chairing of the committee and in concerning himself with something that certainly concerns many, if not most Canadians.

I represent one of the areas in Canada which can be the most readily affected by the use of guns in the commission of a crime, downtown Toronto. My constituents are well aware of the dangers.

During the course of the last year or two the Minister of Justice introduced first Bill C-80 and then Bill C-17, I believe it was. This was extremely important.

I did hear from some specialized groups in the community who were concerned about the restrictions that might apply to those who were recreational or competitive users of guns. I would certainly say that the vast majority of people in my constituency were concerned that we would do everything we possibly could to avoid the increase of guns in the commission of crimes.

I welcome the interest not just of the member for Kitchener but the others who have spoken. However, I want to speak directly to the proposal in front of us. It is a proposal that raises some very serious questions. It raises two, in particular, that I want to deal with directly.

It raises the question of the ability of the courts to distinguish between the kinds of crimes that are being committed. In the debate over the course of the last few minutes we have seen the variety of situations that can occur in real life. We heard an eloquent plea from the member for Kitchener in terms of the importance of having these minimum sentences of five and eight years. We heard an eloquent alternative opinion from the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys when he described the situations in which the courts would virtually have their hands tied in dealing with an individual who, in the heat of the moment or by accident or in some situation with extenuating circumstances, could have his or her life virtually totally destroyed and not only that individual's but those who might depend on that individual. Not to have any ability for the courts to deal with the variety of those situations seems to me to reduce both our respect for and our capacity to use the courts in a way that makes the criminal justice system serve the interests of all Canadians.

I would have some real difficulty in accepting that. When we are increasingly wanting to see the courts exercise responsibility in our society, and certainly that has been the trend over a great number of years now, to put these kinds of inhibitions into the situation would perhaps do significant damage to our courts. I have not been convinced yet of the wisdom of that.

My more important concern touches on something which I do know a fair bit about. Many years ago, before I became a member of this Chamber, I worked as a prison chaplain in several institutions. I worked with a number of people who had been incarcerated for a variety of criminal offences, but the one thing that I was able to learn over a period of several years was that it was absolutely important, along with the incarceration of the individual who had committed an offence, that there was sufficient flexibility beyond the original sentencing period for there to be a recognition that this individual ultimately will be released back into society.

By the establishment of some kind of arbitrary sentencing requirement, in this case for the first offence, one of five years; for the second offence, eight years, I think we would be in danger of creating within our penal system a situation which would do, I believe quite frankly, significant damage.

I have heard nothing convincing in what has been said today either by the member for Kitchener or others in what is magic about imposing an absolute requirement for a five year sentence in the commission of a first crime or eight years on the second, that the day after those five years or that eight year period is completed, that individual is going to be safe to be released back into society.

If I took the member for Kitchener's proposition to its ultimate conclusion, I would say you would put on such a sentence that they might never come back into society. I do not think he is arguing that.

I do not know what is important about five and eight years. What I do know is that it would absolutely prevent, in a number of instances, the assured rehabilitation and the safe release back into society of these individuals.

I have to tell the member for Kitchener that recidivism is still a considerable problem within our institutions. This does not address that issue. Until that is addressed I for one could not support this kind of a proposition.

The third and final thing I want to say is this. The issue, in my mind, is dealing with the thing that we all agree on is not what you do after the offence has been committed, it is how you prevent the offence in the first place. All that has been said about the availability of guns, the acceptability of guns, the way in which guns can flow across the border into this country, those are important issues and the circumstances under which guns are made available, particularly to young people.

I will come here and work with anyone who can do more than that, but I must say that I have been impressed by the Minister of Justice, by the present legislation, by the work that my colleagues have done on this, and I would like to see to what extent we have been able to help the situation along and then let us come back and discuss it.

At this point in time to just arbitrarily impose these restrictions, I have to say, with great respect for my colleague from Kitchener, I simply could not at this point, as an isolated thing, support it. I think there will be real dangers and extensive damage done as a result.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising on debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

A point of order, the hon. member for Kitchener.

Mr. Reimer: Yes, on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I realize there is still some time left in the hour. I wonder if I might seek unanimous consent of the House to permit this bill to go on to committee?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It now being 6.50 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.50 p.m.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my concern about the government's policy in which my country will no longer have a NATO presence in Europe. It is my opinion that Canada is an integral part of the NATO community. The special role of our presence as the bridge between North America and Europe is very important.

I do not want to beat around the bush. I am concerned about the creation of Fortress Europe and of Fortress U.S.A. I call upon the government to reconsider its decision to remove Canada's NATO troops from Europe.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications has declared the Canadian publishing industry is enthusiastic about his new policy. Well, the communications minister should inquire again. The Association of Canadian Publishers recently passed a motion stating that the federal government has retreated from policies aimed at achieving Canadian ownership and control of book publishing and expressing firm opposition to permitting foreign takeovers of Canadian owned firms in book publishing and distribution.

The printing industry which employs 78,000 Canadians has, since free trade, lost $160 million annually and 1,700 jobs, resulting as well in a $330 million print deficit equivalent to an increased loss of 200 per cent since 1988. Why so? Because this government has not placed strict country of origin rules on the importation of printed products from the United States such as the Americans have done. Will the government stand up for Canadian printers, put the needed rules in place, strengthen our Canadian publishing and printing industry, and establish a level playing field which will maintain Canadian jobs and their income?

TAXATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in these difficult days of economic recession and constitutional conflict, it is hard to understand why some measures of government collaboration are not seized when they are so obvious. One such area is the opportunity for harmonizing provincial sales taxes and the federal goods and services tax.

Not only would this simplify sales tax service to all citizens and make the system more consistent, but most important, it would provide a realistic means to ensure a fair and balanced sales tax application toward cross-border shopping.

There may seem to be an obvious short-term political detriment to provincial governments which might take that step, but surely the long term benefits are compelling. Just yesterday, for example, in the New Brunswick budget, a request was made for federal collection of sales taxes on alcohol and cigarettes. Why not integrate the collection process in a complete and comprehensive way?

One other reason involves real dollars that provinces presently collect twice from industry on overhead costs and other indirect inputs. Under the GST these revenues would disappear, but similarly they would reduce the costs of manufacturing and make our export products more competitive.

Harmonization of sales tax systems is a goal worth pursuing.

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Quebec cabinet minister Lise Bacon's angry statements in regard to the Cree of northern Quebec have not been constructive. Her remarks, along with those of others, tend to inflame both anti-native feelings and anti-Quebec sentiments.

Many natives and other residents of Quebec and the rest of Canada are concerned about the Great Whale Project. They, like the supporters of this hydro development plan, should be expressing their opinions.

The Cree, individually and collectively, are affected directly by this project. They have an obvious right to state their case and to state it forcefully.

I understand the issue being debated because I come from the region of Manitoba where there have been massive hydro projects, some of which have not been popular among native people. I would encourage all who are involved in the public debate on these and other major projects to restrain their rhetoric and to focus their comments on the merits and demerits of the specific development.

YOUTH PARLIAMENT

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, once again Beauce is setting a record, this time by bringing together the largest number of people for a youth parliament in a non-metropolitan region of Quebec, since such parliaments have been held in our province.

I am very pleased to point out the massive involvement of Beauce youth in political affairs that concern them closely, such as parliamentary reform, privileges for native people, euthanasia, reduced defence spending and so on.

It is comforting to note that our young people are smart and seek new knowledge so that they can look at society, make a diagnosis and suggest remedies for the public good.

I would like to congratulate these young people on their interest in political affairs. To the organizers, Sylvie Poulin, Julie Bédard, Marie-Claude Poulin, Hélène Roy, and all the participants, I say the future begins now and they are the future.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the P.E.I. potato industry is being held hostage by the federal Minister of Agriculture. The minister's refusal to exercise his responsibility to apply federal phyto-sanitary regulations equitably to all provinces has left the potato growers of P.E.I. disillusioned and bitter.

Since the original discovery of PVY-N in P.E.I. the province has been subjected to the most stringent testing program of any potato producing area in the world. We have now proven that we have less PVY-N than any other province; yet other provinces are being allowed to arbitrarily refuse entry of P.E.I. seed.

There is now absolutely no scientific basis for Agriculture Canada or the provinces to prohibit the sale of P.E.I. seed within Canada.

This is a case of outright discrimination against Canada's smallest province. The minister must use the authority of his office to put an end to it. This is the responsibility of the national government.

How can we expect the U.S. to open its market when the minister allows provinces to keep theirs closed without any scientific reason to do so?

Does this mean that from now on provinces are free to erect phyto-sanitary barriers against other products as well? Who is running Canada's Department of Agriculture—the minister, the provinces or the USDA?

FISHERIES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): There are not many cod in Halton—Peel, Mr. Speaker, but there are a lot of people who support the brave efforts of the east coast fishermen who are trying to save their industry.

I, for one, was proud to see Canadian maple leaf flags floating over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks as a symbol that people in this country are standing up to foreigners who wantonly deplete our fish stocks. Losing the cod stocks would be to Newfoundland what losing the automobile industry would be to southern Ontario.

I want my colleagues in the House representing east coast constituents to know, and I want maritimers themselves to know, that they are not alone in this struggle. People in the rest of Canada are with you. Those are our cod stocks as well as yours, just as our forests and our factories belong equally to every Canadian.

Fight on, because you are fighting for all of us.

CORE AREA INITIATIVE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in a moment of sadness to mark the end of the Core Area Initiative, a 10-year agreement which was very successful in reaching out to some of the most difficult problems in our society.

• (1410)

Yesterday, I joined a group of Winnipegers to mark its end. Instead of standing in front of the Core Area Initiative office as we could have for the last 10 years, we stood in front of a "For Rent" sign.

If you think of the objectives of this government, think of all the priorities that it speaks about such as child poverty. The highest rate of child poverty in the country is in Winnipeg in this area. The government has abandoned them.

You think of working families needing day care and child-parent centres. It has abandoned them. You think of single parents looking for assistance and jobs and training. It has abandoned them. You think of families needing housing. It has abandoned the housing repair program.

Every priority of this government was abandoned when it abandoned the Core Area Initiative. It is a tragic loss for Winnipeg. It is a warning for other cities and a national disgrace for this country.

GLENGARRY TRANSPORT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on May 10, 1991 Glengarry Transport or GTL, the flagship of Glengarry and one of Canada's largest trucking companies, closed its doors permanently, laying off 1,800 employees.

Needless to say, with the office of GTL being in Alexandria, Ontario, many of its employees are my constituents. Older GTL workers were told by the government that they could qualify for benefits under the Program for Older Workers Adjustment, or POWA, once their unemployment benefits ran out.

This business has been closed for 11 months. UI benefits have run out and now POWA benefits have not been approved. Last week I was told by Labour Canada officials that the approval for this application would not occur at least until November of this year, some 18 months after the closure in question.

I call upon the Minister of Labour, and especially on his provincial counterpart in Ontario, to proceed with this application forthwith and to take the necessary steps to give my constituents their benefits.

AGRICULTURE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the agriculture industry has seen numerous set-backs over the past year at the hands of its support industries. This is again the case as a strike by clerical workers at the Alberta Wheat Pool's Vancouver office continues to cause a shut down of the Alberta Wheat Pool terminal.

This strike must be resolved now, and any potential for future future strikes must be eliminated. The economic prosperity of agriculture and this country must be allowed to succeed.

STANTON YELLOWKNIFE HOSPITAL

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the barbaric practice at the Stanton Yellowknife Hospital of performing abortions with no anaesthetic is gaining national attention.

The procedure leaves women writhing in pain, increasing the possibility of error on the part of physicians. Eighty-three women have said that they underwent this torture at the hands of ill-informed doctors. Unfortunately the Northwest Territories has no College of Physicians and Surgeons to discipline the doctors who are unnecessarily hurting women and punishing them for sexual activity.

I want to assure hospital officials and the Government of the Northwest Territories that hospitals and clinics elsewhere in Canada always use general or local anaesthetic for this procedure. No anaesthetic for this painful procedure is simply bad medical practice and will not be tolerated.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, many Canadian families feel the recession and the number of children living in poverty remains unacceptable for the federal government.

The federal government is using the resources at its disposal to reach the most disadvantaged. Besides supporting child care services under the Canada Assistance Plan, the government has introduced a child benefit that will give children much more and that is intended to improve the situation of low income working families. Resources will be increased to address the needs of vulnerable children.

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, unless action is taken very quickly, there will be a salmon war of dangerous proportions on the west coast this fishing season.

The United States served notice at our embassy in Washington that it will now violate the Canada–U.S. salmon treaty. Last year, it overfished Fraser River bound sockeye by 510,000 and it plans to do it again this year.

This will force B.C. fishermen to target U.S. bound coho and chinook on the west coast of Vancouver Island. This is at a time when these stocks are already at risk from overfishing by the U.S. As in any war, the original violation will be forgotten in the uproar from California, Oregon and Washington over the harvest of U.S. bound fish by Canada.

This is a basic political issue. The Americans have been allowed to rob our transboundary stocks despite the treaty. Now they plan to rob the Fraser. This is best stopped now while there are stocks to save on the west coast of North America and a treaty worth the paper it is written on.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, we all applaud the actions of those fishermen and boats from Newfoundland and Labrador that made a gesture on behalf of Canada yesterday.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that he would like to take his responsibilities and take control of the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. I ask him now to do that, to take his responsibilities and exercise control over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

It is not enough simply to get control of the fish. Once he gets control, I ask him to allocate quotas fairly because the two co–ops on the Labrador coast have been consistently denied a quota of offshore fish, even though those fishermen live close to the resource and depend on it historically.

There must be fairness built in the system for Labrador fishermen.

BOSNIA–HERCEGOVINA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Bosnia–Hercegovina is deteriorating. The Serbian–Cetniks are intimidating the ethnic minorities, particularly Ukrainians around the Prnjavor region.

Father P. Ovad from the Ukrainian Catholic Church in Bosnia–Hercegovina indicates that thousands of the minorities have had to leave their properties at gunpoint and are being subjected to physical violence including rapes, beatings, mutilations, assassinations and forced labour.

These human rights violations are being done under the auspices of the Serbian government in Belgrade and the Yugoslav army, the purpose of which is to resettle these territories with Serbians and to achieve a greater Serbia.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

We are delighted the government has finally agreed it is essential to consult Canadians on the Constitution and realize that the Constitution does not belong to politicians or to bureaucrats but to the people of this country.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he will confirm in the House that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was speaking on behalf of the government this morning when he announced there would soon be a referendum bill before the House.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I did not hear the minister's statement this morning, Mr. Speaker, but the government's position is the one I expressed when I said the following:

[English]

"That is what the right hon. member for Yellowhead and I and the rest are working so hard on. We hope and we expect that we will succeed in that initiative". That is the initiative that involves the provinces. "Should we not be able to, then I would want to examine with the leaders of the House other alternatives. At the appropriate time, that could be a number of things".

We are pursuing the activity with the provinces and hope to succeed, but should that not be successful. I will of course consult at an appropriate time with the leaders of the House and we will take appropriate action on behalf of Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister.

Would it not be more appropriate at this time to make it a policy of the government that it will consult the people of Canada rather than the possibility of a referendum as a club over the head of the premiers?

If we recognize that the Constitution belongs to the people of Canada, why not come clean with the people of Canada and say that at last they will decide what kind of constitution we will have in Canada and every Canadian will have something to say about it?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has been on the record since the throne speech with regard to consultation with the public. We intend to honour that undertaking. We will be indicating at the appropriate time how that will be done.

If I may, I want to correct what may be a misunderstanding that the Leader of the Opposition has about the agreement that was reached between myself on behalf of the federal government and the provinces and territories when we met on March 12. We are all committed to a best efforts attempt to get an agreement among the governments as to the constitutional position that we should take forward and that can resolve the several urgent issues facing Canada.

It is understood by the premiers and by the territories that if that process does not work, there will then be a requirement for the federal government to take its own action. That is understood by the premiers, understood by the territories, and no one believes that there is any threat hanging over the head of provincial or territorial governments. That is not the way we operate.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question on the same subject to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Last night, while I was watching television, I was glad to see—for the second time—a commercial sponsored and paid for by the government with taxpayers' money, which said that the Beaudoin–Dobbie report was a very good report. I thought that was very interesting, but how can the minister explain to Quebecers that the government is using taxpayers' money to promote the Beaudoin–Dobbie report when the day before yesterday the minister of defence said that the report was unacceptable?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition guessed wrong again.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: He did. If I am not mistaken, the commercial does not say the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is a good report. The text of the commercial explains the contents of the report for the benefit of Canadians and Quebecers, so that Canadians and Quebecers will be able to make up their minds.

The House leader mentioned that I said the Beaudoin–Dobbie report was excellent. I did, but that is not what the Leader of the Opposition just said.

[English]

The House leader of the Liberal Party is suggesting that we are misstating the case. I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition has inadvertently misstated the fact that there is no such publicity being put forward. What is being put forward is explanatory publicity so Canadians can make up their minds about Beaudoin–Dobbie.

My mind is made up. I think the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is very good for Canada. I think that Canada itself does not need Beaudoin–Dobbie. I think it stands on its own. But I am ready to improve it with Beaudoin–Dobbie and anything else.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint–Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He seems to be having trouble justifying the extremely cavalier attitude taken by his minister of defence. I do not think there is any doubt in anyone's mind in Quebec that the Prime Minister and his minister of defence do not see eye to eye on this very important matter concerning the constitutional proposals being offered to Quebec.

Government sponsored advertising to announce the highlights of the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is what we in the opposition consider a very positive gesture. But we do not understand—and that was the question—why the Prime Minister continues to tolerate in his cabinet a minister who has dissociated himself completely from the government's position in this respect.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is not a government report. It is not government policy, although as a member of this House, I personally approve of the report. It is a report by a parliamentary committee that will be examined by the government—in fact, by governments. At the appropriate time, the government will present a plan that will be actively supported by all ministers, starting with the Minister of National Defence.

The hon. member for Papineau—Saint–Michel is astonished to see differences of opinion on constitutional matters, between me and the Minister of National Defence, for instance. Was he equally astonished when he was a great supporter of Meech Lake and the Leader of the Opposition was a fierce opponent of the accord?

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint–Michel): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister makes a major mistake here. I want him to tell us why he is so desperate to play politics with the future of this country.

The credibility of the government is so low that in order to clinch a constitutional deal that will be acceptable all across Canada, he and his party need the support of the Liberal Party of Canada and the New Democratic Party of Canada. He should stop playing politics the way he is playing them.

I want to ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs a very simple question. Canadian Press quoted the minister of health as saying this morning: "It is logical that a referendum is one of those options of the government, so you have to look at a bill on a referendum in June".

I want to know from the minister if the legislation is ready and whether or not this legislation should be tabled in this House as urgently as possible. Certainly, if the legislation is ready and since our party has been advocating it for a long time, we would be most co–operative to pass the legislation immediately. Why does the government not come forward immediately with such legislation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the Leader of the Opposition that the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is working very hard to obtain a successful resolution of this matter with the provincial premiers, as he is called upon to do pursuant to the application of the constitutional provisions of 1982.

I indicated yesterday that is our position. We hope and expect that these efforts will succeed. I think the best way in a federation to achieve success would be in full co-operation with the provincial governments.

I indicated that should we not be able to do so then I would want to examine with the leaders of the House other alternatives in this regard. That is of course what we would propose to do.

If the very challenging efforts of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs should prove to be unsuccessful over the next five or six weeks, then at an appropriate time we would come to the House with some suggestions as to how we might be able to convey to the people of Canada the options that are there.

One thing is absolutely certain. Should we encounter a wall that would paralyze the activity, and with the clock ticking elsewhere, we will not sit idly by and allow damage to be done to Canada without allowing Canadians themselves to make determinations about their well-being, the future of this great country, and how they want to keep it together.

Mr. Lapierre: Call an election.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says in the background, in the Bloc Quebecois: "Call an election". By the time we call an election, but that is not for now. Now they do not want a referendum because they know they are going to lose a referendum because if you ask Quebecers whether they prefer independence or a united Canada, they will say a united Canada 10 times out of 10, and the Bloc knows it.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister hinted that the process in place to resolve the constitutional debate, the negotiations among the federal, provincial and territorial governments, could fail.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister why the government now thinks that failure is possible. Is there some evidence that the Prime Minister can share with this House? Will the Prime Minister tell Canadians what worries him and makes him perhaps less optimistic?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, We hope and expect that the minister's efforts will be successful in this regard. But we are realistic and we realize that problems can arise when you are dealing with some ten governments.

• (1430)

We are just saying that although we hope to succeed, should we not be able to, we would come before the House to consult with the leaders of the political parties that believe in Canada on valid ways to consult the people of Canada.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister said earlier today that a referendum is one of the options. I think it is clear to all of us in this House that Canadians want to see leaders coming together if at all possible.

Would the Prime Minister be prepared to go to the people with a referendum without the support of the premiers and perhaps without the support of this House? What would that offer look like and who would formulate the offer that would go to the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the offer would look as silly as the question of my hon. friend.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I thought it was a fairly logical question for the Prime Minister. It simply asked who would formulate the offer and what kind of consultation there would be with the Canadian people in a referendum.

I would like to ask a further question about the proposed referendum. The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has often said that a referendum may be used at some time to confirm a national consensus. The Prime Minister is saying that he would not be dealing with the premiers because that process has failed, but that he would force a constitutional resolution through a referendum.

Whether it is before a referendum, during a referendum or after a referendum, under the Constitution of Canada the premiers must be involved. Is the Prime Minister trying to force a consensus on the premiers or is he trying to build a consensus among Canadians in this country with the premiers who will have to make a final decision?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has made that very clear. He has been working non-stop. I think that all members of all parties in this House will recognize his enormous commitment to the unity and the well-being of Canada and will applaud him for his unremitting efforts to secure that ongoing unity.

My hon. friend knows that to bring this about, the minister is following the constitutional prescription of 1982 in meeting with the provincial governments and in seeking to secure their agreement for constitutional amendments. That is the way it has to be. We are going to continue to deploy every effort.

We did not indicate that we were expecting a lack of success. We indicated that we were anticipating success, not because we plan to force a consensus on the premiers, but because we expect that the premiers are sufficiently mature and intelligent themselves, which they are, to realize the enormity of the challenge facing Canada and that they will want to put water in their wine and make honourable compromises to keep Canada together.

If the position is going to be, by every government leader, me, myself and I, they may achieve their own point of view but Canada will fail. The object of the exercise is to make sure that Canada succeeds. That is the commitment of the minister, that is the commitment of this government and I am sure that is the commitment of everybody in this House of Commons with the exception of a couple in the back row.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Since the free trade agreement was signed, the United States has not stopped violating the spirit of the agreement. Now a bill in the Massachusetts legislature would again violate it by taking direct aim at the way Quebec and Hydro Quebec manage their borrowing. This morning, we just learned that six other states might do the same.

Besides a mere letter, what real pressure will the government apply to support Quebec in its struggle to safeguard the spirit of the free trade agreement?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member has referred to is something that does concern us very much. These proposed actions, taken by state legislatures, could have the effect of boycotting Quebec Hydro bonds. That is something that could well be contrary to the free trade agreement. We have been in touch with members of the Massachusetts legislature on this. We propose to follow this matter very closely and take whatever action is necessary to put forward our rights under the free trade agreement in order that this should not happen.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this is really part of a much larger problem. In an agreement between countries, not only the letter of the law but the spirit that underlies it is equally important. This is all the more true in an agreement as sloppily negotiated as was the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Canada is being hammered not only by Washington, but by individual states that are going off on tangents of their own; California in terms of the exports of natural gas from Alberta and now we see Massachusetts and six other states in terms of Quebec bonds, and through a concerted attack on Canadian owned business as a result of a flagrant misuse of buy American policies.

These issues are not going to be resolved by the dispute settlement mechanism or by simple letters to state legislators. They are destroying the very spirit the government claims was inherent in the free trade agreement.

What specific measures is the government going to undertake to protect Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is overstating the position. We have expressed concern about this. We do not like what is happening. But for my hon. friend to cast a blanket condemnation of every action that is taken and saying that this is completely counter to the spirit and the rules of the free trade agreement, is wrong when he says that.

We have taken actions under the free trade agreement to protect our rights. We have to respect the fact that the U.S. may want to as well.

On this particular issue we fundamentally disagree and we are going to make that point known. We will take every action possible to ensure that we protect our position on that.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Yesterday's pathetic spectacle of the minister's disembodied voice spewing some sweet assurance to the fishermen, while in the comfort of his flying machine he flitted around in circles above—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am sure the hon. member would like to put his question.

Mr. Simmons: I say that spectacle won the point better than he knows. Jobs are being lost, fish stocks are being ravaged while the chicken goes around in circles with its head cut off.

What fishermen need from this minister is more than just lip service, they need some indication, some proof from him that he is not afraid in and out of cabinet to advocate the only way out of this dilemma, the takeover of the management of those straddling stocks.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I went 1,500 miles to show my support for our Newfoundland fishermen and for our flotilla.

A week ago last Thursday the hon. gentleman would not go 500 yards to show his support at the standing committee on fisheries when the meeting was called to deal with this very issue. The hon. gentleman and none of his colleagues were there. I will go 1,500 miles and you will not even go 1,500 yards to show your support.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to what we were doing, I want to congratulate Atlantic Airways, the provincial airline that is supplying the service that gives us the best surveillance and enforcement system in the world in the northwest Atlantic. It is a superb service which I checked out yesterday and can verify myself.

I flew over 12 Spanish ships, two Canadian patrol vessels, one European Community patrol vessel, one Coast Guard vessel and seven Canadian vessels in the flotilla and passed on to them our best wishes and our unremitting efforts to help them in the struggle to establish a proper conservation policy.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, what he did not mention was that the plane allowed him to avoid taking the boat and his Gravol pills.

If he is talking about miles and yards, when will he go the few hundred feet from his bench to the cabinet room and sell the idea of a takeover of the management of stocks because only today the European fisheries commissioner says that only a trifling amount of fish is involved; that he doubts Canada's sincerity very much.

Is this not proof that the minister's message is not getting through to Mr. Marin or to the gentleman who looks after constitutional affairs sometimes? Is it not true that the minister is not getting his message through and that his campaign of information is a flop? Is it not time to focus on this issue so we can get on to his other disasters, his mismanagement and give—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I usually have to take my Gravol pills when I watch the hon. gentleman opposite ask questions. That is when.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Well, it is getting awfully hard to help. Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to what we are doing, today, for example, we are supporting and have made preparations for Premier Wells to visit the UNCED conference in New York to help pursue our resolution on the straddling stocks. We are prepared to work with anyone who is prepared to work with us.

What we are not prepared to do is to pretend to the people of Newfoundland and Canada that there is some quick, easy solution to this problem. There is no quick, easy solution, but we are going to pursue every avenue open to us.

Mr. Marin, the commissioner for fisheries in the European Community in his statement today certainly did not indicate that his conscience has been pricked at all or that the community is going to take any effective action. We will be looking to the international community to shame the European Community into observing their responsibilities as international citizens, to stop this overfishing and we will work with anyone, including the hon. gentleman to accomplish that objective.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade, who knows that the February 21 draft North American free trade agreement text in article 1401 lists non-energy pipeline operations for unrestricted cross-border use.

Since Canada has no legislative prohibition on large scale exports of water and a number of corporations already hold rights to massive volumes of Canadian water which they would like to export to the United States, and could through article 1401, can the minister assure this House that the final NAFTA text which would override all Canadian legislation and policy on water exports will contain specific wording prohibiting large scale water exports from Canada through non-energy pipelines as can be done now under article 1404.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me state categorically that there has not been under negotiation nor will there be under negotiation any provision for the large scale export of water. What my friend has said and what his leader has done is to take, quite out of context, a definition of non-energy pipelines.

Non-energy pipelines can be used for coal slurry, for other non-energy related natural gas uses and those types of transportation have to be defined under the terms of the North American free trade agreement.

To take the big leap that my hon. friend and the leader of the New Democratic Party have made of saying that automatically means that there will be large scale exports of water is totally ridiculous. He knows it and she knows it because they both know that it is contrary to the policies of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, coal is an energy, but that just, once again, reveals the level of assurance we get from the Minister for International Trade. I will put my supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment who claims to be doing an environmental assessment of NAFTA as it goes along.

I would like to ask the minister in his responsibilities for water export policy and legislation a very simple question to which he can give a very direct answer. Is it the minister's understanding of the present text of the North American free trade agreement that Canadian water could be exported through non-energy pipelines? Yes or no?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade just gave a very clear answer. The Government of Canada has a policy and we intend to respect it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We are wearing yellow flowers today as a sign of solidarity for the family of a Montreal grandmother, Henriette Haddad, who has been held in Lebanon for nearly seven years. Mrs. Haddad's family is in Ottawa today and wants to ask the Prime Minister a question directly.

Given the inaction of his minister of external affairs, would the Prime Minister be prepared today to take on the case of the only Canadian hostage still held or missing in Lebanon?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this file has been thoroughly reviewed by me. I would be very happy to share it with the Prime Minister but I can assure the hon. member and the Haddad family that it has been reviewed. Much of it is public, nearly all of it is public in terms of the actions that have been taken on behalf of the Haddad family and on behalf of Mrs. Haddad.

This government will continue as it has in the past to show sympathy for the family and to follow any leads that we have that will lead to a satisfactory conclusion by way of information if it is forthcoming or to find out exactly what happened.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Haddad family is not looking for sympathy. They are looking for action.

Yesterday in this House the Secretary of State for External Affairs continued to insist against all evidence to the contrary that Mrs. Haddad had not been a hostage.

Last night on national television we saw two ministers of the Lebanese government state categorically that she was a hostage.

The fact is that this 66–year old Montreal grandmother has been held for more than 2,000 days, possibly in Lebanon. We do not know whether she is still alive.

Given the seriousness of the situation and as he has done in other cases, will the Prime Minister personally intervene and contact the President of Lebanon? Will he let him know that the Canadian government is taking this issue to heart and that the Canadian government recognizes Mrs. Haddad is a Canadian being held hostage and deserves our support and our help?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is quite right. Mrs. Haddad does deserve our full support and our help. That is what the Government of Canada has been doing through the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We have conveyed to the Government of Lebanon our view throughout that Canada's efforts ought to be assisted fully by all authorities to the extent that they exist in that very troubled land.

We have received the kind of assurances on which the minister of external affairs has based her previous statements.

Ms. Copps: The minister is wrong.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says the minister is wrong. I suppose she may be. Anything is possible.

The minister has given full and complete assurance to the hon. member, to members of the House and to the Haddad family regarding everything she knows and the Government of Canada knows, and everything that we have done and would be ready to do to assist Mrs. Haddad and her family.

Maybe my hon. friend knows something we do not know because she just said we are wrong. She may be right. I would be happy to meet with my hon. friend to get this information, but I can tell her and the Haddad family that the government takes this extremely seriously. We have done what we think is just about everything that a government can do. If there is more that we can do, we will.

I want to assure the House that the minister for external affairs has personally kept me informed, has informed the cabinet on a regular basis, and has done quite a tremendous job in defending the interests of Mrs. Haddad and the Haddad family.

This is not to say that we cannot improve and if we can, the Government of Canada certainly will.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, also to the Prime Minister on the same question.

Yesterday the minister for external affairs said the government had done everything possible in this particular case.

• (1450)

But last night we learned that the Canadian government officials never contacted the family of the man abducted with Mrs. Haddad. The government officials never spoke to other hostages who had been taken hostage and who had been with Mrs. Haddad. Canadian government officials never spoke to the last people in Lebanon who had seen Mrs. Haddad. So not everything was done.

I would like to have a commitment from the Prime Minister that he and his government officials will do everything possible, will do what other countries have done to support their citizens who have been taken hostage.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Prime Minister has assured the House and the family that that is exactly what we are doing and will do.

We followed up at the time under very chaotic circumstances in Lebanon in any way that we could with the means that were available. We did not have an embassy in Lebanon for quite some considerable time as other countries have not.

I want to assure the hon. member as well that missing persons are very important to us. What is important is that when people go missing, whether they are hostages or not, they deserve the full support of their government.

It is the fact that they are missing and that they have disappeared that is of primary concern to us. We have followed up through groups in Lebanon and through the Lebanese government now that it has reformed. Those things have not lead us to any additional conclusions.

I am quite prepared to backtrack on all of those meetings that we have had and to talk to people again. If there is new information we will continue to follow new leads. I cannot do more than that.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, now the United Nations and the special representative of the United Nations, Mr. Picco, will go to Lebanon to intervene in the case of Mrs. Haddad.

I want to ask the minister if she and her officials in the Canadian government will give Mr. Picco, the representative of the United Nations for hostage taking matters, their full support and the support of the Canadian government on this matter?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Mr. Picco has a list of a number of individuals who are listed as missing in Lebanon.

Not only does he have our full support, but we also provided him with some considerable information. I raised the matter with him directly myself. The answer to the hon. member's question is of course, yes.

LABELLING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In his announcement yesterday on the government's fight against alcohol, the minister made no mention of actions to prevent foetal alcohol syndrome, one of the leading causes of child retardation and behavioural problems in Canada.

Since both the Government of United States and the Government of Yukon already require that warning labels be prominently displayed on alcoholic beverages warning of the severe consequences of drinking during pregnancy, will the government take this positive step and require such warning labels throughout Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I know that foetal alcohol syndrome is an issue particularly in British Columbia. It was raised at times when I was in the province.

What I have to say is that any alcohol consumption represents a threat, particularly for pregnant women and it has to be known as such. That is why we are working with the provinces, and particularly in his own province with community organizations to develop awareness about the consumption of alcohol.

I can say that it is working because it is well supported. We are not yet ready, however, to determine any commitment in terms of labelling because we believe that it still has to be studied. That is what we are doing in the department.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

The minister knows that the only opposition to warning labels comes from the brewers and distillers. Since the government has already said that Canadian borders will be open to beer, both interprovincially and internationally, will the government recognize the health consequences as well as the commercial consequences of its actions, and require national, uniform warning labels on all alcoholic beverages?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said that we recognize the problem of consumption of alcohol, particularly for pregnant women.

The question he raised would normally be considered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare because so far British Columbia is the only province where that issue has been raised in Canada, but discussions at the health minister level are wanted. If there is a unanimous position by the ministers of health in Canada to do something about it, we will certainly consider their recommendation.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): My question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Last September the Government of Canada said it was in favour of entrenching property rights in the Canadian Constitution. Is that still the government's position?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the government had proposed the entrenchment of property rights. That was discussed in public hearings across the country. There was not a great deal of support evident in those public hearings, and that recommendation did not receive the unanimous support of the House in the report of the special joint committee.

The matter is still being considered by ministers in the meetings that will commence again next week. At some point in that process we are going to have to reduce the constitutional agenda to those items which can command enough support to be carried into the Constitution.

I would hope that Canadians who are interested in the question of property rights would make their views known quickly to all governments as we get into these next stages of the constitutional discussions.

PACKAGING AND LABELLING

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

As the House knows, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is spending a great deal of time in forcing packaging regulations by Canadian manufacturers while ignoring the enforcement of the same regulations on imported goods.

Could the minister please tell the House if he is considering shifting the efforts of his department to the enforcement of Canadian regulations on imported goods?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It is a very important issue and we recognize that.

With my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, since 1989 we have enforced a joint team at the borders to look after that issue. Mislabelling is important to us. We are doing everything we can to make sure that the regulations which apply to Canada also apply to the Americans and to people from other countries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is speaking for the Minister of National Defence.

Three weeks ago the Minister of National Defence said he was cancelling the promised $100 million supply depot in Moncton for budget reasons. On Thursday the minister announced a $10 million expansion at another site.

Three weeks ago we did not have any money and now we have the money. If it was not economically feasible three weeks ago, why is it now suddenly politically feasible? Are there two pots of money or is there a double standard?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated in the House last week, what we have proceeded with is a consolidation of our supply operations throughout Canada. We have taken the existing five depots and consolidated them into two. That will result in an annual saving of approximately $35 million. That obviously is consistent with the requirements that our department has to help reach the deficit reduction requirements.

I might add that the facility in Montreal will not be built by the government. It will be built by the private sector and arranged on a lease back basis to the government. Subsequently we will still continue to have the savings of $35 million per year.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Jeffrey Simpson just recently said in an article on defence: "When it comes to budget cutting political requirements invariably come first".

Mr. Speaker: I wonder, given the time, if the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that the government would respond on the basis that the supply depot in Downsview should be consolidated with the one in Montreal, when all the internal reports indicate that it should have gone to Kingston. The same information is available for Moncton.

Why is the government playing politics with national defence and with the lives of employees at the Moncton supply depot?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleague that I know all these decisions are difficult. Indeed many people indicate that we should do further rationalization of our infrastructure. We recognize that changes have to be made to meet the realities of today.

I would like to advise the member, though, that when we looked at the total Canadian scene, the rationalization of depots throughout the country, it made more sense to establish them and maintain them in Edmonton and to work with the existing facilities in Longue Pointe, Montreal, rather than to establish any new Greenfield operations, which I think the hon. member would agree would not have made any logical sense.

CORE AREA INITIATIVE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Core Area Initiative program in Winnipeg died. The pallbearers were the federal and provincial Tories. What a national disgrace.

Why did this government refuse to renew funding for this program which has helped some 3,000 inner city Winnipegers find jobs? Why did this government again turn its back on Winnipeg, one of the poorest cities in Canada? Why did—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that it had been agreed to end core two, which ended yesterday, at the end of the fiscal year. There was a lot of overhead. We want to have an agreement between the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba on funding that is now being used by the Government of Canada, for example, in training of especially aboriginal people in Winnipeg to give them the kind of training they need so that they can integrate into the job market.

It is better for us to spend the money for training and for those people than to maintain something that has now ended and which was agreed to end by all three levels of government.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of Dr. Peter Tancig, Minister of Science and Technology of the Republic of Slovania.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINTS OF ORDER

CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to clarify a point I made in response to the member for Skeena and pursuant to a matter that the leader of the NDP had raised.

Non-energy pipelines can include coking coal, other minerals, chemical feed stocks, and non-petroleum based gases as well as oil and natural gas. I wanted to make that clear so that there would be no misunderstanding whatsoever about the import of my answer.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Did the minister say that non-energy pipelines are for gas, oil, coking coal, and chemicals? If that is so, what are the energy pipelines for?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, coking coal is not energy. Other minerals are not energy. Non-petroleum based gases are not energy. These are the uses that non-energy pipelines can be put to.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to statements made by the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin. They are rooted in citation 64 on reflections on members and citation 92 on interfering with—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, I wonder if the hon. member is here. I would say to the hon. member for Skeena it is customary on a question of privilege that involves another member to ensure that the other member is here when the point is being made. That is a courtesy which has been extended for many years across the Chamber.

I wonder if the hon. member could just perhaps quickly check to see whether the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin is here, and I will come back to the hon. member.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier this afternoon in Question Period the minister of fisheries, in response to a question by my colleague, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, intimated in his answer that the Liberals were not in attendance at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries on March 19 which discussed overfishing.

I wish to correct that by saying that the member for Cardigan, the member for South West Nova and myself were present at that meeting throughout those discussions. The meeting was called as a result of the efforts of the member for Burin—St. George's. He was unavoidably detained and made arrangements for us to represent him and his colleagues at the standing committee on fisheries.

I say this to correct the impression left by the minister of fisheries that we are not concerned with that very serious issue when indeed we are.

Speaker's Ruling

POINT OF ORDER

BILL C-63—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Monday, March 30, 1992, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond rose on a point of order relating to the omnibus nature of Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies. During consideration of this matter, the hon. members for Kamloops, North Island—Powell River, Ottawa—Vanier and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader also made contributions. The Chair is grateful for their interventions. I have reviewed the matter and am now in a position to rule on the procedural arguments made against this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to wind down six government corporations or agencies: the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission of Canada, and the Science Council of Canada. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has objected to this bill because it is asking parliamentarians to pronounce themselves on several important issues in one single question. He has argued that the bill lacks relevancy in so far as its substance is not linked to its long title, and argues further that it would be extremely difficult to debate six principles at second reading or to move amendments at report stage.

Before addressing each of the issues raised by the hon. member, it would be useful to briefly review what an omnibus bill is. As I mentioned in my ruling of June 8, 1988, there is no precise definition for omnibus bills; the most exact definition the Chair could find and agree with is that given by the hon. member for Windsor West, which is found at page 15880 of Hansard for May 30, 1988:

> The essential defence of an omnibus procedure is that the bill in question, although it may seem to create or to amend many disparate statutes, in effect has one basic principle or purpose which ties together all the proposed enactments and thereby renders the bill intelligible for parliamentary purposes.

Clearly one of the purposes of omnibus bills is to group together multiple statutory amendments so that discussion in the House may be focused. As the government House leader in his former role as opposition critic explained on March 1, 1982 at page 15482 of Hansard in relation to the Canada post office bill:

> —(Bill C-42) amended 14 other statutes to make them consistent with the new statute dealing with the post office. It is clear that grouping these is an aid, not a hindrance, to proper parliamentary discussion and decision.

Although omnibus bills are sometimes welcomed by both sides of the House, several objections have arisen to their use.

[English]

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond identified a number of them. He argued that the long title of Bill C-63 should properly indicate the purpose of the bill—that is to say, the termination of specific agencies—by naming the affected acts, thus establishing the relevancy between the different sections of the bill. To illustrate the lack of relevance between the various sections of the bill, he quoted from citation 626 of Beauchesne's sixth edition:

> Although there is no specific set of rules or guidelines governing the content of a bill, there should be a theme of relevancy amongst the contents of a bill. They must be relevant to and subject to the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title of the bill.

In response, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader argued:

> The umbrella of this particular legislation was made very clear in the budget. It indicated very clearly that the government planned to dissolve or terminate a number of corporations and other bodies for a central theme, being the ability to cut government expenditures and, therefore, as much as possible relieve the burden on the Canadian taxpayers—.

[English]

As to the question of the long title, I wish to refer all hon. members to my ruling of June 8, 1988 on page 16257 of Hansard:

> A further point raised—was the insufficiency of detail in the long title of the Bill because it did not list all of the statutes being amended therein. Hon. members might wish to consult Dreidger's The Composition of Legislation, Legislative Forms and Precedents for information on this point—On pages 153 and 154 there is an explanation of Canadian practice as it relates to long titles, which clearly demonstrates that every Act being amended need not be mentioned in the title—If hon. members feel, however, that such a course is necessary, I suggest that they should proceed by way of amendment and not by a decision of the Speaker to reject the Bill.

The principal objections of the hon. members for Cape Breton—East Richmond, Kamloops, and Ottawa—Vanier are that this bill espoused six principles dealing with this disparate elements such as employment and immigration, ocean development, science policy, economic issues, and so on. They contend that it would be difficult to debate the full complexities of the affected areas at second reading and to come to a single decision. To this general argument, we can turn to the reply of Speaker Lamoureux on January 23, 1969 at page 618 of the Journals:

> The vote on second reading is less a vote on the principle of the bill and more a decision of the House to send the bill on for further consideration at subsequent stages of proceedings. If this interpretation is correct, it seems it should be even less difficult for honourable Members to vote either for or against the main motion, since such vote would not constitute either approval of, or opposition to, the principle of the several propositions contained in the omnibus bill.

In a lengthy ruling on May 11, 1977, Speaker Jerome brought greater explanation on pages 5522 to 5524 of Hansard:

> —there can be no doubt that a motion containing two or more substantive provisions is quite distinct from a procedural motion or a motion which is generally described as having only the effect of dealing with the progress of a bill. The practice in respect of substantive motions has never been extended to those motions which relate to the progress of a bill. The use of the omnibus amending bill is well enshrined in our practices, and I really can find no reason to set aside my predecessor's very clear and sound reasoning, or the practice. Nor can I find any authority which would support an order of the Chair at this second reading stage that the bill be divided—

This still leaves, as it has in the past every time this kind of argument has been put forward, some very deep concern about whether our practices in respect of bills do in fact provide a remedy for the very legitimate complaint of the hon. member that a bill of this kind gives the government, under our practices, the right to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related subjects—

I think an hon. Member of the House ought to have the right to compel the House to vote on each separate question—

Therefore, while I carefully guard the specific rulings on the contradiction between the principles of the bill and the motions that might be put forward until the actual stage arises, because we are speculating as to what the cases may be, it seems to me in advance that in a bill of this sort—a member ought to be able, if he wishes, to attempt through motions to delete under Standing Order 75(5) to isolate those sections which he feels ought not to be amended or that ought to be voted upon separately, without offending the principle of the bill. I think that would give the hon. member and other hon. members an opportunity that they should enjoy, to put their position on the record, which I think ought to be known, and also to require others in the House to vote in respect of that position.

In the same vein, Speaker Sauvé also expressed her opinion on June 20, 1983 at page 26538 of Hansard in this manner:

Thus, although some occupants of the Chair have expressed concern about the practice of incorporating several distinct principles in a single bill, they have consistently found that such bills are procedurally in order and properly before the House.

[English]

The Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons has not been given any specific authority over the form or content of omnibus bills. From time to time, suggestions have been put forward by the Chair on how hon. members may voice their positions on various sections of omnibus bills. As Speaker Jerome indicated, for example, report stage motions to delete certain clauses may be one way of proceeding. As I stated on June 8, 1988 at page 16257 of Hansard:

Until the House adopts specific rules relating to omnibus bills, the Chair's role is very limited and the Speaker should remain on the sidelines as debate proceeds and the House resolves the issue.

In conclusion, under the circumstances I cannot accept the objections made to this bill to divide or set aside the progress of Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

I thank all hon. members for their contribution.

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Very briefly I want to thank the Chair and Table for returning back to the House so expeditiously and giving us a ruling with regard to Bill C-63.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the comments of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. Some of these questions are not easy and they require a lot of work. I think that all members who have to work on these judgments very much appreciate the thanks and appreciation extended by members.

The hon. member for Skeena. We are returning to the hon. member's question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR CARIBOO—CHILCOTIN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin is present in the House. The question of privilege that I raised arose originally from his remarks of March 13 and have been carried on since then.

I would draw your attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, sixth edition, citation 64 on "Reflections on Members", and citation 92 on "Interfering with Members" which says:

92. A valid claim of privilege in respect to interference with a Member must relate to the Member's parliamentary duties and not to the work the Member does in relation to that Member's constituency.

I believe that—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could just get some clarification here and then I will hear the member out. Were these comments made outside the Chamber?

Mr. Fulton: They were. The most recent remarks were made outside the Chamber and I can in fact come to them very quickly.

The issue arose on March 13 in a statement made by the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin which I and I believe the Chamber believe that he subsequently withdrew on March 25 and put an end to it. That resulted from a point of order that I raised and that you reserved on. As I said, the member rose on March 25 and apologized to the House thereby, I believe, withdrawing the remarks from the record.

On March 26 I publicly thanked the member for that apology. A letter was in fact published yesterday in the newspaper in his constituency. However, the newspaper in his constituency quotes him yesterday, March 31, 1992, in the Williams Lake Tribune on the front page where it suggests that the member has now moved the attack on the Library of Parliament. It says and I quote: "Worthy is upset at the use of the parliamentary library and has sent a letter to the Speaker of the House, John Fraser, asking him to look into the matter. They used the library of the House in an improper manner. It's a dirty fight by Skelly and Fulton".

The member is fully aware because I have stated it in this House and I have stated it outside of this House that I did not get the parliamentary library to prepare the paper. I said so in a letter which appeared yesterday in the newspaper in his own constituency which says: "Contrary to Mr. Worthy's statement I did not commission the parliamentary library to prepare a research paper on share groups in B.C. Contrary to Mr. Worthy's suggestion that I criticized share groups in the paper, the paper was researched by a professional at the Library of Parliament and I had no input in the paper whatsoever nor am I quoted in it. One would think Mr. Worthy would have checked this out before raising it in Parliament as a personal attack, but he didn't. My respect for him is restored by his apology in Parliament". That was run in his own newspaper.

The reason that I raise this, is that this is not solely a personal attack, not only on myself but on the member for Comox—Alberni, but it is in fact an attack on part of the institution of Parliament. It in fact affects my parliamentary duties, not in relation to my constituency of Skeena, but in my capacity to be involved in issues in the entire environmental field in my home province of British Columbia where the member is suggesting that somehow I and another member of this House made an improper use of part of this House. In fact, I had no role to play whatsoever in the preparation or whatever of the paper that was prepared by the parliamentary library.

I do not think it is an appropriate kind of statement to leave on the public record, either that members were making improper use of the library or that the the Library of Parliament is somehow involved in some kind of improper activity.

I seek one more time some clarification from the member and from the Chair. Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am perfectly capable of carrying on thee kinds of things outside the House, but I do it to protect the privileges of all members in this House.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin in a moment.

The withdrawal that the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin made in the House was with reference to a comment he had made concerning the hon. member for Skeena, but that comment was made in the House. The hon. member is signifying agreement to that.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member brought this up as a question of privilege because it gives me a chance to get this on the House record, which I was having difficulty doing.

My apology the other day was because I misused statement period to make a statement that could be construed as an attack on the hon. member. That was a misuse of the statement period, and for this I apologized.

My primary concern is for the people I am trying to defend, the people who are under attack. It is the grassroots people, the workers, cattlemen, mayors, aldermen, people who belong to the share groups of British Columbia who have been subject to what they consider to be a severe and unfair attack by two members of this House.

I did write a letter to the Speaker and I hope there will be some action. I do not accuse the Library of Parliament of being in the wrong. I am questioning what I consider to be the misuse of the Library of Parliament by two members .

The document produced by the library, sent out with an accompanying letter by these members, implies things about this document that I do not think are there. They are misusing a document produced by this House.

I also have some concerns abut how this researcher in the library was able to arrive at the conclusions, but that is a subject matter I have asked the Speaker to enter into. I have not seen the article in the paper. The member did not advise he was raising this point of privilege, so I had no chance to prepare for it.

The same day I stood in this House to indicate my mistake in using the statement period, I was telephoned by a newspaper because it had already received the letter from the member. I was asked what the situation was and I stated it.

If you look at the documentation I have, it indicates that the two members are, in what appears to be a fairly methodical manner, trying to impugn grassroots people belonging to the share groups throughout British Columbia. I think it is a terrible thing for members to do. I will continue to do the best I can to defend the share groups from what I consider to be an improper attack and improper use of the facilities of this House.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has raised a matter which he agrees took place outside of this Chamber and the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin has responded.

There are two aspects of this. The first is whether or not the comments made outside the House affect the privileges of the hon. member who is complaining. On any careful analysis of what privilege is, one will note that the act or comment complained about must either in fact diminish the rights and the ability of the member of Parliament to carry on his or her duties or potentially do that.

The hon. member for Skeena has indicated to the Chair and to the House that he is more than capable of handling debate outside the House, and that is so. If I was to allow privilege in this case, I would have to be saying that this debate which is taking place between himself and the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin outside the House is somehow impinging on his privileges and his ability to carry out his duties as a member of Parliament. I do not think we can go that far. As a consequence, I will have to reject the hon. member on the question of privilege.

There is another point here. That point has been alluded to by the hon. member for Caribou—Chilcotin. It apparently concerns the content of a paper written by an official in the Library of Parliament. The hon. member has brought that to the attention of the Chair by separate letter, not through this particular application this afternoon, and I am considering that matter.

I want to point out, first of all, that the librarian is not an officer of this House; the library is an administrative service of the House of Commons. The research papers are produced by the Library of Parliament. I think all hon. members would agree that it is a very extensive service indeed to which a great many members refer. Certainly I would think it is probably the view of members here that over many years the service that has been given to us by the Library of Parliament has been absolutely splendid and given us a great deal of assistance in doing those things which we must do as members of Parliament in the public interest.

However, I will look at this particular matter and I will respond to the hon. member for Caribou—Chilcotin. In the meantime, for any of those who have been listening or watching this, this really is an argument that is taking place outside the Chamber. The withdrawal that took place the other day was a withdrawal, as the hon. member for Caribou—Chilcotin has again stated, of improper words relating to the hon. member for Skeena made in this Chamber. At that time, of course, I thanked the hon. member for his courtesy in doing that. In fairness, the hon. member for Skeena has publicly commended the hon. member for that withdrawal. The rest of the debate they have to do the best they can with.

As I say, on the question of the paper, I will try to see if there is some resolution and some assistance that can be given in this matter by the Chair.

I thank both hon. members for their courtesy in the interventions today.

PETITIONS

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, in which people from the Moncton area are petitioning this Chamber, asking that a referendum be held on all constitutional matters.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have here over 150 petitions and several thousand signatures from people in my riding of Hamilton Mountain, from all over Ontario, from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and other parts of Canada.

I would like to add these to the over 350,000 signatures I have already personally presented from citizens who feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system.

They are calling upon this government to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are very serious and abhorrent to society. They ask this government to further amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

IRAQ

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition in the House today that relates to the conflict between the United States and Iraq.

The petition relates to recent statements by the President of the United States that he is considering bombing Iraq if it does not follow United Nations' policies.

The petitioners would have the House of Commons and the government condemn the statements of the President of the United States and urge the government to work toward diplomatic solutions to the problem.

HOUSING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present a petition signed by about 150 residents of the city of Hamilton who are expressing their dismay at the fact that the government caved in to the Reformers in their caucus who demanded an end to the co-op housing program.

These people are calling on Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit co-operative housing program and to maintain Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by hundreds of residents of Burnaby, Rosewood, Langley and a number of other communities in British Columbia, as well as Sackville, New Brunswick and other New Brunswick communities, which points out that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons, and discrimination in sentencing and parole. They point out that the only relief which is available from this harsh punishment is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

It therefore calls upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to their homes in Canada.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 234, 238 and 264.

[Text]

Question No. 234—Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova):

Have our negotiators at the GATT indicated specific areas which may adversely affect Canadians after the GATT is signed and, if so, what is the list of specific adversities?

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): No. It is not possible to pinpoint specific areas or sectors within the Canadian economy which may be adversely affected by the Uruguay round trade negotiations because the level of tariff/non-tariff barrier reduction has not yet been agreed on a product or sectoral basis.

The expectation of our negotiators is that whatever depth of barrier reduction is agreed in specific areas—and indeed Canada is pressing for barrier elimination in a number of resource and advanced technology sectors of export interest to it—every effort will be made to ensure that the changes will be introduced gradually so as to permit Canadians to take advantage of and to adjust to the new market conditions.

Question No. 238—Mr. Mifflin:

What is the per capita defence spending by province for each of the years 1970 to 1991?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): It should be noted that figures are unavailable for 1970–71 (the methodology for capturing Department of National Defence spending by province was changed in 1971) and for 1991–92 (the current fiscal year is not yet complete).

Question No. 264—Mr. Mifflin:

In consideration of all national defence expenditures in Canada, what is the per capita expenditure by province and territory for each of the years 1980 to 1992?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Information requested has been provided in response to Question No. 238 answered this day.

Figures are unavailable for 1991–92 as the fiscal year is not yet complete.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

That this House call upon the government to restore the Court Challenges Program.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion is simple and straightforward and, I believe, makes it incumbent on the House to consider this matter.

Since 1978, the Court Challenges Program has made it possible for a number of private citizens and minority groups to have their constitutional rights clarified before the courts. Supported over the years by all political parties, the program has been an essential factor in the constitutional development of language rights. I am thinking of section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870; and since 1982 the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and sections 16 to 23 on matters that are vital to this country, section 15 on equality rights, section 27 on multicultural heritage, and, finally, the equality of men and women, as guaranteed under section 28.

In its report tabled in the House in 1989, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, consisting of members of all three political parties in the House, was unanimous in recognizing the fact that this program was important, effective and indispensable, and recommended that the government extend the program until the year 2000.

Initially the program was funded by the Department of the Secretary of State, in co-operation with the Department of Justice. I was here in 1977 when the program started, as a result of the Forest case in Manitoba. The program's administration was later transferred in 1985 to the Canadian Council for Social Development, under an agreement with the federal government. This agreement expired in July 1990.

At the time, the Secretary of State announced that the program would be administered by the Human Rights Research and Education Centre of the University of Ottawa, for a period of five years until 1995. When it announced the termination of this program in the budget, the government broke its contract with the centre and the program's staff.

[English]

From 1985 to February 27, 1992 the program financed about 250 cases, 77 of which were about linguistic rights. The program is at the origin of the most significant rulings in the interpretation of our Constitution on linguistic rights and equality rights.

Speaking of equality rights, I want to pay special tribute to our critic, the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, who cannot be here today. She is in hospital. We would like to send Shirley our best wishes.

Looking at the rulings of the Supreme Court of Canada, one could mention the Manitoba appeal on legislative bilingualism in Manitoba, the Mahé ruling on school administration in Alberta, the Swain ruling on the rights of mentally handicapped people, the Tétreault-Gaboury ruling on the rights of people 65 years and older and the Canadian Newspapers Company regarding the confidentiality of victims of sexual abuse.

This program helped Canadians clarify their rights. I know that the majority does not like sometimes to be told by the courts that it is not as generous, as open, as caring as it should be or as the Constitution of this country accords Canadians.

[Translation]

As official languages critic for the Liberal Party, Mr. Speaker, I could give you a list of all the cases funded by this program and heard by the courts. I must say the program was extremely helpful in clarifying these issues.

There have been a number of letters and other forms of communication from private citizens and organizations across the country, protesting the termination of this program. One expression of concern came from the Association culturelle franco-canadienne de la Saskatchewan, in a letter to the Prime Minister dated March 4, 1992. and I quote:

> Universal access to the courts to defend our basic rights—one of the pillars of Canadian democracy—has vanished, which is a matter of utmost concern.

• (1540)

Another quote from the Federation of Francophone and Acadian Communities of Canada to the Prime Minister dated March 16, 1992 said:

> We have had to take almost all provincial governments to court for them to stop humiliating us and depriving us of our schools.

Another one is an editorial in Le Droit dated February 3, 1992:

> The Court Challenges Program was the best way that minorities and a whole range of disadvantaged groups had to protect themselves from the continual abuse of various levels of government.

Another quote is from the Association of French School Boards of Ontario, dated March 31, 1992, yesterday:

> If the Court Challenges Program is not reinstated, the government will have sealed the fate of minority language rights and it will be possible to violate them with impunity, and the official-language minorities will be unable to challenge such action in court.

On March 9, 1992, the Canadian Bar Association wrote:

> It seems ironical that this program was cancelled on the day before the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was published, since this report deals with challenges to equality rights and the rights of linguistic minorities.

[English]

The press release of the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled of March 2, 1992 stated:

> Cancelling the Court Challenges Program and cutting Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's co-operative housing program will make it more difficult for people with disabilities to achieve equality within the existing system.

The Hon. Bertha Wilson, former judge of the Supreme Court of Canada in her letter to the Minister of Justice on March 4, 1992 stated:

> I have on numerous occasions publicly expressed the view that it is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them and I assumed that the expansion of the Court Challenges Program following the advent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was an effort to address this problem.

An editorial in The Ottawa Citizen of March 3, 1992 stated:

> If the program dies, it will be for the very reason it was born—the disadvantaged who need help aren't a powerful lobby.

We can only openly lament, given the support, the statements of the people I have quoted and the recommendations of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, that the decision by this government is unfortunate and the reasons given to date have been totally unsatisfactory to say at least in my view not at all plausible.

Can it really be said that the program was too expensive for the taxpayers when we consider that between 1985 and 1992 an average of $625,000 per fiscal year was spent to support these cases? This represents a very reasonable sum given the size of the federal government's over-all spending.

Furthermore, have we really come to the point where we are putting a dollar value on the preservation of the fundamental rights of people to get their linguistic rights clarified? Have we come to the stage in this country where disadvantaged groups, be they socially or economically unable to go to the courts because they cannot afford it, then I say we have a serious case of collective examination of our own consciences to do.

The facts clearly show that every province without exception, Mr. Speaker—and I could quote a series of cases in every single province of this country but time being of the essence I cannot do that—has been taken to court, either because they were hostile to giving linguistic minorities their rights or indifferent.

It is unacceptable in this country today that we give for a reason to the people of Canada for abolishing this program that we say we cannot afford it. It is not a costly program. Thanks to this program these rights have been clarified and affirmed. Some of them still need to be clarified and affirmed, notably by the courts and possibly by the Supreme Court of Canada.

There is still much to be done to complete this interpretation of our laws, of section 23 for example. The Right. Hon. Brian Dickson, someone for whom I have great respect, said in the Mahé ruling that this is only the beginning and the courts have a lot of work to do.

As well, the relevant sections of the Canadian Constitution are far from being clarified by the courts. I do not remember it exactly but I think the Americans say: "A constitution is a living tree".

The consequences of abolishing this program would be harmful to Canadians. Even if individuals and groups of individuals finance their own cases in front of the courts the judicial method remains very slow and very expensive. Further, even if the rulings of the Supreme Court of Canada are not followed up in many cases the groups or the individuals must return to the courts and sometimes restart the process. This would result in a heavy burden on them.

They are not rich, but they are proud Canadians. This program addressed their individual rights as Canadians.

[Translation]

Litigation in Canada, especially if it goes as far as the Supreme Court, is extremely expensive. Without the Court Challenges Program, what will parents and parents' groups and official language minorities do if they want to have their constitutional rights recognized? Will they have to hold bazaars, bingos and bean suppers to raise the necessary funds? How many fundraisers will they have to hold to collect the $35,000 needed to start a case or the $5,000 it takes just to have lawyers look into the possibilities? Canadians must be able to say that in Canada, recognition of basic rights is everyone's business and not just the affair of the rich. In many cases, no money means no rights. We know that saying.

However, the Conservative government promised Canadians many times that it would keep this program and we believed it. I would like to quote the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, who said on May 10, 1990: "We believe that this program has an important role to play in helping to clarify some provisions of the charter. Therefore extending the program reaffirms the government's commitment to advancing human rights in Canada."

[English]

In August 1984 the Prime Minister said before the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped: "A Progressive Conservative government will financially assist under the charter of rights all cases deemed to be of national importance. Cases involving the rights of the handicapped and disabled would certainly fall in this category".

[Translation]

I would like to quote the Prime Minister again. This quotation will be longer, but I think that it will be useful. "We will keep the present Court Challenges Program, which helps individuals and groups seeking to obtain a court decision on contentious points relating to language rights under the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We will consult members of minority groups and other interested persons to ensure that the Court Challenges Program is both well designed and effective". This is from a letter that the Prime Minister wrote to the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec on August 14, 1984, when he was Leader of the Opposition.

I have as many quotes and letters we could want. I know that time is pressing and I cannot read them all. Government members have told Canadians time and time again that they would maintain this program. They said they would. We believed them, but they did not keep their word.

• (1550)

Some of us feel the government has borrowed the agenda of the Reform Party. I can hear members saying: "Come on, Jean-Robert". Now listen to me. The Reform Party has never had time for minorities. It does not believe in multiculturalism. It does not believe in bilingualism. Anyone who abolishes the programs and mechanisms that enable multicultural groups and minority language groups to defend their rights before the courts are wrong. This is not the way Canada was built, and it is not the way we want this country to go on.

I say that by taking a leaf from the Reform Party's program they are out of line with the social and economic realities of our country. We will not let the rights of Canadians be violated. That is why I have asked the government to reinstate the Court Challenges Program immediately.

In the current constitutional context, we are talking about creating collective rights as well as individual rights. We are on the verge of creating a new concept that is neither well known nor easy to interpret: collective rights. What are collective rights? When I talk about self-government for aboriginal people, that is a collective right. When we talk about education rights for minority communities, which may be English in Quebec or French outside Quebec, that is a collective right. Section 23 of the Charter concerns collective rights. It is a difficult concept. Distinct society, whether we like it or not, more or less defines a collective right.

By terminating a program whose purpose was to clarify these new individual rights and possibly clarify these collective rights, the Conservative government is not acting sensibly. I intend to do everything I can, together with my leader, who originated the program. I say this because he was there. He was Minister of Justice when the program was established.

A Liberal government will respect the rights of women, aboriginal people, the disabled, language minorities and other minority groups. As I said, I will work very hard to reinstate a program that will reflect our respect for the many facets of Canadian society. I am making a personal commitment, and I believe I have the support of my entire caucus. I even have a letter I sent yesterday to the Prime Minister, signed by practically all members I was able to contact. I could not get in touch with the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, because she is in hospital, and a few other members are outside the country, but everyone I approached in my caucus, including the chairman of a standing committee of the House, the member for Oxford, and the NDP critic, signed this letter which quite simply asks the government to extend the Court Challenges Program.

In conclusion, I urge the government to do its job, to make good on its many promises and to reinstate as soon as possible a program that we truly need here in Canada, one that makes Canada a wonderful country, one of the only countries in the world where these constitutional rights can be defended before the courts. We cannot stop now.

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by joining the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in wishing good health and speedy recovery to the member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. She is indeed a good friend of mine and a good friend of all those who fight for equality and minority rights across this country.

I would like to thank the member for the manner in which he clearly laid out the issue and the comprehensive understanding which he has brought to it. Certainly his defence of the rights of official language communities and minorities from coast to coast has been vigorous and effective throughout. During the time I had the privilege and pleasure to work the official language file with the hon. member as my critic I always knew I could count on his full participation. Certainly he was very helpful in rendering the program fully accountable.

I hope that whatever progress we made was a result of the strength of the partnership we had.

I would like to spend a few minutes responding to the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I think it is fair to say at the outset that my hon. colleague and I, and indeed all of us in this House, recognize the contribution that the Court Challenges Program has made to this country.

It is also fair to say that by any measure the Court Challenges Program has been a successful program.

[Translation]

We must also admit that this program is absolutely incomparable. Nowhere else in the world, be it in the United Kingdom, the United States, Europe or elsewhere, does a government give its citizens the financial resources to challenge its own laws, practices and regulations and to ensure that they are applied fairly and equitably.

[English]

This is a singularly Canadian enterprise, a made-in-Canada program. Canada alone conceived this policy. Canada alone drafted the terms of the program. Canada alone implemented those terms with results that had and will continue to contribute to the development of social policy over the last decade and a half and into the future.

On this point we do not differ. However it should also be acknowledged that it is this government that has spent more than any other government in supporting this type of program. Our contribution has been unprecedented. This is a legacy of which all of us can be justifiably proud, more so than any other party in this House.

Perhaps it would be useful at this point to briefly review the genesis and evolution of the Court Challenges Program. Established in 1978, its initial purpose was to provide financial aid for the preparation and defence of test cases intended to clarify language rights under the Constitution Act of 1867.

After the adoption and proclamation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 the government of the day expanded and updated the program so that litigants would be provided with sufficient funds to challenge federal and provincial legislation pertaining to the equal status of official languages and minority language education rights.

That essentially applied to sections 16 to 23 of the charter.

Some three years later, in April 1985, section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into effect. Shortly thereafter, in September of that same year, this government again broadened the application of the challenges program.

These reforms provided funding for cases to test federal laws, policies, and practices based on the equality clauses of section 15, the equality of sexes clauses of section 28, and the multiculturalism clauses of section 27 when used in conjunction with arguments based on section 15.

At the same time the government decided to give the administration of this program, which until then had been the responsibility of the Department of Secretary of State, to the Canadian Council on Social Development, an independent agency.

[Translation]

We thus ensured that decisions on funding—what cases to choose as precedents, what groups or individuals to finance, what amounts to pay—would be made as they should always have been made, completely independently, without government interference. The evaluation of applications for financial assistance was entrusted to independent boards established by the council.

• (1600)

When the program was renewed for another five years in 1990 administration was transferred to the Human Rights Research and Education Centre located at the University of Ottawa. During these years funds were committed not only to bring test challenges to court but also to conduct research and impact studies, to launch interventions and to monitor case developments.

In fact, in the years since 1985, some $8.5 million was allocated to groups or individuals seeking to clarify the language and equality provisions of the charter.

Since its inception in 1978, some 264 have been granted funding by the program, 99 involving language rights and 165 involving equality rights. Many of these were landmark cases.

Consider for example Bilodeau v. The Attorney General of Manitoba in which the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Government of Manitoba should be required to translate into French all of the laws it has passed in the English language only. All of us understand the importance of this case in the defence of francophone rights.

Or consider the Canadian Disability Rights Council v. Canada in which the trial division of the Federal Court declared unconstitutional and without force or effect and in violation of section 3 of the charter, a provision in the Canada Elections Act that for many years had deprived Canadians with a mental disability of the right to vote.

Consider too the case of Canada Employment and Immigration Commission v. Tétreault-Gaboury in which the Supreme Court ruled section 31 of the Unemployment Insurance Act inconsistent with section 15 of the charter.

The effect of section 31 was to remove applicants age 65 or older from the normal benefit plan and to provide them with a single lump sum retirement benefit amounting to three times the weekly rate to which they would otherwise be entitled.

[Translation]

And the list goes on. I am thinking, for example, of the Ford case in Quebec, the Mercure case in Saskatchewan and the Mahé case in Alberta. All these important decisions were made as a result of challenges financed by the program.

[English]

These, of course, are only a few of the 68 significant and historic decisions rendered by the courts between 1978 and March 1991 as a direct result of the funding provided by the Court Challenges Program.

During those years this program enabled the legal system to adjudicate an extremely broad range of human rights issues, including the rights of prisoners, aboriginal Canadians and the disabled, and discrimination based on age, gender, sexual orientation, citizenship, race, ethnic origin, marital and economic status.

In giving voice to this motion, my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier is essentially recognizing the importance the Court Challenges Program has made in the fight for equality, equality of race, equality of gender, equality of language and equality of access.

These values lie at the very core of the department it is my privilege to administer. Let me say frankly that one must always guard against the impulse of complacency and acknowledge that there is more to be done.

Nevertheless, let me say that I am proud of the progress we have made on any number of fronts to bring Canadians of all cultures and origins into the very centre of life in Canada. It opens up the country to their talent and energy, their ingenuity and creativity. It helps to break down the barriers that have been constructed, to assist persons with disabilities to have full and equal access to mainstream society, to wage war on our most implacable enemies, racism, bigotry, discrimination and illiteracy.

It is citizens, human beings, who build nations and civilizations, not governments. However my department, the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will continue through all of its programs to support this crucial human endeavour.

Times are what they are. There is no escaping current realities. This government cannot simply evade or blindly shirk its fiscal responsibilities.

The economic climate in Canada today is very tough. It is tough everywhere and it requires equally tough responses, decisions that will not and cannot always be popular or welcomed.

Our resources are finite. Our resources are stretched. Everyone knows that. With the resources that are available, we must prioritize. We must make hard choices. Across Canada today everyone is being forced to make hard choices.

Now it is true that the Court Challenges Program was never intended to provide perpetual access to minority and equality groups seeking to challenge federal legislation in the courts or to underwrite their efforts.

It is true that the role and activities of such groups is often already supported by existing government programming including the women's program, the disabled participation program and by a host of other initiatives, not only in the Department of Secretary of State, but also in the other departments.

There are initiatives designed to combat racism and discrimination and to promote official languages and equality rights. That is the centrality and the importance of why we established a full Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to make certain that equality was there in fact and not only in law, the equal opportunity to participate fully for all of our citizens.

It is true that these other programs will continue to be funded by this government and encouraged and actively promoted. Some elements of the Court Challenges Program, some research and public education may still be eligible for federal funding.

All commitments of court cases made before the budget's main estimates which were handed down on February 27 will be honoured and processed at the level of court at which they were approved.

It is equally true that not all remedies to all wrongs need to be addressed or resolved in the halls of justice.

[Translation]

It is true that after taking nearly 300 cases to court, some of which will continue to be heard while the program is phased out, we now have a body of precedents in the field of official languages and equality rights.

[English]

All of those propositions are undoubtedly true. So where exactly does that leave us? It leaves us with a proposal by my hon. colleague that however well-intentioned, it is simply not realistic. I salute his purpose but I cannot endorse his motion.

Perhaps now is the time for the provinces to begin to play a role. Perhaps it is time for the Canadian Bar Association or for other legal organizations and social agencies, non-governmental bodies and institutions to step forward.

With the letters of support the member has been able to receive, I have no doubt that there may be a body or group of people very well prepared and interested in continuing to carry on the work in a shared or some other relationship.

What a wonderful opportunity we have today. I thank the member again for placing this important question before the House. We have the opportunity today to actually do some brainstorming and some thinking as members of Parliament, to examine what possible method can be found.

We certainly all recognize the benefit and the excellence of the program that had been in place. It is clear we cannot go backward. We cannot undo what has been done.

• (1610)

We have decided that this program has made its contribution. On this decision, there is no turning back. But surely we have it in our collective powers of creativity and imagination to find another way, one not necessarily funded by the federal government.

In this spirit, I invite hon. members of this House to devote a significant portion of this debate to exploring some of those possibilities today.

I look forward to being able to listen with great anticipation to all of the innovative and creative ideas that members have been hearing from their constituents. I hope in that spirit we can begin to construct something that could be of benefit to the very issues that my hon. friend wants continued to be addressed.

Again, I thank the member for his concern and the dedicated manner in which he brought the issue forward today.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question. He said that the time had come to move this Court Challenges Program to other levels, and he mentioned the provinces. In every case, the province was the accused, and to say that the provinces could take over is like putting the fox in charge of the henhouse. It makes no sense. This program costs each Canadian 10 cents a year.

[English]

Ten cents per year per Canadian and the minister cries economic tough times. We know that Tory times are tough times, but it is ten cents a year per Canadian for a program that helps Canadians to get their rights clarified before a court.

I say to the minister in all honesty that his argument does not convince me. I do not think he has convinced Canadians the reason he has given that it is economic tough times that have forced this program to be cut is appropriate.

I ask him very sincerely, is he not telling us that indeed this was done for ideological reasons rather than for economic reasons?

Mr. Weiner: Almost all my efforts in this past eight-year period as a federal member of Parliament and minister have been to help Canadians understand the benefit of having one level of citizenship, first class citizenship, the equality that we all believe to be in the law, which is not there in practice.

What I have done is I have tried in a very open and honourable manner in the creation of this department to make the centrality of our effort bringing forth partnerships, partnerships with Canadians from coast to coast in every one of the institutions they represent. In that way those institutions, once and for all, will get it through their heads that what we need is significant change. What we need is a change of attitude. What we need is an opportunity to participate.

How can you feel good about your citizenship if you are not included? How can you feel good if you do not have the same access to jobs, to housing, to the same income, if your young, dedicated, intelligent, young people, have no job offers?

What we have done very practically is we have taken almost all the resources of the new department and we have placed them to fight racism, racial discrimination. We have brought forward a program on integration and equality.

Now there is a consensus of people from coast to coast who are really recognizing the benefit of having this kind of program. Maybe it has been some of the public education and awareness. Maybe it has been the work of members from coast to coast. Because we have a consensus of opinion in this House which is very supportive of what we are doing.

In a survey, a very in-depth analysis last year by Angus Reid, almost 90 per cent of Canadians when faced with the most in-depth type of questioning of their attitudes recognized the need for that kind of programming and wanted it to continue to go on unabated.

So the accusation that there is something ideologically wrong, I can tell you that for me this is the opportunity to make the Canadian dream a reality, to give every one of our citizens that opportunity to participate fully, the human opportunity.

There are a lot of program areas beginning with literacy and going through to voluntary action, human rights, the racism and integration programs that we manage. With this particular program we have nothing to be ashamed of, nothing at all to be ashamed of. It has been an enormous success. It is at the backbone of promoting what we all wanted to do. The program has fulfilled its objectives.

It does not mean that it could go on forever. It does not mean that we had to have this kind of a program to the year 2000. I have said in this House in answer to the hon. member's questions that yes, we do have a significant body of jurisprudence. Whether we have enough or not is debatable. Whether others should perhaps want to participate in a new kind of creative programming, that I think is the excitement of Canada.

That is the kind of role I think Canadians may want to play from coast to coast, not necessarily to wait for the federal government to put everything on the table in a manner that it might not be able to afford in these particularly difficult times when far too many are hurting and are out of work.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I say right off that I admire the hon. minister. I think he has done good work for Canada's department. He is honest and straightforward but today is a very shabby performance. I almost would feel sorry for him, defending the indefensible if I did not know that there are other people I should feel sorry for, namely the people who are not going to be able to take advantage of this program.

He said the program is good, it is working. So why is he killing it?

I want to ask him this question because he said money is involved. The Court Challenges Program cost $2.7 million a year, is that not correct? The minister is nodding, $2.7 million. The government spends $870,000 on daily press clippings for the Prime Minister. Why does the government not cut that and put the money in the Court Challenges Program?

Mr. Weiner: I am not in the very important job of budget making. What I am in the process of doing is carrying forward in a most appropriate fashion a new department, with increased resources, new personnel from coast to coast, with a lot of ideas and excitement and a partnership of people who hope and pray that this will be their opportunity so that indeed when I set up a partnership with an institution, that that institution will once and for all recognize the diversity of Canadian society and allow them to participate.

We all have our priorities. We all would like to do exactly those things that we would want to do in life. This is a team effort. Budget making is a very difficult proposition.

I am thrilled that the former Minister of Finance is in the House with us today. This is not an easy job. This minister who is with us today took on a job that had to be addressed for some 65 years in this country. For 65 years we had a tax loaded on the backs of the manufacturing sector. We were constantly advised to make improvements, broaden the base, allow all Canadians to participate. He did that.

The current finance minister brought forward a budget at the end of February which did a lot of very effective trimming, a lot of belt tightening. Frankly it left my ministry in very healthy shape. I am very pleased that the word multiculturalism was not mentioned in a very prominent way on February 27.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on February 27, the minister in reply to a question said: "There is now a solid base of jurisprudence for future years". A day later in reply to another question he said: "We have built up a certain amount of jurisprudence". Today he said: "It is debatable and perhaps much more needs to be done". I would like a clarification on that point.

Last, of the 264 cases, 165 on equality and 99 on language, could the minister inform the House how many of these cases were challenges to the government's position and how many of these cases were challenged by the government?

Mr. Weiner: I thank the hon. member for his attempt at clarification. Throughout I have used the words "a significant volume of jurisprudence". The hon. member can read my response in Hansard.

I will quote a response to an answer I gave the member for Hamilton Mountain: "Madam Speaker, as I said, the Court Challenges Program was an excellent program, a made-in-Canada initiative, to really examine the laws for their fairness, the equality in language laws that were in place. It has done that very fairly, but after almost 300 cases of jurisprudence have been established, one would imagine that we now have a significant volume of jurisprudence". This is the question: Is it significant or not? Did we not set into place something of great importance for this nation?

I would humbly request that with the strength of support from coast to coast, from the provinces, from the Canadian Bar Association, from jurists wherever they are and from community groups, I am expecting that at the end of this day there might be some very new and exciting creativity brought to this very important area.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to speak on this important motion.

I want in the course of my speech to deal with some of the issues that the minister raised. Why has the government cut this $2.7 million program, that in the minister's own words, the government's contribution was unprecedented and this was a most successful program. He said that it did its job. Well let us examine that. He said that the government cannot afford that. We will examine that as well.

Before I begin, I would like to quote to the minister from an article by Arthur Drache in The Financial Post, not a socialist newspaper. I leave this for the minister and for the former minister of finance, who is in the House, to listen to because it comes from a paper that normally supports his party. The article reads:

> While I felt the budget presented by Finance Minister Don Mazankowski was as good as could have been expected, there are aspects which I find troubling. In particular, I'd like to voice dissent for the decision to eliminate the Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Science Council of Canada and, most strenuously, the Court Challenges Program.
> Removing these institutions from the Canadian landscape is a method of decreasing dissent and criticism of government policies. The net result will be that those who challenge policy have been deprived of quasi-official platforms and will be marginalized.

That is a serious charge. I say to the minister that he and the government have a serious problem on their hands. There is always one item, or maybe more, that stands out as being unreasonable.

How can the government say to the Canadian public that it has cut a successful program which a large number of prominent people, including a former judge of the Supreme Court of Canada says is absolutely needed, because it does not have enough money and then turns around and spends $870,000 a year for daily press clippings for the Prime Minister. It just will not wash.

I would ask the minister, if I could, what percentage the $2.7 million is in the budget of his department. I bet it is a pretty small percentage.

I happen to know, since I am justice critic for my party, the estimates of the Department of Justice and here they are: for professional and other services last year, 1991-92, $74 million. That is for hiring lawyers to go up against people in the courts for the Department of Justice. Next year it is going up to $89 million. The government could find $15 million for the rich lawyers but it could not find $2.7 million for the poor and the handicapped, the marginalized groups in this program. I say shame on the minister on this. This is a defeat for the minister. He should resign over this.

Look at what is happening to the judges in this country. How do you explain this to the people? The government has allowed the judges, who make $147,000 a year, to get a cost of living increase of 5 per cent so they will go up to about $155,000. At the same time, the government froze the salaries of the lower level civil servant. You take a woman, as a secretary and single parent, working in the—

Do not leave the House, Mr. Minister. Sit down and listen to the speech.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has no business saying I was about to leave the House. If I want to stretch my legs in the lobby this is an opportunity. I do not have to ask his permission to get up for one moment. But I take it as an insult that he would even think I would leave the House while he was giving some very constructive suggestions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would just repeat the old parliamentary rule that the presence or absence of a fellow member in this House should not be mentioned.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam again has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister was leaving. I am not speaking for myself, this is not personal, this is speaking for a lot of people who want the minister to hear this.

Let's look at the program. As the minister said, it started in 1978 as a program to fund language cases and it was under the Secretary of State. The program continued in 1985 and was expanded to cover federal equality rights cases. It was under the same department. Then in 1990 the government put it under an independent organization, the Ottawa Human Rights Centre, which is at the University of Ottawa.

This was a good program. This has been a good minister, Mr. Speaker. This is the minister who brought in redress to Japanese Canadians. He will go down in Canadian history for that but he will also go down in Canadian history for ending the Court Challenges Program, which I ask the minister to have another look at. I am going to make some suggestions in a few minutes as to why.

The program has been declared a good program. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons conducted an examination in 1990 of the program and unanimously recommended not only its continuance, but its expansion. The most surprised person on budget night was the Conservative chair of that committee.

I have a letter before me from Bertha Wilson, the former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. She says: "I saw for myself when I was a member of the Supreme Court how invaluable this program had been to minority groups and to the disadvantaged. It has clearly been well and efficiently administered. The public has unquestionably received full value for its money".

How many government programs could you say that about? Could you say it about the Prime Minister's clipping service or sending his limo down to Costa Rica? Come on, this program is working. Three hundred cases have been funded through this program. The program has made a crucial difference in the most important equality and language rights cases to come before the courts. A maximum of $35,000 can be provided for a case at each level of court.

I have been a trial lawyer. That amount is peanuts. You should see the money that the government is spending, for example in the aboriginal rights cases in British Columbia, to fund their lawyers. They would take the whole program in a year.

Mr. Speaker, $2.7 million is not a large amount of money in terms of government expenses or legal expenses.

There is strong support from academics, from the Canadian Bar Association, from the media, all over the place, for this program. The question is this. Is there an alternative available? Well, we could have volunteer lawyers, but that is a hit and miss program, it is charity.

We could have the Canadian Human Rights Commission, but the human rights commission is responsible for the human rights act, not for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We could have ad hoc funding, which the minister appears to suggest in different cases. But many deserving cases would be excluded. There would be duplication of cases, and it would cost the government more in the long run. That would mean the government would choose which cases to fund. That is the key it seems to me.

I would like to talk about some of the cases that the program has dealt with. In Andrews v. the Law Society of British Columbia, the program funded the Women's Legal Education and Action Committee to intervene, and the result was to present to the court a new approach to equality rights that had a major impact on the result.

In the Swain case, Regina v. Swain, the case concerned the question of evidence in insanity cases. The result was that we in Parliament had to totally amend the Criminal Code on insanity. I was a member of that committee, as was the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, and we participated in that. That case, in fact, forced the government to update the law and we now have a modern law as a result, sponsored and supported by all the parties in this House. Shacter against the Queen is another case on sexual discrimination at UI. CEIC against Tetreault—Gaboury, against UI. Also seniors, discriminating against people over the age of 65, Egan and Nesbit against the Queen.

Let me just quote what Ms. Coté, director of the program, said to the standing committee a few days ago: "The program provided funding to Jim Egan and John Nesbit to challenge the definition of spouse in the Old Age Security Act under which same sex spouses are eligible for the spousal allowance available to eligible heterosexual, common law and married spouses".

Egan and Nesbit have lived together for 40 years and they lost the case in the trial division. Now they want to appeal. The trial judge erred by using the "formal equality" test rejected by the Supreme Court. But there will not be an appeal if this program is cut off.

Why is that important? It is important because what happens in our law is that often you lose at trial division and then you go to the Supreme Court of Canada and you win, and that changes the law.

The best example is the Nisga Indian case where Tom Berger, acting as a lawyer for the Nisga Indians back in the early seventies, appealed the case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada after losing at the trial court. The Supreme Court was split, and as a result of that decision we have the modern law of aboriginal rights today in Canada. That is why it is so important to fund these cases. That is why it is so important to go to appeal.

I could quote more cases, but the minister knows that these cases have been successful. The question is: Is it finished? I quote Ms. Coté again: "Furthermore, issues involving discrimination based on ethnic origin and colour, as well as issues affecting low income people, have barely been touched on by the courts. Very few court challenges to systemic discrimination have come before the courts. The program just recently funded three case development projects concerning some aspects of the discrimination suffered by Afro-Canadians in the prison system. Without financial support to undertake their legal proceedings, it is quite possible that the agency that received funding to complete this research will not have the means to take the subsequent court action".

There is work to be done. We have just begun to test it.

In the language area, as the hon. member for Vanier pointed out, we just had the Dobbie—Beaudoin report Constitutional Suggestions for French Language Rights Outside Quebec, the concept of duality and promotion of those rights. Who is going to take the cases? Charity? Is that what we are going to say to francophones outside Quebec?

I have before me a letter that was sent by La Fédération des Franco-Colombiens to the Prime Minister. It says: "Without the Court Challenges Program the charter's scope is seriously curtailed. From now on it will be virtually impossible for ordinary Canadians to force governments to respect their constitutional obligations, especially with respect to the language rights of the minority French speaking communities across Canada". It provides evidence—and I will send it to the minister and table it in the House—of a case right now on French Canadians using French in the criminal courts of British Columbia.

What do you want to do? Do you want to turn it over to the provinces? Do you want Albertans to say to Mr. Getty: "Give us some money so we can finance something on bilingualism"? That is absurd. It is absurd and it does not do justice to this minister.

An hon. member: Or to the country.

Mr. Waddell: "Or to the country". The minister has asked if there is another way. What about the provinces? I would be prepared to concede that the provinces would have some role. We are a federation. Let us expand this program and get the provinces playing a role. The minister cannot do that overnight. He cannot just end this program and then expect the provinces to come in. I urge him to find some additional funds from that big department of his so that he can continue this program in a temporary way.

I see the minister talking to one of his friends. I hope he is listening because a lot of people want the minister to hear this. He is a fair minister. Therefore, I say to the minister: take some money from the department, keep the program going, work with the provinces. He wanted suggestions. I am prepared to work with my colleagues in Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia or their NDP governments. I know my friends in the other part of the House would do likewise and say: "Come on, maybe we can find some money to provide for challenges for provincial laws and for federal laws as well".

I would like to conclude with a couple of quotes. Again the government has to explain. John Tait, the Deputy Minister of Justice, when asked about the program the other day said: "I would say as deputy attorney general that we have gained a tremendous amount of good jurisprudence from this program and that is all—not go on to say that the jurisprudence is now sufficiently developed. It is not".

There is still somewhere to go, according to the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Perhaps money is the problem. However, as I pointed out, the government found money for the PM's clipping service, for judges' increases, and for all kinds of other matters.

I then ask the minister what is it? Why is he cutting this program? Is it because of a bunker mentality? Is it some notion that this government cannot cope anymore with things and has to hit back? Is the government somehow afraid of criticism, as Grace says.

This idea is appearing all over the place. In Stevie Cameron's column she talks about cutbacks to freedom of information, and the combination with the Privacy Act and freedom of information. She says: "The Tory government is doing everything it can to kill freedom of information and to kill access to information". You can see it in the attempt of the Minister for International Trade to try to restrict freedom of information on trade issues. It is all over the place.

I say to the minister: "He can find some money. This program is not finished, there are aspects of it that can continue. There are things to be done. The provinces cannot fill the gap, but they can help. I am prepared to help him find ways to do that".

I ask the minister to look at it because there is something else that we should consider. These are our courts. These courts belong to the people of Canada. Everybody should be in the courts, not just the rich. They are funded by our money. We pay the judges and the court staff and so on. Can we not pay some people to take some difficult cases to the courts?

The government did that and the government was a good government for doing so.

Why is the government fighting against our people in this way? I do not understand it. This is the unkindest cut of them all. This is a cut that directly affects people who are dispossessed, people of colour–

An hon. member: That's what you said when VIA Rail was cut.

Mr. Waddell: The hon. member said that is what I said when VIA Rail was cut. When VIA Rail was cut I said that it was a cutback of the institutions of Canada. I said that it was going to hurt this country if this government keeps cutting VIA Rail, the post office, the CBC, and so on.

I am as aware as he is that we have problems with money. However it seems to me that this is the wrong place to cut the money. These people are not able to find alternate sources of money. These people are the poor and marginalized in our society and for once the government gives them a break. Why, then, take it away?

This is why I am angry with the minister, whom I normally respect very much.

I ask him to find a way to continue this program, to find a way to tell these people that the government has not given up on language rights across this country. That is not easy for a westerner to say.

I ask the minister to find a way to tell the franco–Columbian group in British Columbia: "We are with you, keep going". I ask him to find a way to continue to finance these cases so we can make our courts open to all. This was the unkindest cut of them all.

I ask the minister to find a way to reinstate this program with or without the co–operation of the provinces or other people, to keep it alive, as he has in the past, until we can come up with some alternative.

• (1640)

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for his speech.

I listened to his speech attentively and I must say that he understands, like many of us here, the seriousness of the debate. I want to thank him from the bottom of my heart for his support.

Today we are on supply proceedings. For those of us who are familiar with the House rules, we are indeed debating supply. That means money for the government. Under those rules the opposition is given 20 days a year to call subject matter which is debated.

Today, the opposition, I moved the motion and my friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys seconded it, moved a motion to reinstate a program under the minister's department. It is a program which I think is essential.

I want to ask the member who just spoke if he has had a chance to look at the spending authorities for the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. If he examines those expenditures he will find that the bureaucratic expenses have gone up by some substantial amount but that the grants and contributions have decreased by about $24 million.

The minister says that he is trying very hard to create better race relations, that he is trying to fight racism and that his priority this year has been on that subject. However he did not tell us that he deferred the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and that his department has cut $24 million in grants and contributions, the total dropped from $78.722 million last year to $50.731 million this year.

I would like to ask the member if he has had a chance to look at these estimates. If not, maybe he can give me a comment on the credibility one must give to a system which increases its operating expenditures—in other words, the bureaucratic expenditures—and reduces grants and contributions and then comes into this House and tells us: "Times are tough. We have to cut expenditures".

For God's sake cut expenditures, but cut them in a way that people will understand. I ask the member if he has had a chance to look at these estimates? It sounds to me like the minister and his department, and the government in general, are not seriously attacking the problem of cutting the expenditures of the department. They are cutting the expenditures of grants and contributions which this program benefited from.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, to answer the member's question, because I am not the critic of that department I have not had a chance to look at the individual expenditures of that department.

I did say in my speech that I looked at the Department of Justice where there is a similar pattern, there is a pattern of increase in the estimates of that department, an increase both bureaucratically and for outside counsel.

I put that to the minister and he said that he is not the Minister of Finance, he is not responsible for that. He has a point. I asked him about the $870,000 paid for the Prime Minister's daily press clippings and he said that it is not his responsibility, and he is right.

As the member points out, his responsibility is for his own budget. It is very interesting, as the member has pointed out, that his budget has increased for the bureaucracy and decreased for grants and expenses. The minister seems to be sucking and blowing at the same time with those figures, does he not? No doubt, he will explain why.

I suppose there is always a pressure in the bureaucracy for more money and more expenses, and it costs a lot. Compare those kind of figures, both in the Department of Justice and in the minister's own department, with the $2.7 million that this program is presenting and then compare what we got out of the program with some of the stuff we got out of the departments.

We are getting pretty good value for our money. It is total economic irresponsibility to pad those figures and to cut this program.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the hon. member, who I know would want to have it clear in his mind, we did create a new department in this particular year with available resources from the Secretary of State. There was a division of the existing resources. Some additional resources were given to us so that we could have a new, effective department right across the country.

The first thing the member should do is examine the administrative situation of the Secretary of State and the new department and realize that we have made use of the collective resources or the administrative resources of the two. Wherever possible we attempted to do within the existing resource base in order to establish new centres right across the country for the delivery of the services one would anticipate. We tried to to do this as carefully as possible.

The $24 million that the member is referring to was the specific amount that partly came about as a result of the settlement with Canadians of Japanese origin. That is the deferral of the Race Relations Foundation.

Deferral. We have a commitment in law to proclaim the Race Relations Foundation in the future. However, frankly, there is still some work that has to take place. In the meantime, the activity of the department, in accentuated fashion, in heightened fashion, with increased resources, is directed more and more toward fighting racism.

The member for Halifax is here. She might want to get to her feet and talk about some of the activity I have been privileged to participate in with members of Parliament and with the community in Halifax. I hope that she will find it helpful. She may want to interject at some point in this debate as well.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, excluding the deferral for the money for the Race Relations Foundation and the Japanese Canadians it seems to me that it is the most expensive new letterhead and new phone number in Canadian history.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be participating in this debate this afternoon. I would like to say at the outset that our party, the Liberal Party, will be dividing our 20 minute segments so that we will get twice as many speakers. Therefore, I will be speaking for 10 minutes and the member for Halifax will follow for a subsequent 10 minutes.

