Mrs. Vézina (for the Minister of Justice): moved that Bill C–64, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

Deputy Chairman: Order! House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C–64, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mrs. Vézina (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C–64 be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall this bill be read the third time? With leave of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Vézina (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Churchill has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be delaying this bill but after reviewing the short words that I gave on second reading, I would like to read the full text of a letter we received from the Northwest Territories Minister of Justice into the record. I think it would help people who are watching and who are concerned about official languages to further understand what has happened and to make sure there is no belief that there is any delay involved. The letter which we received by fax from the Northwest Territories Minister of Justice, Dennis Patterson to our leader states:

I am writing to let you know about a request I have made to the Honourable Kim Campbell to extend (for one final time!) the deadline of March 31, 1992 for translating regulations into French. My department has been working flat out and has airlifted help from Ottawa in addition to assistance supplied by the editors of the Canada Gazette. Even with that help, the Department of Justice expects the revision will not be completed until the end of the summer. In an abundance of caution, the bill passed and assented to yesterday in the Legislative Assembly fixes a new date of September 30, 1992.

The government of the Northwest Territories has worked hard and opened a considerable amount of (federal) money to meet the obligations established by Parliament. All of the statutes are now published completely in bilingual form and all bills proceed through the Assembly in both English and French. All new regulations are produced and published in both languages. Most of the backlog of regulations is translated and the first of four volumes of regulations has been sent to the Territorial Printer.

The Honourable Kim Campbell has undertaken to introduce the necessary legislation as soon as the appropriate Bill passes the Legislative Assembly here. It would be a shame if Parliament could not amend the Northwest Territories Act quickly with all party consent before March 31 and I seek your support to ensure that valid health, public safety and social assistance laws continue to protect the residents of the Territories.

Yours truly,

Dennis Patterson

I think that it is very obvious from the letter I have just read into the record that the Northwest Territories is committed to have the regulations translated by September 30 of this year and I think it is a very reasonable extension under those conditions.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to thank the hon. member for Churchill for his statement, because I thought it was the right thing to say. The letter he shared with us is very important at this point in our deliberations and it is good to have it on the record, in Hansard, for all Canadians. It is an important principle for this country. We belong to a really bilingual country and it is fitting to point that out in the present climate.

So I again thank the hon. member for Churchill for what he said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I in turn would like to commend the hon. member for Churchill for his good words, for reading this letter and the encouragement it shows for linguistic duality, that is French and English in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The vote is on the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–60, an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be given the opportunity to address this particular bill today.

I want to begin by saying that these federal–provincial agreements such as Established Programs Financing agreements are not really agreements per se. This is a misnomer. How can it be an agreement when in fact the federal government has on a number of occasions unilaterally breached them, reduced them. An agreement means that at least two people want to do something in common with known rules of changing or whatever business they were intending to do. In this particular case that is not the situation, so I think I need to make that statement initially.

Let us recognize as well what this is all about. We are talking about Bill C–60. This is a massive assault, as a number of people have recognized before, on post–secondary education funding in Canada. It is also a massive assault on health care services.

Let me share with the House that contrary to a promise made by the government not to change the transfer formula, it was in fact reduced in 1986 by 2 per cent. It was in fact changed in 1990 by 1 per cent. In 1991 it was frozen and that freeze was extended to 1995.

What do all these changes mean? It means that from 1986 to 1995 there will be 30 billion fewer dollars transferred to provinces for health and education. That is roughly $20 billion less for health and close to $10 billion less for education. That is why I call it a massive assault on health and education.

Let me also share the most recent data I have received. For example, in 1990–91 there will be 315 million fewer dollars transferred for education. In 1991–92 there will be 594 million fewer dollars transferred for education. This is cash. Some of us will know that there are both tax transfers as well as cash transfers. The tax transfers do not put any money on the table in spite of what federal government officials will say. They basically permit the provinces to raise the taxes and they take the flak for it.

What the provinces want, what the provinces need, and what the students require is more cash. We are all knowledgeable about the current situation where the students have been hit extremely hard. Tuition fees are on the increase. Student debt is sky-rocketing. It is becoming increasingly difficult to get an education in this country.

What do these massive cuts mean to Canada? What do they mean to Canadians and Canadian students? First, they damage our competitiveness. Let us not doubt that for one moment. We talk about increased productivity, more competitiveness and globalization. They do nothing to enhance those matters in any way.

The most serious impact is on the poorer provinces. When we look at the Atlantic provinces and the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, they are the ones that are the most hard hit. Those are the provinces in which parents hope their children will get the kind of education which will permit them to develop those provinces so that they can make their rightful and full contribution to Canada. Those are the provinces that will be adversely affected by these kinds of measures.

Let us look at the economies of these provinces.

[Translation]

The Atlantic provinces and especially the western provinces—in this case only Manitoba and Saskatchewan—have been hit very hard. In Manitoba, the Canadian Forces Base in Portage la Prairie was closed, all kinds of subsidies in the farm sector were cut, and I could go on. This is in addition to what these provinces have already experienced. I did not mention the Atlantic provinces, the fisheries, unemployment, and so on.

[English]

The impact of all these cuts is being felt, as I indicated, in the smaller provinces, the poorer provinces and in the whole of Canada.

We have to remember that some of these cash payments will dry up by 1996. That is very important to remember, because come 1996 there will not be any more cash on the table for some of the provinces. We have to remember that a Canadian labour market survey has indicated that most businesses, roughly 80 per cent, believe that the single most important factor to increasing competitiveness is better training and retraining, in other words, more and better education. We have to remember that many of the policies this government has pursued have not been conducive to that, not only because there has been less money but because there have been the compounding factors of the recession: in abundance high unemployment, poverty, social assistance.

In 1985 total education and training expenditures were 7.3 per cent of our total spending. In 1991 it was 6.4 per cent. That is a dramatic drop, extremely acute.

We also have to remember that it is in the context of enrolment being at an all-time high. We have our resources on the one hand which are being pushed down, squeezed and reduced and then we have our student enrolment on the other hand which is increasing.

Between 1985 and 1989 the growth rate in education spending was 2.3 per cent compared to inflation at 4.2 per cent. There again is a dramatic statement with respect to how those expenditures have been compressed.

These are statistics from Statistics Canada. I do not want anyone to get the impression that I have made them up in order to try to impress people.

Another interesting statistic is education and training as a percentage of GDP. It declined from 1.3 per cent in 1986–87 to 1.1 per cent in 1988–89. This is another dramatic reduction. Between 1986–87 and 1988–89 Canada's real GDP increased by 15.4 per cent. Over the same period of time while we had this increase of over 15 per cent, our operating grants to universities increased only by 1.1 per cent in real terms. Yet the number of students attending universities increased by 7.5 per cent.

Let us look at this. We have growth of 15 per cent. We have real increases to universities by 1.1 per cent and student growth at over 7 per cent.

I want to quote something that you will find very interesting, Mr. Speaker, as will other members in this House and those who are watching us. When the Prime Minister was the Leader of the Opposition he said:

> We are committed to sustaining the current federal financial commitment, according to the formula set out in the 1977 agreement. We believe that financing post-secondary education is an important priority for both levels of government.

That is what the Prime Minister said, and I have outlined what has happened since then.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, speaking in the House in 1982, roughly 10 years ago when he was in opposition, said that EPF, Established Programs Financing, moneys and tax points that are transferred for health and education "could have disastrous effects" because there were reductions then "on the universities and colleges, on hospital funding and on the operation of hospitals". He continued:

> Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments: Let us solve these problems not on the backs of the hospitals and universities; let us solve these problems outside that arena.

That is what the Prime Minister and the former Finance Minister had to say.

I regret that my time is coming close to the end because I had so many more things I would have liked to have said that I know Canadians would have been interested in finding out about. But perhaps I will have an opportunity to do that in the near future.

Our concern is that there are some positive steps in this bill and there are a number of technical improvements, but I think it masks the major problem, which we are not talking about.

I want to terminate with perhaps one observation. Why is this being extended for two years? People are saying: " Because we are rediscussing that it is being reviewed". That is a possibility, but looking at the government's record for sharing openly, I have to wonder if there are not other reasons. Is it because cash is going to run out then, or are there other particular concerns?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the impact of this bill is considerable. Although it has a number of very positive aspects, it raises a number of questions, because as you know, there has been a very severe cutback in transfers of funds to Canada's colleges and universities.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, this is an odd little bill. It does not really do anything very much, but in failing to do anything very much it does very little in a variety of areas.

It touches on the equalization program and in so doing, more or less renews that program for a period of further negotiation. It makes a minor change to the Established Programs Financing program, basically for the purpose of preventing the equalization payment ceiling from cutting EPF payments. A more bizarre concept it is difficult to imagine, but that could be the case as the legislation is now crafted. As well, the bill sets the groundwork for harmonization of provincial sales taxes with the goods and services tax.

It is a very broad brush the government is using in this bill and very thin paint indeed.

For the reason alone that the bill seeks to create a regime that would allow for harmonization of provincial sales taxes with the goods and services tax, our caucus will be opposing the bill. We are irrevocably opposed to the goods and services tax and see no reason that we should support moves which would make its imposition on Canadians that much easier. Our goal, in fact, is to remove the GST, to destroy it, to replace it with a fairer taxation system based on progressive income tax and not regressive excise taxes.

However, in saying that, I should note that this is not the only move this government has undertaken in an attempt to compel provincial governments to adopt its taxation regime, to come into the tent.

[Editor's Note: Power interruption.]

When the federal government alters the income tax system in such a way as to make it less progressive, more regressive so as to reduce the burden on those who can most afford it and increase the burden on those who can least afford it, those changes automatically carry over to the provincial taxation systems that are reliant on the federal income tax system.

Now what does this mean? Over time it means that the revenues which provincial governments need to come up with, their contributions to schooling, health care, education, transportation, the host of revenues needed for the of services that provincial governments supply, are cut back, just as they are cut back federally because of the alterations in the federal income tax system that have starved that system more and more over the last 20 years. For example, the tax breaks to corporations that have resulted in a circumstance where now corporations pay roughly 15 per cent of the total of income taxes collected in Canada, whereas 20 years ago they paid between 30 and 40 per cent on average.

What this has done is that it has starved provincial governments for necessary funds because they are reliant on the federal taxation system to generate those funds. This has meant that increasingly they have had to rely on other sources of revenue to meet their commitments in education, health care and social services and the broad range of services they provide.

Yet what has been happening simultaneously is that the sources of income for those programs, the federal transfer payments, have been severely restrained too. What this has meant over time is that more and more fiscal pressure has been devolved from the federal government on to the provincial governments.

They have lacked the fiscal resources with which to address those new pressures and thus, have had three choices. In the first instance, they could raise their own taxes. It is assumed by the current federal government that will be the avenue chosen, and it is preparing for this harmonization of the GST. It thinks that having put enough pressure on provincial governments, it has left them no choice but to hop on board the GST cash cow.

There are two other alternatives available to provincial governments. They can in turn devolve that fiscal burden on to their municipalities. This is precisely what has been happening in Alberta and I believe has been happening elsewhere.

They can simply reduce services. This too has been happening across the country, such that everywhere in this country the education system now is not what it was 20 years ago. Everywhere in this country there are line-ups for hospital beds that would have been unthinkable 20 years ago. Everywhere in this country there is poverty that would have been unthinkable 20 years ago.

An hon. member: It is because of the unions.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I just heard an hon. member across the way say it is because of the unions. How this kind of bizarre, twisted thinking could be held by an adult eludes me. The remarkable and appalling fact of the matter is that it is precisely this kind of thinking that seems to animate the legislation we repeatedly get from that side of the House.

I would just note that having created this fiscal crisis for provincial governments, the federal government now seeks to use the vehicle of harmonization with the GST to force provincial governments into that harmonization, thereby legitimizing further this wholly illegitimate tax. And do you know what? It may work. God knows there are provincial governments out there that are in terrible fiscal shape, that desperately need whatever sources of revenue they can cobble together with which to attempt to continue to provide Canadians in their jurisdictions with the services that Canadians ought, by right, to be able to expect.

So, yes, Mr. Speaker, it may work. But it will not work for long. One way or another there will be an election in this country within the next 18 months. Either the government itself will go to the people or it will be forced to by constitutional deadlines. When that happens, this government will be defeated. The only question is what will replace it?

I can say this, if the government currently in place is replaced by a New Democratic government, the GST will be gone. As well, the trade deal will be gone. A number of truly regressive and reactionary measures will be gone, but they will be replaced in this instance by a taxation system which will be such that we will no longer have to worry about ceilings on established programs funding. We will no longer have to worry about harmonization of provincial and federal sales taxes because we will have returned to a system of progressive income tax based on ability to pay.

An hon. member: What a statement.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not usually have the experience of literally bringing the House down, but I fear it may yet happen. That will be a most happy day for Canadians. With those words I will leave you to deal with these problems.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply want to point out to hon. members that we have had a power failure and are now running on a generator until everything gets back to normal, hopefully as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. This bill has several components and I will just point to two.

The first one is simply an extension of the equalization and transfer payment system for another two years. I would like to say that in general this type of legislation continues for five years. Therefore, I ask why this government at this time is only renewing it for two years. Would it create a situation of difficult planning? I think this is again another tactic by this government to keep provinces hostage to federal-provincial relations.

The second component of this bill relates to the creation or changing the base year for the ceiling provision. The base year being used at the moment is 1987-88. The proposed legislation, Bill C-60, would make 1992-93 as the new base ceiling, thus creating a situation where there would be no ceiling for this year if this legislation is passed.

What the substance of this bill about transfer payments and equalization. Equalization as a concept for Canadians was developed at the time of Confederation so that those who had less would be helped by those who had more.

• (1050)

What do we see today? Large numbers of homeless people wander the streets of major Canadian cities. That is what the editorial by Duncan Cameron says in the Canadian Forum. It is true. And what did this government do with the budget in February? It cut the program for co-op housing, trying to remove the choices from those who come from the poor sector of our society, those with low income. They will have no choice; they will have no shelter over their heads.

Where is the heart of this government? Where is the heart of this government insofar as it plays a leadership role in trying to equalize the wealth across the country so that Canadians will have a decent standard of living for all, not only reserved for a few.

This government has had a crusade and that is the deficit crusade. But it has forgotten to take into account that there is another more important crusade and that is about children.

Has this government introduced a program to fight child poverty? No, it has not. In my province of Manitoba, 22 per cent of all children are poor. How can a so-called country of plenty tolerate a province having 22 per cent of all children suffering in poverty? There is no program.

There is the so-called child benefit package program that is supposed to improve the welfare of the poor, this package itself is not indexed to inflation. So over a period of perhaps six or seven years, the benefit will disappear. I really think that the package is an election gimmick. It is to start in 1993, just about three months before the proposed election that the Prime Minister said a few months ago would take place. There is no sense of equalization in this country. So any legislation introduced along this line by this government becomes suspect as to its intent.

In fact, since this government took power, federal spending represents now about only 16 per cent of the gross domestic product and by 1995-96 will fall to 14.5 per cent. No wonder we do not have a sense of national purpose in this country any more. And the government tries to introduce this bill in an attempt to camouflage its intent.

About transfer payments, one of the major institutions that will suffer will be our medical system. Now this government has continued to say that Canada cannot afford costly health services. This is the Conservative myth for the truth is quite different.

Canada's expenditure on health care as a proportion of the national economy, the public sector spending from 1978 to 1987 has risen only from 5.5 per cent to 6.5 per cent of the gross domestic product. Since 1982, expenditures have been steady at between 6.3 per cent and 6.6 per cent of the gross domestic product. So forget about the Conservative need. In fact, I should point out that Canadians spend in total about 40 per cent less per capita in real dollars for health care than Americans do and our country has a better health care system.