I want to say to the Secretary of State how disappointed I am in the government at the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. This is a tragic decision for this country because a lot of what Canada stands for is embodied in the Court Challenges Program. Over the last few years it has been our court system that has really been holding this country together. It certainly has not been the federal government.

The minister said that this government spent more than any other government on this type of program. However he also said, and truthfully so, that this is the only Court Challenges Program in the world. It has been in existence for 15 years and this government has been in power for more than half of that 15 years.

Sure, this government has spent more on this type of program. It is the only one and the Conservatives have been the only party in power for more than half of that period. That does not make them in any way sensitive to the needs of the disadvantaged, the minorities and the women in this country who are being abused by society and who no longer have the ability to challenge this abuse in our court system.

This is an absolutely detestable decision. In this country we have an excellent Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is something that we can be very proud of, but this charter is not going to work if we prevent a large segment of our population from being able to utilize it to protect themselves and the rights which they have every reason to believe in and take for granted in this country of Canada.

We have now, as a result of the decision of this government to cancel the Court Challenges Program, a rich man's charter. The disadvantaged, the minorities and the women in this country cannot enforce their rights in a court of law unless they are very wealthy indeed. In 1989 the standing committee on human rights issued a report which said: "The virtually unanimous verdict of witnesses who appeared before the committee is that the reasons for continuation are not merely sufficient but compelling".

• (1650)

The member of Parliament for Oxford, who is now chairman of that committee, upon hearing that this Court Challenges Program had been cancelled wrote to the Prime Minister asking him to reconsider his decision.

I want to say under no circumstances is it a sound argument to say that there is now a sufficient body of jurisprudence based on charter decisions and the Court Challenges Program is no longer needed. That is what the Solicitor General told me when I posed a question in Question Period on this subject. He says it is no longer necessary.

Any legal academic will tell you that it takes at least another 10 years from now to be able to get a proper body of jurisprudence on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we have at the present time.

The government is sponsoring through its constitutional dialogue changes to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which means there are going to be changes that will have to be interpreted in our courts. How can the government possibly say that we have sufficient jurisprudence not only on what we already have in our charter but the changes that are going to be made to our charter? I want to say as well, now 200 years later, the Americans are still interpreting their charter of rights and freedoms.

Even if there was a substantial body of legal decisions on which we could base the future rights of Canadians, that does not take away from the fact that we as a Canadian people have to protect the disadvantaged people in our society.

The minister talks about the fact that he is interested in abolishing racism, in promoting unity. We need court decisions if we are going to have that kind of battle against these dreaded spectres that all people confront. We have to have court decisions. We have to know where the courts stand.

It is ironic that the government would cancel this program immediately after the Butler decision on pornography. It was an excellent decision which was decided nine to zero by the Supreme Court of Canada and which challenge was financed by the Court Challenges Program.

We do not have to just look at the writings. We look at the actual words of our justices of the Supreme Court. Former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Brian Dickson, and former Justice of the Supreme Court, Bertha Wilson, have decried the loss of this program. During their tenure these judges were particularly interested and sensitive to the need of the charter and to the needs of disadvantaged Canadians.

My friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam and my colleague who has sponsored this motion, the member for Ottawa—Vanier mentioned the words of Bertha Wilson. I want to mention another segment of her presentation and her petition to the Government of Canada. She said: "I have difficulty with a policy that places the burden of that restraint on those who can least afford it". That is exactly what we are doing when we are cancelling the Court Challenges Program.

This is just another means. We have to be truthful. We have to come right down and say what this is. This is a move by this government to silence critics. It is no more than that. It is a complete abuse of the Canadian system. It is an abuse of what this country stands for. Worst of all, it is an unmitigated move to silence the critics of this government, a government that has abandoned the Law Reform Commission, the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada.

The demand for this Court Challenges Program is growing every year. In 1986 there were 120 applications. By 1989 that figure had doubled and it has continued to grow since then.

That does not mean that everyone who applies is going to be approved. There is a non-partisan board which approves who will be able to benefit from this program.

My heavens, this country has benefited from that program. We have such good jurisprudence as a result of the cases which have been brought before the courts as a result of this program.

It is incredible. It is absolutely incredible that this government would cancel this program. This government has money to allow escort services as a tax deduction but it cannot find money for the Court Challenges Program.

This government increased the litigation budget of the Minister of Justice by $16 million. That is not the program, that is just the increase for this year. Yet it cancelled the Court Challenges Program, which was $2.75 million. That is an absolutely diabolical move against the disadvantaged people in this country.

As Canadians we have to continue to petition this government. We cannot let this matter rest. We have to continue to petition this government to reinstate this program. We cannot possibly let this subject go. It goes right to the fibre of what Canada is all about.

If we for a minute turn away from this decision of the government and ignore what this government has done, then we as members of Parliament and politicians in this country are losing a piece of ourselves and a piece of what we are here to do.

When the minister talks about this program he says: "Times are what they are". The minister said that the government must make hard choices. Well, there are more and more people going hungry in Canada. There are more and more people sleeping in our streets. Now there are more people who will not get justice before our court system. Those kinds of problems cannot be answered by saying that times are what they are and hard decisions have to be taken.

I know the minister is not responsible for this decision. I know the minister to be a good person. But I want to say to the minister that he is a member of a government that has callously jettisoned the disadvantaged people in our society. The Liberal Party is not going to stand for that. We are not going to let this matter go.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague and fellow critic on his speech.

The minister must detect that while my colleague is normally level-headed, more level-headed than I am, we are both rather disturbed today. It showed in both our speeches.

We are both lawyers. We have been trial lawyers and we know what it is like in the courts as to who gets to go to court. Here was a program that helped poor people get to court. People that you do not normally see in court.

I want to ask the member to comment on that particularly, on who does go to court if you cannot get any help. He mentioned the moneys that the government could find. Was it $16 million for the litigation budget? I wonder if he would agree with me that it was $10 million for the increase in the judges salaries. But it cannot find $2.7 million for the disadvantaged program.

I also want to ask him about this idea of another motive. What is the real reason? I wonder if the member noticed as I did that months after the Law Reform Commission brought in a report for an aboriginal justice system, it is gone. After the Economic Council of Canada had a different view from the government on Quebec independence, it is gone. The Court Challenges Program was constantly challenging the government, it is gone. Am I being paranoid or does the member see a pattern to this kind of cutback? Is this a government that has a bunker mentality?

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam for his intervention. I agree completely with what he has said.

What we have is a move by the government to silence its critics. The Law Reform Commission came out with a report on aboriginal justice which I thought was excellent, along with some of the other good work that it has done. The member also mentioned the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada.

• (1700)

Those matters have obviously met their own demise because the better they are at the work they are doing the more ready the government is to pull the carpet out from under them and cancel their work because it does not want critics.

Look at the changes in the House of Commons. We are sitting less and less. The rules are more stringent. Closure is invoked more than it ever has been before. It is absolutely incredible. The whole matter of opposition in this country is being thrown to the wolves.

As the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam says, there is money for anything the government wants. The travel budget of the Minister of National Defence would pay for 25 court challenge programs.

Ms. Clancy: I'll say.

Mr. MacLellan: It is absolutely incredible that this is chosen to be cut. Sure there has to be fiscal responsibility, but not through the people who need the help of their government and through a program that has meant so much to our jurisprudence and to the fabric of Canada.

Decisions have come from this program that we never would have had. Had these decisions not come, we would have continued to perpetuate the injustice that was going on evidently before the decisions were reached.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in two days that I have spoken on the matter of the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

I am glad that my hon. colleague from Quebec over there finds it so amusing. I think a number of his constituents would find the cancellation of the program less than amusing, particularly those members of linguistic groups in this country who might have wanted to use it.

In any case, I too, like my hon. colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, am disappointed that twice in two days I have to talk about the disgraceful activity of this government.

I listened to my other hon. colleague, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, talk about his fight to end racism and I know he means it. Indeed, both of us have been involved in certain measures and activities in my riding. I know he means it. But the point is, what he clearly does not understand and what this government does not understand is that without access to the courts in this country disadvantaged groups are not going to enforce their rights.

We have a magnificent Charter of Rights and Freedoms and it is not worth the paper it is written on if the people who need it cannot get into the courts. My colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys has said that, my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier has said that and my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam has said that. How many times does it have to be said?

We understand this and you do not have to be lawyer to understand this. You have to be a person in the street, a woman or a disabled Canadian or a black Canadian or a member of another visible minority or an aboriginal Canadian to know what it is not to be able to enforce your rights. Perhaps you have to be a member of a linguistic minority in any one of our 10 provinces to know what it is not to be able to enforce your rights.

What good is our charter? I ask the minister rhetorically at this point, what good is our charter if the people who need it the most cannot enforce it? It is a disgrace and a national disgrace. It is something that we as Canadian parliamentarians should collectively hang our heads about.

I agree further with my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, we are not going to let it stay here, we are not going to let it rest here. This will be the ghost of Christmas past, Christmas present and Christmas to come for this government. People will remember it.

It will be a disgrace along with the GST, along with all kinds of other policies of this government. But this one will lead the pack because this is one that attacks the weakest and those least able to defend themselves. As a Canadian I am ashamed.

If my colleague, the hon. minister, wants to defeat racism then put the Court Challenges Program back in place. We know what racism is in Nova Scotia. We are ashamed of it. We want to see it obliterated. But unfortunately it is not going to be done by government departments. It has to be done through the courts. That is what the court system is for.

The law is a sword and a shield. In the area of racism and in the area of discrimination generally we need the sword as well as the shield. And it is the courts that provide the sword. In this case the government has removed both sword and shield. Again, I am ashamed.

What was the Court Challenges Program? It was the hallmark of a government that was committed to the advancement and the defence of human rights. We as Canadians can get a little smug compared to our fellow countries in western civilization. We tell ourselves that we are a kinder, gentler country, as has been spoken about, than our neighbour to the south.

Take away this program and we take away a great deal of the kindness and the gentleness and we take away the major reason for Canadians to hold up their heads and say: "We have a record in human rights to be proud of". We will no longer have that record. There will be no way that records of that kind can be made. If the minister thinks differently, I can only say one thing to him: "Prove it, show us, and don't talk to us about government departments because they are empty words". There are many things government departments can accomplish. There are many things government programs outside this particular sphere can accomplish, but the enforcement of rights not backed up by accessibility to the courts is hollow. He knows it, as does every member in this House.

Talk about hard decisions in hard times and cutting a program that was approximately $2.7 million per year. It was not a huge amount of money for the great amount of good that it did.

We have heard and seen from my other colleagues here today of the other expenditures of dollars that are still there, that are still thrown around by government members. But who do they take the money from? They take it from the voiceless. They take it from the defenceless. I hope they are proud of themselves.

Without this funding, this small amount of funding, equality for women and other minority groups, linguistic, ethnocultural or whatever, is a hollow concept. The charter is only a mechanism for striking down discriminatory laws. It does not—and this bears repeating over and over again—guarantee the absolutely necessary access to the courts.

Alliance Quebec said it very eloquently: "The issue quite simply is whether the rights and freedoms provided in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms have any real meaning or whether they are rights in theory only. Are they living manifestations of fundamental values, or are they merely paper tigers, sound and fury signifying nothing? Under this government they will become sound and fury signifying nothing". I might even extend that quotation to its beginning, which is: "a tale told by an idiot".

The purpose of the Court Challenges Program was not to give minorities, women, special privileges and rights but to guarantee them what was rightfully theirs. We are not talking about giving something extra. We are talking about bringing disadvantaged groups up to the level of the rich man's charter, as my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys so eloquently put it. That is what it will become. That is what it has become in the wake of this policy.

A number of my colleagues here today have cited cases of great importance that have been handed down, decisions that have been handed down because of the Court Challenges Program. Let me cite some, although I know I may be being repetitive. This horror that is being visited upon us needs us to repeat over and over again what the government is doing to us by this cancellation.

In Keegstra, Andrews and Smith the Supreme Court upheld the hate propaganda provisions.

The Vesey case established that discrimination based on sexual orientation was prohibited by section 15 of the charter, even though sexual orientation was not a named ground of discrimination.

• (1710)

The Andrews case marked the beginning of the process of defining equality. The Supreme Court ruled that the main purpose of the equality rights section of the charter is to benefit those who have been historically disadvantaged. I think every one of us in this Chamber knows who have been historically disadvantaged. Every one of us knows what will happen if those who have been historically and are continuing to be disadvantaged in this country have no access.

Turning to the Butler case, the day before the government takes away the Court Challenges Program the Butler case is decided. The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the obscenity provisions in the Criminal Code, arguing that while there may be a contravention of the freedom of expression provisions they nonetheless constitute a reasonable limit. It was recognized that the violent and degrading acts and pornographic material are harmful to the equality and dignity of women.

Let me state again how important this is in the search for equality. I listened yesterday to the debate about women in Canada. I listened to members on the opposite side of the House very eloquently talk about their abhorrence of violence against women. The Butler case will go a long way in the eradication of violence against women in this country, and without the Court Challenges Program there would have been no Butler case.

Abolishing the Court Challenges Program is an inestimable loss for our society, because without it minority language communities and disadvantaged groups will be deprived of an essential tool.

Without the Court Challenges Program, who will protect the poorest and most underprivileged from the continual abuse of governments? Abolishing it is shameful. I ask the government to reinstate it immediately.

[English]

I demand it. We all demand it. Give us back this program.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member on her excellent speech but I too have to ask this question: What good is it to have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms if those whose rights are denied cannot be enforced in the courts and they cannot claim protection of those rights, especially when we realize that the great majority of those whose rights are denied under the charter are in lower income groups?

Sometimes they may be in middle income groups. The disabled, visible minorities, the aged, these are not people with a lot of money. They cannot afford to enforce their rights in the courts with their own means. Women, immigrants, aboriginal people, linguistic minorities, in nearly all these cases the opponents of these people whose rights are denied are governments that are financing their litigation with the taxpayers' money.

With these great sums of money these governments, provincial governments and federal governments, can spin the case on forever. They use dilatory motions. They appeal the case up and down the system and the poor litigant on the other side is expected to keep up with that. He or she cannot keep up with that, and the result is that there just is not any justice.

I have a question for the hon. member. The justice critic for the Liberal Party pointed out that while the government cut the Court Challenges Program with a total budget of $2.7 million, it increased its own litigation budget by $16 million. In other words, this government has taken taxpayers' money to strengthen and increase its own ability to go to court and to fight in many cases against the citizens of this country. Yet it has done away altogether with a very small budget which would allow Canadian citizens to do battle with the government in cases where their rights are involved, not only with it but with provincial governments and corporations as well.

I want to ask the hon. member who is very familiar with the justice system and has experience as a lawyer: Am I missing something here? I always thought a Department of Justice was to provide justice for Canadian people and to use taxpayers' money to provide justice, not to support a government in preventing justice. Would she, with her experience, try to straighten me out on that one?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who is a well-known champion of human rights and of those people who have been disenfranchised by the removal of the Court Challenges Program. Of course he is absolutely right.

Any of us on either side of this Chamber who have practised law know the horrendous cost involved in litigation, even at the provincial level. To talk about taking a case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada is beyond the realm not just of lower income or poverty level Canadians. It is beyond the realm of possibility for middle class Canadians. It is a heck of a big expense even for those with the kind of money it costs to push these cases forward.

As was so eloquently put forward by all of my learned colleagues, governments on the other hand have the money. They have their in-house departments such as the Department of Justice. The absolute scandal of this is that while this government has removed the sword and the shield from the disadvantaged groups, it has sharpened its sword and toughened up its shield against those very people. Talk about overkill. It has knocked down fortifications that disadvantaged groups had to enforce their rights. At the same time it has given itself a bigger stick with which to beat those disadvantaged groups.

It is a scandal and it is something that we as Canadians should really be ashamed about.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. I have been in the House since about two o'clock and I have heard the whole debate. I have some questions because I realized that the House had to decide whether to stop funding the Court Challenges Program. On that, I must congratulate all hon. members who ask questions because they show their interest in Canada's linguistic minorities. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that our commitment to our country's linguistic duality remains just as firm.

The Court Challenges Program was created in 1978. At that time it was an answer to the federal government's concern about the possible erosion of some minority rights guaranteed by the Constitution of Canada.

In March 1978 the Department of the Secretary of State and the Department of Justice together announced that the Canadian government would help those who sought court rulings to clarify language rights based on sections 93 and 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 23 of the 1870 Manitoba Act was not mentioned because at that time it was not known to be a constitutional provision.

From the beginning the Court Challenges Program focused on language rights. It dealt only with them. The program continued as such until 1982. When the famous Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms took effect, the federal government decided to update the program. In December of that year it announced the expansion of the program. Cases eligible for financial aid could be based not only on the Constitution Act, 1867 but also on section 23 of the 1870 Manitoba Act and sections 16 to 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Until 1985 the program was administered by the Department of the Secretary of State. In September 1985 it signed an agreement with the Canadian Council on Social Development under which the council undertook to administer the program for a five-year period. The administration of the program was entrusted to an independent body so that it would be at arm's length from the government. The council was then required to set up independent committees to review applications for assistance and distribute funds with no intervention from the federal government or the council.

In July 1990, further to the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, the program was extended for a five-year period. The administration of the program was then transferred to the Centre for Research and Education on Human Rights at the University of Ottawa.

The program was extended to cases involving language rights based not only on the previously mentioned provisions but also on similar constitutional provisions. This agreement includes a part on equality rights. The program also seeks to clarify equality rights guaranteed by sections 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or section 27 presented in support of arguments based on section 15.

The program was not created as a protest tool. Historically, the program was perceived as a way to promote Canada's two official languages and it remains that. In this regard, it seeks to provide financial assistance in developing test cases to clarify the language provisions of the Constitution.

The trail-blazing cases in the field of language rights deal first with education rights, second with bilingualism in the judicial system, third with language of service, and fourth with fundamental rights.

Let us remember that section 23 of the Charter gives qualified parents the right to have their children educated in the minority official language of their province of residence. This right was established to correct past injustices in education and deficiencies in the present school systems by applying a uniform remedy.

I would like to be able to trace the historical development of cases subsidized by the Court Challenges Program, but time is passing. Allow me, however, to emphasize that the court challenges dealing with section 23 helped clarify these provisions.

For example, the Supreme Court decision in the Mahé case clarifies the procedure for real enforcement of education rights. We are glad to be able to point out the important role that the Court Challenges Program has played in clarifying section 23 of the charter.

Language is an important aspect of judicial proceedings. In this area, we can say that language rights concern mainly the choice of the language of the proceedings and the right to address the court in the language of one's choice. Again, I cannot elaborate on the development of the constitutional provisions concerning language rights as they apply to the judicial system, but please believe me that it is an interesting story, especially since the Court Challenges Program is responsible for the gains made in this area. The Supreme Court decisions in the Blaikie, Mercure and Bilodeau cases have led the courts and the Supreme Court of Canada to identify the sections of the charter that apply to judicial bilingualism and to define language rights as they apply to the courts.

Section 20 of the charter grants two distinct rights. The first is the right to communicate with any office of the institutions of Parliament and the Government of Canada or the legislature and Government of New Brunswick in the language of one's choice. The second is the right to receive services from these offices in the chosen official language. The right to use one's language, the language of one's choice, implies the right to be heard and understood in that language and also to receive replies in it. That is what Judge Beetz says in the SANB Acadian Society of New Brunswick decision. These rights are not limited in cases involving an office of the institutions of the legislature and Government of New Brunswick or the head office of a federal department.

We know that some fundamental rights or legal guarantees in the Canadian charter can have a linguistic connotation. That is the case for the freedom of expression which every individual in Canada enjoys under section 2 of the charter. The Court Challenges Program has supported some precedent setting cases.

The Court Challenges Program has thus helped to clarify several constitutional provisions concerning language rights. It must be noted that the legal clarification of a language provision does not always result in net gains for the official language minorities. We may be astonished at how long it takes education or language rights to develop in many provinces. We should ask ourselves about the limits of judicial recourse. The courts are not the only place to assert our rights. Language minorities have other tools at their disposal to help them claim their rights.

This brings me to talk about the Official Languages Commission, the new Official Languages Act, and the programs of the Secretary of State and the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, whose objectives are the promotion of official languages and the full participation of all to the life of our Canadian society.

The new Official Languages Act includes all the measures taken in the fields of education rights, bilingualism, the courts, and service language. As early as 1985 we were hoping to revise the Official Languages Act. The basic principle was clear: to give Canadians a tool to replace the conflicting approach of the Court Challenges Program.

On September 15, 1988 the new Official Languages Act that had been ratified by the government during the summer came into effect. This legislative framework reflects the philosophy of this government, which was stated in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on February 15, 1990.

The linguistic duality and the protection of the linguistic rights of minorities are not abstract notions. These principles are embodied in statutes such as the Official Languages Act, and they will be confirmed and protected because they are enshrined in the Constitution. Those principles take on a real meaning thanks to the will of a generous and tolerant nation.

The Official Languages Act has two main objectives. First, to ensure the respect of French and English as official languages in Canada, their equal status, as well as equal rights and privileges regarding their use in federal institutions. Second, to support the development of francophone and anglophone minorities and, generally, to promote within the Canadian society and in cooperation with numerous others, the full recognition and use of French and English.

The new legislative approach is much more centered on the notion of partnership with other interested parties in the field of official languages that on a conflicting approach. This innovative approach shows a new spirit of co-operation in the promotion and teaching of official languages, as well as a greater will to actively participate to the promotion of minority linguistic communities. Indeed, this is confirmed by numerous recent achievements.

The federal-provincial co-operation regarding the teaching of official languages is based on a tradition that spans two decades. The commitment shown by the two levels of government regarding the teaching of French and English as the language of the minority and as a second language gives Canadians the possibility of receiving an education in their own language if they are part of a minority group, to have access to the same quality of teaching as that of the predominant linguistic group, as well as to learn the other official language and at the same time to familiarize themselves with a different culture.

I am pleased to point out that this co-operation is more and more prevalent in the field of education. It can be seen, for example, in the innovative efforts made by provinces, with the encouragement and financial support of the Secretary of State, regarding services in such fields as justice, social services and health.

It is true that our country is going through a difficult period as regards official languages and national unity. We are all aware of actions such as the passing of resolutions on unilingualism by some Ontario municipalities in early 1990, not to mention the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. In fact, we can still feel the effects of those events. What is often difficult to perceive is the fact that behind this turbulence some changes more positive for our future were slowly taking place.

The decision made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Mahé case was a breakthrough regarding education in the language of the minority. It provides that minorities have the right to actively participate to the management and control of their children's education and educational institutions. Even the guidelines set by the court regarding the implementation of this right should be beneficial to minorities in every province and territories.

We will continue to support communities that give themselves tools to create a healthy and dynamic social environment. The existence of Francophone and Anglophone communities across the country is not only a fundamental characteristic of the Canadian federation, but also an essentiel element for national unity. This duality gives us our uniqueness and has shaped our Canadian identity, just like the precious contribution made by aboriginal people and Canadians from other cultures to our pluralistic society. I remain convinced that this respect for our identity is strongly supported by a great majority of us. As a matter of fact, this fact was verified over and over by nation-wide surveys.

To make our institutions a vibrant reflection of this wide diversity in a spirit of fairness while acknowledging the differences, that is the challenge the federal government takes up day after day. But we realize that we cannot do it alone. We must work in concert with all the stakeholders. Together, we will build the necessary infrastructures while giving our continuing support day after day to the development of our communities and making sure that the English and French languages are fully recognized throughout the country. It is true that much still needs to be done, but we have come a long way.

A significant renewal of the Secretary of State Official Languages Program and Official Languages in Education Program was announced at the very time the provisions of the new Official Languages Act came into force, on September 15, 1988. These programs are designed to give concrete expression, in our everyday life, to the government's commitment to official language minority communities as well as promotion of linguistic duality.

Several initiatives were undertaken besides the Secretary of State programs to encourage other stakeholders in the official languages issue to work together and implement as widely as possible the federal government commitment. Co-operation was sought between the various federal departments and agencies, voluntary organizations and official language minority communities as well as provincial and territorial governments. I should point out here that the federal government is not working alone in the area of official languages and that the contribution of the provincial and territorial governments is increasingly significant. They are major partners in achieving our goals of linguistic duality.

Under the Official Languages Act, the federal government is committed to co-operate with the provincial and territorial governments, to foster the growth of the English-speaking and French-speaking minorities and to promote linguistic duality. Through the Secretary of State Official Languages in Education Program, government supports initiatives to teach these minorities in their own language and encourage government to give every one the opportunity to learn English and French.

The federal government, also wants to co-operate with the provincial and territorial governments to foster the delivery of services in the language of the official language communities in areas such as social services, health services, legal services, cultural and recreational services, and to promote both official languages among all Canadians.

This co-operation, which started in the early 1980s as a one-time initiative, has considerably expanded since 1987. Master agreements signed with the provinces and territories have enabled the federal government to join forces with several of them to provide services in the language of the minority and to promote linguistic duality in other areas beside education.

Mr. Speaker, you need only look at the Secretary of State annual report on its mandate regarding official languages to realize how diversified this government's achievements are in promoting and protecting the official languages of Canada. The Secretary of State thus administers a support program for official language minorities' organizations and institutions. Through this program, financial assistance is provided to community organizations in each province and territory to enable them to participate fully to all aspects of society.

The program is aimed at five main areas. In terms of delivery of services, assistance is offered to provide some services in the language of the minority where such services do not exist. For instance, the government has supported the development and maintenance of community centers, the publication of newspapers in the language of the minority, commemorative days of all kinds, the creation of an outdoor activities center accessible to youngsters and adults, French schools and immersion schools, organizations, businesses and the entire francophone community in Alberta, as well as the establishment of day-care services.

Second, assistance is provided to preserve existing community institutions and encourage the involvement of the community in their operation. New institutions will be established if need be to meet the needs of the community and help the people. In Vancouver, for example, with the support of the federal government, the "Maison de la Francophonie" was established to group together under the same roof all the francophone organizations in Vancouver and to create a francophone forum providing cultural, artistic and recreational activities as well as to promote the revitalization of the French fact on the Pacific coast.

In Manitoba, an organization received help from government to develop a strategy for the creation of a shelter for francophone women victims of violence.

Third, representation refers to what is being done by agencies to obtain statutory, political or social recognition of the rights of the community and to receive services in their own language.

In recent years many groups have obtained government support to promote their cause. For instance, the Association provinciale des parents fransaskois obtained a grant so that it could represent Fransaskois parents before the provincial government, on the issue of school boards for the Fransaskois community. With the money, the association was able to hire a researcher in order to clarify entitlement and develop a recovery, refrancisation and upgrading program as part of the school board issue.

Fourth, in the area of community awareness, assistance was provided to enhance community identity.

Fifth, human resources development focused on activities that would help an individual or agency to acquire certain skills that would help them take specific steps and promote community well-being as well as build on those skills.

These education, training, community development and consultation activities are supported by the government.

I see I am running out of time, and I want to say to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, for whom I have had the greatest respect, ever since I first came here in 1984, that it is time to stop. It is too bad the government happened to select a program that was so special to him, but we must stop spending. We have to stop. You could say it is not enough or it is too much or you could at least spend a little. I remember that in 1984, when I gave my first speech, the subject was waste. It is high time we stopped spending, because we can not give to everyone. The government has departments and certain agencies that provide help from within. I have been talking about them for the past seven minutes at least. I am sorry but I cannot support the motion presented by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member and I hope you will not take this time away from the hon. member's questions and comments.

I think you will find consent for the following motion. Given the importance of Bill C-60 to the seven equalization receiving provinces, there should be unanimous consent for the following motion.

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, when the hon. member for Saint-Jean rises on a point of order, this House will revert to presenting of committee reports to permit the tabling of the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance.
> That at the time for Government Orders on Thursday, April 2, 1992, this House shall proceed to report stage and third reading of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, notwithstanding Standing Order 76(1) and;
> That all necessary questions to dispose of the report stage and third reading of Bill C-60 be put no later than 4.45 p.m., on Thursday, April 2, 1992.
> That any recorded division be deferred until Monday, April 6, 1992, at 6 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, in a spirit of co-operation, we support the motion.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I regret to inform the House that our caucus will not give consent.

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to designate tomorrow, Thursday, April 2, 1992 as an allotted day.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY (S. O.81)—COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gauthier (p. 9154).

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): One must have some experience in the House of Commons to see and appreciate the government's play in this, Madam Speaker.

In any case, I for one found the speech of the member for La Prairie interesting and timely until the last minute. However, when he concluded by saying that we must stop squandering—that is the word he used—when he insinuated that the Court Challenges Program would possibly cause squandering, I protest and say to him: "With all due respect, my friend, I think you are profoundly mistaken".

For the better part of his speech, the member for La Prairie gave us the views of someone who knows very well the issue of minorities and of access to minority language schools. I thank him, because what he said will be useful and, I imagine, will help various communities to take stock of the situation.

I would like to tell the member about something that is happening not far from here and ask him what he would do as a Quebecer, as a Canadian, as a member of this House and as a responsible person. Francophone parents living in a riding not far from Ottawa have children, five to nine years old, who must spend four hours each day on a bus in order to attend a French language primary school. I will not give any names. The member can read yesterday's Le Droit and the editorials in the papers. He will realize what a scandal this is causing in Ottawa.

Just think, these children must ride four hours by bus daily to get to school simply because the board will not create a francophone sector in its jurisdiction. This is a case in point which we as members of a minority thought we could fight, thanks to a very useful tool called the Court Challenges Program.

Sometimes that program simply gave us a means of saying to the officials, the provincial authorities: "Thanks to the federal government, we can go to court to make sure you honour our rights". Here is an example of injustice. I am not talking about something that happened last year or somewhere else; this is a serious situation prevailing right here in Ontario where nearly 40 children have to be bused four hours a day to get their education in the official language of their choice.

The Court Challenges Program could have been useful in such an instance. It could have helped in justice being done. I ask the member what kind of an answer he would give to those parents? What kind of an answer would he give to my brothers, sisters, cousins in Ontario who are victims of such injustice? What does he say to those people? I ask the question most sincerely.

Mr. Jourdenais: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. I understand his concern about what he just mentioned, because I have the same problem in my riding.

Restraint is nowadays the watchword of all governments, either provincial, municipal or federal, but if we can set up this thing closer to where the kids are so that they would not have to travel. I am not totally aware of this matter, but I will tell about the situation in my riding. It just happens that they want to transfer members of a minority group who would have to travel six or seven miles. I would really like the hon. member to listen to me. I want to give him an answer, because I have the same problem.

There are community agencies which are dealing with that and are getting funds from the Secretary of State for that purpose. There is currently an organization which will get funds to take care of that group. In my province, it is approximately 120 people who will have to travel also about 30 miles. This is not in your province, but in mine. We have exactly the same problem, and I would do the same on the English or the French side. But there comes a time where restraint and cutbacks are becoming absolutely necessary. Otherwise one day these kids will be crushed under the debt we will have left them. That is exactly what is going on. I understand the problem and we must solve it.

During my 1984 electoral campaign, I had an ad showing a big bag from which came out the word "solutions". I found the problems, but I am still looking for the solutions. I wish the member would do the same.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier will wait, we will go to another member and, if time permits, we will come back to him.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I also want to ask the hon. member a question.

Does the hon. member know that, in British Columbia, despite section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, despite section 530 of the Criminal Code of Canada and despite the Official Languages Act, francophones were denied their right to be tried in their language? It is left to the judge's discretion.

I will meet with a Franco–Columbian group in Vancouver in the same forum, because the hon. member talked about a forum. What must I tell that group who asked for funds in order to launch a court challenge against that provision? They want to use the program that you cut. What must I tell that group? That those proceedings are too expensive?

Mr. Jourdenais: Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure of the member's question, but I imagine that he is going somewhere in British Columbia. Are you going there as a lawyer or as a member of Parliament? I am not quite sure because earlier in your speech and in your questions, you kept referring to the fact that you were a lawyer and that you were aware of similar cases in which you were even involved.

If you are talking as a lawyer, I would tell you to be generous right now. What I accept now but found very hard to accept with this program and many others—because there are other programs that I oppose—was that the government gives money to people who then turn around and sue us.

[English]

I really have a hard time. The hon. member may remember when I stood in the House in 1984 to make my first speech that his question was the hardest question I had ever heard since coming here: "Will you paint your walls blue spending money?" I have a hard time answering a question like that. Every time I see him, I think he is going to ask me that question. We are not painting the walls any more. We have to save.

I read the other day 32 or 35 newspaper clippings saying that the budget that we presented about a month ago was the best budget that has been presented for over 10 to 15 years. I back it up and I am banking on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is one minute left. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I will only be a minute. I want to go back on the issue of education and minority groups. I am talking about school boards that refuse to give their students a teaching in the language of the minority. That is what we are talking about.

When we talk about wasting, this year the Department of Justice increased its budget for disputes by some $16 million, based on estimates made by the regions. This means that the federal government has $16 million more to go before the courts. I ask the member: What logic does he use to say that the Court Challenges Program which, over a period of five years, cost only $4,935,112, is wasting money, when the accused were provinces and sometimes even the federal government and school boards? Where is the wasting? I am sorry, but there is no wasting of money there.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thirty seconds. The hon. member for La Prairie.

Mr. Jourdenais: It is going to be difficult to give a quick reply. I want to tell the hon. member that when I used the word wasting earlier, I meant in a general way. I mean there are so many expenses that were made, that are still being made, and I am opposed to that. When some departments get budget increases of $16 million for things like that, I do exactly what I did earlier in my speech: I voice my opposition to such measures. I understand the situation because the problem exists in my riding. We will have to find a solution by using other programs within the department.

[English]

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the debate on women and the budget, I chose to concentrate my remarks on the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. I was then asked to speak on the subject again today. There are many compelling reasons for the reinstatement of this program so I am very pleased to address this issue again, specifically as it will affect Canadians with disabilities.

In my remarks yesterday I noted that nobody believes the government's explanation for the termination of this program. It has said there is enough jurisprudence but in fact we know there are many important areas of law where there is no jurisprudence at all. It is really quite outrageous for ministers of this government to stand up in this House and make these ridiculous statements. They have said it is time for the provinces, and even the private sector, to support this kind of program.

This strange approach reflects the bizarre mindset of this Conservative government. No one has explained why the private sector should have any responsibility for funding a constitutional human rights program. It is very clearly the responsibility of the federal government.

I certainly would be pleased to see private sector funding of this kind of program. but I am not holding my breath waiting for it. The government has given no indication that it has actively encouraged the private sector to get involved. I guess civic minded businesses are just expected to come forward and say: "here, take our money".

As for the provinces, I think the federal government knows very well what a poor record some of our provincial governments have in defending their linguistic minorities. If these governments were to suddenly show great leadership in defending and promoting human rights, Canadians would welcome this role from them. Although I do not accept the abdication of federal responsibility in this area, I think that the Court Challenges Program would enthusiastically welcome the involvement of the provinces. It would allow the program to become involved in many very important areas of law in which there is little jurisprudence.

Once again we see the Conservative government unloading responsibilities on to the provinces unilaterally, arbitrarily, and without consultation. I would be very happy to be proven wrong on this, but to my knowledge we have had no evidence to suggest that the federal government has actively sought funding from the provinces.

This is becoming a typical pattern for this government. Abandon federal responsibilities, declare that the provinces should fill the gap, but do not actually ask the provinces or work with them to make sure it happens. We all know very well that the provinces are not exactly rushing to take on new financial commitments. This government has hit them hard enough already, and this is supposedly the government of the new federalism.

The Conservatives have described this move to cut the Court Challenges Program as a cost cutting measure, but nobody is buying that. I want to point out that according to experts such as former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson, this program provided excellent value for money. It was recently brought to my attention that lawyers of the Court Challenges Program earned on average about 66 per cent or two–thirds of the salary earned by the average Canadian bar association lawyer in Ottawa.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, I have attended every one of the meetings that the committee has devoted to this issue. We have heard from the director and other officials of the program. We have heard from a number of expert witnesses, from the Canadian Bar Association, Canadian Human Rights Commission, as well as the Deputy Ministers of Justice and Multiculturalism. Every single one of these witnesses has spoken positively of this program. They have all stated that it has been an efficient and effectively run program.

I believe there is widespread agreement in the three major parties that this program should be reinstated. The decision to abolish the program was clearly a hasty and ill–conceived move that the government has come to regret. We even heard that the Prime Minister did not know that this decision had been made. To its credit, this government has been known to reverse unfair decisions in the past. I can say that we in the Liberal Party would applaud it sincerely for such a move. It takes courage to admit you have made a mistake.

I would remind the government that cancelling this program is a betrayal of the most vulnerable members of our society. The language and equality rights section of the charter were put there specifically to protect these groups.

The Court Challenges Program was intended to help these groups defend their rights because they are often financially unable to defend these rights themselves. If is safe to say that aside from the Reform Party, there has been overwhelming opposition across this country to this heartless decision. As I said yesterday, we know that respected groups such as the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the Canadian Bar Association have strongly criticized this move.

I want to quote from a few newspaper articles which give some indication of how Canadians feel about this decision. The following is from The Ottawa Citizen article of February 28. "A coalition of equality seeking groups condemned the program's death saying it makes a mockery of the charter. It essentially means that women and the disempowered groups such as the disabled community in this country do not have any access to their equality rights in the charter", said Shelagh Day of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

"Seven years after the introduction of the equality rights provision, we now have no way to use it whatsoever. How can anyone who is disadvantaged in this country use their equality rights? This was the one program we had". Day said the decision to cut the program had nothing to do with hard economic times. "This is just a straight ideological cancellation of a program that the government does not like. It seems to indicate that the law is for the privileged people and it is certainly not for people who are disadvantaged".

In a Toronto Star column on March 30, noted social policy writer, Leonard Shifrin, expressed his hope that the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Disabled Persons can convince the government that "the price of wooing redneck votes is losing any vestige of respect from mainstream Canadians".

Mr. Shifrin quoted Jerome DiGiovanni, of the Canadian Disability Rights Council, who told the standing committee on human rights that abolishing the program made the charter inoperative for the disabled.

I would like to quote further from Mr. DiGiovanni's testimony to the committee: "The Canadian Disability Rights Council is the legal tool which will for the first time allow 3.3 million Canadians to really have access to the courts and to equality rights without discrimination. The council has been in existence since 1988. We have just barely begun to understand how systemic discrimination excludes us. The case law has not yet been written. Take the Locas case, for instance, the Swain decision where the Supreme Court said that handicapped persons had been experiencing discrimination for centuries, that they were excluded and that the time had come to redress matters. Prayers and goodwill will not correct the situation but access to the courts will. That is really the basic tool that will allow us to achieve equality". This access has again been removed by the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

Mr. DiGiovanni also listed a number of important disability rights cases that will not be able to come forward in the courts because of the cancellation of the program. Cases involving closed captioning of television programs for the hearing impaired; the matter of sheltered workshops and the exploitation of disabled workers; the question of access to buildings and planes and buses are vitally important issues for disabled Canadians. They find it very insulting when the government says there is enough jurisprudence. The government seems to be saying that these cases are not important, that they do not matter and, following this logic a step further, the disabled community and their rights as equal Canadians does not matter.

The minister might be interested to know that Hugh Segal, chief of staff to the Prime Minister, told this group during a meeting last week that the government should not be in the business of funding groups that take the government to court. So it is true, the cancellation of this program has nothing to do with jurisdiction, nothing to do with cost but it is to silence dissent against the government.

Finally I want to quote from the editorial in The Ottawa Citizen dated March 3 which had the headline "Tories pick on the weakest".

"Once in a while a worthy and inexpensive innovation comes along on Parliament Hill. The Court Challenges Program was one. Seven years ago the federal government started this program to provide funding for deserving but powerless groups to challenge federal laws and policies under the language and equality rights guarantees of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There was something in this sensible program for everyone. For women, the elderly, the disabled and ethnic minorities, the funding finally meant access to an effective tool: test cases of individual rights under the charter. For government and all Canadians, there was a chance to build up jurisprudence and guidance in the application of equality rights. Despite the demonstrated usefulness of this program, the federal government remains intractable in the decision to cancel".

I want to assure the government that this issue is not going to go away. As the Official Opposition we in the Liberal Party are not going to stand idly by and watch this program die. Human rights groups are not going to accept this decision either.

This afternoon we heard the minister of multiculturalism go on at length about how great this program is and how well it works. He even suggested that there is still a need for something like the Court Challenges Program. Why? Why, if it works so well, and if there is still a need for it, is it being cancelled?

He suggested that he is looking for ideas of creative, innovative alternatives to the program. He wants to reinvent the wheel and have someone else pay for it. I want to say to the minister that we in the Liberal Party are not interested in participating in the government's face-saving effort.

There is no need for alternatives when we have a program that works perfectly well, is cost efficient and when there is still a great need for this program. We call on the government to do the right thing and reinstate this program immediately.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, the member for Hamilton Mountain has claimed that somebody on this side spoke of having enough jurisprudence.

Nobody ever said that we have enough jurisprudence. That is not a word we use. The member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys talked about the Solicitor General saying that we have sufficient jurisprudence. Those are words that were never used.

We have said there is a significant body of jurisprudence. Just to set the record straight—I know if the Solicitor General were here, he would want to put this on the record—what he has said very clearly is this: "We think that now is the time for other levels of government, the Canadian bar and other non-governmental bodies to which most of the current court challenges pertain, to take a hand and participate in the funding of these matters. The program, we feel, has come to an end as far as this level of government is concerned. It has served the purpose and we think it is up to other groups to come forward at this time to participate in the program".

I always agree with the Solicitor General. Where is leadership? It is not just to say: "Put the money back", money that the finance minister has had in a very, very difficult time to find in one place and another so that we are able to cut taxes by cutting expenses, not by trying to increase the debt and passing it on to future generations.

If you were in touch with your constituents, you might find how well received that budget has been this time. I tell you, we are getting nothing but commendations for the magnificent work of this finance minister.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Weiner: You have not been back home in such a long time, it will be a surprise for you when you do get there.

Leadership is not to say: Put back what is taken away. Leadership is to recognize that we have something that was excellent. With all the representations that have come in from the bar association, from non-governmental organizations, from new provincial governments that may very well have an interest to participate, why not let them all come forward and create a new model. It will not necessarily be something which says: If government will not do it, it cannot be done at all. That is not leadership.

Ms. Phinney: Madam Speaker, sometimes it is the responsibility of the government to take over where an individual cannot. These are people who cannot afford to challenge these issues in court. That is what government is for. It is to help people who cannot help themselves. I have sat on the committee meetings when we have been listening to the witnesses to which I believe both the ministers in the House were invited but to which they were unable to go.

Mr. Weiner: Ah, go back to sleep.

Ms. Phinney: Madam Speaker, I will continue. I said both ministers were unable to go. Read Hansard, it will show that is what I said.

An hon. member: I wonder what reason they had this time.

An hon. member: They are just hypersensitive, that's all.

Ms. Phinney: They were not able to come at any date that was suggested. Their deputy ministers were there. Every witness who appeared before the committee said they felt that it was a good program. They did not know where the help would come from for those people who need it. They had no suggestions as to how to help these people who cannot help themselves.

We are suggesting that this program be reinstated to help Canadians who cannot help themselves.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A very short comment, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I am tempted to comment on the minister's bunker mentality saying: "Boy, they are really welcoming our budget". He had better not stick his head out of the foxhole because it would get shot off.

The member made a very good speech which showed quite clearly that there is much to do, especially in the field of the disabled, as she mentioned. There is much to do in the jurisprudence. It is not completed yet.

The minister raised this idea—I do not know if it is a red herring or whether he is serious—of a provincial contribution. I cannot see the province funding challenges to federal legislation. Has the member had any indication from this minister,the government, any member of the government, or any government member from her committee that any of them have ever made any attempt to talk to a province or to negotiate with a province about the province kicking in money? It seems to me that this was just a big surprise with the budget. Did the member hear of any negotiations with a province? I did not.

Ms. Phinney: Thank you very much for your comments and your question. We have certainly heard from no one who has appeared before the committee that there has been any suggestion, any help, any approach from this government to private enterprise or the provincial governments asking that they should help out in any way to either finance, replace or assist the communities in Canada who cannot help themselves, who have no money.

Most provinces have no money at all to put toward a program like this and are counting on help from the federal government to keep this program going. This is obviously a rich man's charter and the poor people, the disabled, the people who cannot fend for themselves, are out in the cold.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, it is with great distress and sadness that I take part in this debate because the government's decision to cancel the Court Challenges Program is not only a bad joke but completely absurd. I fully agree with the comments made earlier by the member for Ottawa—Vanier who stressed that this program is essential to the minority language groups of this country, to women, to native groups and to ethnic groups. Whenever these groups felt that their rights where being infringed upon, they could turn to this program to obtain financial assistance.

Where will these groups turn now to obtain the means required to have their rights affirmed under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

My colleague's opinion is also supported by Mrs. Wilson, a former Supreme Court judge who expressed her dismay and sadness that this government would abolish the Court Challenges Program. As a former judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who has in many instances passed judgment on cases involving Canadian minorities, Mrs. Wilson's opinion should not be taken lightly.

By abolishing this program, the government is removing a unique mechanism that could be used by groups to defend their rights. It was also a relatively low cost program, if we consider that during the past seven years, the government, which was committed to spending over $8 million, only spent $4.9 million.

If we compare this cut with increases or allocations in other areas, it is a sad reflection on the government's value judgments. What about the $4 million for the Museum of Humour, the $28 million that was spent on the Spicer commission, whose report is gathering dust somewhere on a shelf in some department and has never been heard of since; and more than $20 million for the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, whose recommendations the government has yet to endorse.

At least this was a relatively lost cost program that provided a guarantee for all Canadians that their rights would be respected and the democratic process would remain intact.

The government has acknowledged in many ways that this was a very valid and useful program, since more than 300 cases have been heard so far. Assuming that the program served us well for 14 years, why would it no longer be useful today? We on this side of the House wonder about this, because one gets the impression that the government is anxious to muzzle individuals and groups that favour equality for all Canadians.

To get back to the 300 cases that were heard by various courts across Canada, and I would refer to Hansard of March 17 this year, when the minister of multiculturalism said, in response to a question from the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, and I quote:

> This program was very beneficial, but after nearly 300 cases, according to my information, we have now created a certain body of jurisprudence.

I think we can assume that there will certainly be other cases that will be different from those that have already been heard by the courts and which deserve special attention, since they will also be useful in clarifying various sections of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Speaking of the charter, perhaps I may make a very modest comment, since I am neither a lawyer nor a constitutional expert. The charter has already lost much of its impact, in my humble opinion, because of the notwithstanding clause. If we lose the Court Challenges Program as well, I wonder how the economically and otherwise disadvantaged in this country will manage to obtain official recognition of their rights?

Which leads me to say that those same groups, individuals and minorities would be in double jeopardy. They can no longer depend on this last resort in their quest for recognition of their rights. Where do they stand legally? The charter does not guarantee access to the courts for people who want to challenge laws that prevent them from exercising their rights. It was a very valuable program, a far–reaching program. It was somehow a haven for those who thought that their rights had been trampled.

If you compare this program to the charter, I believe that there is a significant difference for the reasons I have just mentionned.

I see that my time is nearly up. I would like to conclude by asking the government, in view of the modest costs involved and of the program's impact on the lives of all Canadians, to restore this program for the well–being of all parties concerned.

It would be more than unfortunate, even deplorable, if only one Canadian had his rights denied because he could not afford to defend himself. It woud be a shame.

One must always remember that what makes justice meaningful also gives meaning to a person's freedom and dignity.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

I would like to read a paragraph from a letter I received from la Fédération des Franco–Colombiens in Vancouver. As a matter of fact its office is in the riding of the Minister of Justice, Vancouver Centre.

I wonder if the hon. member would comment on this statement and tell me whether he agrees or disagrees. The letter says of the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program: "Nor could the decision have come at a worse moment, smack in the middle of the constitutional negotiations. Unless Canadians are enabled to appeal to the courts to have their rights respected, constitutional guarantees of linguistic duality are so much hot air. It clearly allows that the decision threatens the very principle of linguistic duality, that fundamental characteristic of Canada's identity. It might well cancel out all the positive effects that the current constitutional proposals could produce. The Court Challenges Program is an indispensable tool for guaranteeing the linguistic and cultural growth and development of minority official language communities".

I wonder if the hon. member would agree with that statement and agree with me that the lack of funding and the cancellation of this program is really a slap in the face to francophone groups, such as the one in British Columbia and other groups in other parts of Canada?

Mr. Bélair: Madam Speaker, I agree with my colleague from British Columbia that this is an extremely bad time to do away with this program. We are right in the middle of a constitutional crisis. This afternoon the Prime Minister pleaded with all members of this House to make an effort to recognize each other's values and traditions and also to recognize that there are minority languages in all of the provinces, be it English in Quebec or French in the other provinces.

It was an appeal to not only promote but also to protect those linguistic rights. The Constitution and the charter exist to protect those rights, but in some cases there is abuse. That is why we are concerned that employers—the federal government, its ministries, the provincial governments, corporations—would abuse the rights of individuals if this program is cancelled. It is almost synonymous to encouraging those groups that I have just mentioned to discriminate against groups or individuals in our society. The government chose a very bad time to cancel the program but hopefully it will rethink its decision and reinstate it.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I would like to stress that the Fédération des Franco-Colombiens, and especially its chairperson, Mrs. Marie Bourgeois, with whom I had an excellent meeting a week ago, and its director, Mr. Pierre Rivard, are absolutely astonished by the government's decision to cancel the Court Challenges Program. According to them, this will greatly hamper their efforts to promote the rights of the Francophone minority in British Columbia.

[English]

I would also like to take this opportunity to make a brief comment and ask the member if he would comment with respect to another issue and that is the question of access by the lesbian and gay community to the courts pursuant to section 15 of the charter.

The minister of multiculturalism is in the House and will know that the argument has been made with respect to this particular decision, this ruthless decision to chop the Court Challenges Program is that those who are seeking justice, particularly from minority groups, can go to the Canadian Human Rights Commission and can seek justice there. The human rights commission can act on their behalf.

The minister will know that is not the case with respect to the lesbian and gay community because in their case the Canadian Human Rights Act does not include sexual orientation. They have been waiting six years for the government to keep its promise.

I want to point this out and point out the fact that a number of very important cases, whether it be the case of James M. Egan and Jack Nesbit with respect to spouses' allowance, of Graham Haig and Joshua Birch with respect to the Canadian Human Rights Act itself, Brian Mossop on spousal benefits or a CUPE pension case, could not have been funded without the Court Challenges Program.

I want to ask the member if he would comment with respect to this essential element of justice as well for a community that needs this program desperately in order to seek equality through the courts when it is denied by governments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately it will have to be a very brief comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélair: I would simply like to mention, Madam Speaker, that our official languages critic also went to British Columbia last weekend to meet with members of the Fédération des Franco-Colombiens, including Mrs. Bourgeois who was a member of that same delegation, in order to find out how we could assist them. The first question that was raised is this: Why has the party in power cancelled the one and only means by which we could challenge the British Columbia government concerning school management? What do they have left?

[English]

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be taking part in this debate on the hon. member's motion. It is an important motion and certainly deserves a lot of serious consideration.

Hon. members will be well aware of the tremendous gains made in equality in language rights since the Court Challenges Program began in 1978. This government has been and was an enthusiastic supporter of the program and there are numerous examples of court cases that attest to the program's successes.

I think my hon. friend will be quite interested in hearing about some of the programs and some of the very successful court cases the program has funded to advance the rights and freedoms we enjoy as citizens under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Let us examine equality rights. In 1989 the first case to reach the Supreme Court of Canada was brought by a British born lawyer who was refused the right to practise law in British Columbia because he was not a Canadian citizen.

The Supreme Court struck down the requirement, citing section 15 of the charter. But the decision did more than permit non-citizens to practise law, it laid the foundation for the future interpretation of equality rights. The Supreme Court went on to make a series of decisions that have expanded the scope of human rights statutes.

All six judges who heard the case agreed that the citizenship requirement violated equality rights in section 15 of the charter. A four to two majority decision held that the law was not saved by section 1 of the charter, which allows reasonable limits on equality rights. As a result of the decision, we now have a clear understanding from the Supreme Court what equality rights mean.

Another example of an equality rights case funded by the program dealt with the denial of the right to vote. It challenged the section of the Canada Elections Act which denied the vote to persons unable to manage their property because of mental disability.

Just before the case was heard in Federal Court, this government agreed that the section violated the charter and should be struck down. One hour later the Federal Court agreed with the government and invalidated that section.

The result of this challenge by the Canadian Disability Rights Council is that many of our citizens with mental disabilities were able to vote in the 1988 federal election. As well, my hon. friend will be pleased to know that the case helped to challenge widespread assumptions that stigmatized persons with mental disabilities.

In another interesting case funded by the program, a man argued that as a natural father he should not be denied parental benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act when those benefits are available to an adoptive father. The Federal Court agreed with him and ruled that the UI act violated section 15 of the charter.

The Court Challenges Program funded an Ontario children's rights organization representing a young offender who argued that the provincial government's failure to establish alternative measures programs for young offenders violated his equality rights under the charter.

In ruling in the young offender's favour, the trial judge said the Attorney General for Ontario had a duty to authorize alternative measures programs. The ruling was upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal, but the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that his rights had not been violated and the court referred to the value of diversity in our federal system and the importance of federal-provincial co-operation.

The Court Challenges Program gave funding support to the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund so it could argue a case concerning the interpretation of the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan for credit splitting when a couple separates. The trial judge ruled that the husband was entitled to the full CPP benefits so his estranged wife appealed the decision to the Ontario Divisional Court. It ruled that the Canada Pension Plan cannot be interpreted in such a way that it waives credit splitting rights.

These are just a few of the many successful cases that received funding support through the Court Challenges Program.

I remind hon. members that during the life of the program this government contributed more financial support that any previous government. The program funded up to $35,000 for each court level challenge and up to $5,000 to develop a case.

Canadians have every reason to be proud of this program. We have invested more in the Court Challenges Program than any other country in the world. I say to my hon. friend, not only have numerous cases been resolved under the program, but many more cases have helped to raise awareness among Canadians of several issues that must be dealt with if we are to ensure that this great nation continues to place a high value on equality for all its citizens.

The Court Challenges Program has enabled access for many more groups that for one reason or another are at a disadvantage to the justice system. For example, the Canadian Council of Churches received program funding to challenge many sections of the Immigration Act. The council believes the act violates equality rights.

To assure hon. members that the government had a strict hands-off policy regarding the Court Challenges Program, I must point out that the government argued that the Council of Churches did not have the standing to bring its case to court, but the Federal Court refused to strike down the council's case. The government appealed that decision but the Federal Court of Appeal ruled in the council's favour and the program is now funding the council's appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The government has found it necessary to bring the program to a conclusion. However, as we have already made clear, the government intends to honour all its commitments made prior to February 27 of this year. These commitments include the one made by the program to the Canadian Disabilities Rights Council, which is challenging a section of the Immigration Act frequently used to bar families from immigrating to Canada if the member of that family has a disability.

The program has already funded a number of similar cases but the government settled each of them out of court. The program is now funding the council rather than more individuals so that the case can be argued on behalf of the entire group affected under the Immigration Act.

Many of the cases I have mentioned dealt with and deal with equality rights because that is a key section of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However there are other concerns as well, such as those expressed by Victims of Violence. This community organization is disturbed about barriers to justice that can hinder a person with a disability who needs to give evidence in court.

The program is helping Victims of Violence develop a case on the potentially discriminatory impact of the Canada Evidence Act on people with disabilities. It wants the court to consider options such as allowing videotaped or written testimony for individuals unable to testify in person.

The Court Challenges Program will also honour its commitment to the Canadian Ethnocultural Council to help it research the question of access to the courts for persons with complaints of discrimination under the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Hon. members may know that currently only the Canadian Human Rights Commission can deal with complaints. The council is concerned that complaints of discrimination may not be dealt with effectively or promptly by the commission. It believes that individuals should have access to the courts in these matters.

Prejudice is widespread in our society. Unfortunately, judges are not immune to it. Members of disadvantaged groups frequently raise concerns about alleged discriminatory attitudes and rulings of judges. In that regard, the program has funded the Inuit Women's Association of Canada to help it examine the sentencing practices of judges in the Northwest Territories in cases of sexual assault against Inuit women.

The Court Challenges Program was originally intended to help citizens who wanted clarification of language rights through the courts. Financial assistance was provided to groups and individuals for test cases based on the language rights provisions of the Constitution. My hon. friend will appreciate that the program was intended to serve as a tool to promote our two official languages. It has done that, and the government is proud of what the program has accomplished in promoting the recognition and implementation of minority language rights across Canada. Through the program we have enhanced the vitality of the English and French linguistic minority communities.

It has been a decade since our charter became law. During the past 10 years the Court Challenges Program has been extremely useful in helping to advance the rights and freedoms enjoyed by Canadians. It has certainly strengthened the laws of Canada and influenced attitudes as we strive to ensure equality for all citizens.

However, nothing remains constant. This nation is going through many changes, as are countries throughout the world. We are not abandoning support of our basic rights and freedoms. We have many programs that address those issues and the government will live up to its commitment to provide funding already granted by the Court Challenges Program.

Yes, this government can be very proud of its accomplishments under the program. We have not shied away from giving the program the freedom to operate independently. However the hon. member knows, as do all hon. members, that we must make tough decisions to get our financial house in order. It is time to ask our provincial partners and private sector groups to share the burden and take on additional responsibilities in the area of implementing equality rights for Canadians.

I say to my hon. friend: "Let us work together to ensure the equality of all Canadians. Let us build on the foundation of the Court Challenges Program. Let us move forward and make this magnificent land a place in which all Canadians, whether citizens by birth or citizens by choice, will be equal under the law and full participants in their communities".

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a question relating to some of the comments made by the member, particularly dealing with the appeal process.

We all know that court cases start at trial level and proceed up to other levels of the justice system until they get to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Minister for Multiculturalism and Citizenship said today when he made his statement in the House that the government will honour its funding commitment: "For the level of court at which funding was approved". Most of the cases funded by the Court Challenges Program are at the trial court level.

Therefore, I want to ask the member if he has inquired of the government or of the Minister of Justice, and since she is here maybe she would like to inform him, what the government proposes to do to ensure that the cases funded by the Court Challenges Program, which will be honoured, will continue to be funded if they proceed to appeal without imposing on those minority groups—the underprivileged, linguistic, women, multicultural groups—the onerous financial costs incurred by an appeal to the decision at a court level which has been approved for funding.

My question is simple. Is there an answer for these groups that find themselves in a very difficult situation? They have been approved to go to a certain level, that has been guaranteed. What happens if there is an appeal?

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, I can well understand the hon. member's concerns about commitments that have already been made to previous groups because when his party was in power there was a blatant disregard for commitments made by his administration for future undertakings when it came time to pay the piper.

The fact of the matter is that this government, of which I am proud to be a supporter with all good reason as the record will show, honours its commitments. It has made the commitment that it will honour those cases that have already been funded under the process. It will see them through to fruition.

I see the hon. minister shaking his head in the affirmative, agreeing that this is the case. Although I am not privy to decisions that are taken in cabinet the fact of the matter is that when cabinet ministers of this government advise me that certain things will take place then I have no difficulty in accepting their word at face value. I am sure that as these groups express their concerns—and he mentioned underprivileged groups, women's groups, minorities and a host of others.

On this side of the House we are extremely proud of the work. I understand that when this program began there was very little funding required because there was very little activity in that direction. This year and in previous years this government has been providing funding to the tune of up to $2.5 million a year to assist these groups. Provided they qualify, these groups are entitled to $35,000 per litigation. They qualify for up to $5,000 for case developments.

In extreme cases, if there is a further requirement for funding up to $25,000 per level of court case can be funded, and probably has been funded on many different occasions by this government which I am proud to be associated with.

• (1840)

I want to assure all of those groups that the hon. member mentioned that should they have concerns about their future, provided they are already under the umbrella of the program they will be dealt with fairly and equitably by our government.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I want to put to this vigorous supporter of the government a question concerning a couple of women, Christine Morrissey and her partner, who are challenging the policies of the Canadian immigration department which deny them the right to remain together as a family unit. They are challenging this policy which discriminates against the lesbian and gay community, and that challenge is being funded by the Court Challenges Program.

These women have not yet had this case come to trial. When the case comes to trial presumably the commitment initially made to them with respect to the trial will be honoured—that is the understanding I have. However, what happens beyond that, when the government appeals, as the government has appealed in each and every instance? This is a government which claims to be concerned about the rights of minorities, yet in each and every instance in which those rights have been trampled on this government has appealed, has taken it to a higher court.

I want to ask the member a very specific question. The program is being dissolved. There will no longer be any administrators of the program, there will no longer be any funds for appeals. What will happen to Christine Morrissey and other women and men like them who rely on this program to assert their rights under the charter? What will happen to these people and how will they be able to pursue this case in higher courts?

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, unless I have missed something in the question, it seems that the question put by the hon. member is the same as the question put by the previous questioner. The answer is obviously the same. Any commitments undertaken by this government, whether to these two women that the hon. member brings to the attention of the House or any other groups, will be carried on to fruition and conclusion.

The hon. member may make all kinds of comments about how we are appealing decisions and taking decisions to court but the fact of the matter is that I have just read into the record a litany of people who have successfully accessed the program, despite the fact that the federal government from time to time makes a decision because that indeed is its responsibility. After all, it is the responsibility of the government to implement and introduce into the House legislation and deal with the Constitution and the charter in a way that it sees fit, as the electorate has put it in place to do.

It is to the credit of the government that despite all of that it has supplied a large amount of money on a consistent basis, in excess of $2.5 million in the past year and a substantial amount of money in the years leading up to that. We are extremely proud of the record that we have of supporting groups such as the hon. member and others in the House have mentioned.

It is important that in the future they take up the challenge that we have laid down. The minister and I have told our provincial counterparts and other civic-minded groups that there must be ways other than constantly relying on the federal government as a cash cow because the taxpayers of this nation have said: "Enough is enough. We must come to grips with the rising debt. Taxes can no longer afford to be increased at the expense of the taxpayer".

My hon. friend is a strong supporter of the NDP government in British Columbia and I dare say that there are many out there that he would like to assist that fall into the category he has already referred to. I would ask that he go to his counterparts in the provincial Government of British Columbia and ensure that they understand the importance and the willingness of our federal government in Ottawa to share with them the opportunity to put together programs. Together we may be able to effectively deal with the program that has been proven very successful in the past.

Now the time is upon us when we must move and make the changes that are necessary as we evolve in a changing world.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened very attentively to what the member for Fundy—Royal just said. I take him to be a serious individual and I have a serious point of order.

He is speaking with some authority in assuring the people of Canada in this House and those who are listening that the government will indeed fund appeals to the court cases at the level they have been approved. That means that the government policy announced by the minister today is either misunderstood or has changed while this debate was going on.

Can we get unanimous consent to have the minister to clarify that question for us now, for all Canadians to understand? Where does the government stand on appeals of these cases that have been approved?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member knows very well that is not a point of order. It is a question of debate. With unanimous consent we can debate it, but I do not see anyone rising to answer this point.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, usually I rise on these debates in the House and start my remarks by saying I am pleased to be able to contribute something to this debate. I cannot say it on this particular motion because of the serious impact that it will have on thousands of Canadians in the future.

This country has just gone through a period of constitutional renewal. In fact we are still in the process. It has been a process of inclusion through which we have attempted and are still attempting to include an entire province in the Constitution of Canada.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms is an integral part of our Constitution. It is important we understand that with this removal of $2.7 million that supported the Court Challenges Program we have effectively made the Charter of Rights and Freedoms meaningless to thousands of Canadians. They will not be able to go through the courts to redress wrongs that may be perpetrated on them in the main by arbitrary acts of the federal government.

In the main the government has presented two arguments to the House. One was that there had now been a basis of jurisprudence established that made the Court Challenges Program no longer necessary. The other argument, which was just presented by the hon. member for Fundy—Royal, was that there was a need to reduce government expenditures, that that was the reason why the program was terminated.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. After the government action came to our attention through the estimates, we decided to examine both of those arguments to determine whether they stood up under close examination.

In the course of the last two or three weeks, we have had what I consider to be expert witnesses with a special understanding of the Court Challenges Program appearing before our committee. We asked nearly every witness those two questions: First, is there a basis of jurisprudence established that no longer makes the program necessary? In every case the response was: "No, there has not been".

To put that in perspective, one witness that appeared before the committee, the Canadian Bar Association, pointed out that after 200 years of having the constitution in the United States enacted, there continues to be litigation to determine the exact meaning of the American Bill of Rights. That is no less true with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We asked the minister's own deputy minister what reasons she could provide for the cancellation of this program. The deputy minister's response was that it was purely a method of reducing costs. There was no other reason. Jurisprudence did not come into it. All those other arguments we have heard did not come into it. It was a straight cost cutting measure.

If that is the real reason, and I rather suspect it is, it is a crying shame. What it means in effect is that if one has personal wealth or access to a lot of wealth, one will be able to go through the courts to determine one's rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The recent case we have heard was the one on pornography. If a federal law says that individuals making all kinds of bucks peddling pornography cannot do that, they can work their way through the charter and up through the courts to ask the courts to give them that right.

However, if one happens to be a single woman—I am trying to use the worst case scenario—a disabled individual, or a person at the low end of the socio-economic scale, one will not have the means to use the charter to establish one's rights. It is as simple as that.

When we consider the importance of that $2.7 million program to the rights of Canadians, I think it was a bad economic error to cancel it.

The argument has been made that if we all think this program is so important we should be asking the provincial governments to pick up the cost. We have been told that people's rights can be protected through government departments, even though in the first instance it is the federal departments and legislation that are denying these people their rights.

It has even been suggested that the Canadian Human Rights Commission or the Official Languages Commission could protect those rights. We asked the human rights commissioner whether or not he was empowered to do just that, or whether he would have been able to do that when he was the commissioner of official languages. He answered unequivocally that he could not and neither could the official languages commissioner.

Then it was suggested that perhaps an individual who did not have access to wealth could go through provincial legal aid systems. We were told that once a case had been established to proceed it could cost anywhere around $300,000. Provincial legal aid systems are not structured to do that kind of thing.

In effect it means that if individuals out there do not have a friendly lawyer who is willing to donate up to $300,000 or in excess of that to challenge federal laws through the courts, or if individuals do not have the money, then they are not going to be able to do it. Only rich folk are going to be able to do it. I think people should understand that.

I make a plea to the minister who is listening carefully. I really think this was not well thought out at all. It would appear from our questioning of officials before committee and the responses we received to these questions that indeed it was not well thought out.

As far as I could determine no cost benefit analyses were done on how much the government would actually save by retaining the program. There was none of that. It just seemed to be that somebody came up with the bright idea that federal spending could be reduced by chopping this program.

Knowing what impact the termination of this program was going to have, at the very least I think the government should have said: "Look, we don't think we can continue to fund the program. Let's at least first explore various avenues, whether through the Canadian Bar Association, provincial governments or any other available means, before removing the program".

Now that has done been, at the very least I think the government should seriously consider extending the program until that kind of work has been completed, not only in fairness to itself but in fairness to all those Canadians who are going to be adversely and seriously affected by the termination of this program.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member about obligation. I do not want my comments to be construed as in any way supporting the government's position and action in this regard. My question for my colleague is with regard to the obligation of the legal profession in Canada.

As a member of the legal profession it seems to me that the profession has a responsibility. What we are talking about here in effect are legal fees that must be paid to lawyers in order to litigate certain cases that are constitutional test cases.

We know that lawyers do quite well vis-à-vis the federal government in terms of the amount of money that is transferred to the legal profession for work they do. They are paid handsomely, I would submit.

I was at a committee the other day and we are paying an outside lawyer $600 a day to sit there and help draft legislation notwithstanding that we have lawyers in the Department of Justice.

My question to my friend and colleague is: What obligation does he believe the legal profession has? Does he not believe that the legal profession has a responsibility in these cases? I am not talking about single practitioners or lawyers who might not be able to afford it. Is he aware of what programs major law firms have right across the country to help fund these types of cases on a pro bono basis? Is he familiar with what efforts the legal profession is making as a contribution to this type of litigation to ensure that people with legitimate cases that ought to be litigated vis-à-vis matters affecting the Constitution have an opportunity to do so?

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, that is a legitimate question. Indeed it is one that we asked the Canadian Bar Association and others who appeared before our committee.

It is worth pointing out—and the hon. member for Fundy—Royal mentioned it in his speech—that around $35,000 is provided under the program for each case. It costs anywhere around $300,000 to take the case through the system. The only way it can go through the system is by the Canadian Bar Association and its member lawyers providing what they call pro bono service, which is initially free service or for much reduced fee charges.

The Canadian Bar Association and its members have actually given the Canadian public a very good deal. When we take the $2.7 million that has been chopped from this program and weigh that against the value that Canadians have received under this program by free work by lawyers, by reduced work by lawyers, I think we got a basement bargain deal. Why we are destroying that is beyond me.

• (1900)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I just want some clarification. The member for Beaches—Woodbine was at the committee. I have just heard a question by the Liberal member from Toronto who appears to be advocating, unless I am wrong, that this become a matter of charity from the bar. I do not know if the Liberals have two positions on this.

I understood from all their speakers today that the Liberals had been for this Court Challenges Program. Now we have a Liberal who stands up and seems to say it is the charity of the bar that has to do it. You cannot be all things to all people. The Liberal Party cannot do that. It cannot keep doing that and have any credibility in Canada. I have to tell the hon. member from Toronto that.

I want to ask the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine, what position did the Liberal Party take on the committee? Did the Liberals appear to be in favour or against the cutback of this program? The member said very brilliantly that one, the program is needed; two, that it is a sad case to cut back and it is wrong; and, three, that it cannot be done through the charity of the bar. It has to be done as a proper program.

As a lawyer who did public interest programs, these cases also have to be co-ordinated. It is not just hit and miss. That is where the member for York South—Weston is wrong if he is advocating that it be the private bar.

I am angry because the Liberals cannot have two positions on everything. I want to ask the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine: What position did the Liberal Party take in the committee?

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, the member from Vancouver is clearly misconstruing and misinterpreting my position. Now if he wants to score some cheap political points he can. But I could ask him what his government at Queen's Park is doing or what his government in B.C. is doing.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in rising to support this motion which calls for the restoration of the Court Challenges Program. I would like to congratulate the Liberal member for Ottawa—Vanier for bringing this motion to the House.

It appears that the government is arguing that the Court Challenges Program must be cut in order to reduce the expenditures and consequently to control the public debt of the country.

Canadians should know that this program costs only $2.5 million a year, perhaps a little less. It has been suggested before in this House that we could save the same amount of money if we cut back the tremendous amount of clipping services and media analysis that goes to the Prime Minister's office every single day. The polls that he does at the end of his media interviews. Most Canadians feel that that kind of money is wasted.

Yet the Court Challenges Program is an excellent expenditure of taxpayers money and should be continued.

The problem is that we have a Constitution. The Constitution contains the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Nunziata: Bob Rae?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, the member can stand up in the House and make a speech if he wishes. But he should be called to order at this point for his irrelevances.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Heckling during debate is sometimes part of this House. The Speaker will not intervene unless things being said are really unparliamentary or if the person who has the floor asks the Speaker to intervene because he or she finds it difficult to continue. I will give the floor to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, we do have a Constitution and a Charter of Rights and Freedoms and they do create problems for people in this country.

Not all constitutions are protective of people's rights on the face of them. I recall that back in 1933 the best constitution in the world was delivered to the Soviet people by Joseph Stalin. It guaranteed minority rights, it guaranteed national rights, it guaranteed individual rights. It guaranteed all sorts of things, but nobody had access to the courts in order to establish their access to those rights. As a result, millions of people went to the Gulag and millions of people died when they tried to establish their rights that were guaranteed in that Soviet constitution.

The same thing applies here in Canada. Unless there are the mechanisms and the provisions in effect for people to guarantee their rights under this Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms it does not operate on its own. It does not have a mechanism to enforce itself. People have to challenge for their rights and that is why we have that Constitution.

Without assistance, the vast majority of people in this country would not have access to the judicial system in order to pursue their rights. That has been demonstrated hundreds of times over. That is the reason we have this Court Challenges Program in the first place.

I would like to quote a section from a paper written by the now hon. Andrew Petter who is the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs in the Government of British Columbia. He wrote this paper when he was an assistant law professor at the University of Victoria. He notes how in charter cases the judicial process discriminates against the financially disadvantaged and in favour of the wealthy.

Let me make a few quotes from Mr. Petter's paper. He says: "There are two features of this system that make it a particularly inappropriate forum for advancing the interests of the disadvantaged. One is the cost of gaining access to the system. It will come as no surprise to those familiar with the process of litigation to discover that the cost of mounting a charter challenge is extremely high. The successful action of Southam newspapers to have a search of its business records by anti-combine officers struck down under the charter took two and a half years and cost Southam about $200,000.

The charter challenge brought by Merv Lavigne against the compulsory collection of union dues for political purposes at the time this paper was written, had already cost the National Citizens' Coalition, the right-wing lobby funding the challenge, about $400,000 and the case, at that point, had only proceeded as far as the Ontario Supreme Court.

For people to take actions under the Charter of Rights through the whole court process is an extremely expensive undertaking and many of the people in Canada who need access to that process simply cannot afford it. Without the assistance provided in this program those people are not going to be able to take advantage of the Canadian Charter of Rights in order to establish what their rights are."

Now Southam corporation and the National Citizens' Coalition, which is financed by a large number of corporate donations, do not have any problems getting government funding because their court actions are considered a cost of doing business. They can right it down against their income taxes so that you and I and rich and poor alike in this country end up paying for their challenges under the charter.

The only problem is that for those poor, for those disadvantaged people in this country there is no access to the courts if this program is done away with.

A number of cases have been mentioned by my colleagues speaking in this House over the last short period of time. Some of them in fact come from my riding. One of the cases in fact was the case of Jim Egan and John Nesbitt who are residents of the Comox valley in my riding.

Now these men have lived together on a same sex relationship for something like 40 years. It is a long established relationship. They in fact have grown old together. Unfortunately they are not the same age so that one is now entitled to his old age pension and the other, had he been of a different sex, would have been entitled to the spouses allowance.

How can somebody who is in receipt of old age pension and is in need of a spouses allowance, how can somebody in that type of financial condition take this issue to court and have any reasonable hope of having the court respond when he really does not have the money to do it.

These people took their case to the first stage, to trial division in the Federal Court. They ended up with a judge who brought down a regressive decision that actually set back the rights of those kinds of couples years and years.

• (1910)

They were hoping to be able to go on through the appeal process, through the higher courts. In fact, they were promised by the Court Challenges Program that the funding would be there and they could proceed to have this resolved in the upper courts so that one of the same sex partnership would end up being entitled to the spouse's allowance.

Unfortunately your program cut them off in mid process and left the state of the law with respect to same sex couples worse than it was before the process started.

I heard the member from New Brunswick state that cases that are in process now are going to continue in process until they have a resolution.

I am wondering if that would apply to the Egan–Nesbitt case. Are they going to be permitted by the Court Challenges Program to finish the process until they get a final decision in the upper courts or are they going to be cut off and leave the state of the law in Canada with respect to individual rights in this case worse than it was before the process started.

It is very important that a lot of these cases that have been left hanging have resulted in the law being even worse than it was before those cases started.

This minister and I have had a number of words over the years about programs which have been cut by his ministry when he was Secretary of State. Unfortunately those cuts had been directed at the people who were least responsible for the deficit and who were the least able to fight back, the weakest, the poorest, the most disadvantaged.

This was the minister who cut off the aboriginal communications program when he was responsible for the Department of the Secretary of State.

This was the minister who cut off the aboriginal representative organization funding program, the AFN and other organizations that represent aboriginal people across this country when he was Secretary of State.

This was the minister who cut off support for women's centres across the country when he was Secretary of State. Now that he is minister of multiculturalism, he again takes a direct attack on those who can least afford it. He does this through the Court Challenges Program.

Is it something about this minister or is it something about this government? Why is it that they constantly direct their attacks against those who are poor, disabled, disadvantaged, those who can least expect to defend themselves. That is my problem with this.

Again, I would like to thank the member for Ottawa—Vanier for bringing this motion forward. I would hope that the government would respond more positively to it. Unfortunately, this is a government that is extremely secretive and extremely close in the way it holds power to itself and does not let that power out to the people.

We do not have an ombudsman in this House as we do in virtually every province across this country. We do not have other mechanisms in this House to allow citizens to have input and challenge for their rights.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission is considered a toothless body because it has very little in the way of power that it requires in order to assist citizens who feel they have been the object of discrimination and injustice.

Is it something about this government? Is it something about this minister? All I am saying is that something has to be done. I hope the government and this minister in particular will reconsider the decision he has taken on the Court Challenges Program so that the disadvantaged will not be further disadvantaged in pursuing their rights under the Charter.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I will be brief. Let me make it very clear. I do not support the government and the Liberal Party does not support the government's decision to terminate the Court Challenges Program. It was not a wise move.

What I take exception to is the self-righteousness, the holier-than-thou attitude of the members of the New Democratic Party. They know that the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. They know, and their members have indicated time and time again, that it costs $200,000 or $300,000 to litigate a case. Surely the issue is not only with respect to the Court Challenges Program, but what ought to be done in order to improve access for all Canadians, not only those to the courts and not only those who are challenging the provisions in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or in the Constitution.

The NDP has a provincial government at Queen's Park and provincial governments in British Columbia and Saskatchewan. If they are so pure and so holier than thou, let me ask what their governments are doing, given the fact that the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. What are these hypocrites doing in order to ensure—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member might care to withdraw and rephrase his question.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I will withdraw the reference to hypocrisy.

I would like to ask the hon. member what Premier Bob Rae or Premier Romanow or Premier Harcourt are doing in order to improve access to the courts for ordinary Canadians?

Why does the NDP not put its money where its mouth is and stop being so self-righteous and holier and thou, and tell me what those guys are doing in order to ensure that all Canadians have access to the courts. He cannot speak out of both sides of his mouth.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): If I could speak out of both sides of my mouth, Madam Speaker, I would be a Liberal.

I am prepared to put up the record of the NDP governments in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba, in Ontario, in Yukon and anywhere else against any Liberal provincial government, or in fact any Liberal national government, when it comes to defending human rights, when it comes to assisting people and obtaining their rights through the courts under programs similar to this. We stand second to no political party.

But I think the member should have talked about what the Liberal governments did in this country. They did absolutely nothing and that is why we are in the situation that we find ourselves in now.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member for York South—Weston would tone it down a bit and look, he might realize that the Ontario government has instituted another look. As Kathleen Ruff said in a speech here on the Hill last night: "another look at how they could make human rights laws effective". They say that we have a human rights law but we have to somehow make it effective and workable. They are looking at all these areas, and they have specifically given that mandate to a group and Ms. Ruff is working with that mandate.

I do not understand the hon. member. This is a Liberal motion; this is a motion from his own party.

Mr. Nunziata: Yes and we support it.

Mr. Waddell: Does he support it? He just said that lawyers should give charity a few minutes ago. I do not know, the critic better grab him and get the Liberal position together so they do not talk out of both sides of their mouths.

An hon. member: He's a closet Tory.

Mr. Waddell: I want to ask the hon. member from Comox—Alberni this. The hon. member who spoke gave a very eloquent speech. He mentioned the Egan case and the difficulty that sometimes great cases that establish advances in human rights are lost in the trial division, but ultimately win in the higher courts.

I think a perfect example, and I wonder if he might acknowledge this, was the Nisga case. In the early seventies, Tom Berger, a lawyer in Vancouver on behalf of the Nisga nation, brought a case, lost in the lower courts, I believe lost in the Court of Appeal—if my friend would help me—and a divided Supreme Court of Canada allowed political pressure in this House and elsewhere to convince the government for the first time to really recognize aboriginal rights and we have moved on from there, of course.

I want to ask the member if he could confirm that point and reiterate once again why it is necessary that these cases go to the highest court of the country.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Yes, Madam Speaker. Maybe I will go back to an even more remote case where the United States Constitution guaranteed equal rights to all of its citizens regardless of race, creed, colour or nationality, whatever. That was understood to mean that everyone had the right of access to schools of the same quality. It was not a simple guarantee written into the Constitution or the Bill of Rights of the United States that provided that. Ultimately those children in the United States who were black had to win their right to go to quality schools at the point of a gun. The U.S. army had to be sent into some states of the United States that refused to obey the Constitution.

• (1920)

What is needed is mechanisms by government to challenge, through the judiciary, the Constitution on behalf of disadvantaged people if we are going to avoid the kind of situation that we had in the United States back in the 1950s. I encourage this minister and this government to keep the Court Challenges Program in place. It is an examination of what the alternatives are. This is a valuable program, we should—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the time has expired.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to be able to join in this debate about the Court Challenges Program. Before I begin my intervention, I would like to remind members that this Progressive Conservative government has put more funding and political will into ensuring human rights for all Canadians than any other government in our history.

No other government has created anything like the Court Challenges Program but now the time has come to share the responsibility. Times are tough; money is short. We all know that. What we should be exploring here today is a new direction that involves natural partners like the provinces, the territories, the Canadian Bar Association and the law societies.

First, let me put the Court Challenges Program into the context of all the programs which currently serve to support language and equality rights.

As members will have read in the 1989 official languages annual report, the Official Languages Act, administered by the Secretary of State remains a key law in support of linguistic minority groups. It fully covers both anglophones in Quebec and francophones throughout the rest of the country. It gives that department the mandate to insist and support the development of linguistic minority communities and to promote complete recognition and use of both official languages. That mandate has not changed.

The rights of these citizens are laid out for all to see in our Constitution. By no means is this government abandoning that set of legal statements, but the use of our judicial system is the only way to ensure the protection of human rights in Canada. We must continue to develop other systems through negotiation and co–operation with other levels of government, with human rights lawyers and with advocacy groups by which linguistic and social rights are safeguarded.

Federally we shall continue to pursue the values of Canadian citizenship that influence our daily lives: equality and participation. In addition to the official languages program, the programs of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and Secretary of State remain in place.

We have, for example, a disabled persons participation program. Since 1985 project funding and technical support from the Disabled Persons Participation Program Fund have helped organizations work to change the attitudes, systems and practices that have kept persons with disabilities from getting jobs and gaining access to buildings, goods, services and information. In 1991 the program was expanded to include a partnership fund so that other relevant organizations can join with groups of people with disabilities to address these issues which are important for all Canadians.

The projects funded under the Disabled Persons Participation Program must relate to one of three objectives. First, representation, that is to enhance the capacity for persons with disabilities to represent effectively their rights and responsibilities as Canadian citizens.

Second, improvement of access, to support the development of community-based mechanisms aimed at addressing attitudinal, institutional and informational barriers excluding persons with disabilities from participation in Canadian society.

Third, to create new solutions, that is to facilitate the development by people with disabilities of innovative approaches to participate fully in the social and economic life of Canada.

The achievement of full participation on the part of persons with disabilities will occur only if their concerns are taken into consideration by all sectors of society: business, labour, governments and other organizations. To ensure this happens, groups of persons with disabilities must be able to effectively represent their membership and their issues. This requires groups to be well organized, informed and functionally able to work on behalf of their members. For example, a disability group could bring its membership together to conduct leadership development training workshops, or in collaboration with native band councils, address the needs of persons with disabilities on reserves.

Improvement of access means improving access to education, housing, information and other goods and services in our communities. For example, what are the particular needs of students with disabilities? How can we improve access to services for people living in rural communities?

Your project should address specific, concrete issues and have the potential to initiate change. For example, one could establish a community coalition on transportation for seniors and persons with disabilities to identify issues and present them to the local transportation authority. Or one could share information and ideas with the media about how terminology shapes the way in which persons with disabilities are perceived and could identify current accepted terminology that portrays them in a positive light.

In some cases there are no readily apparent solutions to the issues facing persons with disabilities. In these instances, organizations have to come up with innovative ideas to enable them to take part in all aspects of Canada's social and economic life.

These initiatives could show businesses the capabilities of persons with disabilities and demonstrate that there are different ways to do tasks on the job. Examples of innovative approaches are the establishment of an independent living resource centre to address cross-disability information and community participation needs in a particular community, or the development of a transitional education training program for use with the disabilities.

As well, the government has the race relations and cross-cultural understanding program. Multiculturalism in the 1990s is about removing the barriers to full participation, full contribution and full citizenship of all Canadians, regardless of their background or cultural heritage.

Canada's multiculturalism policy plays a role in helping to adjust to Canada's growing cultural diversity, in promoting Canadian unity and in ensuring that all Canadians participate actively in the social, cultural, economic and political life of Canada.

Canada's approach, integration through effective multiculturalism, is preferable to assimilation and other means of dealing with a diverse mix of ethnocultural backgrounds.

Despite recent well publicized concerns about multiculturalism, we now have reason to believe that the majority of Canadians understand the importance of having a multiculturalism policy and programs.

In July 1991 an Angus Reid national survey found that 76 per cent of Canadians understand that multiculturalism refers to Canadians of every ancestry. Seventy-seven per cent of Canadians feel that our multiculturalism policy enshrines Canada's culture and an overwhelming 85 per cent strongly supports equality among all Canadians as an objective of multiculturalism policy.

Support for the policy's integration objectives is at a level of 73 per cent, and support for its role in helping Canadian society to deal with cultural diversity is at 74 per cent.

Racism and racial discrimination affect the lives of all Canadians, regardless of their age. There can be no doubt that we all want to enjoy a fair and friendlier Canada, not a land divided by racial tensions. We share the responsibility of supporting each other in building a dynamic and forward looking multicultural society of which we can all be proud, and which includes us all.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act sets out the policy of the Government of Canada to promote the full and equitable participation of people and communities of all origins in the continuing evolution of Canadian society.

The act also calls on the government to assist in the elimination of any barrier to such participation. It commits the government to promoting the understanding and creativity that arise from the interaction between individuals and communities of different origins.

In addition, it encourages and assists the social, cultural, economic and political institutions of Canada to be both respectful and inclusive of Canada's multicultural character.

The objectives of the race relations and cross-cultural understanding program are to foster the elimination of racism and racial discrimination, to assist Canadian institutions in becoming responsive and adapting to Canada's multicultural reality, and to promote cross-cultural understanding and the principles of equality and access. Through 1990-91, institutional change, public education, community advocacy, cross-cultural training and research have been the five mutually reinforcing objectives supported by the program to foster equality and access for all Canadians and to promote social change.

Public education initiatives, especially around March 21, the international day for the elimination of racial discrimination, were supported, as were activities addressing the race relations concerns of visible minority and aboriginal youth and of aboriginal Canadians. These have been achieved with the crucial help of the community and the fruitful co-operation of institutions and organizations.

We also have a human rights program. The purpose of the human rights program is to promote the development, understanding, respect for and enjoyment of human rights and to facilitate the implementation of Canada's domestic and international human rights obligations. Its activities include education and promotion, co-ordination and presentation of Canada's human rights reports to international bodies, federal-provincial-territorial co-ordination to fulfil Canada's international human rights obligations and interdepartmental co-ordination.

Since 1986 the program has carried out a range of activities designed to promote and protect human rights: for example, to work with non-governmental groups, NGOs, educators and others working in the human rights field, including both specialists and those who from time to time carry out human rights activities and to carry out other public education activities. It is there to serve as the central point of reference for the federal government's domestic interest in human rights and as part of this latter mandate, to develop interdepartmental and federal-provincial-territorial consultations and co-ordination to implement human rights treaties.

Powers, duties and functions of the Department of Secretary of State were transferred by section 9 of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship Act. As well, the number of reports that the directorate prepares in consultation with federal departments, provinces and territories, has greatly increased over the last two decades. Reports are prepared to meet legal obligations under international treaties that Canada has ratified and to meet other commitments relating to Canada's membership in the UN and the OAS. The directorate often participates in the review of the reports by international bodies.

I would like to go on to the women's program. The women's program attempts to promote economic equality. Women are employed in every sector of Canada's economy and make a major contribution to our country's growth and prosperity. Despite this fact, there are still many hurdles preventing them from fully participating in the economy and from receiving recognition for the role in the labour force and at home.

Many of the groups funded by the women's program are working to improve economic opportunities for women. For example, a group of women lawyers in Saskatchewan is working with farm women. Their aim is to identify the economic and legal concerns of farm women with regard to property, pensions and family law.

Another voluntary group has documented the flexibility needed by employees balancing work and family responsibilities and has made recommendations in this area. In New Brunswick a group of francophone women is working to have the experience of homemakers and volunteers recognized when they look for work.

The women's program also promotes social justice. Social justice covers many issues relating to women's fair and equal treatment in all segments of our society. On a practical level, social justice for women includes the development of a safe society, free from violence and discrimination. Such a society would open more possibilities for women to realize their full potential.

The women's program has partners with many groups working in the area of social justice. In Nova Scotia one group is working with medical practitioners to ensure that the needs of battered women are better met. A native women's group receives financial assistance to raise the issue of family violence in their communities.

Across our country community groups funded by the women's program are working to break down the obstacles that hinder women from full participation in Canadian society at all levels. These include, for example, a Nova Scotia group helping unemployed women access training and education options; in Quebec a voluntary group of Haitian and Italian immigrant women learning about their rights and what can be done about discrimination.

The women's program works with the many different partners in our society. The goal of these activities is to ensure that women can fully contribute to all dimensions of life with the assistance of the program. Many voluntary groups are bringing us closer to making that goal a reality. What these groups accomplish leads to measurable improvements in the lives of women, whether their activities result in single mothers obtaining adequate housing or elderly women on pensions improving their economic and social situation, or whether the discriminatory attitudes that discourage women from entering scientific and technological fields are addressed. The Government of Canada is committed to bringing about social justice and economic equality for Canadian women. In doing so, the government recognizes that many choices, decisions, and challenges face Canadian women today.

To attain equality for women, the government has set out a national strategy in dimensions of equality: a federal government work plan for women, 1986. The women's program of the Department of the Secretary of State is an important part of this over-all national objective to advance the equality of women.

In 1988 the government renewed the mandate of the women's program. In implementing this mandate the women's program assists women's and other voluntary groups working on a wide range of equality concerns.

There is support for the voluntary sector. Members of the more than 800 volunteer groups funded annually by the women's program give their own time and resources to make our society more just and caring. These groups are dedicated to improving the economic, social, and legal situation of women; in the home, the workplace, and the community. Some groups for example are working to improve public understanding of how family violence affects women.

Others are helping immigrant women increase their access to language training, while still others are striving to remove barriers women face in the work force. In fact, together these groups' activities touch on every area of our society where women face obstacles.

The women's program has many objectives: to increase the public understanding of women's equality in order to encourage action toward resolving these issues; to promote the organizational development of women's groups so that they can work more effectively toward equality for women; and to encourage institutions to integrate women's equality issues into their decision-making structures, policies, and programs.

In meeting these objectives the women's program provides assistance to women's and other voluntary groups working to advance the equality of women in the areas of economic equality, social justice, and access and participation.

Within these funding areas the program also responds to new needs and issues such as the concerns of immigrant women, women with disabilities, and those who live in rural and isolated areas. More and more the women's program is working with volunteer groups representing the concerns of women who experience unfair treatment based on their sex, race, disability, or other factors.

I had a few other things to say about some of the other programs, including some of the native programs that we have, such as the Native Citizens' Directorate, the Aboriginal Representative Organization's Program, and some of these other programs. I understand and know that I am quickly running out of time so I may have to speed over that a bit.

The bottom line is that the Government of Canada has many programs to address the legal and social responsibilities of Canadians. It is time that we started to share the load and see other groups in society, including provincial governments, come to assist us and to recognize that they must take their share of responsibility as well.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I regret that the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest was unable to finish his four-hour speech. I am sure it would have been very interesting.

Earlier we heard the member for Fundy—Royal give a very vigorous and positive appraisal of the Court Challenges Program, leaving all of us to wonder what defence he could possibly have offered for discontinuing a program that cost $2.3 million as compared to $15 million for almost any average government publicity campaign.

Then we hear the member for Edmonton Northwest talk about the importance of removing barriers among the various groups in this country. He talked eloquently about multiculturalism. He talked about the necessity of full participation. I do not know whether he realized, however inherent in what he said, was the necessity of empowering the people who are disadvantaged by race or ethnic derivation to defend themselves.

I have to ask him what his reaction is since he did not mention at all the question of the Court Challenges Program what he thinks within the context of what he said about the discontinuation of that program, a relatively inexpensive program, particularly now in view of what he said about racial discrimination, since the director of that program was about to embark on encouraging racial minorities to use the program more effectively than they have in the past and how he reacts to the deferral of the Race Relations Institute. But most especially, in view of what he has said about the necessity of ensuring that every Canadian, regardless of their ethnicity or racial derivation, participating fully in this country as equal citizens, and the fact that the members of his party on the constitutional committee along with the Liberals refused to support an amendment to section 27 as a recommendation that would have added these words: "and the preservation and promotion of racial and ethnic equality", how can he reconcile that to what he has just tried to tell the House? I am sure he is sincere. I want to know if his defence of his government is on that account.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I was not on the constitutional committee. Therefore, I do not know what kind of deliberations took place. I am going to say this.

The member made reference to my four hour speech and I think that speaks for itself. I spoke for 20 minutes, simply discussing some of the programs that this government has in place to support the legitimate rights of all Canadians to a better quality of life. I could have probably gone on for four hours trying to get through all of them. The fact is because of its unique contribution to human rights, unmatched by any government or any party at any level, this government has earned the right to insist that this crucial responsibility now be shared.

I would hope that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier who proposed today's motion would seek the agreement of his colleagues and members of the NDP to ensure that all provinces and territories now take up the challenge by demonstrating some political will of their own.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to ask the member for Edmonton Northwest dealing with testimony which was put to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, by the Deputy Minister of Justice, I believe, to the effect that there were mechanisms in place to allow Canadians to go to the Human Rights Commission or to the Official Languages Commission as an alternative to the Court Challenges Program.