So do not let this government destroy that medical system with its transfer payments. It is predicted by the year 1996 there will be no medicare for Quebec. Perhaps by year 2003 or 2005 there will be none for the whole country and we cannot allow that to happen.

As a consequence of this debate there has been discussion about user fees. In Winnipeg, in the Tory riding of one of the members on the government side, user fees for medicare have been proposed, that patients be billed extra by institutions. It was also proposed at the Tory convention held in Toronto.

Let me say that to date the World Health Organization has said that user fees are not the answer in reforming our health care system. In fact, Canadian studies spanning 20 years consistently report that user fees are a deterrent to accessing health care services. It would be the poor and the elderly living on low incomes who are deterred from accessing medical care should user fees be imposed.

There is a challenge for us to reform the health care system. To date there has been block funding for health care contributions and post-secondary education contributions. On examining this concept I think this was an accident when it was first conceived as legislation. Today there are national standards for national health care but there are no national standards for education.

I ask whether it is better to consider that we split the funding for post-secondary education and for health but reserve the cost transfers for health so that we will be able to maintain the national standards of universality, portability, comprehensiveness, accessibility and public non-profit administration.

This government instead of going with many, many bills, is not addressing the real issue of today insofar as transfer payments to the provinces are concerned. That is giving appropriate transfer payments to the provinces so there will be no cry from them, so that they will not have the cutbacks on hospital beds, the increasing waiting lists for necessary surgery.

On that note I would just like to say that unless this government develops the creativity and the will that it will preserve medicare and contributions for post-secondary education, it will be a sad day when these two systems are destroyed.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I too am delighted to participate in this debate today on Bill C-60. I realize I only have a couple of minutes before Question Period. After Question Period I will be continuing with my remarks on Bill C-60, which is legislation to deal with federal-provincial tax arrangements as well as health and education transfers.

It is health and education transfers that I want to talk about today. Those are two areas that mean a lot to the people in my riding. I am sure health and education are extremely important in every riding of this country.

Since 1986, this government has reduced the growth in health and education transfers. The EPF, Established Programs Financing, was to grow by the rate of the GNP, the growth in the economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being eleven o'clock a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is extremely encouraging to most Canadians today when we reflect upon the powerful statement of support for Canadian unity which Premier Bourassa made in Quebec's National Assembly yesterday.

He has placed himself clearly and firmly in favour of one united Canada. By this expression he has demonstrated impressive leadership which renews the confidence of all who pursue this common vision and mission of one Canada.

Let us now continue to move forward as a nation to resolve our constitutional discord with understanding, compassion and common sense. There is new momentum to keep Canada whole; there is new commitment to attain that goal in all corners of our country.

• (1100)

Bravo, Mr. Bourassa, and my congratulations to you and to all your fellow Quebecers.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, every year the Department of Fisheries and Oceans turns on the power and other services and starts dredging small craft harbour facilities on April 1.

This year because of the freeze on non-essential spending, fishermen are concerned that these services will not be provided until the money manages to filter down to the regional office in Charlottetown.

Fishermen spend a great deal of time on the wharfs in spring getting ready for the lobster fishery in early May. Any delays in providing services could mean delays for fishermen in a very competitive fishery.

I urge the government to turn on all services at the wharfs and provide all necessary dredging immediately to allow fishermen to make a proper start to the fishing season.

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Finance says that a 1 per cent increase in short-term interest rates increases the federal deficit by $4 billion. Canadian interest rates are 3 percentage points higher than U.S. interest rates. If the difference between the Canadian and U.S. interest rates was reduced to one-half a percentage point as it was during the 1970s, we could cut our deficit by $10 billion annually, or alternatively use the savings to institute a municipal public works program for much-needed infrastructure such as transit roads and sewers, thus recognizing, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, "the important contribution that adequate infrastructure makes to our competitive position, while at the same time creating jobs in a fiscally responsible manner".

RACISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Tomorrow is the international day for the elimination of racism. It is a day to acknowledge the work of many Canadians who believe in justice and a time to renew our commitment to ridding our society of inequalities.

Unfortunately, this government has clearly shown its lack of commitment to the elimination of racism and discrimination by the indefinite deferral of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, which includes $12 million of the Japanese-Canadian redress settlement, inaction in redressing past injustices of the Chinese head tax, and the internment of Ukrainians, Germans and Italian Canadians, and the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

Canadian unity requires equal opportunities for all Canadians, which can be achieved by eliminating racism and discrimination.

Pauline Pellie, an aboriginal elder, told the recent Aboriginal Conference: "We want to be heard, to be respected, to be equal". This is what all minorities in Canada want.

KIDNEY MONTH

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to express my appreciation and sincere good wishes to the Kidney Foundation of Canada on the occasion of Kidney Month for 1992.

The Kidney Foundation of Canada enables Canadians affected with kidney disease and related disorders access to information on prevention, diagnosis, treatment and specialized services. In addition, the Kidney Foundation, with the help of thousands of donors, raises significant sums of money which go toward research, patient services and public education programs.

The Kidney Foundation of Canada urges all Canadians to sign a donor card or the consent portion of their driver's licence if they have not already done so.

I invite all Canadians to join in saluting the Kidney Foundation of Canada and wishing it continued success in its important work of promoting public awareness of kidney disease, supporting excellent research and in encouraging donor donations.

IRANIAN NEW YEAR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, March 21, our first day of spring, is celebrated by Iranians throughout the world as new year's day, or Nowruz. Nowruz, which literally means "new day" is a secular observance of the start of the Persian calendar, the arrival of spring and the renewal of life on earth.

Nowruz festivities have taken place for over 2,500 years, making them one of the oldest observances of nature by humankind.

Iran, formerly Persia, is one of the most ancient civilizations on earth, with so much to offer modern societies. Our own national mosaic has been richly enhanced by those of Iranian descent who have chosen Canada as their home and contributed so much to our way of life.

I wish happy Nowruz to all Canadians of Iranian heritage and thank them for bringing their rich culture and Nowruz to all Canadians.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I asked my constituents how I should vote in the House of Commons.

In response, Rick Mitchell of Campbellville writes me: "Please do not be afraid to break party lines to vote on policy legislation according to what your constituents want. You cannot please all your constituents but you will win their respect by representing us".

Phil Moddle of Acton adds this: "I sympathize with your concerns about effectively representing a diverse group of people and opinions. However, never forget that the vocal minority are only a minor part of your constituency. The other 90 per cent silent majority needs you to do what is right in your heart as only you can properly assess the impact of these decisions. Issues such as referenda, MP recalls and so on bother me because they simply indicate that people do not understand what a Parliamentary democracy is".

I thank my constituents for their advice and understanding.

CHALLENGE '92

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, this morning's announcement of the Challenge '92 budget by the Minister of State for Youth proves once again that the government is a master at playing shell games with Canada's future. This morning's statement in no way reverses the irresponsible trend set by this government.

Since 1985, 41,000 summer jobs for young people have disappeared as a result of this government's cuts to the SEED budget. Last month, of the 32,000 full-time jobs that Canada lost, 22,000 were held by young people. In 1990, 726,000 students had to work while they studied in order to afford rising tuition fees, lab fees and higher living expenses.

These depressing statistics are only a small sample from a very long list. Students are the architects of Canada's future prosperity and this government's short-sighted outlook is robbing them and our nation of a promising future.

I urge the minister to review his commitment to the youth of this nation and restore funding to an acceptable and responsible level.

CUSTOM COMBINERS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon–Souris): Mr. Speaker, for decades Canadian and American custom combiners have crossed the Canadian–American border to assist with the harvest in each other's country. This practice provides an important employment opportunity for combine owners and crew. In addition, it is a vitally important service to farmers who require such help during the crucial harvest season.

Unfortunately, Canadian custom combiners and their employees entering the United States have been and are being subjected to more restrictive regulations and red tape than has been and is the case with their American counterparts entering Canada. In fact, some Canadian custom combine operators have believed for several years that they are being unduly harassed. As a result, they are frustrated and angry.

Our custom combine operators do not seek revenge. They do not ask that access into Canada be made more difficult for their American neighbours. They ask only that the rules regulating their entry into the United States and their activities there be as fair and just as those which the Government of Canada places on their American counterparts entering and working in our country.

Surely this request is both a reasonable and a just one.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, Revenue Canada has a paid informant program that is out of control.

Since the Conservatives took office in 1984, informants received $836,078 in cash payments, averaging $2,900 each. Revenue Canada claims it does not know the actual number of informants nor does it know the citizenship of the informants. It has advised me in writing that in at least 30 cases, payments have been made to non-residents of Canada. This creates an interesting situation where Canada's tax man is paying informants with hard-earned Canadian tax dollars and the informants pay no income tax. This program is so popular that the Minister of National Revenue has more than doubled his payouts since last year.

Despite a written denial tabled in the House on Wednesday, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans also has a special cash fund for paying informants. Since 1984, when the Tories came to office, The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has handed out cash to informants in amounts ranging from $50 to $2,000. These secret budget items are hidden in the operations and maintenance accounts and like the business write offs for escort services, reveal the real Tory morality.

HIGH SPEED TRAINS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the transport committee's latest report on high speed trains and the feasibility study that is now being done for the Quebec City-Windsor corridor—1,215 kilometres long—where about half the country's population is concentrated. This corridor would be much longer than existing high speed railway corridors in Europe.

• (1110)

In addition to the many industrial benefits, the socio-economic advantages, and the potential for exports, setting up a high-speed railway line could very well make Canada a centre of excellence for high speed railway transportation.

Mr. Speaker, building a high speed line, at an estimated cost of five to eight billion dollars, will represent the biggest private investment this country has ever known. This genuine revolution in transportation could generate the construction of 23 corridors in North America, with economic spin-offs and investments totalling $200 billion.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, once again the government has shown that profits and trade are more important than protecting the environment and the health of children. In refusing to ban the export of tetraethyl lead, the Minister of the Environment has said it is all right for Canadians to manufacture and export products that will lead to irreversible intelligence loss, memory loss, behavioural problems and nervous system damage in children in Third World countries.

These are the victims of a decision on behalf of Canada to continue exporting tetraethyl lead, but the minister says: "Oh, that's all right, we are going to tell them it is banned in Canada, that we are protecting our children and poisoning their children". That does not make it all right.

The minister has the power to ban the export of tetraethyl lead and end this environmental racism and I ask him to do so. I ask him to table the reports on which this shameful decision was made. I ask the Minister for International Trade, in particular, to assure Canadians that we are not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN TOUR

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Shawville, Quebec are organizing a "Proud to be Canadian Tour" on Saturday, March 28 next, that will consist of various endeavours which will seek to heighten our awareness as Canadians of the very privileged status we enjoy as a democratic and prosperous country.

These different endeavours are scheduled to coincide with Canada's 125th anniversary and consist of activities that will nurture a lifelong relationship with our heritage and flag, encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

I would like to thank the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Shawville, Quebec for their most worthy efforts to bring us all closer together today and in the future.

CANADIAN AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the long disgraceful process of destroying the Canadian airline industry and turning it over to the Americans is reaching its climax.

First there was deregulation by Liberals and Conservatives. Then the Conservatives kept the ball rolling with the privatization of Air Canada. Now the last barriers to Americanization are being removed.

American Airlines, in return for buying no more than 25 per cent of Canadian Airlines' equity, will assume effective control. The reservation system and Pacific Rim schedules will quickly be tucked in American Airlines' back pocket. All that will remain will be rationalization of the North American schedules, including domestic Canadian flights.

Thousands will lose their jobs and Canadian Airlines International will exist in name only. Then it will be Air Canada's turn. Spurned by Canadian Airlines, Air Canada will have to seek an American suitor too and that will complete the destruction of the Canadian airline industry, once one of the finest in the world.

Another stunning triumph for the Liberal-Tory wrecking crew.

RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the last few weeks I have received petitions from over 1,500 constituents who are concerned about the use of improper language on radio and television.

I believe, as do many other Canadians, that Parliament has a responsibility to ensure that the CRTC, the Canadian Radio and Television Commission, carefully regulates the use of foul language in radio and television programming.

Many of my constituents believe that the efforts by parents to discourage the use of foul language should not be undermined by the radio and television networks, especially those funded by the Crown.

My constituents have asked me to call upon Parliament to ensure that the CRTC is vigilant in enforcing strict rules of conduct insofar as the use of inappropriate language on radio and television are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could have the attention of the House for a moment. There have been some electronic difficulties and, as a consequence, the microphones are not working in the aisle which is headed by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Windsor West.

I am sure that hon. members would have some relevant suggestions to make to the Speaker concerning this, but in the interest of proceeding effectively with Question Period, if it is necessary for any of those members to speak, the microphones on each side of them are working. If that is not sufficient, the members can change their seats with other members.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to assure the House and the public that the interventions of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and myself did not cause this power failure, no matter how vigorous they may have been.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade claimed that a new GATT agreement would facilitate free trade negotiations between Canada, Mexico and the United States. Does this statement mean that the government changed its position and that it will not sign an agreement with the United States and Mexico before we can renew the GATT agreements?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have made it very clear that the priority of the Government of Canada in trade negotiations is the Uruguay round.

We are at the same time negotiating with the Mexicans and the Americans on a North American free trade agreement. Both of those can go forward. One does not have to go forward ahead of the other.

The comment that I have made, though, is that with certain elements agreed upon in the Uruguay round, the multilateral negotiation, it removes those matters from the table for the Mexican negotiations and therefore would make the North American free trade negotiations easier to conclude.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a report today in the Financial Post that the office of the U.S. trade representative is establishing a Canada watch committee. It sounds to me like a trade CIA. According to the report, one of the first things the committee is planning to do is to launch a public relations campaign to try to convince Canadians that the free trade agreement is working for them.

Is the minister aware of the new American PR committee, and does he think that it is the proper thing for the Americans to do at this time?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. friend should be welcoming this sort of interest on the part of the U.S. trade representative. I think he and we, from time to time, have some criticisms to direct toward the Americans on their conduct of the trade relationship between Canada and the United States.

If this signals a concern on the part of the U.S. trade representative about the state of the relationship between Canada and the United States in the area of trade, then that certainly can be welcomed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have to disagree with the minister because it is very unusual for a government to come and make propaganda on another level or in other nations. This is not just a bunch of small level functionaries, as the Prime Minister would say, but this is an office under the leadership of Carla Hills and she is a member of the Bush administration.

So now that big business in Canada is no longer willing to put up money to defend the free trade agreement, does the minister find it normal at this moment that the American government will have to pay to come to tell Canadians that what is good for America is necessarily good for Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that my hon. friend should be jumping to these sorts of conclusions.

We make our views known in the United States. We have advertisements in the United States. We have literature that we distribute to people who have interests in U.S.–Canada trade relationships so that they are aware of our views. If the Americans decide this is something they would like to do, that is part of a better understanding of the relationship.

If the Americans were going to put forward views that we fundamentally disagreed with and we felt that they were distorting the understanding of the picture, you can be absolutely sure that we would be speaking out very strongly both here in Canada as well as in the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. On the eve of a North American free trade agreement, Canada is simply not doing enough to build its industrial base.

In order to get us ready for this agreement, what concrete initiatives will the government take to adapt our industrial structure and modernize our economic base?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me put things in perspective.

We have some $2 billion to $2.5 billion of two-way trade with Mexico and we have some $250 billion worth of trade between Canada and the United States. There is a fundamentally different order of magnitude in the trade among the three countries.

My hon. friend asks what we are doing to prepare Canadian business. One of the things that we have done is to launch the prosperity initiative which is a broad dialogue both with Canadians in general as well as with 31 industry sectors where we are seeking to have an in-depth dialogue with them on the things that are necessary for these industries to compete on a world-wide basis.

These discussions I can tell my hon. friend have been very forthcoming, very productive. There will be reports that he will be able to review sometime within the next few months.

There will be an action plan announced by the steering group sometime in the early fall that will set out what all Canadians should be doing, what the federal government, what other levels of government, what management, what labour, what educators, what scientists, what Canadians as a whole can be doing to respond to the global challenges in economic policy and in the actions that they can individually take.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

I wonder if the minister lives in this century if he does not know now what we should be doing. In terms of wages, workplace safety, and the enforcement of environmental standards Mexico lags far behind Canada.

In terms of manufacturing capacity however, that country is moving up the curve at an incredible rate. Make no mistake. Mexico is going to be the base for a massive thrust into North America on behalf of the Asians and on behalf of the Europeans. We need more than empty words and studies and lowered inflation rates to meet this kind of competition.

The question is, beyond the talk and empty studies that are simply confirming what every person in this country really knows, what is the government actually doing to gear the country up for the real world that lies ahead?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend was in the private sector and he knows that governments cannot ensure that companies are productive and competitive. It is up to the management and the workers in those companies to do the things that must be done to ensure their competitive position.

I can tell from the look on my hon. friend's face that he agrees with me.

In addition to what I have just said one of the key elements that we are trying to espouse and to encourage in the work that we are doing in these industry studies is the adoption of things such as total quality management. My friend is also very much aware of the impact of total quality management on the productivity and the effectiveness of a company because of studies that have shown that the companies which accept total quality management can improve their productivity by 20 per cent.

This is one of our objectives in the prosperity initiative.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I too want to address a question to the Minister of International Trade. We have just heard him reject the de Grandpré report which was asked for by this government to keep a promise by the Prime Minister that there would be the best adjustment programs by the government anywhere in the world.

Now we have heard them deny that.

My question is for the minister concerning the proposed North American free trade agreement with the United States, Canada and Mexico.

Despite the secrecy required by the Canadian government for information, the Mexican Senate has had open access with the ability to discuss the details.

I want to quote from a letter I have from a Mexican senator relative to article 402: "Article 402 refers to the extent of obligations, i.e., no goods shall be discriminated against by states or provinces of another country under the argument of state sovereignty especially in the United States and Canada".

I want to ask the minister: Does he agree with article 402 which would prohibit a province through its provincial government to do some preferential buying of its own products here in Canada and at its own budget expenditures?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, possibly the hon. member might give me the benefit of that letter, rather than just dropping it on me in the House this morning. Since he has read from it, he should be tabling that letter in the House of Commons.

My hon. friend has also, in the preamble to his question, said that I just rejected the de Grandpré report. It is that sort of distortion—

Mr. Barrett: You said it was a business responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister may wish to complete his answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, what I wanted to say is that we accepted a large part of the de Grandpré report contrary to the distortion of my hon. friend.

One of the primary considerations and primary recommendations of the de Grandpré report was to increase the amount of training that we do for Canadians who are between jobs. That was precisely the purpose of Bill C-21 in the last session. It increased the amount of training moneys by some $750 million.

I would expect that my hon. friend would take back the ill-advised remark that he just made.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, since I cannot enter into debate on the previous answer, I will just say that we certainly have a difference of opinion.

I want to refer again to this letter which I will table. By the way, I understand that the minister has been requested to table the letter he referred to yesterday from Senator Gephardt and I hope that the minister will table that in the House today.

In this letter from the senator to me, which I will table in this House and have made public over the last two weeks, there is detailed discussion sector by sector of the draft bracketed treaty. I refer specifically to article 402, and if the minister is not familiar with article 402, of course, he can refer to this document.

In general, is it correct that the agreement will have a clause that says: "No goods shall be discriminated against by states or provinces of another country under the argument of state sovereignty, especially in the United States and Canada". Would that agreement signed under this wording prohibit a province from doing preferential buying in its own province with its own budget?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to a quote that I made in the House yesterday.

I might say that this quote is in a publication called U.S.-Mexico Free Trade Reporter. I would be happy to table this excerpt. But I might go on to say that Hills has classified the U.S. negotiating position as secret and congressional staff members must have security clearance to view the documents. That is counter to what my hon. friend has been saying, but I would be happy to table this document.

My hon. friend has been putting two questions to me on very specific items of the negotiations. What I was saying in the House yesterday was that there was an opportunity to do that in committee, which my hon. friend did not take advantage of.

He was braying like the donkey I was referring to yesterday and trying to make some political points. He did not take the opportunity to ask some specific questions on what the free trade agreement would entail or not. I would invite my friend to come to the committee meeting and engage in that sort of discussion or possibly, if he could get over his political hurdles, to come to the briefings from officials that we had yesterday afternoon.

• (1130)

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I have a document from a Mexican senator and what I have asked for is the same privileges that a Mexican senator has had to quote specifically from the article, specifically write letters about the draft bracketed agreement.

Why can members of Parliament not have the same access and the same rights that Mexican senators have been given about this specific agreement? Why not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Mexican senators have seen a copy of the Mexican text. They have not seen a copy of the Canadian text and they have not seen a copy of the American text. The briefings that they have been getting are based on the Mexican text.

The Mexican government has certain objectives in a free trade agreement. We have certain objectives as well.

I invite my hon. friend to come to the briefings and receive the—

Mr. Barrett: I want the same access the Mexicans have.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to make myself heard over the braying of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor West.

BANK OF CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance. This week we learned from the annual report of the Bank of Canada that average salaries at the bank rose 6.6 per cent in 1991. This was almost double the average wage growth and a full 1 per cent higher than the average rate of inflation last year.

Why did the government agree to a salary increase at the bank much higher than it allowed its own public servants and almost double the national average for Canadians? Why this "do as I say, not as I do" approach when it comes to wage increases at the Bank of Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, in 1990 the board of directors, which runs the affairs of the Bank of Canada, under the Bank of Canada Act approved a salary scale increase of 4.75 per cent for the year 1991. Because it began on January 1, 1991 it was before the government brought in its restraint program.

I think more importantly, for the year beginning January 1, 1992, the bank's board approved a package which included no increase in the basic wage rates or salary ranges and a freeze of senior managers' salaries. This is their zero year at the bank.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my figures come from the 1991 report for a time when the Governor and the Government of Canada were lecturing Canadians about wage restraint. The government owns the bank. The deputy minister of finance of this government sits on the executive committee of the bank's board of directors.

How can the government and the bank expect to be taken seriously by Canadians when they talk about wage restraint under these circumstances and in the face of the plain figures in the government's own report from the Bank of Canada for 1991?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The article overstates the increases because of the downsizing at the Bank of Canada. The increase is 4.75 per cent for the year 1991.

For 1992, the increase is zero. This is their zero year. They are abiding by the wishes of the government at the Bank of Canada.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of National Revenue. As the minister will know, a former employee of his department, Mr. Ted Reid, informs us that in 1986 Revenue Canada issued a memo permitting businesses to keep over-collections of the federal sales tax, thereby short-changing taxpayers of Canada by some $100 million.

I want to ask the government: when did it discover this issue? What measures has it taken to preserve the integrity of our tax system in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised some time ago in the House of Commons, I believe it was about a year ago. At that time the Minister of National Revenue made a statement on behalf of the government.

The matter has been raised subsequently by the Revenue Canada employee referred to in my hon. friend's question. The matter has been a subject of considerable analysis and examination since then because of the nature of the complaint. Subsequently the complaint was brought forward by the former Revenue Canada employee and it is now, at the Revenue Canada employee's request, before a Manitoba court. Under the circumstances, I think it would be inappropriate for me to comment further.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, is it not ironic that Canadians are being gouged by the GST while others are pocketing $100 million of taxpayers' money?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. How will he explain to Canadian taxpayers, to ordinary people who are being bled white by the GST, that 100 million of their tax dollars were given in that fashion? How can the government justify such action?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is a fair individual. I expect that he would withhold drawing certain conclusions, as he has just done, until this matter has been heard.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question on the same topic is for the same minister. This ruling was made in 1986. In 1988 when he was Minister of Finance he wrote a letter to one of his own constituents and in the letter he said: "An adjustment now would thus constitute a windfall gain to the firm unless it was passed back to customers in the form of price reduction".

The government has been aware of this loophole since 1986. It did not act to close it. It did not act to inform small business and consumers. Why, when such a significant change was made, which increased tax refunds to corporations to the level of $150 million, was it not gazetted? Why was that not sent out to all small businesses and consumers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the matter that my hon. friend has raised in response to a question from the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I have stated that at this time it is in appropriate to go further than what I have just said.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is a civil suit in Manitoba. I asked a question not about the court case, but why this government, knowing that it had made a very significant change for which forms are out there now with former civil servants, making sure that corporations get this money from the federal government with no responsibility to make sure that small businesses and consumers that were over-charged receive the money in the end. Why did the government, knowing what was happening—and it has known for five years—not inform the public? Why is the rip-off occurring? Why is the customer who overpaid in the first place not getting the money?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have responded to that question.

AIR DISASTER

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the FAA of the United States has told me that it is continually investigating new information as it comes to light regarding the Arrow air disaster in Newfoundland, Canada's worst air disaster on Canadian soil.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport, is the government aware of these ongoing investigations by the FAA and in particular, of a criminal investigation ongoing?

Does the government not feel ashamed that it refused to reopen the case, even after Judge Willard Estey, who was not allowed to look at any new evidence, concluded that the findings of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board were completely erroneous? Does the government not feel ashamed that it is now leaving it to the FAA in the United States to find the real cause of Canada's worst air disaster on Canadian soil?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we would be ashamed if this had been the conclusion of Justice Willard Estey. After the Canadian Aviation Safety Board of the day completed its investigation in 1985–86 of this very unfortunate accident of December 1985, because of the inconclusive results of the investigation by the CASB, we asked Justice Willard Estey to look into it. His conclusion was that no further investigation was warranted.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, he concluded that the real cause was not what the Canadian Aviation Safety Board said it was.

On Wednesday, I spoke on the telephone to one of the chief criminal investigators in the security division of the FAA in Washington. He had to go to a pay phone to feel safe talking to me. From that information, I then recited what was in a report on the administrator's desk in Washington on Monday, the number of pages and who signed it concerning this case. Only then did they admit to me that they have had a criminal investigation ongoing since January 1991.

I will give the minister the name and the telephone number of the chief investigator if he wants to know it. Will the Government of Canada now reopen this case and demand to be full partners in the investigations that are ongoing with the FAA, and this time to demand that the U.S. military and the FBI and authorities in the United States and Canada, who have any knowledge of this subject, be forced to give full disclosure? The families of the 256 victims deserve to know why their loved ones died.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this person might have requested to go to a pay phone because of the member, if he was speaking to him in the same voice that he is now speaking.

The truth of the matter is that there have been all kinds of allegations since the conclusion of Justice Estey's report to the government. There are ongoing allegations and insinuations. There has been no new evidence brought forward, but if there is any new evidence, we will certainly examine it and then act accordingly.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs.

In his recent statement regarding resistance fighters, the Minister of Veterans Affairs stated he was planning to return war veterans allowance to its original purpose.

I would ask the government to assure the veterans of Canada that it was referring to resistance fighters only, that it was not announcing a plan by the back door that would cut veterans off the war veterans allowance when they reach 65 years of age?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, is out of the House of Commons on business. I can assure the hon. member that the goal of my colleague is to provide the best possible assistance to all war veterans.

He will certainly be sensitive to the concerns raised by the hon. member and will want to give reassurance to war veterans that everything that can be done by the government in order to support them properly and to recognize their important contribution to Canada will be done.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister.

I would ask, in that case, when members of this House might expect that legislation will be brought forward pertaining to war veterans allowance, legislation which will be necessary to implement the changes that the minister recently announced?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give my hon. friend a date today. My colleague, as I mentioned earlier, is out of the House today. I am sure that he will be in touch with my hon. friend early next week when he is back in Ottawa.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for small businesses.

In the February budget, measures were introduced to assist small businesses that are in financial trouble in the midst of this recession. I would like to ask the minister just what steps have been taken to make small business aware of how to request the provisions of that program and particularly what instructions or encouragement has he given to the banks and to chartered accountant firms to help to implement that program?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his very responsible question.

This is an important part of the budget provisions that affects small business, the Small Business Financing Program. It is recycling, in part, a program that existed before 1987. There is an interpretation bulletin out there, Interpretation Bulletin 507, I think it is, which I encourage people in the small business community to take with them to their banks.

I have spoken to the Canadian Bankers' Association about this. It has indicated that it will co-operate. I have just written to the CEOs of all major banks, plus the CEOs of the other financial institutions, to make them aware of this program and to get them sensitized to its importance. That has been done.

It is important to know, though, that the legislation necessary to support the program is in the drafting stage. Since this was part of the budget, the program is in force as of now from the date of the budget. I would encourage all small business people with financial problems to apply for this program if it suits them and I would encourage them to see their financial institutions to ascertain the necessary information.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the imposition of the U.S. penalty duty on value added to softwood lumber has forced many British Columbia wood manufacturers to consider moving their manufacturing facilities south of the border and to export rough beams or cants which will be liable to only one-third of the duty that would be imposed on remanufactured wood products.

This will dramatically reduce the number of jobs in the remanufacturing and secondary wood processing sector which was to be the promise for future jobs in the B.C. forestry industry. It will also reduce the availability of raw material for the B.C. remanufacturing sector.

What action does the minister of trade plan to take now to counteract the impact of the 14.5 per cent softwood duty on value added in order to prevent the export of B.C. softwood remanufacturing industry south of the 49th parallel?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the concern my hon. friend has expressed. It is something that I have discussed with the people who are wholesalers shipping into the United States as well as the remanufacturers. I fully sympathize with the concerns and the anger they have expressed in this matter.

We have discussed this and we are continuing to discuss this with the U.S. department of commerce and the U.S. trade representative in order to see whether there is a way that we can have some adjustments to the way the bonding is required, comparable to the way that this was done back in 1987.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister is aware of the urgency in this situation.

Soder Industries, a remanufacturing firm connected with International Forest Products, has already moved to the U.S. and other major firms have plans to follow.

I have a letter from Skagit County Economic Development Office in Washington state offering tax incentives, tax credits, and low interest loans to lure B.C. firms to move to Skagit county.

By the time the minister has finished his discussions or has gone to the free trade panel, a substantial part of that industry will already be south of the border.

What action will his government take immediately to fight U.S. subsidies and to ensure that wood remanufacturing jobs remain in British Columbia?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that we fully understand the urgency of the situation and are taking action right now in taking the matter to the U.S. administration in order to get a change in the way that this is proposed.

I would caution my friend, and through him his constituents or people taking precipitate action on this, to allow the process to unfold. I would hope we will be able to address his concern, which is not a concern limited to British Columbia but is in other parts of the country as well.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Bank of Canada rate dropped by 17 points and analysts are saying today that interest rates in general should continue to decline.

My question is for the minister answering for the Minister of Finance. The Bank of Canada rate is 7.65 per cent. Inflation is 1.6 per cent. Yet the chartered banks this week jacked the five-year mortgage rate up to 10.5 per cent, even when their own analysts are saying that rates should drop in the future.

Does the minister have any advice for the banks like: let's stop gouging consumers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out, the bank rates did drop 17 basis points yesterday. That is most encouraging. During the last few weeks we have seen some volatility in the marketplace. The banks and mortgage lending institutions have increased their rates somewhat.

However, we are encouraged at the drop in the bank rate yesterday, together with the good news of our exports being up 4.6 per cent in the month of January and the inflation rate today holding below 2 per cent. There is some very good news out there.