He and others in the House know that the Court Challenges Program was specifically put together by the Liberal government in 1978 to deal with constitutional issues under the BNA Act, extended to the 1982 charter of rights by the Liberals again, and then in 1985 to section 15. That is the course of events of that program.

My question is, how can this government entertain that statutory decision or commissions existing in this country under statute of this House are equal or able to deal with constitutional questions which are the first law of the land and are not, in my view, similar in any way, sense or shape. How can one pretend that there are other avenues than to go to the courts to get your constitutional rights affirmed and clarified? How can one say that?

Is the minister close to him in agreement with the Deputy Minister of Justice?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I think the point is that we have a multitude of programs at the federal level to try and assist people in ensuring that they receive their basic human rights. We are involved in many, many ways in this area.

The fact of the matter is, as was pointed out in the earlier debate by others, that the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. It is not up to the federal government to simply take the whole burden in this area. We think it is time that some of the others started to take their part of the load.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question.

You say it is time for other levels, meaning the provincial level. Right? That is what the minister was talking about.

If francophones in Alberta want to exercise their rights under the Official Languages Act, or other rights of the Constitution, and they go to the government of Premier Getty are they going to get money to finance that case?

Some hon. members: No way.

Mr. Waddell: Who is kidding whom?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the Government of Alberta and I do not plan to. This hon. member will know, and all hon. members will know, that from time to time I have disagreed with the Government of Alberta even though it happens to be of the same political persuasion. Once in awhile I would like to see members of the NDP disagree with some of their provincial counterparts when they know that they are wrong rather than just standing up and repeating those lines.

An hon. member: Against the gospel.

Mr. Dorin: They should be telling their provincial counterparts to take their responsibilities seriously and not leave it all to the federal government rather than coming into this House and demanding that we do it. They should be speaking to their political cousins back home if they are so supportive of them.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be here. I am pleased to rise today in support of the motion of my hon. colleague calling upon the government to restore the Court Challenges Program.

A great many ordinary Canadians are deeply concerned by the government's recent decision to terminate this program. The program has benefited women, minorities, disadvantaged groups and aboriginal people. It has enabled these groups to mount court challenges under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It has provided financial assistance for the preparation and defence of test cases.

Without this program many of these court challenges simply would not have happened and Canada's human rights situation would be worse than it is. If the program is not reinstated many cases which would benefit Canadians will not even get to court.

Lawyers are expensive. Fighting government in the courts is expensive. The government has all kinds of resources at its disposal.

Ordinary Canadians with human rights grievances do not have the resources that the government has.

This program, the Court Challenges Program, has helped equalize the imbalance in resources between ordinary Canadians and government.

The Court Challenges Program was first established in 1978. At that time it dealt only with official language minority rights.

In 1982 the program's mandate was expanded to include the new language rights guaranteed under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In 1985, after the charter section on equality rights came into force, the program was expanded to include equality rights.

To ensure an arms length relationship with government the program was taken out of government and administered by the Canadian Council on Social Development. It was given a five-year mandate.

In 1990 the program was renewed for another five years and became affiliated with the Human Rights Education and Research Centre of the University of Ottawa.

This is not an expensive program. It costs very little and is a very cost-effective program. Each year the program would commit up to $2 million for cases. The program's operating costs are $750,000 a year. The total annual budget is thus only $2.75 million. I understand as well that the program's lawyers charge well under the normal fee.

The program has received a total of 951 applications under its equality rights component since 1985, 310 of those applications have been funded. Court decisions or reports have been received on 115 applications, and there are 156 active files.

Eighteen aboriginal applications have received case funding and 22 aboriginal applications have received case development funding.

The language rights component has received a total of 171 applications, 94 of those applications have been funded. Court decisions or reports have been received for 56 applications and there are 27 active files.

The NWT Association des Parents Francophones in Yellowknife has received funding under this component.

Some of the cases assisted by this program have had far-reaching effects. For example, the case in which a Toronto father won the right to child care benefits, and the case in which residents of mental institutions won the right to vote in the last federal election. There have been some landmark cases on minority language rights.

• (1950)

In other words, the government and Canadians have been getting good value for their money. The program has funded parties or interventions in cases that have resulted in judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada that have made new laws, yet the government has cancelled this program. Why?

There are still many questions and issues outstanding and unresolved. What will happen to all those cases that are in progress? Apparently those applications which have been approved for funding will receive funding only for the level they have been approved at, but what about appeals? If a group loses and wants to appeal or they win and the government appeals, there will be no funding available.

I want to elaborate on this issue by referring to a case the Inuit Women's Association, Pauktuutit, is developing.

Last year, Pauktuutit applied for funding under the Court Challenges Program to prepare for a section 15 challenge to the NWT judiciary's practice of issuing lenient sentences to individuals convicted of sexually assaulting Inuit women. In November, it was notified that that its application had been approved in principle. The cancellation of the program puts its case in some jeopardy. While it will take the case to trial, there is no funding available for an appeal should an appeal be necessary.

The president of Pauktuutit has written to the Minister of Justice to express shock and disappointment at the cancellation of this program. I want to quote briefly from that letter:

> Since its inception, the Court Challenges Program has provided organizations such as our own with the opportunity to take on very difficult cases affecting our constitutional equality rights. Without the support provided by the Court Challenges Program, we fear that justice and equality in Canada are sure to suffer.

In her letter, the president of Pauktuutit also pointed out to the Minister of Justice the significance of the case that they are working on. I will again quote briefly:

> This is a very important case, one that offers hope to the victims of sexual assault (and Inuit women in general) that the crime will be dealt with as a serious one.

The letter concluded with an appeal to the minister to support the reinstatement of the program. Again I quote:

> The Charter of Rights and Freedoms will never be able to fulfill its promise of equality and justice if disadvantaged groups are unable to take their cases to the courts.

I agree with the views and concerns expressed by Pauktuutit and join with it and the many other Canadians calling for the continuation of the Court Challenges Program.

Several other aboriginal groups and organizations have been assisted by the program. The Chippewas of Nawash received case development funding to pursue a fishing licence issue. The Native Women's Association of Canada received funding to challenge aspects of the Indian Act.

Aboriginal people have received funding to challenge issues related to voting rights, exclusion from programs, cultural rights, language rights and aboriginal customary law. Inuit, Innu and aboriginal women prisoners have also received assistance from the program.

I want to conclude my presentation today with some comments made by a very distinguished and respected Canadian.

Former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson now heads the royal commission on aboriginal peoples. She had this to say about the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program:

> As a Supreme Court Judge, I saw what an invaluable contribution this program made. It was exciting; it made you think government can't be all that bad. And then—bingo! This policy makes the people who can least afford it bear the brunt. There's no point in giving people rights if they don't have the wherewithal to go to court.
> It is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them—
> I have difficulty with a policy that places the burden of—restraint on those who can least afford to bear it.

There is still a need for this program. The clarification of the rights and responsibilities of Canadians is an ongoing process. A committee of this House, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, has strongly supported the program. There is no other comparable program existing in Canada. The Government of Canada must not cancel this program because it is too important for ordinary Canadians. The necessary refinement and elaboration of human rights in Canada must not be cut off at the knees by withdrawing the only possible source of funding from those who need it the most.

I call upon government members to support this motion. The Court Challenges Program must continue and minorities must continue to have the tools they need to defend, protect and enhance their rights.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by complimenting my colleague from Nunatsiaq for a very moving and informative address on this very important Court Challenges Program.

I also wish to mention how valuable he is in this Chamber in defending the interests and rights of that large part of Canada to the North that is such a rich part of our heritage. I was particularly struck in his speech by his enumeration of the cases that have been brought forward with the assistance of the Court Challenges Program affecting voting rights, minority rights, and the rights of the people that he represents in Canada's North, as well as minorities across this country.

It was a very eloquent testimony to the value of this program, particularly in an age in which our democracy is increasingly being defined by the court system, and in response to litigation in a very complex court process.

One of the disturbing things that took place in this budget and that is taking place in the actions of this government is that the ability of ordinary Canadians to participate in this new kind of democracy through the courts is being undermined.

In Nova Scotia, in my own riding the Minister of Justice has been taking over a year to fill a judgeship appointment. The consequence is that there have been cases which have not gone before the court on sexual assault matters, on family violence and on many very important matters affecting ordinary Canadians because they have no access to the court system.

The second disturbing development is that there has been consolidation in my province of Nova Scotia making it more difficult for people to access the court system. This decision by the government to cut out the funding from the Court Challenges Program is another way in which this government is undermining the abilities of ordinary Canadians to participate in this new aspect of democracy, which does not only take place in this Chamber but in a very complicated legal and court system.

I come to my question, which I know my friend from Nunatsiaq is waiting patiently to hear. That question has to do with the list he enumerated. Somebody told me when this was announced that it was as if the federal government had decided that all charter questions had been decided, that there was no need for further clarification of charter provisions on equality rights. Clearly my colleague has already enumerated a long list of concerns which are very much related to the charter.

I would like to ask my colleague if he knows of more possible instances of legal problems affecting minorities or citizens in his part of the country?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I draw your attention to the fact that there was a small power failure and it is now eight o'clock.

It being eight o'clock p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

With respect, I think it is too bad we were not warned we had lost a few minutes. I was in committee all day, on that important joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons and also on the special committee on electoral reform. I would have liked to take part in this debate. It is too bad we have run out of time, but I want to be on the record as saying that I would have liked to speak in this debate. We had no idea the bells would take us by surprise and we would miss the hon. member's brilliant response to the question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. With his experience, the hon. member for Saint-Denis ought to know that. In any case it is 8 p.m., even if we are running somewhat late.

Mr. Prud'homme: Would you consider Standing Order 26?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SETTING OF GUIDELINES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation setting conflict of interest guidelines for Members of Parliament and Senators; and that these guidelines should also regulate conflict of interest and post-employment practices for senior bureaucrats and senior political staff.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt who is moving the motion and others are members of a parliamentary committee that is presently dealing with the whole issue of conflict of interest.

The government has already introduced legislation which is the subject matter before this committee. We will soon be writing our report, and it seems to me that this motion is redundant in that the matter that the member is raising has already been done.

If it is the wish of the House to take the next hour to generally discuss this matter, then so be it. But the House should be aware that the matter is already before a parliamentary committee which is looking into a piece of legislation that was introduced into this House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the Standing Orders that says a private member's motion that has been introduced in the House cannot be debated while a motion similar but not the same would be under review.

That bill which my hon. colleague has referred to was never debated here at second reading. It was introduced and then turned over for pre-study.

The committee is doing a pre-study, but there is nothing in the Standing Orders that precludes a member's motion introduced into the House from being debated on an issue which is under discussion by a study committee of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member who said that the subject matter of this motion is now before a Joint Committee of the House and the Senate. If I could have unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I would move that the motion as presented be referred to this committee for consideration and subsequently reported back to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis. The Chair awaits your sage advice.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the hon. member from Toronto, who read with great gusto the motion presented by our hon. friend from Nickel Belt raised a point which is of particular interest to those of us who are students of the Standing Orders of this House. I see that our table officers, the Chair's advisers and my old colleagues and friends, the experts, are all busy with their reference books, because this is quite an interesting point.

I was prepared to come here to discuss the matter, or at least to listen to the hon. member, because his speeches are always most interesting, brilliant and full of energy, and that is why I was here, even at this late hour. Since we are talking about conflicts of interest, I wonder whether he realizes that he himself has a conflict of interest because he is asking the government to consider introducing legislation.

In fact, the government did introduce legislation but it did not ask for a vote so that we would have as few constraints as possible in committee—and my hon. friend certainly had none, in committee—in order to present a bill that establishes conflict of interest guidelines for members and senators. Monday we were together all day, the hon. member, my colleague from Toronto and the member for Etobicoke–Lakeshore. We talked about this all day and all last week. And we are still very busy, because Parliament has asked us to consider this matter.

[English]

Because of the devotion of our colleague who is putting this private members' motion forward, we are also discussing among ourselves the question of having tough guidelines that should regulate conflict of interest and post-employment practices for senior bureaucrats and senior political staff.

The more we talk with each other privately, the more we discover that probably it is the political staff and the senior bureaucrats who are the most dangerous people for conflict of interest and not backbenchers.

I am in your able hands to decide if we are not having a redundancy by debating this motion. I will listen attentively to my esteemed colleague to find out whether he finds himself in a total conflict of interest by debating his motion.

Of course, I will abide by your judgment, Mr. Speaker. If you were to decide that no, he cannot go on, I assure my colleague that I will stay here until nine o'clock to listen to what he has to say.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, to draw this bow so widely that it is possible I could be in a conflict of interest is beyond credulity.

I have been introducing motions on conflict of interest since I was elected into this House. The latest one that I introduced was in April 1989. This motion has been standing on the books since April 1989.

The government's bill, Bill C–43 which my colleagues are referring to was introduced in November 1991. If anybody is in conflict, it has to be the government that is in conflict, not this hon. member.

I also want to point out to my colleagues that there was no opportunity to discuss this issue at second reading, which is the traditional way in this House of Commons. When a bill is introduced, there is a debate in principle at second reading.

I have to ask myself what this little exercise is about. Here we are with a motion. Here is an opportunity for members on all sides of the House to exchange ideas. Why are people so jittery about talking about something that we should be turning the lights on, conflict of interest.

• (2010)

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I recognize my friend as an expert on the matter. I know that his motion has been on the books of this House for some time and that indeed the government may have stolen the idea from him.

I do think that there are some differences in the proposal put by Bill C–43 for pre-study by a committee of the combined House and the Senate and this motion. One example is that there is no reference in the motion before us to spouses but there is in Bill C–43.

I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, since you are in the chair, whether you could not rule if indeed according to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 173, it states:

The Speaker may:

(2) Rule out any question which violates the procedures of the House and in the same way deal with irregularities in motions and amendments.

It continues:

(3) Make alterations to proposed motions or may refer them back to the Member for correction.

I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, if you cannot rule at this time so we can proceed with debate as to whether the motion is receivable. If it is receivable, then let us proceed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to thank hon. members who just spoke. Since I am not an expert on parliamentary procedure, it has always been my policy to give members the benefit of the doubt in debate. This is Parliament, so it means giving all concerned the benefit of the doubt. I will take under advisement the point of order raised by the hon. member for York South—Weston, and meanwhile, I would prefer, in line with our great parliamentary tradition, to let the debate continue, while the Chair may later consider the advisability of extending the debate.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, now we are past the preliminaries we can get into the main round.

Mr. Speaker, what is a conflict of interest for a private member of Parliament? What is a conflict of interest for a public office holder? It seems to me that we have to start with the definition of conflict of interest. For those who are watching, what do we mean by a conflict of interest?

I would like to put on the record that when a member while pursuing his public duties and responsibilities is perceived or has the potential or actually furthers his or her own interest or the immediate family's financial gain, it seems to me that is a definition of conflict of interest that covers both potential, apparent and real.

I see it as a spectrum. At one end of the spectrum we have what I have just described on this ethical spectrum. On the other end of the spectrum, as I see it, we have acts which are premeditated and deliberate. Those are covered by the Criminal Code. I am not intending to discuss that part of the spectrum, but rather the first part which is more ethical in nature.

My motion deals, as I said, with the first part of the spectrum. So I start by asking the question: Why do we need a conflict of interest bill? Why do we need conflict of interest legislation?

I want to suggest three main reasons. Members may think of other reasons but I can see three particular and precise reasons.

One is that the job of the member of Parliament has changed. There is a new climate. The jobs of MPs and public office holders have changed. In fact the MP today, the member of Parliament, the public office holder, has so much more influence than 20 to 25 years ago, more influence than when I first came to this place in 1972. We are constantly upgrading the role of the private member. There is a demand by parliamentarians to make members of Parliament more influential in the whole process of law making, in the whole process of decision making in the House of Commons.

Just think of the changes in the role of the spouse of the MP. There was a time when the MP was invariably male and the spouse had no outside assets. Her assets were his assets and that spouse was invariably, 99 per cent of the time, someone who stayed at home.

That has all changed now, thank heavens. We are finding that women are taking their place in the House of Commons. Women have businesses of their own. They have professions of their own. There is a whole change in the climate in which MPs and public office holders operate today.

Second, I would like to point to technological changes mainly in communications. There are more functions. Think of the thousands of people who MPs interface with every year. MPs now are the target of lobbyists, whether it is anti-gun legislation, program legislation, anti-banking legislation or whatever.

MPs are involved with thousands of people. Elected members attend a multiplicity of functions on a yearly basis. A multiplicity of functionaries hover around elected members, and government affects them all; Parliament affects them all.

The third aspect is an important one. Public expectations are different. When I first came here the House of Commons was not televised. Now the House is televised, what is said in the House. What I am saying now is instantly broadcast across the nation.

The media are much more instant in their reports. Reputations can be instantly destroyed with a few key strokes on a computer. Innuendo can destroy. That has changed. The public has changed. The media have been and are the message now because they modify perception of people about elected politicians.

I could point out the explosion in the number and frequency of contacts with people by the member to whom I referred previously. All of these provide more occasions for elected members of Parliament to be in a situation where there could be or seems to be, in the eyes of the public, a conflict of interest.

Let me give a specific example. An MP who happens to be on the board of directors of a trust company comes to the House and is elected chairman of the finance committee. I would suggest that is a potential for conflict.

Then the committee receives legislation on financial institutions. Now we have the appearance of a conflict, an apparent conflict. If that MP as chairman, maintaining his position on the board of directors of the trust company, participates and votes in the decisions of the committee dealing with financial institutions I want to suggest that he is in a conflict of interest.

• (2020)

This is in stark contrast to an elected member of Parliament who actually takes money to push or oppose legislation. That is an act covered by the Criminal Code.

I want to point out the last case we had, the cause célèbre of all this, was the Sinc Stevens incident. It was interesting to note that Justice Parker reported Sinc Stevens had not done anything criminal. He had not broken any law but there had been conflict of interest on 16 occasions. We had no legislation to cover that in this House, none whatsoever.

There is the transparency of the political process. We have had occasions on which we have advanced that transparency. When we passed the Election Expenses Act we recognized that it was important to know who was making contributions to the politicians and the political parties, how much, when it was made and by whom. We made that transparent. The first part of the transparency puzzle was put in place.

The second part, I would suggest, is when we passed the Lobbyist Registration Act. We turned on the light on a very arcane profession, those who wielded influence in the nation's capital with the nation's politicians.

The whole demand that I made on behalf of my caucus during that process was to apply the same transparency. The principle I used was that the public has a right to know who is doing what to whom and for how much. The whole purpose was to create the transparent environment so that the public had access to what was going on.

The third light we have to turn on so that we can create this environment and raise the ethical level—and God knows it needs raising in terms of the public perception—is a conflict of interest bill that in fact deals with the part of the ethical spectrum I discussed before: potential, apparent and real conflict of interest.

What is the cornerstone of all of these pieces of legislation? What is the cornerstone?

An hon. member: Disclosure.

Mr. Rodriguez: Public disclosure. Obviously members of this House are in tune with the mood. After an exhaustive judicial inquiry into the Sinc Stevens affair, Justice Parker said: "Public disclosure is the cornerstone of any modern conflict of interest legislation". That is what he said.

If members of Parliament think we can get away with just hiding these things, with having our own confessor–adviser tucked away neatly in the bowels of the House of Commons, and with taking the attitude that everything is for us to know and for the public to try and find out, we are barking up the wrong tree.

One member used an argument against this whole question of disclosure and said: "Well, it is only widows and Mother Teresa who will ever run for Parliament. If you do this you will scare off all these good people from running for Parliament". Then we heard the argument: "What my assets are is my own business and nobody else's business". Then we heard the charter argument, that if we forced spouses to divulge we would be violating their rights under the charter and we would have a charter challenge.

On the first argument against public disclosure, the one about only widows and Mother Teresa running for Parliament, it seems to me that Justice Parker said at page 350: "I was particularly interested to learn that the disclosure requirements have not discouraged good people from entering politics or running for public office. For example, a study of members of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate conducted by the Centre for Responsive Politics in 1985 found no one who felt that financial disclosure affected his or her decision to seek public office".

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: I want to tell my colleague that nobody twisted his arm to run for politics, to run for Parliament. He wanted to. If we set the rules, these are the rules. If he cannot accept the rules by which the game is going to be played then he should not get on the team. It seems to me that is pretty straightforward.

I want to deal with the other argument in the same way. All the provinces have this conflict of interest legislation with public disclosure.

An hon. member: What about Ontario?

Mr. Rodriguez: All of the provinces have it, including Ontario. It was brought in by the previous government. As a matter of fact we were just looking at David Peterson's report the other day. The member saw it. It is there and it has not resulted in anybody challenging anything in the charter.

Nobody has challenged it in the Supreme Court. It has not stopped people from running for provincial legislatures. As a matter of fact in the last provincial election in this country we had three times more people seeking seats than there were seats. It certainly has not prevented anybody from running.

What would conflict of interest legislation do? In my view conflict of interest legislation would prevent situations of conflict from deteriorating and becoming criminal acts. I believe that it will minimize the instances of potential conflicts becoming apparent or real, thereby improving the quality of public life. Third, I think it will go a long way in protecting elected members from unfair allegations.

Thus I think the public perception of Parliament would be enhanced so I recommend to my colleagues that there be support for the enacting of legislation that would provide conflict of interest guidelines.

Mr. Prud'homme: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course we have accepted your ruling and we cannot debate it, but may I at least call upon my colleague to try to restrain himself as much as possible from giving us in public what we are trying to arrive at together a good bill.

He is discussing with me and other colleagues the exact subject matter he is now talking about in public. We have abstained from giving the views of the committee publicly. It is only for en français, on dirait pour le bon fonctionnement du comité. I have no objection. I believe in conflict of interest laws. We are getting very close to using the same arguments with each other, trying to convince each other that this is the best bill possible.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor back to the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the Chair has had some time to think over the point of order raised by the hon. member for York South—Weston. I do not think that it is good to leave the House uncertain and so I think it useful to go over the chronology of events, given the sensitive subject before us.

On May 13, 1991, the hon. member for Nickel Belt presented a motion concerning, among other things, conflicts of interest for senior officials and senior political staff. On November 22, 1991, Bill C–43 was tabled in the House of Commons on first reading and this bill makes no mention of senior officials and senior political staff.

On the same day a special committee was created and the subject matter of Bill C–43, not the bill itself, was referred to it. On December 2, 1991, the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt was placed on the order of precedence. It was drawn by lot and placed on the order of precedence and on December 10, 1991, the committee was struck to consider Bill C–43.

In summary, we are faced with certain principles, the first of which is the right of any member to present bills and motions—this is an important point. Second, the motions are not identical. The motion for Bill C–43 is not the same as the one from the hon. member for Nickel Belt, since this one extends the debate to senior officials and senior political staff. Finally, the motion is not votable. That is why, under the circumstances, I think the Chair can allow a debate limited to one hour. On balance, weighing the pros and cons, I think that a member's legitimate right to present a motion could be weakened or violated by an overly strict interpretation of the rule which forbids discussing a bill that is already being considered in committee.

All this is to say that I find the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt to be in order and I again give him the floor for the three minutes remaining to him. Again I ask hon. members to be careful in what they say since the subject referred to is part of the work now going on in a parliamentary committee.

Therefore I call on both sides of the House to co-operate.

[English]

ESTABLISMENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I deliberately started out debating the motion. I had to put it in context. I started by describing a definition of conflict of interest as I see it.

Second, I started with the question, why is conflict of interest legislation necessary?

Third, I stated what I hoped would be accomplished if it ever becomes the law of the land.

I know my hon. colleague from Saint-Denis is a gentilhomme. He is a very kind and gentle person and he harks back to a period in our parliamentary history which was possibly a gentler, kinder time. But it also had overtones of being an old boy's club. This business that I cannot say what is being said in committee—well, our hearings and witnesses, whatever took place, was open to the press and many matters have been reported in the press.

The hon. member for Mississauga South did a survey in his own riding which was carried in the Hill Times, which said that 80 per cent of his constituents supported conflict of interest legislation and 78.2 per cent included that spouses should be included in the whole matter.

My motion proposes that not only should the elected members and the public office holders be covered by the legislation, but that it is also important for senior bureaucrats and the most important political advisers to politicians be covered. In fact, they receive the same kind of lobbying, they are subject to the same influences as members of Parliament in many instances. I have proposed in my motion that they also be covered.

I would urge members to support this. I think it is part of a very important triad of bills that will enhance the credibility and the ethical performance of the House of Commons as perceived by the public.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak this evening to Motion M-22 presented by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. I will read it into the record so it will appear in Hansard in French, as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation setting conflict-of-interest guidelines for Members of Parliament and Senators; and that these guidelines should also regulate conflict-of-interest and post-employment practices for senior bureaucrats and senior political staff.

That is the wording of the motion moved by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Hon. members are aware that the subject matter of this motion is being given broad consideration at this time.

As we all know, on November 22 last year, the government did in fact table similar legislation. A special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was appointed recently to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-43, the Members of the Senate and the House of Commons Conflict of Interests Act. The hon. member for Nickel Belt is a member of this committee and is therefore familiar with the initial proceedings in which he was an active participant.

I also think it is important to recall that the Conflict of Interest Post-Employment Code for public office holders tabled by the government is already in place. This code was introduced for the first time by the Prime Minister in September 1985. The code already provides guidance with respect to conflict of interest and post-employment practices for public servants, senior political staff and ministers and parliamentary secretaries. In this respect, the Special Joint Committee has already heard testimony on its application from a government witness, the Assistant Deputy Registrar General, who is responsible for enforcing the code.

However, conflict of interest, the general focus of the motion, is an important issue for parliamentarians and deserves to be taken very seriously. The work of this committee will have an immediate impact on the lives of all parliamentarians, now and in the future. Canadians generally are also interested in the subject because they want to be sure that parliamentarians put the national interest before any thought of personal gain.

The work accomplished by this committee is unprecedented at the federal level. As soon as it finishes its study of Bill C–43, the special committee will submit a number of important and historic recommendations to the House and the Senate on what should be done about conflict of interest.

Today we should consider the purpose of this bill in a broader perspective. When I say we, I mean not only parliamentarians, who are more directly concerned, but also all Canadians who want their government to function fairly and well, in the best interests of all Canadians.

Canadians, and that includes parliamentarians, set great store by ethics and expect high standards of behaviour from all those who hold public office.

• (2040)

Because of this great concern, the public feels the integrity of the government decision–making process is very important and has been increasingly demanding more openness, responsibility and accountability on the part of government.

Members of Parliament and senators undergo daily extensive and justifiable scrutiny by the media and the citizens in respect.

I believe as does the government that parliamentarians must all submit graciously to this scrutiny and its consequences.

It is fair and proper that we, as public office holders, should be guided by the highest standards of conduct and that we should be judged on the basis of these standards which, as far as the Canadian people are concerned, vouch for the health and vitality of our parliamentary democracy.

The principle that no public office holder shall use his or her office to further his or her private interests is central to these standards and our democratic parliamentary government. The special joint committee presently reviewing this bill will be guided by this fundamental principle in the historic proceedings it will be holding over the next few months.

When dealing with conflicts of interest we, as parliamentarians, must also take into account the need to achieve a delicate and necessary balance between the importance of respecting and preserving the privacy of all parliamentarians and the need to maintain the highest possible standards of behaviour for parliamentarians fulfilling their public duties, and to encourage them to respect them. The committee is now faced with the task of finding such a reasonable and acceptable balance in the context of today's political life in Canada.

As we all know, and as Justice Parker underlined in his report to the government on the conflict of interest issue, respect for ethical standards is above all a matter of individual conscience and behaviour. In his comments on this, Judge Parker said:

> – the faith of the public in the integrity of the government depends on the integrity of each of its public office holders and their sense of honour.

Canadians are quite right in expecting from their members of Parliament and senators that they display this integrity and this sense of honour. However, as Judge Parker pointed out, no conflict of interest regulation system can fully guarantee that such situations will never occur. In fact, what is important is not that there be a system guaranteeing that no conflict of interest situation will ever occur. The important thing is to determine what must be done to prevent, as much as we reasonably can, conflicts of interest and, should those occur, to deal with them in the appropriate manner.

The basic objective of any arrangement regarding conflicts of interest is therefore to help well–meaning people to conform to the high standards of conduct imposed on public office holders while allowing them, as much as possible, to enjoy their right to a reasonable degree of protection of their private life.

This committee obviously has a very important role to play in the coming months; it will have to deal with a complex and sensitive issue. Its task will be to try to reconcile the interests of the individual with those of society, so that the government can operate in an efficient manner. Parliament and Canadians hope that the committee will give serious consideration to these issues and will prepare adequate and reasonable guidelines that will help parliamentarians to avoid finding themselves in conflict of interest situations and, should that happen, deal adequately with the situation.

The work of the committee will be a public demonstration of the unanimous will of Canadian parliamentarians to conform to the highest standards of conduct in the exercise of their public responsibilities.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some brief submissions on Motion M-22, presented by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I have the honour, as does the mover of the motion and the previous speaker and others in the Chamber who will likely speak later, of sitting on a special House of Commons and Senate joint committee that is reviewing Bill C-43. Just yesterday the committee, consisting of MPs and senators from the three major parties, with the exception of NDP senators because they do not have any, they do not believe in the Senate, met at Meech Lake not too far from Parliament Hill to consider this whole matter.

The committee has been sitting over the last number of months and we have had the opportunity to hear from a significant number of Canadians who have expertise in the area of conflict of interest.

As the member indicated, we heard from Judge Parker who headed the royal commission of inquiry that investigated the Sinclair Stevens matter. We heard from Mitchell Sharp, a former cabinet minister, who was the co-author of a report that was tabled several years ago in this House. The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore was the executive director of that particular committee and I hope he will have the opportunity to speak this evening as well. We heard from a number of individuals, including people who had expertise in other jurisdictions.

The committee will consider now all the issues and hopefully present to this House legislation that will serve the public interest, that will be fair to MPs, senators, bureaucrats and their spouses and that will hopefully meet with the unanimous approval of this House.

I am speaking this evening on my own position and not necessarily the position of the Liberal Party, although a number of my colleagues happen to agree with the position I take on a number of matters.

I have some concerns about the position taken by the member for Nickel Belt. He believes in full disclosure. He believes that MPs, senators and their spouses ought to publicly disclose their assets and liabilities.

Mr. Rodriguez: Without quantifying.

Mr. Nunziata: He is through heckling. He is trying to add a few caveats.

The point is that generally speaking the NDP, through that particular—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. On a point of order, the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind genuine criticism but I would hope that the member would not misrepresent the position I have taken. I have never suggested that you quantify the assets or the liabilities. That is the position I have taken consistently as he well knows. So do not do that, John. It is not becoming of you.

Mr. Nunziata: With respect, Mr. Speaker, the impression the member of the New Democratic Party left with this House and with all who are viewing and all who might review his comments later is that the NDP wants full public disclosure.

But yes, the member says "without quantifying". If the member from Nickel Belt owns 1,000 shares in the Royal Bank or the Bank of Nova Scotia, that would not be indicated in the public disclosure that he is advocating. It would only indicate that he owns shares—

Mr. Rodriguez: Like it is done in certain provinces.

Mr. Nunziata: —in those banks. That is one of the issues that the committee will have to consider, whether there ought to be full public disclosure on the part of MPs, senators and their spouses.

The committee will also have to decide what sanctions ought to attach to any infractions or improprieties or breaches 9zof the conflict of interest legislation, keeping in mind of course that we are not dealing with criminal activity. The Criminal Code of Canada deals with criminal matters, as the member pointed out, breaches of trust, corruption, bribery. We have the Criminal Code to deal with that kind of activity.

What we are dealing with here is activity that falls short of criminal activity, but is still improper in that MPs and senators could use their offices in order to gain personally or through their families.

I support disclosure but not full public disclosure. Let me explain the reasons why. The member talks about disclosure but he does not indicate why disclosure is necessary. Is he suggesting that once an MP discloses what he or she has publicly, that MP is free then to be involved in a conflict of interest? In other words, is the member suggesting that once you disclose, that becomes your carte blanche or your opportunity to be in a conflict of interest situation? With all due respect, he did not say that in his submission. Once a member discloses publicly then that member ought to withdraw from the debate, declare the conflict, not participate and not vote. I have not heard the member advocate that yet. This has to be clarified.

In my view, MPs ought to disclose to a jurist counsel, a commissioner or a well-respected, highly revered individual by way of prescribed form, assets and liabilities without having to disclose to the public. Frankly I do not believe the public wants to know what assets each individual member of Parliament has, what cars they drive, what bank accounts they have, where those banks accounts are, what shares they own in what companies, what debts they might have. All they want is some honesty and integrity from the people that sit in this House.

The NDP want spouses to also be required under the law to disclose. If you think about that it is pretty old fashioned thinking, thinking that is unbecoming of the New Democratic Party. The New Democratic Party often advocates equality, fairness, the Charter of Rights. Our spouses are independent people. They have lives of their own. The member for Nickel Belt in his submission and in his goal would almost treat spouses as chattels of MPs that they can lead by the nose and force into disclosing. That is not fair. Spouses have their rights to privacy.

This member wants to have the public to know exactly all the assets and liabilities of his wife. I wonder whether that member has spoken to his spouse about whether or not she may or may not agree. The fact is that there are a significant number of spouses who object to having their lives fully exposed by way of public disclosure. I do not think it is fair. It would lead to systemic discrimination. It is chauvinistic and it is old-fashioned thinking. It is somewhat surprising coming from the New Democratic Party that they want to require spouses to have to disclose publicly all their assets.

I support disclosure but only private disclosure. As well, let us not forget that we have to distinguish between MPs and members of the cabinet. There has to be a different regime for cabinet ministers, a higher level because they are exposed to more private information and are able to influence public policy more than average members.

I regret that my time is up. We will have the opportunity in this House in the not too distant future for all MPs to offer their views on a piece of legislation that this committee will bring forward that I believe will be fair and equitable to all those involved including MPs, senators, their spouses and bureaucrats.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, tonight we are debating ethical conduct in government. As previous speakers mentioned, yesterday those of us, myself included, who are members of the parliamentary committee dealing with this subject, began at 8.15 a.m. and went through to 5 p.m. non-stop. Tonight in the House of Commons we are debating it. Tomorrow morning, we start again at 9.30 a.m. This is in addition to other matters.

What we are discussing of course is the subject matter of Bill C-43, the government's legislation which substantially addresses the points raised in the motion before us tonight from the member for Nickel Belt. I believe that the public trust rests on a belief and on a conviction that those in public office will conduct themselves in an ethical fashion.

Those of us holding public office, whether with great or modest responsibilities, carry with us a portion of the responsibility for the destiny of our country and for the carriage of the government of the day and also a part of the trust which the Canadian people vest in government. That is why the issue before us tonight of ethical conduct in government is one of transcending importance because in a democracy, ultimately our system of government depends upon the consent of the governed, not the coercion of the governed.

We must always see that the people of our country have confidence in those of us who are in this place and all of us, including those who are members of the Public Service, must carry out our duties in accordance with the public interest.

The issue, I would submit, is not whether a conflict of interest arises. Show me an individual who never has a conflict of interest and I will show you a one-dimensional person perhaps living in the outskirts of Frobisher Bay as a hermit. In our complex society it is inevitable that we have conflicts of interest.

The issue is not that they arise, but that when conflicts do arise, they be resolved in the public interest. That is what this bill is all about. That is what our committee is discussing; the mechanisms, the procedures, the rules that can permit all of us in public office to see that there is a way of resolving conflicts.

There are different ways that that can happen. It is by no means sufficient for those persons who hold public office in Canada to act within the law. There is a further obligation to act in a manner that will bear the closest public scrutiny.

On this point I join with the member for Nickel Belt in favouring full public disclosure. I want that to be a fundamental principle of any legislation that we enact, and then to the extent necessary to find balance and to protect the rights of privacy to which the member for York South—Weston has referred.

There can be reasonable and proper exceptions and limits, just in the same way that we have passed the Freedom of Information Act which states as a fundamental principle that all Canadians have a right to information about the public programs of our country. We make some reasonable exceptions for matters that pertain to national security, matters that pertain to sensitive commercial transactions currently under way, matters that pertain to rights of privacy of individuals and so forth, just as we do with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We have established fundamental rights of Canadian citizens and then make some restrictions and limitations according to what can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. That is the approach that I hope we can see the legislation proceed on.

The member spoke about the committee report that was prepared by the task force on conflict of interest. I was very pleased to serve as executive director of that task force, appointed by former Prime Minister Trudeau and to work with two outstanding Canadians, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp and the Hon. Michael Starr, both former cabinet ministers, both long-time members of this House. I believe that this report stands us in very good stead.

Out of the 10 principles that were recommended for inclusion in any legislation, there is one I would refer to. It states as follows: "Any conflict between the private interests of public office holders and their official duties must be resolved in favour of the public interest.

Upon appointment to office or election to office, and thereafter, public office holders are expected to arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent such conflicts of interest from arising".

As my time is concluding, I want to simply make these final two points. We have before us this legislation. Simultaneously, another committee on which I am serving is looking at election finance legislation and reforming the election laws of the country. We also have the Lobbyist Registration Act due for a comprehensive review later this year.

It is time for the Parliament of Canada to look at all of these different statutory regimes and recognize that they are woven out of a single fabric. We must have a common approach in all of these legal regimes that govern ethical conduct in the Public Service of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

THE ENVIRONMENT

NATIONAL WILDLIFE WEEK

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of members of the House and Canadians the many activities taking place across Canada to celebrate National Wildlife Week from April 5 to April 11.

We should not underestimate the significance of wildlife to Canada's development, both economically and culturally.

First, our aboriginal peoples developed a traditional way of life in close harmony with nature. Later, European explorers marvelled at the wealth of the wildlife in our seas and in our forests.

Canadian literature and art are rich in themes of wildlife and landscape, bearing witness to the powerful influence of nature on our actions and ideas.

But despite our land's vastness and its rich endowment of wilderness, wildlife is threatened here in Canada, as elsewhere, by human activity crowding our natural habitat. Canada's list of endangered wildlife gets longer each year and now stands at more than 200 species. This trend is alarming, but it is not irreversible, and in recent months a range of wildlife initiatives have been launched under Canada's green plan in order to halt it.

These initiatives include a National Wildlife Strategy for Canada, the newly introduced Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act, the recently launched federal policy on wetland conservation, two agreements with the World Wildlife Fund Canada, and the establishment of a new migratory bird sanctuary in the Northwest Territories. All of these will help Canada's goal of preserving 12 per cent of the country as protected spaces.

In the international arena, Canada is active in protecting wildlife. During the ongoing negotiations leading up to the United Nations earth summit in Brazil this June, Canada is taking a leading part in working to develop a framework convention on biodiversity.

The Prime Minister has recently announced his decision to attend the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and his presence will underline Canada's commitment in this regard.

• (1010)

Efforts such as these to ensure the health and diversity of wild species, both nationally and globally, will be highlighted during National Wildlife Week.

Many private organizations and government agencies dedicated to conserving wildlife are joining forces to celebrate this week with a wide range of activities. For example across Canada, children are becoming more aware of wildlife conservation issues through the highly successful Habitat 2000 educational program developed by the Canadian Wildlife Federation.

Here in the national capital region, Wildlife Festival '92 will include events such as displays at shopping centres and museums, an international film festival and nature tours.

One of those nature tours will take place right here on the Hill on Tuesday, April 7. I invite all members of the House of Commons and their staff to join with me on a "walk on the wild side" of the Hill around the Parliament Buildings.

I am very pleased that the Speaker of the House of Commons will co-host this walk on Parliament Hill. The walk will be under the direction and guidance of a biologist from the Canadian Wildlife Service. Following the walk, we will have an opportunity to express our own wildlife artistry in a special painting, and our co-operative artwork will be displayed in the Wildlife Festival '92.

Canada's wildlife is a vital part of our history. It is up to all of us to ensure that it is also part of our future. I encourage Canadians to join with their governments, their local conservation authorities, their communities and their friends in celebrating this year's National Wildlife Week.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the ingredient necessary, if we are to preserve this fragile ecological sphere, is political will.

National Wildlife Week has a great deal to do with creating that political will. We must make Canadians more aware of our wildlife and more aware of the peril in which many species find themselves. Without that increased awareness eventually stiffening political will and backbone to protect those species and to ensure that Canadians for generations to come will continue to enjoy as our parents, grandparents, those who first came to these shores and those aboriginal Canadians who were here for many centuries before have done, the richness of life in this country.

Species do not live in isolation, and wildlife requires wilderness. Endangered species are also a question of endangered spaces. We have to look not only at what will look nice in a picture, because if that is primarily where we focus our efforts, all we will have in a few generations is pictures. We have to look at wildlife where it actually lives.

I know all members of Parliament are aware of this marvellous book and the marvellous program on endangered spaces that is seeking to protect the very habitat which ensures that species can survive and thrive.

There is little doubt that a strong, unifying bond among Canadians is our deep appreciation of our natural environment. One of the things that unites us from coast to coast is to know that we share in common some of the most beautiful and unique natural spaces that exist on the face of the earth.

For members who have not looked through this book in some time, I encourage them to do so. They will see the diversity of forests, tundra, water, all of which to some extent without political will are endangered. Without us protecting those spaces, the natural environment in which wildlife flourishes, our wildlife is in danger.

A week is important because it focuses public attention. Children learn, we all learn that we are not doing all we should to make sure future generations will enjoy what Canadians now have.

It is beyond the commitment of Canadians. It is a commitment that we have to the world to protect a unique environment that exists nowhere else. That is why Canada has in principle adopted the world-wide commitment to protect 12 per cent of natural areas in this country.

However, we would all admit that we are far from achieving that. As we have been cautioned by the Canadian Nature Federation which will soon be appearing before the environment committee, the real test of our commitment is: Do we allocate our resources to accomplish the goals that we say we want to accomplish?

In the budget that was presented to Parliament just a month ago and in the estimates that were tabled more recently, do we have the funds to ensure that we are preserving not only national and natural treasures but world treasures? That is the responsibility and the stewardship we have for being fortunate enough to live in Canada. We have a responsibility to preserve what is ours so that we can share it with the world.

We also have to look at the specific actions we take on a daily basis in this House through the instruments of government to see whether in fact we are meeting the global commitment that we so eloquently state to protect wildlife. For instance, do we have the regulations on pulp and paper mill effluent to ensure that wildlife is protected? Do we have the tax policies that allows Canadians to donate land for preservation?

The community has led on these issues. It is up to all of us in Parliament to ensure that we carry out the trust that they have placed in us to protect our wildlife.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in anticipation of National Wildlife Week. As somebody who comes from a riding which is well known, starting with the beluga whales and the polar bears and many various types of wildlife species, covering three-quarters of Manitoba, I certainly welcome this week and recognize the importance of wildlife to Canadian history and to Canadian nature.

Both previous speakers have talked about the aboriginals and their traditional harvesting of wildlife. At that particular time in our history, when it was the dominant economic feature of sustainable development within our country, there was a balance. That balance has been lost over the last hundred years. It is a balance that we must restore.

I welcome the remarks of the minister. I noticed that she did make reference to the Prime Minister's attending the conference in Brazil this June. I would hope that in making his presence known, the Prime Minister will also urge the President of the United States to attend and make sure the United States government is not sabotaging the efforts of this biodiversity conference. It is very important that the American government and the American people become involved in the process and not be destructive to that process.

Within our own nation we need to see the federal government's words being matched by the federal government's actions. Within the province of Manitoba, there is an issue with regard to the Oak Hammock Marsh. Ducks Unlimited is building its national headquarters right within that marsh. It is going to affect drainage. It is going to affect the breeding areas of many species.

What is the federal government's position in this? The federal government is helping to fund that headquarters right in that marsh. For that matter, under the western economic diversification office the federal government is supplying $2.48 million for that centre.

Right now the federal government again is being taken to court on this very issue. I would like to see the federal government providing financial support to those organizations that are concerned about this potential development within Oak Hammock Marsh.

It is interesting to note that the Government of Manitoba found that this particular project could not go through on the basis of the 1987 laws. In June 1991 it changed the laws in Manitoba to allow this particular project to go forward. The federal government was silent.

That is just one example. I could go through any number of examples of why this is a problem in our nation, but I do not want to give a long political speech of that nature.

There are many positive things that can be done. We have to continue to develop our national parks system. If I can do a local plug for a few seconds, one of the things we would like to see is quicker action on is the national park in Churchill, a very important park for the people of that region. It should be recognized as one of the special geographic features of our nation.

I recognize that my time is short on this issue, but I hope that all Canadians will participate in National Wildlife Week next week, that it will be a very successful week for all of Canada, and that it will result in concrete action on behalf of the environment of Canada.

FINANCE

10TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. The committee has agreed to report this bill without amendment.

Routine Proceedings

11TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 11th report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-56, an act representing the control of government expenditures.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That eight members and six staff of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be permitted to travel to Vancouver, B.C. from April 20 to April 27, 1992 to attend the Independence '92 International Convention on Disability, and to hold hearings in conjunction with the convention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENVIRONMENT

BROADCASTING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think you will also find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Environment be empowered to have televised and radio broadcasting of its meeting on April 6, 1992 according to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the House of Commons.

That, notwithstanding the report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business concurred in by the House on October 20, 1989, a broadcast of the proceedings on the parliamentary channel be permitted on Sunday, April 12, 1992 at 12 o'clock p.m., Eastern Standard Time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House a petition certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36.

This petition bears names of concerned citizens from across Canada, from Halifax to Vancouver, who humbly pray that Parliament amend the Income Tax Act such that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures.

I might add that this petition was circulated and the signatures were collected prior to the budget of 1992 and that some of the objectives of this petition have already been met.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present today petitions signed by residents of Calgary Southeast, Calgary Southwest and Red Deer, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

These petitioners wish to draw to our attention that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazil prison, have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment.

They ask Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the beautiful city of Kingston, Ontario.

These petitioners object to the failure to recognize the seriousness of crimes of violence against the person and call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act to make clear our abhorrence of the seriousness of these crimes.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform the House, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a), that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 15 minutes beginning at 1 p.m.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its unwillingness to concede that the deregulation of the Canadian transport industry has been a failure and in fact has led to fewer carriers, fewer jobs, higher prices, reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of my caucus I guess in a large way to repeat once again that we told you so.

The motion before us deals with the government's failure to concede that deregulation did not work, did not work for air, did not work for trucking, has not worked for rail, and certainly has not worked on behalf of Canadian consumers.

Let me start by asking a rhetorical question. There is a song out there from my youth: Where Have All the Flowers Gone? Let me change that to: Where have all the carriers gone? Where is Wardair? Where is City Express? Where is Nordair? Where is Austin Airways?

The list can go on and on and on in Canada and the United States. Where is Braniff? Where is Eastern? Where is National? Where is Western? Where is Frontier? Where is Ozark? Where is Piedmount? Where is Air Cal? Where is PSA? Where are Empire, Horizon, Air Atlanta, Jet America?

They have all gone. They have been gobbled up or they have gone into bankruptcy.

• (1030)

The same thing has been happening in Canada. It should not have come as a surprise to the Canadian government. We entered into the full formal debate on deregulation. The white paper Freedom to Move was tabled by the then Minister of Transport who is now Deputy Prime Minister. The indications were there in the United States which had been in a deregulated mode for about 10 years that we would have fewer carriers, not more; that we would have less competition, not more; that we would have higher prices, not lower prices; and that safety would be undermined.

Regretfully all that has come to pass in Canada. The Conservative government decided to go full bore into economic deregulation.

I want to make clear what that means. That is not just getting the government off the backs of the industry, which is how the government would like to phrase it. It changed the way in which the system was managed. It took those sectors—air, road and rail, primarily road and air—from a test of public necessity and convenience to a fit, willing and able kind of test.

What that means in layman's terms is that under regulation, carriers who wanted to change their rates, to change their routings, to drop a city or to add a city to their network would have to apply. They would have to prove that there was a need and that there was a public benefit from the proposed change, or that the negative aspects were minimal and they had no choice because of rising fuel costs or what have you.

That is all gone. What we ended up with is a system where the banker made the decision. If you could convince a banker that there was a need for a service and if that banker was prepared to advance you the money, you were in business. Yes, you needed a safety certificate, but the reality we have seen from the Moshansky report is how easy it was to get that safety certificate without going through the proper requirements of assurances of safe operations.

That is the kind of system we went to. In Canada we have gone from three major airlines, Air Canada, Canadian and Wardair, down to two. Initially we saw the emergence of a number of independent regional carriers: Atlantic Canada, central Canada, western Canada, the north. Just as an aside I want to remind the House that the north retained its regulatory regime because the transport committee unanimously recognized that the north was different. There is a different kind of regime north of 60 that allows greater control by the government. However, that is aside from the point.

We now have Canadian Airlines negotiating very seriously with American Airlines for an infusion of equity. As much as 25 per cent of Canadian Airlines is up for sale to American Airlines. Air Canada has suggested if that happens it may have to follow suit. It is the beginning of the end of the word "Canada" in those two airlines.

At the same time, as part of this new regime of competitiveness brought to us by the Conservatives we have ended up having all those regional carriers that emerged in the rush to get in on the bandwagon to make a buck being acquired in some cases 100 per cent, in some cases 50 per cent and other ranges by the two major carriers. We have a duopoly in Canada, an unregulated duopoly.

That has not benefited customers. It has not benefited communities. In terms of customers, they are required to pay even higher prices for less service. A number of communities lost jet service, communities like Sault Ste. Marie, Dryden, London, Windsor, North Bay, Sudbury, all in Ontario, and Brandon, Manitoba, to name a few. They lost jet service. Their replacement service was the smaller, commuter Dash-8 type of equipment, albeit a very excellent aircraft. But when you go from a jet service which has in some ways an elitist feeling about it to a lesser service, in the eyes of those communities their communities have been down-graded; it is no longer the economic stimulater they once had.

The community of Dryden, for example, used to be the regional hub for northwestern Ontario. It was not Thunder Bay. Because Dryden had jet service, it made sense for the smaller northern carriers to base their operations there, or at least to provide connections there up into the far north, to the northern reserves, to Kenora and to other communities in the northwest. As a result of deregulation, Dryden lost its jet service. Even more important, it lost its hub status. That moved to Thunder Bay.

That is a plus for me and my constituents, and it certainly has helped us make the argument for a brand new terminal at the Thunder Bay airport because of the rapid increase in traffic that has occurred there. So we are winners. But Dryden was a loser. It has also had an impact on its economy, because without the jet service, without the ease of connections and the quality of service, the business community is less likely to see Dryden as a place in which to locate. I think if you talk to the mayor there you would find that what I am saying is very accurate.

At the same time, the passengers have been squished into smaller seats. In some cases they have lost in-cabin services. In some cases they do not even have washrooms, although that is slowly changing in terms of providing bigger and bigger equipment. So there was a decline in services offered. Yet they were still expected to pay the same to fly from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg on a Dash-8 as they were paying on a jet.

Let me touch briefly on the fares, because I think it is a key element. The government and the promoters of deregulation argue that it is cheaper flying today than it was in 1984. I have a service bulletin put out by the Aviation Statistics Centre from Stats Canada. It shows a year-by-year, in fact quarter-by-quarter change in air fares. It breaks it down between northern economy fare and northern discount fare, southern economy fare and southern discount fare.

When you look at the southern fares, the ones that most of us in this room have paid for by the taxpayer, economy fare since 1986 has gone up around 50 per cent. The Consumer Price Index has only gone up by 27 per cent in that same period. In terms of the full economy fare, the business person who does not have discretion in terms of when he or she may fly but has to get to Toronto or Ottawa today, buys his or her ticket with no discount. That has gone up by 50 per cent, if not more, since 1986.

That has an impact on the business community. It has an impact on governments in terms of additional costs to them because governments do have to fly people from city to city in order to do their work.

On the discount fare in the south, it has not gone up as much but it has still gone up slightly above the CPI. It looks like it is about 130 per cent of what it was in 1986, again comparing to a 27 per cent increase in the CPI. So it has gone up marginally more than the Consumer Price Index.

To say that we have all gained because of deregulation is not accurate. We may have not seen the increases as drastic, I would grant you that, but we are still paying more today for the discount fares than we were in 1986 and we are paying more than we would if the Consumer Price Index had been the measure. Keep in mind that under regulation, any of these fare increases would have to be subject to the test of public convenience and necessity. While there was some inflexibility under the old CTC when it came to rate setting, I think that could have been fixed in such a way to provide greater opportunities for the carriers to provide discount fares while at the same time not affecting their bottom line.

Let me turn now to the bottom line because that is really the nub of the issue. When you take the decisions about safety, the cities that you service, the rates you charge, out of the hands of the regulator, i.e., out of the hands of the state and give it to the bankers, the driving force is: "Can I make a buck? Where do I have to reduce my input costs in order to maximize my profit?" I think what we saw throughout the last six years, if not more than that in Canada, and certainly in the last 15 years in the United States, is that as a result of the cut-throat competition with prices being driven down in order to attract traffic to a particular airline, they have put themselves in financial jeopardy.

That is why Wardair went under. In a sense, it had no choice but to sell to Pacific Western. That is why City Express could not make a go of it, even though I can remember the owner of City Express telling the transport committee as we were studying deregulation: "Just watch me. I can compete with the big boys and win". He could not. He lost. Quite frankly, we all lost because that was a good service, an entrepreneurial service that filled a niche in the market.

The other element of the bottom line regulation is that you begin to look at ways to cut costs that you would not have looked at before. There is nothing necessarily wrong with working smarter, but we saw what was happening in the States and we gave a warning, my colleague from Regina—Lumsden and I. I have handled this matter since 1984 and my colleague for decades before that. At one time an airline would replace its component parts well before the legal limit of that part or the specifications said to. For example, a widget that had 1,000 air hours of use might be replaced at 800 hours to give that additional margin of safety. At the same time, minor maintenance problems on a plane would be fixed immediately.

What has happened because of cost cutting is that part that has to be replaced in 1,000 hours is not replaced until 1,000 hours. Those minor problems with the plane are stacked up and, therefore, they end up as part of a major repair job.

Certainly, Justice Moshansky in his report outlined that on the Air Ontario flight, the fatal flight that crashed in Dryden killing 24 people, there were a number of maintenance deficiencies that had been noted a number of times and while by themselves they did not cause the accident, they certainly helped to create the atmosphere in which the accident was caused.

We see from an economic point of view that when the banker rules the roost, too many things go by the way. We would prefer a return to regulation so that carriers, those that still exist, can in effect be guaranteed a reasonable return on their investment. After all, they are there to make a profit. They are not there as public servants, although we wish Air Canada was back in that mode as a publicly-owned company, publicly owned by the taxpayers as opposed to the individual shareholders. But that is a matter for another debate.

The key thing is we need some stability. Carriers have to be assured of a decent return. In doing so, we then ensure that they can afford to pay for the kind of maintenance we need, the kind of safety we need, the kind of services we need.

Let me turn now from air to trucking. We saw a separate piece of legislation in this House deregulating trucking and parallel action in the provinces to also deregulate trucking. I found that whole aspect quite ironic because as a provincial member of the legislature in Ontario in 1976, I was part of a select committee that studied trucking deregulation in Ontario. Deregulation never occurred there under the Conservatives, but as a result of what the federal Conservatives did here, the provincial Liberals agreed and followed through with deregulation.

What we saw happening in trucking was in a way a microcosm of what happened in air. We saw the emergence of a whole bunch of new truckers. A lot of the independents that for years were operating illegally became legal. They had the ability to get out and make a buck. A lot of new ones came in, again with the same test. If you can convince your banker, you can buy a rig and you can go out and hustle for the work.

We raised expectations and a lot of mom and pop operations developed, that independent spirit. What happened was that the industry grew too fast. There were more trucks than there was cargo, so costs became a factor. We saw outside this House the place was almost surrounded by rigs. We saw in Windsor the bridge between Windsor and Detroit shut down because of truckers who were angry at the inability of governments to assist them. They were angry that there was not enough work for them. They saw their limited cargo access being siphoned off to American truckers because they have different tax laws, different write-offs and what have you.

We created a situation where we had gone from a regulated environment where there were some controls on the number of trucks as a way to guarantee quality of service, a restriction on the quantity of service so that the number of trucks on the road matched the cargo that was available, so that there was a good bottom line that those who were in business had a decent return. Yes, they tend to be larger companies, almost back to that point where a lot of the independent operators are now locked into contracts with a major company. They are finding themselves no better off as a result of that.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I have limited time left. In conclusion, the motion that we put forward not only is a statement about deregulation itself, but is also an indication that this government has failed to recognize that its philosophy did not work. It did not create more competition, it did not create more jobs; it did the opposite: less jobs, less service, less safe operations.

I know it is time to turn things around again and provide some stability in our air industry, our trucking industry and in our rail industry, which I have not even got to because of the time available. If we do not then what is happening to Canadian Airlines is going to happen to CN, CP, Air Canada and our trucking companies. More and more they will be bought up and controlled by individuals and companies south of the border.

I would like to leave you with just one parting word. The reason that this country developed as it did in an east-west mode was because of the foresight of our first Prime Minister who said we had to have those connections. By deregulation, we have lost those connections entirely.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to be involved in this debate on the opposition motion this morning.

I listened intently to a colleague of the House defending this motion which deals with deregulation. It does not surprise me that he and his party would be opposed to deregulation because they are basically opposed to privatization of most things. They would like the government of the country to own all transportation, to basically be involved in a major way in the activities of trucking and rail. In other words, it is the socialistic view that he presents in his place. Although we never talked about that part of it, his view is quite simple. It is that private enterprise should not be into transportation.

He shakes his head, but if he had heard what he said this morning, he is opposed to deregulation which allows for the private sector to invest in the transportation industry not to be dictated by the government. But in fact, in his case it would be.

He did not acknowledge that the customer becomes the king. The consumer decides how many airplanes should fly, how many trains should go back and forth as opposed to imposing this at the expense of taxpayers and the state of the economy of this country.

I want to get to the specifics of what he talked about. He made a statement that deregulation reduced services and made air traffic less safe.

If that is the statement of the opposition today, let the hon. gentleman stand in his place and tell this House what safety regulations were taken away or were reduced by the Department of Transport. What specific safety regulations were ended because of deregulation? Let him be specific. Which specific safety regulations do we not have today that we had before we went into this deregulation?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. It shows the underlying lack of knowledge of the government as to the impact of deregulation.

Let me deal with his last question in a very direct way. There were no safety regulations that were changed as a result of deregulation. There is no question about that.

As to what was not done, as far back as the spring of 1984 the departmental staff were warning that they did not have sufficient inspectors to ensure that as we moved into a deregulated environment we would be able to make sure that it remained safe. That is point number one.

With respect to point number two, I will repeat what I said in my speech. When you take away the economic stability of a carrier and that carrier begins to look for ways in which to cut corners, then instead of an extra margin of safety that it would operate under—in other words, replacing a part at 800 hours instead of the prescribed 1,000 hours—the margin of safety was reduced. There was no violation of the law, let us make that clear. But it created a culture that left open the possibility of a Dryden crash which regretfully happened.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who talked about trucking. I have an article from March 1992 written by Jean-Roch Savard which says: "On December 6, 1991, the Government of Canada announced a series of measures concerning the transportation industry, especially trucking. These provisions should in principle improve the tax system for carriers and subcontractors. By taking advantage of these measures, highway transportation companies should become more competitive, it is thought". He concludes his article by saying: "In my opinion, only a concerted effort of the federal and provincial governments will get the trucking industry back in shape. Ottawa has shown its goodwill. Given the present political context, Quebec must get the message and do its part".

Will Ontario now do its part to help the trucking industry in southern Ontario?

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I welcome my colleague's question. First of all, let me say that I welcomed the federal initiative. It was a good short-term solution to a long-term problem. But it would not have been necessary had we not allowed the proliferation of truckers to exceed the ability of the suppliers to provide goods to move. That is the reality.

In terms of Ontario, I do not have the specifics with me. Ontario did participate with the federal government in trying to find solutions to the situation as it related to Ontario. It is working on it. It has made some announcements. I am not sure if they parallel those of Quebec.

Certainly, we all recognize that truckers are in deep trouble. Not just the independents but the whole system is in trouble because of the competition from the United States. If we let the NAFTA agreement go through, assuming that the draft that I read into the record in this House is accurate, giving them full access to trucking, then we might as well kiss all of our independent operators goodbye.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I quite appreciated the speech by my hon. colleague that pointed out to some degree the inevitable impact of deregulation and the difference in philosophy. It is clear there is a difference in philosophy between this side and the other side.

I want to ask a question about the government acting within the context of its own ideology, within the context of the American experience in this House during the debate.

I clearly remember the warnings given to the government about the inevitable rise in the amount of traffic, for example at Pearson airport, and the necessity of increasing the number of air traffic controllers.

I ask my colleague what was the government's reaction to that? What has been the sequel? I ask him if he is aware of the increase in the number of planes that do not take off for mechanical reasons? Also, what is the impact of increased traffic on the availability and adequacy of inspection of aircraft in the latter regard?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I could use a whole ten minutes just responding to my colleague.

Let me try to deal quickly with the elements. With regard to planes not taking off because of mechanical difficulties, there is a definite indication of an increasing number. There is also an increasing number of the smaller commuter carriers that cancel in-between flights. Say there is one flight every hour but there are not enough passengers, so they cancel a flight. Under regulation they would not be allowed to get away with that.

In terms of air traffic controllers, in terms of inspectors, the government was warned time and time again that what it was doing was inconsistent with the realities of deregulation. If you are predicting more planes in the air as a result of your policy, then you damn well better have more air traffic controllers to handle that in the air and more inspectors to ensure that the operations are in fact safe.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to bring a little reality to this debate and to demonstrate that the government's regulatory reform has been quite a success. I have the facts to prove just that.

I must say that I welcome the contribution to this debate and also the sense of reality brought to the debate by the hon. member for Portage—Interlake. The member for Abitibi also posed a very good question.

During the mid-eighties, the government saw that the legislation which had served and protected transportation industries well in the past was impeding their growth. This legislation served neither the Canadian industry nor the travelling public.

In 1987, the government introduced economic regulatory reform in transportation, a regulatory framework to meet the needs of modern Canada. The National Transportation Act of 1987, the Motor Vehicle Transportation Act of 1987 and the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act of 1987 brought in a new era of economic regulations for the transportation industry of Canada.

That legislative package recognized the importance of transportation in enhancing Canada's competitive edge in the global economy and in promoting the economic growth of its regions.

To achieve those ends, specific provisions in the legislation were designed to encourage the development of a new competitive environment, an efficient transportation system that meets the needs of shippers and travellers and a simplified accessible and responsive regulatory process.

The key elements of the new national transportation policy are safety, competition, less regulation and increased accessibility. Safety of the transportation system is the top priority. The transportation system exists to serve the needs of shippers and travellers. Competition and market forces are the prime agents in providing economic, efficient and adequate transportation services at the lowest cost.

• (1100)

Economic regulation of carriers will be minimized to encourage competition both within and among transportation modes. Carriers should, as far as is practicable, bear a fair share of costs and facilities and services provided at public expense and to be compensated for publicly imposed duties.

Transportation is a key to regional development. Carriers should not create undue obstacles to the mobility of all, including disabled persons.

In proceeding with these major reforms, the government did not underestimate the strategic importance of Canada's transportation industry. As a prudent manager of Canada's assets, it mandated that the National Transportation Agency review the operation of the new regulatory framework and report to the minister each year for four consecutive years.

Three such annual reviews are now in and they indicate that the economic regulatory reforms and objectives are being met. Let us look at the facts as reported by the agency.

First, there is no evidence of a reduction in safety. This was confirmed by the preliminary 1991 statistics from the Transportation Safety Board which, as compared to 1990, indicated a slight decrease in the railway accident rate, a decrease in the number of shipping accidents and no change in aircraft accident rates.

Generally, Canada's transportation accident safety record in the 1980s was good. The trend in accident rates in the air and rail modes has been downward. Moreover, the available data indicate that the introduction of economic regulatory reform in 1988 had no detrimental impact on the transportation accident rate. The rates have generally continued their downward trend.

Second, competition and market forces have kept real rate increases down. Let me highlight a few examples to illustrate this point. In the air mode there was an increase in the use of discount air fares. About two-thirds of passengers travel on discount fares on southern routes and there is a growing use of discount fares in the north. In the rail mode, freight rate increases have been lower than inflation. The level of competition has kept downward pressure on trucking rates. The market conditions have also kept freight rates of international liner shipping services in check.

Third, there has been a growth in the number of air and truck carriers. While some consolidation has occurred, competition still predominates. Moreover, in the rail mode we are witnessing the emergence and expansion of short-line railways.

Fourth, there have been major improvements in levels of services and increased competition. For example, in the air mode comprehensive national networks of the two major carrier groupings have resulted in widespread competition and increased services in terms of domestic city payers connected by direct and indirect flights.

Alternative services are being offered for the first time to many communities in Canada. In summary, travel options have been expanded with increased competition in price, service and quality.

Finally, intermodal services are improving. Shippers report improvement in intermodal services for domestic and transborder traffic. Port container traffic reached its highest level ever in 1990, while railways and port terminal operators made a number of intermodal facility investments in 1990.

The facts are there to prove that our regulatory reform is successful. However, the government recognizes that not everything is rosy. The demand for transportation services is derived from the demand for goods and services in the economy in general. The reduction in economic activity world wide in the recent economic downturn has slowed transportation activity. Moreover, the air mode was doubly affected by last year's Persian Gulf crisis. All modes have been affected and the drop in transportation activity has affected the financial position of the carriers and of employment. The transportation industry is not immune to slower economic growth. The transportation sector is expected to improve, however, as economic recovery gathers momentum. We are seeing those trends already beginning.

On February 3 the Minister of Transport announced a comprehensive one-year review of federal transportation regulatory legislation. This review will complement other consultations that are under way in conjunction with the government's prosperity initiative. The review will provide valuable information on the transportation industry by identifying and assessing developments since economic regulatory reform was introduced in 1988. It will also highlight opportunities for improvements in domestic transportation.

As we move through the 90s, transportation will be as strategic as it was 125 years ago at Confederation. Transportation is a pillar of prosperity in Canadian competitiveness. Economic regulatory reform has been successful in bringing about a strong and vital transportation sector.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport for boldly stating what few other members in this House would probably state, in fact, what few Canadians would believe.

I want to take one statement he made in that very short summation on deregulation by this government since 1984–85. He said that there was no reduction in accidents in the air. The parliamentary secretary said that.

I want to give him one example of evidence that we, the minister and Transport Canada have which refutes that very statement. The Canadian Aviation Safety Board's figures for 1981 to 1984, prior to deregulation, show that accidents numbered 695 in 1981 and fell to 458 in 1984.

Then deregulation set in. This government embarked on its program of deregulation. From 1985 to 1991, the number of accidents went up. In 1985 there were 438 accidents; in 1991, 449 accidents. This is not rhetoric. These are figures released by CASB, the Canadian Aviation Safety Board.

I want to ask the member, based on this information, how he can say that there has been no reduction in the number of accidents in the air.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question. It points out again how these opposition members and this member in particular like to manipulate numbers to mislead those who will read Hansard and those who are watching this debate right now.

Let me say at the outset that I am delighted we have Hansard. It is a printed record of what is said here in the House. It is quite clear through a review of Hansard that at no time did I use the words that the hon. member has just attributed to me.

I said that there is no change in the accident rate. There is a significant difference between the numbers in a given year of accidents and the accident rate. Clearly, if anyone would care to look at the numbers, they would note that there has been a tremendous increase in the volume of air traffic in Canada over the years.

For example, if there were twice as many flights in a given year, one would presume that at the same rate there may be, unfortunately, a few more accidents. If there is only one plane flying, there is considerably less chance of accidents than if there is more than one.

I always have to have a look at the hon. member's motivation when he brings out these facetious arguments with regard to manipulating numbers as he did the other day in the House when he was asking our minister about the figures for regulatory safety inspectors and asking who was right.

I found it an interesting question, enough to pursue the matter. I found that both ministers were right, the minister who made a reply in this House several years ago to which the hon. member referred his question in the House this week, and also the current Minister of Transportation.

The member, as is usual to suit his purposes, is comparing apples and oranges. He is asking one minister about the regulatory safety inspectors and comparing his response to a question asked several years ago of the former Minister of Transport who was referring in his numbers to inspectors.

I have it here in the total system. This was back in 1985. His answer included air navigation and airport inspectors as well as regulatory safety inspectors.

Obviously, there will be, as there is today, more in terms of numbers when you include air navigation and airport inspectors in the figures of regulatory safety inspectors. These are two other categories of inspectors to which the former minister referred. It is a somewhat clever but deceitful effort to manipulate numbers to the member's advantage.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the parliamentary secretary's response. I want to point out at the outset of my comments that deregulation only applied to commercial aviation. It did not apply to the owner-operators, the general aviation class. It only applied to the commercial ones, the folks you and I buy tickets from to ride on their planes.

We have been playing with numbers. The reason I pointed out that deregulation talks solely about commercial aircraft is that the numbers the parliamentary secretary uses, the numbers the minister uses, while accurate, are meaningless in the debate about deregulation and about the Dryden inquiry. The real numbers from CASB indicate that from 1984 to 1991 the Canadian registered aircraft commercial operations accidents increased by 33.7 per cent. More important, and this comes back to a comment made by the parliamentary secretary just now, the total accident rate per 100,000 hours has gone from 8.3 in 1984 to 9.4 in 1989.

Therefore, the member's argument that safety is better because there are more planes in the sky and more hours does not hold water. The agency's own reports show that there has been an increase, not just in the straight number of accidents, but in the rate of per 100,000 hours. It is going up, not down.

My question to the member is: Why does the government continue to insist on mixing apples and oranges in this debate instead of being honest with the Canadian public and saying the accident rate has gone up and it is going to do something to bring it back down?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we could keep going around this. The facts are clear. The member stated in his somewhat lengthy preamble to his question that our numbers were accurate. That is on the record as just now admitted by the member. Our numbers, the numbers of the Minister of Transport and the Department of Transport are accurate. There has been no increase in the rate of accidents in this country. He is referring specifically to air safety here.

I would like to repeat that we have just completed a three-year inquiry into a particular crash. The Moshansky report has recently been tabled and I think the member is aware that just this past week Mr. Justice Moshansky, who completed this very detailed report and assessment, indicated that Canada has one of the safest aviation systems in the world. That speaks for itself.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I again restate that it is privilege for me to rise and debate this opposition motion regarding the deregulation of our transportation industry.

For the record, let me restate what that motion is.

> That this House condemns the government for its unwillingness to concede that the deregulation of the Canadian transport industry has been a failure and in fact has led to fewer carriers, fewer jobs, higher prices, reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

The thrust of this motion is correct. However, I would like to state one important caveat with respect to the intention of this motion. What it states regarding higher prices and job losses is true. Of paramount importance, however, is the government's complete failure to be prepared to deal with the creature it unleashed. There are literally volumes of documentation rife with examples of this government's failure to deal with deregulation.

I would like to set out other problems in Transport Canada which, as far as we on this side of the House are concerned, have barred real attempts at reform within the transportation system.

Transport Canada has become a revolving door of ministerial irresponsibility. On the one hand, ministers are replaced at the drop of a hat when cabinet shuffles are completed. This fact severely mitigates any changes to the system which might have been under way as the minister became more familiar with the department.

I have that kind of knowledge first hand from one of the previous five Ministers of Transport that this government has had in office. In fairness I am not going to state who that is. I am not going to say who it is by name, but he knows who it is. He was the one who told me at a dinner one night when we got together with other members of the transport committee. He said to me: "Damn, I was just getting my teeth into this thing. I was just starting to understand that massive portfolio called Transport Canada and now I have to be moved off to another minister's portfolio". That is indeed unfortunate.

On the other hand, successive managers, and we are talking foot soldiers, senior managers and the minister, brought in from the outside have made their mark in the department and then have moved on, of course merely compounding the phenomenon of the revolving door which I just spoke about.

The problem is that ministers and managers trying to make the right career moves did not implement policies which would probably have increased the department's spending. Remember that this is a government that, from the very beginning, made deficit reduction its over-all policy objective.

When deregulation was proposed by this government, its belief was that the industry, air and road, would blossom on its own. It believed—and we have heard it from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport—in that Conservative credo of survival of the fittest and took the reins of the marketplace so that the industry could grow without undue government regulation and supervision. But the government failed to tend to the roots of that system. We know full well that when something has to grow, one has to put in the support mechanisms and the resources that will ensure the steady, strong and vertical or upward growth of that system, but not this government.

I want to take you back, Mr. Speaker, to the excellent and far-reaching report of the Dryden inquiry. The commission chair, Justice Virgil Moshansky, was extremely thorough in his investigation of Transport Canada, as well as the airline involved in that tragic accident of March 10, 1989. In volume 3 of the report it states: "Throughout the hearings of this inquiry into the Dryden accident, I heard repeatedly concerns expressed by Transport Canada witnesses regarding their inability to respond effectively as regulators to an increased demand for air carrier certification, inspection and surveillance services". According to the witnesses, the certification inspection and surveillance workload created by a rapidly changing air carrier industry was not matched by a commensurate increase in resources for Transport Canada's regulatory agency.

The resource squeeze stems from the almost simultaneous introduction of two federal government policies in 1984, namely economic regulatory reform of the air carrier industry and deficit reduction, a program imposing fiscal restraint on federal government services. The combined effect of these two policies created a difficult set of circumstances for Transport Canada personnel responsible for air carrier safety.

At the time of deregulation, under the former Minister of Transport who is now Deputy Prime Minister, it was called a freedom to move. There was concern over what the government was trying to achieve under deregulation. The Official Opposition sounded the alarm bells but was continually assured by the then Minister of Transport that everything was going to be okay. He stated back in 1984: "I would like to indicate unequivocally that the government will neither propose nor permit any economic regulatory reform that might be detrimental to safety standards".

That was not what his deputy minister was saying. I want to quote again from the Moshansky report on page 874. This is what his deputy minister said:

> You can't talk about it—

That is, economic regulatory reform.

> —without talking about another government policy because while I said a moment ago that, yes, we would implement the policy laid down to us by the Minister of Transport, one is essentially saying in these major policy initiatives, that one is implementing the policy of the government, of the Ministry, of the decisions, the policy decisions of the government.
> Yet, another high priority policy decision of the government was deficit reduction. And the first blush of deficit reduction measures hit in Mr. Wilson's economic statement of November 1984. And these—these measures that were in that impacted upon the department.
> The department took a second blow in terms of deficit reduction targets in the May 1985 budget, which was, in financial planning terms, hard on the heels of November '84.

That was back in 1984 from the then Minister of Transport's deputy minister. Clearly the department was struggling within itself, wrestling with two diametrically opposed points: safety and saving a buck. We all know and we all can appreciate, and we have all stated it time and time again in this House, that you cannot fudge on safety.

By 1985 the department realized this problem and undertook to investigate the experience of deregulation in the United States. There was a trip. The purpose of the trip south of the 49th parallel was to obtain the experience of officials from the Federal Aviation Administration, the FAA in the United States, which had six years of deregulation behind it. That trip proved to be a turning point in Transport Canada's awareness of the huge expansion required in the United States of additional safety inspectors. They realized that if the object of deregulation was to increase business in air transportation, they would need to have safety resources commensurate in order to keep up. In the United States, the number of inspectors increased rapidly.

The Canadian delegation was headed by Donald Douglas, then Transport Canada's director of licensing and certification.

I have, for the consideration of this House, a memorandum from that very crucial meeting. I want to read into the record some of those concerns made by the Canadian delegation when it returned from FAA headquarters in Washington back on December 20, 1985: "The FAA has just announced that they would be hiring 500 new inspectors over the next three years to keep up with the effects of deregulation. The FAA is also planning to hire 1,000 new air traffic controllers".

Another member of the Canadian delegation was Ian Umbach. He stated in testimony to the Moshansky commission that air carrier inspectors were facing grave difficulties keeping up with the workload of inspectors. He states in his report, page 879, in a question and answer between the commissioner and Mr. Umbach:

> Q. And were you making submissions to your supervisors saying, look, I need more staff?
> A. Yes.
> Q. So your numbers were part of that 1,150 (person-years) requested?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And what signals were you getting from above, from your supervisors?
> A. Other than losing a PY (person-year) we were getting no response.
> Q. And what were the reasons—what was your understanding?
> A. We were downsizing.
> The Commissioner: You were what; you were downsizing—
> The Witness: Downsizing.
> The Commissioner: —in staff?
> The witness: Yes, Sir.
> Q. So in effect, you were asking for more inspectors, but in fact, they were taking inspector positions away from you?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And what about your workload? Were they reallocating your workload or requesting you to do less work?
> A. No.
> Q. What was happening?
> A. We were doing more with less.

That is the crux of it, Mr. Speaker, doing more with less. Time and time again the opposition had raised the need for adequate resources but kept on receiving assurances from the minister that everything was under control.

I, too, put a question to the Minister of Transport and our transport critic, the member for Ottawa South, put questions to the Minister of Transport, as did our members from the north. If you want to talk about playing with figures, if you want to talk about playing and manipulating the numbers, last week on Tuesday, in Hansard, page 9093, the question from me that day:

> The Minister of Transport stated in this House last Thursday that the total number of inspectors—
> The total number of inspectors in aviation.
> —increased from 456 in 1985 to 569 in 1991. According to the Deputy Prime Minister, when he was Minister of Transport back in 1985, the actual number of inspectors was not 456, but somewhere over 600.

The question was asked, the total number in the aviation business. The answer was 456. But back in 1985 when that same question was put the number was not 456. The number was in excess of 600.

The current Deputy Prime Minister who was Minister of Transport of the day said on one day 600, and then put it accurately on the very next day, 614. Industry-wide inspectors, that was the question. That was the answer. Those are the facts.

While there were the foot soldiers in Transport Canada who were frustrated by the staffing shortfalls in inspectors and repeatedly warned the higher levels at Transport Canada, that middle management, that senior management about the gaps in safety, the warnings of course fell on deaf ears.

Even in later documentation it was admitted that Transport Canada just was not up to scratch on staffing requirements for inspectors. In 1987 a preliminary review of aviation regulation was conducted by the then assistant deputy minister of aviation. It was clear from this internal overview of deregulation that Transport Canada was unable to increase certification and inspection workloads. Part of the executive summary of that preliminary report echoed previous concerns regarding the diametrically opposed concerns of safety versus the almighty buck.

It is very clear on page 887 of the Moshansky report. This is the preliminary review of aviation regulations done in June 1987:

> Regulatory reform of the domestic air industry was introduced at a time when the department possessed neither sufficient trained resources, the required planning and operational processes, nor the necessary enforcement capability required to effectively monitor and foster aviation industry compliance with established safety legislation, regulations and standards. In this respect, the Department has generally paralleled the American experience with deregulation—Specifically, the following major areas of concern were noted during the preliminary 1987 review:

(a) The shortage of trained, experienced inspection staff and other personnel has seriously impacted on the Directorate's ability to effectively perform its mandated tasks; (b) The increase in certification workload under ERR, resulting from the need to service new and expanding air carriers, is affecting the Directorate's ability to effectively complete its ongoing inspection program, and thereby assure industry compliance with established legislation, regulations and standards;

We had these findings and again the concerns went virtually unnoticed. The revolving door at Transport Canada continued. Economics continued to win the battle, a losing battle, over providing sufficient financial resources to the most important, the priority mandate of Transport Canada, safety.

Let me take the House once more to the Moshansky report, that very comprehensive report, three volumes thick, to the findings at page 913 where the Justice states:

Based on the information before this Commission, the Aviation Regulation Directorate was not adequately prepared to perform its functions in the latter 1980s.

The warning flags raised early in the 1980s and repeatedly thereafter had seemingly negligible effect. The forecasts of safety assurance deficiencies were soundly based and progressively confirmed, yet there was no proper response by the senior management of Transport Canada in the form of urgent planning or action to meet the inevitable challenge.

I am going to proceed to the last one because my time is short.

Had the Transport Canada Aviation Regulation Directorate been in a position to discharge all of its responsibilities in an effective and timely manner, some of the factors that contributed to the Dryden accident may not have arisen.

What we are saying on this side of the House—and this is not a laughing matter, because all the signals were there—I say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport: What we have been asking for years now is that the department get serious about providing the necessary resources to ensure safety.

Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, today could be 1985 or 1989 all over again. The warnings have been issued again. Now in 1992 continued warnings are being given. We do not want to hear again in five years' time those words that ring out by Justice Moshansky. This accident at Dryden did not happen by chance, but it was allowed to happen.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to re-emphasize that what was deregulated in these economic regulatory reforms, was the economic burden on the industry. The safety regulations have remained in place and have been strengthened over time.

We do not do justice to Canadians and the industry if we do not strongly say that today air travel in Canada is safer than it was 10 years ago. Transportation Safety Board statistics back this up.

The hon. member has made exhaustive reference to the Moshansky report. In a recent television interview, Justice Moshansky was asked: Is it safe to fly in Canada?

The author, the leader of the inquiry, Mr. Justice Moshansky replied on Canada AM: "Yes, I think it is safe to fly in Canada. I think we have one of the safest transportation systems in the world. That is not to say it is perfect. The thrust of my report was to identify deficiencies which should be corrected in order to bring it closer to perfection".

The Transportation Safety Board estimates that its accident rate since 1988 has been slightly below the average of the immediate preceding years. The most important thing for Canadians today is that we have not been standing still and waiting for this report.

Again as Mr. Justice Moshansky said: "I agree that the Canadian skies are safe. We have one of the safest aviation systems in the world, however, that is not to say it is perfect. We must also remember that this investigation was regarding an accident at a particular point in time. Certainly some positive steps have been taken by the department to correct a lot of the deficiencies which we discovered during the inquiry," he went on.

The member for Hamilton prefers to fearmonger and pretend that the government does not adequately respond to safety concerns. Our response clearly indicates our positive approach.

I want to ask the member this question. Does this mean that he has not taken the time to read our 93-page initial response to the Moshansky report which was tabled in this House and which indicates, as the minister has repeatedly said, that we have already acted on 49 per cent of Justice Moshansky's recommendations?

Is it possible that the member does not want to talk about a response precisely because it does show just how much we have done?

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport has said is: What was deregulated was the economic burden. An economic burden? Is safety and the resources financially needed for safety a burden for this government?

Safety now falls on the altar of economic policy of this government and has its major operation, its gut and heart torn right out of it. Why? Because it has a system in place that says: "We want economic policy, tightening and rationalization to rule the day and safety be damned".

In response precisely to the parliamentary secretary's question: Yes, safety is there in Canada. Yes, safety is there. I fly. Most of the members in this House most weekends fly back and forth across the country, to their ridings and back to Ottawa.

As reported in Hansard, December 17, 1985, page 9522, the Minister of Transport of the day and now Deputy Prime Minister said:

> I would like to indicate unequivocally that this Government will neither propose nor permit any economic regulatory reform that might be detrimental to safety standards. That is the policy of this Government.

Do you know what happened? On March 10, 1989 there was a plane crash and 24 people died. That is what happened. But the skies were safe. Why? Mr. Justice Moshansky carried out this very thorough complete investigation of that accident touching on resources that were just incredible, the length of time it took, the people he spoke with, from departments to the man on the street. He said in his findings on page 913:

> It was known that significant increases in personnel would be required to meet demand,

Demand of what? Demand of deregulation. Yet such increases were not authorized, let alone acquired. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because the government has an economic policy agenda: save a buck. But wait a minute, we need more safety. Yes, safety is there right now, but we need more safety inspectors. Sorry, we will have to do with what we have but it is not enough.

• (1140)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question to my colleague deals with deregulation. He will know from his reading of the Moshansky report that in the spring of 1984 the Liberal federal government was warned of the realities of deregulation, that they were not ready for the kind of deregulation that was put forward by the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Also, the province of Ontario under David Peterson followed the federal lead and deregulated its trucking industry which created the kind of chaos we saw outside this House and in the Windsor area.

I would like my colleague to explain how his position today relates to the positions of the then Liberal government of Canada and the Liberal government of Ontario.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker I want to thank my colleague from the New Democratic Party for that question.

Back in 1984 the then very capable, visionary Minister of Transport of the day had a plan and a vision for this country that would incorporate what we are waiting for still to this day. We hope to get it some time this fall, a comprehensive, multimodal, intermodal pattern of transportation in this country. We expect that some time this fall from the royal commission on transportation.

In 1984 we heard the cries of industry and we understood what the demands of the public were. Yes, deregulation was a consideration. I tell hon. members that step was in its infancy, was going to be worked on and then we all know what happened. There was an election.

In 1985, this government, that has taken us through everything we have gone through in the last seven and a half years and that the Canadian public are just fed up with—if we could have an election tomorrow everybody out there would be saying: "Praise be, let us have the election. Let us get to the polls. Let us get rid of this crazy government".

In 1985 the government also realized: "Let us have a good look at deregulation. Let us carry Axworthy's banner and have a look at it".

They went to the United States. They formed a group and visited the FAA. The FAA by this time had seven years of deregulation behind it. For seven years it watched the industry under deregulation. And do you know what? It blossomed. There were a lot more flights, a lot more congestion, a lot more planes coming and going from airports.

The government said: "If that is the case, we had better have a look at what the airlines will need and the demands upon us by the Canadian public to ensure safety is there". What did it learn? The Canadians who visited, and I speak specifically of Don Douglas, Canadian Air Transportation Administration, learned that the Americans would have to hire 500 new inspectors and 1,000 new air traffic controllers. What did this government do? Well, it is on the record and it was not enough.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I too, wish to address the motion moved by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan suggesting that economic regulatory reform in the Canadian transportation industry has not been successful. I listened very carefully to his remarks, as well as to those of my colleague from the Liberal Party. There has been a lot said about regulatory reform and how it has affected safety. I really want to pick up on the safety of the transportation industry in this country, maybe more particularly air transportation.

The parliamentary secretary, the member from Calgary Southeast, stated that we did not touch the safety regulations. Safety is paramount. It is number one. What was deregulated was the crippling economic burden. The regulations, be they provincial, municipal or federal regulations, were just weighing the industry down.

In 1984 this government took office. It was at the request of the industry that it sat down to look at all the problems of the transportation industry. We did that in consultation with consumers, industry people, government officials, provincial government officials, as well as all areas of the transportation industry. There were seminars right across the country and indeed here in Ottawa. The transportation standing committee met many times—I was going to say hundreds, but I would have to check that—with regard to how we could move into deregulation and never, ever touch safety.

As the member from Hamilton West said, we cannot fudge safety and he is quite right. We did not. The regulation of safety, both in focus and by the reality of the regulations that are there today, remains in place. Indeed it has been strengthened over the intervening years.

With regard to the areas of accidents or injuries which none of us wants to see, they have diminished in terms of transportation over the past five to six years. The rates are down. The trend in accident rates for Canadian registered aircraft, for example—and I know my colleague across the way will be interested in this—has been downward, from 16.9 accidents per 100,000 flying hours in 1981 to 14.2 in 1987 and an estimated 14.0 in 1990. We can do better. Safety has to come first and we will not jeopardize it at all.

I repeat that the government categorically did not deregulate safety or de-emphasize the importance of safety within the transportation deregulation policy. I would not be doing justice to Canadians nor would anyone in this House be doing justice to Canadians if we allowed that type of misconception to go unchallenged.

Let me say that either the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan who moved the motion is perhaps misinformed—and I do not really think he is misinformed—or maybe he is unaware of the events.

The transportation sector is part of the basic infrastructure of Canada. Whether it is on rail, on water, in the air or on the road, it is absolutely essential to the daily economic and social life of this country. It joins the regions together from east to west. It moves goods and people from coast to coast. Its importance is reflected by the large part that it plays in our economy in terms of jobs that are created and revenues that the industry generates. Transportation services account for approximately 6 per cent of our gross domestic product, generating some $35 to $40 billion in revenue and providing over half a million jobs for Canadian men and women.

A strong transportation sector is absolutely important to the consumers and to the industry sectors. It is directly related to our competitiveness. It is directly related to how well this country does and our gross domestic product.

• (1150)

That industry, just like every other industry, is changing with the world. A lot of these changes that are perhaps difficult for us to accept are being forced on us by the outside world. We have to become more efficient. We have to become more competitive. We have to compete in the world. But safety has never, ever been on the table.

It is related to our competitiveness. It is what we sell here at home but more important, what we sell abroad where the transportation costs really play a major role. It is based in the final selling price of every product, every service that we sell. Low value, bulk, resource commodities are all major parts of our exports. The transportation costs can account for as much as 30 per cent of the final selling price. That is quite high.

We are trying to become more efficient and more productive and to rationalize. There were some jobs lost and we know that. However, there were too many truckers on the road to fulfil the need of the market that existed.

Getting back to the final price, the long distances we have to travel in this country from coast to coast, from tide water to tide water for our major exports really add a tremendous cost and are why some of our areas have not been competitive. For these reasons the federal government has always been and always will be committed to the future of transportation whether it be in the air, on the water, on the roads, or on the rails.

My colleague for Calgary Southeast was speaking earlier. He demonstrated that the government has put in place a successful regulatory framework that has improved safety services, choices, and has provided lower prices for transportation services for Canadians. Upon doing that the government did not just sit back. It went further and acted to support the transportation sectors with certain initiatives in certain areas to deal with problems they were having.

Let me give an example of our commitment to act when called upon. Last summer there was no doubt the trucking industry was having problems. It was financially suffering. The federal government stepped in. We have to realize that this is not just a federal government area. It also has to do with provincial governments. Of course it has to do with the truckers in the industries themselves. The federal government stepped in right then in order to find solutions to the problems. These were real problems. The Minister of Transport set up a task force to address the issues. It was under this government that the process of dealing with the problems and issues in the trucking industry, the way to find solutions, came about.

We did not abandon the truckers nor would we in their time of need. We stepped in to assist. The trucking industry task force involved many months of hard work, including meetings of all the key players, many independent analyses, non-governmental consulting firms making recommendations. At the heart of the problem for owner-operators was their low and unstable income. The studies done suggested that when economic recessions occur—and the whole world is in one—larger trucking companies reduce the level of work. Our owner-operators, in order to maintain utilization of their own vehicles and their own drivers, do this rather than getting out of the industry. Therefore the owner-operators have to accept work from whoever will hire them. This led to successive rounds of rate cutting in addition to the recession. There was a drop in traffic and it compounded the problem. Therefore we went in and met these issues head on. We tried to help in every way possible.

What the Minister of Transport concluded was a partial rebate of the federal excise tax on diesel fuel in aviation fuel. He realized that this was a problem. The rebate applies to the purchases of diesel and aviation fuel subjected to the federal 4-cent excise tax. The program provides for a temporary cash flow benefit of about $120 million per year to the transportation companies by allowing them to elect to receive an excise rebate of 3 cents per litre of eligible fuel. In exchange, businesses which elect to receive this rebate will be required to reduce their losses carried forward for income tax purposes. This was twofold.

The second area was an adjustment of the capital cost allowance rates. This was a major area involving the cost of their rigs vis-à-vis the United States and the major competition. The Minister of Transport along with his task force went in and made an adjustment of the capital cost allowance to reflect the actual depreciation better. We moved from 30 per cent to 40 per cent for freight-hauling trucks and tractors; from 7 per cent to 10 per cent for railway cars; and from 4 per cent to 10 per cent for truck and other specified class one rail assets.

This one move will provide about $30 million per year in income benefits to Canada's transportation industry, approximately $15 million for trucking companies and $15 million for the railroads.

There was a third area that the minister addressed. He also announced the formation of a trucking co-operative with $2.7 million in federal assistance. The co-operative will improve the financial viability and the competitiveness of its members through reduced costs by establishing bulk purchasing power for equipment and supplies of for-hire owner operations and by acquiring assistance of business management experts.

Finally the fourth area was a $3 million federal contribution as a start-up fund for a trucking research institute. This is one area where Canada knows it has to pay more attention to research and development and science and technology.

The institute will satisfy the need for focused research and development in the trucking industry and help address the current difficulties faced by truckers so that they can remain viable and that they can remain competitive.

Our government has also acted responsibly in overseeing the regulation of the industry. In this country regulation of Canadian interprovincial trucking companies is deregulated to the provinces under the Motor Vehicle Transportation Act. Under the legislation that was enacted in 1987, this act was to be reviewed within three years. A report reviewing the reverse onus test under the legislation will be submitted to the Minister of Transport in the very near future. Reverse onus allows applicants to receive a licence if they are fit, if they are willing and able, and if no other carrier or no other carriers can prove that they would be negatively affected.

This places the onus on affected parties to come forward and to make their objections known. One opinion may be to eliminate the reverse onus test which would leave in place the test of being fit, willing and able on the part of the applicant for the motor vehicle transport licence.

This test currently looks at safety records and at insurance as well. However, consideration may be given to include financial viability as a part of the test. I think this is one thing we will probably have to look at. The federal government is clearly doing its share and we can do more.

I really look forward today to the debate because transportation has to be one of our greatest areas and our greatest assets to make this country work. The federal government is doing its share in making the trucking industry viable, efficient and effective. We have not abandoned our commitment, nor will we.

As I stated at the very beginning, we are committed and we will continue to be committed to the future of this industry, but never ever will safety be jeopardized. We cannot do that. It comes first with the Canadian people, whether we are talking health and welfare, whether we are talking transportation or agriculture. Safety of the Canadian people has to come first, but the industry also has to be able to compete.

We need to look at ways to assist the industry in becoming more viable, more financially viable, making it more economically viable, providing it with methods and research so it can meet the competition head on. That is what it is all about. We need regional development and a trucking industry is there to support this.

We move goods from coast to coast by truck and rail. They are probably the most efficient ways. We have a good industry.

It has been unfortunate over the last few years that there has been a recession. Two or three of us have mentioned this. Obviously there had to be some rationalization. We had too many trucks and we had too many drivers on the road. It did mean some loss of jobs. In order to become efficient and effective and have a better industry, rationalization had to take place.

In conclusion, I appreciate taking part in this debate. I am certainly glad that the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan has put this on the table today. We have heard a great deal about infrastructure with regard to the first premiers' meeting. We realize that perhaps they would like more funding. That is in another department, another portfolio, but it proves that infrastructure is important. Whether it be airports, highways, seaways or freightways, we simply have to make sure that this country can work.

I want to say thank you very much. I look forward to continuing this debate and hopefully we can hear some very good suggestions and solutions to some of the problems that do exist out there.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague on the government side for her intervention in this debate.

She will have known that the recommendations of Justice Moshansky have created a bit of a stir in this House in terms of when they are going to be implemented by the government.

Justice Moshansky pointed out that there was an anomaly between the regulating of the pilots and the engineers and the cabin crew, the flight attendants. The pilots are regulated. There are regulations, as safety measures, that specify how many hours they can work.

This House, through the Standing Committee on Transport, in a review of the Aeronautics Act, gave the government the power to regulate hours of work for flight attendants, the motion that I made supported by the Official Opposition and, most important, by the government.

Justice Moshansky, not knowing that we had done that when he wrote his report, said we should do it. We are actually ahead of the game. The government in its response tabled by the Minister of Transport did not say it is going to do it. It said it was going to refer it to the Dryden commission implementation project. The government response says: "Concur action on the way, a new amendment to the Aeronautics Act enacted March 19, 1992 provides enabling authority for making a regulation respecting flight time limitations for flight attendants. The application of a new regulatory proposal will be referred to the Dryden commission implementation project".

My question to the member is why did the government choose this method when normally it would pull together an ad hoc committee representing the industry, the union, which in this case is the Canadian Union of Public Employees, and the department to draft the regulations that are workable? Instead, it has sent it off to this implementation project which has a whole range of things to do.

Is this the government's way of deep-sixing this very logical change in legislation as opposed to acting on it immediately so that flight attendants can have the same kind of protection the pilots do?

Mrs. Sparrow: I thank my colleague for the question. He has raised a very good point. There were a lot of excellent recommendations that came out in Justice Moshansky's report and I believe our government has acted on 49 per cent. We have taken specific action on 49 per cent of the recommendations. We are committed, absolutely and openly, to responding to and acting upon the 191 recommendations.

I believe that you were speaking specifically to the regulating of pilots and cabin crew, the flight crew attendants. The pilots' area has been addressed concerning the number of hours of work. It has to be addressed.

The Minister of Transport has set into place an implementation team that will be looking at the specific areas. There will be no duplication of services required. We have exactly the same goal. I agree with you that safety has to come first.

As I mentioned in my speech, never ever have we tampered with the safety rules. I really welcome the member's specific questions dealing with the hours of work of the flight crews. They have to be limited. You will find that the minister, through his implementation team, will come up with the same goal. I quite agree with you.

It is interesting how prior to the Moshansky report the government acted upon a lot of the recommendations. I can honestly say, and you will have to agree, that we did not sit back and wait and wait. We knew there were errors that we could respond to, or that the Department of Transport could respond to, in order to improve safety. You will find that we have exactly the same goal and the minister has in place an implementation team and we already have responded to 49 per cent and will complete the rest.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to congratulate the member for Calgary Southwest on her comments and on her speech. Her speech has certainly reinforced her reputation as a member of Parliament and an individual who cares, a reputation that was established in previous careers. Her comments indicate that she cares not only about the importance of safety in the transportation industry, but about trying to establish that very delicate balance between ensuring safety as a crucial priority and trying to solve some of the other problems within the transportation industry.

I would like to reinforce the importance of getting some of the facts on the record. I appreciate members for doing that.

There is some information important to reiterate here. The data from the Transportation Safety Board of Canada indicate that the trend in accident rates for Canadian registered aircraft has been downward from 16.9 per cent per 1,000 flying hours in 1981 to 14.2 per cent in 1987 and an estimated 14 per cent in 1990. The accident rate for Canadian railways has decreased from 17.4 per cent of accidents per million train miles in 1981 to 12.5 per cent in 1987 and to 12.7 in 1990.

• (1210)

The number of shipping accidents fluctuated from 1,075 in 1981 to 1,008 in 1987 and 1,202 in 1990. The data from Transport Canada's road safety directorate indicate that the motor vehicle accident rate has decreased from 133.1 accidents per 10,000 registered vehicles in 1981 to 124.3 in 1987 and to 107.3 in 1990. Preliminary 1991 statistics from the Transportation Safety Board all indicate an improvement.

I would just like to ask the member, in view of the fact that there is a significant improvement, what does she see that the government could do to enhance safety in the transportation industry?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Elk Island. He is quite right, safety enhancement is absolutely necessary. The main thing is to continue the safety research we have already undertaken in the various segments of transportation. We will constantly consult with the industry as well as the consumers. We will be reviewing the regulations and we will be discussing this with the Standing Committee or Transport. We will also talk to all the legislatures so that we can respond very constructively and very positively to the Transportation Safety Board of Canada. We are also open to any suggestions or areas of interest of ways of improving.

I thought I might correct my colleague who suggested, quite rightly, that aircraft accidents are down. There are 16.9 accidents per 100,000 flying hours. That is a little bit different from 1,000 hours.

When I spoke with regard to the transport minister's task force on trucking, we had a start-up fund of $3 million for a trucking institute of research. This is where transportation research has to be looked at, and no doubt there will be new modes of transportation, new types of engines, new hours of work for the cabin crew as well as for the pilots. We can always do more, but all in all we will continue to follow through on research and development.

In conclusion, I want to say that the report from Justice Moshansky with regard to the air disaster will be reviewed. As I said, we have already completed and addressed 49 per cent of the recommendations and will do so with the 191.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there are two ways of looking at this debate in terms of whether the government was correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate it if you would indicate if your party is going to split the time between speakers in this debate.

Mr. McCurdy: I am happy to so indicate.

There are two approaches that can be used in this issue and that is whether to deregulate at all and how deregulation took place in Canada as a result of this government's policies.

First of all, most Canadians see deregulation in the context of deregulation, privatization, the free trade agreement and the destruction of a lot in this country which has been constructive over the years and the recognition of the unique characteristics of this country.

Deregulation is very much like the free trade agreement in that in principle it was fine but when looked at in terms of the fine print, it did not recognize significant differences that existed and exist now in Canada as compared to the United States. There are a lot of differences that are inherent in our country such as the large distances, the thin population, increased energy costs and characteristics and considerations of that sort which have burdened the free trade agreement as well as the question of deregulation.

I want to deal with the question of deregulation primarily by looking upon its manifestations in Windsor and to point out in how many different ways the government seemed not to know what were the consequences when it got into this. Had the government committed itself to deregulation then it should have put in place programs, structures and policies which would have been able to somewhat mitigate the inevitable implications of the implementation of deregulation.

Unfortunately we got an indication of the depth and the complexity of thinking by this government when we heard the speech by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. I remember two things he said quite sharply. He said that if you have one plane in the air you will get so many accidents and if you have two planes in the air you are going to get more accidents. That shows you the depth of analysis that was conferred upon this debate and reflects the depth of analysis that was involved when this government chose to deregulate on the basis of relieving the economic burden on the transportation industry.

An hon. member: In the name of competition.

Mr. McCurdy: What this is supposed to mean I do not know in the context of saying that it has nothing to do with safety because obviously the measures involved in safety do confer a substantial economic burden both on the government and the carriers.

Windsor is a strategic point in Canada. It is the nexus of air, ground and rail transportation between Canada and the United States insofar as Ontario is concerned. If we look at each of the areas, trucking, air transport and railways, we are going to find examples of the impact of what this government did with respect to deregulation clearly manifest.

With respect to trucking, what we have found is that in 1989 there were 57 bankruptcies in Ontario of truckers. In 1990 there were 140 or so, and in 1991 there were 157. Each year after deregulation the number of truckers in Ontario going bankrupt increased. In Windsor, day after day, one reads of truckers going under.

I see behind me the former transport critic. He pointed out at the time of the debate, as so many others have pointed out, that the larger costs, the larger tax rates, the lower depreciation and all of those things, plus the habits on the American side of longer runs, longer days and bigger companies with lower marginal costs, without some help for trucking, would inevitably lead to its destruction if it is, at the same time, paired with the freedom of American truckers to come over and carry loads in Canada from one place to the other and not just between Canada and the United States.

The consequence of this government's deregulatory policy was essentially the destruction of the trucking industry in Windsor. The minister says: "The government has taken certain measures to help the trucking industry". What he should have said is: "The government took certain measures to relieve what is left of the trucking industry".

Windsor understands deregulation. We had the Ambassador Bridge blocked twice by angry truckers. We saw highway 401 outside of Toronto blocked by angry truckers. We saw right here on the Hill hundreds of truckers making their point known. It was only then that the government began to act to correct what could have been corrected, what could have been anticipated when it introduced its policy of deregulation.

With respect to railways—and I do not want to take too long with this—but we heard about VIA Rail having to take all of its cars on the Quebec–Windsor corridor off the tracks because of a mechanical difficulty. Mechanical difficulties seem to be showing up so frequently in all of those areas.

• (1220)

Even more important than the frequent discovery of mechanical difficulties on VIA Rail and the other railway carriers in our neighbourhood—and that is not by the way just Canadian carriers—what we see is an utter disregard for the mechanical problems that American inspected cars exhibit when they come into Canada which are unattended by the Canadian transport inspection system.

Deregulation is not just about safety considerations, it is about economic considerations. We have a situation now in Windsor where we have a railway tunnel that goes from Detroit to Windsor that both CN and CP use.

CN in the new deregulated environment is now proposing that the Windsor tunnel, which has the higher transportation load, that is, it has the most frequent crossings in Ontario, will now be virtually in disuse insofar as CN is concerned in favour of building a larger, more accommodating tunnel for the largest freight arrangements on the railway. The result will be the total displacement of the industrial focus of the Windsor–Detroit area to the Sarnia–Port Huron area. In spite of all that will entail there is nothing that government can do about it.

Deregulation is not just something that allows carriers to do things which are in their own financial interests if those financial interests disregard the interests of communities. It can kill communities. That is potentially what can happen in Windsor if CN is allowed to proceed with cold disregard for the interests of Windsor–Detroit in favour of moving its key transportation route across to the Sarnia area.

Finally, all you have to do is be in Windsor for a week, experiencing the cancellations, the delays and the failure to fly of so many aeroplanes because of mechanical difficulties. You begin to understand the impact of deregulation so abundantly cited in the report by Moshansky.

What we are saying is that this government knew when it introduced deregulation that there were a lot of things that had to be taken care of first. There were going to be more aeroplanes in the air, they needed more inspectors, there needed to be more intense safety inspection of both the crews and the aeroplanes, there needed to be more air traffic controllers.

To this day, we do not have enough air traffic controllers to take take care of the increased flights that are the result of deregulation.

The consequences to Windsor are all of those that have been predicted: cancellations and eliminations of flights and a significant economic impact on our city.

You do not have to pay attention to Windsorites who have been critical for five years of what this government has done. If you look at the Moshansky report you will see why: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 20 different reports that say that this government should have been anticipating what has now led to a crash in Dryden and can still lead to difficulties if this government does not get its head straight and make up its mind that it is going to take those recommendations seriously.

Deregulation was wrongly introduced in practical terms. Ideologically it was stupid.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I must say I enjoyed the contribution of my colleague and I want to follow up on his last comment about the 20 reports.

I want to read a quote to him which says: "Furthermore the committee believes that the necessary human and technical resources must at all times be made available to the Minister of Transport to ensure that he can carry out his responsibilities to maintain and improve upon the level of safety and security in the transportation sector".

This was not a committee of bureaucrats. This was not a committee of inspectors. This was not a union document. This was the report of the Standing Committee on Transport at the end of its review on Freedom to Move which was the white paper that started us on this process.

My question to my colleague is this: Is it shocking to find that Tory members of Parliament, who were the majority on that committee, who also were pointing out the dangers ahead of us by warning that the minister had to have the resources necessary, meaning inspectors, air traffic controllers and airport security guards, et cetera, knew what they were getting into?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of my hon colleague.

Of course, he is right. The basis of the findings of the committee report was common sense. There is a clear distinction to be made between common sense ideology and the actions of this government.

As I said, our present transportation critic and many intelligent, insightful people on the government side as well as within the Liberal Party were able to anticipate the obvious. The obvious was that if the major airlines were deregulated, they were going to concentrate on nodes. This meant that each smaller community would be bound to be served by smaller, less resourceful airlines that would cut corners.

Even in the absence of that, the very burden of increased flights really indicated the need for more regulatory resources. Many of those regulatory resources are supplied by Transport Canada.

At Pearson, there were two things that any idiot who did not know anything would have known. If there were more flights, there would have to be more and not fewer air traffic controllers, there would have to be additional runways and all of that sort of thing. There would need to be more inspectors. There would have to be a very careful regard for those new entries into the air industry.

None of that happened. It was not just the transportation committee. The Nielsen task force said the same thing. Everybody said the same thing because all anyone had to do was go and look at what happened under deregulation in the United States. Every problem that deregulation caused in Canada could have been anticipated on the basis of observations with respect to trucking certainly and with respect to air transportation.

In an ideological context we disagree with what the government did, but it has no excuse within the context of that ideology not to have done what its action required it to do: put in place the necessary measures to ensure the safety of Canadians. It did not do it, and of that it stands guilty. It stands guilty of so much in any case.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to support my colleague from Thunder Bay who has put forward the motion:

> That this House condemns the government for its unwillingness to concede that the deregulation of the Canadian transport industry has been a failure and in fact has led to fewer carriers, fewer jobs, higher prices, reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

I want to direct my remarks to the railway industry, but I want to also address the answer given by the member for Calgary South. In my riding which is very close to the Calgary South riding of the member, part of the highway from Field to Golden on the number one Trans-Canada Highway could be best described as a cow trail rather than a highway.

Where the federal government used to have control of transportation and the trucking transportation, they have allowed the provinces to reach agreements that are much less stringent. Highway tests were taken at Golden by the RCMP and many trucks had to be taken off the highway because they did not meet the standards. Large trucks carrying mobile homes or modular homes that are 30 and 40 feet in length used to have pilot trucks driving in front of them to ensure safety on the highway. Down through these heavily graded roads, through these sharp curves, they are now travelling without pilots.

I want to say to the member that it is not safe and there are going to be more and more bad accidents. Had this deregulation not taken place, I am almost certain we would never have had that serious accident in Vancouver in which an innocent family was sitting down at the waterfront in its car waiting for the ferry and that truck broke loose with hot tar and came down and smashed on top of those people. What kind of safety did those people have? That must come directly to the deregulation of the trucking industry and this government has to take full responsibility for that.

I want to refer most of my remarks to the railway industry because I was a railway car inspector for CP Rail for 19 years, from the early 40s into the 60s. In those days, out of the blue would come a government CTC man who would stop a train in the yard and inspect and not allow the cars to go from that terminal. Consequently they had to be switched out and nothing could be done.

Those kinds of safety precautions were important. We had car inspectors right across the country inspecting those trains. Every so often there was a spot check made and the safety was ensured and the government knew exactly what the conditions of those trains were.

Through deregulation that has all gone by the board now. Through deregulation the railway industry has been allowed to reduce the crews on those trains. It is hauling twice as much tonnage. The industry has been allowed to take the caboose off the trains. It has been allowed to put an electric marker on the tail end of the trains and made strong commitments toward it. Now it is reaching the point at which it is talking about putting reflectors on the ends of the trains. Can you imagine the safety of the trains with a reflector on the back and the curves on these railways and not being able to see that reflector until a headlight actually hits it?

There are signals and so on throughout the country showing where the occupancies are, but just the same, surely to goodness we have not reached a point at which we have a 100-car train standing on a piece of track in trouble, with a reflector on the tail end telling the next crew that the train is stopped. That is not safety.

I say to this House that we had better get back to regulating these kinds of things because if we do not, we are going to have some very serious accidents.

The industry also made commitments that car inspectors would be maintained at these points. It said that Cranbrook in my riding would be designated as a car inspection point. Last year, the railway cut back on the car inspections at that point. There are cars coming in from the United States on interchange. They are coming into our yards, not to the first terminal, the first point where it used to be when they entered Canada for an inspection, but coming on into the city of Cranbrook, into its yard where it has now a reduced car inspection group and it does not even know how safe those cars are.

I have reports showing that there has been leakage of chemicals in that yard. The response team that is supposed to be set up by the deregulation is not carrying out the provisions of what the regulations even call for. That response team, if it is going to be a response team to deal with the tragedy, must meet on a regular basis with the firefighters in those communities, with the ambulances in those communities and with the railway companies. If it does not do that on a regular basis, then it is not worth the paper it is written on.

That is the kind of thing that has taken place because of deregulation. I do not blame my union friends on the railway for negotiating because when they are negotiating to reduce a crew or reduce a system, the company offers them large buy-outs, large settlements.

It is not unfamiliar and not unethical for that trade union to want to support its members and try to get the best deal it can. It realizes that it is not going to be protected by governments. Safety regulations are not going to be protected by governments. If it is going to happen anyhow, it might as well get the best settlements it can. Naturally it negotiates for buy-outs and those kinds of things. That is not running a safe, efficient railway and that is causing the kinds of problems that we are having right across Canada.

The riding that I represent, Kootenay East, has probably one of the highest grades. The trains carry 10,000 to 14,000 tonnes a piece. They come down those grades and the hill from a glacier. After, they come through the Connaught Tunnel or the new MacDonald Tunnel and into Revelstoke. It is all heavy grades, heavy tonnage. There are no cabooses on the back ends. All of the crews are in the head ends of the trains when they hit Revelstoke. There are one or two car inspectors. There used to be as many as 25 or 30.

That is not safety. The air brakes used to be cleaned every four years. The air brakes used to have to be tagged, back ordered and sent to the repair track and new ones put on. Now it is unlimited. They travel across this country with the dust from the coal, the dust from the road bed going into those air brakes that are required to be clean and efficient at all times, carrying hundreds and thousands of tonnes. We have reached the point at which there is not even a mandatory cleaning date.

It used to be four years. Four years is a long time. It used to be four years and it had to be updated. It used to be 90 days for a test. The brakes would have to be tested to make sure the air did not leak and that the brakes were working properly. None of that is in existence any more.

That is what deregulation has done to the railway system. It is not safe and we are going to have more and more serious railway accidents across the country.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for a fine speech and an analysis of the situation. There are probably very few people in the House who have the expertise he has. He was an on-line worker with the railroad. I grant you that the member for Regina-Lumsden was as well, but it was a different kind of line, the telegraph line.

The point is that over the years there has been a body of regulation built up which this government is in the process of destroying.

I would like to ask the member why on earth were these regulations put in place in the first place?

Mr. Parker: I would like to thank the member for the question. He goes back exactly to the situation. We have a transcontinental railway system going east and west. Many railway cars would come in and tie on to us through the prairies and so on, coming in from the United States. Many of the grain shipments and car branch lines would be coming in. Therefore, the government of the day decided it could not allow a railway system to travel across Canada tagging on all of these cars that are coming in from other areas and so on without an efficient inspection.

The government could not trust the companies to do it, and rightfully so. After all, they are in it for profit.

• (1240)

There was a very efficient and a very wonderful Canadian railway transport inspection group. It was respected by all railway employees. When it came to town, the engineer set the brake and he would not move that train. When that guy came to town, he had the authority to stop that train. Nobody was to touch it. He would walk down that train and there was no funny business. At the end of the day, it was all marked by CTC and it stated that this car was in order. It took as many as 33 per cent of the cars off of those trains for defective hand-brakes, defective grab irons. It would make them go to the repair track. They were all marked and recorded. With that kind of an inspection by the government, it found the defaults even with all that system in place. Imagine what is going on out there today with the railway system.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask my hon. friend whether it is true about the reduction of railway car inspectors both by the railroads and the CTC.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Yes it is true and the unfortunate part of it is that in the days of these government inspectors, they were highly qualified people.

The car inspector had to serve an apprenticeship of four years in order to be qualified to do that inspection. Now we have lost that because there are fewer and fewer inspectors. There are fewer apprenticeships taking place and the railway industry is going to be in one serious situation if this government does not change its views with regard to deregulation.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the opposition day motion today which essentially tells the obvious tale.

The obvious tale in terms of the government's transportation policy is exactly that deregulation has been a failure. It has not worked and is basically paramount and equated with a government that does not have any answers or any policy program or framework with which to guide, nurture and shape not only the transportation infrastructure, but a very integral part of Canada's economic livelihood. Another aspect of the unity debate in the last couple of months and in the future months is the structure and the transportation role that the government has played in keeping Canadians linked with one another and keeping this large country from east, west and north united.

The government started talking about deregulation in 1985. Finally a few years later, through legislation, it realized that unfortunate nightmare. It preferred to allow the marketplace to dictate. It preferred to take a hands off attitude and allow the transportation policy and network go its own natural course. When we talk today on the floor of the House of Commons about its failure, we can define that failure according to a number of different factors.

The first one is that this government promised my former colleague in the transport critic portfolio, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, and other members of the caucus that deregulation would lead to great competition, increased competition in the marketplace. It would see the start of regional airlines right across this nation. What happened under deregulation? The reality now is that we are into a duopoly that may soon find itself a monopoly by one airline alone.

We have gone from regional carriers that existed before this government came in to a situation that is largely dominated by almost 95 per cent of all air movement.

I am going to concentrate on the air industry because my friend talked about the rail industry. We have gone from an industry that was beginning to become more versatile to an industry that is dominated and controlled 95 per cent by Air Canada and Canadian Airlines.

I have nothing against Air Canada and Canadian, but one of the commitments by this government was to further diversify the industry and give opportunities to the smaller regional air carriers to flourish and it has not. Exactly the reverse has taken place.

City Express used to operate in my area of Toronto and shuttle to different parts of Canada and the United States. City Express, started by Vic Papalardo, is no longer there. One of the reasons he is not there, not the only reason but one of the contributing reasons is that Air Canada squeezed him out of the market. Air Ontario, through economies of scale offered reductions that unfortunately City Express was not able to match over the long-term. So he kept extending himself and extending himself. Then the world collapsed around him. As City Express goes, so do other regional air carriers.

On the measuring yardstick of further competition, the failure is quite clear and obvious.

The government also talked about further competition creating more jobs. Well, with regional carriers going out of business and with Nationair, Air Canada and Canadian, we have had over 5,000 Canadians lose their jobs in the last 16 to 18 months just in the airline industry alone.

Where is the infusion of jobs because of this ideology to free enterprise, no government regulation apparatus, the opportunity to try to guide and make the marketplace fair?

The government also talked on this third promise that it was going to bring greater quality of service to the regions of the country. I question that because it can talk about the odd extra flight into one community or another.

But we should also list a number of the communities in northern Ontario, for example, Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie. Look at Atlantic Canada after the government gutted VIA Rail, after it cannot build proper highways with federal support. It also began to take jet service out of Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario and parts of the west.

Canadians are beginning to ask themselves what standard is at play here. If you happen to live in Vancouver or Montreal, or Toronto where we have the flagship airport into the major Canadian markets, there is frequency of service and quality of service in terms of jets. If you happen to live in Sudbury or Sault Ste. Marie, all of a sudden Air Canada pulls out its jets. If you want to go into Deer Lake you have to go by prop. Why?

We are discussing the very tender and fragile nature of national unity. Transportation tears at that fragile quilt because Canadians are seeing different treatment depending on where one lives in this country. Add cost recovery services on top of that. Atlantic Canadian airports are paying more proportionally than users are at Pearson airport which happens to be the flagship airport of our country.

Those Canadians living in those regions are asking themselves: Where is the Messiah that was supposed to be deregulation in terms of quality of service? On that note again it gets a failing grade.

We then enter open skies. Can you imagine if we get into cabotage and open skies? American carriers will be allowed to come into Canada. Do you think for one moment that American mega air carriers are going to give a darn about Deer Lake, about Moose Jaw, about Sault Ste. Marie, Sarnia or Sudbury? They are interested in the major hubs of the Canadian air market. That is where their bottom line is.

• (1250)

If the situation is bad now, what is it going to be like if this government does not draw its line in the sand, does not articulate the bottom line in a free trade arrangement in the skies?

We have already seen their bottom line with the free trade agreement. Never mind correcting that. Now they want to get into an agreement with the Mexicans and the Americans on North American free trade.

Where are we going to be in terms of quality of service if we allow American carriers the option of going wherever they wish in this country? We know what is going to happen. It is going to gravitate in the worst shape around those mega major hubs and again further exacerbate the gulf that Canadians are feeling economically now, depending on where one lives in this country.

Lastly, on this side of the House there have been quotes and quotes of my successive transport critics who have obtained assurances and guarantees from the Deputy Prime Minister down to the litany of hall of famers who have been transport ministers. They have a rotating door over there for the transport ministers. Each of them swore that safety was not only going to be protected but also enhanced.

Yet, what is the reality of the safety variable? Despite the government's deregulation talk in 1985, the industry started planning deregulation before it even happened. Rather than predicting greater volumes of traffic, greater air movements, greater passenger volumes and rather than plan safety mechanisms for that increased travel, we have had a reduction.

There are fewer air traffic controllers today than there were before deregulation started. There were 1,800 air traffic controllers in Canada prior to deregulation. We are now at 1,400.

In 1985 when the government started talking deregulation, it froze the number of air traffic controllers that were able to come out of the school in Cornwall. Rather than plan in anticipation of greater need, it froze the number. Why? Because it has this thing called ideology and it cannot move beyond that ideological framework.

Now the Minister of Transport is forced to scramble to push through more controllers in Cornwall. Justice Moshansky suggested in his report that we were short 400 to at least have basic minimum standards.

Do you know how many commercial aircraft inspectors we have today? We have 31 commercial aircraft inspectors. In 1988 there was a leaked confidential departmental memo that said for the period leading to 1988 at least 41 commercial aircraft inspectors were needed.

Now we are at 1992 and we are still 10 below the threshold that was established in 1988. And this government has the audacity and the temerity, which is a favourite word of the Prime Minister, to say that it kept pace with its safety regulation and safety apparatus.

In terms of open skies, if we are going to have greater American involvement in our skies I think it is quite well known that our safety apparatus is much safer than that of the Americans. What implications does that have for transporting Canadians? Are we harmonizing—another favourite word of the Prime Minister—positively their system to ours on a safety basis and not the reverse? I do not hear too much discussion by the minister on that when we talk about airline deregulation or an open skies arrangement between the two countries.

Justice Moshansky said it very brutally, clearly and frankly. I am paraphrasing, but he essentially said that the combination of a deregulated regime in the air and fiscal restraint has undermined the safety variable in the delicate equation that is air travel. That is essentially what he said, that fiscal policy and deregulation, the combination thereof, as our critic said was a collision in mid-air. And the victim was safety.

Now, we do not want to be alarmists. We do not want to scare passengers. I still believe that the infrastructure has survived this government to the degree that there is a basic foundation.

The premise of our arguments is that if there is going to be deregulation, if volume is going to be increased, if fleets are going to be making more movements—and they are aging fleets—then it is logical that the safety net of the deregulation must keep up with the times. But it is being reduced because of that fiscal ideology.

It is the same thing in the city of Toronto. The Minister of National Defence said: "On the basis of fiscal restraint, we need to consolidate the military depots from Moncton and Downsview and Montreal". Fair enough. So the government commissioned a study in 1990 to obtain the recommendation of which place should have the consolidation.

The report in 1990 by the productivity group gave four recommendations. The first recommendation on the most cost-effective consolidation was Kingston. It was suggested that based on defence criteria and cost, Kingston, along the Toronto-Montreal access, was the logical place to consolidate. The last, least suitable, least economically viable location in the entire Toronto-Kingston-Montreal access was Montreal. Where did the minister consolidate? In Montreal.

I do not want to pit region against region, or city against city. And I do not want to bring Toronto up at the economic cost or price of Montreal, because the shape of the economy in Montreal is equal or worse than it is in Toronto.

At the same time, I do not believe that those 300 Canadians in Toronto should be treated in this fashion. Three hundred job losses in Toronto, very definite, very concrete, very real. I have met with workers already and I have met with the union. I have received their letters, and they cannot understand the rationale of the government moving in this way.

As a Toronto member of Parliament, I would like a few answers from the government, if in fact fiscal restraint is one of its more important ideological compasses that guides its government activities. Because even if it was to be Kingston, then at least it would be seen to be fair. Canadians in Montreal or Canadians in Toronto would then be allowed to perhaps minimize the pain of moving their families and relocating to a new community.

I could sell that in Toronto. I am sure my friends in Quebec could also sell that to Montrealers. But what I cannot sell in Toronto is when people are puzzled legitimately about the rationale of this decision.

People clearly conclude that it has nothing to do with consolidation, nothing to do with financial savings. It has everything to do with the political mind set of this Minister of National Defence who fuels long enough in Canada to give us these crazy decisions, then jets off and we have to clean up the mess.

• (1300)

The other negative aspect of that is that the minister who hails from Quebec, a fellow Canadian from Quebec who is engaged in this national unity debate, by that very decision triggers anti-Montreal, anti-Quebec sentiments. Workers said things about our fellow Canadians that ought not to be said of. The minister has to learn that when he makes a decision that becomes nearly indefensible, he is contributing to the forces that he himself, and fellow Canadians in Quebec are trying to address, together with all Canadians.

What we have is an economic military decision that finds itself in the international unity mix. That is very, very dangerous. With respect to the case of the military depot, I wrote to the minister yesterday and asked that he and his officials reconsider. I am not even asking them to keep the Downsview base in Toronto at present levels.

If that is his decision, I will applaud that decision. If he at least can tell Canadians it is the most effective and cost-efficient and in the best interests of our national security, if those three variables happen to be found in Kingston, then this member of Parliament will defend the Kingston alternative. Otherwise this member of Parliament will be hard pressed to explain and give a rationale to workers who will be coming to my office tomorrow and Saturday, and saying: "Okay, there is a net loss of 300 jobs. Now what do I do?"

We know what the recession has done. We know what the free trade agreement has done to Toronto. We know that there was not any job stimulus. At least allow this government to maintain a current level of employment without a government action that says: "You will be the net losers of 300 without any replacement".

How am I supposed to keep 300 families believing in Canada under that perspective? It is the same thing when we talk about safety. It wants to deregulate, it is the government. It wants to increase the number of flights, it is the government. But it also has the responsibility to provide a safety apparatus that keeps up with the pace of deregulation and that does not fall behind and becomes victim to an ideological government that simply is looking not to the future but to the past.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague will comment on the last part of the member's comments. I have some sympathy for what my friend across the way has said about air travel. As you know, a number of us spend a lot of time on aeroplanes. I am getting frustrated.

In the old days when you flew out of St. John's you would have to phone to find out if the plane was going or not. In the last six years flying in and out of St. John's, I have only been taken out of that airport once by weather. Now, you just go.

When you arrive at St. John's at six o'clock in the morning, you cannot tell if the planes are going or not because there are so many bloody aircraft flying. You do not know what is going on. There are two Canadian Pacific 737s sitting there every single morning. There are two Air Canada jets. There is a 727 and now they are bringing in the Airbus, plus all the DASH-8s that are lined up along the tarmac. I agree with him. You do not know what is going on, there are so many aeroplanes flying.

Here we are, 560,000 people down there. That is the size of North York. We are sitting there. What do we have? Out of St. John's every day, there are 13 flights to Halifax. Ten of those are direct. Out of St. John's every day, there are nine flights to Gander. Out of St. John's every single day during the week, there are eight flights to Deer Lake.

This is unheard of and unprecedented. The situation in Deer Lake is quite serious. There are seven flights a day from Deer Lake to Halifax and six of those are direct. The situation is serious in Deer Lake. Deregulation has allowed so much increase in aircraft that it has blown the government expenditure. We had to build a brand new airport in Deer Lake, Tobin Memorial Airport. There it is, all walls and no roof. The head is right off it.

This is what deregulation has done. With all the 737s and the 727s and the Airbuses and the 146 flying around, including jet service from Stephenville to Halifax and Montreal, how can my friend across the way from Toronto explain this in light of deregulation when we have an unprecedented amount of aircraft, flights and seats and deregulation has supposedly closed us down?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I am glad my hon. friend along the way got up because he was not listening to the words I was trying to convey to the House and to Canadians.

I did not define Ontario as being only Toronto and he should not define Newfoundland as only revolving around St. John's. We can ask him about Goose Bay. What about Deer Lake? What about Gander? What about Stephenville? Newfoundland is bigger than St. John's, as Ontario is bigger than Toronto. That is why I tried to articulate, as a Toronto member, the needs of fellow Canadians in Sudbury, in Sault Ste. Marie, in Hamilton and elsewhere across the country.

It was also interesting that the member did not touch upon the whole financial, ideological bent of this government as I defined through the military depot. Perhaps one of the reasons was that between the gentleman's riding and the riding of the minister of fisheries from St. John's West, they essentially have 82 per cent of the small craft budget when both those ridings have the smallest percentages of the fisheries industry. Maybe that is why the member did not touch upon why the military depot, when it was recommended to go to Kingston for financial and other variables went to Montreal. That is exactly the malaise that this government has gripped itself with and it is a malaise that, unlike the government polling or strategist, a malaise that is very well understood and recognized by Canadians who will do something about that very quickly.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I will make it short so hopefully my other colleague can get in. Just on the same line, I want to ask my colleague from York North whether he recognizes that a lot of those flights referred to by the member from across the way are two airlines leaving at the same time going to the same destination. We certainly see in Ontario where Air Canada flies at nine o'clock and Canadian flies at 9.05 from Toronto to Ottawa or to Thunder Bay or Montreal or wherever. There is a lot of duplication, unnecessary duplication, and I suspect it is the same thing in Atlantic Canada. I have been at those airports where there are a lot of planes on the ground first thing in the morning, but by nine o'clock they are all gone. You do not see them again until four o'clock because everybody is sort of stacked up.

I wonder if the member could respond to that analysis.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the member, and I thank him, alluded to a fact that I failed to mention. Another promise of deregulation was that it was going to benefit the consumer in terms of the ticket price. This Deputy Prime Minister was the first to lead off by saying Canadian consumers, the travelling Canadian public, will experience reductions in air fare. With the only exception of advance booking months before, the average cost of a seat on any aircraft has not only increased, but increased at a greater pace than the cost of inflation.

That is another failure point. The member speaks generically to something that I would favour as an individual member on this side. We do have two very competent transport critics who are articulating the transport view on behalf of the leader and the Liberal Party of Canada. We need some form of government role, not to create greater bureaucracies, but to fill a very important vacuum that has been created by deregulation.

I believe that Canadians and the nature of our country require some form of re-regulation because re-regulation, or a form thereof, is one answer to the whole plight facing both Air Canada and Canadian.

If the aircraft industry in this country and the government can sit down I know that we can find a way in which both those airlines can live well and can compete well. We need a form of reregulation that, whether domestically or internationally, begins to address the situation logically and carves out that air space, rather than allowing this vacuum to make Air Canada and Canadian go at each other with the ultimate situation being the vulnerability of both airlines to the detriment of the interests of the Canadian travelling public and the Canadian economy in general.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on an opposition motion.

This Tuesday, the federal Minister of Transport made public the final report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario Crash at Dryden. This inquiry dealt first and foremost with a human tragedy. I fully sympathize with the survivors and the families of the victims of this crash.

At the same time, Mr. Corbeil reassured all Canadians that Canada's air transport system is safe. According to the Canadian Transportation Safety Board, the statistics on aircraft registered in Canada clearly show that in the last decade there was a marked improvement in aviation safety in Canada. In fact, from 1981 to 1991, the accident rate for aircraft registered in Canada dropped by 35 per cent. The minister added: "I promise to see this improvement continue".

During the whole three-year period of this investigation, seventeen recommendations were made, but while the inquiry was going on, the department implemented some other measures to improve aviation safety.

I speak today as the member of the House of Commons who represents the largest riding of all 10 provinces, not counting the two northern territories. The riding covers over half a million square kilometres and has more than 20 airports, some belonging to the Inuit sector, some to the Cree sector and commercial and other airports belonging to the Government of Canada.

Concerning the March 10 accident in Ontario, I have a newspaper article here from December 28, 1989 by Sylvain Blanchard. We can rely on it, because journalists provide us with excellent reports. The headline is: "Air deregulation in Canada: very few bargains, but improved service". The article says: "The changes were much less painful than in the United States. In 1985, when the deregulation of air transport began in Canada, the carriers acted like a group of savages at a feast. Some, like Wardair, that shouted on the rooftops that they would take over one third of the market, had indigestion".

The image is striking, but Robert Obadia, founding president of Nationair, paints a positive picture of air transport deregulation in this country. He thinks that Canada's experience was much less painful than the experience our southern neighbours had, where air transport has been deregulated since 1978. "Deregulation in Canada had hardly any impact on ticket prices," he hastened to add. "They continue to rise at the rate of inflation and the bargains one finds here and there are largely explained by efficient seat management. However, deregulation has considerably improved service in small communities."

Speaking of small communities, let us consider northern Abitibi and Air Creebec. At hearings on air service in remote and northern regions, Chief Billy Diamond, the founding president, was asking whether it was adequate. He said: "The Crees founded Air Creebec to provide air transportation along the coast of Hudson Bay and James Bay and inland. The company, which is run by aboriginal people, provides a reliable and efficient service which is constantly expanding".

And I could go on. Air Creebec strongly supports Transport Canada's new air transportation policy. As for the smaller communities in the north, in the Inuit settlements, Air Inuit, which carries quite a few passengers, says that the local landing strips were in very bad shape for many years. After considerable pressure, the federal and provincial governments have agreed to fund construction operations that should bring all airstrips up to standard by 1990.

My point is that both governments, the province of Quebec and the federal government, have invested more than $100 million under the James Bay Agreement—

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling that my time is up. I will finish my speech after Oral Question Period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Of course. Provided you are in the House, the Chair will be glad to allow you the remainder of your speaking time.

It being 1.15 p.m., I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

At 1.15 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Every year Canadians across this country look forward to the month of April as their favourite hockey teams take to the ice to do battle in the National Hockey League playoffs.

To many Canadians, hockey is more than just a game. It is part of our culture, part of our identity and a source of pride to us all. Hockey is indeed our national sport.

Hockey is also a business. Last night the business aspect of the game took precedence over the interest of hockey fans. As the players and owners failed in negotiating an agreement, a strike has now interrupted the hockey season.

While the players may lose pay and the owners may lose revenue, the big losers will be the loyal legions of Canadian hockey fans who year in and year out look forward to watching the Stanley Cup playoffs.

Players and owners owe it to all Canadians to make every possible effort to reach an agreement and get back out on the ice.

MOHAWK RACEWAY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, tragedy struck my riding last night. Barn No. 3 at Mohawk Raceway was destroyed by fire.

Dead this morning are 79 of Canada's finest racing horses, still lying in their stalls. Only 11 standardbreds were saved and that was due to the efforts of one heroic, and as yet unnamed trainer, who tried to battle the blaze himself before being defeated by it.

Among the lost lives is Scooter's Boy, a three year old colt which many believe had the potential to become a Canadian champion.

I want to express my dismay and sympathy for all those who raised, trained and loved these creatures. The loss is enormous to this industry, which is the largest in my riding. Of course, it is not just an economic loss. Destroyed were 79 athletes, animals of beauty and courage, which will be missed by all who knew them and cheered them on.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, a delegation of five New Democrat MPs has just returned from Washington, D.C. where we met with key players in the Canada–U.S. softwood lumber dispute.

In our discussions, it became alarmingly clear that the political agenda behind the U.S. actions is really all about free trade in raw logs. The Americans want access to Canada's timber resources and are using the countervail to beat us into submission.

The U.S. lumber lobby claims that if Canada would only lift its ban on raw log export, the U.S. countervail would dissolve. Representatives for U.S. Senators Packwood and Baucus stated flatly that access to Canada's raw log market is "the prize". They see Canadian timber as a resource to be exploited.

This is an issue of sovereignty. As Canadians, control of our resources is vital to the control of our economy. Canada's provincial and federal governments must stand resolute and say "no" to this invasive U.S. action.

GYPSY MOTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the potential plague facing our western agriculture, forestry and shipping industries is of grave concern to all of us. The Asian gypsy moth must not be allowed to spread. To ensure that it does not, quick and decisive action must be taken.

Agriculture Canada will spray next week to eliminate the threat. The agent that will be used in the spraying is Foray 48B which contains a bacteria that is eaten by the gypsy caterpillar, which kills it before it can take on its destructive moth form.

This is a naturally occurring bacteria that is not harmful to humans. The parties that have been involved in developing the Asian gypsy moth eradication program and verifying its safety include Agriculture Canada, B.C. Plant Protection Advisory Council, Forestry Canada, B.C. Ministry of Forestry, the Ministry of Health, federal Department of National Health and Welfare, and the Chief Medical Officer for Vancouver.

This agent has been used numerous times before in British Columbia as well as in the U.S. without ill effects. There is no evidence to suggest that this case will be any different. Some have attempted to suggest that this spraying will be a hazard to the people and the environment of Vancouver. However, this is not true and should be considered inexcusable fearmongering.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, if the government is planning to pursue its urban renewal program in Winnipeg's older neighbourhoods, which would also create the jobs Manitoba so badly needs, I would suggest that before announcing its plans, the government first provide guarantees that local people, including the business community, and also those in St. Boniface and St-Vital, will be involved in the project.

[English]

I would also ask the government whether or not it has any other plan for cities such as Winnipeg and many others in Canada, to try to create employment for those Canadians who want to work.

VIMY RIDGE

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Veterans Affairs is to be commended for the ad that was produced to mark the 75th anniversary of the battle of Vimy Ridge.

Veterans in my riding have often complained about the way Canadian history is taught in our schools. They say young people know more about American victories than our own.

That is why it is good to see the story of one of the greatest victories in our history. Seventy-five years ago this week, the Canadian Corps achieved what other armies before it had failed to do and showed the whole world what a young country like Canada was able to accomplish.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear that Canadians will also have a chance to learn more about the Dieppe raid. Fifty years ago this year, Canadians were chosen to test the defences of Hitler's continental fortress, and like the Canadian Corps at Vimy, our forces responded with a great deal of courage and discipline. These campaigns taught us a lasting lesson. As it says in the ad about the victory at Vimy, courage and solidarity triumphed.

GALLUP POLLS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, Gallup is giving pollsters a bad name as a result of political bias and really stupid questions.

Take today's question: "Should a social charter be placed in the Constitution to ensure national standards for social programs, or should each provincial government decide how to implement social programs in a province?"

What is a social charter intended to do? It is intended to produce the national standards for social programs, which, in general, will be implemented by a provincial government within a province, like medicare and social assistance.

I know what tomorrow's Gallup question will be. "Should one clean one's teeth with a toothbrush or with toothpaste?" Anticipated response: "Eighty per cent of Canadians agree that Gallup should be cleaned up; 20 per cent think Gallup is a horse". That is judging strictly on scientific merit.

VIMY RIDGE

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as you know, Canadians everywhere next week will pay tribute to the memory of those in the Canadian Corps who 75 years ago achieved what so many before them had failed to do in the successful assault on Vimy Ridge.

This victory at Vimy Ridge marks, in the opinion of many historians, the real birth of Canada as a nation, whose lingering colonial status was finally put behind it. This most famous victory was a tribute both to the bravery and the intelligence of those who participated. Canadian officers, most of whom were citizen soldiers, had no stubborn attachment to the military tactics of previous battles. In fact, their willingness to be innovative and to adopt new tactics was a key to their success. Moreover, every member of the Canadian Corps was given a role and an explanation. Each in reality was a vital part of the process.

We know what Vimy meant to Canadians 75 years ago. It also could mean much to our future if we follow the lead of that pioneering generation who, in looking up at Vimy Ridge, refused to be overwhelmed by the obstacles which faced them. They chose instead to see an opportunity to be realized.

Mr. Speaker, may we have the self-discipline required to follow in their footsteps.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, ACOA has recently published The State of Small Business and Entrepreneurship in Atlantic Canada, 1991. It revealed that R and D spending in Atlantic Canada is 35 per cent below over-all Canadian spending, 78 per cent below Ontario and 30 per cent below Quebec.

• (1410)

To close this gap a significant increase is required. The best incentive would be the situation where an entrepreneur could commit his or her own funds first, which would then yield a tax benefit.

The most effective method to encourage R and D expenditure is the ITC tax credit which is fully refunded to CCPC. Presently the Atlantic Canadian rate is set at 35 per cent. This rate should be increased to 60 per cent. This would be a welcome boost for initiative and creativity in the Atlantic region. This sort of program would be an indication that this government supports regional development as well as competitiveness in the 1990s.

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, it is important to recognize the need to establish a balance between economic development and environmental protection. The concept of sustainable development is being accepted in Canada and around the world as a means to achieve that vital balance.

Under the umbrella of the United Nations, the world community will soon join together in Brazil to consider the nature of the critical relationship between environment and development. A way must be found to ensure that new and effective environmental technology is available, not only to industrialized nations but also to developing countries. What is required in each country is a national environmental plan to define sustainable development objectives and describe appropriate processes.

The Canadian government has demonstrated leadership in this regard with the emergence of our own green plan. Our Prime Minister has demonstrated his commitment and leadership by confirming his attendance at the earth summit in June. We all know that we must balance development with environmental protection. Let us all work together to ensure a safer environment and a better world for our children.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, for several years I have been questioning the Minister of National Health and Welfare about breast implants and have asked the minister when he will provide answers to women who have had implants and who need help. The minister has consistently refused to help and has repeatedly implied that women with problems with their implants are isolated cases. Yesterday I received four calls about breast implants.

The first was from a reporter who said that she had been unable to find one woman who is satisfied with her implant.

The second was from a woman looking for a doctor who had some experience in removing implants because she does not want to be experimented on again.

The third was from a woman who was looking for a lawyer who knows something about the issue.

The fourth was a woman who had her implants removed and was not advised to send them directly from the hospital to a lab or a lawyer, thereby jeopardizing possible future lawsuits.

It is time for the minister to provide help for women with breast implants, instead of siding with the manufacturers through his continued silence.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, seniors across Canada were thrilled in the last few days to learn that the Government of Canada, in a most unusual fit of generosity, has granted them an awesome 37 cents a month increase in their pensions. These seniors are overwhelmed at this new-found government largess.

With those additional riches, a thrifty senior citizen can afford an extra one third loaf of bread or even a quarter of a litre of milk. With careful shopping, a prudent senior citizen might even be able to use the 37 cents to buy a can of beans.

If, on the other hand, their basic needs permit, this increase will mean a significant improvement in a senior's quality of life. A senior who saves the additional 37 cents every month will be able to go to a movie once every 18 months.

It will be hard for seniors to forget the government's generosity when the next election rolls around.

VOYAGEURS CANADA 92

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State, accompanied by Claude Taylor, chairman of the board of Air Canada, representatives of the private sector, volunteers and fellow members of Parliament, this morning officially launched Voyageurs Canada 92, a unique experience in the history of our country, in this 125th anniversary year. Voyageurs Canada 92 is thus in place, ready for the largest exchange program for young Canadians across the country.

I am very pleased that my constituency of Laval-Est is twinned with Edmonton North. This program will give nearly 37,000 young Canadians between the ages of 16 and 21 an opportunity to discover their country, its different regions and its people. Voyageurs Canada 92 is an investment in our collective future. I say to all those young people: Travel throughout our beautiful country, because you are its future. Have a good trip!

VOYAGEURS CANADA 92

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, this spring and fall some 37,000 young Canadians will celebrate Canada's 125th birthday by getting to know their country better through first-hand experience courtesy of Air Canada and the Secretary of State.

The 295 members of this House will twin with each other and will exchange young people from one part of Canada to another.

The program is called Voyageurs Canada 92. It will be the largest exchange program ever conducted for such a time period. Interested young people 16 to 21 years of age should contact their local MP.

And more good news on the national unity front. Today the Council for Canadian Unity released a survey done by Environics Research which revealed that 71 per cent of Canadians, including Quebecers, support the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

Congratulations committee and Canadian youth.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, once again, I would like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister a question.

Canadians wonder if this government will eventually stop confusing the issue. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said in this House that we would probably need a referendum, and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs supported that view. However, right after Question Period, the Minister of Justice said that there cannot be a national referendum, only provincial referenda. Then, a few moments later, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration stated that there should not be a referendum in Quebec with federal involvement, or something like that. And it goes on.

As I was saying yesterday, the Prime Minister spends money to tell Quebecers that the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is very good. But when the minister of defence returns from Paris, he will make a stop in Ottawa to tell us once again that the report is not good.

My question to the Prime Minister is: When will we have a prime minister who will take his responsibilities and tell Canadians that this confusion has lasted long enough and that the time has come to let all Canadians express themselves in a national referendum?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand my friend's partisan flights of oratory. I do not understand them at all.

He asked me that question yesterday and I gave him an unequivocal answer on behalf of the government. It was the same the previous day. I do my best to provide him with complete and honest answers on an important issue. A few days ago, the hon. member seemed satisfied with my reply. If he has a problem with that, I will be pleased to help him.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Prime Minister carefully yesterday. We have said on this side of the House that we want to help the government resolve the problem. Will he tell his ministers to shut up if they do not know what the policy of the government is?

I was on a radio program this morning in Calgary and people were telling me: "When will they stop talking about the Constitution? We are fed up. We have economic problems in Canada".

The Minister of Justice talking about the Constitution says something contrary to the Prime Minister; the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration says the same thing.

When will we have a Prime Minister who will speak on behalf of his cabinet and tell his plan to the people of Canada so we can resolve the constitutional problems? When can we face the real problems that Canadians want us to resolve, to create jobs for the 1.5 million Canadians who want the economy to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition asks me a very strange question on the floor of the House of Commons: Will I tell the ministers of the Crown to shut up? The answer is absolutely not. This is a free Parliament, a democratic Parliament and that is why we are here.

If my hon. friend is suggesting that there has been a violation of government policy, then perhaps he could bring that to my attention.

I can tell my hon. friend that in the past, ministers in other governments perhaps ought to have spoken up, ought not to have accepted the party line on a very important matter, some 11 to 12 years ago. Perhaps we would not be in some of the difficulties we are today if others had stood up and said: "This is not good enough. We will not put up with this. Canada must be made whole from the very beginning".

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister after seven years in government will know that a government is a government. The government should speak with one voice. When somebody in the cabinet does not accept the word of the Prime Minister, the honourable thing to do is just to get out of the cabinet and speak outside the cabinet.

I would like to know when this Prime Minister will end this confusion and ask his government to have one constitutional policy so that we can resolve this problem that is bleeding Canadians? They want us to resolve the problem. The hesitation and ambivalence of this government is creating a désespoir among Canadians.

The Prime Minister has nothing to lose. He just has to do his job and the people of Canada will be happy.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I still do not understand why the Leader of the Opposition feels that on something this important he has to surround whatever criticism he may have with such needlessly partisan observations.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, on a question like this.

Mr. Chrétien: I want you to be the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, I see.

I will say that when this matter came up the last time, I came before the House in 1987, having negotiated a constitutional accord which I believed was in the best interests of Canada. I brought it before the House of Commons and we initiated a debate. It was supported very widely by almost all members of the House of Commons. When it was not fulfilled, pursuant to the obligations of the Constitution in 1982, I came back and negotiated it again.

My hon. friend may have had disagreements with it, but I took the risks on behalf of Canada. I believed that Canadian unity was so important that we tried to achieve that degree of unanimity and unity. I brought it back again for full debate and support by members of the House of Commons.

It was approved by eight provinces representing 94 per cent of the Canadian population. That was a great exercise in Canadian democracy. It may not have been perfect, but it sought the end of bringing people together.

We did not succeed even though we achieved unanimity on two occasions, in 1987 and 1990. Some of the most eloquent support that we received was from members of my hon. friend's own party, and I thank those members again for that.

The fact of the matter is that we are faced with another challenge. I am going to commit every effort that I can and I invite my hon. friend to do the same thing, to make sure that at the end of the day there is one and only one important consideration, the unity of Canada. Not whether I am elected or re-elected, that is irrelevant. Not whether my hon. friend is elected or re-elected, that is irrelevant. The only important thing is Canada and the unity of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. For the second day in a row he has been trying to rewrite history and make excuses for his failure to successfully conclude an agreement. Whatever the circumstances, one thing is for sure, he made promises he was unable to keep. Those are the facts. And the person to blame for today's constitutional crisis is the Prime Minister, who made promises he failed to keep.

The Minister of the Environment knows that the Liberal Party—all members of the Liberal Party—tried very hard to obtain approval of the Charest report. It is clear that the dissenting voices were not on this side but on the other side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: How can we expect to settle the constitutional question, when some Conservative ministers cannot seem to make up their minds? We know how hard it is for some of his ministers from Quebec to conform to cabinet discipline, but we are amazed that the Prime Minister cannot even control his Minister of Justice.

When will the Prime Minister manage to control his cabinet and ensure the government speaks with one voice?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a federalist and as a Canadian, I really do not understand how the hon. member can make these highly partisan comments on an issue that is so vital to the existence of our country.

He says we should not rewrite history. I agree. The events are there, and historians will make their own value judgments. The fact is that on June 9, 1990, at a televised meeting in Ottawa, the Prime Minister of Canada and 10 provincial premiers all 10, signed a constitutional document, pursuant to which they agreed to approve the Meech Lake accord or have it approved, either by referendum or by a vote in a legislative assembly by June 22.

In one province, all three leaders—NDP, Conservative and Liberal—expressed their approval of the Accord. But in the tenth province's legislature, the vote that was to take place, as agreed by the provincial premier when he signed the document, was cancelled at the very last minute. If the accord had been defeated by a vote in the legislature I would have said: Well, that's too bad, but at least the MPPs had a chance to say yes or no. However, the fact that the vote was cancelled at the very last minute was a very serious development.

I am not the one to rewrite history and I would ask my hon. friend to read up on his history before making these negative comments about me.

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another question of the Prime Minister because it is obvious that what is at stake here is the future of this country.

The unity of this country is very important. It seems to us on this side that the government has been confusing process with progress.

We have had the Spicer commission. We had the Beaudoin-Edwards committee. We had the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee. We have had six national conferences and many millions of dollars later we are asking and wondering where the government is going.

Very recently the Minister of Finance said in this House that the bad economy was linked with the unresolved constitutional crisis. Well, we would like to be sure that the government is going to come forward very soon with a solution to this constitutional crisis. Unfortunately, we do not see this coming.

When will the Prime Minister come with the united proposal from his cabinet, a uniform final proposal that all Canadians could vote on and agree?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the challenge were to bring forward a united proposal from the Government of Canada, that would be forthcoming. Perhaps my friend has forgotten under the 1982 Constitution that is no longer possible.

The primary obligation pursuant to the Constitution that was amended was that the Government of Canada meet with the provinces and agree with the provinces on constitutional amendments without which we do not have the constitutional authority to move ahead.

That is the heritage of 1982. I am not being critical. It is simply a fact of life which means we cannot simply stand up in the House of Commons and say we are going to propose such and such constitutional change without the approval of the provinces.

The point that we have been making, and I think it is a reasonable point, is that we have engaged the process further to consultation with Canadians. They wanted royal commissions, parliamentary commissions, and the involvement of ordinary Canadians to the extent humanly possible. There were five major conferences, plus one that was devoted exclusively to aboriginal concerns. That was very important.

• (1430)

We are now meeting with the provinces with a view to seeing if we cannot come forward unanimously with a package that will meet all of the requirements of Canadians in terms of constitutional change.

I have indicated time and time again to my hon. friend—and I thought he agreed with this—that if we are unable to do this in spite of our best efforts then we will come before the House of Commons and report to him and our colleagues with a device designed to make sure that Canadians have an opportunity to speak for themselves in regard to this fundamental question.

I do not think there is any disagreement between my hon. friend and myself as to our ultimate objective. We are trying to do it in the most democratic and effective way possible.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians outside this House and another 1.5 million Canadians who are on some form of social assistance, many of whom have given up looking for work.

Today, Statistics Canada suggests there is a stall in the economic recovery, but the Conference Board of Canada goes further and calls it the slowest recovery from a recession in modern history. The Conference Board makes a direct link between the high unemployment and the recovery from the recession. Certainly the unemployed would agree with that.

In its last budget the government has refused to invest in a program like a community infrastructure program to get people back to work. The government's programs clearly are not working. Employment is not increasing in this country. I want to ask the Prime Minister: When will the government bring forth a plan to get Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has been referring to the composite leading indicator, which I remind her has increased for nine consecutive months. It stayed level in the month of January, but I remind her that real gross domestic product grew in the month of January. Housing sales are up by some 14.5 per cent. New housing starts are up by some 11 per cent. Motor vehicle sales are up by some 7 per cent over the previous year.

There are indications of a strengthening U.S. economy, but I remind the hon. member that the economy is weak not only in Canada. It is weak in the United States. It is weak in the United Kingdom. It is weak in France. It is weak in Japan. It is a world-wide phenomenon.

I think the hon. member would agree with me that a number of initiatives were brought forth in the budget to help the manufacturing and processing sector, to improve the investment climate, to preserve jobs, and to create new jobs.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians understand that economies may be weak, but what they need is a strong government in Canada that will stand up for Canadians and put in place some programs that will get Canadians back to work.

This government acts as though it has absolutely no choice and that it is powerless to do anything. A number of suggestions have been put forward by the provinces, by this party and by others that would get Canadians back to work.

The Conference Board today has confirmed that the employment results "of the past months are nothing short of disastrous". That has to be a serious indictment of this government's policies.

One of the reasons is certainly the Canada-U.S. trade deal. We only have to look at what has happened with the Honda ruling, beef exports, beer, all the softwood countervail, and so on. Now we see computers and textile industries being jeopardized by the proposed NAFTA deal.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Given what is happening in Canada now, given what is happening to Canadian jobs, why is the government intent on expanding a trade deal to Mexico, taking a bad deal, the Canada-U.S. trade deal, and making it worse?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I presume from that my hon. friend would not have us at the table at all and that she would like to have the Mexicans and the Americans arrange a trade deal among themselves that could disadvantage Canada, that could disadvantage Canadian investment and investment in Canada.

That is simply not the position of this government. We also see some good opportunities for business in Mexico. I remind her that there was a trade show at the end of January. We were looking for some 75 companies to go to that trade show, but because of the opportunities that were there 206 Canadian companies went down.

Automotive products, telecommunications, environmental products and transportation are all products or services for which Canadian business people see good opportunities in Mexico and through Mexico into the rest of the South American market.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. It is clear that this government has managed to export more Canadian jobs and products despite what the minister has to say.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the minister a question about a very specific area, textiles and electronics, industries that employ hundreds of thousands of people in this country. We learned that senior American and Canadian officials are saying that these industries are even more threatened than before because of the trade agreement between the United States, Canada and Mexico.

Here is my question for the minister. Surely it is time to end these negotiations. Once again, hundreds of thousands of jobs are at risk. Is the minister now prepared to end these negotiations, for the sake of Canadians and their jobs?

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: Protection all the way.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand how my hon. friend can say as a result of the free trade agreement there has been an export of jobs when our exports with the United States have gone up since 1988. Our trade surplus with the United States has gone up since 1988. The facts do not support the rhetoric that she is using.

As far as the particular question she has posed on the rules of origin for textiles and for electronics, she may be surprised to hear that she and I are in agreement. We are opposed to the position that is on the table between the Americans and the Mexicans, and we are fighting that. We are fighting that because the advice that we have received from those industries is that it would be negative for the position of those industries in Canada and in seeking access to those markets.

That is precisely why we are at the table: to get a good deal for Canada, a good deal for these industries, and to make sure that the national interest is protected.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know that the Leader of the Opposition and indeed members of this party have publicly acknowledged and applauded the position of the Prime Minister in Quebec last week and the posture of the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs in Alberta last week. We have applauded the Prime Minister and the constitutional affairs minister in coming around to the position that we have consistently taken on a national referendum and the need for a national referendum.

Through five questions today from the Leader of the Opposition and the member for Papineau about the division, the conflict and the contradiction within the Prime Minister's cabinet, the Prime Minister has not once said or acknowledged the need for a cabinet to be united on this important question.

Does the Prime Minister agree with those of us on this side of the House that it is important for a cabinet to speak with one voice on this question if we are to expect a resounding single and unified voice from the people of Canada on the need to keep this country together?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his original comments, his prefatory remarks. I acknowledged earlier yesterday the constructive views of the Leader of the Opposition and the member for Papineau in regard to some important aspects of national unity. When he talked about the division, conflict and contradiction, I thought he was talking about his caucus for a while and not necessarily anybody else's.

With regard to the question of unity, no political party on any great issue, at least not in recent Canadian history, has had total agreement on everything, but in the seven and one-half years I have had the privilege of being Prime Minister I have been very grateful for the solidarity and the support I have received when I have had occasion to speak for my party and my caucus. That has been true from the beginning, with some exceptions, and it remains true today.

With regard to the question as to whether the caucus and the party is united on the important question of the unity of Canada, there is no question about that.

Is it united on the question of putting forward new constitutional proposals that will meet the legitimate aspirations of Canadians from all across the country? There is no problem there. Is it united on the question of this being done within respectable and reasonable time frames that we are all familiar with? There is no problem there.

However, given the constraints of 1982 which force us to deal with the premiers to achieve a constitutional agreement, how it is done gives rise to differences of opinion. Those differences of opinion are not fundamental to the issue of Canadian unity. All of us in our own way are seeking to do the right thing, namely to keep the country together, as I think my hon. friend is.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of Canadians including many on this side of the House who are willing to participate in a crusade for Canada, but we have to know what the game plan is.

It is fundamental, whether the Prime Minister realizes it or not, that the Minister of Justice of Canada, that the Minister of National Defence of Canada, that the Minister of Employment and Immigration of Canada, that the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs of Canada, that the Minister of Transport of Canada, that the Prime Minister of Canada, that the cabinet of Canada speak with one voice in order that Canadians can have some sense of leadership at this time of crisis.

I ask the Prime Minister once again, because Canadians are begging for leadership: Will he assure this House, and through this House Canadians, that at least the members of his cabinet will speak with one voice, that he is presiding over a campaign for Canada and not presiding over the beginning of the Tory leadership campaign, a shocking example of partisanship at a time when Canada needs leadership?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, he was doing okay until the very end.

An hon. member: He got mad hearing his own voice.

Mr. Mulroney: Just for once in his life, Brian went on a little too long. I indicated—

Mr. Tobin: I will be in your corner in the campaign.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said he will be in my corner. That is one of the most terrifying things that has been said. Could I have a glass of water and think about that, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: May I say to my hon. friend that I think we are probably in fundamental agreement. That may surprise him. I think we probably are.

The fundamentals of what we are talking about are, for example, what I laid out most recently in Quebec City last Friday and in Baie Comeau last Thursday evening: the fundamentals of Canada, the benefits of a united Canada, the ferocious opposition that must exist to those who would destroy and dismember this great country. The fundamentals, the heart of the argument is there, well known and widely acknowledged across the province of Quebec and across Canada.

How we achieve constitutional amendment given the constraints of the 1982 Constitution, how we bring forward new constitutional proposals, when and under what auspices, using what instruments are questions for legitimate debate. These matters are now in the process of being considered by the country. At an appropriate time, when the government makes a choice and brings it in, the cabinet will support that decision fully. My hope is that the hon. member will support it fully because at that point in time it will be clear to him, to coin a phrase, that the universe is unfolding as it should.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the harassment by the United States of the Honda automobile exports from Canada is a threat to jobs and to future investment and manufacturing in Canada.

A United States trade official has admitted that what he called "ambiguous and contrary" rules of origin are at the root of the current dispute, adding that they were "badly drafted" in the existing free trade agreement.

What will the government do in the current North American free trade negotiations to ensure that these "badly drafted", "ambiguous and contrary" rules of origin are eliminated?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, before I respond to the question, just to make a point, colleagues opposite have tried to draw some spurious differences among our cabinet.

I would say that if you compare the trade position of the member for Etobicoke North to that of the member for Winnipeg South Centre, you will see a significant difference in the trade positions within that party on one of the fundamental matters of our time right now. I think the hon. member should be careful.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Etobicoke North.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I should conclude that the minister has no answer or he just wants to evade the question altogether.

It is not just automobiles which are the target of protectionists in the United States, as the minister well knows. Now U.S. negotiators in the current North American free trade talks are asking for a higher content requirement for Canadian-made computers. Certainly all that casts some doubt on the government's continued claim that somehow Canada won secure access to the U.S. market.

I will repeat my question. What is the government doing to obtain an improved definition of content requirements at their current levels in the free trade negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend mentioned in his earlier question that an American official points at the loose drafting in the original wording of the rules of origin. Both sides of the agreement thought we had a good definition of rules of origin. Clearly we are finding now with the Honda issue—he points out some other problems—that we have to tighten up these rules of origin.

This is something that we are attempting to do, working with the Mexicans in the North American free trade agreement. That work will help us as well in the event that there is not a Mexican agreement. We will be able to use that work to good effect in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Nothing is perfect in this world. I wish it were. But we are going to try to make it a lot better as we learn from our mistakes.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the Minister of Finance realizes quite how serious is the accusation from the Conference Board of Canada. It is an accusation that says that consumer confidence in this country continues to be extremely poor despite the efforts of his budget to make things better.

The minister does not seem to know on whom to blame the continuation of this recession. One day he blames it on the Constitution, the next day on Mr. Rae, today on the American economy.

Is it not time that the minister recognized that the problem is with himself and his government's policies and is it not time to change those policies for the sake of people across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have acknowledged that the economy is weak and acknowledged in the budget speech the fact that there was negative growth in the fourth quarter of 1991 and that the prospects for the first quarter of 1992 were not at all promising.

Having said that, I remind the hon. member that real GDP rose in January 1992. There has been a lot of activity in the housing sector, thanks to the lower interest rates, the moderate price of housing and the initiatives this government has brought forward, both in terms of lower down payments and the RRSP program.

• (1450)

The merchandise trade balance is improving. There has been a 4.6 per cent pick up in trade. It is an indication that the U.S. economy is strengthening and is having an effect on Canada.

In addition, to address the critical area of job creation and job preservation, we brought forward a number of initiatives that will help the manufacturing and processing sector both in terms of making them more competitive and improving their investment climate.

I ask the hon. member to make sure in his next communication with the premier of Ontario that he ensures the premier does nothing to undermine or nullify those very positive initiatives we have taken.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the Conference Board gave a report card on this past budget the minister brought in and said that there would be an addition of 0.1 per cent to economic growth thanks to that budget.

I want to ask this minister if he is satisfied with an addition of 0.1 per cent to economic growth when, in fact, that means there are going to be hundreds of thousands of Canadians kept off the job, out of work, not contributing to our economy and costing the people of this country and their own families immense amounts in human damage.

Is he prepared to accept that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member's conclusion.

As the hon. member knows, the budget projects that there will be 1.5 million jobs created over the next five-year period or roughly 300,000 jobs a year. We are not only going through a recession, we are going through a restructuring program which is causing industries, particularly the manufacturing and processing industries, to go through a restructuring and adjustment process as a result of globalization and more competitive economy.

We have tried to support industry in that initiative with very positive measures. We believe that there will be a growth rate pick up of about 2.7 per cent this year and more than 4 per cent in 1993.

Contrary to what the hon. member has suggested, I think the budget has received a very positive response and has served to improve optimism and hope for the future.

BANKS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or whoever is answering for him today.

While Canadians are on their knees begging for relief, Canadian chartered banks have increased service charges by over 365 per cent. But this minister, the government's so-called chief consumer watch-dog, has remained silent.

What action will the minister take today to confront Canada's bankers, protect Canadian consumers and prove that Canada's watch-dog has not turned into a lap-dog for the big financial institutions in Canada?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the minister has taken his responsibilities very seriously. I point out to the hon. member the legislation that was passed which resulted in disclosure is now part of the law, part of the manner in which the banks have to conduct their business. There was also additional competition that was approved in the legislation.

I put those forward to the member and I mention one other point. He knows and I know that consumers are the best watch-dogs for their own dollars and for the manner in which they are going to reduce their own costs. Again, getting financial services is still the best way to take a look at one's own interest and one's own concern. Many people in this House have said many times that the consumer can best protect him or herself by shopping for the best services at the best price they can.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting response.

At the same time that we have double digit unemployment, record bankruptcies right across the country and close to one million Canadians relying on food banks just to stay alive, Canadian chartered banks reported a record $2.2 billion in profit. That is 1,100 per cent increase in 10 years.

What will it take before this minister and this government realize that Canadian consumers have had it and they are fed up by being ripped off by big banks? They want something done about it.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will remind the hon. member again about the legislation. I would also remind him about the work that was done in the parliamentary committee and the testimony before the committee.

But I point out to him again that many of us, and I do not want to take it from any single point of view, shop around for the best deals. Service charges are not the same at every bank and the charges are not the same in every branch. We can, in fact, shop around. That is part of the marketplace and I would suggest that is still the best way to do it. If he does not like it I could give him some figures to show what some of us are spending.

CANADIAN JOBS STRATEGY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I would like to ask a question on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians whose UI benefits have run out, who are unemployed and who are in desperate need of training.

Can the minister explain why his government cut $100 million from the training fund of the Canadian Jobs Strategy last year and a further $110 million this year? Does the minister not realize that these cuts are gutting community-based training from one end of the country to the other?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the adjustments to the CJS project are not gutting training, quite to the contrary. Maybe the hon. member would be pleased to learn that we have increased training funds for unemployed Canadians by $400 million this fiscal year. We are going to be spending $1.8 billion to train unemployed Canadians throughout Canada.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the minister is trying to hoodwink Canadians into believing that this government is committed to job training. He knows that the amount of money being spent on job training is coming out of the UI fund, that the government has cut funds from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. People who are unemployed and who are not receiving unemployment insurance are in desperate need of training. These are the people who are being affected.

I would like to ask the minister again why is he gutting community-based training programs across Canada? Does he not realize that the most disadvantaged of the unemployed—women, youth, the disabled and visible minorities—are the ones more desperately in need of training?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Maybe the hon. member should get out of Ottawa, go to the country and see those people with whom we work.

The Labour Force Development Strategy that this government introduced is working on behalf of Canadians. We are working with the labour movement, with business, educators, trainers. I was in Toronto yesterday and I got a standing ovation from people in need of employment and training and who are getting it.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Further to the many reports which we received today, what does the Prime Minister think of the statement made by Mr. Parizeau, leader of the Parti Québécois, to the effect that it would be preferable to delay holding the referendum in Quebec for a year or two, in view of the economic situation?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that Mr. Parizeau has just scored a goal in his own net.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: First, he says that he wants a referendum as soon as possible and he votes against Bill 150. But in English Canada he says that he wants the referendum delayed for a year or two. I quote him. On March 15, he said: "If you ask me whether it would be preferable to make a decision on Quebec sovereignty today or in a year or two, I prefer waiting a year or two, because we will be in a recovery then".

So in Quebec, he wants the referendum right away, and in English Canada, he wants it in two years.

Mr. Parizeau also wants a sovereign Quebec with Canadian currency, Canadian citizenship, the benefits of the Canadian economic union, the FTA, a Canadian passport, the Canadian flag and the Queen. If this were a hockey game in Baie-Comeau, Mr. Parizeau would be playing for the separatist Quebecers while proudly wearing a federalist sweater.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

In speaking on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the minister will know that within the past week grave human rights concerns have been raised with respect to both Guatemala, where a delegation of respected church leaders just returned to Canada, and India in which Amnesty International has documented serious violations of human rights, particularly in Punjab and Kashmir.

I want to ask the minister this question. Will the government take serious action to implement the recommendations of the Interchurch Committee on Guatemala? What action will the government take with respect to the recommendations of Amnesty International and in particular with respect to the ongoing detention of Akali political leaders in Punjab.

What action is this government going to take with respect to human rights violations both in Guatemala and in India?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the hon. member's abiding interest in human rights issues, and I am sure he realizes our government is extremely concerned and is acting accordingly. In fact, he will recall statements by the Prime Minister to Commonwealth countries and members of the Francophonie that we would support those governments and take appropriate action.

As for the two specific cases mentioned by the hon. member, in the case of India, we have frequently made representations, both to the government directly and through various organizations, including the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva not long ago, and also last fall, in November, at the UN General Assembly. In other words, we are doing everything we can to inform the authorities concerned that we cannot tolerate human rights abuses and that we want them to act accordingly.

As for Guatemala, here again we are aware of the problems facing people in that country. I can inform the hon. member that we are trying to change attitudes and persuade governments to act accordingly.

And very briefly, Mr. Speaker, as far as our aid programs are concerned, very often, and I wish the hon. member would realize this, our programs are directed to the disadvantaged, and we are trying to have a positive impact on both the governments and the people of these countries.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Since 1987 the government has demonstrated its commitment to the people of northern Ontario through FEDNOR, the federal government's highly successful economic development program specifically tailored to the north.

As the minister well knows, the FEDNOR program sunset on March 31. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, who is directly responsible for FEDNOR, is touring the north at the present time. I am wondering what the government program is where that particular program is concerned.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend would agree with me when I talk about the enormous success of the FEDNOR program.

There has been an almost unanimous outpouring of support for it and as a result we will be increasing the funding to $60 million over a five-year period. This will continue support for tourism, which I know my hon. friend is very interested in, as well as small business.

There will be an additional office in Kirkland Lake and that, we hope, will help better the record we had in the last five years where 487 projects were approved to create the total of 3,000 jobs.

That is the record of success we know must be continued by this very good program of FEDNOR.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mr. Leonard Simms, Leader of the Opposition and Mr. Bill Matthews, both members of the Newfoundland House of Assembly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader with regard to the business of the House for tomorrow and for Monday through Friday of next week as we will be breaking on Friday for the Easter recess for members to return to their constituencies to work on behalf of those in the riding.

While the minister is on his feet, could he share with us any information pertaining to possible enabling legislation with regard to the referendum to which the Prime Minister has referred. As the minister will recall, I posed that question some time ago and I believe departmental officials had been working on it. Perhaps the minister could inform the House accordingly.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, today of course is an opposition day. Tomorrow the government's priority would be to ask the leave of the House to waive the 48-hour notice and proceed with report stage and third reading of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. The have not provinces are waiting for those funds. In fact, this bill should come into effect on April 1, the new fiscal year.

We will be asking members opposite for their co-operation in this regard. We attempted that yesterday but it was turned down by the New Democratic Party. We will try again this afternoon. If we receive a no again to that request then it will be my intention to call an allotted day tomorrow.

On Monday the government will call second reading of Bill C-46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, followed by report stage of Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act.

On Tuesday we expect to complete third reading of Bill C-31.

On Wednesday the government intends to call Bill C-49, an act to amend the Criminal Code respecting sexual assault for debate at second reading.

I would like to discuss with colleagues the remainder of that week as to what other legislation might be completed.

Concerning the referendum legislation, the Prime Minister has indicated all of our energies, all of our hopes, all of our aspirations, along with, I believe, those of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party, are working to receive an agreement with the provinces to achieve a constitutional amendment that will unite this country.

As the Prime Minister indicated, that should we require to hold a plebiscite then there would be discussions among House officers to find the way in which the appropriate legislation could be brought forward. In the meantime, rather than getting into the minutia, we should keep our eye on the ball, the ball in this case being the constitutional unity of this country. I will try and avoid playing political games with this important issue if the hon. member will.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member opposite has anything to fear from me. As a member of my caucus, and as exhibited by our leaders as well as other members in this caucus, we proceed in a way in which the best interests of this country come first, putting politics aside.

In response to Bill C-60, I just want to confirm for the government House leader that the consent the hon. member is seeking is to have this bill come before the House for debate. I know the hon. member is astute enough to recognize that we have given that consent and we intend to give that consent.

However, I hope the hon. member does not confuse our consent with agreement with the subject matter in terms of what the government is doing under the fiscal arrangements. We would like to have that bill before the House in order to debate it fully. I want to make that undertaking quite clear to the hon. member. It does not necessarily mean that we agree with all the substance of that particular bill.

Perhaps the hon. member could indicate what he might contemplate for next Thursday and Friday.

• (1510)

I know that is far off into the week, but is he thinking of continuing supply days or is there other legislation of which we might make our critics aware? Then they can prepare for the debate which will ensue.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, when considering future legislation, I am not sure how long is going to be required for the amendments to the Criminal Code respecting sexual assault, for example.

We also have legislation dealing with oil and gas regulations for offshore drilling that is important in terms of Hibernia. We have to bring that forward, perhaps, for passage.

There is another bill respecting the transport of dangerous goods which I would like to bring forward for passage. Of course, all of that depends on the amount of co-operation we receive concerning other legislation.

With respect to Bill C-60, I need to remind the member that there is another house, and the other place will require time to deal with the legislation. The fact of the matter is the failure to agree not only to bring it forward for debate but to complete debate within this week means that the cheques that go out to the have not provinces will not go out on time.

They will not be delivered until into May as opposed to April 16 and 22 when they are expected. That is fine. In fact, it will save a little interest for the federal government but cost interest for the have not provinces. I leave it up to the opposition to decide how they are treated.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, there have been several references to Bill C-60.

I would like to clarify if I could some of the points to which the House leader referred. He suggested that discussions had taken place to which a no had been answered. In fact, it is not the case.

Discussions took place at which we indicated that under certain conditions we were quite prepared to pass the legislation with extreme rapidity. One of those conditions was that we receive the chance to put an amendment with respect to this legislation in committee and to have that discussed.

It was something of a surprise to discover yesterday that while the very discussions were taking place with the deputy House leader of the Conservative Party, the finance committee passed this legislation through committee without the possibility of the amendment, which is quite important to all of us who want to see a much greater sense of urgency with respect to review, with respect to renewal and with respect to change in other major transfer programs besides this present transfer program. It was important to have that debate take place.

I look at the House leader's comments that he is open to further discussions this afternoon as a welcome signal. I look forward to seeing those discussions go forward.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that he welcomes those discussions but I see the chairman of the committee standing.

He will probably confirm that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor filibustered all day Tuesday rather than allow that bill to come through committee. Perhaps it can be confirmed by the parliamentary secretary that the discussions that the hon. member said were not held were in fact held.

Perhaps it can also be pointed out that what he is expressing in committee is Bob Rae's position that Ontario no longer wants to contribute to equalization and he wants to cut back the period from two years to one year.

That is legitimate, but he should put the motion and have it voted on rather than obstructing and filibustering. What he is doing in the process is delaying cheques that will go out to these have not provinces. Let there be no mistake. The delay of those cheques will be due to the activities of that member.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

[Translation]

I am willing to let the debate proceed, but the Chair would like to suggest that, considering the signals that have been sent, the three House leaders might wish to pursue their attempts to reach a consensus outside the House.

That being said, I am willing to allow further comments for a few minutes. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

[English]

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify one point that was just raised by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. On Tuesday the entire meeting was taken up essentially by that member on a discussion of this bill. There was an agreement that we would put this bill ahead of the other bill that was scheduled to be debated or dealt with in committee on Wednesday and that we would do it at 3.30.

I contacted the Liberal deputy Whip. I advised her. At 3.30 members of our party were there. The Liberal members were there. The hon. member for Windsor West was there. The hon. member for St. Boniface was there. We waited 10 minutes. No one was there from the NDP so we commenced the meeting. We passed the bill. There was nobody there to move the amendment so the amendment was not moved. It is not up to us, necessarily, to wonder where members are who are not there to move their own amendments.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I have just two quick points. I agree that it makes sense to continue the discussion.

The first point is that there has been a complete distortion of the position I put in the committee. At no stage was it suggested that we should delay equalization payments to provinces this year because we wanted somehow to block them on behalf of Ontario. That is simply not the case.

With respect to the comments of the chairman of the committee, I simply want to say that if there is not sufficient communication between the House leadership of the Conservative Party and the Conservative chair of this committee it is not my fault.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, whatever else the plans might be for next week, I certainly hope there is agreement to pass Bill C-49, the rape shield law, in a quick and timely fashion. I think we have been assured that it will move through the House quickly.

Will it be coming up earlier and will we have an opportunity to pass that bill?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, it is my intention to call it, to call it early and to call it on time. If we take up all next week discussing Bill C-60 then there might not be an opportunity.

I think the choice is the hon. member should discuss with her colleague from Essex—Windsor. This is what happens with unnecessary delay on legislation. I cannot commit absolutely, but it is our plan to bring forward that bill.

Mr. Dingwall: I am wondering if the government House leader could just confirm what I understand will happen if Bill C-60 is not dealt with tomorrow in terms of the time frame of getting cheques to those poor provinces across the country. He alluded to the fact that they would not get them in April but would be postponed until May.

Can he confirm that? Do I understand correctly?

Mr. Andre: The situation is that the other place, like this place, intends to adjourn at the end of next week. We have to get the bill passed through this House and over to the other place. They demand the right to examine it at second reading, committee study, report stage and third reading. On that which has taken our House several weeks to do, they react rather badly when we suggest they should do it in half a day.

Therefore, if we delay past tomorrow and some time to next week before we send it to the other place, there is a very good likelihood it will not receive royal assent prior to our adjournment. It will not be considered by the other place, in which case the cheques that I believe are due on April 16 and April 22 will have to be delayed until the bill is dealt with. That is the only point I am making. I regret that we are in this time bind, but that is what happens when bills get delayed for purposes of making political points.

• (1520)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to rise, but the minister suggested it was our fault that the bill was being held up and I want to correct the record.

The bill was not tabled until late February. It was only given two days of review by committee. If the government were that worried about priorities, it would have brought the bill in earlier. It would not have had day after day of opposition days. It would have gone on with government business.

This malarkey that it is our fault is just that, malarkey.

Mr. Andre: I want to remind the hon. member again of what happened. There was a meeting of finance ministers in Quebec City at that time to work out the details of new fiscal arrangements. Immediately after that meeting a bill was introduced in the House by the Minister of Finance to give effect to those agreements.

The hon. member is suggesting that it is quite appropriate for his colleague from Essex—Windsor to keep the thing in our House for a month or several days in committee. But we should be able to send it over to the Senate some time next week and it should deal with it in a few hours so that the provinces are not going to be denied their cheques.

The reality is that might not happen. Let there be no mistake as to where the fault lies if in fact those cheques are delayed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I invite both sides of the House to pursue their efforts to reach a consensus. Orders of the day.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRANSPORTATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Angus (p. 9219).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At 1.15 p.m., when the House took recess, the hon. member for Abitibi had 16 minutes left to finish his speech.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to continue my comments on the opposition motion. As I was saying, after the crash at Dryden, Ontario, several months later, on June 19, 1989, we read the following in an article by Frédéric Wagnière in La Presse:

> We need a second round of deregulation in the air transportation industry.
> A recent study predicted a 30 per cent increase in the cost of air transportation in Canada within the next two years. The increase was predicted on the premise that 98 per cent of domestic traffic is controlled by two companies, Air Canada and Canadian Airlines. The two companies share the same reservation system, which gives them an advantage over their competitors.
> In the case of commercial aviation in Canada, deregulation has caused rates to go down but has also eliminated regional carriers, which have been absorbed by the two major airlines.
> If regional carriers had been able to remain independent, the industry would have become more competitive.

In concluding, our journalist wrote:

> Generally speaking, the entire industry would be in better financial shape if it used its equipment more efficiently. This would mean more efficient use of airports and the services of air traffic controllers, since the fees charged for these services are the same whether an aircraft is half empty, with passengers paying full fare, or almost full, with passengers paying economy fare. Overloading is a problem today at airports in Canada, and one solution would be more efficient flight scheduling.

This was in 1989.

Pierre Jeanniot, in an article that appeared in La Presse on June 10, 1991, writes:

> Canada's transportation industry is at a crossroads. The climate of pessimism affecting the industry has spread to the commercial aviation sector. A new approach is necessary. In the seventies the emphasis was on airport infrastructures. To keep voters happy, the government, instead of building airports on the basis of need, was rushing to provide facilities left, right and centre, as a sop to the electorate.

This was in 1970.

> In the early eighties, deregulation became fashionable. The government wanted to let market forces prevail, which is not unreasonable, except that at the same time, investing in the future of airport facilities was no longer considered necessary.
> Fortunately, after a seven-year gestation period, a policy for decentralization is expected to be announced this year.

This was in 1991. In his article, Mr. Jeanniot also said, and I quote:

> Another suggestion would be to establish genuine, intermodal integration, combining railway and air transportation. The facilities of Dorval and Mirabel could be used as a single airport by providing for rapid railway transportation between the two. The experiment would not only be useful as a pilot project for renewal of the railway industry but would also make Montreal more competitive with Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue in the same vein, on the motion of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, which also mentioned roads. At the first ministers' meeting in Toronto on March 23 and 24, they talked about the railway system. I asked the Minister of Transport a question in the House this week on this subject. I said: "I understand that the Quebec government is neglecting highway 117, the Trans-Canada Highway in Abitibi-Témiscamingue. However, further to the First Ministers' Conference on the economy held on March 24 and 25, the governments had agreed to give priority to proposals regarding the national highway system".

When we talk about the highway system, be it the Trans-Canada Highway or other cross-Canada roads, all the provinces say that they have their own priorities, and that is important. For us in Abitibi, as far as highway 117 is concerned, it is really important that the road from Louvicourt through Val-d'Or, Malartic, Rivière-Héva, Cadillac and the Rouyn-Noranda area to the Quebec-Ontario border be completely rebuilt for the safety of users and the public. For many years, economic interest groups have been asking both governments for this.

It is time for both governments to become fully involved so that a remote region like Abitibi–Témiscamingue has the money to rebuild this highway for the greater safety of road users.

Another important area, Mr. Speaker, is the trucking industry. This morning, other members spoke about it. I have here an article published in the March 1992 Écho du transport. It says:

> On December 6, 1991, the Government of Canada announced a series of measures concerning the transportation industry. These provisions should in principle improve the tax system for carriers and subcontractors. By taking advantage of these measures, highway transportation companies should become more competitive, it is thought.
> To put this in context, let us give the measures affecting highway transportation. The government has done much in recent months, in cooperation with the unions, independent carriers and so on. They set up a two-year loss compensation program offering a partial rebate of the federal excise tax on diesel fuel to transportation companies in exchange for a reduction in the losses that they would use to reduce their income tax in future; truckers will thus be able to choose a similar rebate that is administratively simpler and is meant primarily for independent truckers; depreciation rates will be adjusted to better reflect actual depreciation, with the CCA going from 30 to 40 per cent for trucks, tractors and semi-trailers used in carrying freight; $2.7 million will be allocated to establish a cooperative that will use its buying power to help lower the costs of supplies and equipment for truckers who rent their services.
> There were many measures. Although the federal government adopted these measures to help the trucking industry recover, we must also keep in mind that this initiative of the Mulroney government finally recognizes that freight transportation is a very big business and that economic recovery is closely tied to it. Therefore it must support the trucking industry with economic incentives.

Mr. Speaker, this magazine article was written by Jean-Jacques Savard. In closing, he adds this:

> In my opinion, only a concerted effort of the federal and provincial governments will get the trucking industry back in shape. Ottawa has shown its good will. Given the present political context, Quebec must get the message and do its part.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the trucking industry is important, but all governments must get involved. It is not only up to the federal government. We must maintain this security in Canada.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan mentions rail transportation in his motion. Mr. Speaker, in Abitibi–Témiscamingue, we know that it is very difficult to find out what the executives of VIA and Canadian National, those Crown corporations, are thinking in their ivory tower in Montreal. For months, the workers have been trying to get answers. I have tried to obtain answers in this House by putting questions on the Order Paper and Notice Paper, and every time, the answer that comes back to Parliament is the same: it is confidential.

• (1530)

We have been fighting for months to maintain the railway network. One only has to look at the Franquet–Chapais case, one of the very few that was won by economic stakeholders, by workers, following a decision made by the National Transportation Agency in favour of the Abitibi–Témiscamingue area. Immediately after, CN officials and their lawyer, Mr. Cantin, came back with a slew of lawyers to appeal that decision. Today, the case is again before the courts, but I can tell you that one day the remote areas will win this battle.

A few years ago, when CN board of directors and members of the Saint-Laurent section in Quebec chose to make a detour via Lac Saint-Jean and go directly to Rouyn-Noranda, they penalized the workers of Senneterre and of the Abitibi–Témiscamingue region. Indeed, many jobs were lost.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by saying that this government works very hard, but it is through cooperation with the political parties, the unions, the economic stakeholders from across Canada, and particularly the provinces that we will be able to improve safety in the airline, highway and railroad sectors. There is a lot to be done, but we can do it together.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak on a very important issue to the riding of Kenora—Rainy River.

Of course, it is well known in this House that the air crash everyone has been speaking of in the last few weeks, to be specific, the Dryden air crash, occurred in my riding. It is obviously an area of tremendous concern to the people of Dryden and of course specifically to the people of northern Ontario, and to those of us who fly in the regions of the north on a regular basis.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank Justice Moshansky for the excellent report that he did, and the huge amount of work that was involved in the inquiry and the tremendous recommendations that were put forward by him and his colleagues.

There were roughly 191 recommendations to improve the air safety in Canada and specifically bring to light some of the difficulties that we have encountered since the advent of deregulation.

First of all, I want to say that I am somewhat disappointed in the government's reaction to the recommendations by Justice Moshansky. Justice Moshansky put forward some very comprehensive recommendations that are necessary, in order that northerners in particular and Canadians in general can feel safe about flying in airplanes, going on trips abroad or just going to visit their neighbours a few hundred miles away in this country called Canada.

What the minister and the government did say about these recommendations is somewhat hard to understand and very difficult to imagine considering the ramifications of not paying heed to the recommendations that Justice Moshansky has put forward.

First of all for those who are not aware of what the government has said, it is simply that it is not completely in agreement with Justice Moshansky's report. It feels that he has not been fair in making some of the recommendations that he has made.

In particular the recommendations suggested that Transport Canada, the government of Canada, were at fault in some instances relating to this particular tragic incident and some of the issues that are ongoing in this country relating to air traffic since the advent of the deregulation that we are now talking about in this particular motion.

I want to say to the government opposite that something is drastically missing and something is really appalling to me as a member of Parliament about this whole episode. I hope this afternoon we will rectify that. I would like to suggest to the government that it would be very appropriate to officially recognize the heroic acts of bravery by the flight attendant, Sonia Hartwick, who risked her life to save many passengers on that very frightful day.

Also we should as a government and as Canadians officially recognize the survivors of Flight 1363 whose lives obviously have changed drastically because of that incident on that very difficult day.

It is important for the government to officially recognize the importance of the town of Dryden and the people who were involved in making sure that the rescue process was done as quickly and as efficiently as possible.

Since the accident and the inquiry there has been no recognition by the government of the very obvious fact that there were some heroic people on that exceptional day who put their own lives at risk. They went above and beyond the call of what is expected of any human being, to see that justice was done and that lives were saved. It shows just how much respect we as parliamentarians and all Canadians have for the heroics of those individuals on that day.

I have been waiting in anticipation for the minister and the government to put forward that kind of motion or publicly make that statement. At the end of my 10 minutes I will be presenting a motion to the House which basically suggests that very thing. It is my understanding that all parties have agreed through negotiations with the House leaders that it would be appropriate to put that kind of motion.

Doing something even as small as that shows that we understand just how exceptional those people were on that exciting day. I say exciting because in one moment people were frightened and the next moment their adrenalin was moving. As an individual who was there the very next day, it was like being in another world. People have to realize just what that means.

One of the things I was somewhat discouraged about was in reading some of the official documents put forward by the department in 1986 relating to deregulation and how it would be dealt with. The individuals who put forward these documents suggested certain things should be done.

I want to read into the record a few comments of what is classified as appendix A in relation to improvements of safety because of deregulation. Also I want to explain the importance of surveillance and inspectors as it relates to deregulation in that context.

Let me read just a few of them and then with that I want to go back to the recommendations of Justice Moshansky. When the two are put together it will be seen just what is lacking in this whole affair. Let me touch on some of the safety issues. Let me read from the document:

> 4. 100 per cent of the inspection coverage each year remains a goal (not a requirement). Its achievement is being sensibly deferred in order to conduct more frequent and intensive inspections on higher risk activities and carriers.
> 5. The following initiatives have been implemented to determine actual inspection requirements, forecast future needs and ensure maximum effectiveness of the staff in this area.
> a) A performance monitoring system has been initiated. It will result in greater efficiency with respect to inspection functions.
> b) Dedicated training programs have been developed for regulatory inspection personnel to improve inspection effectiveness.

Those particular areas that I have read for you were also areas of concern in 1984 in the Auditor General's report. If you take a look at the 191 recommendations made by Justice Moshansky, he comes at this again. Practically all 191 recommendations deal with safety inspection and monitoring, but he goes back to almost identically what is suggested by management in 1986.

• (1540)

In Moshansky's report, chapter 25 dealing with management performance says in 105: "Transport Canada ensure that air Navigation Order Series VII, No. 2, section 5, be amended to provide a clear statement of the duties, responsibilities and qualifications for all air carrier management positions set out therein".

In 106 it says: "Transport Canada ensure that, once standard criteria referred to in MCR–105 are established and published, all carrier management candidate approvals be subject to such criteria being fully satisfied".

And again in 107 it says: "Transport Canada ensure the ongoing and adequate surveillance and monitoring of new aircraft implementation programs by Canadian air carriers".

It is hard to believe that, on the one hand, in 1986 they talk about the importance of doing these kinds of things, of making sure that there are safeguards and monitoring devices, when again in Justice Moshansky's report he suggests that what should have been done has not been done. It makes me wonder just what has been going on in Transport Canada.

In the short time I have left I want to touch on something that I think is very, very important. It relates to the minister himself.