To answer specifically the question of my hon. friend, the mortgage lending rate business is a very competitive business. We have seen the Bank of Montreal leading the way in lowering rates and so on. I am sure that with the drop in the bank rate we will see further movement in the mortgage rates as well.

IRVING WHALE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The Irving Whale is a sunken oil barge off the north shore of Prince Edward Island that contains 3,100 tonnes of heating oil which is slowly leaking from the barge. This sunken barge is an environmental disaster waiting to happen. It has the potential to destroy our north shore fisheries, damage our beaches and threaten our tourist industry.

Will the minister advise the House what action the government has taken since we last asked this question in December 1990?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I was in Prince Edward Island a few weeks ago. I remember having discussed this matter with our officials at the time who are closely monitoring what is happening around the wreck of the Irving Whale.

If I remember correctly, there is a study being undertaken now to determine what is the best course of action. We have to be careful not to assume that there is a simple method by which we can extract this wreck and deal with the problem of its oil content. We would want to proceed carefully to make sure that whatever measure we contemplate would be as environmentally sound as possible, given the special circumstances we are dealing with.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, that study has not been undertaken. In February 1991 it was announced that a study would be undertaken to provide advice on how best to deal with the Irving Whale. That was over 13 months ago, and this study has not even begun.

How can the minister say with a straight face that his government is concerned about this issue? After 390 days a contract for this study has not even been tendered. What is he waiting for?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): As I have already indicated, Mr. Speaker, my information is to the effect that the government—and I think it is in co-operation with the Department of Transport, if my memory serves me correctly—monitors regularly and systematically the wreckage to ensure that we know what is going on.

I will be happy to look into this matter and to come back to the hon. member to see where we are at and to see whether we should not do anything specific to deal with this.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On Monday, 28 refugees will be deported to Lebanon after spending two and a half peaceful years in Montreal with their families. I want to ask the minister: how can the government deport refugees to Lebanon when for security reasons we have not yet reopened our embassy in that country, when war continues in south Lebanon, and when there is terrorism throughout the country?

I want to ask the minister if he will use his humanitarian discretion and stop these deportations immediately.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and members of the House should know that we do not make wholesale deportations of people to Lebanon or to any other place where there are difficulties.

Each case is looked at. There is a review on humanitarian and compassionate grounds for each case. This has happened and will happen in this case like any other.

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I visited those 28 refugees yesterday in Montreal, and their deportation is scheduled for Monday and Tuesday next week. As I mentioned, our embassy in that country is still closed. A war is still going on in southern Lebanon. How can the minister consider deporting those people? Where is Canada's humanitarian spirit?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the member is trying to tarnish Canada's reputation for dealing with refugees, but the people to whom he refers have gone through the refugee determination process. They are not refugees. They were not found to need Canada's protection and, in this case as in all others, the law will be applied.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, earlier in Question Period, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism indicated that he had been in touch with the banks urging them to co–operate in connection with the budget measures announced in relation to small business.

One month after the budget the banks are still saying that they have no knowledge of these programs and are not prepared to do anything about them. If that continues, is the minister prepared to use the facilities of the Federal Business Development Bank to put these measures in place because, as the minister knows, many of these small businesses are just barely hanging on by their fingernails?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, what we have done is that we have spoken to the Canadian Bankers' Association intensively to make sure that we have the best possible designed program for the SBF program. It has some suggestions for improving it. That is what we are going to incorporate into the circular which we will have out shortly.

We are communicating this and within 10 days time the member will have the new circular. In the meantime he should know that he can use Interpretation Bulletin 507 from the 1987 program, take those to the bank managers, and get work under way.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Yesterday Canada's environment ministers endorsed the federal commitment to stabilize Canada's contribution to global warming by the year 2000 at 1990 levels. Would the minister tell this House what base line figure the ministers used yesterday as the actual 1990 CO_2 emissions for Canada?

Is it the National Energy Board figure of 517 megatonnes? Is it the Energy, Mines and Resources figure of 508 megatonnes, or is it the Canadian Council of Environment Ministers at 467 megatonnes?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that as a result of work done with provincial ministers of environment, with territorial ministers of environment, and with my colleague, the Minister of State for the Environment, there was an endorsement yesterday of this important goal, contrary to what seemed to be the general thrust of the statement made by the minister of energy in Ontario. There was also an endorsement in recognition of the fact that some work had been done with departments of energy throughout Canada in dealing with this issue.

We are going to concentrate on three areas essentially: first, by identifying specific actions; second, by anticipating and preparing for potential changes that climate change may bring about; and third, by improving scientific understanding.

Part of that work is going to include perfecting the information we have on the inventory side and putting forward more action in terms of reducing emissions. That will include resolving the issue the hon. member is bringing forward in terms of identifying a clear consensus on the base line year.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, someone must be able to tell Canadians what the actual releases in 1990 were. Otherwise this whole exercise does not mean anything.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. In the September 1991 tabled response to the standing committee report Out of Balance, the minister on page 7 committed the federal government to examining the feasibility of the all-party recommendation for a 20 per cent reduction from the 1988 levels by the year 2005.

When can Canadians expect the publication of this study which apparently has been put on hold within the minister's department?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will recognize that a lot of work has been done in this area. We must not lose sight of the fact, for example, that for the first time we know of deputy ministers of energy and environment met recently to deal with this issue. It is going to require a great deal of co-operation within government and within jurisdictions to attack this problem.

We, in response to the member's question, have taken a position based on what we think is a first step. As he will know, the climate change convention is going to be very much part of the conference happening in Rio de Janeiro in a few weeks from now.

We hope through this climate change convention to engage countries from all over the world. That is the first priority that this government has set. Whether we will go beyond that or not is something that we will want to examine at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I have several points of order and I will try to take them as I have received notice.

POINTS OF ORDER

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify the answer I gave yesterday, March 19, in this House to my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa South, since I think I may have involuntarily misled the House.

As I already said, the government has nothing to hide and I would point out that Judge Virgil Moshansky has indeed tabled his report to the government. That report will be made public next week.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Speaker: The other matter I might deal with was the point of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca with respect to a document from which the hon. minister read. The hon. member is not here. Does the minister want to comment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I tabled the document that I referred to this morning, but I would be interested in my colleague's paper. My understanding is that that particular reference was to the Mexican text. I just wanted to confirm that since that is what I had expressed in my answer.

Points of Order

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would just note two things. The first is that the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has already said that he will happily table the document from which he quoted, I would assume today, as soon as copies are available.

Second, his point of course was that there is at the very least a convention, if not a Standing Order, which holds that when a member reads from a document, especially a letter or other communication, "in an attempt to influence debate" I believe is the exact wording, but it applies as well in Question Period—at least, that has been the practice here—that it is incumbent upon the member, should he be asked to do so, to table that document.

That was the point raised by the hon. member yesterday and one on which he asked you to rule. I understand that you are now delivering yourself of that ruling. Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: I may have misunderstood what I heard. Perhaps the hon. minister can assist the Chair. I thought the minister said that he had tabled it. I think that is the end of it.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that I raise this matter not in an attempt to assess any blame but rather to prevent the setting of what in future might prove to be a discomforting precedent.

I have here a copy of a committee notice dated yesterday afternoon at 4.30 p.m. and I understand circulated this morning for a meeting of the finance committee next Wednesday, March 25, for the purpose of considering Bill C-60, an act to amend the federal-provincial arrangements, et cetera. It notes that the business of the committee at that time in this consideration will be clause-by-clause consideration.

Although some may reasonably assume, nonetheless we do not know that this bill will be passed by this House and referred to the committee this afternoon. In essence what is happening here is the order of reference to the committee contained in the motion for second reading has not passed the House and thus, in effect, the committee is anticipating the will of the House.

This is not a grave matter. Everyone would acknowledge that. It is just that, unfortunately, what seems to have happened here is that the anticipation of the order has included what would seem to be an omission of the possibility of the calling of witnesses by the committee for the study of the bill because the notice refers to clause-by-clause study which of course comes only after witnesses are heard.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate your ruling that the committee cannot properly anticipate an order of the House in this fashion.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that there is any need for a ruling.

I am advised that the notice has gone out by error, and I would hope that it would not be repeated. I do not think under the circumstances with that information coming to me from my table officers there is any need for the Chair to make any kind of a ruling.

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR CARIBOO—CHILCOTIN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if you had the opportunity to review page 8181 of Hansard in relation to the point of order I raised yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that I have not had a chance to consider it fully.

SPRING

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, on a more cheerful note, this being the first day of spring and in keeping with a long-standing tradition, I have the pleasure today on behalf of all of our colleagues from British Columbia to display the evidence that at least in one part of the country, namely British Columbia, spring has arrived in fact.

The daffodils with which the members have adorned themselves this morning come to us courtesy of radio station CKNW of Vancouver. This annual ritual is designed to celebrate the unique characteristics of our region of this country, but it has a very special significance this year.

Spring is a sign of renewal and a sign of hope. Let those of us who are privileged to serve our country in this House of Commons be inspired during this season of the year to renewed strength and courage to face the challenges that lie ahead, to keep building on the foundations of a strong and united country and to achieve the greatness to which our nation is destined.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING OF REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

WORLD FRANCOPHONIE DAY

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I should like to take a few minutes to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that today is World Francophonie Day.

As you know, March 20 was chosen because it was on that day in 1971 that the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co–operation was founded, also known as the ACCT.

In addition to being the prime mover behind the francophone summits, this intergovernmental organization has also become the general secretariat for the Francophonie. Jean–Louis Roy, a Canadian, has directed the secretariat for the past two years.

For over 430 million men and women in more than 40 countries, March 20 has come to represent the beginning of an attempt to organize the francophone world as a community of states and governments that have the use of French in common.

Originally, Francophonie referred to a complex of cultural entities where French was spoken. Today, Francophonie more aptly designates a forum for dialogue and co–operation where communities from the south and the north can meet and build their future together.

After the initial cultural relations that provided the basis for this forum, the communities have now expanded their exchanges to include a number of crucial areas such as scientific and technical information, communications, the environment and the economy.

Mr. Speaker, the Francophonie came into its own with the advent of conferences involving heads of state and heads of government, which provided a new sense of purpose, a desire to include political dialogue as well and to consolidate its institutions.

The first francophone summit, held in Paris in 1986, attracted some 40 heads of state and heads of government.

Since then, the francophone family has grown, the attraction of the Francophonie being the strong links that have been forged for over 20 years through this institution.

The last summit at the Palais de Chaillot in Paris last November was the fourth francophone summit. Quebec City hosted the summit in 1987, and Dakar was the host city in 1989.

Three new countries had asked to attend the proceedings at the conference at Chaillot: Cambodia, Bulgaria and Romania, the latest addition to a community of states that are either fully or partly French–speaking.

Mr. Speaker, on that occasion, Canada proposed a joint statement in which heads of state and heads of government made a commitment to actively support the democratic process and respect for human rights. Furthermore, Canada decided to back up its proposal by undertaking to finance a unit within the ACCT to support democratization and human rights.

Canada also supported establishing a network of legal clinics for women.

Yesterday, as part of the activities around the World Francophonie Day, I hosted a reception—you were there, Mr. Speaker—for members of the diplomatic corps and representatives of organizations that are part of the Francophonie's extensive family. I took this opportunity to invite them to a preview of a special program on the Francophonie produced recently by TV-5. This program, which will be broadcast today, is unusual among artistic and cultural programs in that it emphasizes the tangible achievements of the Francophonie, initiated not only by summits but also by special ministerial conferences on the environment, culture, youth and sport. In the years to come, we would like to see more emphasis on the importance of this day and increasing involvement of Canadians across this country.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this special opportunity to remind hon. members that today, Canada is the only country that belongs to the Commonwealth, the Francophonie and the Organization of American States, as well as to the United Nations and a number of other organizations where our linguistic duality and cultural diversity are an asset.

Canada's membership and unique influence within some of the world's most important organizations are certainly cause to rejoice. In fact, thanks to this unique position, Canada has been recognized as playing a very special role in the world today.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, like so many others, I am a statistic of our policy on the francophone community. I come from old Acadian roots, but unfortunately my grandfather did not speak a word of French. I am now trying to correct that deficiency with my daughter, but it is getting harder and harder and I will tell you why.

Of course, we English speakers and French speakers in this House are celebrating the tenth anniversary of La Francophonie. It gives us a chance to show the world that we rejoice in the fact that our country has two official languages and two founding peoples. It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, that since this government took power, it seems that the survival of Canada's French-speaking community outside Quebec is increasingly in doubt.

I will give you, for example, the comments made by the director general of the federation of francophone and Acadian communities of Canada, Marc Godbout, referring to the government's silence on the participation of francophones outside Quebec in the constitutional reform process. He said: "It's blocked from the Secretary of State Department to the Prime Minister's Office."

Mr. Godbout is quite right and I will tell you why. Since he took office, the Prime Minister has never met with the federation's representatives.

On March 18, just two days ago, the Prime Minister's lieutenant, Benoît Bouchard, made a stinging comment in the House, saying that even if francophones outside Quebec asked for it, they would not be at the negotiating table in the same way as the native people are. He said that the million Italian Canadians had not asked for anything. Again in the House yesterday, he repeated what he thought about the status of the French community outside Quebec and it is very unfortunate that it is being downgraded every day by this government.

On March 16, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs said as he was leaving the House that he did not understand what the federation of francophone and Acadian communities wanted. On March 4, the Secretary of State of Canada really shook the francophone communities of Manitoba and Alberta by telling them that the federal government was withdrawing from its commitment to sign federal-provincial agreements on consolidating their institutional and community development.

Again, on February 26, Mr. Speaker, another highly placed minister in this government, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, announced the abolition of the Court Challenges Program, which since its implementation has given francophones outside Quebec an opportunity to exercise their rights to trials in French and education for their children in French, which have regular constitutional protection only in Quebec and New Brunswick.

In order to justify the government's decision to abolish the Court Challenges Program, on February 28, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, another member of the Mulroney cabinet, told this House, and I quote: "We have built up a certain amount of jurisprudence and this program should now be funded by others, perhaps at the provincial level, or by non-government organizations". Moments later, a senior minister, the Minister of Justice, added: "We are in fact the only level of government that has been willing to fund these kinds of cases".

Considering that the Minister of Justice said straight out that no other level of government was going to take over, why stifle the voice of the French fact here in Canada? On February 26, a meeting of the committee on official languages was called but had to be adjourned for lack of a quorum, Mr. Speaker. Only one Conservative member showed up, and he was sitting in for one of the regular members of the committee. In fact, there has been no meeting on the nature of the committee's mandate since May 1991.

Our critic on this issue, who has been fighting long and hard for the French-speaking community in Canada, Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, urged and continues to urge the Prime Minister to reconsider his plans to abolish the Court Challenges Program.

There is more evidence, Mr. Speaker. A survey published in Le Droit shows how precarious the situation of francophones outside Quebec is, indicating that 44 per cent of Franco-Ontarian eighth graders have English as their first language at home.

I could quote more statistics. All this to say, Mr. Speaker, that we do want the Francophonie to be celebrated world-wide, but that we want this government to start by changing its policy of stifling the French-speaking community here in Canada. And we intend to keep fighting for the celebration of the Francophonie world-wide, but especially at home in Canada, where this protection is essential to the survival of our great-grandparents' language for the benefit of our children.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to talk today about the International Day of the Francophonie. Canada joins more than 40 member nations of the Francophonie, including Quebec and New Brunswick, to celebrate this day which is an opportunity to reflect on the challenges that we must face in this very important period of our history.

It is in 1986 that the francophone community project took shape. Since then, four summits have been held in Quebec, Paris and Dakar. More than 40 nations representing close to 400 million men and women participated in those events. The Francophonie is primarily based on language and a set of values.

The Chaillot declaration, which was passed at the conclusion of the fourth summit of countries using French in Paris last November includes a speech on the commitment made by member countries to abide by the principles governing fundamental human rights. However, there is an enormous gap between reality and the rhetoric used by the members of the Francophonie.

The Francophonie is still at the consolidation stage. It is important that this organization faces the challenges regarding human rights, democratization and development.

Last October, the Prime Minister said that Canada would not subsidize repression and violations to freedom because, in the field of international relations, nothing is more important than the respect of individual liberties and human rights. However, the final Chaillot declaration makes no mention of this compelling link between aid and democratization.

My New Democrat colleagues and myself have often stressed the need to put an end to bilateral aid granted to governments of countries that violate human rights, and to restructure development aid so as to give it to non-governmental organizations that work in these countries.

The fact is that while Canada subscribes to a clear commitment to democracy as evidenced by its declaration at the Paris summit, our country also supports structural adjustment policies that create a bigger gap between the rich and the poor, and we also continue to provide financial aid to repressive governments.

Even if the Mulroney government has promised to cut its aid to repressive regimes, the Minister for External Relations announced a year ago a $5 million subsidy to the authoritarian government of Rwanda, which is a member of the Francophonie. Yet a recent report from the group Africa Watch denounces widespread violations of human rights by the Government of Rwanda. In fact, the situation continues to deteriorate.

The record of several other countries of the Francophonie is not much better. Yet no action was taken at the last Paris summit to fight the blatant abuses that exist in countries of the Francophonie.

The Francophonie must look at the human rights issues and recognize that decent health care services, housing and adequate food are just as basic and important as traditional civil and political rights.

The challenges are enormous: protecting the environment, supporting the economies of African countries, promoting the French language, not to mention the emergence of eastern Europe countries such as Romania and Bulgaria. I hope Canada will realize that our most important contribution to the Francophonie is the reaffirmation of the principles of democracy, peace, rule of law, true respect for human rights and equality, as well as a healthy environment.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding in an order of this House that I have to seek unanimous consent to enable me to table a document to which I referred during Question Period.

I therefore ask for unanimous consent to table that document.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I do not object to providing unanimous consent today to table that document which I am sure is to the benefit of all members.

But I would like to indicate to the House that there are several occasions when opposition members have documents which we want to make available to Parliament and to all members and that consent is often denied to opposition members. Yet government ministers can avail themselves, or actually they do not have any choice, they have to table documents upon request of the House.

I would ask the House to consider that in the future, the same kind of courtesy should be afforded to opposition members who want to provide useful information to the House, notwithstanding the rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the member the opportunity to table that document?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions, both of which have been certified correct as to form and content.

The first petition deals in part with the proliferation of adult triple-X magazines and video stores in Scarborough. It makes the point that pornography has a destructive effect on women, children and also on men.

It calls specifically on Parliament to strictly uphold the present laws on obscenity and it is signed by 322 residents of Scarborough.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition which refers to something that is continuing to bother a number of the residents of Scarborough West in particular, and that is the application of the goods and services tax on feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads.

This has been brought to the minister's attention on more than one occasion, however, these petitioners again ask the government to remove the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOUR FACILITY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased also to present two petitions. The first petition is from a number of fishermen and others from Murray River, Montague, Murray Harbour and Sturgeon who depend on the small craft harbour's facilities.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge government to ensure that the necessary repairs are made to the slip at the small craft harbour facility at Graham's Pond, Prince Edward Island.

PENSIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of people on Prince Edward Island which indicates that the undersigned believe that indexed pensions for all Canadians are essential and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain full inflation protection for our federal public employees as a demonstration of the commitment to full indexed pensions for all Canadians.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Malpeque has nine minutes.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to continue my remarks today on Bill C-60.

This is important legislation, legislation which deals with federal-provincial tax arrangements as well as the health and education transfers to the province, that is the Established Programs Financing, the money that the federal government gives to provinces to spend on education and health.

I am pleased to speak today on these two areas because these are important areas to my riding, as I am sure they are to all ridings across this country. They are areas that the government should be making priorities.

But it is really doing the opposite because what it is doing is reducing the growth of transfer payments to the provinces for education and for health. To give you the figures, Mr. Speaker, these cuts the government has made result in a reduction of $9 billion by 1995 according to the Canadian Association of University Teachers. That is for education alone.

The health transfers will be reduced almost $20 billion by 1995. That is the record of the government where it has cut the growth of funding to education and health.

Let us look at what this Conservative government promised before coming to power. When he was opposition leader, the present Prime Minister said, and these are his exact words: "We are committed to sustaining the current federal financial commitment according to the formula set out in the 1977 agreement. We believe that financing post-secondary education is an important priority for both levels of government".

That is what the Prime Minister said when he was Leader of the Opposition. Unfortunately he has not carried through with that commitment because what we have had are changes in that formula. In fact we had one in 1986 and another change in 1990 which amounted to a reduction of money going to the provinces.

I also want to put on record a remark that was made by the present Minister for International Trade before he became the Minister of Finance. He told the House of Commons in 1982 when he was speaking on the established programs funding: "The Established Programs Financing reductions could have disastrous effects on universities and colleges, on hospital funding, and on the operation of hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities, and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial government. Let us solve these problems, not on the backs of the hospitals and universities. Let us solve those problems outside the arena". That is a quote from the Minister for International Trade when he was in the opposition.

Clearly the government has not kept its word. Here we have cuts. As I said we had a change in the formula in 1986 and another one in 1990.

The government is doing exactly what the Minister for International Trade said it should not do. What it is doing is solving its financial problems on the backs of the hospitals, the universities, and the colleges, and it is doing that by the cuts it provided in the formula for Established Programs Financing, which is the money to come to the provinces for education and health.

If we look at the effects that these cuts are having on the provinces, it means if, for example, the province of Prince Edward Island gets less money, it has less money to give the universities. In our case it would be the University of Prince Edward Island. At that university, as I am sure at all universities, tuition fees have increased tremendously. In fact, at the University of Prince Edward Island the tuition fee has gone up 57 per cent from 1985 to 1991. Over a period of six years tuition fees have gone up 57 per cent.

As I said, the government is giving the provinces less money, yet the cost of education is going up tremendously. We also have to look at the record of this government and the student loans program.

As I have just said, in my province of Prince Edward Island tuition fees have gone up 57 per cent, yet this government has not changed the amount of money given under the student loans program since 1984.

I have been calling on this government to look at that program since I was elected in 1988. I have tabled a private members' bill in this House. Hopefully that bill will be drawn and will force the government to look at this whole area. The student loans program as it stands today is very inadequate.

Another factor that will affect our education is that fewer people will be able to go to university. We will have people with all kinds of ability who simply cannot afford to get a university degree.

I am not the only one saying this. For example, in a Globe and Mail article of March 7, 1992, the headline says it all: "Only wealthy need apply". Students are graduating $25,000 to $30,000 in debt. People with ability but little money steer themselves away from a university education. According to the president of St. Thomas University in New Brunswick, and I quote: "We are getting to the point where only the wealthy and the near wealthy will be able to afford university education".

Another effect of federal education cutbacks, of course, is reduced competitiveness. This government talks about competitiveness, but we do not need any more talk. What we need is action.

This government pays big money for studies like the $1 million that was spent on the Porter study on competitiveness. Business and labour leaders are saying that the most important factor in improving Canada's competitiveness is better education, training and human resource policies.

I see my time is running out. I had many things I wanted to say about this legislation. I want to conclude by saying that it is very obvious that the federal government has not lived up to its pre-election promises with regard to the transfer payments. The effects of these cuts are being felt everywhere, from the factory floor to the university campus and the hospital ward.

Canadians expect better and Canadians deserve better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b) because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 17 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-60 now before the House. As everyone knows, this bill tabled in the House on February 20 concerns equalization programs.

• (1240)

Needless to say, these equalization programs are the cornerstone of our Canadian economic union. In 1992-93, the government will make contributions totalling $8.5 billion to the provinces, and on the whole have not provinces will profit most from this.

It is important to remember that at a Ministers of Finance meeting on January 30 the federal Minister of Finance proposed a two-year extension of the equalization program, from April 1, 1992 to March 31, 1994. This program extension would entail an increase of about $400 million for the provinces in 1992-93; about half of this, some $200 million, would become permanent increases, while the rest, some $200 million also, would be temporary benefits.

As we all know, the program renewal proposal is composed of three different sections: a wider tax base, the maintenance of the equalization ceiling for 1992-93; and the elimination of some technical irritant concerning the interaction of equalization programs and Established

Programs Financing. This is of course one more program involving federal transfers to provinces. All Canadian provinces will receive benefits under the measures being discussed here today.

It might be important to discuss the components of this program.

[English]

The equalization as proposed in the bill for 1992–93 would be in the order of $31 million for Newfoundland, $5 million for P.E.I., some $35 million for Nova Scotia, $39 million for New Brunswick, $198 million for the province of Quebec, some $55 million for Manitoba, and $60 million for Saskatchewan. Of course, the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia do not qualify under the provisions that I have just enumerated.

The interaction with the Established Programs Financing needs to be raised a bit as well, I think. There is a recognition, of course, that there are provincial concerns about the interaction between the Established Programs Financing and the equalization calculations by ensuring that the value of the tax transfer and the determination of the program entitlements reflect the equalization ceiling estimated benefits to the province to be more than $200 million. This is a one-time payment for retroactive effects.

I do not want to take much more time of the House speaking to this bill. Because we are talking about transfers to provinces, maybe this is an appropriate time as well to raise the matter of other transfers and how they impact upon us as Canadians. In other areas we discussed the measures not that long ago in the House of Commons, areas of transfers to the provinces for the purposes of health care and social welfare. In those two cases, my province, the province of Ontario, and the hon. member who will be speaking momentarily, his province of British Columbia, those provinces really got a raw deal from the federal government because some of those transfers were frozen or at least they were capped to a maximum three per cent increase.

I think the President of the Treasury Board is nodding in agreement when I say this. In my own province of Ontario as a result of the recession, of course which was authored by the federal government and expanded upon courtesy of the provincial NDP, they are very busy, as you know, chasing jobs away to the United States. Since they have taken over the provincial government, unfortunately, for many residents of my province, the NDP has had some success at chasing jobs away to south of the border.

Due to those two factors, we have an increasingly high number of people in Ontario who are on welfare, coupled with the effects of Bill C-21. Members will remember the notorious Bill C-21 of last session which cut back on the number of weeks that a person could get unemployment insurance. All of those things together have expanded the number of people who are on welfare in my province and elsewhere in Canada. In my province, there is a general cap on the Canada Assistance Plan transfers to those provinces.

That has made it such that it is becoming more and more difficult, particularly in a recession to take care of the increasing number of people who have fallen off not only the job market, but also they have fallen off the unemployment insurance benefits and have fallen on to the welfare rolls.

The unfortunate side effect of all of that has been that to a fair degree now we see municipal tax increases and to a degree, provincial tax increases, to satisfy the shortfall that was caused by the fact that the federal government put a ceiling or a cap on Canada Assistance Plan transfers to those provinces.

So, Mr. Speaker, the picture is certainly not rosy in our province. But being here to speak about the equalization issue, I thought I would take the opportunity to remind the government opposite of its role in the effective financing, not only of the equalization program, but also of the Canada Assistance Plan which, in my province, for example, is in serious difficulty.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I too wish that, at this eleventh hour, the government opposite would come back to its senses and at some time in the future would choose to make more generous contributions so that we can take care of those less fortunate people from the province that I represent here in the House of Commons as the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I too, wish to participate in the debate on Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. I am very pleased that the President of Treasury Board is in the House. I hope he will take note of some of the concerns that we have, especially a member from British Columbia with regard to this bill.

Really, what has happened—and of course I realize this is a housekeeping bill that the government is bringing in with regard to equalization payments and fiscal arrangements with the provinces—is that the government has systematically passed the burden of the national debt on to the provinces. There is no question about that as we look back and see the capping of the programs in British Columbia, in Ontario and in Alberta.

According to the programs the government brought in, it identified these provinces as being the richer provinces. Therefore it felt that it could cap them and let them fend for themselves.

At the same time as this is going on, changes were being made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The government opted out of that program and put the total burden on the workers and on the companies. This again hits the provinces, every province, because it takes that extra money out of those communities. It comes directly out of the provinces and out of the municipalities.

The capping of the medicare and the post-secondary education programs again takes the money directly out of those provinces and the provinces have to come up with the extra moneys in order to provide those programs. That affects the municipalities and goes all the way through the line. As these things take effect those areas are affected.

I want to talk a little about the pressure tactics the government is using on these provinces in order to get them to come on line. It brought in the GST, and 80 per cent of the Canadian public does not want it. The GST is having tremendous effects on the provinces across Canada.

The federal government is trying to harmonize this program, and I want to use an example. In my riding I have three border crossings: one at Roosevelt, one at Creston, and one at Yahk, British Columbia. People are crossing that border not because they are getting better deals, not because of anything. Almost everyone who contacts me and to whom I have talked says it is in protest to the kinds of policies this government has brought in.

That affects the small businesses in my riding. That affects every portion of the riding. Coming back to fiscal arrangements, the government is trying to bring them about. But it is causing more problems with the policies it is adopting.

The government talks about competitiveness. It says that we must be competitive in this market because we have entered into a free trade agreement. Goodness knows the majority in my riding did not support the free trade agreement, but it is certainly suffering because of that free trade agreement.

Rather than a free trade agreement we would have preferred to see a sector-by-sector agreement that made more common sense than what this government has done in the over-all agreement.

Students are affected by it. The government talks about being competitive in the free trade market it is talking about. Yet it is systematically cutting back and stopping our students from being able to enter the system to upgrade their skills and produce the kind of competitiveness the government says will be required to meet the needs of the future.

In every field the government has put its finger on, it has created deeper and bigger problems. It has said to the provinces: "You must come on line with us". It is offering them a goody: "If you come and harmonize the GST with us, we will collect your provincial sales tax".

Those are the kinds of discussions that go on with each province with regard to border crossings and so on. That is not the way to bring people on stream. That is not the way to listen to people.

The government should have listened to the people, not brought in the goods and services tax, and looked at it in a more equitable way. During the GST debate—and this affects the provinces—the minister said that the manufacturers' tax would be removed.

Did we actually see a decrease in the price of automobiles? Did we actually see a decrease in what the consumer was buying? I did not notice it. The people in my riding did not notice it. But they certainly noticed the extra 13 per cent, the 7 per cent GST and the 6 per cent tax on top of that.

The government is now talking about reaching equalization agreements and a housekeeping bill to bring about these kinds of things with the provinces for another two years.

It has not treated the provinces fairly, especially Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. It has singled them out and it has systematically, without any prior consultation with the provinces, introduced the bill into this House and brought about changes for those three provinces which are unworthy. We said so at the time and it certainly created an extra burden on the provinces because of that decision.

I heard the Liberal member who spoke just prior to me talk about the situation in Ontario. He said that the Ontario government is driving jobs to the United States. Nothing could be further from the truth. Everyone knows that the free trade agreement is the cause of what is going on across that border. Everyone knows that had the Liberals stood up and fought against the free trade agreement, stood up and said so at the time and continued fighting it, this would not be happening. No, they flip-flop back and forth because the large corporations said to them: "Oh, you cannot do this". So do not blame the Ontario government for driving jobs out of the country. Take a look in your own backyard and to the kinds of things that went on. Stand up in this House and fight for the people of Ontario instead of blaming the Ontario government.