It is very important that people realize the significance of this. I want to put this one thing on the record. In chapter 37 dealing with safety management in the Transport Canada organization it says that: "Transport Canada proffer for enactment an amendment to the Aeronautics Act to delineate clearly the minister's responsibilities for aviation safety. Such amendment should emphasize the minister's responsibility to ensure that the department is organized in a manner to keep this minister accurately informed of the ability of Transport Canada to deliver its mandated aviation safety programs effectively".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The member's time has expired.

Mr. Nault: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I could just finish, Mr. Speaker, I will go very quickly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Nault: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize if I went a little over my time. Ten minutes seems so short on a big issue like this.

I have asked members of the House on all sides to allow me to put this motion, seconded by my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon:

> That this House also call upon the government to publicly acknowledge and recognize the heroic acts of the flight attendant, Sonia Hartwick, the survivors of Flight 1363 and the men and women from the town of Dryden who were involved in the rescue efforts of the Air Ontario crash on March 10, 1989.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank all members for allowing that very important motion to be put on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minute question or comments period, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I just want to use this opportunity to support the amendment put forward by the member for Kenora—Rainy River.

The efforts of Sonia Hartwick, the efforts of the crash fire rescue crew in Dryden, the municipality, all of the people who risked their own lives in a lot of ways to assist the survivors must be commended.

I would suggest that perhaps at a later point the House may be able to be seized of the actual motion and have it formally adopted by the House.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Like my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan who has just preceded me, on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the House I would also like to thank the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River for his thoughtful gesture and add our recognition to the heroic rescuers, survivors and the people of Dryden.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Following consultations, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, seconded by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, does not meet the Rules of this House since it goes beyond the substance of the main motion. However, as there seems to be a consensus and since the Speaker's role is to serve the House, if there is unanimous consent for the incorporation of this amendment, I will be glad to submit to the decision of the members of the House.

Is there unanimous consent to incorporate the amendment to the main motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House today to add my comments to those we have already heard.

It is about time that we honoured on the floor of this House those people who did what they did with respect to helping the survivors of that crash and the families of the victims to live through this terrible experience.

I compliment my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River. I listened very carefully to his words. The amendment that was just passed by unanimous consent certainly addresses those issues that have not to this point in time been considered by this House, nor have they been referred to on the floor of the House.

I also compliment my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan for rising in his place to support the motion and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport who added his support to the motion. I thank both those two gentlemen and my colleague for bringing this matter before the House.

The substance of the motion today is to talk about deregulation and how it affected all modes of travel within our country, particularly air. This motion comes at an appropriate time inasmuch as we are considering the Moshansky report.

What we are talking about here when we talk about deregulation is deregulation coupled with financial restraint that happened at the same time. It is like trying to combine oil and water; it just does not mix. At this time, suffice it to say, when we try to combine those ingredients we need strong ministerial support and strong ministerial direction to ensure that those people charged with the responsibility of regulatory control and with the responsibility of providing safety to the air-travelling public of this country have had the support of those at the highest decision-making level and to ensure that they were not overworked and their responsibilities in investigating and training were followed through. Unfortunately this was not done. I hope all of us on all sides of the House have learned a lesson from this terrible tragedy.

Out of every tragedy there emerge Canadians who truly should be honoured as my colleague from Kenora has just stated. Not only should they be honoured but recognized on the floor of this House in some tangible way through which we can continue to show on behalf of all Canadians the thanks which they rightly deserve.

I know my time is short. Let me just talk about the three areas I think are important. One is the support shown by all the people from the town of Dryden led by then Mayor Tom Jones. He has shown leadership over the years as mayor of that wonderful small community. Their support and leadership were evident. In very adverse and terrible weather circumstances they were able to accommodate not only the families of the victims of this terrible tragedy, but also those who survived the tragedy.

I had the opportunity to sit through the hearing process in Thunder Bay, in Dryden and some of the hearings in Toronto. When I heard the evidence that was educed at the hearing and in the hearing process I could not help but admire every person who made a contribution from the town of Dryden. I, along with my colleagues on this side of the House, certainly give heartfelt thanks to everyone who made a substantial contribution, including the leadership of the mayor of Dryden.

Sonia Hartwick was the sole surviving member of the crew. What else can be said? We heard the evidence at the hearings and looked at the pain that she was going through in order to give this evidence again. She relived this terrible tragedy not only through her own evidence but through the evidence of those who survived and those who saw her perform in a very professional way and in a way that showed her empathy for the people who needed her help at that particular time.

I lack for a better word but, if I can paraphrase, if ever I have seen a heroine in my lifetime it was truly evident in her performance in this trying time. She truly deserves the thanks of all Canadians. I hope, as my colleague has stated, there will be something in a more tangible form to honour Sonia Hartwick who in our judgment is truly a heroine of this terrible tragedy.

We watched the evidence given by the survivors and Ms. Hartwick. We looked at her husband and her family during this tragedy. There should be some mention made of them. We saw the pain that they were also going through as their wife or daughter was reliving this terrible experience. As father of three girls you always put yourself, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, in the position of what you would do. I can only say on behalf of her husband and her parents how proud I am sure they must have been of her during that critical time. They should be truly thanked for the support they gave her after the tragedy and I am sure they continue to give her.

There is another group of people who are truly worthy of the thanks of the Canadian people. Mr. Justice Virgil Moshansky conducted this tremendous in-depth inquiry not only into the tragedy itself at Dryden but a further inquiry into air traffic safety and how the methodology of accident investigation is conducted in this country. He has shown, through the four volumes of his report, that there are certainly deficiencies in the process.

The work and the dedication Mr. Justice Moshansky undertook in this three-year process along with everyone that was associated, particularly the commission council, Mr. von Veh, certainly deserve, as my colleague has stated, the thanks of those of us who travel a lot on Canadian airlines and the international air community. I am sure they will take the sum and substance of this report and use it as a guide or a model by which all future investigations into air disasters will be conducted.

Just as an aside, I was truly impressed in the first several hearings that Mr. Justice Moshansky conducted a coroner-type inquest into the why, when, where, and by what means all of the victims came to their death.

I had to draw a parallel at that time because we were also involved in the Gander situation in 1985. It has been under constant review. I could not help but compare the quality of the investigative process conducted by Justice Moshansky and Mr. von Veh to the way the Gander inquiry was conducted. That one little episode could have helped family members in the Gander situation. Had the people responsible for the investigation in Gander even gone to the fundamental principle of conducting a coroner-type inquest into the reasons and by what means those soldiers came to their death, they would have satisfied the dilemma all of us not only in Canada but in the United States find ourselves in today because of an improper investigation.

That shows the tremendous importance and contribution of Mr. Justice Moshansky, his commission counsel, Mr. Frederick von Veh, and all the others involved. The lawyers representing the families, Mr. Chris Knutsen and Mr. Sandy Zaitzess, made a substantial contribution.

I appreciate the opportunity to have voiced my concerns.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the hon. member opposite.

I have listened to the questions asked in this House since Justice Moshansky's report was given to the public domain. I have also read the motion we have today. It seems we have a conspiracy which says the total fault of the aeroplane accident was deregulation.

I recall reading in the Moshansky report that there was also some error on the part of the people who worked for the airline in that they did not follow through some of their own prescribed procedures.

I am wondering how he could rationalize those two things and make sure there is a balance on the public record for the Canadian people to look at rather than see only one position put forward from this House as we have seen in the last couple of weeks, that it was an accident purely because of deregulation. Would the hon. member care to comment?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that question. We worked very closely together when he was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport and I was on the transport committee.

He will recall that our committee was instrumental in changing the deficiencies in what was then known as the Canadian Aviation Safety Board. We brought in a multimodal new concept with respect to the investigation of any accident involving trains, pipelines, or in the air or sea.

He will recall that we listened to the evidence given by Captain Norm Vindon of the Canadian Airline Pilots Association and many other people. What really came through to all of us was that there was no one single contributing factor to any accident today. Everything is just too complicated. I appreciate what the member has just asked, but I ask him to take his mind back to the time of that investigative process. It is not one single incident that causes an accident.

I would like to answer the question on deregulation. Although we had deregulation at the time of this incident and the Gander incident, it was one of the major contributing factors. It was not the sole factor, not the only reason why we had this disaster, but it was one of the contributing aspects that caused the accident in Dryden to happen. There were others. I believe the report states there were others. The report also states that it is one of the contributors toward this unfortunate incident and I hope, as I said earlier, that we can all learn from this situation so that it will not happen again.

• (1600)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon two questions. As I understood, he indicated it was not only deregulation but also financial restraint, including lack of support from the highest ministerial authorities, that together, working in concert, had a potential, extremely negative impact on what occurred. I want to know whether I understood that.

Second, while we speak of Gander and Dryden, and they were terrible tragedies, Canadians are also interested in whether deregulation, financial restraint, and lack of appropriate government support could lead to certain problems in other areas as well.

He could perhaps give two quick comments.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. As I stated earlier, the financial constraints that were imposed gave an unholy mix here which was almost like oil and water. On the one hand we have financial restraints being imposed by the Minister of Transport and the government through its endeavours. On the other hand we have deregulation. What does that mean?

It means that in the open market concept or the free enterprise concept anyone could enter the system. What we faced on the other end of the spectrum was a regulatory body which was very important within the air safety in this country and which was confined. Through the reports, the numbers were being cut back rather than being really even kept.

What we have here is a huge workload and a smaller amount of people who could do the work adequately.

Justice Moshansky addresses that issue when he says it was an unworkable combination. That is why I said at the outset that it was ministerial decision-making at the highest level that should be looked at.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate today because I am proud of the government's achievements in transportation. A strong and competitive transportation system is vital for the development of all regions of Canada. I must also applaud our government's efforts to reform the laws and regulations that apply to the transportation system. This vital change has been long awaited. I am confident that it will enable Canada to remain competitive throughout the 1990s, while providing Canadians with safe and reliable transportation services.

The principal objectives of the reform of the economic regulations that apply to transportation in Canada are to stimulate competition, to improve the price and range of transportation services and to encourage the development of key economic sectors in our society. As competition among carriers intensifies, the transportation sector becomes more efficient and effective. Our products thus become more competitive on both domestic and international markets.

Regulations have played a very important role in Canada's social and economic development. They met a need to protect the public interest and ensure the provision of adequate services at a time when markets were simply too weak and underdeveloped to count on competition.

Today, our transportation system, like other industries, has grown and matured. Regulatory protection is no longer needed. Furthermore, competition is much stronger today in all sectors than it was just a few years ago.

These reforms were necessary for Canada to remain competitive in the world economy. The area of Canada is extremely large, second only to Russia. Yes, Canada has many and varied natural resources and a large manufacturing sector, but marketing all these products requires long-distance transportation. Efficient transportation is therefore critical.

In Canada, the share of transportation in the total cost is 1 or 2 per cent higher than in most of the countries with which we compete. On average, transportation accounts for about 5 per cent of the total cost of Canadian products. For resources like coal, pulp, paper, and potash, transportation makes up about 20 or 30 per cent of the delivery price and even 45 per cent for some coal exports.

Of course, we can do nothing to change the long distances that our products have to be shipped to market. It is therefore crucial that we overlook no factor in our control that would keep our costs higher than they could be.

In late 1984, we determined that the transportation regulatory regime was an obstacle rather than an incentive to competition, both in Canada and abroad. Our regulations prevented the transportation industry from attaining the efficiency of which it was capable.

The main difficulty was reconciling the interests of shippers and carriers in improving the package of reforms. Shippers, especially captive shippers, were offered competitive choices through initiatives like competitive line prices and higher interconnection limits. Carriers obtained the management freedom that they sought, which lets them sign confidential contracts and not have to report prices, for example.

The legislative provisions are based on the following principles: First, safety remains the top priority. Transportation safety will be subordinate to no other objective. Second, transportation services exist to meet the needs of shippers and travellers. We cannot consider these services an end in themselves. Third, as much as possible, market forces and not the government should determine what services will be offered at what price. We will thus have a more efficient and economical system and be able to provide shippers and travellers with a wide range of services. Reducing the regulatory burden and government intervention will encourage transportation companies to innovate. Fourth, economic regulation must continue to protect the public interest as often as necessary. Given the weakness of markets in remote regions like the far north, for example, some regulations must remain to ensure orderly development of these markets and guarantee essential services. The disabled must have fair and decent access to the transportation system.

Finally, any regulation that remains in effect should be open, accessible and economical in time and money.

Let us now look at what has happened. First, the two basic laws, the 1987 National Transportation Act and the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, have been in place for over four years. Transport Canada and the National Transportation Agency are following events closely.

One concern raised in the debate on the new National Transportation Act was that regulatory controls were needed to ensure adequate service. So far, everything indicates that the markets are mature enough and strong enough to benefit from increased competition.

In air transport, for example, there is strong competition, not only on the long-haul domestic markets but also in all regions of Canada, with the result that the frequency of service has increased.

The reform of economic regulations has made it possible to better adjust the size of aircraft to passenger demand on short hauls and for services to small communities.

• (1610)

The greater number of flights and the better service that turbo-prop aircraft operators can therefore provide to travellers have dissipated the fears of a loss of services by jet airplanes.

These services are expanding in the north, where some regulations were maintained to protect already established airline companies, as well as vulnerable markets. Also, the legislation gives the authority to ensure essential air services. So far, it has not been necessary to use this safety device.

As regards the railroad industry, shippers and carriers work jointly. More innovative services are offered, as was hoped when we introduced this legislation.

The confidential contracts have proven to be very effective and popular marketing tools.

As you know, the interprovincial trucking business remains a provincial jurisdiction. As expected, achieving uniformity at the national level proved to be a challenge. However, the system works and truckers get some relief as regards regulations, which translates into savings of time and money. This situation is also beneficial to shippers, since they have access to a wider choice of carriers and services.

The reform also included the marine sector. The provisions of the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act of 1987 protect the public interest while also promoting greater competition.

I also want to mention an important reform regarding transport and handicapped people. Thanks to the co-operation of all members, Bill C-131 was passed on July 7, 1988. Those amendments to the National Transportation Act enabled us to determine and implement accessibility standards for every mode, something which was not previously possible.

Our objective is to ensure that handicapped people can use means of transportation that meet their needs while preserving their dignity. It goes without saying that the new economic legislation will not bring about a slacking off of the government controls regarding safety. The new National Transportation Act puts safety among its top priorities; in fact, safety is the main reason justifying the existence of the Department of Transport. I might add that numerous initiatives were undertaken in recent years to ensure and improve safety for every transport mode in Canada.

The measures that we have taken, as well as the global changes to the act are part of the gradual transformation that our transport network has been undergoing for numerous years.

Before Confederation, transport was a real challenge in all our regions. A vast uneven territory needed some links. Our original needs were met with the construction of a transcontinental railroad, which was the dream of Sir John Alexander Macdonald. Then, there was the St. Lawrence Seaway in 1959 and the Trans-Canada Highway in 1962 which both contributed tremendously to economic expansion and transports in our country. Our airline companies and our communication networks are expanding, thereby bringing the regions closer, to the point that we are now all neighbours within a great nation.

The transport modes will continue to play an essential part in the years leading to the next century. The transport network of the future will have to meet five fundamental criteria: (1) it will be safe; (2) it will be accessible to all travellers, including handicapped people; (3) it will be efficient and effective in the sense that it will represent the most judicious use of each transport mode: the aircraft, the railway, the automobile, the truck and the bus; (4) it will meet the needs of shippers and travellers; (5) it will be innovative, both in terms of use of technology as well as provision of services.

In conclusion, our new regulation policy has promoted a climate of competition which has benefited our country. In this fast-changing global village that is today's world, Canadians cannot act like ostriches and bury their heads in the sand, hoping that memories will drive away today's realities. That is why our government has given Canadians the means to take advantage of new opportunities and to face the challenges ahead.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying that I do not much like people who say: "I told you so". I am going to say it anyway. I told you so.

Not only I, but dozens of others, knowledgeable experts nationally and internationally in transportation, warned the Conservative government and the previous Liberal government repeatedly about the problems they would face bringing in deregulation. Neither the present government nor its predecessor listened.

When the transport committee was holding hearings for about a year and a half on the white paper called "Freedom to Move", which really meant deregulation, I said that the government was going to kill some more people. It has.

I served for 21 years continuously on the transport committee. I have 15 years experience on Canadian Pacific Railway. I know a little bit about it, but I sure as heck am not an expert.

My problem, in those 21 years on the transport committee, was being continually surrounded by amateurs who did not know one end of a boxcar from the other. My hon. friend, the Solicitor General, whom I like very much, I must rank among those who did not know the difference.

Transport was the largest department in the government the last time I checked. If it is not now, it is in the top three. Here is the kind of attention and priority this government since 1984 and the previous Liberal government gave to that department.

We have had 13 transport ministers in the past 24 years. There were six Tories in eight years and seven Liberals in 15 years. They served anywhere from one month to 44 months. The one with the record of 44 months was the unlamented Otto Lang, who started all this. They are fine people. I like them individually and there is nothing personal about this.

They were amateurs, they were in a department in which they were not the slightest bit interested. It was not their cup of tea but they had no choice but to do whatever the officials of the department said because they did not know any better.

We have had seven or eight Ministers of State for Transport. They were supposed to relieve and take some of the huge load off the backs of the Ministers of Transport. None was any help.

Going through and recalling what occurred when the transport committee held those hearings on Freedom to Move, and thinking of the witnesses who appeared, it was obvious then that the new Conservative government was on an ideological binge that the bottom line syndrome, deregulated transportation, competition and so-called free enterprise would be the priority, the guiding policy of the government.

• (1620)

We in the NDP, and before that the CCF, are accused of being ideologues. When it comes to ideology, we were amateurs compared to these birds.

When one looks at trucking, it is a jungle out there. There are thirteen jurisdictions with different regulations and rules. Under our Constitution, interprovincial and international trucking are under the jurisdiction of the national government. It vacated it and turned it over to the provinces and territories. When it brought in deregulation, it was warned and told not to do so until it had some co-ordination and identical rules and regulations regarding safety, load limits, speed limits, whatever, jointly arrived at by the provinces, territories and the national government. Some efforts have been made but most of it still has not happened.

Regarding the railroads, the most efficient and environmentally friendly mode of transportation, the government is doing all it can to abandon railway lines. We particularly noticed this in western Canada, although I note it is now happening to a large degree in Ontario and Quebec over the last couple of years.

Grain has to be trucked further because of the abandoned branch lines in the prairie provinces. It means that you have to have larger trucks. One hundred cars of grain will move as much grain as three to four hundred trucks. The beauty of the ideological binge the government is on is that the railroads get out from undermaintaining and improving railway branch lines. The government gets out of its responsibility of making them run a good railroad, and the costs are shifted to the provinces and the municipalities.

There are the airlines. I want to point out two of the witnesses who appeared before the committee when we dealt with the white paper and with legislation. We had difficulty getting one of them accepted by the committee as a witness on his own. He appeared as a member of another delegation. I refer to one John Nance, and I invite my colleagues to read his book. Mr. Nance is a commercial airline pilot, a recognized national and international expert. He was on television the other night as a result of the New York incident. He sure is no socialist but he warned, pleaded with and begged us not to bring in deregulation until we have everything in place necessary to keep safe, efficient and properly maintained and equipped airlines and staff.

He urged us not to make the same mistake that was made in the United States. We have to have in place a sufficient number of air traffic controllers and back-up controller staff. We have to have in place a sufficient number of civil aircraft inspectors. We have to have in place increased training of air traffic controllers and civilian aircraft inspectors. It takes several years to become either one of those. They are high-stress jobs. Some of them do not last long. They have to be replaced fairly frequently. He told us that.

Then the immediate past president, head of the Federal Aviation Administration in the United States, the governing body of airlines down there, the regulatory body similar to our CTC, said the same thing. He urged us not to make the mistakes that the United States made by deregulating too quickly before government, airlines, airports and regulators were ready and prepared for it. We got the same message from him. Again, the government would not listen and chose not to believe him.

The figures the Minister of Transport cited were the statistics for all aircraft movements. He did not tell about just the commercial airlines. The figures are abysmal. The figures prove that deregulation has harmed safety in the air and among commercial aircraft in Canada.

To some people who have not learned anything since, the theory was, and with some it still is, that deregulation would increase competition, would lower fares and give a better deal for the consuming public. What has happened? It is so ridiculous it is laughable.

I have a list here of 39 carriers in the United States. Of those 39, 10 are bankrupt, some pretty large ones too. Eastern Airlines, for example, which used to be one of the largest, went belly-up. There were 17 takeovers by the present existing airlines and 1 merger. Out of those 39, 10 are still operating. So much for increased competition.

Then we come to Canada. Prior to deregulation we had four regional carriers, medium-sized airline operations. A couple of them were doing okay. One was borderline, one was having troubles. We had Air Canada, Canadian Pacific and Wardair.

Max Ward was one of those who appeared before the committee more than once. He is a nice guy. He even gave me a ride in his limousine back to the hotel after a hearing one night when we had a knock down, drag 'em out argument. Max said to us: "Leave me alone. I don't want any subsidies. I don't need all these regulations. All I want to do is operate my charter airline. I'm not interested in domestic routes." Within a year or so of deregulation, who was down in Ottawa pleading and begging for domestic routes? Max Ward, that great entrepreneur of the international charter airlines.

I do not know that Max was hurt all that much personally, but we know what happened to Wardair. It was sort of taken over. I doubt if it got its money, its market value. Canadian Airlines International Ltd. acquired Wardair in 1989.

To go back to 1983, Pacific Western took over Time Air. In 1984, CP Air acquired Eastern Provincial Airways. Innocan Inc. acquired Nordair. A year or so later, Innocan, which had acquired Nordair, was taken over. In 1985, Air Canada and Pacific Western each acquired 24.5 per cent of Air Ontario. So much for competition. Canadian Pacific helped establish Nordair Metro. So much for some more competition. Nordair Metro acquired Quebecair. Talk about banditry. Bank robbers are amateurs.

In 1986 Air Canada acquired 49 per cent of Air Nova. There went some more competition. PWA in 1987 acquired CP Air for $300 million. It was great for the CP Limited shareholders but did not do much for increased competition due to deregulation.

The more one goes through this you do not know whether to break into hysterical laughter or throw up.

In 1988 Air Canada acquired 90 per cent of Northwest Territorial Airlines. Now it is into the territories. In 1990 Air Canada was reported to have outbid TWA to acquire Air Toronto, a commuter carrier to some U.S. cities. This sale was not completed by the end of May 1990 but I think it has been since.

What happened? We have two airlines that acquired several other outfits that were jerkwater, fly-by-night, two-bit operations. They are now called Canadian Airlines' partners and Air Canada's partners. Some partners. All those partners can do is take over the short haul, small numbers routes at the orders of Canadian or Air Canada.

Some of the flights out of the smaller and medium-sized cities in Canada, and I use as an example my city of Regina, are the short-haul routes: Regina-Saskatoon-Edmonton-Calgary-Winnipeg. The planes are not held together with chewing gum and rubber bands but they are propeller driven and might go 280 to 300 nautical miles per hour. It is a lesser service. But under deregulation we are supposed to get better service. This is a lesser service.

As we predicted and as the government was warned during their white paper discussions, it would mean lesser and poorer service to the small and middle sized cities in Canada. The government conveniently ignored that and forgot that there is more to Canada than Montreal, Toronto, Halifax and Vancouver.

If the government is really serious about safety being its number one priority, and we have heard that from every one of the 13 ministers of transport we have had in 24 years, that is less than two years each. One of them, the hon. member for Vegreville, a good buddy who sat on the committee with me for a number of years, only served nine months one period, just barely the gestation period. But if it is deadly serious, why does the government not fill the 70 vacant safety inspector positions, as pointed out by the aircraft operations group which represents the 500 civil aviation inspectors who work for Transport Canada and the Transportation Safety Board? Seventy unfilled positions for inspectors. Why did the Minister of Transport not announce yesterday those positions were being filled?

Remember a couple of years ago the government brought 40-some air traffic controllers who had been fired in the United States to Canada, gave them a refresher course and put them to work because we were desperate for air traffic controllers. If it is deadly serious, it will hire, train and put to work the dozens more air traffic controllers that we desperately need.

Deregulation has been a disaster. It will continue to be so until we re-regulate and enforce what is required to keep our civil air traffic safer than it is now.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am always amazed at the amount of knowledge that my colleague, the member for Regina—Lumsden, has about transportation. With very few notes he is able to remind us of a number of things that people have said and done over not just the deregulation debate of the last six to eight years, but for a greater period of time.

I say that by way of a preamble because I want to ask him about statements made by the head of Canadian Airlines, Rhys Eyton, when he promised that when Wardair was taken over it would continue to operate as Wardair. It would not be gobbled up, it would not become part of Canadian Airlines.

I am going to ask my colleague for his interpretation of the words of that same individual today, when he says that American Airlines buying 25 per cent of Canadian will allow Canadian to operate independently, that Canadian will not be gobbled up in any way by American Airlines. I am wondering if he could pass on his wisdom of those kinds of statements in terms of the reality of them.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend. One thing I can say about chief executive officers not only of airlines, but also of many other corporations which appeared before the transport committee in my years, is that most of them to make a buck would run over their own mothers if they had to.

Nobody believed Rhys Eyton concerning Wardair, but that was the pitch he made to the government and that was the pitch he made to the CTC and he got away with it. All of Max Ward's charter routes were long gone before very long.

As far as I am concerned and the position of the New Democratic Party is concerned, what is required is for Air Canada and Canadian Airlines to merge and let the transport commission carry out its duties as the enforcer and regulator and guardian of consumers' rights.

Instead of that, we have Mr. Eyton now crawling on his hands and knees to American Airlines, which you can bet will get 25 per cent ownership of Canadian Airlines. I will make a little prediction. I hope I turn out to be wrong, but in the life of this Parliament, before the next election, this government will allow a foreign airline to take up to 50 per cent ownership of a Canadian airline. Do you want to bet, Mr. Speaker? Does anybody over there want to? It is in the cards. I do not believe Mr. Rhys Eyton when he says this will not affect Canadian's operation. Baloney.

American Airlines will end up running Canadian's entire maintenance operations, the allocation of its aircraft, the routes it will or will not go on internationally and Canadian will not have any choice but to say: "Aye, aye, ready". That is why Canadian Airlines should merge with Air Canada.

Countries like Germany, Italy, France, Great Britain, the Scandinavian countries, and I could list some more, decided decades ago—and by the way, all of them have populations anywhere from twice to five times ours, a market of 400 to 500 million people just in Europe alone, eastern and western Europe—they could not afford the luxury of more than one national airline. Canada is trying to copy the great U.S. of A. We have lots of geography, lots of climate, not too many people. The only way we are going to operate more than one airline nationally and make money is by increasing fares by half again.

When I was first elected to Parliament, the round-trip economy fare, Regina to Ottawa was $126. Now the round trip regular economy fare is just about $1,000.

If anything proves that deregulation does not work, if anything proves that this country cannot afford a multiplicity of jerkwater, fly-by-night, overnight airlines, the experience of the last eight years should be enough. Surely a brick wall does not have to fall on the government, but I am afraid it will have to, and that brick wall will be called an election.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Regina—Lumsden for going through an exercise, certainly he has years and years of experience on the transport committee. I enjoyed his presentation, which in the beginning talked about the concern of starting with three nationals and four regionals, and the concern of coming down to two, and then his recommendation to bring it down to one. So I will have to examine Hansard tomorrow to follow the logic of that particular argument.

Let me say at the outset that Canada's aviation safety record is among the best in the world. A major accident, any accident, serves to remind us that aviation losses are unacceptable to the public and to any government. All Canadians grieve for the survivors and families of the victims of the tragic crash at Dryden. We are grateful to Judge Virgil Moshansky and the members of the commission for their tireless hard work and dedication in preparing the report that was released last week.

Now that the report has been released, Transport Canada has initiated a thorough, top priority examination of each of its recommendations. The report contained 191 recommendations, of which 35 have already been implemented by Transport Canada. There are 58 recommendations with which the department agrees and for which action is under way.

Seventy-three of the recommendations have been referred to the government-industry implementation team and the remaining 25 which deal broadly with legislation, the Transportation Safety Board and Transport Canada, are under review by the government.

Aviation safety is a product of a partnership of industry, government, unions and passengers. The work of the commission of inquiry has underscored the need for sustaining and strengthening these partnerships to ensure Canadian skies are safe.

Justice Moshansky's investigation is notable not only as an exhaustive study, but also as a constructive analysis which has contributed to our ongoing efforts to maintain and enhance aviation safety in this country. This report is not just a document to be taken under advisement; it is something that must be acted upon and Transport Canada is doing that.

The department's commitment has already been demonstrated by its actions in response to the 17 recommendations contained in the commission's two interim reports. These include key recommendations concerning the clean wing concept and new regulations governing the inspection of aircraft for the presence of ice, snow or frost. The Department of Transport is continually reviewing all aspects of its aviation safety operations and taking corrective action to ensure the system's safety. In 1987 the new National Transportation Act was passed to ease economic regulation of the transportation industry, but I would like to assure this House that safety was not deregulated and air safety had not been compromised.

Since 1981 statistics compiled and released by the Transportation Safety Board show that there has been a 35 per cent decrease in aviation accidents. As the demand for efficient, affordable transportation continues to grow, transportation safety remains the top priority at Transport Canada.

Each year the department devotes a great deal of time, energy and resources to maintain and improve the safety of Canada's national transportation system. This commitment is especially important with respect to aviation. The department remains responsive and diligent in ensuring aviation safety. As I have said, aviation safety is a shared responsibility. Everyone involved in aviation has that responsibility: the aircraft designers, the builders, the technicians, engineers, the pilots, flight attendants, air traffic controllers, the regulators, executive and administrators. All have a direct professional and personal interest in aviation safety. This requires that all participants work together to promote safe operating practices in all aviation activities.

Transport Canada is responsible for the following: to develop and ensure effective safety regulations; to develop and operate air navigation and air traffic control systems; for promoting the use of practices which exceed the regulated standards; and finally, working together with other agencies to monitor the performance of air traffic networks and identify areas where safety can be improved.

Transport Canada also sets out the rules and safety standards for operating aircraft in Canada. It licenses pilots, commercial operators, flying schools, airports, aircraft, aircraft manufacturers and maintenance personnel. These safety standards are upheld through regular inspections of aircraft and safety audits of companies.

The foundation of Canada's aeronautics legislation is the Aeronautics Act which was substantially amended in 1985 following several years of analysis and public consultation. The amendments to the act not only introduced the most progressive aviation safety legislation in Canada, they enabled Transport Canada to better maintain a consistent watch over aeronautical activities.

The Aeronautics Act has just been amended again to further strengthen and improve safety regulations, including a provision for the introduction of urgent safety regulations in a more timely manner.

Transport Canada monitors the performance of the air transportation network and identifies areas where safety can be improved. The department also constantly monitors the air traffic control system.

Since economic regulatory reform was introduced five years ago, Transport Canada has undertaken many safety related initiatives. First, the $800 million radar modernization project, which is nearing completion, will provide the entire air traffic control radar surveillance system.

Second, the $660 million Canadian automated air traffic system called CAATS, which will be completed by 1995, will provide pilots and controllers with improved control capabilities.

Third, the air traffic controller training capacity has been doubled at the Transport Canada training institute. The nation-wide complement of air traffic controllers will be fully met by 1994. The current level is 90 per cent of the requirement of 2,200 controllers.

Fourth, the new air traffic flow management programs are ensuring traffic volumes are kept at manageable levels in air space around our busiest airports in Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Montreal.

A new aeronautics code is being implemented. It deals with standard operating procedures for air carriers, restraint systems for flight attendants and carry-on baggage limitations, among others. Mr. Speaker, I do not know if you get frustrated, but sometimes I am amazed that some passengers seem to have eight arms when they are carrying on some of their luggage.

A special project has also been established to explore and participate in discussions with the Federal Aviation Administration and the joint aviation authorities of Europe to harmonize aviation rules.

Transport Canada Aviation was also reconstructed in 1991 to provide one focal point for the management of aviation related matters in each of the six regions. Also, a government industry task force on air carrier inspections was established in the fall of last year to review and recommend improvements in the manner in which audits, inspections and the general surveillance of the aviation industry is conducted. Finally, inspector training for air carrier audits has also been improved.

These are just some of the measures Transport Canada has taken to ensure safe air transportation in Canada.

I spoke earlier of shared responsibility for air safety. Air carriers are, of course, responsible for ensuring the safe operation of their aircraft at all times. Where icing conditions exist, regulations require a mandatory pre-flight inspection of an aircraft. Transport Canada has developed a mandatory surface contamination training package which all commercial air carriers must provide to personnel involved in flight operations. In addition, air carriers must have approved training programs for both flight and ground personnel in not only de-icing but also anti-icing procedures.

To ensure that pilots understand the implications of wing contamination, Transport Canada amended the air regulations and air navigation orders in November 1990 to prohibit the take-off of an airplane unless its critical surfaces are free of frost, ice or snow. The amendments also require that flight crews receive annual training on the effects of surface contamination on their aircraft.

In 1987, Transport Canada developed a new national company information system, a computerized system that documents air carrier information and tracks critical activity to strengthen Transport Canada's aviation auditing capabilities. To streamline and standardize its audit procedures, Transport Canada also undertook in December 1991 an extensive review of its audit procedures and has published a manual of regulatory audits which addresses all the shortcomings identified by the commission of inquiry.

Transport Canada and the airlines have agreed in principle on a centralized de-icing facility at Pearson International Airport. Work is progressing on technical and environmental approvals. In most cases, air carriers apply de-icing or anti-icing fluids before the aircraft departs for the runway. In severe conditions, if there is a delay between the time the aircraft is de-iced and the time the aircraft is given final clearance for take-off, the effects of the de-icing fluids may deteriorate rapidly. As a result, Transport Canada has implemented gate-hold procedures at Pearson where heavy traffic may cause unacceptable departure delays. Under these procedures, aircraft are held at the gate until a firm take-off time is assigned, ensuring take-off directly following de-icing. Delays between de-icing and take-off will virtually be eliminated by a new dedicated de-icing facility to be constructed at Pearson.

I would like to take my final moments to point out some of the important facts about Transport Canada's inspections and audit procedures.

Transport Canada carries out a number of activities to ensure that aviation companies comply with aviation regulation standards. Aviation regulation inspectors maintain ongoing surveillance of the aviation community on a regular basis. Monitoring activities are often carried out in conjunction with such activities as pilot proficiency checks, in-flight inspections and ramp checks.

In addition to routine monitoring activities, officials carry out detailed inspection of specific aspects of a company's operation as well as comprehensive company audits at regularly scheduled interviews.

I am sure all hon. members are aware of the important work, the crucial work, carried out by inspectors. This work force has increased since deregulation. The number of air carrier inspectors has increased by an average of 6 per cent per year and air worthiness staff has increased by 4 per cent during each of the past five years.

I would like to point out another initiative undertaken by Transport Canada, the Annual Canadian Aviation Safety Seminar, which brings together representatives from across this industry. This year's seminar began yesterday and is being attended by 200 aviation safety specialists from all areas of the industry. The seminar will permit exchange and discussion on ways to improve air safety. In fact, this year's theme is: Maintaining aviation safety in an era of declining revenues.

The number of safety officers has also been increased and additional modules have been provided for the successful Company Aviation Safety Program and Pilot Decision Making Program which were created in response to client-industry demand. As regulators ensuring aviation safety, Transport Canada has made far reaching changes within the industry and has been responsive and responsible to the recommendations of the commission of inquiry.

On the critical issue of de-icing in general and in particular related safety measures, Transport Canada has acted quickly and positively. The department has made clear its commitment to ensuring that the Canadian aviation industry is as informed and diligent as it can be in this crucial area of performance.

I believe that Transport Canada is fully able to provide the Canadian traveller with one of the safest and most efficient air transportation systems in the world.

In conclusion, the Minister of Transport has stated that he is firmly committed to keeping the public fully informed of all actions and plans in response to the recommendations contained in the final commission of inquiry report. The Minister of Transport will be issuing a progress report in six months' time.

This government has an ongoing commitment to making whatever improvements and adjustments are necessary to ensure that a national aviation system is as safe as it possibly can be.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, virtually everything the member who has just spoken has said seems to deny one of the fundamental issues identified by Justice Moshansky after years of investigation, innumerable witnesses and three volumes of report.

What he denies essentially is that a large part of the problem, the risk to safety, arises from a shortage of staff and a shortage of resources. The report is simply riddled with quotes like "excessive workloads", "thrown to the wolves without adequate training", "experienced inspectors leaving because they are not being adequately paid".

We have a series of eight different reports saying that we do not have the resources. We do not have the people to carry out the mandate of the Transport Department. We need new resources. We need more people. We need better training.

We have in some areas related directly to safety an increase in workload of 400 times. I think it is important to quote directly from the transcript of the hearings. When an official raised the problem of shortage of staff to carry out the regulations and to carry out the mandate for public safety, the commissioner inquired: "What response were you getting from your superiors?" "Other than losing a person-year, no response". "What were the reasons? What was your understanding?" Answer: "We were downsizing." "You were what? You were downsizing?" "Downsizing." "In staff?" "Yes, Sir". "In effect, you were asking for more inspectors, but in fact, they were taking inspector positions away from you." "Yes".

"What about your workload? Were they reallocating your workload or requesting you to do less work?" "No." "What was happening?" "We were being asked to do more with less."

That is the litany of this government, in Health and Welfare Canada, in marine safety, in ground safety throughout the Department of Transport, in customs inspections, in the inspection of new chemicals in agriculture, in the inspection of new drugs.

• (1700)

I ask the hon. member who with me has spent the last few weeks looking at the future health of the Public Service, will his government admit the essential problem here is lack of personnel to carry out the directions and the laws of Parliament? Will he read this report? Will he admit that? Can we hear something other than denial of the fundamental problem here?

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, I have to go back to my opening statement in my presentation that Canada is among the best in the world for safety records.

I stated the number of aircraft inspectors has increased and air worthiness staff has increased by some 6 per cent and 4 per cent respectively over the years. I do not think the member is saying that because there is a vacancy let us immediately fill it with a warm body. There is an expectation from not only parliamentarians but also from passengers and people in the industry that a professional level of service has to be provided.

Again, hon. members opposite say that the government has not responded in a comprehensive way to the work of the inquiry. I mentioned earlier the recommendations of the interim report. We have seen some 49 per cent of the recommendations in this report responded to.

The thing we are discovering not only with Transport Canada but also in the bill that the hon. member and I are spending a lot of time on now is that we are talking about a partnership, working together and everyone has to share in those responsibilities. We are progressing in the right direction.

Whether we are talking about the Public Service or about air transportation safety, the Canadian record is among the best in the world. We all acknowledge that we want to improve on being the best. We will continue to operate in that direction.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member's speech. Although he says that perhaps we should not fill a position right away, is he aware of the very huge increase in movement in the air of the very large numbers of smaller planes and that would require a lot more personnel to inspect each and every one of them?

Is the hon. member saying that a very small increase in the personnel is capable of keeping these aircraft in top condition and of making sure that everything is running properly?

I give an example. For Sudbury, Ontario, there was an increase of 171 per cent in the numbers of turbo-planes flying in and out of Sudbury. That is a very large increase in numbers of flights. Even though it is a smaller plane, there are more of them to keep that steady level of traffic going. We cannot service that large number of planes with the same number of personnel. I ask the hon. member, does he think we can?

Mr. Sobeski: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the hon. member for Sudbury. The question is related in a generic sense to the number of planes. If we were dealing in 1920 where it is a manpower issue, I would have to agree with the member.

However, this is the 1990s. I just did a tour out west where it is now computer assisted to help with the volumes of work that air traffic controllers must handle. Inspection techniques have improved. The equipment that professionals have has improved.

The member is quite right. I do not doubt her numbers about the increased number of movements in the air. I know that my colleague from Hamilton will also agree that indeed the professionalism and the quality of the inspectors' work is enhanced by the equipment they have. They recognize that. That is why we have added as we get the trained staff and we are just not going to fill it up with warm bodies.

I just want to assure the members that this government will not and has not compromised safety.

I would also like to remind the hon. members opposite that Judge Moshansky's assessment about the safety of our system today was that it was one of the safest aviation systems in the world.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I am more than anxious to participate in the debate today. Just to remind the House, the debate today is on an opposition day motion. It reads:

> That this House condemns the government for its unwillingness to concede that the deregulation of the Canadian transport industry has been a failure and in fact has led to fewer carriers, fewer jobs, higher prices, reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

Canadians who are following the debate today and in particular who have followed the speeches of members on the government side of the House have to realize that this is an important debate. What is important and what is frightening about the debate is that nothing has changed in seven or eight years.

A great many members in the House today have been here since the 1988 election; some came after the 1984 election. Some members will recall the debates about deregulation in Canada from first-hand experience and some will not.

Some have done their homework and will realize that the discussion we are having today about safety in the airline industry, as great a report as the Moshansky report is on the Dryden crash, does not flow, does not find its beginning, does not originate with the Moshansky report. The millions of dollars, the thousands of hours of testimony that gave rise to the Moshansky report do not contain within them the origin of the discussion in Canada and in this House about safety in the airline industry.

I had the privilege, as did other members of this House, of being a transport critic once upon a time for my party. At first I was an associate transport critic and then the transport critic when deregulation of the airline industry took place.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, and you will recall because you were here in those years, that there was a heck of a debate, both in the Standing Committee on Transport, on the floor of the House of Commons and in the forum of Question Period about safety.

With all due respect to Judge Moshansky, there is absolutely almost nothing in this report that was not raised by members of the opposition, by members of the Canadian Airline Pilots Association, by members of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association, by personnel from Transport Canada and the safety division who came and pleaded with members of Parliament in all parties to recognize the dangers inherent in deregulating an industry, to recognize the requirement to prepare in advance for deregulation.

My colleague from Hamilton West who is now associate transport critic has given me a copy of a question on December 17, 1985 I asked the then Minister of Transport, the gentleman who is currently Deputy Prime Minister. I was joined by the members for Regina—Lumsden, Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Papineau—Saint-Michel, and many others who were asking the then Minister of Transport whether or not safety would be compromised. The Minister of Transport of the day said: "Don't worry about it. We are not deregulating safety, we are only deregulating transportation".

I recall that we asked the minister of the day whether or not he would send the Standing Committee on Transport and the appropriate critics to Washington to examine the United States experience with deregulation. They had been there, seven or eight years along at that point in the game. They had learned some lessons. We suggested that perhaps we could learn from them. What was their experience, what did they do right, what did they do wrong, what was the experience? The government refused to send us to Washington to examine the U.S. experience with deregulation.

• (1710)

So, a couple of us went on a Canada–U.S. exchange to Washington and we went to the FAA. We saw the transportation secretary and saw members of Congress associated with the congressional oversight committees responsible for transportation deregulation. We met with vice-presidents and presidents of various airlines operating in the United States in a deregulated environment. That was all done unofficially. We came back to Canada and reported on the U.S. experience.

I have in my hand a copy of the Debates in the House of Commons dated January 29, 1986, when we reported to the government. They were not the views of the Liberal Party or the NDP or the union or the air traffic controllers or the pilots association. They were the views of Congress, of the Federal Aviation Administration, of senior executives of the U.S. airline industry that deregulation in the United States had been brought about without proper preparation.

They warned us then, in 1986, that the single most important thing we had to do was train sufficient air traffic controllers and put in place sufficient inspectors to keep the industry safe. That is what they told us and that is what we reported to the government.

Even then as we reported to the government that information from south of the border, this government was laying off air traffic controllers at Pearson International Airport.

So, I am sorry. I do not feel very generous today in participating in this debate. I do not accept the bland assurances, typewritten, drafted, crafted by somebody else for the member opposite by some bureaucrat that all is well in the world. "We can be assured this government would never compromise safety." That is what the government told us in 1985. That is what the government told us in 1986. That is what the government answered when we came back from Washington in 1986, that this government would never compromise safety.

But the same government, including the member on the backbench who just spoke, told us that the government would never compromise safety, would never put the lives and limbs of Canadians at risk, in the words of Justice Moshansky in a royal commission report, bought and paid for with taxpayer dollars which cannot be written off, ignored and pretended it never happened, judged harshly this government.

It was not Brian Tobin from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, not an NDP opposition critic, not a union member, not a member of the Canadian Airline Pilots Association, not an air traffic controller, not a concerned citizen. Justice Moshansky said that is exactly what the government did. The government compromised safety.

The government was saying in the House of Commons in answer to me in 1985, it answered to me and to others in 1986 that safety was not compromised. That was the answer up front. Even as it gave those commitments up front in this House, it was back in the shop laying off air traffic controllers. That is the fact.

Nothing has changed. We still get a statement today from the minister, not from an opposition member, not a union member, not a reporter, not a journalist. The minister rejects Justice Moshansky. He dismisses it like the snow in spring. It melts away in front of him, all of the hours of work, all of the blood, sweat and tears and testimony of all of those involved, including some survivors of the crash. It is rejected out of hand.

Mr. Sobeski: You rejected it.

Mr. Tobin: We did not compromise safety. And the member opposite blindly stands up and says: "We have never compromised safety".

I never rejected Justice Moshansky's report. The member should be very clear. The member should take this matter seriously. What I said was that we did not need to wait for a crash. We did not need to wait for the loss of lives. We did not need to wait for a royal commission to act. In 1986, well in advance of the report of 1992, those questions were being raised and false assurances were being given. No action was taken.

I say to members opposite that this is a serious matter. I say to members opposite that there is no tangible indication that anything has substantively changed. That is what Justice Moshansky tells us as well.

Take the airline industry, for example. Today two carriers are engaged, and we may as well call it exactly what it is, in a corporate fight to the death. These two Canadian carriers, let us be honest, are in a corporate fight to the death. All of the seat sales, all of the promotions, all of the little chances to win a bonus, an executive upgrade, a free trip, a free holiday, all of these promotions are part of a corporate fight to the death. Two Canadian carriers have decided that by competitive means only one carrier shall survive. That is what is going on today. As part and parcel of that corporate battle, both carriers are looking at the possibility of finding new American partners, a minority sharehold position that can only go, by law, up to 25 per cent as prescribed in the National Transportation Act, but could result in control.

It is against that backdrop and that environment of a corporate war, the possibility of mergers with American carriers and frankly, with an American corporate culture, that we are having this debate.

I do not care who hears me. I have no hesitation in saying that the Canadian airline industry today, in my judgment, and the corporate culture that engenders the industry today is far superior to the corporate culture that engenders the American industry. The American industry has been floating in debt for so long that it is no longer run by airline industry people. It has been run by the bankers for a heck of a long time. In the United States, they are operating just at the margins provided by the FAA.

It used to be the American industry. If we can picture an invisible line here that is the limit below which you cannot go in terms of safety margins. The American industry used to operate up here, but as deregulation came in, the industry began to operate right at the margin, right at the lowest allowable limit. That is what happened. That is the experience south of the border.

What happened in Canada as well is that we also began moving down toward the safety margin. The trick in any industry is not to operate at the lowest minimum standard. It is to be above it. For every degree you are above it, that is an assurance that you are operating safely. That was the traditional culture in the airline industry. That culture has changed. It is not airline people anymore determining when you push off the gate and take off. It is the banks because they own the carriers. It is because they are awash in debt south of the border and they are awash in debt here in Canada as well.

The corporate pressure, the competitive pressures, the deregulated environment that gave rise to the tragedy at Dryden, which gave rise to this report has not lessened; it has increased. The need to make the industry safe is greater now than it was four or five years ago.

You can only begin to deal with the problem when you first recognize that one exists. What is frightening today is to see the government continue to say in a rather bland fashion, no substance whatsoever: "It is safe. You can trust me. We would never allow the industry to operate in a risky fashion".

I accept that no human being consciously—not one on that side of the House, not one minister, not one member—puts another human being at risk. I accept that. I do not believe there is one member over there who would do that consciously. But I recognize as well that if members opposite find themselves on their knees before an ideology, before the altar of so-called unfettered capitalism, if they get blinded by this notion that totally unshackled, unregulated enterprise always provides the best level of service to our society, that in their adoration before that ideology they have lost sight of the need to serve people.

When you judge what has happened with deregulation in Canada against what was promised as the benefits, deregulation has indeed failed. What were we promised? We were promised we would have a more competitive airline industry. Before deregulation came out, let me remind members, we had EPA as an eastern carrier, we had a Quebec-based carrier, we had Air Ontario as an Ontario-based secondary regional carrier, we had a whole variety starting out with Air B.C. Northwest Territories had their own Northwest Air. There was a whole variety of regional carriers all across Canada, some of which had agreements in terms of marketing, in terms of delivering passengers to and fro, in terms of sharing various services at airports. We had a whole variety of regional carriers, all aspiring to expand their base in a partially regulated environment. There were two major carriers, Air Canada and CP, going at it.

What happened after deregulation? Did we get more competition as promised? We ended up with every single one of the regional carriers being swallowed up and aligned either with Canadian or Air Canada. Wardair disappeared. EPA disappeared. Quebec Air disappeared. All of these regional small carriers as independent entities disappeared and we ended up with a duopoly in Canada. We ended up with a lot less competition.

We were promised lower air fares. Now there is one for those people who live on the fringe of the country, lower air fares. If you live in a competitive market, such as flying between Toronto and Miami, I suppose you might have got a lower air fare out of deregulation. But if you live where I was last week in Rankin Inlet, you did not get lower air fares. You got practically a prison term in terms of your economic ability to be able to fly in and out of your community.

If you live, as I do, in the area I represent in western Newfoundland, in Deer Lake, if you live in Goose Bay, Prince Rupert, Prince George, Smithers, Prince Albert, if you live in what was known as Chimo in northern Quebec, or Iqaluit in Northwest Territories, northern Ontario, Regina or Saskatoon—let us get some bigger cities in here—check out the air fares. They have not gone down. They have dramatically gone up.

It used to be that we took the high-volume routes in this country. Because we licensed carriers on the basis of the stops they made, which they were compelled to make and we subsidized the far-flung regions somewhat, we cross-subsidized them from the high-volume routes. That is what we did. We gave the people who lived in the smaller centres somewhat of a break by cross-subsidizing under the heavy volume routes.

What have we done now? We have done just the opposite. Now we make people who are captive, served by only one carrier, pay whatever the airline charges. So it cost $2,000 to fly to Rankin Inlet from Ottawa and back.

Then we use the big seat sales in Ottawa between Ottawa and Florida and we cross-subsidize those with the people who live in Rankin Inlet. The ones who are captive living in the small communities pay whatever they are charged. In effect they are subsidizing people to go on holiday in Florida. That is the new corporate culture that has grabbed Canada. On the question of lower fares this is not a success. Safety, hardly a success.

Canada is not the United States. Canada has a larger land mass. We forget that huge land mass called Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is a relatively small population, less than a tenth of the United States. There are a number of things that have bound us together historically for 125 years. This is the 125th year. What are they? The post office and its little flag flying in the smallest most remote community was a symbol of our nationhood. The flag. There were some fundamental social programs, the ability to communicate with each other with telecommunications and a reasonable level of transportation, originally bands of steel from sea to sea on the railway. In latter days, the airlines allowed us, despite our vast differences and distances, to communicate with each other, to share with each other and to celebrate that diversity.

Why start withdrawing those things this year? In a few weeks Air Canada is sponsoring, with the support of the government, the opposition, the Speaker and all members of Parliament, an exchange. There will be 125 young people from every district in Canada going to another district to talk to each other because we recognize the country is hurting and we have to bring people together. Therefore, we have a special program to bring people together. We do it this year as part of the 125-year celebration of Confederation. Why would a country say it is important to do that as a special initiative, but yet in its transportation policy make that impossible in every day life?

Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity for an extra minute to conclude.

I will conclude by saying to the extent that deregulation has severed one of the links that has traditionally kept this country together, to the extent that we now recognize through special initiatives that we need to reopen those links, we have to look at deregulation. We have to look at a measure of re-regulation. We have to begin to put back together the bonds that used to bind this country together. One of them is transportation. We have to undo this hastily organized deregulation that has not only put our industry at risk in terms of safety, but put our country at risk in terms of our ability to speak with and to each other.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to listen to the debate today. I think some very fundamental points, not only about transportation and deregulation, but about the nature of the country are being made in this debate. I think it behoves the government of the day to listen very carefully to what is being said here.

In my maiden speech in this House in December 1988, I pointed out that having looked at the geographic area of representation, it turned out that 83 per cent of the geographic area of this country is represented by the opposition and only 17 per cent of the geographic area of this country is represented by the government. Obviously, square miles do not vote, nor do the trees or whatever.

That made it very clear to me that the whole direction the government had been on, freedom to move, free trade and so on, was seen by the regions of this country as something that was operating totally contrary to their interests and their future. We have seen this trend accelerate over the period of time I have been in this House.

If we look at government program after government program, how the government funds regional development, how it develops transportation policy, VIA Rail and so on, the post office, it is a kick to the regions of this country. If people are wondering why there is discontent in the land and why people are feeling disconnected from their country, it is precisely because of policies like those.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he sees the same scope to the dimension of what we are talking about as well?

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I must say that I think he has given all of us something to think about. I certainly was not aware that 83 per cent of the land mass of the country is represented by opposition members and 17 per cent of the land mass is represented by government members.

Perhaps that helps us understand better why post offices have disappeared from rural Canada. Perhaps that helps us understand better why VIA Rail has disappeared from the smaller stations in this country. Perhaps that helps us understand better why some airports have not only lost jet service, but some have totally lost all service in the smaller parts of this country. Perhaps that helps us understand why the railway has not just declined but has disappeared in some parts of this country, P.E.I. and Newfoundland totally and many other branch lines across this country. Perhaps that helps us understand why in 1992 people look to their provincial premiers to be their spokespersons and no longer look, regrettably, to their national parliament.

Perhaps that helps us understand why people in Canada today define themselves politically by whom they are against rather than by whom they are for and define themselves philosophically by what they oppose rather than what they support. We have appealed to the negative, frustrated, angry, disenfranchised, left-out, shut-out side of our character and we have forgotten to appeal to what binds us together in this country.

I could not agree with the member more. This is not merely a matter of dollars and cents. It is a question of nation building. It is a question as to whether or not people believe at the end of the day that by virtue of citizenship there are certain things we hold in common. There are lots of thing that make us different no matter where we come from. Some of us have mountains. Some of us have prairies. Some have water and some have droughts. Some speak one language and some another. Some have booming economies and some have seasonal economies. Lots of things make us different but there are only a few things we hold in common no matter where we live. That is what pulls us together: our sense of values.

When the member says that the withdrawal of transportation services is one of those values we held in common, one of those things we thought defined us as being a Canadian no matter where we lived, no matter what our circumstance, what our language, he is absolutely right. That is the message I tried to bring to this House as often as I could. That is the message I think this government lost sight of in the pursuit of the bottom line and as it knelt before the altar of its right wing philosophy. I do not think it did it deliberately. I do not think it was by design. I do not think it was entirely by accident. It really failed to see, as the member pointed out, or perhaps forgot about 83 per cent of the land mass of the country not represented by members on that side of the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Elk Island will be sharing his time.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak in response to the hon. member's motion that the government's economic regulatory reform of the transportation industry has been a failure. What fiction indeed. I not only take exception to this claim but find its tenor and argument to be somewhat wanting if not totally preposterous.

Since 1985 this government has taken a number of steps and many a hard decision to ensure that Canadian transportation industries could flourish in a more economically competitive and unfettered climate, liberated as it were from undue government hindrance and given the freedom to move to pursue new heights limited only by the powers of imagination, vigour and their determination.

This environment for change was not brought about by self-serving purposes. Rather it seems to benefit all who would use or rely on transportation for reasons of trade and commerce as well as personal travel or pleasure. Moreover, as business and transportation in Canada are inextricably linked and on the move, this government is scarcely going to embark on a course of action that would thwart one form of success for another.

It is precisely about success that I wish to focus my remarks today as exemplified by VIA Rail Canada, working proof of the railroad maxim: "The little engine that could". Part of the problem with VIA Rail in the late 1970s and in the 1980s was the heavy degree of government intervention in the transportation marketplace. This occurred through direct rail passenger subsidies of about 75 per cent of the cost of services. This meant some inequities for the air mode which was subsidized at a lesser level and indirectly through provision of infrastructure. It meant major inequities for the bus mode which received virtually no direct government subsidies. Moreover, the bus mode was in direct competition with a heavily subsidized VIA Rail on a number of comparable routes.

The heavy government subsidies, as well as the denial of a level playing field, offered VIA Rail no incentives to modernize or innovate, knowing that the government would pay whatever deficits occurred in passenger rail services.

Looking back, the soothsayers of doom and gloom who prophesized the inevitable fall of the sky in 1989 as a result of streamlining VIA Rail are doubtless practising their art of "poultry predictions" elsewhere today.

What remains is a leaner, more efficient and professional national passenger railway company, not to mention that awful word successful which my hon. friend fears and despises. That is not a bad record when we consider the few options the Minister of Transport had back then. Tough times required tough decisions.

This government did not abdicate its responsibility to act, nor was it afraid to take tough decisions. Instead it chose to save VIA by imbuing it with new life, mindful of considerable public cynicism and very much aware of a resurgence in passenger rail travel throughout the world replete with its safety, social and environmental benefits.

Not only does VIA's future look bright on several financial and performance score cards, but VIA is also planning with a view to the future. Once again I would say to my hon. friend that when it comes time to peek into the future much has changed since the days of Mackenzie King and the corresponding practices of the arts and wizardry.

The realities of 1990, however, are proof that the new VIA cannot only operate within the limits of available funding but can do so at even less the anticipated cost to government, and in spite of the current downturn in travel for business or leisure.

As hon. members know, VIA has been operating some 396 trains per week over 19 routes since the change took effect in January 1990. While these frequencies are down from previous levels of operation, VIA still continues to serve Canadians in all regions of the country, including several remote regions where passenger rail service is presently the only link to the outside world.

In addition, VIA has faced and survived stiff competition from the lucrative and heavily travelled airline routes in central Canada, particularly those along the Quebec City–Windsor corridor. Thus what began as an exercise to streamline certain services has ultimately resulted in today's VIA, a trend setting network operating at less expense to the taxpayer, meeting today's needs, and keeping its eye on the future.

Indeed, the newly structured VIA was deliberately focused to rethink the conduct of business for passenger rail not only within funding levels set by the federal government but, more important, to meet the challenges of increasing its passenger volume while operating in the mode of a cost effective enterprise. At the risk of sounding repetitive, VIA has been successful on both counts.

Much of this success is due in large part to VIA's own awareness of its product, image and service to the travelling public. That is to say the new consumer credo of the nineties, "service, service, service" is not lost on VIA's executive, marketing staff, or on–train personnel. Once on board this mantra becomes innovative: do more and better with corporate pride and the client in mind. Over a year has come and gone since the so–called cataclysmic collapse of VIA and it is still operating stronger than ever.

On December 16, 1991 VIA announced major increases in the frequency of service in the Montreal–Ottawa–Toronto triangle based on traffic patterns and demand. Some 22 new trains a week were added into service offering more flexible itineraries, better connections, and more opportunities for same day return travel between these cities.

One month later VIA chairman Lawrence Hanigan released a year–end report and traffic studies confirming increased ridership by 5 per cent over 1990 with revenues up by 7 per cent. With less direct subsidies, VIA was able to operate the network for $8.5 million less than originally budgeted in 1991 and by $38 million less than required from the previous year. This has all been accomplished with the use of better equipment, improved productivity, and the quality of on–board services.

Instead of abandoning transportation industries in Canada, I am pleased to report that this government has spent over $4 billion in direct operating assistance to VIA since 1984, helping the railway to move some 46 million passengers in that same period of time.

Figures such as these and a renaissance in train travel and service since VIA's newly streamlined network came into place do not qualify for, much less deserve, the unfounded and odious criticism of abandonment and neglect. Such is the woeful lament of the ill–informed and not worthy of my hon. friend, unless I misjudge him and his service to this House.

• (1740)

In closing, I would just like to borrow two little words often heard in VIA stations as my greeting to the hon. member or anyone else with fixed negative mindsets when it comes to staring reality in the face of success: all aboard.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I take pleasure in being able to participate in the debate of the following opposition day motion:

> That this House condemns the government for its unwillingness to concede that the deregulation of the Canadian transport industry has been a failure and in fact has led to fewer carriers, fewer jobs, higher prices, reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

The problem with this motion, as so often is the case, is that it is stated in the extreme. It is not that there are not some problems in the transportation industry in Canada. It is not that we do not have to do some things to repair some of the areas and improve some of the areas. However, to have a motion that says it has been a failure is absurdity.

Obviously the person who has written this motion has not lived in the regions that have seen improved service as a result of deregulation. The motion reads "fewer carriers". Madam Speaker, if you were living in an outlying community 200 miles from one of the metropolitan areas and you had a choice between jet service once a day and you had to wait all day for that jet in the evening or early in the morning and be gone all day, and two or three or four turbo-prop services that same day and a choice among those carriers, which would you take?

To say that there are fewer carriers is an absurdity. All you have to do is look at the back of the airline magazine as you fly to work here to see the network of airline points that were not there a few years ago and to know that deregulation has provided more service to the communities. It just is not accurate to have this kind of a statement.

Then it goes on to say "fewer jobs". I remember machinists from the airline coming to me a few years ago saying: "Please do not support deregulation. We will lose jobs if you do that". Even logic without statistics shows that that is wrong because if there are more carriers there are going to be more jobs.

I noticed that just about a year ago in the province of British Columbia they announced there was a shortage of maintenance people in the airline industry. They wanted people to come and train in airline sheet metal work. They needed that kind of worker.

I am not saying that in other areas of the transport industry there has not been a reduction in jobs. There has been a reduction in jobs in the wood working industry. The logging industry used to hire two or three times as many people to work as it does now. There has been a reduction in jobs. In the chicken industry we used to have people shovelling out the barns and gathering eggs. It is done on conveyers now. There have been job losses in every major industry that wants to upgrade its technology.

To pick on deregulation as a sign of job loss makes the motion unbelievable. To say that there are "higher prices" and assign that to deregulation, I think everyone will concede that if you have competition you reduce prices. If one airline is competing against another airline for passenger service, or a trucker is competing against another trucker for passenger service, there is going to be a reduction in price.

I can take the member back to the days when it was regulated. I ask him to look at any financial page where the profits of companies are announced and compare the profits of companies on the free market system with those companies that are regulated by a utility commission to see which one has the higher profits. He will see Quaker Oats might have 3 or 4 per cent but the gas company regulated by the government will have 7, 8 or 9 per cent. Uniformly those that go through a public utilities commission, those commissioners always make sure that the monopoly has a better write-up of profits than the competition. To say that there are higher prices may be the case but not because of deregulation.

How about reduced service because of deregulation? I have not seen it. It would be a useful motion to debate the value of deregulation but to say that it has been a failure just cannot be supported by evidence. The motion says "less safe". The Minister of Transport mentioned in the House the other day that there are fewer accidents now per air mile than there have been in history.

Competition creates better service, better prices and better jobs. If you look at any other industry that depends on the transport industry you will know that is the fact. There are problems now. Canada has, I think, severe transportation problems but they are not problems of deregulation.

We have a problem of critical mass of population. To have a transportation industry that functions efficiently so that it can enjoy the kind of profits it needs to upgrade its equipment and so forth, we need 50 million to 60 million people. Canada does not have that critical mass in order to enjoy that kind of efficiency.

Second, the metropolitan areas where the profits are to be made are scattered and there are not the many centres close together as there are in Europe, for example, or in the United States where you have huge population centres close to each other and they can be connected more easily by rapid transit. We do have geographical problems and they make it more difficult for the transportation industry to function.

We have done some things. We have reduced taxes. If members will remember the budget of just a month ago, the capital cost allowance was reduced so that the trucking industry can function more competitively, so that the airline industry, buying equipment, can function more competitively and so the buses can do that. The cost of operation, when you can write down those costs more quickly, helps them to compete.

A lot has been done. I remember when I first campaigned to come into this House, a seasoned politician statesman in the lower mainland of B.C. was campaigning with me and he said to me: "You know, I don't know why you are doing it. Back there in Ottawa they are not going to listen to you anyway". The major problem for British Columbia was freight rates. My friend from Nanaimo remembers that. Raw materials could be brought from the west to central Canada but to bring finished products from the west into central Canada cost a lot more in order to enhance the industrial complex in central Canada.

One of the first things we did as a government was to take that disadvantage away so that the manufacturing industry in British Columbia at least would not be facing the disadvantage of a built-in bias against western industry and I am proud of that. It was because western members came to Ottawa and said: "We need freedom for movement. The industries in British Columbia deserve just as much a chance to operate competitively as those in central Canada". We levelled off the playing field in terms of the freight rates.

We still have the disadvantage of distance and the disadvantage of large metropolitan areas and it still costs a lot to bring finished products in in the quantity we need to make it as competitive as we would like to be, but we have taken a government-induced impediment out of the way and that is deregulation.

My friend from central Canada laughs. We are used to that. People from the great golden triangle here do not know what it is like to operate a business in western Canada and have freight rates that are prejudiced against you. They think that is the way it ought to be, bring your raw materials to Ontario, bring the finished products to the west. Finally, a few years ago we levelled it and made it more equitable for the people in the west.

I say that the motion, which is designed to ask us to examine freight rates and deregulation would be a useful motion if it were not so extreme, if it did not say it so dramatically.

• (1750)

Do we need to examine it? There are areas we need to examine, but to say it has been a failure when VIA Rail passenger service is up, when it is functioning, as my friend from Edmonton said just a few minutes ago. When we worked with VIA Rail two years ago, the doomsayers across the way were saying: "This is the end of Canada" and now we find that passenger service is up and they are telling us that deregulation is a failure.

Every time you introduce competition, you introduce the opportunity for success.

Mr. Andre: I would like to designate tomorrow as an allotted day,

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRANSPORTATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Angus (p. 9219).

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, without getting into too much partisanship, I want to mention to the hon. member the effects of deregulation in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur. We have an airport at Charlo, New Brunswick. It is a Transport Canada airport and it is managed by an effective and competent board of directors representing the municipalities of Dalhousie, Charlo and Campbellton.

Here are the facts. In the 1980s two airlines served that airport. One had jet service, the other had turbo-prop. We now have one turbo-prop airline. We had a weather station but it was closed by the federal government. We have a flight service station in existence right now, but that has been targeted for closure and unless the Minister of Transport designates it in some way, it will not stay open.

My concern, and the member did not address it that much, is the cost recovery. He talked about regions and about a level playing field for the west, and the east I suppose in the same breath, but how about that cost recovery? That is going to hurt the regions. For instance, the same type of plane, a turbo-prop, landing at the Charlo airport in New Brunswick would pay a higher landing fee than the same plane landing in Toronto. I say to the hon. member that is not a fair way of solving that problem.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I noted with care that the member said at one time there was jet service and turbo-prop service and now there is only one turbo-prop service.

I would like to ask him, does he suggest that under a regulated industry, both should be kept alive by government regulation? Since the economic engine for that region has reduced it to only one turbo-prop service, presumably the additional service that used to exist must have been empty. It certainly is not a profitable picture. Would the member suggest that if the service is not needed, that government regulations should keep it going at the taxpayer's expense?

I want to quote from the Moshansky report of two weeks ago. He says:

> I want to re-emphasize that what was deregulated was the economic burden on the industry.

That is exactly what my friend across the way has just illustrated. When you have two services and you need only one, you create an economic burden. The member wants to maintain that kind of service, even though the people are not using it and even though it is going to be a tax burden.

Judge Moshansky went on to say:

> The safety regulations have remained in place and indeed have been strengthened over time.

The motion says that safety has been reduced. The most recent report, the Moshansky report, says just the opposite.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I do not want to cut into the time of the following speaker, but I would like to ask the member who has just spoken, a question.

He talked about the implications for western Canada. What he said might well be true for the metropolitan centres, as I pointed out in a previous intervention, but could the member describe to me how the deregulation has benefited his former home town of Rosthern, Saskatchewan and what in fact the impact has been due to deregulation? Where are they seeing the new opportunities as a result of the policies the member now extols?

Mr. Friesen: In answer to my friend from Prince Albert, I will tell you what I will do. I am going to Rosthern in three weeks' time. I am going there for a fund-raiser to help defeat the member in the next election and I will ask the good folks of Rosthern.

But I do know this. They have a beautiful highway that did not exist when I was last there which runs straight through from Saskatoon to Prince Albert. It was not there when I lived there in the good old days. They have a kind of service and can get to Saskatoon from Rosthern in a matter of 30 minutes. You could not do that before on the old gravel highway.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, in the few minutes remaining in the debate I want to concentrate on the last words in this motion that have to do with reduced service and less safe operations in air, road and rail transportation.

People out there listening and watching this debate do not have to take my word for it or the word of the member for Hamilton West or any of the opposition members as to why the Dryden air crash happened, and why other factors affecting the safety of the travelling public continue to fail to ensure that Canadians can be assured they are getting the best possible service and the full enforcement of regulations and laws that are designed to protect them.

The report of Judge Moshansky says it all. No matter how often members opposite deny or pretend everything is all right, this report makes it clear that over nearly eight years there were repeated warnings within Transport Canada that there simply were not enough resources to ensure the safety of the travelling public.

There was an A-base review in 1984 and the establishment of a program control board. The Canadian Airline Pilots Association in 1985 issued warnings about deregulation and the impact on safety. In March 1985 the Auditor General had similar cautions about not enough resources.

The Nielsen task force, the work of the greatest hatchet man of all times, recommended an immediate increase in resources to preserve the ability of the department to enforce regulations to ensure safety. In late 1985 we had an official of Transport Canada visiting the United States reviewing the American experience on deregulation.

Literally everything that has happened since then, the reduction in inspections, sending untrained and unqualified inspectors out into the field, everything that has reduced the regulatory assurance that Canadians are entitled to could have been forecast through the crystal ball of the American experience after it deregulated.

In May 1986 the report Aviation Safety In a Changing Environment said the same thing.

In 1989 my colleague raised the issues of safety and staff resources in the House of Commons and so did I. In 1990 we did it again.

The government is continuing to refuse to recognize that if you pass laws, if you adopt new policies that increase the workload dramatically, unless you are prepared to jeopardize the safety of the public you have to be prepared to provide the resources to ensure that your regulations and policies work.

We had a clear conflict between two government policies that the government blindly has refused to recognize for well over seven years. One is deregulation, where there is more work to be done, up to 400 times as much in the case of inspecting aircraft, and at the same time downsizing, more work and less people to do it.

We have the same thing in the marine services within Transport Canada. We have a report that is now over a year old that states there are inadequate resources in marine services to respond to emergencies on the waterways. We have similar warnings in the same reports, which the government ignored for years and years, that land transportation safety is also declining.

Throughout government departments—this is why I raise this so urgently, even with so little time to do so—diminution of resources, lack of training and the loss of highly qualified people are jeopardizing the health and safety of Canadians.

I call on the government to look at the impact, department by department, that its downsizing program has had. Look at how many regulations and laws of this Parliament are not being implemented for protection and safety, simply because the government has refused to provide the resources.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member.

[Translation]

It being 6 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

POLITICAL RIGHTS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should enact appropriate legislation to guarantee the political rights of public employees.

He said: Madam Speaker, in moving this motion, I want to refer to the legislation as it now exists, specifically to section 33, which reads in part:

33(1) Except as authorized under this section, no employee shall

(a) Engage in work for or against a candidate and

(b) Engage in work for or against a political party or;

(c) Be a candidate.

Section 32 defines the word candidate. It reads:

A "candidate" means a candidate for election as a member of the House of Commons, a member of the legislature of a province or a member of the Council of the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories.

It does not go any further in defining candidate than the words I have read. It leaves me open to wonder whether a candidate is a candidate when that person declares himself to be one or is possibly nominated by a group of those qualified to vote in that election, as is done by political parties. Or does a person become a candidate on the day that they are officially nominated before the returning officer?

When it reads "to campaign for it", it must mean for the whole period, from the time a person indicates his desire to become a candidate and then becomes one by whatever procedure he or she uses. From that point on that person is a candidate. That means that no person in the Public Service could do that, but there are exceptions.

In subsection 2 a person does not contravene subsection 1 simply by contributing money to the person who is running or to a political party. Again, it is vague in that it does not say whether a person can join a party. I know in the past it has been interpreted to mean just exactly that, that while you might make a donation you cannot be a member of a political party if you are a public servant.

There is a further exception in subsection 3: "Notwithstanding any other act, the Public Service Commission may grant to an employee leave of absence without pay to seek nomination as a candidate and to be a candidate for election".

Again, that presents difficulty for public servants. In my case, I was first nominated on May 1 for the election that took place six months and three weeks later, on November 21, 1988. I had been seeking the nomination for the previous 10 months, which means that if I had been a public servant during that period, I would have gone for a period of some 16 months, if my mathematics is reasonably close, without pay.

I would have had to ask for leave of absence. I would have had to depend on the Public Service Commission to give me that leave of absence, and I would have gone without pay for that whole period.

If one knew when the election was coming, one could time it a little better from the point of view of being without pay. If there is anyone who knows that far ahead, it would be only one person, and even the government leader would not know a year or two ahead of time what date the election was going to be.

It does work a considerable hardship against public servants in particular, a hardship that does not exist with respect to anyone else in the community qualified to run. They can run without having to worry about giving up their employment, getting leave of absence or being without pay for that whole time.

It seems to me that a case can be made on those grounds alone for legislation that changes it and gives public servants at least some of the rights of regular, ordinary citizens—I hate using the word ordinary, it is overused with respect to people.

This has been argued over the years and in 1986, I think it was, the trial division of the Federal Court ruled that section 33 was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That is the section I read which said you cannot become a candidate, you cannot try to become a candidate, you cannot do all those things unless you are exempted by having had the permission of the Public Service Commission.

They challenged that legislation on the grounds that it was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms but they lost at that level. They then appealed in 1988 to the Federal Court of Appeal. That court struck down section 33(1)(a) and 33(1)(b). It left in place subsection (c); but it did strike down 33(1)(a) and 33(1)(b) in June 1988.

The Public Service Commission appealed that decision to the Supreme Court of Canada, and in June 1991 the decision was rendered that confirmed the decision of the Federal Court.

It did strike down subsection 33(1) which stopped you from doing almost anything, engaging in work for or against the candidate, or engaging in work for or against the party. Again, it is interpretation. What is working for a party? I can recall a friend of mine who was a public servant when this happened. Someone reported to his employer that he had a lawn sign in front of his house. He was called up before his supervisor who told him he would have to get that lawn sign down because it was contrary to the legislation. He said that it was his wife's house. The supervisor said: "It may be his wife's house but it was his job that was on the line". He took the sign down.

It seems to me that is certainly going to the extreme in saying the degree of participation that a public servant, any public servant, can engage in at the time of an election.

The Supreme Court ruled that the prohibition of public servants working for or against a candidate or party violated the freedom as expressed in section 2(b) of the charter. However, the court recognized the importance of the political neutrality of the Public Service and of public servants. I think we all agree with that. There has to be some recognition of that.

The court stated that the present provision in banning political activities without distinction and without regard for the nature of the work performed by the public servant in the Public Service went further than was necessary. It stated further that legislation could be enacted which would limit the political activities of public servants. It gave some indication of how future legislation might be framed in order to achieve the objective of a neutral Public Service.

It is still up to the public servant to define in his own mind and hope that what he is doing is proper. Employees are required to exercise judgment and to consider their specific circumstances, the kind of work that they are doing, the level of their position in the public service and the way in which they are engaging in political activities, particularly with due regard to the loyalty they owe to the government and to their obligation to act and be seen to act impartially when dealing with the public. None of us would want their political partisan activities to interfere in any way at all with their delivery of a service to the public. I think everyone will agree with that.

With the court decisions, the employees are still bound by section 33(3) of the Public Service Employment Act with respect to seeking candidacy. They still have to get permission. They still have to get leave of absence. They still have to go without pay for the whole time they are campaigning to get a nomination and the time they are running until the election is decided, which could easily be in some cases a couple of years. We do not know when that is going to happen. I presented my own case and said that it would have been in excess of a year had I been a public servant before I would have had any pay.

That does not apply all over Canada. I do not know the situation in other provinces, but in British Columbia a provincial public servant can seek and obtain a nomination without sacrificing anything. He or she can ask for leave of absence without pay for a period of up to 90 days and can choose the time when it is most advantageous to him. In all likelihood that would be the time of the actual election campaign itself and perhaps some time before that, if one could be reasonably sure when the election was coming. At least there is that freedom there. They do not have to ask anyone's permission. Certainly, if they are stepping beyond the bounds of good conduct, then they would be called to task. They do have that much freedom, freedom which, to my mind, goes a long way toward satisfying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It is time the federal government approached this legislation, approached its public servants in the same open light with respect to the action of public servants. As long as it does not interfere with their work, they should be allowed to participate as citizens of Canada in the electoral process by supporting a candidate of their choice, by supporting a political party of their choice, by being a candidate if that is their choice, by seeking nomination. Until they actually need time off to participate fully, they should be able to continue with their job and then ask for a leave of absence, unpaid, from the time they feel they have to put all their time into their campaign.

I would urge the government and all members of the House to support legislation that would define it so that the people involved would know exactly what the limitations were and the options open to them. All we are asking in this is to make it clear. It is vague now.

We have the legislation, we have the Supreme Court decision and the court suggested legislation could solve the problem. I am urging that the government introduce legislation that will limit the activities to the extent felt necessary so that people will be fair on both sides, but nevertheless define it so that the public servants engaging in these activities will do so knowing that they are within the bounds of specific legislation.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, that was a very thoughtful speech by the member sponsoring the motion before the House on the issue of where one draws the line appropriately on the role that public servants must play necessary to maintain the political neutrality of the Public Service, which at the same time permits public servants to participate in the public life of our country to the extent that they wish to.

I agree with the hon. member that it is important to clearly define this in law because of the certain hiatus that currently exists with the court decision following the review of the existing sections 32 and 33 of the Public Service act that governs this area of political activity by public servants.

When I heard him say he thought that it was important for each individual member of the Public Service "to define in his or her own mind what is appropriate", I felt that was too subjective an approach to be satisfactory either to the Canadian public, the government, or the Public Service itself. That is why again it is important to have this defined in law.

That word in the motion which says that government enact appropriate legislation certainly is the key word: What is appropriate. If you take a historic view of this, the appropriateness certainly changes over the decades and through the centuries.

When I first wrote about this subject over a decade ago in my book called: Political Rights—The Legal Framework of Elections in Canada, I was interested to learn in my research that the efforts to establish the neutrality of the Public Service by de-politicizing it had, in some cases, even gone so far as to remove the right to vote from public servants.

For example, in the pre-Confederation province of Canada, customs and excise workers were disfranchised in 1844. The majority of postal workers lost the right to vote in 1851, and even Crown land agents were denied the right to vote in 1855.

That was perhaps not unconnected with similar tendencies in England at the time when in the years between 1782 and 1866 postal employees and customs and excise officials had also been disfranchised.

Significantly in 1866, when Mr. Gladstone, the great reformer, was bringing in legislation that generally provided for an extension of the franchise in Britain at that time, it included an express provision that would have denied the right to vote to all public servants.

When you look at those kinds of restrictions that applied in the effort to establish a politically neutral Public Service, it is very clear that the whole paradigm within which this current debate is occurring has dramatically shifted.

We are guided particularly by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which is now a fundamental part of Canadian life setting out the democratic rights that all of us have.

What are the restrictions that are demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society? Most often the quest for increased rights is put in terms of the benefit or the advantage that will accrue to the individual who acquires and can exercise those rights.

I think that seen from the other side of the coin the political restrictions that are by law traditionally imposed on public servants in this country can also be seen as protection for public servants, almost, if you would like, consumer protection legislation for public servants. That is because there are serious implications for those who take a political role in the course of holding a public office or being a member of the Public Service.

I think the dilemma was perhaps best set out by J.E. Hodgetts, who was certainly one of Canada's leading scholars on public administration. He wrote about this some years back in 1973, almost two decades ago.

• (1820)

In a book on the Canadian Public Service, Hodgetts said the following: "Partisan activity on behalf of the party in power could be interpreted as a form of job insurance for the public servant or his means of ingratiating himself with his political overlords. But at the same time, such activity jeopardized the doctrine of political non-alignment of public servants that protected them against dismissal when a governing party was defeated."

It is important to recognize that in the quest for seeking political liberation for those who occupy positions in the Public Service of our country, there is a problem for the individuals themselves.

I would like to cast that now, even more broadly, in terms of the collective damage that can be done to the Public Service if we do not get this line of demarcation between what is permitted and what is prohibited in the right place.

We all agree that there has to be a line. I think we all agree that it is best expressed in statutory form so that there is certainty for all. The issue here now is just where that line should be.

In a Public Service where hiring and promotion is based on the merit principle, it becomes problematic, very difficult indeed, if the political persuasion of people within the Public Service is known to co-workers, subordinates and superiors.

This country began with a highly politicized Public Service where following each election the rewards of office included the power to dispense public jobs whether it was in the customs office or any other position to those who had been supporters of the successful party at the election.

Indeed, there was a practice. I see the Mace on the Table before us. There was a practice called macing which was the method by which the members were never permitted to walk between the Mace and the Speaker, as the member for Kingston and the Islands knows, but has forgotten in his reference to the Mace, otherwise a persnickety member for parliamentary procedure.

Macing was the extraction by the government of the day of money from public office-holders as a reward for having gotten the position, a 5 per cent levy, an 8 per cent levy of their salary.

Over quite some time this practice was eliminated, but it was only possible as part of the larger effort to establish the Public Service Commission early in this century and to base hiring and promotion on the merit principle.

We have gone through a long struggle in this country to get to the point where we have, as best as we can achieve it, a politically neutral Public Service. Why is that important?

It is not just for those who are members of the Public Service and looking at this as kind of consumer protection legislation for the vast majority who do not wish to openly become candidates or go out and work in elections even though they may hold serious and considered views about the country and its affairs.

I am thinking now at the next step having gone from the individual public servant to the Public Service as a whole to the third dimension of this and that is the Canadian people.

I believe the Canadian people have the right to look to those who hold public office in this country with a sense that the affairs of our country are being conducted in a fashion that is fair, balanced and in accord with the public interest.

Party differences divide those of us who are elected to this Chamber. They ought not to divide those who work year in and year out in developing policy and furthering the implementation of government programs across this vast land of ours.

I know that it can be quite a chilling reality for many people to think that the civil servant with whom they would be dealing is someone who is actively affiliated with a certain particular political party, perhaps one that is opposed in interest to their own party. That is not something which represents an advance in the public policy of our country but a step backward.

With the historic perspective that I tried briefly to outline in the debate tonight, I hope that when we get to drawing the line that the hon. member wants to see in legislative form, which I agree should be there, we can indeed do it in a way that is fair and responsible for all concerned.

That includes the individual member of the public sector, the Public Service as a whole, the government that depends on the advice and the co-operative support of the Public Service, ultimately and above all the people of Canada who look to the Public Service for a fine tradition of maintaining good government and peace throughout our country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House and notwithstanding the designation of tomorrow as an allotted day, on Friday, April 3, 1992 the government will call second reading of Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods;

That, no later than 2.45 p.m. all questions necessary to dispose of the said bill at second reading shall be put forthwith, without further debate or amendment;

That, any recorded division demanded be deferred until Monday, April 6, 1992 at 6 p.m.;

That, on Monday, April 6, 1992 the government will call report stage of Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act and report stage of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act;

That, no later than 5.45 p.m., all questions necessary to dispose of Bill C-31 at report stage and Bill C-60 at report stage shall be put forthwith, without further debate or amendment;

That, on Tuesday, April 7, 1992 the government will call third reading of Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act and third reading of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act;

That, no later than 5.45 p.m. all questions necessary to dispose of the said bills at third reading shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment; and

That, on Wednesday, April 8, 1992 during government business, the government shall call Bill C-49, the sexual assault act at second reading.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I just want to confirm that there have been discussions between the parties on the motion. We are quite prepared to support it. I do have two questions for the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

With regard to Bill C-31 and Bill C-60, on Monday and Tuesday, we have an order that provides for both of those to be dealt with at various stages. I wonder if I could have the assurance of the parliamentary secretary that each of the two bills will receive an adequate amount of time in the House. Obviously, we are worried that the second one in each case might get short shrift and, as we have seen in the past, really get no debate at all. I would like that assurance.

Second, in terms of Bill C-49 which will commence debate on Wednesday, can the parliamentary secretary indicate whether it is the government's intention to have that bill voted on prior to the scheduled break at the end of the week?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I do want to indicate to the hon. member that yes, we are interested in making sure that both Bill C-31 and Bill C-60 have an adequate amount of debating time. Of course, that is dependent on both sides of the House. But I can signal to him our co-operation in attempts to make sure that there is time for Bill C-60 on both days.

Second, in terms of Bill C-49, yes I can indicate to him that it is the government's intention to complete second reading before we rise at the end of that week.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I know there have been extensive discussions between the parties to settle on the terms of this order.

I am happy to indicate the support of our party to the order. I may say that I am concerned that with the number of bills that are passing, there will not be anything left on the Order Paper by the end of next week.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary will look to the fact that perhaps the government is a little slow in bringing forward its legislation.

• (1830)

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am flattered by my hon. friend's concerns. More often than not he is accusing me of being in too much of a hurry to get our legislation through the House. It is nice to see that as spring approaches we are finally hitting a balance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: According to procedure I must say: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have consent of the House to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

POLITICAL RIGHTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stupich (p. 9291).

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, it was very interesting to hear the comments of the member who spoke last on political rights for public servants. The history lesson was interesting, that back in the 1800s Public Service employees in many sectors were denied even the right to vote. As one of a category of Canadian citizens who were denied the right to vote well into the 20th century, perhaps I stand up to defend political rights with a little extra verve and commitment. We do have a democratic society. The right to participate in the political life of a democracy is the right of every Canadian citizen and one which should only be reduced or removed for the most serious of reasons in the public interest.

I was recently rereading a submission I made to the commission on electoral reform and I carry into this debate the principle that I put forward in that submission. The principle that should apply is that disenfranchising people should not be done and that if the commission had to err on the side of making it a little too easy for some people to vote, it should do that rather than err on the side of disenfranchising those who should not be disenfranchised.

I support the intention that I think the hon. member has in moving this motion, that the government bring forward legislation to clarify the political rights of Public Service employees. The problem is that the courts have already ruled quite clearly on this. What the government needs to do, first of all, is to repeal sections in the legislation that the courts have ruled violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The opinions of the government member who spoke on the motion may be of great interest, but they really are of no great moment when the court has already ruled on what is currently in the legislation. It has said that the legislation that is now in effect places unreasonable limits on democratic rights and that those limits are not justified in a democratic society.

The only provisions that the court left intact are ones that I think everybody would agree are basic and minimal restrictions on the democratic rights to participate in the political process. Those are the obligation on deputy ministers who advise on policy directly to government to refrain from political activity and the restriction that a Public Service employee who wishes to be a candidate has to have permission to do so and has to take a leave of absence while he or she does.

We have right now legislation that the courts have said is contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and after nine months the government has done nothing to make any efforts to change that legislation, to repeal the offending sections. I think that is the first step that has to be taken. In my view we then build on what restrictions need to be put in place that can be justified as absolutely essential to protecting the public interest, because that is the way our charter is framed. Any restrictions on freedoms have to be justified in the public interest.

We have been talking in committee for a month now about the kind of Public Service we want, the importance of a neutral Public Service, the importance of a Public Service based on merit. Quite shockingly to me the government has brought forward legislation that says merit no longer means that we want the best qualified people working in the Public Service of Canada.

There has been deep concern expressed to us from a number of fronts that what that is going to mean is the ability to politicize the Public Service again. We have to remember that legislation to establish the merit principle in the Public Service, to keep it politically neutral, was brought in in 1919 as the result of a whole history in the Public Service of appointments based on who your friends were and whether they got elected and whether they liked the candidate you worked for at election time. Yes, there was substantial pressure on Public Service employees to work for candidates at election time because otherwise they would not be in the Public Service after the election if a candidate won for whom they had not worked.

Certainly we do not want to go back to that. Yet there are many ways to undermine that. The current bill, Bill C-26, that the government has before a legislative committee is probably more dangerous to a politically neutral Public Service than is any exercise by a Public Service employee of a right to have a lawn sign or to make a contribution to a political party, or to make a few phone calls on behalf of a candidate.

The Prime Minister in the 1984 election promised that this was something that could probably be corrected quite easily by setting up a standing committee and bringing in new legislation that took many of the restrictions off Public Service employees in their right to be involved politically. The government never did that, and in fact when my predecessor in Ottawa West brought forward a bill to reduce the limits on Public Service employees' political rights, he eventually felt morally compelled to withdraw that bill because his own government insisted on tightening the screws again and again to the point where close to 50 per cent of Public Service employees were again fully denied any political rights of any moment.

This is an important principle in the bill before us. It is not one, frankly, that I expect this government to act on. But I ask it to consider seriously, since it is now into an era of regulatory review, whether its particular commitment to limiting the rights of public servants makes any sense. I ask it to consider, if it has any true commitment to the concept of building trust and partnership between the government and its employees, whether it does not think that most public servants can be trusted to exercise discretion and not to indulge in political activity that is in conflict with their public responsibility.

I frankly believe that most of them are mature individuals who value their jobs and who value their commitment to serve the public impartially. I think they value it more than the government does, and I do not think they are going to jeopardize their ability to serve the public or the future of their employment with the Public Service by acting foolishly in a political way. If we believe they are the kind of individuals who cannot be trusted then I do not know how we can proceed with reform of the Public Service where trusting one another is really the foundation of revitalizing the Public Service.

It appears to me that there are in place mechanisms to deal with Public Service employees who do violate the trust placed in them by the public and by the government. Departments have codes of ethics. There is the obligation to act in good faith toward one's employer. We have conflict of interest guidelines for employees in the Public Service to ensure that their private activities are not in conflict with their public duties.

On top of all of that, do we truly need legislation? I doubt it very much.

We are dealing with the most fundamental right a citizen has in a democracy. That is the right to participate in the political process, to express their views on issues, to support the candidate of their choice, to support the political philosophy of their choice. Only for the most serious of reasons should we deny that right to 500,000 Canadians. That is how many people we are talking about.

The courts have said that the legislation which was in place is not valid; it has quashed those sections of the legislation.

I call upon the government to bring forward an amendment to repeal legislation that no longer has any force and effect and to make it clear to Public Service employees what their rights are.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise in the House today to represent the Minister of Transport as we begin second reading debate of Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

The minister had rather hoped to be here himself for this particular debate, as he has addressed the House previously on the importance of transportation to Canada and the role it plays in our competitiveness and prosperity, and he wanted to extend that debate to this important piece of legislation.

However, he is in Vancouver today, as most members already know, for the signing of an agreement to transfer Vancouver International Airport to a local airport authority. This is a task he completed yesterday in Calgary and in Edmonton with the transfer of those two airports to local authorities.

The minister nonetheless wanted me to convey to the House his appreciation that this debate is going forward today, as it will certainly be of benefit to Canadians to have this bill move expeditiously through the parliamentary process and on to implementation.

Today I am addressing the need to regulate certain transportation activities to promote the safety of people, property and the environment. As we are all aware, our standard of living depends on a sound transportation infrastucture and its ability to move all cargoes safely and efficiently.

The production of many goods we use, whether or not in themselves dangerous in their finished state, may involve the transportation of hazardous products at some time in their manufacture or production. This could include explosives, acids or pressure-liquefied gases.

Our concern, as the Department of Transport, is to ensure that such dangerous goods are transported in a manner which ensures public safety with no undue burden on industry.

In 1980 Parliament passed the first Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. Ten years of experience with that legislation prompted us to initiate consultations with industry, the provincial governments, interest groups and the general public on possible amendments to the act.

In July 1990 the present Minister of Transport, then minister of state, had 19,000 copies of a discussion paper distributed to industry organizations, provincial governments, federal departments, interest groups and the general public.

That paper contributed significantly to the development of Bill C-45, which is intended to replace the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act of 1980 with the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, 1992.

Transport Canada has maintained an excellent partnership with the provinces in the administration of a single, national dangerous goods program which comprises federal and provincial legislation and a variety of joint activities.

The primary focus of Bill C–45 is to prevent accidents during the transportation of dangerous goods. It is a realistic bill and takes into account what should happen when, despite everyone's best efforts, accidents occur.

For certain circumstances, it requires that industry establish emergency response assistance plans and file with Transport Canada, for approval, summaries of these plans. A similar provision has been in place for the past several years and I must tell the House that I was extremely impressed when I learned of the excellent work done by Canadian industry associations.

For example, the Canadian Chemical Producers Association has established a national transportation emergency assistance plan that allows a member company to call upon another member company anywhere in Canada to provide assistance at an accident.

I am very pleased to be in a position to advise the House that this made–in–Canada approach, which ensures a very rapid, professional response, has been adopted in the United States and is finding acceptance in several European countries as well.

Bill C–45 will ensure that industry will respond effectively to transportation access. It also provides that any emergency responders such as volunteer fire departments will receive adequate information on the products involved. This happens through the established placarding, labelling, and documentation system.

In addition, Transport Canada will continue to operate the Canadian Transportation Emergency Centre, known throughout the industry as CANUTEC, which operates 24 hours a day to provide information and guidance to whatever technical depth is required by those who are responding to an emergency situation.

Bill C–45 will ensure that, when importers bring into Canada material that is regulated in Canada, they must satisfy our regulations.

Under Bill C–45 Canada's national transportation of dangerous goods program will remain in harmony with international programs such as those of the United Nations, the International Maritime Organization and the International Civil Aviation Organization, as well as those of the United States and other countries.

This will be done to ensure that Canadians will not be placed at a disadvantage in the international market by domestic requirements which either over–regulate or under–regulate transportation activities.

With respect to compliance, Bill C–45 maintains the severity of fines and jail terms provided under the 1980 legislation but two new elements are added.

First, it provides that an offence can be viewed as a new offence on each day it continues. This will ensure that an incentive remains for a company to correct an infraction quickly following its discovery.