Stand up against the free trade agreement and let us bring in an agreement sector by sector. Let us not put our dairy workers at risk. Let us not put our farmers at risk. Let us not put other workers at risk because of an over-all free trade agreement. Again we come back to the provinces because every province is affected. Every piece of legislation that this government has tinkered with has caused great concern to the provinces.

It has caused the provinces to try to pick up the slack. The unemployment insurance program is a prime example as to how it affects the provinces. When you take the money out of those areas, you hurt the people that are involved. The government also says that it is trying to re-educate people. If it really wanted to be competitive, if it really wanted to educate the people, it would be contributing today one-third of the cost of the unemployment insurance program to ensure that the kind of educational programs, the kind of technologies that our students and our workers are going to need would be there. It has withdrawn its contributions to that program and made it totally the program of the workers and the employers.

If the government really wants to upgrade the education and the training techniques of the Canadian people and the Canadian workers, it has to get back into that program, start participating in it and start to build the kind of country we are going to need for the future.

The government is talking about a free trade agreement with Mexico and we are not even allowed to participate in it. As the opposition members we are not even allowed to know what kind of discussions are taking place. I want to say to the government on that issue and to all the provinces that will be affected by this, that it is going to affect every one of us. Because if it makes that agreement, the government will also suffer.

While we are talking about equalization payments, while we are talking about harmonizing, let us really look at the broad scope of what this government is doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps you could enlighten me. I had understood that the government members were going to move a motion. Maybe I could take advantage of this point of order to allow the government Whip to get back to his seat and propose this unanimous consent motion. Perhaps he has been inadvertently delayed outside the House on the telephone.

Mr. Hawkes: It is amazing the degree of accuracy of guesses. I was on the phone and suddenly saw that debate had collapsed.

I think there is general agreement in the House, Mr. Speaker, to suspend if this motion is adopted.

I would propose the following motion to the House, and I think it has been negotiated. I move:

That notwithstanding any order of this House that if the debate is completed on the second reading stage of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the taking of any required division will be deferred until Tuesday, March 24, 1992 at 6 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order that was just agreed to, the taking of the vote is deferred until Tuesday.

May I declare that it is 4 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Therefore, it being four o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1.04 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE NATIONAL WEEK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved that Bill C–328, an act respecting a national week of the Public Service, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

• (1110)

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to speak on this bill not only because a large number of my constituents work for the Public Service of Canada but also because in my role as critic for the opposition for Public Service employment, I have become very much aware of the extent to which Public Service employees across Canada are delivering services to Canadians in every community every day. They are assisting us as parliamentarians in carrying out our duties.

The excellence of the Canadian Public Service has been recognized internationally. It is probably because the role of the Public Service in developing the nation has been an important part of the partnership between the public and private sectors, spreading transportation and communication networks throughout the nations.

The Public Service has always been on the frontiers of Canadian development, more laterally spreading the services that ensure that equality for all Canadians is delivered based not on where you live or the particular climate or economic benefits of your community, but on a vision of a Canada where all Canadians share the right to equal opportunities.

The Public Service is the instrument by which the will of Parliament is carried out. It delivers services throughout Canada, acting as a unifying force and a visible presence of the federal government in small and large communities across the nation.

Just as important, the Public Service is the eyes and ears of Parliament on the front lines in every corner of the land informing us as policy makers and legislators of changing circumstances and the new and emerging needs of Canadians.

Yet often the Public Service is the target of public contempt of complaints about government expenditures, policies and programs. Often it is criticized unfairly as being inefficient, slow and expensive. Often governments themselves will target their own employees as handy scapegoats to divert attention from unpopular policies, programs and decisions.

The Public Service is often the first to feel the brunt of public sector restraint, expected to cheerfully bear cutbacks and wage freezes for the good of the country. Morale in the Public Service is at an all–time low. The relationship between employees and employers has never been so strained.

We have just experienced the largest Public Service strike in our 125–year history. Opportunities for advancement have diminished. The best and brightest in many cases are leaving the Public Service of Canada. We are no longer attracting the brightest and best to the service of their country.

Employees have been told they have to do more with less, and they are responding to the challenge with the commitment and dedication to the nation that has always symbolized the Public Service of Canada.

There are very few who work for Canadians who do not feel they are making a contribution to their country. They are proud of the services they deliver to their fellow Canadians. They are proud of the services they deliver to government and Parliament.

But these feelings of dedication, pride and commitment have been tested to the limit. The feeling is becoming endemic that their work is not appreciated, valued or respected by their employer. Moreover, they feel that their employer is attempting to convince their clients, the people of Canada, that their work has no value.

There is good reason for that atmosphere. They have been told that they should be grateful to have a job, any job. Those at the lowest pay levels have been told that their managers who perform well based on the work of all employees will get bonuses and increases while they struggle, many of them on $18,000 salaries to feed, clothe and house their families.

They have watched as their work is contracted out, often at greater cost and less quality while their co-workers are laid off. They have been told that no matter what the Human Rights Tribunal decides on pay equity for employees in female dominated groups, the government will not respect the decision of the Human Rights Commission.

While the government spends over $1 million to encourage partnership and co-operation between employers and employees in the private sector, it excludes its own employees from partnership with government in such important public policy areas as revitalization of the Public Service and management of their own pension plans.

The private sector is learning the importance of teamwork as the need to sharpen competitiveness and productivity gains importance. Employees at all levels must see themselves as part of the team working towards a common goal.

A fundamental ingredient of building teamwork in both the private and the public sector is breaking down the confrontational barriers between management and front line workers, between employer and employees, creating an atmosphere of mutual respect based on the understanding that every employee contributes to the success of the enterprise.

Companies are implementing employee recognition programs not only internally but also externally to ensure that their customers know that their employees are the valued and essential foundation of customer service.

Personal recognition is an important component of job satisfaction that promotes top performance and the incentive to go beyond the bare requirements necessary to earn one's pay cheque. To take risks, to look for creative solutions, to deliver top-notch services benefiting the company, the working environment, the client and the country, the employee must be internally motivated and that internal motivation comes from being satisfied with one's job, knowing that it is important, respected and valued.

Bill C-328 asks the government to step out of the Dark Ages of confrontation and conflict, to recognize that its employees are going through difficult times and are operating in an atmosphere of discouragement. A siege mentality is not conducive to feeling pride in one's work, to feeling loyalty and commitment to one's employer and dedication to going above and beyond the call of duty to provide the best possible service on the front lines.

Bill C-328 asks only that one week be set aside each year to recognize the value of the work performed by employees both to the public, to the government and to Parliament.

While this bill is framed in the context of the federal Public Service, it is not only limited to recognizing the work of federal public sector employees but it also refers to and allows for the recognition of those who serve elected bodies at all levels across Canada. That includes 529,000 federal employees, 506,000 provincial employees, 343,000 municipal employees and countless others who work for local boards and agencies delivering health, education and many other services.

A national week to recognize Public Service employees would be an opportunity for those who work for the public to inform the public about the services they provide. I would like to quote from one of the letters I have received: "A great idea", said one writer. "Not so much to honour the Public Service employees, but it could serve at this time to educate the public as to the services the employees and the governments provide.

The public wants to know what they are paying for. This would give employees a chance to show off their work".

This has already begun. The Professional Institute of the Public Service has prepared a series of brochures that points out the valuable work performed by Public Service employees in such areas as agricultural research in protecting the safety of our food supply, delivering front line health care services in remote communities across Canada and ensuring the safety of the drugs which reach us in our homes. Recognition has also been given to the importance of public sector scientists and all those who work with them in protecting our fish stocks—that is certainly a timely topic—and in providing weather services that ensure the safety of aviation in constant monitoring of the environment. Up and down the levels of government it is public sector employees that are educating our children, ensuring that our planes fly safely, that our highways function, that fishermen who put out to sea have a good security and rescue network in place. Every day of our lives from the moment we turn on the tap in the morning, the services and the quality of life we enjoy in this country depend not only on the decisions of elected bodies but on the competent, capable and committed service of public sector employees at all levels.

A week of focused attention on the value of public services and the people who provide them would build pride among those who work for the public and remind them as well that service to the public is the purpose of their job. It would also encourage communication with the public who are their clients and could be used as well to encourage public comments on government services.

At a time when the public wants to see different levels of government co-operating rather than bickering about their shared responsibility to the public and for the expenditure of their tax dollars, information on who does what with those public dollars will allow for good public debate.

Adapting to change requires a climate of co-operation and mutual respect between employees and employers. Good management-labour relations are essential to Canada competing in global markets. Our partners around the world have to be able to depend not only on the private sector delivering what it says it will deliver but on the public sector being able to deliver what it says it will deliver.

As the largest employer in the country I believe the government must take a leadership role in building an atmosphere of co-operation and partnership with its employees in pursuing national goals just as it is asking private sector companies to develop partnerships with their employees in increasing productivity and efficiency.

The excellence of the Canadian Public Service is recognized throughout the world but there are wounds to be healed. This bill is one small step in beginning the healing process and returning the public sector of Canada again to a proud service that attracts the best Canadians to the service of their country.

This bill may be seen by some as perhaps a bit of tokenism. It is not intended that way. There is a real need to let public sector employees know that despite the cutbacks, despite the salary burdens they have been asked to bear, their work is important to their country. That is why most of them are in the Public Service, whether at the federal level, the provincial level, or the local level. People join the public sector because they want to contribute to the public good.

I would like to quote from a letter I received from the Federal Superannuates National Association which represents retirees from the Public Service, many of whom have spent an entire career making their own personal contribution to the nation. FSNA has this to say: "At a time when Public Service employees are being required to bear the brunt of the government's fight to control inflation, there is an even greater need for recognition of their service to the nation. The passage of this bill would to some extent compensate employees who, particularly during these difficult times, are expected to do more with less, cheerfully and efficiently".

They are doing that. I want to close by thanking the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada for both launching their own information campaign on public services delivered across Canada and also for proposing this bill. While it is not a votable bill, none the less I hope this debate will encourage the government to consider taking a measure like this, giving the employees a focused opportunity to promote the services that they and the government deliver in partnership in restoring the pride they feel in their work.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in today's debate on Bill C-328, the Public Service National Week Act.

This affords another opportunity to recognize the public servants who deliver a wide range of high quality services to Canadians. There is no doubt that the federal Public Service is among the best in the world, and I am not alone in thinking this. In 1975 the renowned British author and physician, C. P. Snow, in addressing a Canadian audience, said that as a former public servant himself, he thought very highly of this country of ours. He said that we had the best Public Service in the world. The Canadian Public Service, as we all know, is based on the British model. Professor Snow said that we had improved substantially on the original model. Yet most Canadians remain unaware of the high degree of respect that our federal Public Service commands throughout the world.

Our Public Service employees are devoted, responsible and conscientious. They work in a variety of areas to serve the public and deliver vital government programs. We find them serving Canadians in such areas as health and safety; they inspect the food we eat and protect the water we drink and the air we breathe; they test the medicine we take; they control our waterways and our airways and our means of transportation.

Public Service employees also protect our interests as consumers. They scrutinize operations and enforce federal regulations from the electronic communications to the activities of financial institutions.

They deliver crucial social programs. Most Canadian families receive federal cheques each year, many on a regular basis, and we tend to forget and take for granted that they are a dedicated people who work diligently to make sure that those cheques are issued correctly and promptly.

Public servants represent us and protect our interests abroad. They support industry, our regions, scientific and technological progress and foreign aid.

I could go on. All these services are delivered efficiently and effectively and in a timely manner. Canadians have come to expect these services and the fact that they often take them for granted is testimony to the high and consistent quality with which they are delivered.

The government, as employer, fosters an environment where Canadians from all origins can find opportunities for successful careers in the Public Service, and it provides its employees with training necessary to deliver government services.

I am in complete agreement with the spirit of the bill proposed by the hon. member. We need to recognize our Public Service employees and we do in various ways.

One of the ways that we recognize public service employees is through the Government of Canada's Incentive Awards Plan. Among the programs under this plan we have suggestion awards, merit awards, awards of excellence. In addition, managers and supervisors in the Public Service take every opportunity to recognize in a less formal way the contributions of employees. This takes the form of a thank you letter for work well done or attendance at a conference or acknowledgement of an employee's work in the foreword of a report or a study.

The suggestion award program enables employees to submit their ideas for improving government operations in providing better service to the public, enhancing the work environment and generating savings and other benefits. In this way, the government officially expresses its appreciation to employees whose initiatives produce valid suggestions.

In 1990-91 the government saved $36 million through some of the suggestions made by the Public Service employees. The government's suggestion award plan has received more than 165,000 proposals since it began 39 years ago. The program paid out a total of $4.6 million to Public Service employees whose suggestions have saved the taxpayers over $153 million.

Last year, for example, an employee of the Secretary of State of Canada suggested that student loan claims from banks be separated into two categories: complete and incomplete. The complete claims can be audited and paid immediately, resulting in reducing the backlog in interest costs. This suggestion alone saved the government $2.7 million.

The merit award program provides management with the means of extending formal recognition to employees for meritorious performance. This award is given for various reasons: for example, work performance at an unusually high level over an extended period of time, successful completion of a major project or assignment in a manner that goes beyond what would normally be expected, performing duties in a meritorious way under abnormal circumstances or with an exceptionally high order of achievement, and innovation that results in an important improvement in operations.

For example, last year a merit award was given to a team of employees from Energy, Mines and Resources Canada that showed exceptional investigative skills in the developing of tracer gas technologies. This has improved significantly the health and safety of Canadians working in underground mines and has reduced operating costs at the Cape Breton coalfields.

Finally, we have awards of excellence which are presented each year by the President of the Treasury Board. These awards recognize the best, most exemplary contributions of the Public Service resulting from employee suggestions for meritorious performance of duties. An example of this is the award given last year to five employees in our embassy in Kuwait. Many of the members of this House will recall that during the Iraqi occupation these employees faced guns and endured 45 to 50 degree Celsius temperatures over a three-month period. They had no electricity, no air conditioning, and no food or water was delivered to them.

As we can see, the federal government does recognize the work of its Public Service employees both informally and formally. In this way the government can encourage innovation, save money, improve its operations, and provide better services to Canadians.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to support this bill and particularly to have an occasion to stand up on behalf of all my caucus colleagues, and indeed I am sure all members of the House, to thank the very hard working public servants who serve us and our constituents right across Canada.

The Public Service of Canada is a very skilled, hard working group of people who care very much about the public they serve and who care about their country that they serve so loyally. They vary of course. They serve the public in many ways: as maintenance workers, file clerks, truck drivers, receptionists, administrators, skilled planners and scientists. They perform many different functions. My two colleagues who preceded me have outlined those very eloquently.

As a person from the west coast I want to mention these people particularly: the lighthouse keepers, the Coast Guard, the RCMP, and others who guarantee our safety. While I am at it, I would like to plead with the government to keep our lighthouse keepers in place because they have a very important function that goes beyond just the keeping of the light.

It is often a very thankless job to be a public servant. I am sure this has become increasingly so over the recent years. The stress in their jobs has increased considerably as restraint cuts have been imposed by this government and people have been laid off in almost every department of the country in very large numbers.

Privatization of this government has also changed opportunities, the whole field of Public Service, and in many cases this has been quite unwarranted and has resulted in less effective services for the public.

As workers face increasing pressures and heavy job loads, they unfortunately have also become the scapegoat for many of the government's policies because they are the face of the government that the public can get at. We often hear people speaking about those terrible "bureaucrats". This is really very unfair. It has become a convenient scapegoat for the frustrations the public feels because of government policies. It is very important that the public understands this and realizes that the policies are made by ministers, not by the front-line public servants we deal with every day in our ridings.