Second, the bill allows court orders to be issued to persons convicted under indictment to (a) prohibit the person from engaging in some or all activities regulated by the bill for up to one year, (b) compensate for damages such as to volunteer fire departments for extended supplies, (c) to restore the environment, or (d) require the person to conduct or pay for technical research and development relating to the safe transportation of dangerous goods.

Except for the prohibition to engage in certain activities, the maximum penalty for the remaining three items is not to exceed $1 million per infraction.

I am very pleased with the excellent work and consultations which have led to these improvements to Canada's transportation of dangerous goods program.

I am sure the text merits the attention of all members of Parliament who will recognize the importance of assuring speedy passage and adoption of this bill.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I am privileged to rise on debate at second reading of Bill C–45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

As the bill's title indicates, it deals with the transportation of dangerous goods in all modes of transportation, by rail, road, sea or air.

The safe transportation of all types of dangerous goods is of great concern to many people. Canada is a vast nation with hundreds of thousands of hectares of uninhabited land. However, all transportation routes emanate from our cities and towns, and it is especially in these populated areas that extreme care must be given for the proper handling of dangerous noxious substances.

Many Canadians, especially those in southern Ontario, do not have to look back too far to recall an event which brought great concern to this important issue of the carriage of dangerous goods.

In 1979, a train derailed in Mississauga. It was carrying chlorine gas. Twenty–four cars of that train derailed at a level crossing at Mavis Road after a journal box responsible for the lubrication of axles overheated and dislodged. Two propane– filled cars exploded into a huge fireball of chlorine gas. Over 225,000 Mississauga residents were forced to leave their homes for several days. That image is burned into my mind because at that time I was a reporter for a local television station in Hamilton. I was assigned the reporting duties of going to Mississauga to cover the accident, what had happened and then the follow–up stories of the evacuation of all those hundreds of thousands of individuals from their homes.

I do not want to have this House think that I draw the following comparisons for partisan reasons. Not at all. I draw the comparison because, like the very motion before this House yesterday dealing with deregulation and safety, all things involved in transportation require, first and foremost, safety. As I stated in this House yesterday, you cannot fudge on safety. The parallels are these.

First of all, like the Dryden crash, the Mississauga train derailment was cause for a judicial inquiry, headed by Samuel Grange. Second, like the Dryden inquiry, the accident was attributed in part to safety standards or the lack thereof relating to inspection and proper maintenance of rolling stock. Like the Dryden inquiry, there were no warning signals. Fortunately though, in the case of the Mississauga train derailment, there were no serious injuries.

In 1970, there were three serious accidents in Ontario which caused much public concern and resulted in public inquiries. The first was a derailment at Cobourg, Ontario, that involved 25 cars. The second was a derailment of 14 cars caused by a plain bearing failure. The third was a collision.

In the 1979 report into the Mississauga train derailment, the commissioner had this to say about the Canadian Transportation Commission, the CTC, now the National Transportation Agency. I quote:

(k) The Question of Funding:

The reason for this inactivity, if such it can called, is twofold. First there is a lack of money and manpower. In this connection a submission has, I understand, gone into Treasury Board seeking provision for more salaries to expand the accident investigation, inspection, planning and standards development programs including the engaging of specially qualified officers to go into shippers and manufacturers' plants and railway yards throughout Canada to ensure compliance with Red Book regulations. I have no knowledge of the priorities and I do not wish to intrude upon Treasury Board decisions. But surely at the very least, the CTC should have the funds to find answers not dependent on information or advice supplied by the railways. The railways are answerable to their shareholders; the CTC is answerable to the public.

The other reason is philosophical. It was very clear from the evidence of Mr. David Jones, the former chairman, and Mr. John Gray, the present chairman of the RTC, that there is an ingrained reluctance to take any action involving expenditure or loss to the railways without a complete investigation of the amount of that expenditure or loss and an assurance that the benefit to be gained will fully compensate for that loss—I cannot understand how the Commissioner could leave to the railways the regulation of the speed and length of trains. A long, fast train is a profitable one; it is not necessarily a safe one.

Wise words, Madam Speaker. Does it sound familiar? Dollars versus safety? Guess which one has been winning with this government as of late?

• (1020)

Let us not forget as well that transportation is becoming increasingly intermodal and high–tech. On the roads, tractor trailer trucks sometimes have two full–length cars behind them travelling, some would say, faster than the speed limit. In the U.S., they have triple car trailers behind trucks. Trains carry freight boxes from trucks stacked too high. Cabooses have disappeared, replaced by sophisticated detection devices. All of these factors obviously increase the risk of an accident occurring. So, caution is the watchword.

However, let me go back to my comments to the safety issue. The Brotherhood of Railway Carmen in 1989 stated in a report that fewer inspectors and less stringent inspection could cause another accident involving dangerous goods. They stated in the report that since the 1979 Mississauga accident, 2,000 safety inspectors had been cut by the railways. That is no way to be thinking about safety.

Again, in 1989, this House was concerned with the issue of contaminated fuels entering this country by road. Apparently there were not enough safety inspectors at our borders to deal with the inspection of the transportation of dangerous goods. Perhaps there are alternatives to resource allocation which could keep up with these incidents. Perhaps where centralization is concerned, there could also be a devolution of control. One suggestion put to me just this morning from the mayor of Mississauga, Hazel McAllion, was that safety inspection and related mandatory supervision of dangerous goods transportation could be decentralized.

She said to me on the telephone this morning: "We have an opportunity here to ensure that there are enough inspectors and there is the enforcement of what the inspectors must do in the field. However, the government is going to have to provide all these inspectors and, of course, the related enforcement". In her words: "This is a huge country. We know where the rail lines are; we know where the train travels. We know where the ships are; we can board them and see all their cargo, but what of trucking? We do not know where all the trucks are all the time. There are no specifically designated routes that they always follow". She has seen a bit of a complication here in trying to ensure that there is adequate inspection and enforcement of safety regulations on the industries, on the carriers.

She went so far as to suggest maybe we should decentralize and put the responsibility of inspection and enforcement on the local fire and police departments. I am not saying whether that is right or that is wrong or whether it is a good idea or whether it is not a good idea, but I have got an open mind to these kinds of things.

She does have a caveat, of course. Hazel says: "If we put the whole idea of decentralizing inspection and enforcement into the hands of police departments and fire departments and special units within those units, we had better have the federal funding allocated to them in order to carry out the job". The unfortunate part, and there are complications that you can see immediately in that how do you supervise all of these many different fire departments and police departments to ensure that the job is being done, et cetera. That one idea she came up with indicated again to me the statement she made that this country is huge. There are many modes of transportation. There is considerable transportation of these dangerous and noxious substances.

We could have the best regulations in the world. We could have volumes of material, regulations and rules that say we had better be making sure, if we are to transport these particular substances which are dangerous or noxious, they are contained in this fashion, labelled in this fashion, and transported in that fashion.

However, in order to ensure that is happening, we need the inspectors and then, if there are inconsistencies in the law, there must be enforcement. That is going to take a commitment by this government, a commitment that just yesterday in this House we demonstrated in the airline industry was not there. Why? It was because the government has one agenda, an ideology of economic restraint.

On the other hand, this government preaches at the same time that the need or priority of Transport Canada is safety and that we cannot fudge on it. Unfortunately the two collide. It was stated not only by me and my colleagues in the House yesterday. It was stated by Justice Moshansky in his report. It has been indicated by witnesses to Justice Moshansky and the inquiry that there is a philosophical difference between the two.

There are opinions which we should discuss, and I suggest that among witnesses who will appear before the legislative committee of this House to study this bill are municipal leaders like Hazel McAllion from Mississauga who has extensive knowledge in these areas. We could discuss her ideas further and set them out there.

For example, clause 6 of the bill would require emergency response plans by carriers of dangerous goods in case of an accident. Perhaps through this vehicle carriers of dangerous goods travelling along known routes and alternative routes could, in conjunction with local authorities, put into place such a plan as would be capable of dealing with a disaster should one occur.

Clause 9 of the bill gives powers to inspectors. The minister may invoke or revoke an inspector's licence. The minister may authorize and designate persons to approve emergency response plans or to issue directions or permits for inspectors.

There are many other requirements of inspectors such as obtaining a warrant for a search of a premises for noxious substances, for example, and powers of the minister to follow under this bill. The inspectors will have to comply with a great series of regulations throughout the course of their duties both to ensure safety and respond to an accident.

A new provision would provide that where an inspector believed it was necessary to prevent an accident from happening, he or she could take appropriate measures to prevent harm to the environment, people and property. For the record, and I want to say it again, I have heard the government has consulted widely on this bill and it has support.

• (1030)

As gold plated as this bill is today at second reading before going to committee for full discussion, it will not mean anything to the safety of Canadians or their property or their environment if proper monetary resources are not given for all these safety inspections and the enforcement that may follow.

That is our message. I look forward to following this bill in legislative committee. We will be very attentive to all the witnesses who appear before the committee on it. We will ask the necessary questions including those questions, I hope, to the minister responsible, the Minister of Transport, to assure Canadians just how far this government will go to ensure that the funds are allocated and to ensure that safety and enforcement are truly the priority of this minister, the priority of Transport Canada and the priority of this government.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to debate at second reading Bill C–45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

I am pleased that the government has brought forward this legislation. When the original bill was passed in this House a number of years ago, my caucus supported it but also argued that it did not go far enough. Surprise, surprise, I will make the same arguments today.

We support the changes that have been introduced: the clarification of the coverage through a new proclamation certainly giving inspectors greater authority to act in order to prevent injury or damage to people, property and the environment; the requirement that industry must put together response plans; the recall system for containers, transport packages, gas cylinders, tanks, et cetera; and a wider range of penalties, in fact some innovative penalties that would require someone who is found guilty of a breach of this act actually to spend money to provide the necessary public prevention or clean–up equipment.

I want to outline some of the additional steps we believe the Government of Canada should be taking. A lot of them focus on those men and women who are the front line of defence when there is an accident involving hazardous goods.

I am talking about the emergency response personnel, fire–fighters, police and the medical teams inevitably found at the scene of an accident involving hazardous goods, whether it is road, rail or perhaps even air. They are the first ones there. They are the ones who are responsible for (a) trying to determine what they are dealing with and (b) trying to do something about it either in terms of containment or in terms of control or elimination of the problem.

Fire–fighters are very concerned about the lack of information. This act and its predecessor act require some form of placarding on the equipment. We have all seen the rectangular signs on their edge, but most of us do not know what they mean. The fire–fighters and police are required to know.

I am also told that in the cab of the vehicle or the cab of the train—it used to be the caboose of the train; we do not have those any more—is a manifest outlining the chemicals, the hazardous goods, and how to deal with them. We have seen a number of occasions where the cab has been destroyed and there is no direct access to what is contained in the vehicle that is now leaking or oozing something.

Fire–fighters are proposing a national computerized registry that would be instantly accessible by the emergency response personnel at the site of an accident. That registry would be required to contain all the information about every shipment of hazardous goods moving by whatever mode in this country.

Before shippers could place that material into a transportation vehicle, they would have to register the information with the computer bank. They would also be required to place a unique identifier that directly related to the information placed in the data bank in a number of locations on the vehicle. If there were an accident involving a tank truck or a truck carrying low level or high level nuclear waste or any fuel or hazardous good, the emergency response team would quickly locate the bar code, feed it into the computer, and immediately know not only what was in that truck but would have a print-out as to the action it would have to take.

That action would delineate things like the kind of material to use to extinguish a fire. I am not sure if most people realize that water cannot be used on a lot of these things, that specialized foam materials or other chemicals are used to counter a fire when dealing with hazardous goods, particularly a chemical.

It would also warn the team about the toxicity of what it was dealing with, whether it becomes airborne and therefore whether all emergency personnel have to wear respirators, or whether there is the potential of contamination through the skin and whether or not they would have to wear protective clothing.

Right now we are sending our emergency response personnel into unknown hazardous situations. Quite frankly they do not know. The fire-fighters' association has documented evidence of case after case after case of fire-fighters who have eventually been diagnosed as having cancer that has been related back to a specific fire that they attended to.

We ask these men and women to put their lives on the line every time they leave the fire station, the police station or the hospital to attend to a hazardous goods accident. If we look at the breakdown of line of duty deaths for fire-fighters, we find that nearly 15 per cent are due to burns and asphyxiation, 44 per cent due to heart attack and stroke, 12 per cent due to apparatus failures, and falls by about 12 per cent as well.

Injuries due to exposure to hazardous materials of the non-inhalation kind, in other words contact with the skin, are about 2 per cent of the over-all injuries. To us it does not seem like a very large amount. However, we should think of the kind of long-term damage that can be done by fumes, by contact with cancerous agents in the line of work. It might not show up for a number of years but it can be very deadly. We need to do something about that. If we can put bar codes on every roll of toilet paper it will be very simple for us to have bar codes tied into a computerized system for every vehicle transporting hazardous goods in this country. It is a very simple process.

We have the technology to do it. All we need is the will. Bill C-45 gives us the tool to incorporate that kind of suggestion into the system. It is clearly a question of having the right to know and it will allow fire-fighters and other emergency response personnel to better ensure that public safety is promoted. The clear intent of the title of this bill is the promotion of public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

We can make those changes and I certainly will be pursuing that, as my colleagues will in committee.

The other area I would like to briefly mention is what happens to our emergency response personnel in the line of duty. A number of fire-fighters are killed every year in the line of duty. A number of fire-fighters are permanently disabled in the line of duty, and never return to work. The International Association of Fire Fighters has proposed the creation of a one-time compensation benefit paid to the survivors of those killed or permanently disabled in the line of duty. I would like to quote from one of its legislative fact sheets:

> Fire fighters and other public safety officers risk their lives daily in an effort to save the lives and property of their fellow citizens. When these brave men and women are killed in the line of duty, as they are with alarming frequency, their deaths are in defence of the citizens of their country, just as surely as a soldier who is struck down by an enemy.
> Currently, Canada has no way to acknowledge the supreme sacrifice paid by these heroes who are killed or permanently disabled in service to their country. The only compensation available to them or their families is the benefits normally available to workers injured on the job.
> One way for a grateful nation to pay its respect to these brave victims is to provide a one-time compensation benefit to the survivors of those killed or permanently disabled in the line of duty.

I know that we cannot do that within the context of Bill C-45. However I flag it as an issue that I believe the legislative committee should examine and then perhaps provide some guidance to the government.

The other area I want to deal with is infectious disease notification, and I believe we can do that by amending Bill C-45. Exposure to infectious disease is a major reason that fire-fighting is one of the world's most dangerous professions. Fire-fighters and other emergency response personnel routinely provide emergency medical treatment in unsanitary conditions on patients they know nothing about. This results in fire-fighters being occupationally exposed to a variety of dangerous contagious diseases.

Fire-fighters who have been exposed to infectious diseases need to be informed of this fact so that they can seek medical monitoring and modify their behaviour to avoid further transmission.

To address this concern the Government of the United States recently enacted a law requiring that hospitals notify emergency response personnel about the infectious status of patients treated by emergency workers. The law prohibits involuntary testing of patients and only requires the hospital to share any such information in its possession. The program is also structured to protect the confidentiality of patients. It is a balancing act.

Those men and women who are on our front lines when it comes to emergency responses, primarily with regard to the transportation of hazardous goods but also in a broader context, should have the right to know. They should know if they have inadvertently been dealing with someone who has a contagious disease and that they may have been infected either through their pores, through breathing, or other ways.

I would like to see this legislation changed to accommodate that concern so that we can provide them with, not protection but the knowledge of the diseases to which they may have been exposed. In some ways, it is no different than the chemicals which they have been exposed to in the course of their activities.

One of the other areas I want to discuss is the role of Emergency Preparedness Canada. Nothing in this legislation provides an automatic linkage to Emergency Preparedness Canada. It used to be called the Emergency Measures Organization.

In each community it is responsible for disaster plans. Its people are the ones with the expertise. They are the ones who have done the planning to evacuate the Mississaugas, to evacuate parts of Thunder Bay. That is their role. Yet there is nothing in this bill requiring their notification of any major shipments of hazardous goods coming through their area of jurisdiction. I think it has to be changed to include that notification.

Another area I want to just briefly discuss is the shipment of blood samples. Most communities do not have laboratories to analyze blood. Yet on a daily basis blood is shipped from community to community to be tested. Most of the blood would not cause any problems if someone were exposed to it, but we do not know.

A lot of this blood, certainly in northwestern Ontario, is being shipped on Greyhound buses in unmarked containers. In the winter it is not shipped in the luggage compartment but is brought inside the bus and put on the racks.

There are no specific controls. This bill needs to address that concern. Workers handle it and passengers may be exposed to it without even knowing it is there. This creates a unique situation.

The other problem is that shippers must be totally responsible. It should not just be the responsibility of the transportation company. There have been situations reported to me in which hazardous goods have been purposefully disguised as something else and transported on a Greyhound bus.

Aerosol paint cans, which have the potential to explode, are regularly being transported on Greyhound buses. That is not Greyhound's fault. It does not and is not required to ask everybody to open their parcels. It is the shipper who has decided to take the cheap route to get product from community A to community B who is violating the spirit of the act. We need to tighten that up as well.

The bill is a good progression but we have additional work to do. Certainly I would hope that in committee we have the opportunity to call the people who I have been talking about, the front line troops who have to handle the hazardous goods after there is an accident, and not just the people from the industry who come in to clean it up with their specific plans of action.

It is the people who are there within minutes of the accident happening who need to know what they are dealing with. Let us hear from them firsthand so that we can get a sense of the changes we need to make to this legislation to make it the best possible legislation to protect the public and the public's employees.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the speech just given by the member from the New Democratic Party was a very enlightening one. It contained a number of ideas. If I were to express myself on this bill with that amount of time I would probably echo a lot of the comments he made.

Dangerous goods and the transport of dangerous goods is a concern for all Canadians, more so in some regions than others.

• (1050)

I would like to provide a local riding perspective. There is a chemical plant in my hometown, not more than a quarter of a mile away from my place of residence. At that place, the ICI plant, there is a very professional response team that is very well qualified. In fact, it is recognized as the assigned response team for any accidents in Atlantic Canada and even the eastern part of the province of Quebec. It has responded to a number of train derailments involving chemicals in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick.

This is a concern. The member outlined some of the problems these response teams have when they get to that site. I certainly appreciated him mentioning the ideas of bar codes, proper clothing, and whatnot.

My question relates more specifically to the bill with the question of inspections—

[Translation]

As you know, Madam Speaker, the bill authorizes the designation of inspectors whose duties consist of monitoring compliance with the provisions of the act.

[English]

I know that the hon. member is quite concerned with transportation and that he participated quite extensively in the debate yesterday on air deregulation. I know that he is quite aware that we are talking about some types of deregulation in the transport industry in all modes.

I am wondering if the member could assist me and members of the House by advising us whether he feels that there is an undertaking by the government to ensure that we have enough inspectors and whether there will be proper training for those inspectors. I would also like him to comment on whether he thinks that the government would provide the money. Yesterday we heard in the debate, time and time again, people questioning whether the government had the commitment to ensure that inspectors were definitely in place.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his comments and his questions.

In examining the Department of Transport estimates for the current fiscal year it was clear, at least on the rail side, that it had made a conscious decision to increase the level of funding for rail safety and I applaud that. This is not something that people normally expect me to say in this House, but when it does a good thing it should be complimented for it.

However, only time will tell whether the continuing cutbacks by the railroads themselves, as they cut corners and find ways to be more competitive with their competitors in the United States and with trucking, will mean that we will see an increase in accidents in spite of the number of inspectors.

Keep in mind that the railroads themselves have their own inspection crews to monitor the safety of the operations. This has changed from a situation in which an individual would walk the whole length of the train and then the other side to check all the important components to one in which there is a drive–by inspection in which somebody just stands and watches to see if anything is hanging down. The railroads are doing that.

The government inspectors check the inspectors. I do not believe that the system is more safe today than it was 10 years ago, in fact I would suggest the opposite.

Also with regard to the member's comments, there was an article in The Ottawa Citizen on March 16, just a couple of weeks ago, about the closing of a stretch of highway 401 west of Cornwall. It was closed for 13 hours when a cylinder of chemicals fell off a flatbed trailer truck.

The mishap late Saturday afternoon had police and fire–fighters from nearby Ingleside scrambling to prepare for possible explosions and toxic gas leaks. They believed that the 20,000 kilogram cylinder contained highly explosive liquid nitro–oxyacetylene. The Ingleside fire chief, Shaw Lalonde, said that later information revealed that the chemical was in less dangerous gel form. He said that there was mass confusion as to what was in that container and blamed the trouble on incorrect paperwork.

This is a classic example showing that we need bar codes and a national computerized registry so that we do not have this kind of confusion, chaos, and danger.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I thought the member gave a very interesting speech demonstrating his knowledge of the area.

I would like to ask him another question concerning this issue. I am sure he is aware of the private members' bill introduced by the member for Mission—Coquitlam, Bill C-334, an act respecting the identification of dangerous goods and to amend the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act.

I wonder if he could clarify the need for such legislation in Canada. I know that in the province of Manitoba there have been many incidents that have scared people in Winnipeg and in rural areas in which towns have had to be evacuated because there is not adequate protection at the present. I wonder if the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan could provide more of an explanation on this issue. I am sure that his explanation of the importance of the bill of the member for Mission—Coquitlam would be beneficial not only to the House but to other Canadians.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

While the private members' bill put forward by my colleague is extremely important and relevant we have agreed, in consultation with her, to attempt to incorporate her suggestions into Bill C-45 so that the legislation could proceed to the benefit of the public and the emergency response personnel which we have to rely on.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to clarify a point made in the hon. member's address about the dissemination of initial emergency response guides provided by CANUTEC. This has been developed in my remarks.

Initial Emergency Response Guide is a book in its third edition. I want to point out to the hon. member that Transport Canada provides it free to all fire department vehicles, including volunteer fire departments, police highway vehicles and emergency response organizations. I am pleased to provide it to the hon. member with our compliments.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the response of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. However, I want to point out that a handbook does not tell us what is in that truck if the placards have been destroyed as a result of the accident.

The whole point of my intervention about the computerized registry is to take that book and incorporate that information into it with the addition of any specific updates on specific loads on specific days.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to be able to participate in the debate on this bill. Before I begin I would like to congratulate the administration on a job very well done in addressing some of the issues ignored by the previous bill, the 1980 act.

As well, I want to thank my colleague for Hamilton West who very nicely addressed some of the concerns our party has about this bill.

[Translation]

Finally, this bill identifies nine classes of dangerous goods and regulates their transportation in terms of securing the safety of the public, property and the environment. The nine classes of dangerous goods are as follows: explosives, compressed gases, inflammable liquids, inflammable solids, oxidizing substances, toxic substances, radioactive materials, corrosives and miscellaneous dangerous goods, including environmental pollutants.

[English]

This bill attempts to deal with a variety of issues concerning the transportation of dangerous goods from one location to the next. It attempts to strengthen the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. It also attempts to provide a clearer legal framework for regulating the transportation of dangerous goods. It seeks to place additional emphasis on taking steps prior to transportation to protect the safety of people, property and environment.

The 1980 act that was in place attempted to bring in partners such as the territorial and provincial governments to set up some standards dealing with the transportation of dangerous goods.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. I will have to interrupt the hon. member who will be given the floor after Question Period.

NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I promised myself that I would stay clear of the arts this session, but today I am going to break my vow.

In front of the House of Commons today stands on display part of a painting by Ken Kirby called: "Isumataq". If those gorgeous people down at the National Gallery could give their heads a shake, this real piece of art could be hanging in the place of "Stripe of Ire with no Voice". Our art gallery could become Canadian again representing this land, true north strong and free.

As I see it Ken Kirby should be given the Order of Canada and "Isumataq" could become the new voice of unity at our National Gallery before it is purchased by the United States of America.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of all Canadians the plight of the commercial printing industry in Canada.

Since the free trade agreement came into effect, U.S. customs harassment based on country of origin markings has cost our printers 1,700 jobs and $160 million in lost exports. Since the FTA was implemented, Canada's annual print deficit with the U.S. has reached $330 million. That is a 200 per cent increase since 1988.

Here is the problem in a nutshell. The country of origin marking regulations in the U.S. are far too strict and are not always applied fairly. On the other hand, Canada's regulations need to be tightened to ensure that imported products are properly marked.

Canadian commercial printers want a level playing field with the Americans. They do not have that now. The problem cannot be wished away. It requires government action now.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like to share with the House some of the advice my constituents are giving me.

Heather and Dennis Sheehan of Caledon East write:

> We are optimists. We love Canada. We know we are Canadians. Quebec is very much a part of Canada. We all came here from somewhere else. The more we travel and meet others the more we appreciate what we have here.

Paul Lonergan of Milton writes:

> We are certainly creating a debt legacy at every level of government that will stifle and strangle future generations. Governments must begin saying no to social net programs and individuals must be made more responsible for their own welfare.

Finally, Roger Lang of Burlington writes:

> I want to see this country be one I can be proud of personally and internationally. We may have family differences but we must rise to a best for all positions rather than repeatedly studying and trying to satisfy every vocal group. We need to change the political system so elected officials work together for Canada rather than trying to make sure they only get re-elected.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the UNCED Earth Summit in Brazil in June is an opportunity for Canada and all nations to make a strong commitment to our shared environment and to take real action to protect it. Yet Canada is not standing up for meaningful international agreements on such important issues as global warming.

Instead of putting forward solid proposals to meet its own commitment to reduce the emission of CO_2 gases, Canada is asking for credit for tree planting, wanting to deal with the symptoms of the problem rather than deal with the fundamental causes, energy production and use in Canada.

We have joined other nations in blocking a proposal to put environmental controls on international corporations. It is fine to talk about sustainable development, but where was Canada when GATT decided that environmental protection was not necessarily an acceptable trade impediment? Where are we in our argument for an integrated environmental—

THE BATTLE OF VIMY RIDGE

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, next week, the Prime Minister, President Mitterand of France and a dozen very special veterans will attend a ceremony at Vimy Ridge, the site of the inspiring victory that took place 75 years ago. The veterans of Vimy will be represented by the few that remain of those who fought at Vimy Ridge and covered their country with glory.

Madam Speaker, I wonder whether they remember the promise made by Prime Minister Robert Borden before the battle of Vimy Ridge in 1917. He said that government and country would consider it their sacred duty to ensure that Canadians would appreciate to the fullest their efforts and courage and that no soldier, whether he returned to Canada or remained in Flanders, would be able to say the government did not keep its word, both to those who came back victorious and to those who died.

Madam Speaker, I trust that subsequent governments have done their best to keep this promise. When we think back 75 years, we should not forget that although our gratitude knows no limits, nevertheless—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

MEXICO

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, why is the Canadian government rushing to sign away Canadian jobs and sovereignty to Mexico, whose government imprisons its citizens for peacefully demonstrating on behalf of workers and farmers?

Senor Luis Aguilar Salazar was arrested on March 17 during a peaceful protest demonstration. He is a candidate of the opposition PRD for the local congress. He is also a counsellor to the Frente Democratico Campesino, a peasant group supported by Canadian NGOs. He was charged with criminal offences relating to a previous peaceful demonstration of peasants.

He is now known in Mexico as the first political prisoner of the North American free trade agreement because President Salinas fears public demonstrations.

I call on the Prime Minister to demand that President Salinas release Senor Aguilar Salazar and stop the police from harassing critics of the government.

SERVICE CHARGES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, the most recent report from Statistics Canada is critical of the increase in service charges, which have tripled service charge revenues in chartered banks since 1980.

My constituent, Al Deruiter, owner of the Port Colborne Catering and Vending Company, will not be surprised at this. Mr. Deruiter, quite rightly, objects to paying $2.15 per $100 for rolled and counted coins when sorted currency is $1.40 per $1,000. He now has an added cost of $150 a month, a cost he can ill afford.

Service charges are destroying relations between business and bankers at a time when the business community should be working together. I plead with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to consider this matter seriously and to take appropriate action.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, yet another deadline is going to pass and the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations will remain unresolved. I urge the government to keep maximum pressure on GATT participants to stress the importance of strengthening and clarifying article XI.

The Prime Minister is obliged to personally explain Canada's balance position to President Bush, but this has yet to happen. Meanwhile, the anxiousness of Canadian farmers in the agrifood industry is increasing. This uncertainty must not continue, as the cost is too great. I urge the government to get the job done.

S. O. 31

BORDEN CATELLI LTD.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the announcement by the U.S. pasta company Borden Catelli Ltd. that it will close its plant in Winnipeg is more bad news for the food processing industry in Manitoba.

What is more frustrating about this closure is that it could have been avoided. Other groups, including the employees, have indicated they would buy the factory and keep the plant working. However, Catelli refuses to sell the plant. Instead, the factory will be stripped, the empty building will be sold and the jobs will be lost.

The attitude of this American company is disgraceful. It shows what little loyalty American companies have to Canadian workers and for the communities that are devastated by such arrogant moves.

The provincial Conservative government is standing aside and doing nothing for Manitoba on this issue. What will it take for the Conservatives to stand up for the farm families and the workers? If a U.S. company will not maintain a Canadian factory, it should be required to sell to those who are willing to buy it. If the Conservatives will not support Manitoba workers, they should hand over the government to somebody who will.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of Parliament a matter that is of great concern to many Canadians and citizens of other countries, namely the intention of the government to further weaken its position of respect in the world by pulling out more peacekeeping troops from NATO.

There are press reports citing a spokesperson for the Secretary of State for External Affairs stating the opinion that the Canadian peacekeeping troops in Cyprus should be removed since, and I quote: "There doesn't seem to be much progress nor effort at times being spent by the parties concerned to come to a resolution". I would like to ask the minister on what facts she bases this assertion or lack of effort on in light of previous assurances that the government was not planning to remove the troops from Cyprus.

I would like to know what has changed. Canada's commitment to ensuring a peaceful settlement of the dispute in Cyprus must not be weakened by short-sighted cost-saving measures.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate Veterans Affairs on the television ad it has produced to commemorate the 75th anniversary of Vimy Ridge. Veterans in my riding have often complained that Canadians are not taught enough about our own history. They say that our kids know more about American victories than our own.

That is why it is so refreshing to see us telling the story of one of the greatest victories in our history. Seventy-five years ago this week the Canadian Corps succeeded where other armies had failed and showed the world what a young country called Canada could accomplish.

I am also delighted that Canadians will also have the chance to learn more about the Dieppe raid. Fifty years ago this year Canadians were chosen to test Hitler's Fortress Europe and, like the Canadian Corps at Vimy, our forces responded with great courage and discipline.

These campaigns have left us with an enduring lesson for, as the commercial says about the Vimy victory, "This is the spirit of Canadians working together".

RAILTECH LTD.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, this government is about to embark on yet another silly, expensive and wrong-headed cross-border shopping trip. Some months ago, the government announced that it was tendering for the construction of the space agency in Montreal. Railtech Ltd., a manufacturer in my riding, was pleased that it was going to have an opportunity to bid for the curtain walls of the space agency. However, it now appears that the government will award the $1.5 million contract for curtain walls to a U.S. supplier. Worse yet, it is not reciprocal. Similar products made by Railtech cannot be used in many contracts for rail cars in the United States, for instance, because of a "Buy American" policy that many cities and state jurisdictions have.

This government has to answer why it is continuously exporting Canadian jobs south of the border.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, last week I had the privilege as a parliamentarian, representing Parliamentarians for Global Action, to attend a meeting in Italy on a proposal to create an international criminal court. Members of the International Law Commission of the United Nations, distinguished diplomats, expert law professors from all over the world, including Professor Sharon Williams of Canada and Cherif Bassiouni of the United States, legal advisers and judges put forward a proposal for an international criminal court and a model international criminal code to go with it. Surely this is an idea whose time has come.

Take the current problem of the Libyan nationals accused of blowing up western airliners, including the Pan Am jet over Lockerbie, Scotland. Clearly, there is some doubt whether the Libyans could get a fair trial in Libya and Libya is reluctant to surrender them to a U.K. or a U.S. court. The solution is a world criminal court.

Take the case of international drug dealers, genocide or criminal environmental acts like what we saw during the gulf war, cases again for such a court.

Madam Speaker, I call on the House to urge the Government of Canada to support at the United Nations Sixth Committee this fall the proposal for an international criminal court, an idea whose time has come.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, I rise to offer congratulations. Last week we were given the welcome news that merchant mariners were to receive veteran status and, of course, all of the benefits that flow from that status. I congratulate the leaders of various merchant navy organizations and associations for winning what had been a long and frustrating fight for equal status.

I also congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs for giving merchant mariners attention and justice. In November we had another instance of veterans winning a lengthy fight when Korean war veterans belatedly received a Canadian Volunteer Service Medal. Just like the merchant mariners, the Korean veterans had been turned down by government after government. In contrast, this government and this Minister of Veterans Affairs find solutions, not excuses. I wish to congratulate him.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, last week the Department of National Defence announced that it will consolidate armed forces supply depot operations by moving the Toronto and Moncton depots to Montreal.

In February 1990 a private research consultant was paid by the Department of National Defence to examine depot consolidation. This study, which examined operational costs, freight distribution costs, real estate values and construction costs concluded that both the Montreal and Toronto depots should be closed down and I quote: "The site for the new facility should be within the proximity of the city of Kingston, Ontario".

What is the point in paying private research consultants to carry out detailed technical evaluations of military operations when their recommendations are ignored for political purposes? What is the point in arguing that the government and national defence are doing all they can to be cost effective when ministers can override decisions which save Canadians millions?

Canadians are demanding cost effective, efficient government. Instead, all they get from this group is empty rhetoric, broken promises and patronage for Tory fat cats.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries concerning the so-called offers made by the European Community yesterday on overfishing.

We know the minister has characterized these offers as an insult and a political gimmick. The bottom line is, these are not offers. They are a slap in the face to Canadian fishermen. We know the minister can deliver on rhetoric.

What we would like to know today is what action he specifically intends to take to tell these Europeans that these offers are a joke and that we want real action.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, we have received no offer from the European Community as yet. There are reports in the newspapers that the commissioner for fisheries is to suggest to the ministers of fisheries of the European Community, who are meeting, that some kind of an offer be made to Canada, that they would reduce by some percentage their quota for northern cod.

Since they have no proper quota for northern cod outside 200 miles, since they are ignoring a moratorium with respect to cod that was imposed by NAFO, the international body for the area that manages fisheries matters, and they have been ignoring that since 1986, we can hardly be impressed by their suggestion that they would reduce their quota.

In addition, the facts are that on March 16 the European Community issued a report with respect to surveillance and enforcement of their own European Community waters and they frankly admitted that they are unable to enforce their own rules in their own European Community waters. If they are unable to enforce the rules on Spain and Portugal in their own community waters, what must the situation be with respect to surveillance and enforcement outside 200 miles?

Such an offer is obviously not one that we are interested in. Number one, they have no quota to offer us to reduce and number two, they have no powers of surveillance and enforcement over Spain and Portugal. This is not anything in which anyone is going to be fooled.

With respect to action—

An hon. member: Time.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, I will get to action if the hon. lady ever gets to a sensible question.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the minister may sit there as a puffed up sculpin, which is about the level of his reaction to date. I want to ask him this question. He has just made the case very specifically for Canadians to take custodial management of our own waters and the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

Given the minister's vicious attack on the plan yesterday, which we in fact agreed with, given his assessment of the non-offers by the Europeans, will he today declare custodial management over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I would prefer to be a sculpin than a blow-fish.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

• (1120)

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the first thing I do in the mornings is not necessarily read Jeffrey Simpson. That is something I would rather do in the evenings so that I have time to contemplate the points that are being made.

I will just give you some idea of the action being taken. For two weeks now we have invited and arranged for European journalists to visit Newfoundland to see for themselves the effects of the actions of the European Community with respect to our fishing industry.

We are pressing in New York our resolution with respect to the rights of the coastal state to manage straddling stocks.

This week we had Premier Wells down there as a witness. We are quite willing to use anyone at all who is interested in this issue to make our point, so we are pressing this resolution before international bodies. We are continuing our diplomatic approaches in various capitals.

The Prime Minister himself will be taking this matter up with Mr. Delors, the president of the European Community on April 23 when he meets President Mitterrand and other leaders of the European Community. There is a very vigorous campaign under way in connection with this issue.

We first have to persuade the rest of the world that it would be right for us to extend fishery jurisdiction before we take that step, because at the present time the rest of the world does not recognize the rights of anyone to manage fishery resources beyond the 200-mile economic zone provided for in the Law of the Sea Convention.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister will be happy to know that the minister would rather be a sculpin than a blow-fish.

Since 1986 the Europeans have ignored a moratorium on fishing. They have ignored international law. They have ignored NAFO. Once again, in the House today, we heard the minister saying he wants to talk this thing through diplomatically.

Has he not understood, by the results of these insulting offers, that the time for talk is ended, the time for action is now and we, as Canadians, must extend custodial management over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to hear the hon. member say that she is against rhetoric, but she should certainly start to apply it to herself.

With reference to this situation, we are proceeding by diplomatic means to try to settle this issue, which is the normal way that civilized countries, particularly of the democratic persuasion, proceed.

If using diplomacy bilaterally and multilaterally in every way that we can, we still fail to achieve our objective then we will have to consider whether some kind of unilateral action will have to be taken or not. At that stage, we would want to have the majority of the world's countries support what we are doing in the realization that we have made every other possible effort to solve this situation by peaceful and diplomatic processes.

Canada is a country that believes in peacekeeping. Canada is not a country that believes in the use of violence and force. We are not trying to settle this matter—

Ms. Copps: Who said violence?

Mr. Crosbie: Well, if we say that we have a management regime beyond 200 miles and we tell some country that it cannot fish or it can only catch a certain amount of fish beyond the 200 miles because that is our management regime and it says we do not recognize it what is the next step?

Everything the hon. member says is replete with the use of the threat of force if other countries do not accept our management regime. Let us be sensible, drop the rhetoric. Let us get on with the kind of campaign that we are waging. If that fails to be successful—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we should go on.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I would preface it by saying that surely by this time he should realize that his approach has failed. When is the government going to do something about it?

I want to also say, with great regret, that the mishandling of the fishery on the east coast is now being repeated on the west coast. I have correspondence from Canadian officials to their U.S. counterparts on the Fraser panel which says that the U.S. quota this year should be 360,000 fish. The U.S. response is that it intends to authorize 870,000 salmon being caught, a clear repudiation of its obligations under the salmon treaty.

I want to ask the minister this question. Considering the important loss this will represent to the west coast fishery, why is the minister and this government allowing the U.S. to repudiate its U.S. treaty obligations? Why is it allowing the U.S. to overfish the west coast salmon stocks?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, one listens to these questions with incredulity.

We are said to be allowing the U.S. to do this and allowing the U.S. to do that. Surely the United States does not seek the permission of other countries when it decides whether it is going to observe a treaty or violate a treaty, so we are not allowing the U.S. to do anything.

In fact, we are disagreeing with the U.S. forcefully with respect to its suggested attitude to the Pacific salmon treaty. That treaty clearly states that the U.S. catch of Fraser River sockeye is to be capped at seven million between 1989 and 1992. The treaty says that the catch includes Fraser River sockeye wherever they are caught, including Fraser bound sockeye caught in Alaskan waters.

The United States wishes to make a change now. It says it does not intend to include Fraser River bound sockeye which were harvested in Alaskan waters over the past three years as part of the seven million allocation. That would obviously be a breach of this treaty and we are strenuously objecting.

We will take what action is necessary to counteract it if the United States attempts to do that. We are not allowing the Americans to do this. The opposition is not allowing it. The opposition's rhetoric is really very, very careless.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister is certainly right when he says he is not a blow-fish.

He is a head-waiter to other countries, simply allowing them to break their treaty obligations and to go ahead and unilaterally assert their right to overfish the Pacific salmon fishery.

I want to ask the minister a question. If the government is so intent on asserting its rights, will the minister undertake direct representation to his counterpart in Washington? Will he be calling in the U.S. ambassador? Will he be taking action at the ministerial level in order to ensure that the fishing season which starts in a matter of weeks will not find itself with the Americans putting the boots to Canadian fisheries like he has done on the east coast?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): The hon. gentleman reminds me of a puff-fish, not a blow-fish.

With respect to this question, this is a matter that we are taking up with the United States, using the usual means by which one takes up matters with neighbours and friends and those who one has treaties with.

We are making it very clear to the United States that it has left only 360,000 sockeye if it observes the provisions of this treaty. That is our position, and we continue to put that to the United States.

It is deplorable that the Americans do not seem to want to observe obligations that they enter into solemnly. This is not something that has happened in connection with the salmon treaty, but that does not mean to say that one cuts off all relationships with the United States.

We have to remind ourselves that it is the market for 75 per cent of our exports, no matter how much the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg huffs and puffs. The way he huffs and puffs, the only house he is going to blow down is his own.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

This week a delegation of New Democratic members of Parliament, at their own expense, met in Washington with American government and industry officials regarding softwood lumber.

They were there, of course, because thousands of jobs are at stake and are being threatened by U.S. harassment on the softwood lumber issue.

What this delegation found was that the U.S. government and the industry are really demanding the wholesale export of raw logs from Canada into the United States. The wholesale export of raw logs means the export of Canadian jobs.

My question for the minister is this. What has the Canadian government done to make it very clear that we will not accept this demand, and that we will not accept free trade in logs?

• (1130)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, what we have done on the broad softwood lumber issue is to take the Americans to the GATT on three issues related to the softwood lumber issue.

We have also vigorously challenged the countervailing duty action, working with the provinces and with the industry as it relates to the injection of the log export controls as a countervailable subsidy.

We have objected strenuously to the U.S. administration and pointed out to them that in 1983 and in 1986 there was no suggestion that log export controls were a countervailable subsidy. In this case they brought this in and we are pointing out to them that it looks to us that they want to see a result at the end and they are using all means to arrive at that end result.

What is most ridiculous about the position of the Americans on this is that they have log export controls themselves. We are pointing out that discrepancy between the two positions they have taken.

I think the leader of the New Democratic Party can be absolutely sure that we are taking the strongest possible action that we can to fight this one.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the minister of course is quite right when he says that the American federal government has its own ban on the export of raw logs. But it seems clear both through the industry and through the Bush administration's initiated action on softwood lumber that they are trying to use the fact that certain provinces have a ban on the export of raw logs as constituting an effective subsidy.

I am pleased that the minister says he is fighting this vigorously but this is a very serious issue. It does affect Canadian jobs and Canadian sovereignty. Americans are protecting American sovereignty and American jobs.

The minister says he is standing up for Canadians on this particular issue but what action is he prepared to take to ensure that Canada's position is put forward very forcefully on behalf of Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I do not understand the question. I just stated what the actions were. If my hon. friend has any further suggestions based on her colleagues' trip to Washington, let her put forward those proposals.

In the GATT there are the actions we are taking against the countervailing duty action by the United States.

There is also the promotion campaign we have in the United States ensuring that Americans understand the result of this countervailing action that it is causing an increase in the price of lumber. It is causing an increase in the price of houses at a time when they are trying to get the U.S. economy going.

What I said when I commented on this in Atlanta a couple of weeks ago was that the Americans are shooting themselves in the foot with the actions they have taken.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the minister is aware I am sure that there is a very strong feeling both in the government administration and in the industry that the wholesale exportation of raw logs from Canada is the ultimate aim.

Certainly both of those groups told our delegation very clearly that, even if Canada were to win in this particular dispute this time, in two years they would continue the harassment on this because that is the ultimate aim.

It is a question of whether we Canadians can have control over our own economy to build up the secondary industry that we have to do. It is absolutely essential that the government assure every Canadian that we are not going to export our jobs and that we will have an economic strategy that means there will be Canadian jobs and secondary industry in this country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the words of support that the hon. member is providing for the positions we are taking.

It is precisely because we wanted to have that sovereign control over the management of our forest industry that we took the decision to terminate the memorandum of understanding, I should say strictly according to its terms.

We are in full agreement with the sentiments she is expressing. We are working closely with the provinces and the industry to put forward the strongest possible case. I say to her again, if she has any suggestions as to how we can strengthen our case, I would welcome them.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

He has reacted to the European Community suggestion that cod quotas should be cut as a political gesture with the words insult, provocation and subterfuge. Those are tough words. The question is: Why is the minister not acting as tough?

If he says we have to be civilized little Canadians going on negotiating for years and years, I remind him that Iceland, one of the oldest democracies in the world and hardly a warmonger, asserted its rights when diplomacy failed.

Why is he on behalf of the Government of Canada not willing to assert similar rights for Canadian fishermen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the rhetoric is certainly flowing strongly this morning.

With respect to the way of proceeding, I believe in the old adage, speak softly and carry a big stick.

Ms. Clancy: Where is the big stick?

Mr. Crosbie: Well, the big stick will be produced when speaking softly no longer works.

An hon. member: It is not working John.

Mr. Crosbie: With reference to the hon. gentleman's question, what course of action is he suggesting we adopt that we are not adopting now?

We have a resolution before the United Nations Conference on Environmental Development which, by the way, originated in a meeting we called in St. John's, Newfoundland two years ago to start this process. We have convinced 40 other countries to associate themselves with this resolution that would resolve the problem.

We have been dealing with the European Community on a diplomatic level for several years. The Prime Minister is going to carry on intensive discussions of this issue with leaders of the various European Community countries. We have had the foreign media over to Newfoundland to see with their own eyes what the situation is so they can explain it at home.

This is the course of action we are on. What is wrong with our course of action? What more does the hon. gentleman think we can do at the moment?

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, it is very clear that the course of action is not working. It has not worked and is obviously not going to work.

What I fail to understand is that the way he talks is not in the character of the minister. He is not that kind of person. Why does he not admit now, the same as Iceland did, that diplomacy has not worked, is not going to work and we must take unilateral action to assert the rights of our people now.

The difference between us and him is that he feels at some point in the future we have to take action. We say take it now.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, if we are going to appeal to history we should at least have it accurate.

When this situation occurred before, when there was a huge fishing effort on the stocks in the northwest Atlantic in the 1960s and 1970s when the hon. gentleman's government was in power, they took in excess of 1,800,000 tonnes of codfish from the northwest Atlantic.

During that period there was a negotiation for 10, 12 or 14 years to achieve the Law of the Sea Convention. Then the hon. gentleman's government entered into an agreement with the European Community in 1977 to give the European Community the right to fish within our 200-mile limit. That did not expire until 1986.

When they were in power they were not the powerful tigers, the ferocious, violent desperadoes they want to say that we should be, now that we are in power. When they were in power they did not act in the way they are now advising us to act.

We are pursuing diplomacy and as long as the diplomatic efforts have a chance to succeed, that is the route we are going. Canadians are not a people who resort to force and violence. We are peacekeepers and that is the course we are going to continue on.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. I want to ask the minister about these trade wars that Canada is losing.

Canadian-made computers have become the latest target of U.S. protectionism. The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement was supposed to protect these industries, but instead they continually find themselves in trade disputes.

I want to ask the minister: Did the minister tell his American counterpart at the NAFTA negotiations that he was unwilling to open up Canadian computer content rules?

• (1140)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, this is a proposal that was put on the table during the NAFTA negotiations. It is a rule that is a good deal more restrictive than has been the case under the FTA.

We rejected it at the negotiating table. At the meetings next week when I will be meeting with my counterpart from the United States I propose to reiterate that rejection. It is something we do not accept.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, the minister seems to be unaware that Canada is in a trade war. Look at lobster, softwood lumber, steel, wheat, salmon, Hondas, beer, computers and the list goes on.

When will the minister wake up to the reality that Canadians do not have faith in him to protect their interests in international trade? When will he take some real action against the Americans on these issues?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, this sort of a question does nothing to further the debate. We have taken specific actions that have successfully defended the rights of the people in his constituency.

In the pork countervail action where we were being beaten by the Americans through their process, we took it to the dispute settlement panel and we won. They took it back. We won a second time. What has happened is that the Americans have paid back the duties to the pork producers.

That is one example, that I spell out in detail, of how we have protected the interests of Canadians and particularly the interests in his community. We are continuing to fight these battles whether it is in softwood lumber, whether it is in Honda, whether it is in magnesium, whatever the actions are.

I just point out to my hon. friend when you have the largest single bilateral trading relationship in the world, you do have these disputes. What we do have now that we did not have before in the free trade agreement is a dispute settlement panel which makes binding decisions which have affected Canada very positively.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, Friday is fish day so I would like to go back to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Manuel Marin, the European fisheries commissioner said that the European Community has volunteered to have the evidence on stocks and EC damage to them examined by the scientific committee of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization but Canada refused.

That statement left as it is could be damaging. I invite the minister to comment on it.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, with respect to this question, when we started pressing the European Community in January 1989, after the half-sacked report of that year in connection with this matter, their first line of defence was that these were findings by Canadian scientists not necessarily agreed to by the European Community scientists. Therefore, we said that was fine.

All that information is available to the NAFO scientists. We are making it available to the European Community scientists. We have made all of our information fully available to the scientists of the European Community.

We have just had Ambassador Gherson and the chief of our science branch visit the European Community, Spain, Portugal and the United Kingdom to go over all of this material and evidence with them.

This is simply an excuse dredged up by the European Community suggesting that there should now be a meeting of the NAFO scientific committee. The NAFO scientific committee will be meeting in any event and we will be there.

All of our information is available to anyone that wants it. We have not had any disagreement from European Community scientists with respect to our information. There has been no disagreement in the last several years. So this is just an attempt to confuse the issue.

The evidence is plain. Last year we had a quota of 190,000 tonnes for northern cod and we could only catch 127,000 tonnes. Who needs more evidence, scientific or otherwise, than the fact that the fish are not there to be caught?

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, the minister's last statement indicates we are out of fish. Yet the European Community seems to be catching more than its quota every year which would seem to indicate their stocks are in good shape.

In any case, I wanted to ask a question of the minister. There has been a lot of talk. He spoke on March 30, as reported in Hansard at page 9017, about other methods and he has been talking about that today. Before we get into those other methods, could the minister tell us what is the level of support we are getting in NAFO itself?

There are 10 members, one of them being the EC. What about the other nine members? Are they supportive of our position or not? How about the European Community itself? Are there any members of the European Community that will support us in this fight before we have to resort to these other methods?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, with reference to NAFO, I believe there are either 12 or 13 members of NAFO. All the others have been supportive of our position and have accepted NAFO quotas.

The one exception is the European Community, has refused, ever since Spain and Portugal joined the European Community in 1986, to accept the decisions of NAFO with respect to the northern cod and with respect to certain flounder, redfish stocks, and American plaice. The other countries involved have been supportive of conservation measures and of NAFO decisions. That is the position up to the moment.

With respect to the other members of the European Community, I have to report frankly that we have not received any enthusiastic support from them. I have visited the United Kingdom, for example, France and Germany. Their ministers are sympathetic when we are there but they never take any steps at the internal meetings of the European Community to raise this question or to put pressure on Spain and Portugal to stop these practices.

That is why we are asking them now at the very top, that is when the Prime Minister meets with them, to put pressure on Spain and Portugal to act like civilized countries and not despoilers of the environment and destroyers of certain animal species that are going to disappear if their actions do not cease.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The town of Fort Erie and the Peace Bridge Authority have both made representations to me with regard to the special designated lanes to speed up traffic.

Since this method has proven to be very successful, will the minister inform the House today whether he will continue with the designated lanes program?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, these initiatives were put in place as a result of extensive consultations with the border communities. As a result of the implementation of these special tourist lanes, both the tourist industry as well as the border communities have accepted them as being very beneficial.

In fact the mayor of Fort Erie stated just the other day, and I will quote briefly: "The special tourist lane put in place to respond to traffic problems has been extremely successful".

With endorsements like these of course we are going to continue to keep those tourist lanes in place wherever applicable and wherever necessary.

MURATA ERIE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, Trenton, Ontario in my riding has been devastated in the last months by the loss of hundreds of jobs. Trentonians have had enough and today as I speak hundreds are demonstrating in the streets asking for assistance.

The cause of today's demonstration is the announcement by MuRata Erie on Wednesday of this week of the closure of its plant and the loss of its last 300 jobs.

My question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Since 1987 MuRata Erie has been the recipient of more than $1 million in government defence industry subsidies under DIPP. Will the government commit today to use MuRata Erie's DIPP funding in conjunction with a portion of UI benefits to go to employees and work with the community of Trenton to convert MuRata Erie's site and available human resources to a new peacetime productive activity?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, no one is happy when they see the lay-off of people from a company that is an important employer in a community.

What my hon. friend has suggested is something that we have been doing. We have been working with companies that have been active in the military field to try to help them to make a transition into non-military products. The program that has been used by and large has been the Defence Industry Productivity Program which does provide for that type of funding of research projects that provide the base for employment in new fields of activity.

• (1150)

If my hon. friend wants to encourage this company, MuRata Erie, to come to the government with a proposal, we would certainly look upon that with great interest.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the MuRata Company has announced its closure and we are hoping that this minister will use DIPP funding to help the community to convert that industry.

Last week the Citizens' Inquiry into Peace and Security in its report entitled Transformation Moment called for a national economic conversion effort targeted at our defence industries. Our own leader and party have consistently called for conversion and global arms control initiatives.

Will the government commit today to bringing forward a security policy green paper response to these critical issues and demonstrate how it intends to respond in a meaningful way to Canadians' concerns for conversion of our defence industries and the promotion of global arms controls?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think my first answer responded in part to her second question.

The Prime Minister has taken an active position on arms control and the importance of reducing the levels of armaments, particularly in the so-called hot spots of the world. Our international actions and activities are dedicated in that direction.

As far as internally or domestically is concerned, the Canadian military industry or the Canadian high-tech industry is much less reliant on military than many other countries. We do not have nearly the same challenge as other countries do in transforming companies from military purposes to non-military purposes.

Just to repeat my earlier answer, the Defence Industry Productivity Program is set up to help companies make that transition. I would encourage the member to work with the people of MuRata Erie to see whether there is some basis on which we can provide funding.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In Winnipeg and in virtually every other major Canadian city there are waiting lists for training programs of two years or more. These Canadians want training so that they can get jobs.

Despite this, the government has cut $100 million from its Canadian Jobs Strategy this year on top of the $100 million cut last year, affecting the disabled, immigrants, and those people who are social welfare recipients.

The co-chair of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board has said that this contradicts stated government policy to improve global competitiveness. What precisely is this government prepared to do now to eliminate those waiting lists and to provide jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is incredible that people would stand up in this House and lead Canadians and unemployed people out there to believe that we are actually spending less money to train Canadians than in the past, when in fact people ought to know that political party opposed this government trying to provide more funding for training unemployed Canadians.

The result is that this year we have increased the funding, the over-all training budget, by $300 million. It is $1.8 billion that will be spent under the unemployment insurance fund to train unemployed Canadians.

If the hon. member is trying to suggest that we are doing less, I do not think he is telling the truth.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

We must remember that there are over 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed at this very moment. There are more Canadians unemployed than there were before and there is less money per capita being spent.

In the last Speech from the Throne the government stated: "Governments will be asked to develop a learning culture to equip Canadian men and women to participate fully in creating and sharing Canadian prosperity".

How then can a $200 million cut in training, coupled with a $250 million cut to colleges and universities, the continuation of the GST on books and other learning materials, adding six months' interest to student loans and cutting $66 million from the SEED program since 1985, achieve more competitiveness, increase productivity, and create a learning culture? How?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Liberals are at it again: increase the deficit, mortgage the future of Canadians, or increase taxes the old Liberal way.

Canada is spending close to $50 billion a year on learning and training. Only one country in the world spends a little bit more—Denmark. Yet when we consider the learning and training system in Canada, we find that we are slipping in comparison to our international competitors.

In the prosperity initiative we are seeking stakeholders in the economy, educators, individual Canadians, labour, business and government to work together to try to identify and come up with an action plan which will result in a bigger bang for the buck. The money is there. The issue is: let's spend smarter, not more like the Liberals would want us to do.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

During the last few weeks I have given the minister and his department documents outlining the Green Party's and the Reform Party's dangerous abuse of the political tax credit. Despite the fact that we support the right of Canadians to give to causes of political parties of their choice, I am very concerned about the precedent setting loophole that has been created.

Will the minister confirm what he has said to me in private, that his department is powerless under the present Elections Act to close this loophole, and ensure that taxpayers' money is only used for electoral purposes or for the purposes of supporting the ongoing operations of political parties?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, no new loophole has been created. As the law now stands, I want to make it very clear that if a contribution is made to a political party in cash or a negotiable instrument, issuance of a political tax credit is appropriate.

However, if a political contribution is made to a political party, through a political party to another organization for other purposes, then it is inappropriate to issue a tax credit.

Having said that, we are always anxious to improve on any law. Because of numerous recent allegations on this matter, I have spoken to the Chief Electoral Officer as recently as yesterday. I have asked him to review the whole matter of issuance of tax credits throughout the Elections Act, and because of these allegations I would be happy to discuss the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and review the Income Tax Act as well.

We are always willing and anxious to improve the law whenever we can.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, further to the minister's response, I have also talked to Elections Canada along with Revenue Canada and I believe it is the law that has to be changed as a result of that.

My supplementary question is for the chair of the committee of the House of Commons that is looking into electoral reform. Will the member ensure that the committee gives special attention next week to ensuring that we close this loophole and that the legislation be amended in a way that taxpayers' money is only used for the ongoing operations of political parties and for electoral purposes, the purposes that legislation was set up for in the first place?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have been here 13 years and I have never had the chance to answer a question in Question Period before.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hawkes: I guess I have about two and a half minutes. I want to thank the member for the question.

The House in its wisdom put together a committee to review the Elections Act. All parties chose experienced members with long experience in politics and in this House. I detect a predisposition in members of all parties to do several things. One is to continue a tax credit system because it establishes a broad base of support for the political process. Instead of a few people with a lot of money controlling it, it belongs to the people. I think we are all agreed with those kinds of clauses.

We do have suggestions from the Lortie commission about a clause for change that would do a great deal of what the member is suggesting.

• (1200)

I would go one step further and say, not just for political parties, but if the receipt is for a tax credit at the federal level, then the money should be spent for federal purposes only. If it is provincial, it should be provincial purposes only.

In today's Quorum you will note that the Reform Party of Canada in Alberta claims it is not running any candidates but it has been registered and has been given the power to give tax receipts for provincial purposes. Maybe the provinces should look at this as well.

HARBOURS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, the last question of the day is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

According to the main estimates tabled in the House of Commons, 70 per cent of the entire small craft harbours' budget for the province of Newfoundland and Labrador from March 1991 to March 1992 was spent in one constituency in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

How can the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans say that he is behaving in a manner that is fair to all fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador when 70 per cent of the budget in that province went to one constituency, the minister's?

Some hon. members: Shame.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I have not heard of this before. My staff must be doing an outstanding job.

With respect to this matter, I am certainly very prepared to have a breakdown done of all spending on small craft harbours in all parts of Newfoundland and Labrador. There was one major project done in St. John's West, the only one in 100 years in the city of St. John's, when a small craft facility was completed in the city of St. John's last year at Prosser Rock.

It is being used by boats from all over the province. The hon. member mentions Ming's Bight. It is very close to my heart. I wish that Ming would bite a lot of other people over there as well.

POINT OF ORDER

ANNUAL HOCKEY GAME

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, with the NHL action suspended due to the player's strike, hockey aficionados were riveted last night to the annual contest between the parliamentary pages and members of Parliament. For a change, the "Page Pacers" gave us a game.

Brett Ballah, Brad Rylder, André Thomas, Geoff Pearcey, Davit "Elbows" Akman, Carlo Spadafora, Wade Aucoin, Serge Melanson, Carol Middleton, Patrick Folz, Pierre Joyal, Jake Irving, Daniel Léger and Matthew Breech for a change provided the toughest competition in years.

It was not tough enough, however. Physical fitness and athletic prowess prevailed. Members of Parliament Bill Rompkey, David Dingwall with two goals and five goal posts, Lorne Nystrom very briefly, Pat Sobeski, Doug Fee, Brian Alexander O'Kurley, Willie Littlechild and I scored three unanswered goals in the final minutes of the game to win 7–4.

The MPs received only modest assistance from former MP and national team member Leo Duguay, gold medalist Alwyn Morris and goalie Tony Baldinelli from Rob Nicholson's office.

Mike Richardson played for the pages, and our thanks to Bob Allen from Hansard who handled a very enjoyable and penalty free game.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Of course this was not a point of order, but we were delighted to hear of this event. We thank our pages.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

11TH REPORT OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the 11th report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-67, an act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Andre moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

VICTIMS OF CRIME COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-341, an act respecting compensation for Canadian victims of crime travelling or posted abroad.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, this is precisely the same bill I introduced earlier in the session but it did not receive the approval of the House on second reading so I am trying again.

The bill is designed to establish a criminal injuries compensation fund that would cover Canadians who are working or travelling abroad. At this point Canadians are only covered at the provincial level for injuries received at home, but if Canadians are working or travelling abroad, as they do now in large numbers, they are largely unprotected. It is within the federal jurisdiction.

I believe this is an important bill which will have the support I am sure of all members of the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Brewin moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(91), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, it is with sadness I rise in this House to introduce a petition. This is a result of the tremendous number of refugees who have been deported in masses, especially lately.

These refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardship. Their future was and is still undecided as they are being sent back to their homeland.

These petitioners are calling on the House of Commons to pressure the government to exercise compassion.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition from my riding in Yukon. This petition is signed by employers of domestics, domestic workers and residents of Canada.

The petition is to draw to the attention of the House that the Department of External Affairs, as we know, has decided to discontinue the practice of processing applications of domestic workers under rules that would give them the right to apply for permanent status.

My constituents strongly object to this and request that the House immediately rescind this particular regulation to a more fair and equitable regulation which will make it possible for foreign domestic workers to remain because they have contributed substantially to the country.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of the people of North Vancouver.

The petitioners believe that constitutions are for people and they call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people, binding upon Parliament, to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

• (1210)

CROATIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of approximately 300 Edmontonians dealing with Croatia. It was approved on March 13 and I do not know whether the delay was my fault or the clerk's.

In any event, the 300 people are concerned that Croatia has instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election. Ninety-four per cent of the population voted for independence. They point out that Croatians, like all other people, are entitled to freedom, democracy and the right to self-determination. They call upon this Parliament to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

Point of Order

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I am happy to table a petition on behalf of a number of constituents who have requested that the government of Canada work out a deal with the government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and, of course, this has now happened.

UKRAINE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to table today. One is from a large group of my constituents regarding the independence vote in the Ukraine and a very supportive position in terms of Ukrainian independence and about our diplomatic ties with Ukraine.

It is with a great deal of pride that I table this, as I come from the riding that has probably more Canadians of Ukrainian background in it than any other riding in this country with the possible exception of the Dauphin—Swan River riding.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, the second petition deals with the GST and says that the petitioners, again all from my constituency of Yorkton—Melville, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and service tax from women's sanitary products. I table this petition in the House today as well.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to rise and present a petition signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa area including Nepean, Gloucester, Ottawa, Aylmer, Kanata, Stittsville and other communities in this area.

The petitioners object to the fact that gas prices in the Ottawa area are significantly higher than those in southern Ontario. I may say the same complaint is made by many members of the Kingston community. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists.

POINT OF ORDER

VOYAGEUR PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I should have raised this point earlier when the Secretary of State was in the House, but I wonder if the parliamentary secretary to the Government House leader would perhaps give an undertaking to the House with regard to the Voyageur program.

The Government of Canada has sent out a number of invitations for students or for young people between the ages of 16 to 21. It is my understanding that a large number of applications have gone out across the country.

I wonder if it is possible for the Secretary of State to provide to each member of this House a constituency breakdown to show where those invitations or applications have gone on a constituency basis, whether it be the Legions, the Kiwanis Club, whatever.

It is my understanding that a number of groups have received them. Some groups have not received them and, of course, members' offices will be involved in the process. I wonder if that information is available, which I presume it is. Someone must have the mailing list that could be provided to members of Parliament.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my hon. friend who has raised a very important and special program for the Canadian youth. All of us are anxious to support it. Being one of those who has not received any applications, my understanding is that those applications will flow to committees that are established by individual members in their constituencies.

I can check into the information that the hon. member has relayed to me and we will see what we can do to get this information to him as quickly as possible.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to belabour this, but I do want to tell the hon. member that a number of groups across the country have now received the applications, well beyond the committees which have been set up, for instance, Legions, and rightly so. I just bring that to the attention of the hon. member. I think it would be appropriate if the information that is now out there be shared with all members of Parliament. I thank him for taking this under active consideration. Of course, I know he will report back to the House expeditiously, perhaps later this day, if not early Monday morning.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I wish to reiterate that in fact I will check out that information. It is very clearly the understanding I had of the program, that it was to be the role of members of Parliament to establish these committees. We will find out exactly what is going on and have that clarified, not only for the hon. member but for all members of this House who I know will be concerned about the issue.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all the questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, as you will probably recall, about 11.55 a.m. I was addressing this issue. I started by congratulating the minister and his staff as well as the administration for their work on this piece of legislation which is, in fact, fairly similar to the act which was introduced in 1980, with quite a few exceptions and a few new proposals.

What really intrigues me with this bill is the fact that it addresses two partners, the provincial government and the federal government. Throughout this bill there is one partner missing, the municipal government or regional government.

When we are dealing with questions affecting the environment, this particular issue falls under the jurisdiction of three levels of government, the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government, the community as a whole. This piece of legislation does not seem to put it in black and white that a third partner is included.

There are some very good aspects of the proposed legislation, especially when we look at the areas of safety requirements, standard marks, emergency response assistance plans and means of containment. For example, this bill would make it an offence for a person to handle, offer for transport, transport or import any dangerous goods unless the person, the goods and the means of containment satisfy the requirements of the bill.

The bill introduces a concept of a standardized means of containment. This particular term would be defined to mean a container for which safety standards have been prescribed in the regulations and which was used or intended to be used for the transportation of dangerous goods.

It goes on to say that no person would be permitted to sell, offer for sale, deliver, distribute, import or use a standardized means of containment unless it displayed all the applicable prescribed safety marks.

That is good, but it goes further to add a new provision which would require manufacturers or importers of standardized means of containment to keep records of the persons to whom they distributed their product. If it were later found that these means of containment were unsafe for handling or transporting dangerous goods, suppliers could be required to issue notices of defective construction or recall to their customers.

These are excellent proposals in the legislation. What is missing, unfortunately, is the third partner, the municipal government, as it deals with the question of transport.

• (1220)

One other aspect which I found to be intriguing is that while there are a lot of new provisions, when it comes to the area of inspection whereby we are giving the inspectors authority, rightly so, when they believe there are reasonable grounds that dangerous goods are being handled, offered for transport or transported in a way that does not comply with the bill, they could detain the goods until they were in compliance, it also gives the inspector the authority to take any measures necessary to remedy non-compliance and allow them to direct any qualified person to take them. That is good, but what is missing is the enforcement, to provide the necessary funds for inspectors in order to apply the rules as set by the legislation.

For any piece of legislation or any proposal, it does not matter whether it is introduced at the federal level, provincial level or municipal level, the key is to have the mechanism for enforcement. That brings us to the human aspect. We have to ensure that we not only have enough inspectors, but that we have the tools that are necessary so they can do their jobs properly.

What has been lacking throughout this whole discussion is the matter of the necessary funds in order to make sure that the bill is enforced and inspectors are capable of doing their jobs.

I do not know how many more inspectors the government is planning to hire. I do not know whether it has thought about that aspect of the legislation. I do not know whether the government has gone as far as trying to do some work with the different levels of government in terms of their enforcement in the difficulties they are having.

I can tell you on the question of environmental impact, the transfer or transport of dangerous goods from one location to another has been identified as a priority for the people of this country. In particular, it has been identified as a priority for the people in my riding of Ottawa Centre and throughout the province of Ontario. I say this because unfortunately quite often what we are seeing is that the transportation method, whether that is by truck or train, is passing through urban centres without making sure that certain provisions and requirements are met. When it comes to that, it is extremely important, at least at the municipal level, to be aware of what is at stake for employees in terms of the transportation of dangerous material going through that particular city, town or area.

Setting up standards is a key when it comes to the environment. If there is any need for national standards, I would say that the environmental needs are there. This should in fact serve as a notice. As we are introducing the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, perhaps the federal government should use this as a first step toward negotiation with all levels of government with a view to setting up standards when it comes to the environment.

The reason I say this is because as you go from one part of the country to the next, there are different environmental standards. For instance, what is a priority for one region when it comes to the cleaning up of the environment or taking care of dangerous goods in one area might not be treated the same way in other parts of the country or in other areas.

Environmental standards are very important, especially at this point in time. In 1988 and thereafter there has been a lot of talk about the clean up of dangerous material from major urban centres throughout Canada. I have not yet really seen any direct action taken. I have not seen the results. If there has been any work on the part of the government, any government, we have not seen any impact study to show that. In fact, if we have cleaned up our urban centres of hazardous material, we have simply moved the waste material that could be stored from one part of the country or another.

To that extent, it is high time for the federal government to start discussion with different levels of government, provincial and municipal, in order to deal with the question of stored dangerous materials, especially in major urban centres, in order to set up a strategy where this material could be moved to another location where the safety of the public as well as the safety of the environment would not be at stake.

The question of enforcement is important. Far more important than the question of enforcement is the question of prevention. As you know, our legislation at the federal level, the provincial level or the municipal level seems at all times to deal with the problem at hand. Unfortunately, we do not seem to see a lot of legislation at the different levels dealing with the question of prevention. When we talk about the question of prevention, we are talking about the questions of education, public awareness, and outreach programs. Whether that is at the high school level, whether that is in the community, in the business sector or in different parts of society, we have to take an aggressive step and move one step further to say that from now on every single piece of legislation that is introduced to deal with every single issue has got to have as part and parcel of it a preventive measure.

That would apply to any kind of legislation, whether the legislation is dealing with the question of the environment, or whatever. It must contain that element, the issue of education and the issue of prevention.

I spoke a little bit about the absence of the third component. A little earlier today my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier brought to my attention a very important issue. Probably in the period of question and answer he will be very much interested in sharing his concerns, not only with this House but also with Canadians across the country, to give an example of what is happening in one of the ridings in the Ottawa—Carleton region.

There are a lot of good things in this legislation. What is missing, as I indicated, are the questions of enforcement, outreach, prevention and education. When I spoke about enforcement I mean the lack of funds in order to do the actual enforcement.

I understand that the government is planning after second reading to have a public hearing. This would be an excellent opportunity for all of us in government, as well as the community as a whole, to bring forward to the committee during those hearings any concerns they might have regarding the transfer of dangerous material and the transfer of waste from one point to the next.

At hand here is a piece of legislation that, in my view, is a good start, the beginning I hope of what might lead to a discussion with the different levels of government whereby eventually we would have a national environmental standard throughout Canada so that we can protect the interests of the public and deal with the question of safety in a tangible and effective way.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Ottawa Centre on his statement. When the bill was tabled last December, I immediately communicated with regional and municipal groups concerned to find out if the bill would have an impact on my riding. My first concern at that time was the transportation of hazardous materials.

• (1230)

I was concerned then with the transportation of dangerous materials in my riding because, as we know, Ottawa—Vanier is the natural corridor for trucks carrying goods that are sometimes considered dangerous. I wrote to Peter Clark, the chairman of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton on January 15. He answered me on March 4.

[English]

In his letter to me Mr. Clark brings out some very interesting facts concerning the transportation of goods in general and dangerous goods in particular. I want to share with the House some of the comments he makes in his letter dealing with Bill C-45, a bill which we know will strengthen the rules and regulations pertaining to the transportation of dangerous goods. Over a 12-hour period, that is half a day, in my riding the heavy truck traffic on the MacDonald-Cartier bridge, which is an interprovincial bridge linking Ontario and Quebec, is approximately 2,200 vehicles or trucks representing about 5 per cent of all the vehicles using the bridge during that time frame. To quote from the letter:

> During the morning and evening commuter peak hours the hourly heavy truck volume is approximately 200 vehicles per hour, again representing three to five per cent—

In my own riding, the letter continues:

> Truck volumes on Nicholas Street (south of Laurier) are slightly higher at 2,500 (two-way flow) between 7 a.m. and 7 p.m. and represent seven to nine per cent of total traffic flows for that period. During the morning and evening peak hours, hourly volumes range from 180 to 270 vehicles per hour and again approximately seven to nine per cent of the total traffic flows.

Last year 24 per cent of all accidents in that corridor were with trucks. There are some serious preoccupations with the problem in my riding. I know the member for Ottawa Centre appreciates it because he was there. He was a member of Ottawa council. He was a member of regional council. He understands this problem. My preoccupation has mainly been with the transportation of dangerous goods.

In the letter I received from Mr. Clark, he said that 2.1 per cent, approximately between 45 and 50 trucks, a day transport dangerous goods. Dangerous goods, as defined in the letter from Mr. Clark could be anything from solvents to propane, oxygen, fuels, petroleum products, et cetera.

My preoccupation is with clause 3(1) of the bill which reads:

> This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province.

I underline "or a province". We are dealing with essentially an interprovincial problem between Ontario and Quebec. I guess it could happen between any province. Does the member have any suggestions as to how we can involve the regional municipalities and the municipalities in addressing the problem of transportation of dangerous goods, so that we can assure ourselves that we are not dealing with a potential risk for which municipalities will have to carry some blame and which the provinces will have to resolve in some way? The authority of the federal government would be paramount. As far as I am concerned, there would be a responsibility with inspectors to make sure that transportation is safe and that transportation is done in a co-ordinated and secure manner. Mostly the regional governments, along with the provinces, have to stop using downtown corridors to transport dangerous goods because of the inherent difficulty that exists. An accident could cause undue damage to our environment, undue damage to the quality of life of the people in that community, and possibly undue damage to our over-all well-being because of loss of life or something else.

Has the member in his experience as a member of the municipal council and as a former member of the regional council addressed this problem? Can he give me a reason or some kind of satisfaction that indeed we can look forward to federal, provincial and municipal co-operation to resolve this issue?

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier who continuously speaks out on behalf of his constituents on issues that affect their daily lives and their safety. Even from the days when I was on municipal council the hon. member communicated with me on a regular basis verbally and in writing, raising the concerns of his constituents, in particular on questions of transportation and questions affecting the environment.

I must say that the best approach to solving any kind of a problem is direct consultation. All of the different partners should be brought together to look at their concerns and to try to deal with them.

My colleagues have for example set before us the question of the interprovincial transfer of goods. In the hon. member's riding of Ottawa—Vanier there is a north-south connection. I might suggest that there is a lot of truck traffic on the routes my colleague has indicated from the province of Ontario to the province of Quebec.

There is nothing in this legislation that would really address the question of urban safety as it relates to the transfer of goods. Also, there is nothing in the legislation that would deal with the transfer of hazardous material from one province to the next, who is responsible, and at what point one province will take over the responsibility of ensuring the safety of the trucks or the safety of the community.

To that extent not only do I want to commend my colleague for raising it, but also I want to assure him that it has been a concern of the municipalities in the past. As we have seen in the communication from the municipalities in this region, there is concern about the tremendous amount of traffic flow and the rise of truck traffic accidents.

I wonder what the government is planning to do in order to address those concerns, especially in light of the fact that the federal government has washed its hands of its responsibility as a full partner when it comes to infrastructure, when it comes to transportation links, when it comes to interprovincial connections, and when it comes to the question of helping out municipalities to deal with their sewage treatment plants, with the overflow of their sewer systems and so on.

My colleague raised this point. He brought to my attention another question on the lack of federal government involvement at the municipal level in the question of infrastructure. Of course one could attribute an accident that has taken place to the lack of good roads, large enough roads or safe enough roads for trucks transporting waste material.

The question of the environment again is not and never will be the responsibility of one level of government. It must and has to become the responsibility of all the three levels of government. One component which is missing in this legislation, as I have indicated and as my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier has clearly put before us, is the third component, that is the municipal level and safety when it comes to transfers of dangerous material through urban centres.

I do not know the answer except that I think the federal government has a responsibility through the Department of Transport, as well as through other departments, to address this question with the municipalities and with the provinces as it relates to environmental standards.

That brings me to the second point which my colleague raised with me a little earlier today, that is, what are we going to do with the dangerous material presently in storage in major urban centres across Canada? What are the plans? When is the government planning to start removing these dangerous materials from major centres in Canada in order to ensure the safety of the public for today and tomorrow?

• (1240)

I want to thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier for his question.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on the second reading of Bill C–45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. As the House will know, this bill seeks to bring into legislation a number of important ideas and recommendations. As far as it goes, it does have my support and the support of our party, as our critic in the area has already explained.

I wish to make a couple of comments if I can arising out of an interest in the issue on the west coast of Canada. A couple of years ago public attention was drawn to the fact that dangerous goods were often transmitted on B.C. ferries and that they were being transmitted without adequate inspection, supervision or compliance with the regulations. In that context, therefore, we had a very careful look at the situation. It became very clear that it is all very well to have a good piece of legislation or to have good regulations, but it is even more important to have adequate personnel provided by the Government of Canada to ensure that the act and the regulations are complied with.

There is still no report back to this House about the situation on the B.C. ferries, and in particular whether the government has acted on the public concern expressed at the time to see that the regulations are complied with and the public is being protected. We will look forward to hearing at committee state from the minister and from the department on this issue and trying to get some commitment from the government that it will couple with this legislation adequate resources and adequate staff to see that the public is in fact protected and that Bill C–45 is not simply words and window dressing.

The next contribution I would like to make deals with a couple of the inadequacies of the bill, particularly because the bill fails to reflect the very effective representations that have been made to all members of Parliament by the International Association of Fire Fighters. In particular is the proposition that there should be included in federal legislation the creation of a public safety officers benefit which should be indexed and payable to the survivors of fire–fighters who are killed in the line of duty, or to the family of an officer who is permanently and totally disabled in the line of duty.

Second is the requirement that hospitals should be given a mandate to notify emergency response personnel of possible exposure to infectious diseases. Third is the need to create a computerized response information system so that fire–fighters can have access to accurate and instant information at the scene of a hazardous materials incident.

These provisions should be in the bill. The government should advise the House and the public how come it was left out. On the face of it, these very important concepts and provisions should be reflected in the bill. They are already reflected in the private member's bill of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, and it is important these ideas get the full consideration of the House.

With those comments we will certainly support second reading so that this bill can go before the committee in the hope that at that stage we can get the necessary improvements.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate for a few minutes. I want to raise two or three items that will be of particular concern to all members, to the industry and to all workers involved in the shipment of hazardous products. These items will undoubtedly arise during the course of committee consideration.

I just preface with a few general remarks on the bill. The bill before us, the Transport of Dangerous Goods Act, 1992 is a redrafted version of the current Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. The stated purpose of the bill is to promote the safety of people, property and the environment during the transportation of dangerous goods.

Among other items that the bill addresses are the handling, transporting and importing of dangerous goods, safety marks, safety requirements and safety standards, emergency response assistance plans, regulation of standardized means of containment, financial responsibility, actions during emergency response and inspection and intervention authorities of federal inspectors.

Bill C-45 would strengthen the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. We fully admit that, and we are pleased to see some progress made.

It would provide a clear legal framework for regulating the transportation of dangerous goods. It would place additional emphasis on measures which would have to be taken prior to the transportation activity itself in order to protect the safety of people, property and the environment.

In addressing the last point mentioned, I would just like to comment briefly on the matter raised under section 6 of the inspector's guide to the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, 1992.

Section 6 reads:

> Some dangerous goods involved in an accident may continue to cause harm or hold the potential for harm after the initial accident has occurred. For example, a tank car containing a compressed or flammable gas may be in such a position or circumstance that there is concern about the tank itself rupturing and causing a secondary accident effect. For some special dangerous goods, as described in Schedule XII of the Regulations, emergency response assistance plans must be in place before these products are shipped. Essentially this places a burden on the consignor of a product to be prepared to respond in case there is an accident with this product.
> This burden falls upon the consignor, who is often the manufacturer, as he is the person who is the expert with respect to the characteristics of the product and he is the person who should know what is required to effectively respond to such an accident. If the consignor is not in Canada, the importer is essentially viewed as the consignor. (This principle holds throughout the Act such that anything which occurred or should have occurred outside of Canada is the responsibility of the importer. Note that this provides for better protection and enforcement than dealing with an agent. Consequently the requirements concerning agents have been deleted.)

Our major concern here is covered in the next one to two paragraphs:

> The way this section will work is that when someone wishes to ship a Schedule XII substance he will submit a summary of an emergency response assistance plan and will "immediately" receive temporary approval. Once the plan has been examined carefully by a Remedial Measures Specialist and found to be acceptable the approval will continue. If the plan turns out to be unacceptable, approval of the plan would then be cancelled and the result would be that the shipper would have to cease shipping that dangerous good.

That particular paragraph gives us some cause for concern. It appears from this documentation that immediate temporary approval will be given to the transport of Schedule XII goods, the most hazardous products, before careful examination by a remedial measures specialist.

If the intent of this is, and it is made clear that it is simply to give preliminary approval, the actual shipment cannot take place until the careful examination, that may be well and good. It will be of little consolation to safety personnel or to communities through which hazardous products are shipped if the turnaround in the decision and the cancellation of the shipping takes place after an accident has occurred because those goods are already in shipment.

• (1250)

Obviously that is one of the areas that we want to look at carefully during committee consideration, to ensure that the immediate approval that is given only gives rise to prior clearance and not to shipping itself until there has been, as it is put here, a careful examination of the conditions.

There are a number of other concerns that have been mentioned briefly by my colleagues which I would also like to touch on.

In my own constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke we do have a large number of very hazardous goods in transit. Our area is mountainous. Whether those goods are travelling by truck or by rail, and most of them are shipped on one of those two mediums, we have some of the more difficult stretches of rail in the country and certainly many of the steepest grades in the highway system.

What we have seen partly through the policies of this federal government when it comes to transport regulations and legislation is an increasing use of our highways by heavy transport trucks, often on steep grades into urban areas. Many of them carry dangerous goods such as chlorine gas in large quantities.

Rail is a relatively safer means of transport. It is more controllable because there is no competing, generally speaking, on the roadbeds with passenger traffic which is much more unpredictable in its behaviour. The conditions of the roadways and the highways are also very often much more hazardous than is the condition that exists on rail. The abandonment of many spur lines serving industrial areas has caused this transference away from rail and on to the roads.

We have had a number of incidents. Luckily there were no major releases of substances which would cause a grave and immediate health hazard to civilian populations. But we have had a number of serious accidents involving trucks carrying industrial materials, some of them safety related, right into the communities of Trail and Castlegar.

Because we have had a bit of a propensity in times past we have also had situations where we have had not accidental explosions take place from time to time on some of the rail lines in our area. These often caused disruptions to major industrial transport by rail and by truck. That is something we hope to never see repeated. But we do have the problem taking place on the highways with increasing incidence.

One of the other matters that my colleague, the member for Kootenay East, raised yesterday in consideration of another subject is also of concern on this matter. That is the change that has taken place in the railway industry, with the elimination of cabooses to getting rid of flashing lights or strobe lights at the end of trains and their replacement by reflectors. Some of those trains transport dangerous goods.

One may wonder what this has direct relevance to in relation to this bill. If we have an increasing number of accidents—and that is almost surely going to happen as a result of the relaxation of some of these regulations in transport—then the incidence of releases of hazardous materials into fast-flowing waterways in the mountains of British Columbia is surely going to occur.

If there are reflectors instead of flashing strobe lights on the ends of trains, which ends of trains are no longer manned by individuals who can give constant reports back and forth between units, then in a mountainous area where there are not only steep grades but also a great amount of cloud, fog, mud, snow and curves, there is simply no opportunity to respond. Long braking distances are required on steep grades if there is no clear sign from the end of the train that it has come to a halt or slowed down in order to apply the brakes to avoid a major collision.

Those are in areas again that where those railway carriers are carrying hazardous products and there are releases in the fast-flowing waterways, the damage is done before any emergency response team can get to it.

Those matters are relevant even though they are not directly involved in the consideration of the bill before us.

Finally, I would like to touch once more upon the matter of the submission made to a number of my colleagues, both in the New Democratic Party and I am sure in other caucuses last May by the International Association of Fire Fighters.

Their appeal links in to some degree with a study, the "Electronic Waybill for Rail Transport of Dangerous Goods," which was prepared for the Transportation Development Centre, policy and co-ordination, Transport Canada by ATG, Automation Technologies Group Ltd., and submitted in August 1991.

That system primarily would provide for electronic monitoring of hazardous products and the shipment of hazardous products in a computerized system. That is vital in this day and age with large amounts of very dangerous goods being shipped so that communities, the officials responsible for the permits and the emergency response teams including fire-fighters, will know at a moment's notice just what they have to deal with and how they should deal with it.

A submission was made by the International Association of Fire Fighters to us last year. My colleague, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, has a private member's bill dealing with this topic and perhaps that could, because it is directly relevant to the government bill before us, be considered in some detail when we get into committee.

Just as a background the fire-fighters entitled their proposal "Right to Know". They point out:

> The most dangerous aspect of fire fighting is responding to incidents involving hazardous materials. Fire-fighters in Canada are especially hampered by a lack of information available at such incidents. Accurate, accessible information is crucial to saving lives and property at the scene of these incidents since the appropriate response for one hazardous material could prove catastrophic if another substance is present.
>
> A variety of technologically advanced systems are available which would enable fire-fighters to learn the exact nature of hazardous materials present at any location and provide guidance on responding to the specific incident. Such systems can be designed for both hazardous materials at stationary structures and hazardous materials in transit.
> Information provided by such systems not only aids in identifying what hazardous materials are present, but also offer detailed information on appropriate emergency response techniques. Some systems can even provide guidance on evacuating specific communities.
> Implementation of a hazardous materials identification system would ensure that the fire-fighters have the information they need to effectively respond to any incident enabling them to protect lives, property, and the environment.
> The IAFF supports the creation of a computerized national emergency response information system which would enable fire-fighters to obtain accurate, instant information at the scene of a hazardous materials incident.

I would just say by way of analogy, and I am not suggesting it is quite as simple, but the same principle applies. If supermarkets can use computers to scan for price and inventory purposes, surely it is not too much to expect that that same kind of technology transmitted to a national level be used in order that fire-fighters and their emergency response crews and communities could do the same for their purposes.

That seems to me a rather minimal objective. The technology is now available. The government has some good major studies now at its disposal. There are further studies along these lines being done in the republic to the south that we can fit in on an international basis to ensure that the very best technology is available.

We have no doubts that there is going to be some significant cost to such a system. If we consider the cost of just one major disaster, such as happened, luckily without major loss of life in the community of Mississauga a few years ago, or could happen, at any time in any major community in Canada, then the cost of implementing such a system for which technologies are now available fades into insignificance. All we need is one major incident to show us that whatever costs are involved in implementing this kind of system, it would be a bargain for all of us.

In conclusion, we generally support the thrust of the bill. We realize that it goes some way toward improving the current regime. However, we feel that there could be some improvements to ensure that lives can be saved, the environment can be saved, and communities can be saved across Canada. We will be making proposals in committee to that end.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Angus: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I think you will find agreement to call it three o'clock so we can proceed to Private Members' Business.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed in today's Order Paper.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved that Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

He said: Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to lead off the debate on the private member's bill I had the privilege of tabling. As you know, the purpose of this bill is to substitute the name "Department of Forests" for the name "Department of Forestry". It would probably be helpful if I provided a brief outline of the reasons that inspired this legislation.

First of all, as you will no doubt recall, Madam Speaker, in 1989 the government agreed to include a definition of the term "sustainable development" in the terms of reference of the new Department of Forestry. I may point out, in all modesty, that this definition was included as a result of an amendment I tabled in the legislative committee that was examining the legislation.

In fact, the inclusion in the bill of the definition that sustainable development meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs is a major step forward for the environment.

The definition gives us the assurance that the Department of Forestry will play a key role in preserving Canada's valuable forests. It also ensures that when federal governments use the term, they will have a clear and precise definition.

Second, in its report entitled Canada's Forests: The Federal Role, the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries emphasized the importance of sustainable development. In its first recommendation, the committee said that the principles of sustainable development and stewardship must be the basis for public policy concerning the management of Canada's forests.

In its second recommendation, the committee urged that the new federal Department of Forestry be charged with initiating and developing a process and a structure for the design, planning and implementation of sustainable development in Canada's forests.

In its third recommendation, the committee says, and I quote: "—in the context of its mission and to fully embrace a comprehensive vision of Canada's forest resources, the new Department of Forestry should be renamed the Federal Department of Forests (Forests Canada)".

During the debate on this recommendation, the committee pointed out that the English designation of the new department was considerably removed from its designation in French. You will agree, Madam Speaker, that Forestry Canada has a connotation that is entirely different from "Forêts Canada".

Still according to the committee's report, the term forestry was confusing because it did not mean the same thing to everyone. To many environmentalists, the term applies to the lumber industry, while most departmental officials and representatives of the industry feel it covers all forestry operations and the management of these operations.

For instance, one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, Mr. Mathew Wright, vice-president of the Nova Scotia Forest Products Association, made the point that the word "forestry" seems to focus far more on industrial development than the word "forests", which has a far more general meaning and a much broader connotation.

As you can see, Madam Speaker, the change is necessary because the English and French versions are not identical; because the term forestry is confusing; and because the name of the department should reflect its mandate.

[English]

I introduced this bill for reasons related to the forestry subcommittee report tabled in the House in November 1990.

I would like to quote recommendation No. 3:

"The committee recommends that in the context of its mission and to fully embrace a comprehensive vision of Canada's forest resources the new Department of Forestry should be renamed the Federal Department of Forests or Forest Canada".

It goes on to say:

"It should be noted that this change would only be applicable in the English language as the new department is now called Forêt Canada in the French language and Bill C-29 is entitled loi sur le ministere des forêts. In fact, the English and French names of the department will be closer in meaning as a result of this recommendation. For the purposes of consistency and so as not to anticipate any future decisions—", and the report goes on to say that it will use the name Forestry Canada for now.

The report was signed by all parties, all members of that committee. The chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, signed it, as did the members for Cochrane—Superior, Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Cariboo—Chilcotin, Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, and Elgin—Norfolk. It was supported at that time by those individuals.

The second report of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries recommended that change in the context of the mission of the Department of Forestry and said that it should be renamed the Department of Forests.

The new Department of Forestry Act contains the words: "sustainable development". Accordingly, the name of the department to which it applies should reflect that principle. According to the second report of the standing committee on forests there exists widespread misunderstanding about the word "forestry" and the values which it reflects. For many people the word denotes only commercial forest exploitation, therefore it was felt that "forests" would be a more appropriate and accurate term.

• (1310)

Finally, the English and French names of the department are not consistent. In French the name ministère des Forêts translates as Department of Forests. I am certain that members will agree that the English and French names of a department should convey the same meaning to avoid confusion.

Another reason I am interested in this issue is because of the sustainable development issue, which the new department is beginning to address. I tabled an amendment in committee concerning sustainable development which now forms part of the act. I am very proud of that. I am also very proud that the amendment was again supported by all parties. That shows the co-operation in the House on non-partisan issues especially.

Basically the name change is put in there because of my interest in sustainable development and because of the mission that the department now has. It is also because of the language difference between the French and English versions.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the seconder of the bill today—

[Translation]

I wish to thank the hon. member for Champlain for his support today.

[English]

I would also like to note the support of the minister for this bill. I would like to note the support of members from all parties. Without mentioning names and whatever, I would like to say that I have received a lot of encouragement and a lot of support and I suppose a real honourable mention to—

[Translation]

—to the hon. member for Champlain for his co-operation in preparing the debate today.

[English]

I believe later we will find that there could be unanimous consent to move this directly to the standing committee and we will probably make that commitment later on. The intention is to get it to committee with the idea that the bill be amended somewhat to reflect some of the discussions that we have had to make sure that the implementation is cost-effective, not to change the name overnight because that has certain cost implications and we are willing to abide by that.

I would again thank all the members and my colleagues here this afternoon for their anticipated support.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise to indicate the support of my caucus for the private member's bill particularly on behalf of the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley who is actually at a forestry conference in northern B.C. today. I am not going to—

Mr. Boudria: He is with us in thought.

Mr. Angus: He is with us in thought, yes. I am not going to reiterate the purpose of the bill, I think it is very clear from the mover. I just want to say that we will not only support it but assist in expediting it on to the standing committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I am also very pleased to speak for a few moments on Bill C-306, whose purpose is to change the name of Forestry Canada to Forests Canada. This bill was presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

I am even more pleased to support this bill, because it is fully in keeping with the recommendations of the Sub-Committee on Forestry published in 1990 that the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur had in his hand. This bill, as you know, proposes to change the English name "Forestry Canada" to "Forests Canada". After discussing it at length with our caucus and the minister, we concluded that the bill was very appropriate and that we should follow it up, of course, with all the reservations that my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur mentioned.

Changing the department's name, minor though the change is, is important. You know, Madam Speaker, that it is being done for some essential reasons. First of all, this change fits in with the department's changing role. In addition, it reflects the new emphasis that the federal government places on forest management as part of sustainable development. Finally, it expresses the growing popularity in Canada of using our forests for many purposes.

On the first point, the role of the department has changed considerably since it was created in 1960.

Originally the department concentrated on supporting the forest industry and the provinces that conducted research and implemented joint forest development programs. However, in the last few years the government has expanded the mandate of the department in order to put more emphasis on dialogue between the various forest interest groups in Canada.

We need only look at some of the recent laudable efforts made by the department and the minister to see how Forestry Canada has succeeded in playing this valuable role.

For example, last year the minister, through the department, organized a successful parliamentary conference on Canada's forestry resources. This event brought competing interests to the same table to discuss the future of forest resources in Canada.

The government also co-operated with the provinces and industry, as well as with environmentalists, nature lovers and others, to develop the national strategy on forests.

Lately, the department has shown that, at a time when the future of our forests is hotly debated, it has done more and more to facilitate dialogue in order to find realistic solutions. The department has approached both complementary and competing groups within the government and industry and among environmental groups. We very much want to bring all those stakeholders together.

It is therefore appropriate that the department be renamed Forests Canada. The new designation will reflect the expanded perspective in which we now view the central role of the federal government in the field of forestry. Also, the name Forests Canada puts the focus of our action more clearly on the forests and therefore more accurately reflects the federal government's priorities and concerns.

[English]

The new name also makes sense as it provides the department with an opportunity to more clearly exemplify the federal approach to our forests.

We all recognize the critical importance of Canada's forests. They are one of our greatest natural resources. They are of immense importance to Canada as a nation and they are undoubtedly becoming a resource which is of ongoing interest to the world.

Canada's forests cover 10 per cent of the world's forested area. With growing concerns about the viability of the forest industry and the increasing concern about climate change and threats to bio-diversity, Canada's forest management practices are followed with keen interest, both at home and abroad.

The government, through the department, is defining its policy approach in this new, more national and indeed, more global context.

[Translation]

That is why the federal government participates more actively in the development and promotion of sustainable development strategies.

Madam Speaker, we know that the government has taken measures in that direction. The department, through its contribution to the green plan, will lead the way by implementing strategies based on the sustainable development of Canadian forests.

Moreover, the department strives to support Canadian participation in the development of international policies and conventions on sustainable development, including the Conference on the Environment and Development that will be held in Rio next June.

Under the name Forests Canada, the department will be able to relate the policies for the sustainable development of our forests to a national objective and, more generally, to act as a national leader in the management of our forests.

I believe the new name would put the department more in line with the new principles guiding forest management, such as multiple use and sustainable development.

Finally, the new name makes sense in that it reflects a growing movement in Canada advocating the use of our forests for a wide range of purposes, as well as the development of those forests in accordance with a whole series of values.

Madam Speaker, I want to support the new name of the department. It is a minor change. Yet, as I have tried to show, minor changes must not be neglected, because they can sometimes indicate and impel larger positive changes.

Madam Speaker, I hope that my intervention will have been useful and that we will all be able to contribute in some way to making our forests a living heritage.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the motion for second reading of Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be amended so as to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry instead of to Legislative Committee D.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: To make sure that everything is in order, I think that perhaps I should take a vote on the motion. Mr. Arseneault, seconded by Mr. Champagne (Champlain), moved:

> That Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts, now be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since there are no other items on the order of the day, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1.22 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod) moved:

That the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be changed to indicate that only those votes which deal with government expenditure, grant or charge on the public revenue and sponsored by the Minister of Finance are considered to be votes of confidence in the government and no member other than the minister may move a motion which would increase public expenditures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to debate this important issue, an issue that could have a tremendous impact on the way in which this House works.

There are several reasons why I put forward this motion and let me elaborate on them.

First of all, I am very interested in seeing a strengthening of the role of the private member in this House, which means private members on all sides of the House. By enhancing the role of the member, it enhances his or her ability to fight on behalf of his or her constituents, to represent those people. That is what I am doing today by putting forward this motion, speaking on behalf of the people of Macleod.

This motion would help ensure that the cabinet remains extremely responsive to private members on all sides of the House, responds to their needs and the representations they make on behalf of their constituents.

I also would like to remove the myth that is, I think, widely held, that the party Whip tells me as an MP how I should vote on every motion, every time I stand up to record my vote. I stand up in this House to vote to represent the interests of the people of McLeod. There are times when I feel resentful of the implication that somehow I am told what to do, I am not party to the consensus that is arrived at, that we as a party put forward in motions and bills in this House. The other myth which has even less basis in truth is the myth that somehow the Prime Minister tells me how to vote on all issues.

We as a party work together. We come to a consensus. We fight it out. We have hammer and tongs discussions in caucus over issues that are important. We arrive at a decision and present that common front to the House. If I cannot agree I am fully free to stand up and vote against motions. I would like to have this motion accepted by the House to help eliminate those myths.

Another reason, and it comes directly to the next point, is that I would like to eliminate the risk of defeating a government over an issue that is really not a confidence motion. In an objective analysis, you stand back from it and say, should a government be defeated on this particular motion? In many cases there are issues that are before the House that should not cause the defeat of a government if they do not pass. They may well be objected to by members on the back bench on this side, or in the front, or in the back bench on the other side.

In a more general sense, I hope that this motion speaks to a sense of direction about the need for fundamental reform of central institutions in Canada. There is a general interest in the Canadian population to see a wide, fundamental institutional reform.

I had the privilege to serve on the Canada renewal committee and we heard this often from people who spoke to us. As we travelled across Canada people spoke of the need for Senate reform. I firmly believe in that. I believe we need to get on with that as soon as possible.

They spoke of the need for House of Commons reform. This is within the spirit of that need and I really hope that we can make some progress on this today. People spoke of making institutions like the House of Commons more responsive to the needs of the people of Canada. This is one such measure that would help achieve that objective. The motion responds to that call and I believe it is absolutely the correct direction in which we need to go.

The motion is a significant issue which is of interest to all Canadians. It proposes fundamental changes to the rules of the House of Commons. Its purpose, in simple language, is to make all the votes in the House of Commons free votes except for those votes on money bills sponsored by the Minister of Finance.

As a result the government will not fall if it loses a vote on an issue that does not deal with money. That is the initial intent of this motion.

It will have a substantial change in the way in which this institution works. In effect, it will help open up the legislative process. It will ensure that some of the debates that now take place in private caucuses will take place more often here on the floor of the House of Commons.

All of us have had the experience of people telling us we did not speak for them on such and such an issue. People genuinely believe that if they do not see any evidence of their point of view being reflected in debate, they do not know that their point of view has even been taken into account. In most cases it has because we have had the debate in caucus.

For example, in the Alberta Conservative Progressive caucus, we take the issue to the national caucus and put forward our point of view. We then hammer away on issues that are important to us. None of us wins the day all the time. In a House of Commons of 295 members, nobody is ever going to win his or her point of view all the time. Even the Prime Minister does not win all the time.

It is important to get this debate out in the open a lot more to help strengthen the point of view, show the way in which legislation is developed, and the influence that we as individual members and Canadians as citizens have upon this institution.

I do not have to tell people here that Canadians in many walks of life have a lower opinion of this House than was the case 20 or 30 years ago. This is true of all institutions in society. We have an opportunity to help rebuild the credibility of this institution because it is so important in society that the central institutions, the law-making bodies have the respect of Canadians and that Canadians feel that the House of Commons and the Senate genuinely reflect their objectives and their part of the country.

• (1120)

I have received a lot of comment over the last year since I introduced this motion in the House. Let me just quote from one. It is an editorial in the Nanton News entitled "Free Vote is Overdue". Let me just read a couple of paragraphs.

> His motion, which is long—

"His" is referring to the member of Parliament for Macleod.

> His motion, which is long overdue, would allow MPs to vote on issues according to their own judgment, and not necessarily follow the party line.
> As it stands now, if a motion by a cabinet minister is defeated, that is shown as a non-confidence vote for the government and an election must be called. There's little wonder government members follow the party line, when their very jobs could be in jeopardy.
> The motion introduced by Hughes is exactly the kind of down to earth, grass roots thinking his constituents expect from him. He's right when he says people are calling for a more visible and effective voice in the nation's capital.
> It remains to be seen whether Hughes' Tory teammates will be quick to adopt his motion. It was however, one of the promises made in the last Speech from the Throne.
> It also remains to be seen whether MPs will vote independently, even if the legislation allowing them to do so is in place. You'll have to excuse Canadians if they adopt a wait-and-see attitude on the actions of politicians who have let them down numerous times in recent years.

This editorial, while endorsing the general concept that I have put forward, also raises some of the other fundamental issues which I think we have to deal with in this House. I look forward to that debate.

We have an opportunity to make an historic change. It is a chance to renew the faith of a sceptical Canadian public. The motion is all about making individual members of Parliament more effective in the job they do for their constituents and I cannot think of a better place to do this than in Private Members' Business. Canadians want and deserve these changes and I think this is our opportunity to respond.

I presume that some of our colleagues opposite may want to point out some detail of this motion which may be flawed in wording or with which they might not agree and use that as a reason to disagree with this motion. One of our colleagues opposite says "never" and I hope that is the case.

In anticipation of that I would like to propose an amendment which would go even further and clarify the intent of this motion. I have heard from lots of Canadians in addition to the editor of the Nanton News and I have had the opportunity to respond to some of those very legitimate criticisms.

I seek permission to introduce an amendment to my motion which would read as follows:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the phrase "indicate that" so that the motion now reads:
> That the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be changed to indicate that all votes, except for those that deal explicitly with the matter of confidence in the government be considered as free votes.

If I may clarify that, I think this amendment should be accepted because it seeks to spell out when a vote is a free vote or when it is a confidence vote and when it is not. The original motion spelled out specific votes. This amendment does the same, but in a more clear manner and in a way which responds to criticisms I have heard from Canadians.

I ask for the support of the House in order to put that amendment forward.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may remind the hon. member that the mover of a motion cannot present an amendment to his own motion. Strictly speaking this motion is not in order.

That being said, if the hon. member seeks the unanimous consent of the House, and since the Chair is the servant of the House, if hon. members present wish to give their unanimous consent, of course the Chair will act accordingly.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent to integrate the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Macleod?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: Can we debate that, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After taking the matter under advisement, the Chair wishes to remind hon. members that unanimous consent is required to receive the motion.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We have consent.

Mr. Gauthier: Debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, this is what we would call imaginative rule making.

[Translation]

In other words, this makes for very flexible rules. However, I feel it is entirely unacceptable for a member who moves a motion to move an amendment to his own motion in the course of the debate.

First of all, the amendment would need a seconder and we would have to know exactly what kind of amendment we have before the House. We have not seen the document, and it has not been circulated. You have a copy, Mr. Speaker, but I do not. I heard the amendment, but I did not see the text. I have not yet read the motion, which in any case I do not think is in order, but I fail to see how you could ask for unanimous consent to accept a motion that is out of order. Either it is in order or it is not. If you say it is in order, then you seek the unanimous consent of the House to put it to a vote, and it is therefore debatable.

I do not think the Chair could say that Christmas Day is June 25. We all know that is impossible. You might get unanimous consent for presenting a motion like that, but it would not be accepted by the members of this House. In this case, I do not think the Chair has the authority, and I wish you would tell me on what grounds you would have the authority to, first of all, ask the House for unanimous consent, to do what? To let the hon. member move an amendment to his own motion? I doubt you can do that, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that you may want to ask for unanimous consent. I do not think you have the authority to seek unanimous consent in a case like this. This is my own view and I would like you to quote for me chapter and verse of which book gives you that authority to ask for unanimous consent.

Although I may be in favour of the motion originally, I may want to amend it. It is for us to decide. It is for the House to dispose of that, not for the member himself to say that he did not make it very clear so he is going to clarify my main motion by having an amendment put by the mover of the motion. I find that to be totally out of context. Even a junior member of the House would tell you that is quite unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I just want to intervene for a few moments to contrast the arguments of my hon. friend who has a great deal of experience with the rules and procedures of this House.

I think you are perfectly in order, Mr. Speaker, to ask if something can be done by unanimous consent, because unanimous consent allows the House to supersede its own rules and procedures. I think what you are doing, rightly so, is offering that option to the House. Should the House decline that, of course the hon. member could not proceed because that in fact would be outside the rules. A unanimous consent question is always in order and is always a question that is left then to the decision of the members who are here today.

I think, in contrast to my hon. friend, you are in fact in order to do that and I would certainly encourage you to do just that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would not want to prolong the debate unduly since this is the time reserved for Private Members' Business and I think that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the debate. That being said, the House can always suspend the rules that it has set for itself. The House can call it one o'clock even though we know very well that it is 11.30 a.m. right now. So, from that, I take the comment by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier as a refusal to give his consent and I suggest that we return immediately to the main motion of the hon. member for Macleod, who still has five minutes.

• (1130)

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My hon. friend put a request to move an amendment and failed in obtaining the necessary unanimous consent. I wonder if there might not be consent of the Chamber to allow him to refer at least the subject matter of his motion to the standing committee or the House management committee which is seized of this subject.

It would then give private members credit for their work and concern in this area, and it might be a good opportunity for the hon. member to further his arguments before a group that is considering just that subject.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary secretary is making a valid point. He is chairman of the Standing Committee on House Management. I see no objection to sending the motion to that committee for further study, but as it stands, not in an amended form.

If the committee wants to propose an amendment to the House, I think that is quite justified. I would not oppose sending it to the committee for further study, because I think it has merit. I do object to members rising in this place and trying to play around with the rules to make it more receivable, in the sense that it is more acceptable maybe for the member to move an amendment to his own motion.

I do not think we can do that today if we want to be taken seriously by Canadians. I think the committee that looks at this motion would probably be very sympathetic to it and possibly would approve of the principle at hand.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene briefly. There are really two matters before us. One is the question of referring it to the House management committee, which I do support. The second one is whether it is appropriate to refer the motion as originally introduced or the attempt to amend it.

On the latter part, certainly others in this House in the round of debate would have the ability to make the attempt. I think the question is: Should the mover of the original motion be allowed to correct his ways at the beginning of the debate? I do not think it is appropriate, so I would suggest that we move on with debate and allow the member to finish his presentation. He may wish to talk about the reason for this proposed change to it, as to why someone else should move it, but I think we can get on with it.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I have a clarification. Can you tell me how much longer I have to speak?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So that it is quite clear, I believe that there is not consent to change the rules as they apply to this motion at this time. We are still debating the original motion of the hon. member for Macleod, who has up to five minutes for his speech.

[English]

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and distinguished, experienced colleagues opposite and on this side for their advice in dealing with this question.

I believe that there may well be an interest by other members in this House in putting forward the motion to amend which I attempted to do myself. I would certainly hope that is the case because it is important. There is a difference between simply trying to define what question should be a question of confidence and what question is not a question of confidence in this House.

It is not something that is easily defined. Perhaps the best way to define it is by simply saying any motion which essentially defines itself as a motion of confidence. That way members opposite from all of the parties not in the government could put forward a motion and define it as a motion of confidence. They could put forward their motions. The government could choose to put forward its motions indicating when it is a question of confidence and when it is not.

Perhaps that helps us get away from trying to define a long list of times or specific types of motions which are questions of confidence and which are not questions of confidence. The amendment which I sought to put forward today seeks to do that.

I would at this point accept the advice of my hon. colleague from Peace River and seek the unanimous consent of the House in order to have this motion referred to the committee which the hon. member for Peace River chairs, the House management committee.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Macleod has just asked the House whether he would have unanimous consent to have this motion referred to the committee on House management after it is considered here. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is not unanimous consent, I give the floor to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on this motion today, flawed as it is. I recognize the hon. member has tried to make changes in it. I think he became aware of the concerns that I had about the motion when the motion came before the subcommittee of the House management committee to decide whether or not the motion should be made a votable one.

I indicated that it was completely unacceptable in its present form because it in effect gave the government the power to decide what items were to be considered votes of confidence, which in some ways it has already. But at least under our current practice there is some constitutional convention that certain votes in this House be regarded as matters of confidence.

I would not want to presume to give an exhaustive list to the House on this important issue, but certainly the list would include votes on specific motions of non-confidence which the member appears to have omitted from his motion which I think are clearly matters of confidence. Those arise generally during the debate on the budget and during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

In addition, I submit that a defeat on a major supply bill, such as an interim supply bill or the final supply bill, would constitute a failure of confidence in the government and would require the resignation of the government or possibly a dissolution of Parliament.

In addition to that list, I think a defeat on a major government bill that had been the basis of an election campaign and which the government put forward as one of its major planks would constitute a serious lack of confidence in the government. I would cite as an example of that a defeat on the free trade bill. Similarly, a defeat on a major budget bill might also constitute a question of confidence, but it would depend on whether the bill was rejected outright or whether there was some other difficulty with it.

Those are areas where I submit the government has an obligation at least to look at the vote as one of confidence. The idea that we should set up a set of rules in the House dealing with the issue is one that I am not in agreement with.

The other side of the coin that I think is important is that the government itself may consider certain matters to be votes of confidence and may choose to resign if it loses them. I think that the option for a government to make that kind of decision is one that needs to be open, should the government elect to use its position to say a defeat on this matter will result in an election or in resignation.

I think the government must always have that right, to be exercised at any time. If the rules of the House say that the government cannot do it in effect by listing those things which are matters of confidence, I think we have done a disservice to our system. The parliamentary system works by convention. Everything is not written. There are certain rules that are unwritten and perhaps their imprecision is helpful. We have some cases where the rules are bent one way. Sometimes they are bent another.

I think the advantage of our system is there is this flexibility because the matters are not put down in writing. Having said that, perhaps the intent of the hon. member was to lessen the strictures that the government places on him, as one of the government's backbenchers, to vote with the government. I can understand his anxiety to get away from having to vote with this particular government at any time. If that is his intention, I applaud it and I would invite him simply to come over to this side of the House and vote against it at every opportunity. He might feel more comfortable, but that is unnecessary to this debate.

What he is trying to do is free up votes in the House of Commons, and I commend him for that effort. It is something that is worth while. The question of freeing up votes is an interesting one because the debate is carried on in two planes. We have those who say we must have more free votes in the House. They urge members to break ranks with the party at every opportunity and vote in accordance with their own conviction or the view of their constituents, depending whether the two coincide. Presumably, it is to represent their constituents better, either by voting in accordance with their own view or that of their constituents. That is one argument.

The second plane or argument is that you free up votes by removing confidence votes from the House, by having fewer of those. Once that is done, particularly members supporting the government would feel freer in their votes because they would know that their vote would not bring the government down. It would not result in an immediate election. They would then know that they can express their disapproval of government policy by voting with the opposition and indicating they are opposed to the bill the government is proceeding with.

Frankly, it is the second argument that should be pursued. That is really the hon. member's intention, I think, in his wording. In my view, declaring free votes in this House will not help our political system. What we need to do is say that there will be fewer votes of confidence in this House. When voting on a bill like plant breeders' rights or the bill dealing with the transportation of hazardous substances, which we debated on Friday, or the bill we will be debating later today, a loss on one of those bills would not constitute a loss of confidence in the government. To my mind that would make sense. I am not sure there would be many who would argue that a loss on one of those bills would, in fact, constitute a loss of confidence in the government.

I have no doubt that if the government lost one of those bills in this House, the government would then introduce a motion of confidence and have it passed. The time to make that change is at the next election campaign when the governing party can announce in the next election that it will not regard votes on minor bills as matters of confidence. If that happens, it will free up votes in this House, which I think is a laudable aim.

I do not think we can free up votes in this House simply by saying that party strictures are abandoned. Members are going to vote with their party on most occasions because parties represent a coalition of interests. Members band together in parties because they believe they can be more effective working together than working apart. If each member of this House made his or her own decision on every issue, we would have real difficulty in coming to decisions in this place because members would be voting all over the map. There would be an unwillingness to compromise, to make a decision that is in the best interests of everyone.

The advantage that the party system provides to the Canadian voter and is often forgotten is that it forces members to compromise. They get together and say: "I will vote for your bill on this if you will vote for my bill on that". It is that kind of compromise that is made behind the scenes and in party caucus in many cases that affects the outcome of votes in this House, gets bills through and it makes the country work. It does work.

If we take away all those strictures and say it is a free for all, we will find that members are ganging up in coalitions that are out to break or stop the passage of certain bills instead of trying to do something constructive.

The party disciplinary system has its place. We need it. We can do with more free votes. I submit that the way to get it is to reduce the number of votes that are considered to be ones of confidence in the government.

For the benefit of the House, the Standing Committee on House Management has been dealing with this issue. There have been discussions. There has been an excellent document prepared by my good friend Professor Franks of Queen's University on this very issue, prepared for the government and released to the members of the committee. The committee is continuing its study. The subcommittee on parliamentary reform is drafting a report at this time, part of which will include some statement concerning free votes in the House of Commons and the confidence convention as it applies in this House. I am sure that at some point a document will come forward from the committee for discussion in this place.

While I welcome the hon. member's motion, I suggest that the wording of it is very seriously flawed. I appreciate the opportunity to have a brief discussion about it in the House. I believe it will come back. I urge the hon. member to continue his efforts and perhaps file a new motion later which may get drawn for debate as this one has and we can have yet another run at the issue.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too want to participate in this debate. The unamended motion before us deals with two elements. The first is that only those votes which deal with government expenditure and proposed by the Minister of Finance would be excluded. Second, no member other than a minister may move a motion which would increase public expenditures.

The motion basically is redundant as far as the first part because the Standing Orders have been changed as a result of the McGrath report to allow a different view of confidence motions. We have argued in this House on a number of occasions, particularly as they relate to opposition days, more technically known as supply days, that governments need not consider the motions as a matter of confidence. We have had some movement.

Members will recall the motion that my party submitted for an opposition day. It was amended, I believe, by the Official Opposition. It was with regard to GATT. The government decided that this was not a motion of confidence. It was providing an over-all direction to Parliament and specific direction to the Prime Minister. One wonders whether he has actually followed up on that. He was supposed to go out and meet with somebody. So the House has the power and the government has the power to make that determination now and have availed themselves.

On the other hand, when the Official Opposition moved a motion under its opposition day reaffirming support of medicare, the government chose to consider that a motion of confidence. One wonders whether the government in fact was a bit worried about what it has been doing to medicare by the changes in funding to the provinces, but that is for another debate on another day.

The government has taken both sides on this issue. I welcome the member's initiative to try and get some clarification. As he knows, the government itself, two days before he tabled his motion, promised to open up Parliament, to provide greater opportunity for private members to participate. Perhaps if he had not been in such a rush to follow the government's agenda, he might have been able to come up with the solution that he tried to introduce into this House a few moments ago.

There are two other elements in this. People have been using freely the phrases "free votes" and "confidence votes" as if they were one and the same. They are not. There is no restriction in the Standing Orders that prevents the Official Opposition, the New Democratic Party or the group of independents to have a collective vote. At any time at all my caucus can decide on any issue that members are free to vote as they wish with no guidance, no direction and no whipping from the caucus. In fact, we did that. When this House cast a vote on whether or not we should be in the gulf during the war last year, we asked the House to make it a free vote, that members be allowed to vote their conscience. The government said no. Even though the question of abortion was a free vote, it was a matter of conscience. Even though capital punishment was a free vote, it was a matter of conscience. To a lot of us war is a matter of conscience as well.

So we freed up our members. We made a caucus decision. We took a vote with a show of hands in our caucus as to whether or not it should be a free vote. We also debated the merits to provide some understanding of the members in terms of the issue. To say that a confidence vote is a free vote for everybody is not the case.

A confidence vote is a very specific tool that governments use to sustain themselves as government because if a government loses a confidence vote it loses the right to govern and it must go back to the people of Canada to get a new mandate or attempt to get a new mandate.

There are areas that this government has moved on that would suggest to many are not matters of confidence.

We have the coastal trading act which started 15 years ago coming through the system. It made it to the House just before the 1988 election was called. It got through the House and to the Senate. There were some disagreements between the parties but it was not part of the government's platform as pronounced in either the 1984 or 1988 campaigns. It was bringing a piece of legislation up to date.

Those types of matters could be looked at as issues not to be deemed confidence and not as part of the government's mandate or agenda where there could be come flexibility.

We have to recognize that part of the reason for the call for free votes in terms of the public view is really for change in the confidence vote system because people are angry about the decisions the government has been making.

I found it interesting that the member's initial wording basically said that anything the Minister of Finance does we have to support.

Is the GST not from the Minister of Finance? Is that not the most hated tax this country has ever seen? Members on the government side like to suggest that if they had had the right to vote according to their conscience they would not have done it.

I would like government members to get up in this House and explain how they voted at their convention in Toronto a year ago. I assume, like our conventions, it is mandatory that they show up as a member of Parliament. I think it was 95 per cent of the delegates who endorsed the GST, after the fact, after this government had rammed it through.

Well you cannot have it both ways. You cannot be calling for free votes to try to appease your constituents who hate that tax. You cannot say you would have voted differently if you had had the right to a free vote.

They did not vote differently at the convention. The GST was in line with the philosophy and the approach of the Conservative Party and the Conservative government and the Conservative memberships. They do not deny that. They make no bones about it.

To suggest that things would be different if we had free votes is not the case. If there were free votes for everything but what the Minister of Finance does, the vast impact on Canadians is through the Minister of Finance, whether it is the GST, the income tax, the corporate tax—or should I say the lack of corporate tax—all of those things affect every Canadian on a daily basis.

It is the Minister of Finance who decides what money is going to go to health, to transportation, to external affairs. That is his budget. That sets the framework for the total operation of this country.

Having said that, the government of the day has the right because it has a mandate to govern the country. There is no question in my mind. So when we say we want to free up the government we have to recognize that it has certain responsibilities.

The government has the responsibility to manage the country properly. We may differ as to what properly means and we always differ on that because we all come to this House with different philosophies.

The government does have that right, but it also has the responsibility to ensure that what it does helps not hurts the responsibility and requirement that at some point it has to go back to the people.

The freest vote of all is the vote at election time. I sure wish we would have one soon.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the intent of this motion and wish to commend my friend for Macleod for presenting it.

It deals with two important issues, issues that all of us have talked about and have been approached by constituents about for many, many years. I regret we could not get unanimous approval of his earlier motion to refer the subject matter. I sincerely hope that we can reconsider that issue.

I listened to the member for Macleod during his presentation and I agree with the editorial support that he quoted. People are calling for a more open, more visible system of government. This is an issue that is of concern to many, many Canadians.

Like the member for Macleod, I was elected and I came here to represent my constituents. Their interests come first. Many of those people have the impression, gathered from reports of confidence votes, that we are nothing but a group of trained seals in this place. We do not have the opportunity to really speak out and fully represent them.

Every weekend when I go home, constituents express frustration with the debates and the votes they see in this place. Most of these people have a very strong feeling about Canada. They have a strong feeling about the issues that are in front of us. They want to express themselves and they want to participate. They want to see their representatives in the House of Commons participating freely.

The member for Macleod has identified two issues that Canadians do have strong feelings about and two issues that many Canadians do not fully understand. They are issues that have generated and will continue to generate much thought and discussion. Yet to the public, it seems that we are limited to this very short debate. We agree in this place that we need a better definition of just what a vote of confidence is and what it should be.

I do not agree with the earlier argument that was made that we should wait until the next election. It should be debated and it should be researched now.

I agree with the principle that was raised earlier by my friend that perhaps the mover should not be allowed to make an amendment to his own motion during private members' hour. I do not think that that issue was decided on its merits.

So I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for York—Simcoe:

> That the motion be amended to strike out all the words after the phrase "indicate that" so that the motion now reads:
> That the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be changed to indicate that all votes, except for those that deal explicitly on the matter of confidence in the government, be considered as free votes.

With the amendment, I would also seek the unanimous approval of this House to refer the new subject matter to the Standing Committee on House Management for further discussion and report back.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before you put the amendment to debate, I would like to ask you to rule on the admissibility of the motion.

If one reads the motion that all members of this House got in today's Projected Order of Business and one compares that with the amendment that has just been proposed, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that amendment is quite in conflict with the principle enunciated in the motion that appears on today's Order Paper.

I do not know if you will rule or have time to rule, but I wish you would immediately rule that that amendment is out of order basically because it introduces a concept called free votes which is not at all similar in the main motion put by the member for Macleod.

• (1200)

I take it that what the member for Macleod was trying to get at was to get the motion to the Standing Committee on House Management which indeed at this time is looking at this whole issue. He knows that. I know that. Everyone in the House knows that. But my point to you, Mr. Speaker, is if the order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize, because the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXTRADITION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is one motion in amendment at report stage to Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act.

[Translation]

The motion submitted by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam will be debated and voted on.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-31 be amended in Clause 4

(a) by striking out lines 42 to 45 on page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"23. (1) Subject to section (2), a fugitive shall not be surrendered

(a) until after the expiration of thirty days after an order of surrender in respect of the fugitive is made by the Minister of Justice under section 25; or"

(b) by striking out line 2 on page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"the court and the expiration of any period of time in which a further appeal or application for leave to appeal to another court may be filed.

(2) A fugitive may inform the Minister, in writing, that the fugitive does not propose to commence an appeal or proceedings for a judicial review in respect of any matter arising under this Act, and where the Minister is so informed, the fugitive may be surrendered forthwith."

He said: Let me just bring the House up to date as to where we are on this bill. This is the extradition bill.

Extradition is when someone commits an offence in another country, comes to Canada, is arrested in Canada, and then the other country applies to Canada to extradite that person.

A good example was the Charles Ng case. My friend has just said it is a bad example and that is part of the reason we have the bill. Mr. Ng was alleged to have committed a number of murders in California. He came to Canada and was arrested here, luckily, over an incident. It was actually a shoplifting theft incident in Calgary, I believe. He then went to a Canadian jail and awaited extradition.

Our extradition laws have been in need of revamping. I think we would all agree, every side of the House would agree with that. Certainly we got a thorough airing of the law in terms of the number of appeals that Mr. Ng went through. Most of us thought it was too long; some people would cut it very short. A number of us felt in the House that what we have to do is get a balance to get a fair procedure.

I underline this to the members of the House, the reason the Ng case went on so long was that Ng challenged through his lawyers the principle of whether Canada could extradite or send someone back to a country that had the death penalty for murder when we do not have the death penalty here. The Supreme Court decided that in fact Canada could send people back to a country that had the death penalty.

The minister does not have to do that. Just recently the Minister of Justice in extraditing someone to Florida said: "I will extradite the person to Florida as long as you give me an undertaking that the death penalty will not be asked for'. There is some fairly wide discretion.

One of the problems, as I have outlined before, is in an extradition case like Charles Ng there seems to be almost an abuse—not an abuse because you are entitled to an appeal—with appeal, after appeal, after appeal. There was delay. On the other hand, a decade ago there was the case of Leonard Pelletier, an Indian activist, an aboriginal leader in the United States, who history seems to say was extradited on fabricated evidence, affidavits. That is a blot on the Canadian justice system. Mr. Pelletier is still in jail in the United States.

We do not want that to happen. We have to find a fair way. All members of the justice committee, and I am looking at my friend from Peterborough, my friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys and so on, tried to find some system that would be fair and have fair procedural matters but would not involve too long a delay.

What does my amendment do? My amendment catches a matter that I think is a fault in the bill. What happens is that when the appeals are exhausted, the minister decides under section 25, because it is a political decision at that point, a decision of state, to agree to the extradition as has been ordered by the Canadian courts, after all appeals have been exhausted. There is a tendency, and we saw it in a recent case, of suddenly the person is gone right out of the country right away. There was not even a chance for the lawyer to even meet with his client. That is pretty tacky, it seems to me, and not within the principles of justice that we should have in Canada.

My amendment simply gives a short period in which there can be a consideration of further appeals or a consideration of getting things in order before the person is actually extradited to the country that is seeking the extradition. It seems to me that is fair and just. That is not a long delay.

Not only that, I am following what the Canadian Bar Association said. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the Canadian Bar Association regarding the date of surrender. I quote their brief to the legislative committee on this bill: "A fugitive should not be surrendered to a foreign state until he or she has had an opportunity to exhaust all rights of appeal provided under the Extradition Act".

I am just checking my notes of what the bar said: "A fugitive should not be surrendered to a foreign state until he or she has an opportunity to exhaust all rights of appeal provided under the Extradition Act. Allowing the fugitive an opportunity to exhaust such rights requires that he or she have a reasonable period of time following any decision to determine whether or not to file an appeal or to apply for judicial review. Paragraph 23(a) of the act, as proposed in Bill C-31, does not provide the fugitive with a reasonable period of time following a decision by the minister under subsection 25(1). Further, proposed paragraph 23(b) does not allow the fugitive a reasonable period of time following a decision by a court of appeal to bring an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada".

The recommendation that is set out is recommendation 12 of the Canadian Bar Association. I basically followed that in the drafting of my amendment which was read to the House.

We heard in the committee from Donald MacLeod, the lawyer for Charles Ng. If I might say parenthetically, I was very impressed with Mr. MacLeod. John Diefenbaker once said this: It is tough for a lawyer to take a pretty unpopular case. This was an unpopular case. MacLeod in my view handled it well. He handled himself very well in front of our committee. I think all members felt that way. Mr. MacLeod said before our committee, and I quote:

• (1210)

> If surrender is effective before a Notice of Appeal is actually filed, access to the appeals process contemplated by the bill can be completely frustrated.

I draw the member's attention to what Mr. MacLeod said at page 13 of his brief. I quote:

> As currently drafted, the bill makes no provision for automatic stays of execution during all appeal periods. If surrender is affected before Notice of Appeal is actually filed, access to the appeals contemplated by the bill can be completely frustrated.
> I would suggest automatic stays such as those contemplated by former provisions of the Criminal Code for death penalty cases as means of guaranteeing access to appeal process, section 604 and section 607(3) of the Criminal Code as they stood in 1975.

There is a precedent.

I asked the question of some departmental officials who were with the parliamentary secretary, whom I welcome. I see him in the House, the member for Niagara Falls. The departmental officials rejected my amendment. They said that the amendment would mean cases like that of Mr. Obomsawin, who, it is reported, wanted to be extradited immediately. They said the minister's hands would be tied.

That is not true. In other words, this is someone who did not want an appeal, "Just get me extradited". You will see from my amendment, clause 2, I say:

> A fugitive may inform the Minister, in writing, that the fugitive does not propose to commence an appeal or proceedings for a judicial review in respect of any matter arising under this Act, and where the Minister is so informed, the fugitive may be surrendered forthwith.

That takes care of that argument.

The second argument the department put up was that the amendment would mean a stay of execution of up to 120 days should the Supreme Court be in summer recess. They are technically right. July and August are excluded from the computation of the 30-day and 60-day limits normally applied to appeals, if you look at the Supreme Court Act and the Federal Court Act. How many cases will this actually affect? We are just talking of that period of the summer which affects everything in our judicial system anyway. Do we toss out the principle of fair and even-handed application of justice, the very principle of our right to appeal that the legislation recognizes, simply because the court has gone fishing for the summer?

There could be a short delay in some cases in the summer. That is a pretty weak argument, it seems to me, for arguing against my motion.

In the couple of minutes remaining, I would just draw the House's attention to the evidence of David Givens, a trial lawyer from Vancouver, who has done a lot of extradition cases, including the Reyat Interjit Singh case involving the bombing of the Indian airliner. Mr. Givens said that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your maximum 10 minutes has now expired.

Mr. Waddell: Could I just point out then, Mr. Speaker, that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give more time?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: I thank my colleagues.

I would suggest you look in the Givens' statement. Look at some of the evidence in other cases, the difficulty lawyers have contacting their client, arranging matters, talking further about appeals and so on. This amendment is not asking much. It is simply asking that after all appeals are exhausted and the minister is about to grant the extradition that there be a short period, as I say in my bill, of up to 30 days, to give counsel time to meet with his or her client, to look at the matter, to decide where they are going from there.

That is not unreasonable. As I said to the House, we in the NDP will support the extradition bill. I suggest the government might consider supporting this amendment.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this amendment. I have a concern, and I am hoping that the hon. parliamentary secretary can address it. Like the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, I have a concern on this. It is a fundamental concern.

My concern is not that the lawyer have a chance to speak with his client after all the rights of appeal have elapsed, to say goodbye or whatever he wants to do, take him to the World Court or whatever. We have here in this process a right of appeal. My concern is that upon having a judicial review of the order of extradition, the government has the power to whisk the person who is the subject of the extradition order out of the country before that person has the right to file a right of appeal.

I was not there to listen to the Canadian Bar Association's suggested amendment, but from reading this, this would seem to me to be their concern: that you have the hearing, the hearing is over and immediately upon the finish of the hearing, the person is whisked on to a plane and taken out of the country before that person has a chance to file an appeal.

That would seem to be a denial of the person's fundamental right under this act and under the fundamental right of justice actually. If, in fact, it is a question merely of the person being able to be taken out of the country immediately after the finish of the hearing of the appeal, I have no problem with that.

I feel that if there is a right of appeal, the person who is the subject of this hearing should be given time to speak with his or her lawyer about filing that appeal. To me, this is not clear. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could give me some information and clarify this for me.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words at the report stage of Bill C–31, the extradition bill. I hope to have the opportunity as well tomorrow when this comes up for third reading stage.

There are quite a few defects at the present time. Whatever else we can say about the extradition law in this country, I think we can say three things for sure. We can say that the law is enormously complex as it stands now. It results in long delays, and it requires a great deal of costly court time. It has those three defects, all of which I think most Canadians would agree should be remedied.

I suggest that the extradition bill that is presently before Parliament goes to those three problems that I find. The present legislation as it now stands gives an opportunity for an individual who is fighting extradition to get as many as three times in sequence the opportunity to have his or her case reviewed by the Supreme Court of Canada; three times in sequence.

Tell me what other forum or what other law in Canada would provide that kind of opportunity for an individual. One of the problems, and perhaps the major problem with the extradition law in this country as it is now, is that it provides that individual who has come here far more remedies than are available to a person charged with a criminal offence under Canadian law. You get far more remedies, far more kicks at the can if you have come from elsewhere to Canada to try to pursue your rights than if you are a Canadian citizen charged with an offence in this country.

As I say, you cannot give me another case where you or anyone would have a case, a problem or a charge that could be reviewed three times in sequence by the Supreme Court of Canada. You cannot come up with any examples because it only exists in the extradition law.

That is why the government, rightly so, has come forward with the changes. With respect to the motion presented by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, I would suggest that the effect of the amendment would be to prevent the surrender of a fugitive to a foreign state until either the expiration of 30 days after the Minister of Justice makes a surrender order under section 25 or the expiration of any appeal periods or any periods in which to make an application for leave to appeal, whichever time is later.

Presumably the reason for the suggested amendment is to prohibit the surrender until after the relevant appeal periods have expired in their entirety, whether or not the fugitive has actually filed an appeal or an application for leave to appeal.

The amendments contained in Bill C–31, include a statutory bar to surrender where an appeal is actually pending. In other words, a fugitive could not be surrendered where a notice of appeal has been filed on behalf of that fugitive according to the provisions of Bill C–31. These provisions do not contain a prohibition on surrender during the periods in which an appeal or leave to appeal may be initiated, if an appeal has not actually been taken.

The reason that a prohibition on surrender of the nature contemplated by the hon. member's amendment is not included in Bill C–31 is that it increases, in our opinion, the likelihood of delay. Bill C–31, on the other hand, encourages appeals on behalf of the fugitive to be initiated promptly. This is consistent with the general aim of the bill which I indicated earlier, which is to reduce delays in the handling of extradition cases in this country.

A legislative prohibition on surrender within the statutory appeal periods, where no appeal has been filed as proposed by the hon. member, has the potential to be abused by fugitives who are seeking a means to stall a likely surrender.

For example, in the case of an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, this amendment could result in a delay of up to four months before an appeal is filed where the summer recess of the court is calculated as part of the period within which to apply for leave to appeal. Otherwise the amount of time permitted to appeal to the Supreme Court under the Supreme Court of Canada Act is 60 days.

Out of concern over opening up the possibility of inordinate delay, the government is unable to support the amendment of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. Instead the government intends to re-examine the issue of forestalling surrender of a fugitive during appeal periods.

A comprehensive review of all aspects of Canadian legislation in this area is taking place and certainly members of the government hope to introduce further changes to this area of the law later this year. In the meantime, I would suggest to hon. members, because of the possibility of delay, because of the possibility of abuse which goes contrary to the stated intentions of this bill, they turn down the suggested amendment by the hon. member.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, just on a small point.

My concern is with the fundamental right of justice. I think this is basically a very good bill. Our party has no problem with the bill over all. It is a step in the right direction.

As the hon. parliamentary secretary has said, there were far too many appeal processes that were not really necessary. But this bill, through the ability of the country to whom the person is sought to be extradited, has a chance to make application and the person who is the point of the extradition has the chance to appeal. I think it looks after these areas.

My concern, and I have stated it to the parliamentary secretary, is that while it gives the right of appeal to the person the government is seeking to extradite and says this person cannot be deported, turn this person over to the other country while this appeal is pending. The problem is, once the hearing is finished the government has the right to whisk this person out of the country before this person has an opportunity to speak to his or her lawyer on the question. There would be no way to file an appeal, therefore, the appeal cannot be pending if it is not filed. If the right of appeal is there why is the person being arbitrarily denied that right? That is my only concern and I think it is a valid one in the motion proposed by the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I just want to point out that there is no question and comment period at report stage. It is purely out of gentlemanliness, as a courtesy, that I recognized the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. If the hon. parliamentary secretary wants to answer the question, he may, but I would not want to set a precedent.

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: I am always pleased to speak a second time, Mr. Speaker. I am very enthusiastic about this bill.

I have heard the concerns of the hon. member. I can indicate to him that in our review of the bill in this area we will have a look at that to make sure we have struck a balance between the government's and the Canadian people's justified concern in seeing that these matters are held in an expeditious manner and are dealt with in a fair manner and the concerns expressed by the hon. member on behalf of an individual who is the subject of an order sending him back to his or her country of origin.

We will be having a look at it, but I think the present law has erred on the side of providing for too much delay, too much review and too much stalling. I think this is one of the reasons why Canadians have come forward and said to us that we must do something about extradition in this country because that kind of legislation is not working.

The hon. member says: "We have erred on the other side. Now we are trying to rush these people out of there". I can say to him that during the review of the bill, the witnesses who came forward and my interpretation of the bill, I think it does strike the balance. It is in conformity with the tenets of fairness that we expect within Canadian laws and within the Canadian judicial system.

I do not think it goes too far the other way in trying to hurry these individuals. That is certainly not the intention of the bill. It is that everyone should be dealt with in a fair but expeditious manner that takes into consideration our collective rights as Canadians to have a system that works and is not open to abuse.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much time because I see that all three parties are supporting this bill.

I want to emphasize to the House how many representations I had from my constituents in Parkdale—High Park about this extradition bill. Their biggest concern is that the criminals we are harbouring in Canada have more rights than the victims.

I am pleased that finally all three parties are listening to what the Canadian people have been telling us and passing this legislation and, at the same time, being fair. The message I received was loud and clear: we are giving more rights to the criminals than to the victims. Hopefully this will end with the passage of this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before calling in the members, I want to remind hon. members that pursuant to the item on the Order Paper divisions could—I did say "could"—be taken this afternoon at 5:45 p.m.

• (1230)

I want to make it clear, before calling in the members, that this vote is not automatically deferred until the end of the day. It can be taken forthwith, if the hon. members so desire. However, for the time being, I have no choice but to call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been consultations and I think the Whip for the Official Opposition will be informing the Table that the vote will be deferred until 5.45 p.m.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, there has been agreement among the parties to defer the vote until 5.45 p.m. I think you will find there is that agreement.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Just to make sure everything is quite in order here, I will put the question anyway. Then I will recognize the hon. member for York—Simcoe to move what he has just suggested.

Call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is agreement among the parties to defer the vote you have just called to 5.45 p.m. tonight.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize. I thought that by saying "call in the members" there would be a call of the bells. In any case this is a technicality. However, I want to make sure that we are following the rules of the House and I would appreciate a call of the bells. Then, I will recognize the hon. member for York—Simcoe.

And the bells having stopped:

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government Whip to defer the division to a later time.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 5:45 p.m. today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

I apologize for any confusion, but the Chair wanted to make sure that the rules were well followed and understood. It is always better when things are explained before rather than after. I thank you for your co-operation.

Government Orders

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–60, an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are four motions in amendment regarding the report stage of Bill C–60, An Act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, standing in the name of the member for Essex—Windsor.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2 and 4.

[Translation]

Motion No. 3 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 to the House.

MOTION TO AMEND

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–60 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–60 be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Motion No. 4

That Bill C–60 be amended by deleting Clause 7.

He said: This bill in front of us today does two or three significant things.

Part of the bill deals with the extension and improvement of equalization payments for seven provinces throughout the country. We have no quarrel with that part of the bill, nor have we moved any amendments with respect to it.

A second part of the bill provides a guarantee of personal income tax revenues to provinces, and that guarantee is extended for two years in the bill. We feel it is important that this bill have the effect of increasing the sense of urgency to deal with the whole set of problems associated with transfer payments in this country, as the federal government has been off–loading many of its costs onto the provinces by reducing the expected amount of transfer payments for the provinces.

We have moved an amendment which reduces the extension of this guarantee from two years to one year. Within this one year period, it should be possible to deal with some of the serious problems which exist with respect to other transfer payments besides the equalization system.

The third thing this bill does, which is what this set of amendments deals with, is make it possible for provinces to enter into arrangements with the federal government to effectively establish harmonization of sales tax regimes so the goods and services tax, which we so profoundly object to, can be harmonized with provincial sales tax regimes.

We have seen and heard from every manner of small business across this country. Whether this small business happens to be in the service sector, in manufacturing, the corner grocery store, or the diaper service that services your child, we have heard nothing but horror stories about the way the goods and services tax has imposed a massively increased administrative burden on these small businesses.

I have sat and talked with small business people in my constituency who have told me they have to take as much time now to deal with the administration of this tax as they do to promote their businesses. I can tell you about specific cases.

The Great Canadian Trading Company, for instance, is an important business employing people and selling Canadian items to tourists coming from the United States in the Windsor area. The owner of this business has told me she has to spend over half her time administering this goods and services tax. It is not because she is an uneducated person. It is because her business is a particularly complicated business. It is not large enough to justify hiring a specialist to look after the administrative problems of the goods and services tax. Her small enterprise purchases Canadian craft goods from over 800 different suppliers from across the country.

That kind of business finds itself absolutely crippled by the goods and services tax. The government has suggested to us that we can somehow solve some of these administrative problems by creating one grand tax covering both provincial and federal revenues. It would be a super goods and services tax which would somehow make things easier for small businesses. It will not. It will make things more difficult for small businesses across this country. What is already a problem for firms, such as the one I referred to in my comments, will become an even bigger problem.

We have moved these amendments because we think they should be taken out of this piece of legislation. We think there should be nothing in this piece of legislation that gives any stamp of approval to the goods and services tax. As far as we are concerned, this tax should be eliminated from the arsenal of tax measures in this country.

If we get the chance to form the government after the next election it will be eliminated, and it will be eliminated because it is a bad tax. It establishes an inequality between small businesses in Canada and those in the United States, which is so grossly unfair that those small businesses on our side of the border simply cannot compete effectively.

We must give those small businesses in Canada a fighting chance to compete effectively, not against countries in Europe which have value-added taxes, but against companies in the United States where they do not. When we visited Washington a few months ago we were told they have no chance of putting a value-added tax into effect. To establish fairness of competition for our small businesses here in this country facing small businesses right across the border in the U.S., we must see to it no stamp of approval whatsoever is given to the GST. That is why I urge people in this House to vote for these amendments. They will have the effect of stopping this government's continuing efforts to legitimize a bad tax which has increased the recession, put more people out of work in Canada, and made life much, much more difficult for small business people right across this country.

I urge those people in the Conservative back benches, who should be listening to their constituents and standing up against the GST, to support these amendments. I urge the Liberals, who go back and forth on this issue of the GST, to make it clear in this case they are going to take a position which stops the government from putting the GST under yet another stamp of approval from this House of Commons.

I hope these sets of amendments, which I have moved with respect to this legislation, will be accepted for that reason.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the amendments to the proposed bill under discussion.

One part of the proposed amendments would diminish the revenues guaranteed from two years to one year. The other would delete clauses intended to improve tax administration between the federal government and those of the provinces.

I will deal first with the proposed amendments to the revenue guarantee.

Hon. members will be aware that the proposed amendment to the revenue guarantee does not directly affect the main purpose—

Mr. W. Langdon: I should point out to the Conservative member who is speaking that the amendments do not include the revenue guarantee. That debate will take place with respect to the next amendment moved, as I understand it.

Mr. Richardson: I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member but I think I will carry on.

Honourable members will be aware that the proposed amendments to the revenue guarantee do not directly affect the main purpose of the proposed legislation before us, the renewal enhancement of the equalization program. However, just because this House is aware of this distinction, it does not mean the provinces or the public in general will seize this subtlety. Therefore, it is important all of this legislation apply for a period of two years.

There are good reasons for having chosen to renew the equalization program for two years. Renewal at the traditional five-year period would have given every appearance of a lessened federal commitment to the current review of all three major transfer programs.

Such a message would not reflect our intentions, so we did not want to send it.

We considered the other extreme of reviewing the equalization program for a single year, but this would have turned up the heat for the transfer review process and left the seven equalization-receiving provinces without the transfer revenue certainty they need for reasonable planning horizons.

After more than 20 months of consultations with the provinces, we settled on a two-year renewal period. We believe it offers the best balance between the need for impetus and flexibility in the review process, and revenue certainty for the provinces.

This is the way the provinces understand the proposal as of today, and all of the recipient provinces have agreed to this proposal. It would be regrettable if this House sent a signal that the agreed upon time frame was less than secure.

I would now like to refer to tax administration and turn to the proposed deletion of clauses related to tax administration amendments.

The clause in question set out a legal framework for amendment agreements between the provinces and the federal government, providing for the administration and enforcement of a federal tax by a province, or the administration of a provincial tax by the federal government.

• (1250)

Such agreements improve the over-all efficiency of the Canadian tax system and thereby contribute to a better tax system. The provisions of the bill also simplify the payment of taxes for individuals in cases where an agreement has been entered into.

The clauses in question provide for simplification of payments in taxes and refunds in cases where a province is administering a federal tax. In such cases, the bill allows the taxpayer to validly pay the province the federal tax that the province is administering.

The province will also be able to pay tax refunds to an individual on behalf of the federal government. In this way, it will be simpler for a taxpayer to pay and to receive refunds of a federal tax that is administered by a province. Under these clauses, the same is true of provincial taxes that are administered by the federal government.

The clauses in question also provide for simplified remittance to the federal government of taxes collected by a province on behalf of the federal government. In such cases, the clauses state that the province may deduct from the taxes so collected the amount that it has paid to persons on behalf of the federal government.

The remittance of provincial taxes collected by the federal government will also be simplified under these clauses. I could go on, but I think the House gets the point. We are talking about making tax administration and enforcement more efficient and hence less expensive.

Canadians have made it abundantly clear that they expect their governments to do everything they can to improve efficiency and cost effectiveness. I say to the House that we should retain the clauses that are proposed for deletion.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to that. I heard the member say it is to improve efficiency. Those words sound sort of cold, bureaucratic and as an economist would speak. To improve efficiency.

Mr. McDermid: What have you got against economists?

Mr. Waddell: I have nothing against economists, but there is a real world out there. They are not listening and similarly the government.

I received some phone calls last night. One phone call was from a senior who told me that the seniors got 37 cents on their pensions as a cost of living increase. They got 37 cents. That is the three month cost of living increase.

Mr. McDermid: So we got inflation down.

Mr. Waddell: Just look at that. The government has a GST now that it wants to harmonize with the provinces.

You buy a hamburger and I am not talking about buying it at McDonald's where most seniors buy hamburgers, but let us say you buy a hamburger with a salad and maybe some French fries. You can get that at a restaurant for $4.98 or $4.99, if you shop around.

Let us say a senior goes out and gets a hamburger at $4.99. They pay 7 cents on the dollar in GST. Seven times five is 35 cents. So to buy one hamburger you have to pay 35 cents tax to this disastrous government that almost equals the amount of the increase received.

Prices have moved up. I know the government says: "The inflation rate is going down". Look at the real world. It is off-loading its deficit onto the provinces and they are off-loading it onto the municipalities.

It means to people in the greater Vancouver area where I come from that somebody has to pay more money for transit, seniors. Somebody there has to pay more money for house taxes, seniors. Somebody there has to pay more money for water taxes, this or that, the seniors.

What do the seniors get from this government? They get 37 cents. Go out and buy a hot hamburger, and you pay that in taxes to this government on the GST.

What does the government want to do? It wants to harmonize the GST. Do you know what it should do? It should take the damn tax right off. It should take the GST off, and it should tax the people who can afford to pay the taxes. It should not tax the seniors who get a bloody 37 cents from this government. It is shameful.

I know we got into a little trouble with the Mace. I got into trouble. It was my fault and I apologized to the House and I was disciplined for it. It was over a vote, a quick vote that was held because the government made seniors pay their taxes unlike other people. Unlike other people, the government was making them pay their taxes quarterly. Many seniors were suddenly getting hit with these tax bills and interest. We found out it was $300 million it was taking from the seniors, collectively. Individually, of course, it was giving seniors an increase of 37 cents.

Now I know the economists. I respect the economists and I respect the people who say: "Well, Waddell, you are crazy. You are getting up here and equating $300 million with 37 cents".

There is a real world out there that the government has to face in an election, if it had the guts to call an election. This gutless bunch will not call an election because they are scared. Mulroney gets up and he says: "I am going to call an election". But he is scared.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not want to do your job, but we refer to one another in this House as hon. members, not by last names. I am sure that the hon. member, who is in full flight right now, would apologize to the House for that.

Mr. Waddell: I will apologize to this House when Mulroney gives the seniors some money and gets rid of this GST.

An hon. member: Your time is not up.

Mr. Waddell: My time is not up. I will continue. I am not apologizing to this House.

The Mulroney government, which you can call a government, this sham of a government has no guts to call an election. Come on, call an election. Let the seniors get at you. Come on, let all those people that pay the GST. Come on call it, we are waiting. Call it. You are gutless. You know what you are doing. You give 37 cents to the seniors of this country. Thirty-seven cents. That is where they are at. The gutless—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, I remind the hon. member that the debate is on Bill C-60.

Mr. Waddell: I am speaking to the bill, if the members would listen. I am speaking to the bill. The bill is about the GST and about harmonizing. I am saying that the government is requiring seniors and other people in this country to pay the GST. At the same time it gave them 37 measly cents.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Waddell: Why? What do you mean why? Why did you not give them some decent money, if you are going to tax them? You are going to take $18 billion.

Do you know what the government does? Do you know why it wants to harmonize and get more money? It wants to take this GST money but not to pay down the deficit. It wants to put it in a big slush fund for the election it is going to call, not now but in 18 months at the last minute.

From this big slush fund, it is going to take that money from seniors and other people in Canada and it is going to give it to political consultants, to ad makers, to the people who are going to try to warp public opinion. Well, the government is not going to get away with it. It is not going to get away with it. People are fed up.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, we are used to the rhetoric of the NDP, but I just want the member to be reasonable.

It is difficult, but he knows very well that some citizens in this country are well protected, even with 37 cents. No other group of people around the world can say that its spending power is protected so well for the 37 cents they receive.

They talk about children, people losing their jobs and so on. The rhetoric of the NDP is to spend money, spend money, spend money. That is the wonderful world where they are because they do not have to find the money.

Once again, be reasonable and tell the truth to Canadians. It is what we are about here, my friend.

Mr. Waddell: I will reply to the minister. Get out of your limousine, Mr. Minister. Get into the real world. Get out to McDonald's or the food banks. Get out of the big fat city that the Mulroney Tories are in. You may be gutless enough to not speak out in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I asked the hon. member to be relevant about the subject of the debate. Debate is on Bill C-60.

Mr. Waddell: I am relevant. I am saying to the House, to this fat bunch of Tories who are not listening, I am relevant. People have phoned me and said: "By God, we got 37 cents from this bunch and now they put an $18 billion tax on us, collectively". This is why they are mad at you. My friend you live in a world—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I repeat once again that the debate is strictly on the motions to amend Bill C-60; consequently the scope of this debate is very narrow. I request the co-operation of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: I am dealing with this motion. The motion calls for harmonization. The motion talks about the GST. I am saying that to buy a hamburger with a salad for $4.99, seniors and other people in this country have to pay 35 cents in GST. The government wants to harmonize it with the provincial tax so they will pay more. And they are saying: "Thanks, you gave us—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the tirade of my hon. friend. He told us to get out of the fat cities. I saw him in fat city Toronto yesterday.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: It is very easy to get the NDP going.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to know what the minister has against Toronto. There are seniors in Toronto who got their 37 cents and are paying the sales tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That is not a point of order. It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I will talk to that. Let me just say that the government is going to oppose the motions that were presented by my hon. friend from Windsor.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. McDermid: Because they are inappropriate for this bill, that is why.

One of the things my hon. friend fails to mention when he talks about increases in old age pensions is that by law and for many, many years senior citizens pensions have been indexed to the cost of living in our country. Because the inflation rate is so low, that is why they are getting that amount of increase in their cheques.

I agree with my hon. friend that it is a small amount but it is the law of the land. It is a law that was passed by this House of Commons and by the way, supported at the time by the New Democratic Party. I want that made very clear. They supported the indexing of senior citizens pensions. As a matter of fact, at that time I believe it was a unanimous decision of this House. So my hon. friend is railing away at the government and how terrible it is about this type of thing.

I want to say that one of the things he failed to mention when he talks about the GST and moneys to seniors is that because of the GST they also get a cheque from the federal government that protects people with low income. That is part of the program. He failed to mention that today.

We had not had sales tax rebates for people with low incomes until this government brought that in, I believe in 1986. The Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre brought that in in 1986 and it has been greatly increased over that period of time. Until the goods and service tax came in, in fact, that was increased.

I understand the hon. member's concerns. I have had the same calls from seniors who were concerned about the low increase in their senior citizens pensions. Again, that is because we have been able to get inflation down. In getting inflation down that helps those on a fixed income. These wild increases in costs that we had, which forced the inflation rate up was damaging to our senior citizens. Keeping the inflation rate down is very important.

This bill is about transferring funds to provinces. There are great debates on that. I listen to my hon. friend when he stands up and rants and raves about off-loading onto provinces who are off-loading onto municipalities. Every expenditure in a municipality now is the federal government's fault. Every increase in an expenditure is because we have so-called off-loaded.

I want to point out very clearly that we have increased moneys to all provinces of Canada since 1984 by an average of 5 per cent. Ontario's increase was 6.2 per cent, including the year 1992-93.

I want to make it very clear that increases are going to the provinces, but not the huge increases we used to see. The Ontario government in its generosity was increasing its welfare spending at the rate of about 24 per cent a year. We had no control over any system in Ontario to make handing out welfare easier or simpler.

It was costing 24 per cent more per year and we had to put some kind of a limit on it, so we said we would not increase it any more than 5 per cent a year. I think people want that.

I hear this off-loading story all the time, yet there is just one taxpayer paying the bill. Whether he is paying it municipally, provincially, or federally, he has to pay it at some level if he is going to get a service.

I do not understand blaming the federal government for all the woes of the provincial and municipal governments. We are going to hear it from the Ontario provincial government when it comes out with its budget, and probably in its Speech from the Throne today.

I spoke to the premier of Ontario for some time yesterday, and his government is coming forth with its Speech from the Throne today. I am sure the federal government is going to be blamed for a lot of things. It is setting us up for its budget as well.

The point is that moneys are increasing to the provinces, not at the rate they would like, but that is natural. It is not going to municipalities at the rate they would like to see it increase from the provinces.

The taxpayer of this country is saying: "Whoa, no more taxes", whether they are federal, provincial, or municipal. The bills keep going up, the spending keeps going up, and governments are not putting any discipline on their spending. The Peel Board of Education in my constituency, which I believe is the largest board in North America, has done some trimming and made some announcements. A lot of people are opposing their cut-backs. That is fine.

But at the same time they are saying we cannot have these large increases and expenditures because we cannot afford them. We have to economize.

So that is happening, and I believe we in the federal government are certainly going to take the rap for this type of thing. It is easy to point fingers and we all do it in political life. We say it is the Ontario government's fault, or the municipal government's fault, or the federal government's fault. It is all our fault.

We are trying to get a common sense approach to government expenditures. That is what this is all about. I must say this bill does help provinces out. It does help seven out of ten provinces with increases in transfer payments. Agreements have been reached between the federal government and the provinces for the next two years on the transfer payment program. Naturally they would like more money. I understand that.

This bill will provide some extra money for some of the provinces and I believe it is most necessary. We will be voting against these amendments as proposed by my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased you recognized me. Mind you, with the shouting match going on between the members to my left and the members across from me, I wondered if I would ever get a word in edgewise, especially from the members on my left.

I do not like this bill. I have a lot of reservations about the way the government has handled the transfer payments. I recognize there are a great number of problems, and I know there are no easy answers, but we are not going to support this bill.

• (1310)

On the other hand, I am also realistic enough to realize the moneys contained in this particular bill are very much needed by the provincial governments. It is fine to impose the bill, but not to unduly hold it back. For every day these provinces do not receive their moneys they must borrow, and then perhaps they have a more difficult time looking after the needs of their people. Let us never forget these moneys are going to help people.

I sat through the interventions by the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on this particular amendment. The people to my left seemed to be very much concerned with the GST and the possibilities of its harmonization. They are accusing the government, of course, of having something in this particular bill that would facilitate harmonization. Well there is no surprise in that. The Conservative government has said from the beginning it would like to have harmonization with the provincial sales taxes across the country.

I am wondering if perhaps the New Democratic Party has had some inside information from some of its provincial leaders as to their inclination towards harmonization. Perhaps it has lost control of its provincial arms and Ontario and British Columbia, very much NDP-run provinces, might be ready to harmonize with the federal government.

I cannot understand otherwise why there is this great fear and harangue by the NDP members to my left about harmonization. It would seem to me they could just grab the phone, call up Mr. Bob Rae, and he, being a good NDP, would say: "Absolutely not. Never will we ever harmonize". It would be the same thing with the premier of British Columbia, so I am at a loss to understand this great debate about harmonization. I would expect they would be in a very good position to keep their ideology within their party, and make sure it certainly does not happen, at least with Ontario and British Columbia.

Something tells me there is more to this than meets the eye when you sit and really listen to the long, drawn-out debate about it. I would love to have some of that inside information they may all have, because it would certainly allow us to prepare for what is coming. Many of us have no idea, and we certainly are not confidants of the NDP governments in those provinces. We certainly do not know what their intentions are in terms of harmonization, but if their protests are any indication, I have a feeling that is the way these governments are going to go in the not too distant future. They are afraid this particular legislation might have some clause that will facilitate it.

I am not going to carry on much longer because I do not want to hold up the debate on this bill. I would like to see that the people, who are really the beneficiaries of the moneys being transferred, are able to collect those moneys as quickly as possible. There is a lot of poverty and hardship out there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): The hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Rodriguez: Well he was not in his place when I stood up. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I do not want to criticize the Chair, but I think when you recognize people they ought to be in their place, okay?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I have no problem at all recognizing the member for Nickel Belt. In fact, it will give me more ammunition in my speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): In that case, I will recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, he will need all the ammunition in the next election to win Timiskaming, I believe that.

I want to speak in support of the amendments brought in by the member for Essex—Windsor. I think he has recognized the problem of harmonization, which is what the federal government has been after the provinces to do with respect to the GST.

I understood when this government took office it was going to be a new era in the relationships between the federal and provincial governments. There was no longer going to be a confrontational approach, which was the Trudeau approach. Trudeau had a running battle with the provincial governments all of the time he was Prime Minister. When this government took office there was going to be a new era of co-operative federalism. That was the key to the relationships between the federal and provincial governments. Things would be smoother. They would work more in harmony and co-operation. Then the government decided to bring in the GST.

The minister who spoke before me said people were absolutely opposed to any new taxes. We in this party opposed a previous bill, Bill C-22, which was to bring in a payroll tax on employers to pay for a wage protection fund in the bankruptcy act. This government brought it in and we have been fighting over it ever since.

We agree there is only one taxpayer and he is at his limit. Why is the government pushing harmonization, which is going to cost taxpayers more money? Why has this government denied the Government of Ontario anywhere from $300 million to $400 million a year in provincial revenues by not collecting the provincial sales tax from all those who shop across the border in Ontario? Why has it been using that as a blackmail tactic to get the Ontario government to harmonize?

I have spoken to a lot of constituents who shop in Ontario and do not think it is fair the federal government refuses to collect the provincial sales tax at the border when it has all the mechanisms at the border to do it.

Residents of Ontario come back across the border at Niagara Falls or Fort Erie and declare goods at the border. The federal government collects the federal sales tax and any duty on the goods, but not the provincial sales tax. Is this the sense of co-operation?

The NDP Ontario government opposed the GST in its campaign. We on this side opposed the GST federally. Provincial New Democrats opposed it in the election and became the government. Since then this government has been blackmailing them to integrate the GST into the sales tax program.

The government talks about fairness, so let us talk about fairness. The retailers are collecting the GST right now and they are not paid anything to be federal tax collectors. They received an amount of money to help them initiate the GST and pay for a new cash register or whatever other paraphernalia they needed. But the government does not pay the retailer to do all that book work to collect the GST for it. That is not fair.

The government is now attempting to muscle the Ontario government and all the other provincial governments into harmonizing the GST with their provincial sales taxes. Can you imagine, right now in the province of Ontario, we do not pay a provincial sales tax on haircuts.

I want the government to know, this is what happens when you have the Tories on the run. This is their attempt to shut up the opposition on this very important issue. I want the people watching to know that the Tories have turned up the heat and now we have the fire brigade outside. Tories, I know you would sink to a lot of things, but I never thought you would get this low.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): The hon. member on a point of order.

• (1320)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate if the House were to suspend to the call of the Chair.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): In view of the alarm it is a good idea. To the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I have noted your time on the clock and we will reconvene when the alarm stops.

This House stands suspended until the alarm stops.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 1.25 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 1.37 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Nickel Belt has one minute left.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is very rare that we have this kind of disruption in the middle of a speech. I would ask you to be generous in your interpretation of the one-minute period that my colleague has left. He was making some very important points when the fire alarm interrupted him.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Of course I am aware that the Standing Orders do not provide for suspensions in situations like the one we were just in. I am told that it is the first time that the business of the House has been suspended because of the alarm bell ringing. That said, I give the floor to the hon. member for Nickel Belt for at least one minute.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted by the Tories putting the place on fire, the fact of the matter is that the minister who spoke before me was perfectly correct in his sense that Canadians do not want any more taxes. They want no further increase in taxes. In fact they want a lowering of taxes. I want to suggest to him that the attempts to force the governments of this country to harmonize with the GST would increase taxes to them.

• (1340)

For example, by harmonizing the GST with the provincial sales tax in the province of Saskatchewan, it is estimated that it would cost the people of Saskatchewan $300 million a year more. Imagine what it would cost the people of Ontario if the GST were harmonized with the provincial sales tax. I would hazard a guess that it would be in the vicinity of $1 billion. It will not lower the rate. It extends the tax to things that are not now taxed. It seems to me that is not fair to the people of Ontario.

We do not pay a provincial sales tax on haircuts. I know the minister does not have that problem, but we do not pay provincial sales tax on haircuts. If we were to harmonize the provincial sales tax with the GST, it would be extended to all those things that this horrendous, terrible GST is now applied to.

If the minister really wants to show a spirit of co-operation and keep the taxes down for the people of Ontario, why not collect the provincial sales tax at the border on those Ontarians who shop in the United States?

Mr. McDermid: On all items?

Mr. Rodriguez: On the items they would pay that tax on in Ontario, absolutely. It seems to me that is fairness. It would bring the tax down for the rest of the people in Ontario if those people were to pay their fair share of the taxes.

Mr. McDermid: Ontario merchants do not want that.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, earlier I allowed the hon. member for Nickel Belt to give us his wisdom and his thoughts. I was hoping for something different from the member for Nickel Belt and the NDP, but it was the same old broken record and when you listen to a broken record long enough you want to throw it out.

I just want to make a comment before getting into debate. I know the audience out there had the opportunity to listen to the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. It is no wonder the Canadian public is at the point where it does not want to listen, watch or see public officials on an ongoing basis and the type of charade that took place in this House earlier.

I want to apologize on behalf of this government. We certainly do not believe in those types of tactics. We are trying to do our utmost in this House to ensure that we bring some sanity back to the House.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member should withdraw his accusation of unparliamentary tactics. All I did was speak. That is what Parliament is about. All I did was represent people who are worried about what this government is doing. The member has no right to accuse me of unparliamentary tactics.

Mr. McDermid: That is no point of order.

Mr. Waddell: It is a point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think that hon. members on both sides of the House have expressed their opinions on the point at issue. It is not necessary to go further.

We resume debate with the hon. member for Timiskaming.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the concerns of those in the NDP with regard to Bill C-60 today. I listened over the last number of months to their concerns about rural Canada, their concerns about small business, and their concerns about the industries in this country. I really find it hard to believe, after listening to their concerns in Question Period or in speeches in the House, that they want to make sure that Canadians are working and they want to make sure we have a stable country. They will not even deal with the basic, fundamental problems in this country in duplication.

It is one thing to look at job creation, but it is another thing to sit down and look at what the NDP want to try to continue to do, which makes no sense whatsoever to anybody in small business. If they have to make two reports to file with two separate governments, it makes no sense whatsoever. That is the message we are receiving from the Canadian public, the fact that they want simpler guidelines, simpler rules, simpler opportunities so they can do business in a very competitive world.

I get quite frustrated when I sit here and listen on a day to day basis that they want to do something to get people working. Yet when the government moves forward with proposed legislation that will give the opportunity for all Canadians, all types of business, for a blended type of taxation that will take away some of the difficulties with which they face, they say the government is not listening to the provinces.

Over the last 20 months our officials have been travelling the country meeting with provincial counterparts, trying to work out an agreement that is going to be successful for everyone. I think that is what we are supposed to be doing in this country today. We are not supposed to be sitting back and fighting one another. We have a big world out there and we have to address the competitiveness and the opportunities that are afforded us. What we are trying to do with this piece of legislation is ensure that happens, that for a small Ma and Pa type of operation in Timiskaming or any other part of Canada, where they have a hard enough time to keep eating, we take away duplication for them.

I do not think we are asking too much. We are asking that the provinces put their political thought off to one side for a period of time and look at what is going to be the best for our country. That is what we have been trying to do over the past 20 months.

Similarly we hear on an ongoing basis that we should not be capping, or we should not be limiting the transfer of payments. The people I talk to are tired of seeing blank cheques handed out. They do not want to see blank cheques. They want to see government accountable for every dollar because there is only one taxpayer out there.

Someone living in my community says to me: "John, I have to pay provincial, federal, school board, and municipal tax". By the way, my constituents applauded the Minister of Finance on his last budget because he finally came out with a budget that is fair.

They are sitting back and saying right now: "What is going to happen in the province of Ontario in a matter of weeks?" We know there is a throne speech later on today. There will be pie in the sky. They will be turning around and blaming us, the federal government. But look back over the last seven years at the transfer payments we have sent to the province of Ontario. You start writing out cheques. My constituents believe there is sufficient money in the educational system, in the health care system, but what they do not want to see is the misuse of funds. We want to see accountability, that we are not just continuing to write out cheques.

It is the same thing when we are talking about taxation in regard to the GST. You would think from what we heard earlier there are no rebates at all for Canadians, that the government was only taxing more. On the weekend I was talking to an individual involved in trailer sales. He said: "John, it is the best thing that ever happened to my business. You know the parks that I have in place are worth $1.5 million. I do not have 13 per cent tax on that any longer and you would not believe what that has done to my cash flow".

At the same time we are taking the tax from 13 per cent down to 7 per cent. You would almost think that we are not giving rebates, if you listen to what has taken place in this House. That is the problem we are facing in this country. Canadians want to know the truth. Canadians want to know. They are not looking for pie in the sky. They are interested in a government that recognizes and tries to deal with the problem. That is what we have been doing in the last seven years.

You get all these ideas flying over top with all their airy-fairy types of opportunities. It is no wonder that people want to turn off their TV set and not listen to what is happening in this House.

What this government has been doing, and what this bill would do, is ensure that it is a blended opportunity for taxation, an opportunity for the next two years for stability. I think that is what Canadians are looking at. Canadians are not prepared to listen to any more of the hare-brained type of proposals and scare tactics that are being used on the other side. I am sure that at the end of the day Canadians are going to recognize, and are starting to recognize, that. In fact, in The Toronto Star yesterday there was an article stating that Canadians are prepared for a big increase in opportunities in this country. It is because of the basic policies that this government has put forward over the last seven years.

• (1350)

In closing, I hope that we have the opportunity to pass this piece of legislation later today. It is another step in ensuring that Canada will be strong for the future.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to engage in this debate for a brief period.

The bill before us is Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. One thing that this bill does is to pave the way for possible harmonization of the goods and services tax and provincial sales taxes between the federal government and the various provincial administrations across Canada.

The way that the federal government has been behaving over the past few years, and the past few months in particular, makes me think that we are almost engaged in running a protection racket. If the provinces refuse to buckle under, despite their own priorities and the wishes of their citizens, even the needs of their own people and the needs of their own treasuries, they are being forced, under threat of continuing cuts by the federal government to cost-sharing of different types between Ottawa and the provinces, to knuckle under and harmonize their tax regimes with the federal tax called the goods and services tax.

There is a pretty powerful incentive included in these threats, in this blackmail and in this protection racket. If they are to harmonize their provincial sales taxes and the goods and services tax for collection at the border, for instance, there are in some cases advantages to the tune of extra hundreds of millions of dollars which could flow into those provincial treasuries at a time when they are very hard-pressed.

We do not think it is very good politics or even very good economics to have federal-provincial financial relations determined by the kind of attitude that the federal government has displayed during this past period. Surely when we are facing real difficult economic situations across the country and, in some regions, particularly in the manufacturing areas of Canada, there is no doubt that we are facing some extremely hard times. What we should be asking is that the federal and provincial governments sit down in a rational sort of way, decide what the essential priorities are in a time of reduced revenues and work out, as well as we can on a co-operative basis, just what funds we have to raise and what the priority expenditures ought to be. To have it done by bluff and by bluster in a scenario of name-calling and increasing confrontation between Ottawa and the provinces is not what our taxpayers expect us to be doing. At a time when we have enough problems across the country, constitutionally or otherwise, we do not need any more division than we have got already.

What has happened to the finances of some of our so-called have provinces over the past period? I am a representative of a constituency in British Columbia. The British Columbia government faced some pretty severe choices in its recent budget. It did not help its situation by having Ottawa, over the last few months, renew its cut-backs of a few years ago to what all Canadians thought were long-standing agreements as to appropriate shares of revenue and financing between our different levels of government.

Why has the federal government felt the need to off-load its responsibilities to the provinces? One reason is the long-standing failure on the federal government's part to exercise prudent fiscal management. That has caused a serious debt problem.

We do not suggest the government sitting across the way bears all the responsibility for that. Its management record over the last few years has not been great. The problems it faces because of the lack of self-discipline of the previous federal government certainly has not helped the situation.

The federal government now appears to want to avoid the visible and direct association with the severe measures it has implemented to restore its financial health. Off-loading delivers tax increases and service cuts to the public indirectly via the provinces. For obvious political reasons, the federal government is trying to direct this so the provincial governments will take the blame.

I referred initially to what seems to be the continuing threat within this legislation to push the provinces into harmonizing their provincial sales taxes with the federal goods and services tax.

An hon. member: A good idea.

Mr. Kristiansen: A good idea, the member opposite says. Does he really want to see a situation where, in order to get necessary revenues, provinces are forced to levy their provincial sales tax on all items, such as children's clothing and a number of other areas? The provinces in their wisdom have for years and years decided not to be subject to general revenue-creating mechanisms, in order to exclude people from paying taxes on goods and services which are essential for the basic maintenance of the family?

The goods and services tax has been a very blunt instrument. It has not reflected the kind of fine tuning of provincial sales taxes different provinces have developed over the years with regard for the needs and attitudes of their own populations.

We think it is fundamentally wrong for the federal government, by one means or another, and this means in particular, to attempt to force those provinces to alter their taxation base. That is not co-operative federalism. It is not co-operative financing. It is not co-operative fund raising. It is not co-operative government. It does not make sense and it is not fair.

Earlier, one of my colleagues made a point about the 37 cent cost of living increase to old age pensioners' cheques. While that may not be strictly relevant to the debate before us, I think it does demonstrate the kind of problem as seen by many of our electors and voters. In this country, pensioners who have paid their way for years and years get 37 cents a month as their pension increase. As my colleague mentioned, that does not even pay the tax on a cheap hamburger. This country has suffered from economic mismanagement for years and years.

I do not want to go on any longer. Soon we will move to Question Period. I hope the government rethinks its attitude to this legislation, stops blackmailing, stops managing a protection racket and gets down to serious co-operative discussions with the provinces as to what moneys are required and how it should be spent.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the National Hockey League players are wrong. According to Gilles Bourcier in today's La Presse, 62 per cent of the people in the Montreal area condemn the strike by the NHL players and 40 per cent of Montrealers are behind the team owners. They would rather believe the Canadiens' general manager, Serge Savard, who is from Abitibi. People do not appreciate being deprived of their favorite springtime entertainment, especially when the obstacle is a group of athletes who are considered to be very well paid.

I greatly appreciate the action taken by the management of the Montreal Canadiens hockey club in opening their books to the public, as I do with my expenses as a member of Parliament.

JUSTICE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, what has been going on over at the justice minister's office this last year? They certainly do not seem to have been doing their jobs. Since the March 1991 retirement of Judge MacPherson, Nova Scotia County Court District 6 has been without a judge.

The federal justice minister, who was responsible for appointing a replacement, has failed to do so. She has even refused to provide an explanation for her delay, just that it should not be too much longer. Her inaction has frustrated the local detachments of the RCMP and has created hardship for countless people who are served by this important court.

Last summer a sexual assault case was thrown out because the case had taken too long to come to trial. There was no judge to hear it. Victims of family break-up and violence suffer as decisions on custody and support payments are put off. Backlogs are growing each day.

Six weeks ago, the justice minister promised me that a replacement would be named shortly. We waited, yet heard nothing. Two weeks ago, she promised there would be a judge by the end of March. Still nothing. Why does she not do her job and name a replacement now?

VIMY RIDGE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, 75 years ago this week, Canadian forces won one of the most significant victories of World War I when they took Vimy Ridge.

At first light, on April 9, 1917, four Canadian divisions attacked. British Columbians were side by side with Calgarians. The Van Doos of Quebec stood shoulder to shoulder with the Highlanders of Nova Scotia. The British had not been able to take Vimy Ridge, neither had the French, but the Canadians did.

The victory was not without cost, 3,000 men died. The casualty list exceeded 10,000. Three of the four Victoria Crosses won at Vimy were awarded posthumously.

The Canadian war record, crowned by the achievement at Vimy, won for Canada a separate signature on the peace treaty ending World War I. It has been said that Canada became a nation at Vimy Ridge and at a time when we are thinking about what being Canadian means, Vimy stands as a grim and glorious reminder of those who brought us together by giving everything for our country. We will remember them.

ROTARY CLUB OF ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Rotary Club of St. John's, Newfoundland for having raised $183,000 for a new shelter for battered women.

This fund raising effort clearly shows that men and communities want to be part of the solution to eliminate violence against women. For more than 20 years, small groups of women have been working alone, setting up shelters, providing the counselling and services, raising funds, lobbying governments, educating the public on violence against women. Many women are burned out from having spent a lifetime of putting the needs of others before their own.

I am pleased that these women no longer need to continue the struggle alone. Unless we all join together the way St. John's has, violence will always be a part of our lives.

NATIONAL WILDLIFE WEEK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of National Wildlife Week, I would like to invite members of this House to join the Minister of State for the Environment and others for a nature tour around Parliament Hill tomorrow. Two biologists from Environment Canada will be our hosts for this 20-minute walk to discover the wildlife and habitat surrounding our home away from home.

After the walk, hon. members are invited to add a personal wildlife touch to a nature painting that will be set up in the rotunda. Members will also be able to view displays and publications from several wildlife organizations and government agencies in the Hall of Honour. The walk will begin at 10.30 a.m. leaving from the west doors of the Centre Block.

As the minister said in this House last week, National Wildlife Week was created to increase Canadians awareness of wildlife issues. We too can better appreciate these concerns by discovering the environment at our doorstep. Come and take part.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the government's decision to reduce its financial contribution to social housing is incomprehensible in the present context. There is a long waiting list for such housing not only in Quebec but in all the provinces of Canada.

The success of the Co-operative Housing Program in particular is an obvious reason to maintain funding for housing in Canada. An Ottawa Valley organization called "Logemen'occupe" clearly showed the confusion that exists in the department responsible for social housing. All organizations concerned with housing for the less fortunate in our society express their strong disagreement and disappointment and ask the government to reinstate the Federal Co-operative Housing Program immediately and to reallocate the $6.1 million that had been provided for it in 1992-93.

KURT BROWNING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, Olympian skater Kurt Browning made a lot of Canadian chests swell with pride last night during a performance he gave at the exhibition gala of the World Figure Skating Championships in Oakland, California.

Not content just to win a silver medal at that championship, Kurt last night performed a spectacular interpretive dance on what it means to be a Canadian. To the strains of the new symphonic version of O Canada, Browning's performance had every Canadian in the arena on their feet and cheering.

Starting this Thursday in Vancouver, Kurt Browning will skate his way across Canada in the Stars On Ice show, arriving in Halifax at the end of the month. At the conclusion of each show he will again skate and dance to this version of the national anthem.

Thanks, Kurt, for reminding us again of all the things that are right about this country. We are proud of you, we are proud of Canada.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness and concern that we read about the worst fighting in central Bosnia since the Second World War. At least 100 people have been reported killed in battles of inter-ethnic warfare. Authorities are unable to halt these violent events which are leading to an all-out war between pro-independent Croats and Muslims on the one side, and Serbs and the army on the other.

This violence has erupted on the eve of a meeting by European Community foreign ministers who may recognize Bosnia-Hercegovina as an independent state. Serbians have claimed that such recognition would lead to further violence.

Eight hundred and fifty Canadian troops stationed in Germany are scheduled to begin leaving for Yugoslavia to join the peacekeeping force and a contingent of 270 Canadian engineers are already on site. I am concerned that the renewed fighting is putting at risk the lives of peacekeepers and Canadians would like reassurances that the 850 troops will be in a relatively secure position.

I recognize the important role of peacekeepers and I hope that peacekeeping forces are able to stabilize the situation. With the deteriorating situation, UN peacekeeping operations are being tested in the extreme but must be maintained with their safety protected.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I want to place on the record some figures in point form on federal transfer payments to the province of New Brunswick.

1. They are expected to total almost $2 billion this year.

2. They will account for about 39 per cent of New Brunswick's revenues.

3. They have grown at an annual average rate of 5.7 per cent since 1984-85.

4. They will total over $2,100 per capita this year, 70 per cent higher than the national average.

The bottom line is this. This dollar amount has increased, it has not decreased.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last week Gordon Gray, the chairman of Royal LePage, stated that Canada should end the universality of its social programs or risk national bankruptcy. Royal LePage is connected to Brascan, which is connected to Trizec, which is connected to Royal Trust, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

He did not call for an end to the perks that entitle Royal Trust's senior managers to borrow money at favourable interest rates and to buy company stocks at a discount. He did not call for an end to tax shell games that allowed Brascan to declare 1989 pre-tax profits of $442 million and only paid .07 per cent taxes, or Trizec that had $202 million taxed at .8 per cent. Both are former winners of the corporate welfare bum of the week.

He did not call for an end to capital gains exemption, tax deductible cocktails and other super deluxe multibillion dollar corporate goodies that have privileged a few at the expense of the many. I agree with Mr. Gray when he said: "Once you know the facts even a fool can understand".

CANADIAN FORCES BASE CHILLIWACK

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack celebrates its 50th anniversary this week.

Established at Vedder Crossing in 1942 as a military engineering training centre, Sardis Camp grew to become what is now CFB Chilliwack.

CFB Chilliwack provides virtually all basic officer training in Canada.

CFB Chilliwack is also home to the First Canadian Engineer Regiment or 1 CER. UN peacekeeping efforts in the Persian Gulf were greatly assisted by the engineers of 1 CER. Their operations have now been consolidated with construction of a $10.5 million facility to be officially opened on Friday by the Associate Minister of National Defence.

I welcome the attendance of His Excellency, The Governor General who will join us in celebration this coming Saturday.

CFB Chilliwack has been part of our community for 50 years. It is part of the family and we are proud to recognize the important role it plays.

I trust this celebration puts to rest last year's rumours of closure. Congratulations, CFB Chilliwack. You do us proud.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, our understandable preoccupation with the foreign overfishing issue is overshadowing some of the other disasters of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

For example, his catch failure program has to be seen and is a major disappointment for all who were looking to it. Last fall, the minister asked fishermen and plant workers on the southwest coast to wait until the winter fishery was over. I have some news for him. They waited. The winter fishery was as dismal as we told him it was going to be. Ask the people in Isle aux Morts, Rose Blanche and Burnt Islands.

They are the reason why the minister has to take a fresh look at his catch failure program. I ask him to do it without further delay to ensure that those fishermen and those plant workers and others who need that assistance will get the assistance that they need.

4-H CLUBS OF CANADA

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, as you know the wealth of a nation lies in its people. By the same token, the future of a nation lies in its young people.

For that reason, I am very happy to be able to be here today to pay tribute to one particular youth group which I think has made a tremendous contribution to Canada in the past and will continue to do so in the future.

I am thinking of 4–H clubs and 4–H delegates are here from all across Canada participating in a citizenship program. The theme of their week in Ottawa is unity.

On behalf of all members of Parliament, I would like to pledge that we will do our best to ensure that they, when they have an opportunity to participate as leaders in the future, will have the same united Canada to live in that we have today.

SENIOR EXECUTIVE SALARIES AT PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, last week, the government announced a 37 cent monthly increase in old age security benefits. The minister said in the House that in Canada, and that includes Montreal, as long as people have to fight to keep their jobs, as long as workers accept wage cuts to save their jobs and as long as children need assistance, he would maintain the same policy with respect to senior citizens.

Today, in La Presse, Michel Girard mentioned salaries totalling $2,038 million for five directors of Petro–Canada. In 1991, this company registered a loss of $598 million, and shareholders saw the value of their shares drop by 37 per cent. What do we see today? We see these senior executives, these so–called big bosses, being paid all kinds of money in the way of salaries, and on top of that, they get $85,000 to pay for membership in private or social clubs and pay the fees of their financial advisers, while they get other perks as well at rock–bottom rates.

The government should treat the heads of all institutions the same. If we parliamentarians are asked to make a sacrifice, let the corporate bosses do the same and set an example to the rest of the country!

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement went into effect, U.S. Customs has routinely been harassing Canadian printers when their products cross the border insisting that "made–in–Canada" be prominently displayed.

Yet, U.S. printed materials meet no such requirement when crossing into Canada. On March 30, the Minister for International Trade, in response to a question on this matter, said: "One thing we have to be conscious of here is that Customs requirements work both ways".

He went on to say: "There are a number of our printing companies that are endeavouring to get into the United States". The minister clearly has no understanding of this, Canada's fifth largest industry, that is being decimated by the free trade deal and that it is being harassed at the border.

At the very least, the minister must insist on equal application of labelling laws for all printed material crossing our border in both directions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Seven and a half years of Tory policy have created the largest number of poor people in Canada's history. In metro Toronto, the welfare rolls have increased by 40 per cent in one year. In Edmonton, there is a 28 per cent increase; in Winnipeg, a 53 per cent increase. In Montreal, the welfare rolls have increased by 14 per cent and in Halifax by 15 per cent.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: How can provinces and municipalities meet their obligations to the poor when the federal government continues to cut back on transfer payments?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong when she suggests that we are cutting back on transfer payments. Transfer payments are, in fact, increasing. As a matter of fact, transfer payments have grown from a figure of $25.6 billion in 1984–85 to $37 billion in the year just past and to $39 billion in the current fiscal year.

That is substantial growth and all transfer payments, particularly those in the area of equalization and the CAP payments, are increasing at a substantial amount, certainly much more than our over-all annual increase in program expenditures.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that 700,000 young Canadian children have to go to food banks to get something to eat. In one of the richest countries of the world, this is outrageous. In Montreal alone, 95,000 people are on welfare.

My question is directed to the minister. How can the provinces and municipalities be expected to meet their commitments to the poor, when the federal government keeps cutting the total amount of transfer payments to the provinces?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the same answer applies.

I would urge the hon. member to look at the facts. She will find that over all, the average annual rate of growth of transfer payments from 1984–85 to 1992–93 is growing at an average rate of 5.4 per cent. The growth rate from 1991–92 to 1992–93 is 5.1 per cent.

We recognize that this is not the kind of growth rate that you experience during the high inflation days. When you have inflation at 1.6 per cent or 1.7 per cent, an increase in transfer payments at the rate of 5 per cent or 5.5 per cent is very substantial.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, at Toronto City Hall today, they are opening a photo exhibit. It is called "Canada's Food Bank Kids". There are 700,000 of them, including many thousands in that very city who have to exist through food banks.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister: Given that his government's policies have forced provincial and local governments to cut back directly and indirectly on services to the poor, how is he meeting his obligation to the United Nations in that great declaration on children when his own federal government continues to take food out of the mouths of Canada's children?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is, indeed, an unfortunate conclusion because the growth in transfer payments to the province of Ontario has been 6.2 per cent over the period 1984–85 to 1992–93.

As a matter of fact, this year there will be something in the order of $10 billion transferred to the province of Ontario through transfer payments and tax points. When we have an annual increase rate of 6.2 per cent, when our over all program expenditures are being contained to 3.5 to 3.6 per cent, that is a very generous disposition of taxpayers' dollars. I wish the hon. member would look at that and, in difficult times when we are trying to deal with a deficit, treat it for what it is, a very generous contribution by the federal government.

• (1420)

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The city of Edmonton is now home for four government members of Parliament and 60 food hamper programs.

On March 25 ANAWIM, an inner city agency, served 121 food hampers to help 199 people eat while waiting for their social assistance cheque to come in at the end of the month. This a typical day for this organization in the last week of each month.

Will the minister now admit to the House that the government's economic and social policies are wreaking havoc on his own province?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course every jurisdiction, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal, is going through some very severe cost pressures and cost drivers. We are trying to deal with that in a generous fashion while at the same time attempting to bring down the deficit and curtail the growth of the burden of debt which takes money out of the hands of the poorer people and the children of Canada.

I remind the hon. member that if we do not get at the fundamental problems of the deficit and the debt, there will be a lesser amount of money to be provided for children, the working poor and the poverty stricken in this country. What we are trying to do is manage in such a way that we can deal with the fundamentals in a balanced way while at the same time providing the framework and the environment for investment and job opportunities, not only the preservation of existing jobs but the creation of new jobs.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary for to the same minister.

The government's policies are causing harm across the prairies. Winnipeg at one time prided itself as being the gateway to the west. It is now, under this government's policies, turning into the gateway to hell. Just think, there were 27,000 people unemployed in Winnipeg as of the end of last month. There are three times that number receiving provincial and municipal assistance.

When is the government finally going to present Winnipegers with a plan to get these people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree that the budget strikes a balance in trying to deal with the deficit while at the same time trying to help those sectors, particularly the manufacturing and processing sectors. The hon. member should know that in terms of agriculture, there is no government that has been more generous to the farmers of Canada, particularly those farmers in western Canada, to deal with the very serious difficulties caused by the trade war.

There are a number of positive measures in the budget which will improve the lot of many Canadians and, most important, will provide some hope and optimism for jobs. We have to get to the fundamentals. We are addressing those. We have low interest rates, low inflation, a positive investment climate. We have provided some assistance to the manufacturing and processing sectors which is a very intensive job-creating sector.

I think the hon. member will recognize that there is a mood of change out there, a mood that is becoming more optimistic and confident about the future.

DIPLOMATIC CORPS SECURITY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns the attack on the Iranian embassy in Ottawa yesterday.

Did the government receive advance warning of this attack? If not, why not?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to express on behalf of the government and, I believe, all Canadians how annoyed we are at the attack. We regret the injuries to Ambassador Lavassani and other occupants of the embassy.

I can respond to my hon. friend that at the present time I am informed that our response was as prompt as possible under the circumstances and that arrests have taken place.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Several hours in advance of the attack on the embassy here in Canada, there were attacks on embassies in the U.K., Norway, Sweden and Germany. Clearly we do have CSIS agents in the U.K. Why was CSIS not advised here in Canada that these attacks had taken place and therefore possibly have been able to act and to avert the situation as it did happen?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's comments. As my hon. friend and the House can understand, there will be a full investigation as to the timing of these events, as to when they took place in the various locations around the world. Obviously that exact information will be known once the investigation is completed.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary for the minister, Mr. Speaker.

CSIS has a budget of $217 million and 2,000 employees. CSIS has been very active in filming PSAC demonstrations, harassing the Inuit over low-level flights and, in fact, during the gulf war in following innocent Iraqi and Iranian Canadians.

The minister says that there will be an investigation. Will he make the results of that investigation public and will he tell the Canadian people why this organization did not know this information, particularly when it was well known in Europe?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, I am sure, made an allegation that she would want to think about before she repeated it, the allegation that CSIS is filming PSAC demonstrations and harassing native people. I have no knowledge of the fact that that is in any way true. If my hon. friend has any information, I would hope that she would make it available to me immediately and I will follow-up on it.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question for the same minister on the same subject.

The diplomatic community in Canada is seriously shaken following the vicious attack on the Iranian embassy here in Ottawa on Sunday. The Iranian ambassador and two of his staff were injured, files were removed from the building and 26 people were arrested in connection with this shocking incident.

The minister and his government know that Canada has an obligation to the international community to protect the personnel and property of foreign diplomats. Can the minister explain to this House how at least 30 people forcefully entered the Iranian embassy without being stopped by the police or security?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have been following the media accounts of this as I am sure my hon. friend has. I think if he were to make himself aware of those accounts, there was considerable damage to several embassies around the world and similar situations.

I think if he were to compare the police response and the police action, in this case the RCMP and the city of Ottawa police, action was taken promptly, arrests were made and everything, as far as I am informed, was done as quickly as possible.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the same minister.

The minister tells us what happened in other countries. What happens in other countries does not have to happen in Canada. We are a peaceful country and we can set an example. What happens in other countries does not have to happen here.