At the same time as public servants bear the burden of heavier workloads and increased job pressures and job insecurities, many have experienced unrequested transfers as the government has arbitrarily made changes without consulting with them.

I agree with my colleague and I commend the member for Ottawa West for presenting this bill. We support it. We should have a national Public Service week as one of the means of recognizing and showing our appreciation to the Public Service of Canada. Hopefully it will help to improve the morale of the public servants which I agree is at a very low state. We should all bear a responsibility for seeing that this is improved.

It will also be a useful way of making members of the public much more aware of what the Public Service employees do for them, the very important services they provide and the very high degree of competence that our Canadian Public Service is noted for internationally as well as, hopefully, within our own country.

A Public Service week will be useful, but I think we would all agree that it will be very meaningless and, as my colleague said, perhaps a token unless there are sincere changes in the way that public servants are treated in Canada.

Given the arbitrary treatment that this particular government has provided to public servants, it is very important that we have a Public Service week. But that is not enough. We must also have a change of attitude on the part of this government and a change in policies and practices. It is first of all very important that the government show much greater respect for its employees, for the jobs they do, and for their collective bargaining rights. Surely the people in this House remember the treatment they received during the last Public Service Alliance strike when collective bargaining rights were completely overruled by this government.

Women in the Public Service deserve special recognition, not only for the contribution they make but because of the hardships they have faced in the past and the pay inequities they have experienced. It is deplorable that this government has refused to pay the retroactive pay owing to women in the Public Service because of the inequities in their paycheques over the past years. The government must play fair and pay this money that is owing, retroactively.

It is unconscionable that now the government would obstruct and threaten to ignore the Human Rights Commission and the recommendations it will be making on this matter.

We also need to implement employment equity in the Public Service fully. We want a Public Service that will truly represent the people of Canada. Therefore we must see more visible minority people, persons from all ethnic backgrounds being hired. We must see physically and mentally disabled persons in our Public Service. They must have equal rights to employment. We must see many more native Canadians. The proportion of native Canadians in the Public Service is intolerably low. We must see women at all levels in the Public Service. These people must not only have the opportunity to get in the door, but they must have opportunity to move up the scale and have much greater access to promotions and to senior jobs as well.

We should also be expanding child care services for our public servants. If the government continues to refuse to do anything about a national child care program to which it were committed a number of years ago, the least it can do is provide child care for its own employees, its own public servants. We can do this and must do this in many ways. Where there is a large number of public servants in one location, we should have day care centres available just as we have here in the House of Commons. Incidentally that was why I initially proposed a day care centre on the Hill. It was to demonstrate that this is the kind of thing that should be offered to employees right across the country, not only to people on the Hill.

We must have increased child care services, and if there are not day care centres then there should be some provision perhaps in their collective bargaining package to help to pay for the costs of child care so that children will not be suffering as parents go to work.

As the member of Parliament for Vancouver East I would like to thank particularly the public servants who serve my office and my constituents. I know it is the same for other members of Parliament in the House.

When we have problems with immigration cases, we can readily phone a consultant in the immigration department for advice. When constituents have problems with unemployment insurance or training programs, we contact Canada Employment to resolve them together. We frequently call Health and Welfare about pensions and disability cases and many other local public service people who serve our constituents well. When we go overseas I am constantly impressed about the high professionalism of the people in External Affairs. I want to recognize them particularly.

Public servants cannot change policies and we should not blame them for the policies of the government. They are extremely hard working dedicated people. They are our employees and the employees of the people of Canada. Therefore they must have better treatment and greater recognition for the job they do. We would certainly think the 125th birthday of Canada would be a good time do that. We support the idea of a national week to recognize the Public Service of Canada.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege to be able to speak on Bill C-328 today. It is a very significant bill and it seeks to establish a Public Service national week.

I am sure that every hon. member of this House agrees with the spirit of this bill. This House certainly recognizes and appreciates the commitment and dedication shown by all members of the Public Service of Canada.

My government is fully aware that the Canadian Public Service has evolved for more than three-quarters of a century to become one of the finest organizations of its kind anywhere in the world.

Public servants are often thought of as only serving elected governments. While it is true that much of the business of the Public Service is to help develop and implement government policies, public servants as their name applies are men and women who serve Canadian citizens every day: for example, the air traffic controller who guides our plane to a safe landing, the scientist who is developing a preventive vaccine, the immigration officer who welcomes new Canadians to our land, the person at the Canada Employment centre who helps workers find jobs during these tough economic times, the health inspector who ensures that our food is safe to eat, and the letter carrier who brings us our mail.

These men and women belong to a body of more than 500,000 public servants whose work is valued by Canadians all across this great nation.

I am sure my hon. colleagues will agree that the Public Service has been at the forefront in helping to advance employment equity for women, persons with disabilities, and minority groups. The hon. member for Vancouver East spoke very eloquently about the situations and the need for continued improvement in this area.

Public servants, both French speaking and English speaking, are ambassadors for Canada both at home and abroad. They are a force for national unity. This government fully supports the ongoing efforts of the Public Service institutions to recruit quality men and women who will reflect the rich cultural and regional diversity of Canada. Throughout our history the Public Service has been the infrastructure upon which governments have built sound institutions that have helped give this nation one of the highest standards of living in the world.

As my hon. friend said when she introduced her bill, we now have a dynamic and flexible partnership between the public and private sectors, a partnership that requires enhanced creativity to safeguard our prosperity in this decade and on into the 21st century.

When Canadians look at the Public Service, they see themselves. They see husbands and wives raising the next generation of Canadians. They see citizens actively participating in community organizations. They see women and men putting in long hours as federal public servants and then heading for their neighbourhood community centre to coach youngsters in minor hockey leagues, to help a talented figure skater, to help a skier dreaming of making it to the Olympics or some other such volunteer organization.

Our Public Service is a truly distinctive Canadian entity. Over the years, it has evolved to reflect the diversity of our multicultural and multiracial society. Looking at the organization from an international perspective, the Public Service has kept pace with Canada's emergence as an important member in the world community. I believe that most Canadians recognize that an effective Public Service is fundamental to our national health and individual well-being.

This highly professional organization performs a wider variety of functions than any other organization in the country. Those of us who work primarily here in Ottawa need to remind ourselves that two-thirds of the federal public servants work and live in communities outside of the national capital region.

In presenting her bill, my hon. colleague spoke of the value of the services provided by public servants. The hon. member is right. Valuable services are provided and they are provided in a manner that reflects values established over several decades; values that this government will continue to uphold so that all Canadians will be proud of their Public Service.

I believe that Canadians who choose to serve their country are inspired by motivation that goes well beyond the necessity of making a living. Hon. members probably know a number of men and women who have set aside promising careers in the private sector in order to work as public servants for the betterment of their country.

In her introduction to the bill, the hon. member mentioned that many people are leaving the civil service to go into private industry. I would also remind her that many people from the private sector are proud to come into the public sector as well.

Despite their willingness to serve, I am sure that there are times when it is extremely frustrating to be a public servant. The responsibility of spending the hard-earned taxes of Canadian citizens is not one that public servants take lightly. Because of their responsibility, public servants are often open to criticism from Canadians and indeed members of this House.

The women and men of the Public Service of Canada fully understand and appreciate that our democratic system depends upon individuals living up to their responsibilities. We can be proud that our public servants maintain a high standard of both personal and professional conduct at all times. The values that I spoke of earlier are entrenched values that permeate the Public Service and sustain its high quality. That understanding was clearly reflected by the Prime Minister in PS 2000. To quote the Prime Minister in his introduction to the white paper, he said:

> The Public Service of Canada is fundamental to the successful functioning of our democratic institutions and of our country. It serves Canada ably and has contributed immeasurably to our stable economic and social environment, to our achievements as a modern industrial nation and to our values and identity as a people.

I believe that Canadians genuinely appreciate the contributions of Canada's public servants and while I fully support the intent of my hon. colleague's bill, at this time I cannot support establishment of a Public Service national week. The hon. member from Ottawa West may feel that a special week would be well received in her riding and certainly I can understand that, but considering the potential cost to taxpayers, it is reasonable to believe that such a proclamation would be regarded with cynicism in other parts of the country.

Members of this House are well aware that the recent budget demonstrated the necessity of keeping discretionary spending under control during this time of fiscal restraint. The cost may not be great, but there is always publication and advertising that must be done.

This does not mean that a special week cannot be set aside, if the hon. member, along with other hon. members and private citizens, wish to do so.

It does not require a formal recommendation from the Government of Canada to establish a special week to acknowledge the contributions of public servants. Any group of private citizens is free to take that responsibility on themselves.

In closing, again I commend the hon. member on the spirit of her bill and perhaps in a healthier economic climate, it should be reconsidered. At the present time, I regret that I am unable to support such a bill.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to support the motion that Bill C-328 be read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

This bill would ensure that, each and every year, the third week of the month of June is known as Public Service National Week. I support this proposal and hope it will meet with the approval of all members of this House.

I have only a few minutes. I realize that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and other members from the national capital region wish to speak as well, but I imagine their speeches will not be very long either, considering the little time we have at our disposal.

Today's debate is an important one, because its purpose, as I see it, is to recognize the constructive and indispensable contribution made by Public Service employees.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa West, whose idea it was to propose this bill, and I would ask hon. members to give her the support she is seeking.

This plan would help make Canadians more aware of the remarkable work done by public servants and improve the image of a Public Service that has not had an easy time since 1984, when this Conservative government was elected.

As you know, the last few years were particularly difficult for federal employees. Numerous lay-offs in which nearly 13,000 public servants lost their jobs, privatization of services that so far had been provided by Crown corporations, the pay freeze—zero for this year and 3 per cent next year—and last summer's strike, the biggest one ever in this country, have made Canadians aware that there is a problem. All these measures have caused a number of serious financial problems for some people, and sometimes family problems as well. In the process, Canada has lost some of its best people, and there are also the problems this creates for young people who were intent on a career in the Public Service.

There is a long list, but I will not get into all the details. Briefly, Public Service morale is at its lowest ebb in many years, despite the fact that a plan to renew the Public Service of Canada, PS 2000, is now before the House. However, I doubt that this initiative will be able to restore the trust of public servants in an employer who has given them an extremely raw deal for the past seven years.

Our Public Service, known as one of the best in the world, consists of about 529,144 federal public servants, 506,600 provincial public servants and 343,200 at the municipal level.

In the final instance, public servants deliver the services approved by provincial and federal legislatures. The Public Service has served the Canadian people well in the past and hopefully we can change the government's attitude so that these public servants can not only regain initiative but also have confidence in their future, that their positions will be secure and that they can have a career in the Public Service knowing that one day they will be entitled to a well deserved retirement.

There is a partnership between public servants and politicians. We politicians deal with the reasons why. We decide why we want such and such a program. Public servants are the specialists whose responsibility it is to advise us how best to implement it. That is important, and it is extremely difficult at times to understand why this government is determined to lower the morale of the troops.

This week I received a letter from Iris Craig, president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service, in which she said that the purpose of Public Service Week is to make Canadians aware of the services and security that public servants give them. Further on, she said that National Public Service Week would be an ideal opportunity for the government and public servants to tell Canadians that they are at their service. I conclude with another quote from Ms. Craig: "We would like to celebrate Canada's 125th anniversary by showing Canadians that a healthy and efficient Public Service is essential to their social and economic well-being".

The government has a duty to ensure that the public service is able to serve the national interest effectively while providing the services that Canadians expect of their government. To do so, public servants must be able to count on their employer's respect and good will. A National Public Service Week would thus be a step in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to obtain the unanimous consent of this House so that Bill C-328 can follow the normal course and be seriously considered by a committee of this House to give all hon. members a chance to be involved and say where they stand in this debate. I would ask you to have Bill C-328 referred to Legislative Committee H so that it can be studied in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa West. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992–93

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, as reported (without amendment) from Legislative Committee E.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty to rule on the motions proposed in amendment to Bill C–61.

There are five motions in amendment to the report stage of Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. I will now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 to the House.

Mr. McDermid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I notice those motions are in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, who is not present in the House to introduce his amendments. I wonder if the Chair would rule on that. Since he is not here to move his amendments, are they in fact in order?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Standing Orders of the House are quite clear in this respect. If the mover is not in the House, the House cannot consider the hon. member's motions in amendment.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read a third time. By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on third and final reading on Bill C–61, the borrowing authority bill.

Let me begin by putting this legislation in its proper context. That of course is the context of the budget that was presented a few weeks ago by the Minister of Finance, a budget that cuts government spending, cuts taxes, cuts the deficit, bolsters economic recovery and strengthens the international competitiveness of our economy.

Any debate on borrowing authority has to address the issue of public debt and deficit, burdens that weigh heavily on the people of Canada and that constrain the capabilities of the government.

There is one important and fundamental lesson governments everywhere have learned from recent recessions. That is never again must government allow itself to be financially crippled by debt.

The Liberals sit here and laugh at that. They sit there and they laugh. They laugh at government being crippled by debt. They left this government with a $200 billion debt. Canadians have been paying for that ever since.

Governments cannot assist those facing hardship or stimulate economies with money they do not have. To try to do so by borrowing more would only lead to higher deficits, higher debt, higher interest rates, slower growth and all that. It is not a pretty picture, as we know.

Renewed effort to reduce the deficit was one of the things Canadians clearly told us they expected from this budget. In all the pre-budget consultations that the Minister of Finance, myself, and the President of the Treasury Board had across Canada, that was the one message that came from every group no matter what their status in our society, that we must reduce the deficit. They also wanted realistic and lasting solutions to our economic problems, streamlined government to meet the realities of the 1990s, new opportunities for people to improve their skills and knowledge.

The government has responded to these challenges with a budget that takes action to bolster recovery this year and strengthen growth and job creation in the years ahead.

The budget provides help where help is needed, but it pays for that help not by increasing taxes or increasing the deficit, but by reducing expenditures; not by increasing borrowing and taxes. It cuts spending to reduce taxes and bolster economic growth and competitiveness. The budget also ensures significant declines in the deficit for 1992–93 and the following years.

The deficit will be held to $31.4 billion in the 1991–92 fiscal year which ends in about a week. It will be reduced by almost $4 billion to $27.5 billion next year and to $22.5 billion in 1993–94.

Mr. Milliken: Nobody believes that.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is sitting over there delivering his speech from the seat of his pants. I understand that he is the next speaker for the Liberal Party and I would encourage him to withhold his comments until that time.

The net public debt will begin to shrink as a proportion of the economy in 1993–94 for the first time since 1973–74.

Reducing the deficit is essential for a return to sustained economic growth and new jobs. It is an essential foundation for a return of confidence, at home and abroad, that will ensure a strong recovery. Most important, the measures in the budget will not compromise our deficit reduction goals.

Continued spending restraint will help bring about a major reduction in government borrowing. The government's financial requirements will be reduced to zero in 1995–96. The government will then begin to reduce its outstanding debt in the financial markets for the first time since 1969–70.

It is in this context of deficit reduction that we must consider Bill C–61.

Mr. Boudria: Who wrote that?

• (1210)

Mr. McDermid: I did. I wrote it. In case you wanted to know, I wrote it. It's a good speech too.

Like borrowing bills in recent years, this bill contains three basic elements: financing authority to cover financial requirements for 1992–93; an amount to cover exchange fund account profits; and a contingency reserve. In total, the government is requesting authority to borrow $24.7 billion for the 1992–93 fiscal year.

It bears noting that the House committee has reviewed the provisions of the bill and has reported back with no amendments.

In addition, there is provision for an additional borrowing authority of $3.9 billion to provide for borrowings conducted in this fiscal year under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act. There are also a number of technical changes to tie the bill more closely to the fiscal year.