My supplementary concerns the next round of the Middle East peace talks on refugees to be held in Ottawa May 13 to 15. Can the minister stand up in this House and issue a guarantee to the international community that Canada, as a host country, is capable of providing adequate safety and security to the principal players in these critical talks?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will give the international community the same guarantee we gave them when they were here for the G-7, the Commonwealth and the Olympics.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Yesterday's attack on the Iranian embassy recalls the 1985 hostage-taking incident at the Turkish embassy in my riding which resulted in the death of a security guard and serious injuries to the Turkish ambassador. The government promised at that time an intensive review of security at all embassies.

• (1430)

I have 38 embassies in my riding. What measures has the government taken since the 1985 incident to reassure those working in these embassies and those living around these embassies that their security is indeed protected?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. In or about that time the Government of Canada organized the special emergency response team under the jurisdiction of the RCMP and put that in place.

Fortunately since that time it has not been required to be called into action. I can advise my friend that the RCMP makes regular threat assessments and discussions are held with embassies from time to time.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the same minister.

The Government of Canada is responsible for the security and safety of foreign diplomats and dignitaries in Ottawa. Why then will the government not provide the necessary financial resources to the Ottawa police, the organization that is providing this service free of charge to the government?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has a security responsibility vis-à-vis foreign embassies. My hon. friend makes his point on behalf of the Ottawa city police. There may very well be correspondence to that effect, but in my meetings with Tom Flanagan and members of council from Ottawa from time to time that particular matter has never been raised with me.

If in fact someone wishes to raise it, I would be pleased to entertain the question.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General who very conveniently did not answer a question from my leader a few moments ago.

CSIS has agents in London. The attack in London took place at approximately 8 a.m. Ottawa time. The attack in Ottawa did not take place until around noon. That is four hours. It does not take four hours to make a trans-Atlantic phone call.

I want to know where our CSIS agent or agents were in London that morning and why they were asleep at the switch and did not get in touch with Ottawa in time.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I never answer a question without having the facts at my fingertips. That is an obvious question and it is a question that I have asked. I have asked it of my officials and I have asked to be provided with a full report as to what the chronology is.

I reject absolutely and categorically any suggestion that our people in London or anywhere else were asleep at the switch.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, if the minister does not have his report ready, how can he reject anything at this time? How can he say they were not asleep at the switch when he admits he does not know the facts?

My supplementary question is simply this: Why is it that the government has not entered into a new regime of protocols, particularly with those sensitive embassies located in Ottawa where a normal person or a reasonable person might from time to time anticipate or expect acts of violence or vandalism or even worse, considering the hot spots in the world, namely Iraq and Iran, particularly the IRA, the Red Army brigades in Europe and so on?

Surely it is time that the government through the RCM Police entered into new protocols with our foreign visitors here in Ottawa and the diplomatic corps.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I always reject allegations that are not based on fact and I never discuss sensitive security arrangements on the floor of the House.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister about the discussions now under way in Montreal on the proposed North American free trade agreement.

Gary Hufbauer and Jeffrey Schott of the Institute of International Economics in Washington have just completed and released a study. In it they find that such an agreement between now and 1995 would create a net gain of 600,000 jobs in Mexico, 130,000 jobs in the United States, but a net loss of 4,000 jobs in Canada.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why is his government pursuing discussions for such a one-sided and harmful deal when it comes to the interests of our Canadian workers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the study to which the hon. member refers, but his question shows an unbelievable short-sightedness in its premise.

First of all, the hon. member should know that Mexican tariffs against Canada are quite substantial, much more substantial across a wider range of goods than are tariffs right now against Mexico which are virtually, pretty well all gone. Therefore there is a great incentive for us to negotiate a new agreement with Mexico and the United States in the NAFTA context.

Our objectives in this negotiation are clear. Let me repeat them. We want to improve our access to the Mexican market. We want to give greater access to North American inputs to permit Canadians to compete better in the world markets. We also, by the way, want to be a preferred site for investment in North America. If there is going to be investment in North America, we want it to include Canada. There are other objectives, all of which make a NAFTA negotiation pose an important challenge for Canada and we think a very good opportunity as well.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister who forgets that the current free trade deal with the United States has certainly not made Canada a preferred site for investment for people who want to do business in the North American market.

He attacks a report prepared by a former senior trade official of the United States government, Gary Hufbauer. His report finds that if this North American free trade agreement is entered into our trade surplus with the United States would be reduced by $250 million a year each year between now and 1995.

Why is the government pursuing a deal which would have a negative effect on our trade with the United States, up till now our best customer?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think I could ask the hon. member why, when he is constantly attacking the Americans, he suddenly turns around and quotes American researchers as if they are gospel. This particular report is based on Americans doing American research.

The hon. member makes the point that the free trade agreement has not set a good context for NAFTA. Does he know that we have gone from a deficit position in net investment with the U.S. to a very substantial surplus since the free trade agreement, plus our exports with the United States have also increased from a $13 billion surplus to a $17 billion surplus, plus we have a dispute settlement mechanism?

It has been a good deal for Canada, and I will always be proud to stand in this House and defend it.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

A few weeks ago the Minister for International Trade indicated in the House that indeed the Employment Support Act could be of some help to the ailing softwood lumber industry.

Given that the free trade process could well take over a year to resolve the dispute and given that the industry needs help now, when will the minister announce on behalf of the government if indeed the Employment Support Act will be used or some other assistance plan for the softwood lumber industry?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the act to which my hon. friend refers dates back to an era before we had a free trade deal and other labour adjustment policies and programs.

As well I should point out to my hon. friend that the industry has been quite successful in passing through to the American consumer the additional costs that are inherent with the countervail duty action and the preliminary findings in the United States. In fact lumber prices have doubled since a year ago, and they have increased between 35 and 40 per cent since the first of the year.

• (1440)

For the moment the sting is out of the system. Nevertheless we are concerned about it and we are hoping that the procedures we are engaged in in the United States fighting this action will be successful.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Forestry.

It has been revealed that the U.S. commerce department is using a member of the Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports to investigate the claims of our softwood industry. This is the same body that wants to impose duties of over 30 per cent on our exports. It seems that the tinpots and the low-level functionaries can sure make a lot of noise.

What is the minister going to do to ensure that our industry gets a fair and impartial hearing in Washington and is not victimized with biased feelings?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have invited the investigations of anybody because we have nothing to hide. We will have no difficulty at all proving to any objective observer from anywhere that our lumber industry and our wood products sector are not subsidized.

We intend to assert ourselves in that fashion not just with the commerce department in the current investigation, which has a couple of unfortunate preliminary findings, but also under GATT. Eventually the case will be appealed under chapter nineteen of the free trade agreement.

CAMP IPPERWASH

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on April 16, 1942 the Department of National Defence expropriated land belonging to the Chippewas of Stoney Point, Ontario, under the War Measures Act. The government promised to give the land back when it was no longer needed for the efficient prosecution of the war.

Half a century has passed and the government has yet to keep its promise. The Minister of Indian Affairs has supported the claims of the Stoney Point people to have the land at Camp Ipperwash returned.

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. When can the people of Stoney Point expect an announcement that the government will return the land taken from them 50 years ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary committee considered the matter for several weeks. It has tabled its report. The government will respond within the usual timetable.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in September 1991 as part of its cost saving plans the government struck a committee on base closures. The report of that committee is expected shortly.

In a letter to the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Indian Affairs said:

> Given your department's current proposal to reduce the number of military bases, I believe this is an appropriate time to finally settle the Camp Ipperwash matter.

Will the Minister of National Defence settle the Camp Ipperwash matter, or will the Stoney Point people have to proceed with the eviction notice they plan to give DND officials on April 16 of this year?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question will be included in the government's response.

MINING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The mining community in Abitibi–Témiscamingue and I realized several months ago that the Government of Quebec would not sign the Canada–Quebec subsidiary agreement on mining development until the agreements on industrial development, forestry and tourism had been signed.

Is the Quebec government discussing the possibility with your department of signing a Canada–Quebec agreement on mining development as soon as possible, for the benefit of Chapais, Chibougamau, Abitibi–Témiscamingue, and Quebec in general?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, prior to the question being asked by the hon. member there were other priorities that the province of Quebec had put forward as part of the Canada–Quebec regional development agreement. It has now put forward a position that it wants a new mineral development agreement for Quebec.

My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is responsible for the amounts, that is the global amounts. As Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, once those global amounts are agreed to between Canada and Quebec we would be very pleased to develop the details within that MDA and get it signed as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for External Relations. The government will shortly be announcing a large multi-million dollar project supplying grain storage facilities to Egypt.

Has the minister personally reviewed that contract to ensure that all the facilities, production and supplies will be manufactured by Canadian companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that so far I have not looked at the details of the particular project mentioned by the hon. member. He is probably aware that generally speaking, tied aid is subject to certain restrictions or commitments. I am not familiar with the details of this particular project, but I intend to make enquiries and get back to the hon. member as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the minister that when she reviews that project it would be important to take a look at the requirement for Canadian content.

It is my understanding that a substantial part of the project will be contracted to a Nebraska steel company to supply the storage and grain facilities.

I want to ask the minister: At a time when our own steel industry is being harassed by American manufacturers, when there is a severe recession going on, when jobs are lost, why are we spending Canadian taxpayers' money on American products instead of providing jobs for Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Norther Development)): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member, and he may be aware of the fact, that generally speaking, aid is tied to the use of Canadian goods in a ratio of 50 per cent in the case of goods provided to countries in sub-Saharan countries, while the ratio is 66 per cent for other countries.

The purpose of this policy is to ensure that our expertise and skills are transferred to Third World countries and that eventually, these countries will be able to take charge of their own development.

As for the specific case referred to by the hon. member, I will make enquiries and get back to him.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Following the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the case of the Oldman River, the minister was asked to stop the dam from being filled until the environmental review panel had completed its report.

The minister stated at that time that he did not know what to do. In fact, he said that he needed more time to render his decision. The minister has now had two months. The world was created in six days. Will the minister now issue his stop order?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): I am happy to have been informed of Liberal Party policy on how to create the world in only six days. It is something we look forward to.

The Oldman decision is a landmark decision in the areas of the environment and the Constitution that relates to the federal government's guideline orders and the application of its environmental assessment process.

Our officials have examined and in fact still continue to examine the impact of the decision. We stay in close relation with the other jurisdictions involved. As soon as we make a determination on a specific course of action, I will be happy to inform my colleague.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, an awful lot of Canadians spent an enormous amount of time, heartache and money fighting this case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada where they won.

To not issue a stop order now before irreparable damage is done, before the spring run-off starts, will be construed as a wilful disregard by this government of the laws of the land.

What does the minister's continued dithering say to the credibility of the environmental review process in this country? Indeed, what does it say to this government's commitment to the law of the land?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my friend is making some assumptions about what the law does or does not say that we are not making on this side of the House of Commons. That is what we have to be clear on before we act.

This is not the first time that we have been faced with a difficult situation in this area. There have been other major projects that have been the object of scrutiny by the courts. I have had the opportunity to say before to my colleague that from time to time we must take whatever energy and time is required to examine these situations carefully before we act.

• (1450)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just a very easy question for the Minister of the Environment.

Does he not agree that the dam should not be allowed to fill while the panel is sitting?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Skeena typically asked in his preface an easy question, when he knows very well that in the area of the environment when dealing with very difficult issues there are no easy answers.

As far as this issue is concerned he will also know that we must first determine what our legal basis is to act before we go forth, especially may I add, when we are dealing with other jurisdictions. We must be careful in the way we undertake our duties in these areas to delimit areas of responsibilities. That is the spirit in which we are examining this issue.

TAXATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

For a long time now we have been advised that the federal government has been negotiating with the provinces for harmonization of the goods and services tax with provincial sales taxes.

Last week the New Brunswick Minister of Finance announced in the budget that there would not be harmonization of the New Brunswick provincial tax with the goods and services tax. In fact, he announced that agreements would be struck with the federal government for federal customs officers to collect the provincial sales tax on alcohol and tobacco at the border.

What is the special nature of the agreement to be reached with New Brunswick? Does this indicate the end of federal efforts to seek harmonization of the GST program with provincial sales taxes?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no it does not mean an end to our desire to work with all provinces in seeking harmonization of the GST.

It is ultimately in the best interests of all provinces, both from the standpoint of improving the competitive position of their manufacturing and processing sector and in terms of administration and the removal of duplication and overlap.

I am disappointed that after a series of lengthy discussions with the province of New Brunswick that it saw fit not to make a decision to move toward harmonization. I would not interpret that as an outright rejection. Discussions will be going on.

We are continuing to work with the provinces to collect provincial sales taxes, offering to do that at the border and also with respect to the collection of the alcohol and tobacco tax.

We will continue to work with all provinces to endeavour to provide a harmonized system that will be easier to administer and more efficient not only for individual Canadians but also for the economy as a whole.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the national trade ministers are meeting in Montreal today in negotiation of the North American free trade agreement, about which Ambassador Ney of the United States says a deal must be done by the end of this month because of the U.S. elections.

Meanwhile, The Financial Times among others says that a deal done in 1992 would be a bad deal for Canada, that Canada would take a major beating.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Does the government agree with Ambassador Ney? Is Canada going to have a rushed, half-baked deal with no elections because the Americans are going to have elections?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that we are not going to rush any deal. We are going to negotiate the best possible arrangement for Canada.

We are going to improve our access to the U.S. markets still further and to Mexican markets still further, to be a preferred site for investment and to add in our trade with Mexico, a dispute settlement mechanism.

All of those objectives are what we will achieve in these negotiations and we will not rush doing it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Last week the finance minister said that concern about the North American free trade agreement was overblown because Mexican trade consisted of about only 1 per cent of Canadian trade.

I want to ask the minister this: Do not the proposed provisions on automobiles, transportation, telecommunications, textiles, agriculture, services, investment, intellectual property rights, energy, of the proposed supersedence of the North American free trade agreement over the current free trade agreement suggest a good deal more than 1 per cent of Canadian trade over all?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's question is full of surmises, none of which has any basis in fact.

He should know that we are there to negotiate the best possible arrangement for all of those industries in a context that will allow us to compete more effectively, both in the United States and Mexico.

CYPRUS

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, there are press reports citing a spokesperson for external affairs stating their opinion that Canadian peacekeeping troops in Cyprus should be removed since "there doesn't seem to be much progress nor effort at times being spent by the parties concerned to come to a resolution".

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: What facts does he base this assertion of lack of effort on? In light of previous assurances that the government was not planning to remove the troops from Cyprus, I would like to know what has changed.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleague that there has been no decision to withdraw our troops from Cyprus.

Obviously though we are concerned that after some 27 years we are continuing to provide a substantial number of troops. We feel, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed, that we would hope peacekeeping would be the kind of mission where we could go in and maintain peace, as opposed to peacemaking.

Obviously we are making every effort to try to find ways to ensure that in the situation in Cyprus there can be active dialogue to work toward peacemaking and that it will not be necessary to maintain peacekeepers indefinitely in that situation.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): It looks like this government is taking the scissors to everything, even peacekeeping.

I would like to ask the minister what assurances, if any, has the government received from the Turkish government that if all the peacekeeping forces are removed from Cyprus that hostilities will not resurface?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, that is obviously the problem. We do not want to withdraw peacekeepers and then have hostilities resume. That is not the purpose.

Mr. Karygiannis: Have you been there?

Mrs. Collins: I have been there, indeed I have.

We are trying to work with both sides and ensure that through the United Nations every effort is made to try to bring about a peaceful solution to the situation in Cyprus so that we and other nations eventually can withdraw our peacekeepers.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance cannot deny the anguish and the hardship that unemployment insurance exhaustees and those Canadians who have to resort to municipal and provincial welfare have to confront on a daily basis.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what specific programs does he have in mind to put in place now to assist the unemployed, to assist those who have to go on welfare, as well as to assist those thousands of Canadians who have to go to our food banks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member already knows that the Government of Canada, in partnership with the private sector, that is, business and labour, and also in co-operation with every provincial government is trying to establish the labour force development strategy which is geared towards the unemployed.

When the hon. member refers to exhaustees, the government has programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy where some of these people can be helped. But it is important for everyone, every stakeholder in the economy, to realize that there is no easy, magic solution out there and that we have to work together. This is what we are striving to do.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are aware of the strategy of the Government of Canada.

But the minister must be aware that in Nova Scotia 78,000 people are on welfare; in Quebec over 500,000; and in Ontario 675,000 Canadians are on welfare. They don't want to hear from the minister about a strategy. They want to hear about the concrete action that the Government of Canada will take to assist those individuals.

So I ask the minister: What specific programs will he and his government put in place to assist those thousands of Canadians who want meaningful work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): What we have to do is pursue the work that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the premiers started the last time they met.

• (1500)

The issue is activating those funds under welfare and under UI, trying to render these sums more relevant to the needs of people in terms of training and learning in Canada.

Following the last first ministers' meeting, there was agreement among the provinces and the federal government to keep working in that direction, which we will do.

BURMA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

The State Law and Order Restoration Council, which is the illegal military junta currently ruling Burma, has now moved beyond the jailing of parliamentarians to the murder of entire villages of innocent citizens.

Last week, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the entire energy standing committee agreed that Petro-Canada should immediately suspend all activities in Burma.

Will the minister contact the board and executive of Petro-Canada, insisting that the company send a strong signal of protest and revulsion by suspending all activity in Burma and informing them that unless such action is taken quickly, the government will take the unusual but completely legal step of voting its remaining 80 per cent of the company's shares to compel such a suspension?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada is a publicly owned company. It is managed by a board of directors. I would suggest that the hon. member make his representation to them.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, is the minister then saying that the government will do nothing, even to attempt to convince Petro-Canada to withdraw and stop supporting this bloody regime?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I have no indication that Petro-Canada is supporting that regime.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I move Motion No. 9 which stands in my name on the Order Paper to concur in the third report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs presented to the House on Friday, March 13, 1992.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Dingwall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to delay the proceedings here nor the interventions of the hon. member, but perhaps the Chair could be somewhat helpful.

We were operating under a unanimous consent order of the House that we would be proceeding with the report stage of Bill C-31 as well as the report stage of Bill C-60. I believe later this day, at approximately 5.45 p.m., a vote is to be held if necessary. I am wondering if the Chair could inform the House as to this intervention here today, which is quite rightly within the rules, the hon. member has the opportunity to do that, whether or not in fact all questions will be put with regard to Bill C-31 as well as Bill C-60 at 5.45 p.m. and, if necessary, division would be held later this day on those two bills.

• (1510)

Could the Chair inform the House.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it should be understood that as part of the understanding between the Whips and House leaders to decide today's order of business, it was understood that rather than presenting this concurrence motion today, I would have presented a question to the minister and received a decent response rather than the arrogant shuffling off of a response that we received from the minister today.

The understanding of our party is the promise that was made to us by the government in this case was not kept and therefore the promise is off.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I just listened to that intervention with just a little bit of surprise and shock.

First of all, there was an understanding between the parties. That is very clear. It has gone beyond that of being simply an understanding. It is unanimous agreement of this House of Commons which created a House order under which we are operating today.

To have the hon. member now suddenly say that because he was not happy with the answer given to a particular question offered in this House of Commons he is now proceeding with this, I think he is perhaps being slightly inconsistent.

The point I want to make is this. We were operating under an understanding, an understanding that was so strong in fact that we agreed to a House order that said we would proceed with Bill C-31 and Bill C-60 today. Not only would we proceed with them, but at 5.45 p.m. this afternoon all the necessary questions to dispose of those bills would be put to this House and decided at that time. I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that you should perhaps look at that.

I can assure you that I have several motions for concurrence on this Order Paper that take precedence to the hon. member's motions which I would like to have moved as well, but because of the understanding of the House order did not proceed with them today. I would ask that that be reconsidered certainly in light of the remarks just made by the hon. member which are totally out to lunch.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I hate to disagree with my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. He has recounted with some clarity the understandings that the parties had with regard to proceeding today.

Neither the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader nor I can stand in this Chamber and rectify any differences which may result as a question from the hon. member which was put quite rightly. He does not like the answer which has been given. It is within his right as a member of this House to move the motion which he has clarified as Motion No. 9 and debate will proceed on the basis of that motion.

The question I have for the Chair is a clarification. Notwithstanding this particular motion, at the end of the day at 5.45 p.m. will report stage of Bill C-31 and report stage of Bill C-60 be concluded? Will the Chair indicate to the House, please.

Ms. Langan: On the same point of order. Mr. Speaker, I know that you are anxious to make a decision on this but I think it is important and the House leader for the government side did not point out that notice of the question that the hon. member for Comox—Alberni put forward was in fact given to the minister on Friday. To have a response that says he will look at the committee's report and answer some day down the road is certainly not much of a response after having received the courtesy of being put on notice on Friday that this question was coming.

In addition, if we come to the end of the business the government surely would have brought something else forward and it is quite appropriate for the hon. member for Comox—Alberni to bring this forward at this time. To suggest that this member is out to lunch after being ignored by the minister I think is highly inappropriate, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has before it an order that specifies, whether there is a debate or not, that the vote must be held not later than 5.45 p.m, to dispose of the two bills at report stage, namely C–31 and C–60. Debate or not, members of this House will have to decide.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if it would be in order for me to call concurrence on Motion No. 6 which has precedence over Motion No. 9.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must remind the hon. parliamentary secretary that since the House has been presented with the motion of the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, it would have been better for the hon. parliamentary secretary to intervene before the hon. member for Comox—Alberni moved his motion. The House now has this motion before it and I must consider this fact.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The difficulty facing us is quite simple. We have a unanimously adopted order of the House which says that Bill C–60, the bill being considered under Government Orders, is to be debated in this House, but at 5.45 p.m., the debate must end and the vote must be held.

The debate began this morning, as I recall—I was here—and was to continue. Now a member, who is probably not interested in Bill C–60, one must believe, presents a motion in the House which is acceptable under Routine Proceedings but will prevent us from considering Bill C–60. Unless the government decides to move a motion that we proceed to the Orders of the Day, this motion will probably take up the afternoon's debate, even if it is justified and the report is probably very much in order.

My difficulty is that some of us would have liked to debate Bill C–60. If I understood your decision correctly, the debate on C–60 will not take place unless the hon. member changes his mind or the government has the courage to propose that the House proceed to the consideration of Government Orders. If that is indeed what you said, Mr. Speaker, in that case, it will be hard for us to explain to our constituents, to Canadians, why Bill C–60, a very important bill, was not debated in this House this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply remind the House that the motion is to consider an amendment moved by a member of the New Democratic Party and that a member of the same party moved the motion under discussion. But that said, the Speaker is only the servant of the House and I have no choice but to apply the Standing Orders and to hear the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very brief but I want the House to know that this is an extremely important issue and that the honour of the Crown is at stake.

While I understand the need to debate the legislation that has been put on the Order Paper for later today, I was under the impression, our caucus was under the impression, our Whip was under the impression, that if I were to withdraw this motion, we would at least get a decent response from the minister instead of the kind of arrogant response that we got from that minister, the arrogant non–response.

That is why this motion appears today. It is important to members of this House because of what it means in terms of our relationship with aboriginal people.

Fifty years ago this month the Government of Canada seized land under the War Measures Act, land that was given to the Stoney Point Chippewa people as part of their reservation under a treaty dating back to the 1820s. That land was Chippewa land and was to remain Chippewa land forever.

The Department of National Defence wanted lands to set up a military camp in order to prosecute World War II. They had an opportunity to buy land in other areas of southern Ontario but they would have had to buy the land from non–aboriginal people, from white people and they rejected that. They wanted the land that was owned by the aboriginal people, the Chippewas at Stoney Point. In fact, they were encouraged to acquire that land by George Down who was the Indian agent of the day. To quote Mr. Down: "Personally, I think this is a wonderful opportunity to gather a few straggling Indians and locate them permanently with the main body of the band."

• (1520)

It was characteristic of the way that Canadians and the Canadian government looked at aboriginal people at that time. They considered them "a few straggling Indians", to use the words of George Down.

The Department of National Defence went to the Indian people at Stoney Point and asked them if they wanted to sell their land. They replied no, they did not want to sell it, it was theirs based on a treaty signed back in the 1820s, a treaty that they felt bound them as well as the Government of Canada.

It was only after they refused to sell that the Canadian government seized that land under the War Measures Act and turned it into Canadian Forces Base Camp Ipperwash.

Part of the conditions in the Order in Council by which this land was seized was that after it was no longer needed for the efficient prosecution of the war, it would be returned to the Chippewa people from whom it was taken in the first place.

After the war, in spite of their promises, the Government of Canada and the Department of National Defence refused to return that land to the Chippewa people. They refused to keep their promises, refused to respect the honour of the Crown in the Crown's dealings with those Chippewa people.

As a result, 50 years later, that land is still in the hands of the Department of National Defence and it still refuses to keep its promises. The Minister of National Defence sits in this House in his arrogant way and says: "I am not even going to answer these questions until after 150 days when I have to deal with the report of the aboriginal affairs committee."

Mr. Waddell: He has chronic jet lag.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): At least he is here. He was advised of the question and he should have answered it in a decent, frank, forward way because this is an issue that has been outstanding since 1942. It is coming up to its 50th anniversary.

The Order in Council under the War Measures Act was passed on April 14, 1942. It was executed on April 16, with those people at Stoney Point being dragged out of their homes, all of their furniture, all of their possessions taken from that land within two days after the Order in Council had passed and forced into another aboriginal community at Kettle Point.

They were related to the people in the community of Kettle Point, but there was not that much space available for housing. As a result, many of the people who lived at Stoney Point during those years around 1940 ended up leaving the reserve altogether and being forced to live in communities throughout southern Ontario. That community was completely broken up.

What was even more insulting was that many of the Chippewa people of Stoney Point actually joined the Canadian army and went to fight in World War II. They went to heroically fight in World War II under the Canadian flag.

They came back to their homes at Stoney Point after the war, in some cases decorated for bravery, after fighting for Canadians during the war. They came back and found that it was not the enemy that stole the land from them, it was not the enemy who threatened their homes. The people who threatened their homes was their own Canadian government.

In fact, the story is well known of one veteran of World War II who came back to his home at Stoney Point, found that he could not get in because it was a military base and was forced to sleep in a ditch outside his own land because he could not get inside the fence. It was now owned by the Canadian government, that same Canadian government that promised when the land was no longer needed for the efficient prosecution of the war, it would go back to the Stoney Point people.

Fifty years have passed. What is the term, what is the validity of a promise made by the Government of Canada to aboriginal people? When is the Government of Canada expected to keep its promise? The Minister of National Defence cannot even keep a promise over a weekend to give a decent answer to a question that is being asked in this House on behalf of those aboriginal people.

If that reflects the kind of promises that are made by this government and by previous governments, who in this House will defend the honour of the Crown and the government's agreements with aboriginal people? Are we saying that this government has no honour?

We now have an opportunity, 50 years after the fact to go to the Stoney Point people on April 16, the 50th anniversary of when that land was seized, make amends and return the land or at least indicate that the land will be returned to them.

That camp has been open since 1945. It was used to train people who went to Korea and then when it was no longer needed for war purposes, it was used to train militia corps and cadet corps. Now it is very seldom used at all. In fact, the camp is closed for a good part of the year. In spite of that, the government still refuses to return that land to the Stoney Point people.

I do not know what it is about this government, but a promise seems to mean nothing to them. The honour of the Crown seems to mean nothing to them in terms of its relationship with the aboriginal people. All we have been asking for, all the Stoney Point people have been asking for over these many years, is that the government keep its promise and return the land that was seized from them under the War Measures Act.

It is not much to ask. All the minister had to say in the House today was that the Department of National Defence understands that a wrong has been done to the people of Stoney Point and that the wrong needs to be corrected, that the government is phasing down the number of bases it operates through the Department of National Defence gives them an opportunity to correct that ancient injustice that was done to the Stoney Point people. It is not much to ask, Mr. Speaker.

On April 16, the Stoney Point people plan to make a peaceful demonstration in front of the gates of Camp Ipperwash which is now the CFB camp located at Stoney Point. At that time, they are hoping to present to the people from the Department of National Defence an eviction notice, the same kind of notice they received so unceremoniously 50 years ago. They hope on that day the government will be prepared to right this wrong, to make amends for what they did and to make sure, through an announcement, that the land is going to be returned to its rightful aboriginal owners.

That is all they ask and that is why I am rising in the House today on this important issue, a week or two weeks before this event is to take place at the gates of Camp Ipperwash.

I call on this Parliament to support the report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs calling on the government to return the land taken from the Stoney Point people back in 1942 to its aboriginal owners and their descendants who have been waiting for so long for justice to be done.

I hope that Parliament has heard these words. I indicated that I intended to be brief on this issue. This grievance has been outstanding for 50 years. I hope members will support this concurrence motion and get the Minister of National Defence off his duff so that he understands what the principles of justice are all about and that he makes an announcement today or at least within the next week or so to indicate to the people at Stoney Point that justice is going to be done; that the land seized from them 50 years ago is going to be returned and that the honour of the Crown will be restored.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–60, an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 4 (p. 9352).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion is differed.

The vote on Motion No. 1 will also apply to Motions Nos. 2 and 4 in the name of the hon. member for Essex–Windsor. We shall now proceed to the consideration of Motion No. 3.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C–60 be amended in clause 5 by striking out line 36 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"1993, and"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is certainly the most important sets of amendments I would like to see this House adopt.

We heard from officials, as we reviewed this particular piece of legislation with respect to equalization payments, that this particular bill came out of a wide discussion of all transfer payments across the board, not just transfer payments with respect to equalization, but transfer payments with respect to the Established Program Financing system. It provides money for health and post–secondary education, and also transfer payments with respect to the Canada Assistance Program. Those transfers from the federal government cover the cost of various programs such as day care assistance and support for welfare recipients. They cover a range of different programs that help people with disabilities, who are in poverty and facing some of the problems created by the recession in this country.

This bill deals with one part of the transfer payment program: the equalization part. It does not deal with the other key parts: the transfers for health, the transfers for post–secondary education, and the transfers under the Canada Assistance Program.

What we are saying with this amendment is: Yes, let us let the equalization payments go through for the temporary two–year period which this bill establishes for them, but let us take the transfers that are equally crucial to provinces across the country and put the pressure on this government to see to it that it comes up with answers to improve these transfers. Let us see to it that these transfers actually get treated in a fair way for all provinces in this country.

We have suggested that this particular clause which deals with income tax revenue guarantees not be extended for the two years but simply be extended for one year so as to say very plainly to the government, on the part of Parliament, that there must be an answer to the transfer payment inequities in this country within the next year.

Let me tell the House why it is so important to do this. It is important for the sense of equity and fair play. The present piece of legislation dealing with equalization payments transfers an extra $422 million to seven provinces this year. We are not against that transfer. We think that it is an important transfer to take place, but let us be very clear about who receives this money.

Out of $422 million which this government is seeing it gets to provinces in addition to what they received before, 47 per cent or $198 million goes to a single province. Other provinces receive some support too. Quebec, as I say, receives $198 million; $60 million goes to Saskatchewan; $55 million to Manitoba; $39 million to New Brunswick; $35 million to Nova Scotia; $31 million to Newfoundland; and $5 million to Prince Edward Island.

We do not object to these new improved transfer payments. What we do object to is other provinces that are facing serious problems as a consequence of the economic difficulties associated with the recession in this country, those other provinces that need the money badly, are not being treated fairly by the federal government.

Let me speak for a few minutes about my own province of Ontario. I do not speak about Ontario because it is the only province that is being hurt. If we look at the whole transfer payment question, we see that all provinces have lost since the 1982–83 year $41 billion in money which they expected to receive from the federal government and which they have not received. If we take 1992–93, all provinces will lose a total of $9.3 billion as a result of the caps and freezes and controls which the federal government has unilaterally put on transfer payments.

Transfer payments have always been something which were agreed to in the past through federal–provincial conferences. Since 1982–83, under both the Liberals and the Conservatives, these agreements have been undercut. This year the result for all provinces is a total loss of $9.3 billion. In this coming year Ontario will lose $4.5 billion of that $9.3 billion. That is almost half of the total.

This has hit the Canada Assistance Program especially hard. The province of Ontario, because of changes in unemployment insurance and the recession, has seen massive increases in the number of the people on welfare. For instance, the city of metropolitan Toronto has seen an increase in the last year of 29 per cent in the number of people on welfare. We have gone from 98,000 cases to over 105,000 cases.

That means that the province of Ontario gets only 31 per cent of its costs under the Canada Assistance Program covered while every other province except British Columbia gets 50 per cent covered. British Columbia gets 37 or 38 per cent of its costs covered.

This is not right. It is not something that can continue. We move this amendment to impress on this government the urgency of doing something about the Canada Assistance Program and other transfer programs to make them fair to all provinces in Canada.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but concur with what my colleague for Essex—Windsor has just said. The devastation wreaked by successive Liberal and Conservative governments over the years on the concept of equality, justice and dignity in this country is something that has to be brought to the attention of the Canadian public again and again.

We have gone from 50/50 cost-sharing on the Canada Assistance Plan to where, for the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario, the government has put a freeze on the transfer payments on the basis that they are have provinces and therefore do not require as much assistance from the federal government as the other provinces do. The Canada Assistance Plan was instituted to help people and for the federal government to make an assessment on the provincial governments on that basis is extreme and cannot be tolerated.

The fact of the matter is that the poor people, the less well off people of British Columbia have suffered a loss in 1991–1992 alone of $166 million and that by the year 1994–1995 the total will be $1 billion.

In 1992–1993 the estimated cost to the province of Alberta is $223 million. In Ontario in 1990–1991 the estimated cost to that province was $415 million, and there is a staggering $1.2 billion decrease in federal transfer payments to the province of Ontario this year.

What is happening without a doubt is that the federal government is reneging on its responsibility to the people of Canada and particularly to the people in those three provinces.

We could ask ourselves why. We have answered one of the whys I think in that the government views these provinces as being wealthy and able to take care of those costs themselves.

The fact of the matter is if you are someone needing assistance it does not matter what province you live in and half the people needing assistance in this country, come from the province of Ontario.

With the financial situation having burgeoned as it has in Canada within the last year to year and a half, the province of Ontario has suffered great devastation as a result of the free trade deal, as has the rest of Canada. Along with the rest of Canada it has also suffered the devastation that comes with the changes to UI. Ontario has been particularly hard hit with the multiplying numbers of unemployed and it is my suspicion that where Ontario used to be a net contributor to the federal government it may turn out to be a have not province itself as a result of the changes to UI and the free trade agreement.

That 450,000 people have been lost, most of them in the province of Ontario, is something that weighs heavily on the kinds of programs which the Canada Assistance Plan was designed to help.

To reiterate and remind people what happens under Bill C-21, among other things it requires people to work for a longer period of time in order to qualify for UI benefits. Also they receive less benefits from UI in the event that they are laid off.

Those two things, multiplied together, have formed a devastating draw on the treasury of the province of Ontario.

I cannot help but point out that we have to bear in mind that the Canada Assistance Plan was set up to help people and for the Government of Canada to make an assessment on the Government of Ontario is demeaning in the most extreme sense of the word.

Something very similar happened with the extended programs financing which was set up originally to compensate the provinces for revenue lost to them as a result of tax reform.

Since the time when the changes were brought in we have had further changes by successive Liberal and Conservative governments to wear away and erode the amount of transfer payments to all the provinces which the federal government ought to be continuing. There were at least two broadside attacks by the Liberals after they brought in what originally appeared to be a generous program. Had it remained in effect it would have been. The problem I would suspect, considering the philosophy of the Liberals when they are in government which corresponds precisely with the philosophy of the Conservatives when they are in government, I might add, is that the—

• (1550)

An hon. member: How do you know that?

Mr. Fisher: How do I know that? I am very glad you asked that question. There are tonnes of statistics and evidence to prove that that is the case.

It was originally set up with a revenue guarantee to the provinces on these transfer payments under the extended program financing. In 1982—I do not remember who the finance minister was. Most likely it was MacEachen. Maybe it was even Turner—he changed the formula so that the revenue guarantees were no longer there.

Then we had those wonderful years of six and five. We all remember six and five and how it affected our pay cheques. I would certainly remind the Canadian public, those who have forgotten, and I suspect not too many ordinary Canadians have forgotten six and five, that it was the beginning of the end of any ability to keep up with inflation in this country. Our pay cheques have reflected this ever since, since exacerbated by successive Conservative programs and a tax on working people.

The education portion of the Established Programs Financing was cut under the six and five program. It is to its credit, although one wonders why, it did not cut the medicare portion of it as well, but in any event it did not. But the education portion of that was and as a result of that the research and development and the post-secondary education in the country have suffered enormously.

The Conservatives not being satisfied with the cuts the Liberals made to the Established Programs Financing, have taken three successive swipes at it. They changed the formula which tied the transfers to the growth in the GNP to GNP minus two and that was done in 1986. Not satisfied with that in 1990 the former Minister of Finance came along and changed that from GNP minus two to GNP minus three. Of course, just recently the government has put a freeze on it so that there can be no increases at all to the Established Programs Financing.

What this amounts to is that we really do have as far as medicare is concerned an attack on standards. As this progresses in actual dollars and the cost of medicare being what it is will result in for all intents and purposes no meaningful amount of money being transferred to the provinces at which time the federal government will no longer be able to insist upon the maintenance of standards.

We are saying that the 50/50 funding ought to be restored and that the changes which have taken place ever since the program was put into effect have been devastating to the country. That applies as well, as I said, to the Canada Assistance Plan.

I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time you have allotted me. I see my time has run out.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to take part in a debate that has to do with transfers to the provinces. I want to put a couple of things on the record.

One of them is transfers to my home province of New Brunswick. I hear this in my riding quite often when I am back home. Just about every weekend, someone will comment on transfers to the provinces. I think it is important that I put it on the record that the province of New Brunswick is getting more, not less.

I think most of us in this House understand that, including some of the members opposite. They are getting more, not less. In fact, the province of New Brunswick will get in the order of $1.6 billion. Some calculations put it closer to $2 billion in direct transfers from the Government of Canada to the province of New Brunswick.

That is a significant figure when you are talking about a province as small as the province of New Brunswick. Two billion dollars is a lot of money. If you want to get technical and you want to measure it on that lower number of $1.6 billion, let us talk about that figure. Whether it is $1.6 billion or $2 billion, it is a fair amount of money in a province of only 720,000 people. What it comes down to at the end of the day is it amounts to 39 per cent of all the revenues coming into the province of New Brunswick.

What I am trying to paint is a picture that shows the people of Canada where the money is coming from. It is a transfer from other taxpayers in this country to a have not province, in my case the province of New Brunswick. Thirty-nine per cent of all the revenues come from other taxpayers.

To sort this out, this is the fascinating part of the whole equation. The whole equation is trying to sort this out in our own minds so that the people back home can appreciate it. When we are talking about moneys coming from Ottawa to New Brunswick, it is not money from heaven.

Somehow we fall into this idea that moneys are here in Ottawa and it is just a case of moving them out of here, putting them into those have not provinces, if you wish. It is not quite that simple. The money has to come from a taxpayer some place else. The difficulty that this government is finding itself in, and this country, is that there is no place else at the moment.

The economy of Ontario is in trouble. The economy of Alberta is a little better and the economy of B.C. is a little better as well. Those are the three major sources of tax dollars that were being transferred to those other provinces.

What we would like to do in Ottawa is increase, increase, increase, which we have done, especially to those have not provinces but our ability to increase at the rate that people would like to see it increase is limited. The money is not free. It comes from other taxpayers, and that is the point that I want to emphasize today. It comes from other taxpayers and other parts of the country.

When the member from Essex—Windsor speaks and uses some of the language that he uses, and statistics, he is quite careful in his choice of words. When he talks about the anticipated dollar amount being less than what was anticipated, he is using percentages that might have been. Might have been does not count. You have to deal with certain realities out there, especially when you are using taxpayers' money. The fact is if we are going to send more money to the provinces beyond what we tell them we are going to send them and what we have sent them at this point, it has to be borrowed money. It has to be borrowed money that has to be paid back.

If it was money from heaven, we would not have to pay it back, would we? Unfortunately, that only exists in the minds of the NDP. It does not have to take responsibility for balancing the books or being accountable to the taxpayers of Canada. Its members just have to stand up on their hind legs and howl at the moon.

Howl they might, thank goodness the NDP is not the party in power. If it was, we would not be saddled with a $400 billion deficit in this country, we would be in a country that would have to be taken over by the IMF. Look at Ontario today, what it is doing there. Ontario is haemorrhaging because a socialist government cannot ring in expenses.

An hon. member: They are in better shape than you are.

• (1600)

Mr. Thompson: They can holler all they want on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker, that particular party, because at the end of the day, nothing is going to change. They do not have to take responsibility for their words or their actions. They just have to talk about it and, as I say, get up on their hind legs and howl at the moon.

In the province of New Brunswick, particularly, I am supportive and encouraged with what this government has done for my home province; very encouraged. As I mentioned, that figure this year is going to be close to $2 billion transferred to the people of New Brunswick to help them with their programs. It accounts for about 39 per cent of their revenues. That little have not province of New Brunswick is receiving about 70 per cent above the national average when you measure how those transfers take place. That is very significant.

If you measure it on an individual basis, the figure is up in the $2,100 range per individual in the province of New Brunswick transferred government to government. That is not including other federal government programs that are transferred to the individual. If those were calculated into the equation, the number would be even greater, much greater, but we can save that argument for another day. Those types of programs we are talking about, of course, are UIC programs, again federal dollars, even support to our seniors. Those are not factored into those numbers at all. Those are simply numbers transferring dollars from government to government.

The argument that they use is a fallacious argument. It bears no regard to reality at all. It has no semblance of reality at all because they have never had to be in a position of governing this country. Let us face it, Canada is not an easy country to govern because we do have these regional disparities within the country. We have always had a system of government in this country, a federal government, that has always responded to the needs of the poorer provinces. This government has responded to the needs of the poorer provinces.

Again, let us look at the real numbers. Let us not project a number that means absolutely nothing. Let us not project what might have been. Let us take a look at what has actually happened. In these provinces, there has been an annual increase in the have not provinces. Again, I zero in on New Brunswick, a 5.7 per cent increase since 1984–85. Incidentally, that is the year we took office, 1984–85. There has been an increase of that much every single year.

The difficulty the province of New Brunswick is finding today is simply this. It has allowed health care costs to escalate over 80 per cent in the province of New Brunswick and its transfers have only increased to the tune of 52 per cent over that time frame.

What it has done is allowed expenses to gallop ahead of the transfers. Now it has got to find someone to point the finger at, but the truth is it should have dealt with that four or five years ago and did not. Now, when the hard numbers are coming home, it has to find another group of people to blame it on. That group of people are the people who make up the Government of Canada.

The fact is there have been increases on average of 5.7 per cent to my home province of New Brunswick and that is significant. Compare with what they have done on the expenditure side and that is where they have lost the battle in the province of New Brunswick.

I am pleased with what this government has done in regard to transfers. As our economy continues to move ahead and, as we work through the recession, you can be assured we are going to take a closer look at what we can do for these provinces in the coming years.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on these amendments this afternoon.

It is surprising and somewhat intriguing that my colleagues on my left had so much to say about my party a moment ago and so little to say about the bill and its amendments. I get the feeling that the Liberal Party of Canada is much more of a threat than this bill, in spite of the fact that the latter is flawed. I found that interesting, especially since it is becoming a common occurrence. I will try to avoid putting down other parties and instead address the bill before us.

[English]

I found it interesting to talk about the record of this government. I think when you are in government that happens all the time the record of the previous government. I suspect that many people would say, and I do not do it tongue in cheek or unkindly, in terms of transfers to provinces that the Liberal record looks pretty good compared to the current record. It goes not without saying, but show me any political party, any political person, that is unblemished. I wonder if you would find them in the House of Commons. In fact, it might be very difficult to find them anywhere.

If you compare the Liberal record for transfer payments to provinces with the current government's, I think it looks pretty good. I think as well that you can compare the Liberal record with what has been happening in some of the provinces recently. Let us look at the NDP provinces; what is happening to health and education, hospitals being closed, people being laid off, fewer dollars being transferred for education.

I guess the lesson to be learned is that we have to be very careful about casting stones because, frankly, other people may get up and do the same to us. We would probably merit that when that happens.

My colleague has just indicated that provinces are getting more than they were. Yes, sometimes that is true, but we have to talk about what they are getting more of in this particular bill. Are they getting more tax points or more cash? If they are getting more cash, what are the circumstances under which they are getting it? Has it taken into account inflation? Has it taken into account, for example, the program needs? Has it taken into account student growth within those programs? Or, if we talk about health, has it taken into account the additional clients that they have for health services?

It is very easy to say that I now have more money; but if I have more people requiring more services of me that cost money, then an increase is not necessarily an increase.

When we talk about this we must not forget that we are talking about, if my memory serves me correctly and I do not mind being corrected, $39 billion; roughly $24 billion for Established Programs Financing, transfer funds for health and education. That is about a ratio of 211 for health to education. Again, if my memory serves me adequately today, it is about one-half tax points, the other cash. The other $8 billion is for equalization, to make sure that those provinces which are not as wealthy as others, relatively speaking, are in fact rewarded appropriately.

Finally, of course, there is the CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan, to assist the social programs. Some people will know that that CAP has been capped. In other words, the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Alberta are limited to 5 per cent growth. That has caused a lot of stress. You will recall that there has been a court challenge, and of course the animosity, the disagreement, and the discomfort continues.

One of the questions that we have to ask is this: There are a number of amendments here. There has been some reluctance on the part of the opposition parties to support this bill, which would appear to be fairly innocuous, which would appear to be primarily a technical bill, and I have been assured that that is so during committee. But we must ask the question: Why is the government running into these kinds of problems? I think, with all due respect, it is because of its record on virtually every major issue. It has often said the right things and it has often, I suspect, intended to do what was correct, but it has fallen short. Whether we look at the Constitution, the economic development of our country, or even the social programs in our society, we realize that the government probably meant well. But if we look at the result, it is obvious there is an enormous gap between what they wanted to do and what they have done. And that explains this attitude, this concern, this mistrust which is found just about everywhere. Therefore, when they come up with a bill such as this one, mainly described as a housekeeping bill with no political impact, people are wary, they are concerned, they are reluctant, they try to block it, they try to find out why it would be as straightforward as it seems to be.

[English]

When I say that the bill is fairly simple and deals primarily with technical things, I do not want to give the impression that it is not an important bill and that it will not lead to particularly important developments. We are not without knowing that one of the reasons, supposedly for the extension of two years, is because there will be a major review undertaken. There is a major review that is being undertaken. It is in the process of happening.

• (1610)

I suggested that review needs to be made public. The stakeholders need to be identified. We should also have a policy impact statement. The government should be telling all of us involved with the particular program, whether we talk about equalization, EPF or CAP, just what would happen from a tax point and a cash perspective, if the current trend of a reduction of transfers continues.

What are the options out there? What are the positives and negatives of the various options government could come forward with?

[Translation]

I have the distinct impression that very shortly it will be election time. I suppose we could call this pre-election time or season. Eventually, it will be the real thing.

We might also see some little games being played that might benefit the government and would not necessarily make things easier for the people who are concerned about this bill and the proposed amendments. This is an extremely important issue, and, as I said earlier, should be seen separate from the problems this government has had in many areas, including the Constitution, the economy and development of social programs. Clearly, there is a climate of suspicion. People seem to be watching and waiting for the other shoe to drop.

In concluding I would like to say that: I am willing to accept the testimony that was given in committee. I believe the people there were honourable. There are no hidden agendas. This is an extension of that. At the same time, I am disappointed with the process for the review of these programs. The key actors who will be involved in attempting to help government come up with a more sensitive and effective way of responding to the needs of equalization, health and education and the social assistance programs, will be reflected more accurately.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my remarks by commenting on the comments made by the Tory member for Carleton—Charlotte.

It is important when he talks about how well New Brunswick has done under this government's programs, what he thinks about the reduction in the ceiling that has been put on the equalization, on the projected revenues of those lower-income provinces including New Brunswick.

From 1988-89 to 1991-92, equalization ceilings reduced revenues of the lower income provinces by $3.1 billion. Does that sound like have not provinces doing better under this government's programs? Even somebody who is able to do basic mathematics can figure out there has been a slight of hand. I find it awfully difficult to understand how the reduction of $3.1 billion in the have not provinces can mean that those provinces are doing better. During that period, the disparity between the lower and higher income provinces widened. It actually led to a reduction from $8.1 billion to $7.9 billion in 1991 for those provinces.

I hope when the hon. member speaks again on matters such as this, he at least does his homework on behalf of his own province.

I would also like to respond to the comments just made by my liberal colleague from St. Boniface who pointed a finger at NDP governments. He said none of us should cast stones because somehow the NDP governments in Canada have not lived up to their commitments.

It would not be appropriate to allow this debate to pass without at least talking about my province of British Columbia. Much of what I have to say would also apply to the province of Ontario and what the NDP government is facing there.

It is important that we think about the kinds of things that were put forward by the B.C. government's Minister of Finance and Corporate Relations, Glen Clark, prior to introducing his budget in British Columbia. He had comments about the Established Programs Financing for health, post-secondary education, the Canada Assistance Plan and other programs.

Glen Clark's paper detailed the actions of the past Liberal and Conservative federal governments and the impact they have had on the British Columbia budget, which just came down a week and a half ago. It is shocking. The combined effect on British Columbia of the off-loading measures implemented since 1982 will be $1.1 billion in 1991-92. This is in a province that is now facing tremendous unemployment, particularly worsened by the recent softwood lumber tariff.

The $1.1 billion in 1991-92 is equivalent to 67 per cent of the estimated 1991-92 budget deficit of $1.7 billion in British Columbia. Yet when the B.C. Minister of Finance, Glen Clark, brought down his budget, he kept the faith of those less fortunate in the province and maintained payments for welfare, health and education in the province. They were still the priorities of the provincial government.

You can imagine it was very, very tough with those kinds of cuts. Others had to pay the price because this government off-loaded its responsibility onto the British Columbia government.

If the current off-loading continues to the first year of the new century, the negative fiscal impact on British Columbia from the fiscal years, 1991-92 to 2000-01, will be $32.7 billion. To be more specific, the impact of the Liberal and Tory changes to the Established Programs Financing funding formula will result in B.C. losing $6.8 billion by 1994-95.

The B.C. report of Mr. Clark notes that Canada Assistance Plan benefits are used to assist people, not governments. In 1991-92, $166 million will be lost to British Columbians due to the five per cent growth ceiling, and more than $1 billion by 1994-95.

The question has to be asked. Why does this government feel the need to off-load on the provinces? It seems to be a failure on the federal government's part to exercise prudent fiscal management, and it has caused a serious debt problem for this country.

The federal government wishes to avoid visible and direct association with the severe measures it has implemented to restore its financial health. It off-loads those problems on to the provinces. By off-loading, it delivers tax increases and service cuts to the public indirectly through the provinces. They throw up their hands and say: "But we're keeping faith with the people". I say this government is not keeping faith with the people. This government is dumping its problems into the backyards of every Canadian in this country.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government is required to provide funds to the provinces and territories on a 50/50 cost shared basis for social assistance and social services. I might add, that includes child care. However, in 1990 and again in 1991, this Tory government unilaterally amended the Canada Assistance Plan Act by restricting increases in federal contributions to 5 per cent for the three have provinces of Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia. What would happen if you or I made an agreement with somebody to do something and then reneged half-way through the deal? Well, if we were dealing with our friendly bank, you can be assured we would not be happy. You and I would be in big trouble.

However, this federal government blithely and continuously reneges on a deal it has made with the provinces. It defies its own legislation, much less its own commitment. It withdraws its support and commitment by capping the Canada Assistance Plan and the EPF payments.

Then we have hon. members like the hon. member who just spoke for the government side, who get up and try to tell us Canadians are doing better, even though they have in fact cut back $3.3 billion on that original commitment.

It is similar to the situation of one person having a commitment and owing another $3,200. That person reneges on the $3,200 and the projected commitment, and comes back and says: "Well, I have decided I cannot afford it and I am going to let you carry the loss". That is not too difficult to understand. Most Canadians will see this government is reneging and is dishonest in the face of the legislation. It is holding Canadians up for ransom by dumping its responsibilities on the provinces.

In closing, when this government goes to the polls, each of those members will want to be able to look Canadians in the face and say: "I kept faith with you and I lived up to my commitments to you". I would suggest the hon. members on the other side of the House talk to this government about what is necessary for one to be able to look a Canadian in the eye and say: "I kept faith with you".

Mr. Thompson: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make it perfectly clear that during this debate today we have heard extrapolations or projections of what might have been. I suggest the hon. member's entire speech was based on what might have been if we lived in a perfect world.

That is the point I wish to make. Those are extrapolations only on figures that might have been--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not a point of order. It is a matter of opinion.

On the same point of order, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Langdon: As my colleague pointed out, equalization payments to provinces like New Brunswick actually fell from $8.1 billion to $7.9 billion. That is not talking about extrapolations. That is talking about actual reductions.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter into this debate and in particular to offer a perspective as an Ontario member. I would not want to hear catcalls from the other side of the room, just because I am a New Democrat and the province of Ontario happens to have a New Democratic government.

I will try to offer a perspective based on the reality that this federal government is in fact off-loading its responsibilities through the curtailment of its transfer payments. I do not care what government is in Ontario. It is just a coincidence that we are both New Democrats.

We talk about have provinces and have not provinces and what is going on with the federal government.

A lot of things have been said today about there being only one place to get tax money and that is from the taxpayer. It really does not make any difference if we get it on the federal level, the provincial level or from the municipal level or through the board of education taxes. The reality is—it was pointed out by a Conservative member—there is only one taxpayer. That person is absolutely right. There is only one taxpayer.

The problem is that the federal government continues to raise personal income taxes—

Mr. Hockin: We lowered it.

Mr. Samson: Tell the taxpayer that you lowered it.

An hon. member: Look at the budget. We lowered it.

Mr. Samson: Now they are getting excited. It does not take much to get them excited.

The fact is that the way the tax dollar is being spent is the issue. When the federal government transfers responsibilities to the provinces without transferring the funds for them to function, it would be about the same as if I said to my wife: "I have the income but you have to go out and pay the bills". This is what is happening today.

When we see the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, when we see what this federal government is doing—I support the fact that we need immigrants in Canada—but when it allows immigrants to come to Canada and it transfers the responsibility of educating, housing and feeding these immigrants on to the provinces without transferring the proper amount of money, then what are we doing?

What is this federal government doing? I think what it has to come up with are some answers as to what it is doing with Canadian dollars. How is it spending the money?

This government has made millions and millions of dollars on the GST. It knows that and it admits it. It has saved. It brags about the reduction in interest rates and it is saving millions of dollars there.

It cut Canadian Jobs Strategy by $100 million. It sells gold to the tune of about a million ounces per year. What is it doing with the money? The deficit does not go down. The national debt is not going down. Where is the money going?

It is fine for the government to say it is doing what it can, is getting things under control and expects the provinces to do the same thing. However, it is not prepared to help them. It holds back spending and puts up a nice front. Come next election time, it is going to be able to say: "We did our share. We got things under control."

Now the provinces cannot do it. Why not? Because they have cuts in the transfer payments from the federal government. The government is passing on its responsibilities to the provinces unfairly saying: "Those are the breaks. We are not giving you any extra funds. We are not going to give you any more money to do what you have to do. You are just going to have to do it."

I would like to see any one of those married members say that to their spouse: "I am going to keep the money, but you have to take care of the household. You have to buy the food. You have to pay the mortgage. You have to dress the kids." Give me a break.

As one of the have provinces, Ontario has made a commitment. In 1988–89, the federal government collected more than $5,000 per capita in Ontario. It spent $3,360 per capita in Ontario. The result was the net outflow from Ontario of some $16 billion in federal revenue.

The Ontario government continues to commit and keep its commitment to the values of sharing in Canada. In particular, Ontario has always strongly supported the $8.2 billion equalization program.

Let us face it. Everybody is in trouble. All the provinces are in trouble, and the federal government has to recognize that. It has to come up with programs that will put people back to work. People do not want social assistance. People do not want welfare. They do not want to live on a street corner in a cardboard box. They want to work. They want to contribute. They want to be part of the economy. They want to be part of the growth of this country.

• (1630)

What we need are job creation programs and a show of confidence from this government. We need some assistance to get things moving in this country. It means that this government has to participate and has to start loosening up a little bit.

It has to start realizing that even the have provinces are hurting. It has to recognize that the have provinces need assistance before it is too late, before they become have not provinces. All the provinces want to participate and I think this federal government has an obligation to recognize that and to offer assistance.

I would just like to conclude by asking this federal government to rethink what it is doing in this bill. We have to look at the growth of CAP. One member mentioned a little earlier that the Canada Assistance Plan has grown by 5 per cent a year. Obviously that is not enough. Until this government gets its act together and starts putting people back to work, we are going to need more assistance. But that is not what Canadians want. They do not want more assistance. They want to work in Canada, for Canada, for the benefit of Canada so that we can remain Canadians.

I look to the federal government to come to its senses and get this bill under control and get its act under control.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, but I do want to participate in this debate because there seems to be a lot of misunderstanding, particularly where I come from in Ontario, about deficits, government spending, tight fiscal policies, unemployment and so on.

Of course the recession drives this thinking. People in Ontario have been hit very hard in the past two years. Not only are we going through a recession, but we are suffering in many sectors of the economy in many parts of the province from the ravages of the free trade agreement. We are still suffering the ravages of the high Canadian dollar vis–à–vis the U.S. dollar. We are still suffering the ravages of the high interest rate policies of this government opposite.

Those are policies that have built up over the 1980s and collided head–on with the economic downturn which we call a recession, but in many communities in Ontario it is in fact a depression.

Then, to cap it all off, the federal government has the gall to turn around and tell the Ontario government that it is spending too much. At the same time as it is telling the Ontario government that it is spending too much, it is off-loading its portion of financial responsibility to the province of Ontario to the Government of Ontario.

This government cannot have it every way it wants. On the one hand it lectures the Ontario treasurer and says: "You have got to cut back on your spending", while at the same time this government cuts back on the transfer payments to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the way our country is constituted, the provinces are responsible for delivering certain basic programs: programs for higher education, programs for medicare, programs for social services. If the province of Ontario listened to this Conservative federal government we would have a lot more people not only on welfare, but we would have people wandering around the streets with no assistance at all. We would have universities laying off professors and lecturers. We would have not just wings in hospitals shutting down, we would have whole hospitals closing down.

The Conservatives cannot have it every way they want it. They cannot tell the province of Ontario that it is spending too much money and then cut back on transfer payments in those three vital areas and think that the people of Ontario are going to believe them.

For example, in 1991-92 federal cuts have increased Ontario's debt by $11 billion or 28 per cent. That is virtually the same amount that the Ontario deficit is at the present time. The reason the Ontario deficit has gone so high is because the Ontario government has felt a commitment toward those hurt the worst as a result of the recession.

It is one thing for the federal government to say: "We are cutting back on fiscal transfers for higher education, for post-secondary education but it is another thing for the Ontario government to tell the universities of Ontario that they have to shut down faculties or parts of faculties or parts of medical schools, parts of educational schools and so on. That is where the action and the heat is. That is where the immediate criticism is, on the street, on the campus, in the hospitals or in the social welfare offices.

It is very nice for the federal Minister of Finance to cut back on transfer payments for social welfare matters. When was the last time he stood behind a counter in a welfare office and said: "I am sorry, you do not get anything next week or for the next two weeks because we do not have any more money".

It is the provincial people who are left with that very unhappy position. They have to meet the people one on one in the social welfare offices and they need funds. If the federal government is going to cut back on transfer payments, then to fulfil their responsibilities the provincial governments need to borrow money in order to make up the difference.

Then we have the situation where the Minister of Finance lectures the province of Ontario and says: "You are overspending".

Debt is a major problem in this country, nobody denies that. But do you cut back on social transfer payments for welfare, payments to single parent families at a time when unemployment in this country is at 1.5 million, when over 10 per cent of Canadians are unemployed, when industries are not able to pay the taxes which legally they are supposed to be paying, when we have an economy that is in transition? I am being kind when I say that. The industrial heartland of Ontario is in terrible shape. I am not deliberately painting a negative picture.

I am convinced it is going to turn around. I am convinced they are going to be winners and I am convinced that within a year or two we are going to get the unemployment rate in Ontario down to a manageable figure. But to get from here to there, we are going to have to spend a lot of money in this province. Let us be honest about it. Other provinces in this country, the less fortunate provinces, the poorer provinces have for years depended on Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia to mention only three, as sources of transfer payments.

In Ontario, which accounts for 43 per cent of all federal financial input through taxes and receives only 30 per cent back, there is a loss of some 16 per cent in tax revenues raised by the federal system for transfer payments. That amount last year was about $16 billion and that was during the depth of a recession.

How does the Ontario government keep the money flowing to the hospitals, to the universities and colleges and to social welfare assistance? Where does it get that money? It has to borrow the money. Then the federal Minister of Finance slaps them in the face, verbally at least and says: "Hey, you guys at Queen's Park are spending too much money".

Surely the time to cut back, if the federal government feels it has to cut back in order to tackle its deficit problems, is not when we are at the bottom of the economic heap, not when we are going through the trough and the depths of a recession. As I said at the outset it is close to a depression and would be a depression if we did not have these social welfare payments.

The time to cut back is when the economy is going full steam ahead, when money is coming into the public treasuries of the provinces, from industry and from personal income taxes. That is when governments can afford to make cutbacks, but surely not in the very depths of a recession.

That is why the province of Ontario has been caught with this terrible annual deficit, this current account deficit. I have not heard the throne speech today in Ontario. It started, I believe, at around three o'clock. But I have no doubt that the Ontario deficit may go well beyond $11 billion this year.

• (1640)

A lot of that deficit is a direct result of the cutback of the federal transfer payments in those three areas I mentioned. Probably close to half is the result of the cutback in federal transfer payments to Queen's Park this year.

Now, if you are going to hammer Queen's Park, if you are going to tell Queen's Park that it has to put its finances in order, then it is little wonder that the Premier of Ontario says: "Look, as part of that unity package, as part of that constitutional debate in Ottawa, we are going to have to ask for a change in fiscal policy in this country vis-à-vis the federal government and the provinces. In other words, if we are going to suffer the cutbacks in fiscal transfers from the federal government, then we are going to have to acquire the legal right to tax more on our own."

We know what that kind of thing could lead to. It could lead to a lot of trouble in this country. If provinces do get greater control over direct financing, there will be less inclination, less of a tendency, to transfer funds out of those provinces through the federal government to the have not provinces.

I would rather have it the way it is, quite frankly, if the federal government would pay its bills. And that is exactly what we are talking about today. The federal government should pay its bills to the provinces, and it is not doing that. Yet it is expecting the provinces to keep pumping funds into colleges and universities, hospitals, and so on.

I have made my point. The federal government cannot keep on cutting back on transfers at this time, particularly during an extreme recession. Certainly, new fiscal arrangements are being called for.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. In keeping with the previous speaker who began his remarks by saying that he was going to be brief, I will be even more brief. I would like to put a couple of points on the record that deal with this very important matter we are discussing today.

First of all, one of the items I do not think Canadians should lose sight of and one that perhaps they are not aware of is the fact that this government has instituted a program called the Revenue Guarantee Program. It protects provinces that are participating in this program in tax collection agreements from major revenue reductions due to sudden changes in federal personal tax policy.

As members have previously said, there are provinces that are currently suffering from economic shortfalls. This is a program that was put in by the government to assist when it finds that there are times in its revenue projections that for reasons not within its control which caused its expectations not to be met that this program kicks in.

Saskatchewan suffers from its dependency primarily on the grain trade, a trade that has been subject to the international grain price wars. Saskatchewan has seen its economy spiral in a negative fashion to the point where we have and continue to feel and have felt for quite some time the recessionary influences of the international grain trade wars. Again, this is in a province that to a major degree depends on a singular aspect of its economy for its survival. There have been some attempts made to diversify, but those are somewhat limited.

Saskatchewan has benefitted from this program and I suggest to members in this House and to Canadians that that opportunity is there not only for Saskatchewan but also for every other province.

There has been some comment made, yes an admission, that grants to provinces have increased over the past, but perhaps these increases have not been enough. I am not too sure that anyone has the power, the strength, or the wherewithal to determine when enough is enough, particularly when you are reliant on a pool of funds that is restrictive in its own, and the federal government is no stranger to that dilemma.

The federal government has, and I would like to recite for you for the record, committed itself to an ever-increasing expenditure of transfer payments going to the provinces.

The EPF fund, which in 1984–85 was $14.5 billion, rose to $20.5 billion in the year 1991–92, and will go to $20.766 billion in 1992–93. In the area of equalization the same holds true going from 1984–85 from $5.5 billion up to the next year of $8.5 billion. The Canada Assistance Plan is going from $4 billion in 1984–85 to $7 billion in 1992–93 and other transfers are going from 1984–85 from $2.1 billion up to $3.6 billion in fiscal year 1992–93.

Perhaps expressed in terms of percentages, percentage figures seem to live with people more so than terms of actual dollars. EPF has increased by 4.5 per cent from 1984–85 to the year 1992–93, the equalization funds by 5.9 per cent and the Canada Assistance Plan by 7.3 per cent.

It is very clear that there have been ongoing increases in the transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces. What makes this point even much more important to make is that all of this has occurred at a time when the federal government has dug in and said: "We will reduce our expenditures at a time when others are asking us to increase our expenditures". Canadians generally are asking the Government of Canada to reduce its expenditures and in so doing we have had to limit the rate of growth that has been transferred to other provinces.

I made issue of this just last week in a Standing Order 31 statement where we have been criticized for what is more popularly referred to as off-loading. To curtail the rate of growth, to still include a rate of growth in the amount of funds going to the provinces, I would suggest respectfully that it is not off-loading.

What is in fact off-loading is very clearly illustrated by what has happened in the province of Saskatchewan, my own home province. The province of Saskatchewan has indicated that grants to municipalities will be cut by 15 per cent, not the rate of growth showing a cut, but starting from an even base from last year there will be a 15 per cent cut in the amount of moneys being transferred to the city of Regina, the city that I had the pleasure of representing for nine years. That is off-loading. That is a fact in spades, in capital letters. That is off-loading.

We, the federal government, have been expected to tighten our belts to show our rate of growth increasing by no more than about 3.6 per cent. The Government of Saskatchewan has come upon us, the residents of Saskatchewan, and said: "Your rate of growth will not only not show any increase but we will cut from the previous year". That is off-loading.

Those are essentially the points that I wanted to get on the record. There has been much said about "if I were there, this is what I would do" without the associated responsibility of providing the answer to the question of where in fact would these funds come from.

Economic realization of difficult times requires some pretty stringent approaches to how one deals with the country's economics. A wish list is not the way to do it. If anyone for a moment suggests that additional funds be spent, a supporting source from where these funds should logically come should accompany those kinds of comments.

Those are my comments, Mr. Speaker. I thank you for the opportunity to put these on the record.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to what the member for Regina—Wascana said. He said he would be brief. Well, he was almost brief.

He said right at the end that if I were there, this is what I would do, without a realization of where these funds would come from. I say to him, on behalf of my colleagues in the NDP, just let us go over there. Let us go to the government benches for a little while. We will show you where the funds come from. We will have a fairer system of taxation in this country. We will get rid of the GST and we will get economic prosperity going again in this country.

I am from the province of British Columbia. I want to say a little bit about the off-loading by the federal government and how it is affecting my province.

The member for Brant spoke a few minutes ago about how it is affecting his province. He said, as I recall, that a part of the provincial deficit in Ontario, the budget deficit, perhaps up to half of it came because of the cutbacks in the federal transfer payments.

I know that in my own province, as the finance minister of British Columbia, Glen Clark, has said, that the cutbacks, the off-loading measures implemented since 1982 in B.C. have been $1.1 billion. This is equivalent to 67 per cent of our estimated budget deficit of $1.7 billion in British Columbia.

• (1650)

We have a deficit in British Columbia because we had to clean up from the Socred government which mismanaged the provincial finances. Social Credit was a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives for those people from outside of B.C. who may not realize what it was. It was a Liberal/Conservative coalition. Not only did it mismanage, it would not even tell the people the truth of what was happening to the provincial finances. Now that we have got to the bottom of that we realize what is happening.

I cannot speak for Ontario, but I was listening to my friend from Brant and my other friend from northern Ontario, of the NDP, speak a few minutes ago.

I began to wonder, in Ontario there are tremendously difficult times right now because of the free trade deal and because of the changes that are going on in that economy. So our friends in the Conservative Party are saying: "Just abandon the workers and abandon the people who need some help in these difficult times". You cannot do that. You would have riots in the streets if you did that. You would not have a peaceful province.

I might tell the member for Brant, I was thinking about this in a broader context. What was happening when Ontario was doing well in the 1980s? After that short recession you will recall in the early 1980s, then Ontario did very well. That is the time the Peterson Liberals were in power, as I recall.

It seems to me that government does have some obligations. It should not have been spending so much. That was Liberal mismanagement in Ontario that time. If it had saved some money, then in the difficult times, it would be more credible for a government to say: "We can spend money now".

That is straight Keynesian economics. You prime the pump when the times are bad, when private investment is not there, making sure the recession is not that bad. Then when times are good and the taxes are flowing in, you put it away. That was the basis of the kind of economics that got us out of the Great Depression and World War II.

An hon. member: It got us into the present mess.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): My friend says it got us into the present mess. No, that is not true. You save in the good times and spend in the bad times. The Liberals forgot to save.

Now I wanted to talk about how this affects my own province of British Columbia. I have just said that how the off-loading measures have meant about 67 per cent of our estimated budget deficit. It has really caused that and that is one of the reasons we have that deficit.

Yet, I think that the B.C. Minister of Finance, Mr. Clark, maintained the faith with those who were unemployed and those who were in difficult situations and brought forward a good budget. He has been criticized by the Liberals in the province of British Columbia, but he kept the faith unlike previous Liberal governments or the Liberal/Conservative coalition known as Social Credit.

The established programs financing, the impact of Liberal and Conservative changes to that program will result in my province of British Columbia losing $6.8 billion by the end of 1994-95. These are great sums. I want to give a little bit of the background here.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, called CAP, the federal government is required to provide funds to the provinces and territories on a 50/50 cost shared basis for social assistance and social services including child care, social assistance and welfare.

However in 1990, and again in 1991, the Conservative government unilaterally amended the Canada Assistance Plan Act by restricting increases in federal contributions to five per cent to the have provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario. This did not help, in many ways, national unity or co-operative federalism by doing this unilaterally.

At a recent federal-provincial finance minister's conference, B.C. noted that the Canada Assistance Plan benefits are used to assist people not governments. This goes to people, not to governments.

In 1991-92, $166 million will be lost to British Columbia due to the 5 per cent gross ceiling. More than $1 billion will be lost by 1994-95. That means that money is lost to people. The federal government is taxing Canadians and not redistributing that money sufficiently.

The Conservatives brought in the cap of 5 per cent gross ceiling even though the Canada Assistance Plan agreement required the federal government to give one year's notice of the change. B.C., Ontario, Alberta and Manitoba and two native organizations challenged that in the Federal Court. They lost. The result is that Ontario, as my friend for Brant said, has been hardest hit by the ceiling due to the dramatic increases in welfare because of the recession. In January 1992, over 1.1 million Ontarians were receiving benefits, up 33 per cent. High unemployment there was because of the collapse of the manufacturing sector due to the free trade agreement and the recession.

I want to say something about our position on this matter. I owe that to the House. We in the NDP have opposed all legislation restricting Canada Assistance Plan funds because it allows the federal government to renege on paying its fair share of social assistance costs. Much of the growth and demand for aid is due to federal actions, ironically, such as the reduction in UI benefits, the made in Canada recession and the job losses due to the free trade deal.

The federal government is even giving notice that it is withdrawing from providing social programs which the Prime Minister once called a sacred trust. You cannot trust the federal government to honour its commitments. Someone once said: "If you shake hands with the federal government you better count your fingers after".

What is happening is that both Liberal and Conservative governments, especially Liberal governments in the past, and this is important to remember, are not going to change the situation at all. Off-loading these expenses to the provinces is not the way to get out of it. The hon. member said: "The revenue guaranteed program is out there". Let me tell him for Ontario and for my own province of British Columbia, we have not seen the cheques. If the cheques are out there, they seem to be bouncing.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues on this side of the House who have spoken, I want to take a few minutes to put my thoughts on the record with respect to what is being proposed here by the government. I hope in the process of my remarks we do not have a repeat of what happened this morning when the government tried to shut me off by bringing the House down.

We live in a confederation. This is the way we have developed our form of government in this part of North American where provinces came of their own volition into a federation. We have a central government. There was one time when taxation was a provincial responsibility. That was one of the rights of the provinces. During the Second World War, they turned it over to the federal government. It was to be for a temporary period of time.

The federal government has ended up with that. There are those of my colleagues who have seen Canada as a confederation with a strong central government. I see smiles on faces of my colleagues who have always argued for a strong central government. We have a strong central government in this country.

An hon. member: Dictatorship.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is a government that determines what happens to the Canadian dollar. It is a government that has total control over the Bank of Canada. Therefore, it is a government that can control the interests rates in the country. These are facts. Bob Rae and Allan Blakeney and anybody else who ever governed a province never had a say in that. We are now hoping to broaden the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, but in fact it is the federal government that determines these things. Monetary policy is determined by the federal government. There are no ifs, buts or elses about this. Let us put it in the proper context.

• (1700)

Two years ago, when inflation was at at 5.5 per cent or 6 per cent, Dr. Crow decided that we could not have that and that he, as the central banker, had to enhance his image with all of those international casino players. Therefore, he was going to make sure that inflation was wrestled to the ground. What we saw was interest rates going up and up and up. As they went up, unemployment went up in the country. In fact, the Conference Board of Canada at that time said that it was a made-in-Canada recession.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Rodriguez: You all remember that. Have we forgotten, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. member: A Tory concession.

Mr. Rodriguez: Here we have a government at the national level that had its hands on the levers of fiscal and monetary policy, yet the people from whom it got the revenues reside in the provinces and who get their services directly from those provinces, services for health care, for education and social assistance. These are operated by the provinces. Here we had the federal government taking action. Of course, the end result was that in fact we had all of those people falling on to unemployment insurance.

Then this government, to put salt into the wounds, brought in changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21. I do not have to remind too many members in this House of that bill. My colleague fought this so hard, the member for Timmins—Chapleau sitting here to my right. The act turned over the funding of unemployment insurance to the employers and employees totally. To put further salt into the wounds, this government decided to take the training funds out of the unemployment insurance program.

The government then pats itself on the back, puffs up its chest and says: "Look, on our operating accounts we run a surplus". Last year it ran a surplus of $11 billion. The federal government, a little known fact, took in $12 billion more than it spent on the operating year over year accounts. But because of the deliberate high interest rate policy that was followed by this government, the Sumo wrestlers of the world, that had to wrestle inflation to the ground, which is down now to 1.7 per cent, the patient is in a coma.

An hon. member: 1.5 million unemployed.

Mr. Rodriguez: What is the price? We said this to Mr. Crow. He thought he was J.C. He came before the committee and we said to J.C.: "Is your conscience not bothering you? How can you sleep at nights knowing that you have so successfully defeated inflation, but you have got 1.5 million people unemployed in this country?"

With the cutbacks in unemployment insurance where do you think those people are now ending up? They are ending up on the welfare rolls—

Some hon. members: Of the provinces.

Mr. Rodriguez: Of the provinces. Thanks for reminding me, brother. On the provinces. What does the government do? It turns around, this gang over here, heartless and cruel—

An hon. member: Soulless.

Mr. Rodriguez: —soulless. This heartless, soulless and cruel government turns around and blames the victims for this pickle that it is in when it is all made over there. It is a made in Toryland recipe. That is where it has been made and now the Tories are saying to Bob Rae: "You are spending too much".

In this country, there are two million people living on social assistance. There are 2 million people living on social assistance, and they are saying that the governments at the provincial level are spending too much. They are spending too much.

I want to put things in proper perspective. I know my good friend from northern Ontario to my right is there, but I have to say it. They actually blame the Ontario government. Who is it who got us into things in Ontario like the Dome? I thought that was something that the private sector ought to build, but Billy Davis on the board of directors and Howard Starkman and all these guys, they wanted the Dome.

Who was going to build and pay for the Dome? The taxpayers of Ontario. Ontario now is left with this white elephant called a Dome, and it is now backing out of the deal it had just signed to buy the thing.

Who got us into buying Suncor shares that are not worth a pinch of coon snuff today? Billy Davis, the Tory premier got us into Suncor. We cannot even sell those shares today and help pay down the debt. They are not worth a pinch of coon snuff.

That is where we are. As a matter of fact, the last budget that the Peterson government brought down before they were defeated projected a surplus of $400 million. By the time poor Floyd got the key to the treasury, that had worked its way to a $700 million deficit.

What happened? This gang—I hate to say this to my left, but that is only figuratively—this cruel, heartless, soul-less gang took actions which created the problems that are now being experienced particularly in Ontario.

In fact, Ontario was the goose that laid the golden eggs for years for this government. It lived off the avails of Ontario. I say it should be charged with pimping. It has lived off the avails of Ontario, and now Ontario has a rough time, they are all deserting the house. They are all leaving the House, and turning around and saying: "It is your fault. You are spending too much".

I want to tell you that the NDP government in Ontario is not prepared to back away from its responsibility to make sure that the victims of this cruel, heartless government do not end up on the street. That is what we say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the acting government Whip to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Consequently, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded division on the questions now before the House is deferred until 5.45 p.m. today, when the bells shall be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

CONTRAVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Monique Landry (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House today and lend support to the Minister of Justice who has set forward her proposals for a federal ticketing scheme.

The Contraventions Act is but one means whereby the federal government can assist provincial jurisdictions in coping with the heavy burden on the courts. The Contraventions Act provides for a ticketing scheme that will be simple and will assist in making the justice system more efficient.

To begin with, the 12 participating departments and agencies have identified almost 4,000 existing minor regulatory offences which will be included in a schedule of offences. The schedule which accompanies the act can be regularly updated and amended so as to meet the future needs of government departments and agencies.

What kind of offences are contemplated by this Contraventions Act? We are talking about minor offences. For example, recklessly driving a motor boat close to shore, hunting without a valid licence, camping in a park without a permit, illegal parking on federal lands.

The person who is ticketed has the following options: Plead guilty and pay the set fine as indicated on the ticket without having to appear in court. Plead guilty with representations asking the court for a lesser fine or an extended time to pay the fine, or the individual may wish to dispute the charge and so indicates the desire to proceed to trial by forwarding the ticket to the appropriate court office.

In this latter case, where a trial is requested, the trial proceeds in accordance with the summary conviction provisions of the Criminal Code. An individual who ignores a ticket will be found guilty by default.

It should be noted that the Contraventions Act will apply to young offenders as well as adults. It is fair that young persons who engage in activities under the sphere of the ticketing scheme, such as boating, camping, hunting and fishing should be held responsible for their actions if they violate the law.

In recognition that the maximum fine limit of $1,000 which is set for adults may be onerous, the maximum fine level for a young person who is ticketed will be $100.

Permit me now to speak in an even more tangible and concrete fashion about what the Contraventions Act will do for many Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka there are literally hundreds and hundreds of cottages surrounding one of the most beautiful lake districts in all of Canada. While most residents wish to enjoy the tranquil beauty of nature in the surrounding area, there are a few who would abuse the privilege.

I am deluged with complaints from friends and neighbours in my riding who are angered by the wanton and reckless disregard that some people display when using their boats on the waterways. People will sometimes drive recklessly close to the shore, rev up their engines at noise levels that far exceed the permissible limits. Up to now, enforcement of the small vessel regulations and the boating restriction regulations have been a most difficult chore for enforcement officers. The overly lengthy procedure inherent in the current system mitigates against the uniform and consistent enforcement to the detriment of cottagers.

The Contraventions Act will permit the issuing of tickets to people who drive their boats in excess of prescribed speeds near the shores, or it will allow enforcement officers to ticket people who engage in unauthorized boat racing, or who fail to maintain their equipment as required by regulations.

The activities I have spoken of, as one can readily see, are not activities that should be subject to the procedures and sanctions of the Criminal Code. It is entirely appropriate that people who commit these somewhat less serious, but nevertheless bothersome, infractions should be dealt with under the law. But it is equally clear that people who commit such infractions should not necessarily be always subject to the procedures of the criminal law.

Therefore, the Contraventions Act is an ideal solution, permitting the monitoring and enforcement of these activities while doing so outside the traditional bounds of the Criminal Code.

Those who do not wish to contest proceedings should be able to pay the ticket without having to go through the criminal law process as they have to now. The enforcement of these minor regulatory offences is made much more efficient for the government and simpler for those found in contravention.

We need action on this front now, and I am urging all members of the House to lend their support to this legislative initiative so as to ensure a peaceful and tranquil summertime.

I have been pressing for this legislation for well over five or six years. I believe I have brought it to the attention of three ministers of justice, starting with the Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, our present Governor General, and with the Solicitor General and finally with our present Minister of Justice. I finally got my message through to her and I guess to her officials so that the bill was finally organized and brought in last fall.

I am hoping that some way part of the bill—and I am emphasizing that part of the bill to do with the boating regulations—can be brought in and passed more quickly than the rest. I have been told by the legal authorities in the Ministry of Justice that while the bill will go through without too much opposition, even when it gets through in a hurry it is going to take some months and probably would not actually become law until this fall.

That would mean that we would miss the entire boating season and the present unwieldy way in which these infractions are dealt with would continue for another year. That means, again, that a great many people who could be given a ticket and would pay a fine, because they have to be charged under the Criminal Code now, which is a much more serious offence, will get off for another year.

Furthermore, when this legislation does finally come into effect, there will be literally tens of thousands of cases which now have to appear before the courts which can be settled out of court. I am hoping that the Ministry of Justice some way or another can get the part dealing with boating infractions through and ready by the May 24 weekend.

• (1720)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka on the work he has done in bringing this bill to realization. He and I have something in common. We both have had trouble getting through to the last two Ministers of Justice. I can appreciate that, as he knows, and as all members know.

As the member has said, this has been in the works since 1985. A lot of work has been done on this. I think basically the idea is a good one. There is need for something like this. I feel a lot more needs to be done by the Department of Justice and the government to relieve the workload of the courts so that we can allow the courts to do the job which most necessarily needs to be done and that is to keep up with the caseload with which they are faced.

What we have here is a situation where there are a lot of laws through regulation that now are brought forward through the Criminal Code and require court hearings. What is being said is that a lot of these cases do not need to go before the courts. If there are going to be guilty pleas, if there are offences under regulations of various acts, then it should be enough to give a ticket or something to the alleged offender and that ticket would require the offender to pay a fine up to a maximum of $1,000.

It may be that under the regulations the fine is set, but the fine could be set at less than $1,000 for adults but not more because the maximum under this bill, the Contraventions Act, is $1,000. As the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka has said, this act also applies to young offenders, but the maximum for young offenders is $100.

There is a need for this bill. I think if properly handled and properly dealt with that this can be a very positive aspect of our judicial system.

The aim of this bill is twofold. One is to decriminalize approximately 3,500 offences by creating the option for the enforcement officer to issue a ticket to an offender rather than pursuing a summary conviction or an indictable action.

This will free up the court's time, eliminating the need to hear these minor offences. It still allows the officer to go by way of summary or indictable conviction if he or she wishes. It is up to the officer. The option is there.

In most cases I think that the officer will choose to go by ticketing. It helps the court's time. This of course does not mean that because someone is ticketed they have to plead guilty. If they feel there are extenuating circumstances and they are not guilty of the offence for which they have been ticketed, they can arrange to be heard in court. In some cases they may be even able to submit written evidence and not have to appear in court if the distance is too far.

The courts and the system and the act are going out of their way to simplify matters which the government feels, and I think too with a great deal of justification, can be dealt with more simply than they are at the present without dealing with the high priced talent in courts and through lawyers, judges and so on in order to take time which is needed for more complicated and lengthy processes.

Not only that, but this legislation is supported by all the attorneys general of the provinces. There is heavy demand from most government departments to have their regulatory and other minor offences included among those covered by Bill C–46. At present, this bill covers 12 departments, commissions or boards, whose regulations or sanctions will be covered. These offences can be ticketable.

As the bill is in place for a while it is presumed that more departments, commissions and agencies will come in. More than the estimated 3,500 offences will be brought under this bill. Also, with the support of the provinces it will just continue to grow.

There is one major concern—and this is a major concern—as to what is going to be ticketable, what is going to be given this option to be ticketable as an offence, is left to Orders in Council. If done conscientiously this will not be a problem. If the government decides to politicize or to try to lean in a certain direction to accommodate vested interests, I can assure the House that this bill is going to be a problem.

I want to flag this right now because it is vital. I think our party is in agreement with what the government is trying to do, the spirit of trying to relieve the workload of the courts to simplify the justice system, as the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka has said, in boating violations on lakes and things that are obvious.

What are we trying to do here? We are trying to divide it into two different categories. For those who are committing a crime against society, against morality, a crime against the person, these matters will still have to go through the Criminal Code to summary or indictable offence. That is the way it should be.

However, in themselves some acts are not really unlawful. Driving a boat at high speed on a lake ordinarily would not be an offence, but because people are on the lake, because there are other boaters on the lake, this is an offence because of public will. It is a situation of inter-communication of people and in their best interests people have to respect the rights of others. Because of the interweaving of society and the rights of people, these offences have to be dealt with.

Illegal parking on Department of Transport property is an offence. We do not want them to be criminal offences. We do not want the stigma there, but they are still against the best interests of society and the best interests of other people and have to be dealt with.

There are also a lot of acts, a lot of regulations which are vital and which are going to become more important. They are not just minor annoyances. When I talk about that, I talk mainly about the concern with respect to environmental dumping offences for which many minor ones appear on the list now. The fear is that the department lawyer may be under heavy pressure from his or her minister to add serious offences to the ticketable list when it should remain as summary or indictable offence only.

In talking to the Department of Justice on this it says that it does not think this is going to be a problem, that my concern is just theoretical, and that the system will not allow this to happen. However the system can allow this to happen because what becomes a ticketable offence is, as I have stated, to be determined by Order in Council.

If the government decides that it wants to do it for some reason even though it is against the best interests of society, it can add it to the list so that an offence can be a ticketable offence when in fact it is a very serious dumping offence.

There has to be a perspective and we have to watch this very closely. I would suggest to the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, the Minister of Justice and the parliamentary secretary who is here today that there be a review process given to the House of Commons on these Orders In Council, the way it is being done with the regulations of gun control under Bill C-17, that these new ticketable offences to be dealt with outside of the Criminal Code and with the option to be ticketable rather than preceding with summary or indictable offence, be given to the House of Commons for a period of time to review so that we can look at it and judge whether this is in the best interest.

I say that because I think all members of this House have an interest in making sure that this is done properly. The government has come forward with this idea, albeit not quickly. It was first started in 1985. First reading of this bill was on December 9, which was four or five months ago, but still, the spirit is there. I think it is important to maintain that spirit. I think we have to continue with that.

The government also says that this is going to be revenue neutral, but there will be money saved by making better use of the court's time and resources. I think that is a fair statement. I do not think we want to go too far. I think we want to keep it in perspective. I think the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, the minister and the parliamentary secretary, all members of government, all members of this House, would want the same thing.

The only thing I am afraid of is that without the parliamentary review, with the ability to do this so easily through Order In Council, it may get out of hand. There is not that check and balance I would like to see.

I do not want to go on too long on this bill. I will be the only speaker for our party because we want to get it into committee and we want to be able to talk about it. We want to have this idea pursued and developed and in place as quickly as possible to take advantage of the summer season. I want that idea to be able to be discussed as well in committee.

With respect to the young offenders, the government has said that it wants to have it heard in youth court wherever possible. I think that is important. I think we have got to use the youth courts. One government, the Government of Saskatchewan, has a problem, however. It would only agree to the legislation if the province could hear the young offenders in ordinary court because it had no mechanism for these offences to be heard in youth court.

I feel that is unfortunate. I would hope that all provinces would stop this transfer, this idea of having young offenders going to adult ordinary courts.

I also want to make a point. I make this not to detract from this legislation which I think is basically a good idea. This idea of what we are talking about today, of ticketing these regulatory offences to relieve the work of our court system, was first put forward in 1976 by the Law Reform Commission, which now has been terminated by the government. I know the Law Reform Commission is not a part of this bill, but I want to say to the government that here is a prime example of what the Law Reform Commission was able to do by bringing forward this idea.

People have said the Law Reform Commission was great, but how many bills are a result of the work of the Law Reform Commission? We are seeing one today as a result of the Law Reform Commission that was brought forward 16 years ago, four years after the Law Reform Commission came into being. That took a long time, but yet the idea was germinated in 1976 and now it has come to reality in 1992. It is here thanks largely to the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka and to the Law Reform Commission. It is tragic that we are losing this very important agency which is germinating these ideas.

By losing the Law Reform Commission, we will be with Zimbabwe and Bangladesh, the only three countries in the Commonwealth that do not have a Law Reform Commission. Now that puts Canada in a pretty bad light as far as I am concerned.

What we have done is to say that we do not want this type of original thinking. If the government is going to get rid of it then we are not going to have this thinking. We have had it to this point and the $4.8 million of the Law Reform Commission's budget has been well served as far as this country is concerned.

With respect to this bill, I want to say that we have the Criminal Code which will deal with wrongful acts that violate societal standards and decency in humanity. We also now have these items that are ticketable or can be proceeded with as summary or indictable offences.

I do hope that we will have a good discussion of this in committee. It is my intention to have witnesses called and we could hear this in committee as quickly as possible. It is important to have more discussion on it.

Basically, as I have said, it is a step in the right direction. It is going to create a positive presence. I would say that we have to be able to review the Orders in Council so that the latitude which this bill gives is not abused.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend from the NDP who is allowing me to rise briefly before he speaks. I wanted to speak as the minister responsible for tourism enthusiastically in support of the bill introduced by my hon. friend from Parry Sound—Muskoka.

I have received dozens of representations asking that something like this be done. This not only affects all of the purposes that were described earlier in the debate, but it will help tourism in important ways because there are a number of public places where people do not feel safe. This will change the nature of our waterscape and landscape making them safer and quieter.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill which my party will support. But like my friend, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, the critic for the Liberal Party, we want to call some witnesses and ask some questions at committee stage.

I noticed that the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys has mentioned that this bill came from ideas first put forward by the Law Reform Commission in 1976, a Canadian institution. He also mentioned that the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka had advocated the bill, if I might say another Canadian institution almost.

I noticed the government has chosen to get rid of one of those institutions and that is the Law Reform Commission. I am personally hoping, as some relatives in my family are also hoping, that it does not get rid of the other institution and that is the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka.

Perhaps the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka might use his influence, which I am told is considerable with the Prime Minister and the government, to get that other institution, the Law Reform Commission, back in. He might consider that.

There are a couple of points that I would like to raise. As the government has said, this bill in fact takes what were almost full criminal offences where an appearance had to be made in court, even though they may be minor transgressions, to make it more like what happens in the provinces with a traffic ticket basically. That is a good idea and long overdue. We in the committee want to have a close look at the regulations. We do not have the regulations here so we do not have a list of what we are expected to see.

• (1740)

In the paper the government put out today called The Ticketing Scheme for Minor Regulatory Offences, a Backgrounder, it mentioned that it has identified minor offences under federal law or regulation for which it is responsible and which will be subject to the Contravention Act. It mentions Agriculture Canada, Atomic Energy Control Board—we might want to look at that carefully—Canada Ports Corporation, Communications Canada, National Defence, Environment Canada, and Fisheries and Oceans Canada. Specifically we want to look at Environment Canada offences because the trend in criminal law and in public opinion is to make tougher penalties for environmental offenders, not easier penalties. We want to have a look at this and make sure this does not go against that particular trend.

It would be similar, as I understand it, as to how some of the ticketing schemes work in the provinces. I might say parenthetically it may mean that we will now have to pay our tickets at the airports. They will actually come after us. That is what happens in the provinces. We will want to hear evidence from the provinces as to how these schemes are working and how they collect the money. We can learn, it seems to me, from how the schemes are working in the provinces. We want to see some evidence of that at the hearings in committee on this particular bill.

I do not know whether the minister will be speaking on this bill in the House. Obviously she has not spoken so far. The minister had a press conference about an hour or an hour and a half ago. I was there. She released a statement and discussed this bill in the context of what she called the protection of society week. She talked about bringing this bill in because she wanted to modernize the law and protect society though a number of bills.

I replied at the press conference, without trying to be too cheeky. I said: "There is a difference between law and order and lawn ornaments". A lot of this is lawn ornaments. A lot of it is hype and publicity by press release. In fact there is not a great deal of substance.

We are thankful that there is contraventions legislation but it is a long overdue bill. It is not the deepest of bills. We are thankful that there is a bill dealing with jury selection, but it was the Supreme Court of Canada that told the government to get on with that bill. We are thankful that there will be in this law and order week the Extradition Act, but we have had that for a while.

The latest development in extradition is the concept of an international criminal court. That is how to deal with Libyan terrorists and so on, but the government has not talked about that anywhere. I will later on in the week, I hope.

I want to come back to the notion that the minister put forward, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. The minister talked about this bill at the press conference, this bill we are debating here today. She said it would modernize the law. If she really wants to modernize the law, I will tell her a couple of things to do. Do not get rid of the Law Reform Commission because the Law Reform Commission was one of the vehicles for getting the new ideas to modernize the law.

I want to quote an article on that by Stephen Bindman, a reporter for Southam News, that appeared in The Ottawa Citizen on March 11. He talked about the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys saying that Canada joined Zimbabwe and Bangladesh as one of the few democratic countries getting rid of the law—