Before I finish my remarks, I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the government has been operating under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act since January 28 of this year. Various factors contributed to this, particularly the increase in financial requirements as reported in the budget.

Let me remind members that until new borrowing authority is in place, only short-term debt instruments can be sold, and the government cannot maintain the desired balance of short and long term debt in its debt program. This balance is carefully designed to achieve the objectives of cost minimization and reduced exposure to increases in debt service changes. It is therefore important that Bill C–61 be considered in a timely manner.

The amount of borrowing authority requested in the bill is directly connected to the budget and the financial requirements stated therein. The information required to deal with the financial aspects of the bill is set out in the budget documents.

I therefore urge the House to proceed with this legislation as quickly as possible so that new borrowing authority will be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year and the government's regular borrowing program can proceed as the fiscal year begins.

Our record of spending restraint and deficit reduction offers sound testimony that this country's finances are being handled prudently and responsibly.

I urge all members to support this bill.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the unbelievable statement of the minister with which he closed his brief address was, of course, one that I will seek to refute in the time allotted to me today. It is obvious that he could not have said that with a straight face. I was amazed that a wide grin did not break out on his face as he uttered those statements. I was also amused to hear him suggest that this bill should get speedy passage because the government had run out of borrowing authority on January 28 and was having to borrow all of its money on the money markets on short-term notes.

An hon. member: Doesn't that make sense?

Mr. Milliken: It does make sense. The trouble is that it just shows incompetent management. If the government had asked for the proper borrowing authority last year instead of underestimating its requirements, as it did, I say to the minister, he would have not been into this mess and would not be here today pressing us for speedy passage.

We were assured last year that the borrowing authority that was asked for was more than sufficient. The government had everything covered and everything planned. Now we see in fact that not only did it not have it properly planned, it misplanned it. It botched it as usual and of course now the Canadian taxpayers are paying the price of this bungled, incompetent government which cannot manage a lemonade stand let alone the administration of the Government of Canada.

The purpose of this bill, as everyone has stated, is to permit the government to borrow to cover the annual deficit that it is running up in this country. It said that the deficit this year is going to be lower than last. Time will tell. If so, it will be the first time in about four years that the government has managed to get it down. Every year it is trumpeted by Ministers of Finance how wonderfully this government is managing things, that it has managed to cut the debt, it is really working and deficit control is a big priority, but every year the deficit goes up. For the last four years, the deficit has continually risen and 1991–92 was no exception.

In the new financial year, and we will see, the minister says it is going down to $27 billion. But the minister has been wrong before, almost consistently, and so time will tell whether he manages to get this one right. In any event, his deficit is unduly large and I will make some commentary on it later in my remarks.

I want to draw to the attention of the House what the results of the Conservative policies have been. I want to deal specifically with my own riding of Kingston and the Islands where the hardship that has been wrought by this government's disastrous combination of policies has been severe. It is estimated that in Kingston, 1 of every 25 people is collecting welfare benefits and this does not include those receiving family benefits or unemployment insurance.

In 1989 Kingston's welfare payments totalled $5.2 million. In 1990 the figure was $8.6 million. In 1991 it will be approximately $14 million by the end of the year. That is almost triple its level in 1989.

It is predicted this upward trend will continue with an estimated further 60 per cent growth in case-loads over the next year. This could bring welfare payments over the $26 million mark by the end of 1992, compared with only $5.2 million in 1989. The welfare case-load in the Kingston area is up 140 per cent in 1991 over the 1990 figures. The provincial average is even higher than that.

I am sure that the minister of state for homelessness will be interested in the fact that the welfare payments in Kingston are higher in 1991 than they have been at any time in the past decade by almost double. It is a disastrous situation brought about by a series of disastrous policies.

In building permits, total building permit activity in the Kingston area was down 14.7 per cent over the 1990 total. Kingston fared reasonably well in that respect. The industrial and commercial and residential building permits comprised 77 per cent of total building activity down from 90 per cent in 1990. Housing starts in the greater Kingston area fell from a total of 1,199 starts in 1990 to 644 starts in 1991, almost half.

That is the record the minister boasts about when he says this government—I hope I have not lost his words, they were so memorable—"was managing prudently and well". I do not consider that set of figures to be prudence or competence in management.

There are more disturbing figures. The food banks in the Kingston area experienced significant growth in 1991 over 1990 figures, a growth of 15.6 per cent in the number of parcels delivered. It is clear that they are not always able to meet all the demands placed on them. That is the report from the Partners in Mission Food Bank operating in Kingston.

There are other disturbing trends in the economy that the government has failed to address. The Canadian Federation of Labour in a recent survey it conducted in the fall of 1991 found that 36 per cent of Ontario's small businesses are considering moving all or part of their operations out of the province.

The minister, I am sure, has some personal knowledge of businesses that have moved out of his riding. Later in my remarks I will be referring to some of the ones that have moved out of my riding of Kingston and the Islands.

They have moved out for two reasons. I will grant the minister that. It is not just the policies of the federal government; it is also the policies of the provincial government in Ontario that have caused heartache and disturbance to thousands of people and they are leaving the province like flies.

The hon. member for Oshawa is laughing. He, of course, used to be a supporter of that government. He can afford to laugh. He got out of the morass. He got off the sinking ship before it dragged the province down. He is still laughing. I am surprised he would take such a callous attitude toward his constituents.

This year bankruptcies are running 50 per cent ahead of last year, with retailers hardest hit followed by manufacturers, wholesalers, restaurants and construction companies. What we have in Canada today is a lot of bad news brought about by a government which is unable to deal with economic problems in a rational and meaningful way.

The world-wide recession is what is blamed by the government for the present mess. But we all know that the recession in Canada started before it started anywhere else and is worse in Canada than it is almost anywhere else. The reason that it is worse and the reason it started sooner is because of the policies of the government.

There were three major policies that have caused this difficulty for our country and I will go through each of them in turn. First, free trade; second, tax reform Tory style; and, third, high interest rates.

The free trade agreement, which the government negotiated and said was going to save Canada from everything, has been a complete disaster for this country. The minister laughs. He knows that is true. He knows how many jobs have been lost in his own riding. I know that there have been a significant number of jobs lost in my riding attributable directly to free trade. It is not just the recession; it is people moving out. That has made the recession worse in Canada. It has crippled Canadian industry in a way that has not happened in this century, at least not since the great depression.

The chief negotiator for Canada, Simon Reisman, who sold this country out, who gave it away to the Americans in the free trade negotiations, has consistently tried to hide his incompetence. Now he is apologizing for the deal in effect saying that perhaps the Americans are playing unfair, that they are not doing what they said they would do, they are not living up to their side of the bargain. Well, he did not get it in writing; he gave everything away. He had the wool pulled over his eyes by the Americans.

We said so during the campaign. What was his response? He called the Leader of the Opposition at the time a traitor. With respect, I think we know who the traitor was.

I think this free trade deal has cost Canadians jobs. It has cost jobs in my riding. It has cost jobs across the country but particularly in Ontario.

I have some quotations I would like to read about what has gone on. A major plant in Kingston that employed a little over 60 employees when it closed was K. D. Manufacturing. I will read part of the article that appeared in the Kingston The Whig–Standard last fall:

> K.D. Manufacturing operated in Kingston for more than 70 years as the largest producer of wooden picture frames in Canada. Its 60-plus employees worked in the Montreal Street plant for an average of 20 years. At one time more than 100 workers were employed there.
> But now the company is enjoying the advantages of free trade on the other side of the border.
> The whole plant, which was family owned, closed down in Kingston and moved south of the border.

I quote here from the owner of the company, Howard Kelly. He said: "We have been pleased with the move because of our sales retention. We didn't lose much of our business". He added that about 90 per cent of his business was still in Canada. Free trade makes it easier to sell goods in both countries. Ninety per cent of your business is in Canada, and you move to the United States. That is the advantage of the free trade deal that the government talks about so enthusiastically. "Most important it now allows us to manufacture products more competitively with our North American competitors and gives us more exposure to the U.S. market", he said. "Free trade, cheaper non-union labour, a new market and a state loan were all factors but there are no simple explanations".

A state loan to help set up business, where was the government with its adjustment programs for Canadian workers to help this kind of business stay in Canada? There were not any.

I have another series of quotes. The Whig-Standard the same day published an article about whether or not free trade had created a level playing field:

> Despite the free trade agreement, Kingston's economic development officer is concerned that Canadian companies are being pressured to open plants in the U.S.
> Wejay Machine Products Co. Ltd., which designs and builds custom, automated material-handling and packaging machines for the aluminum, steel, paper and textiles industries, is one company Kingston Township expanding its presence in the U.S. market.

I am sure it meant from Kingston Township but it does not say that in the article. So here was a company operating in Canada that felt it could not get business in the United States unless it opened a branch plant in that country and started producing its products there.

I quote from Mr. David Cash, Kingston's very competent economic development officer. He said:

> But it seems to me that the spirit of the free trade agreement is such that a U.S. company shouldn't discriminate against a company located in Canada.

We were told that was exactly what free trade was going to do. That is what Simon was running around the country saying. That is what the Prime Minister was running around the country saying. That is what the Minister of Finance at the time was running around the country saying. Who was telling the truth? We did not get that kind of deal.

Then Mr. Cash said, and I quote again from the article:

> Mr. Cash is still concerned that the free trade agreement is not working out the way it was supposed to do. "The whole idea of free trade was, and still is, that you can serve your American market from Canada without duties, so I get concerned whenever U.S. companies are pressuring their suppliers in Canada to move or expand their operations into the States, but I don't know what I can do about it.
> It seems to me to be a fairly new and emerging concern."

It is a concern, but one that this government ignores completely. There is absolutely nothing that the government is doing to assist in this problem.

We had the Prime Minister rattling his sabres the other day saying that maybe there was some problem and the United States was being unfair in free trade. Of course, he is a great friend of the President. We have all heard what good terms he and the President are on. He and the former President used to sing duets together, but it is not doing any good now. Canadian industry is still suffering as a result of the free trade deal and this government's policy in supporting it.

I want to quote from the Prime Minister again. I quote from a more recent edition of The Whig-Standard, March 17. There was an excellent article written by Ian Austen of Southam News which was printed in the paper. It quotes the Prime Minister. Listen to this; this is unbelievable. He says:

> Our highest priority is to have an agreement that ends the threat to Canadian industry from U.S. protectionists who harass and restrict our exports through the use of trade remedy laws.

That is what the Prime Minister is quoted as having said in the House of Commons in March 1987.

We all know that that objective was not achieved in the free trade negotiations. The government failed Canadians in getting what it said was a prime objective. "It was the highest priority", the Prime Minister said. Of course, we have heard him say things like that before and we all know that he is talking through his hat.

The article goes on to say about the free trade deal that:

> The lingering problems are two-fold: The trade agreement has neither changed the way the Americans operate nor made solving disputes any faster.

It states quite correctly:

> As for the Honda case, the free trade agreement doesn't even offer the hope of a binding settlement.
> The two governments are in the early stages of setting up a bi-national panel to review the dispute. But in this and all customs cases, neither government will be bound by its findings.

The article refers to Mr. Ritchie, the deputy negotiator who helped poor old Simon try to sell the country out, and says:

> Mr. Ritchie now acknowledges it is a major flaw in the deal he helped create.

Of course this was supposed to create all these jobs and it did not. But the government does not seem concerned about unemployment. It has done nothing in the budget to assist the unemployed. The article goes on to say:

> As well, during the recession 10 years ago, only 22 per cent of those left unemployed in Ontario lost their jobs because of permanent factory closings. Today the figure is 65 per cent.

That was the 1981-82 recession that we hear so much about from this government. Twenty-two per cent of those left unemployed in Ontario lost their jobs because of permanent factory closings. Today the figure is 65 per cent. It is 65 per cent who are out of work because of permanent factory closings.

I suggest to the minister—and he knows this probably better than I but does not want to admit it—the reason that all those factories have closed is because of the free trade deal. It has been a disaster, and it is a cornerstone of Tory policy under this government.

The second cornerstone is tax reform, Tory-style. By that I refer of course to the goods and services tax. We have had a massive tax shift in Canada since this government took office in 1984, and it is a tax shift that I suggest to you is the reason Canadians all across Canada are complaining that taxes are too high. The government does not heed these complaints. It has lowered them very slightly in this budget, but the reduction is so minuscule that it is difficult to measure in most Canadian pocketbooks.

Canadians know they are paying a lot more in taxes, and they are right. What has happened is that we have had a change from the world of corporate tax as a means of raising revenue to the field of personal tax. The Tories are hitting the people who are least able to pay. That is what is going on, and I have some figures to support that.

First of all, in a recent Maclean's article, I think it was just a week or two ago, there was a graph showing budgetary revenues as a percentage of total federal spending. Where does the money come from?

In 1984, 41 per cent of the revenue came from personal income tax. Forty-one per cent of federal spending was raised by means of personal income tax. Today, it is 47.7 per cent, a very significant increase.

Corporate income taxes in 1984 accounted for 13.2 per cent of the revenues used for government spending. Today, it is 7.2 per cent, a very significant reduction. What the government has done is it has taken the taxes off the corporations and has transferred the tax to the individuals. That is exactly what it has done.

The minister shakes his head. He knows this is accurate. There is nothing inaccurate about this. If he pulls out the government's own taxation figures from the raw figures he will see that there has been a reduction in corporate taxes as a percentage. It is not difficult to see that and this graph, I suggest, has shown this. It shows that that is the case and it is an accurate graph.

Sales and excise tax revenues have actually decreased over the period. The graph is based on an estimate of the GST revenues for 1992-93. One suspects that if the GST were applied in a normal economic year, not one where there is a recession, the revenues would be much higher. But time will tell, time will tell.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, we are up to 40 now.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, but as a percentage of the total grab I think the member knows the GST would be higher.

An hon. member: What about corporate income taxes?

Mr. Milliken: So would corporate income taxes, so would personal income tax, but as a percentage of the total I am suggesting to the member that the GST would in fact be more.

Mr. McDermid: Liberal economics.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "Liberal economics". I can tell him that Canadians would much prefer Liberal economics at this stage, and all the polls indicate it.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: If the hon. member is so sure that is not true, I urge him to advise the Prime Minister to call an election and we will find out.

The Conservatives would like Canadians to believe that this latest budget offers Canadians a significant tax break when in fact we all know it does not. Turning to the reduction in the personal income surtax, that tax was originally brought in by this government in 1986 and was subsequently increased on two occasions. It was one of the 40 changes in personal income tax the government has brought in to soak Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. McDermid: We are up to 40 now.

Mr. Milliken: Forty changes to personal income tax which have resulted in increases for Canadians. The change in this tax offers virtually no relief. The reduction in the surtax actually benefits high income earners more than low income earners. For a family of four—

Mr. McDermid: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: I see the minister is laughing. He should listen to these figures because maybe it would make him sing a different tune in cabinet meetings where they discuss these matters.

For a family of four with a combined income of $15,000, this tax cut will result in a savings of $2 for 1992. If the same family had an income of $75,000, it would save $74 in 1992.

Mr. McDermid: How much did the ones with $15,000 pay?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member probably knows that answer better than I do. After all, he is a minister of the Crown who has at his fingertips all the figures he should need for answering those kinds of questions.

Mr. McDermid: Very little, if any.

Mr. Milliken: The goods and services tax, as well as being the most unpopular tax in Canadian history, has contributed to inflation in this country. The figures are all out on that. Over one per cent of last year's inflation was attributed directly to the goods and services tax and it has cost Canadians dearly. It has driven Canadians across the border in a cross-border shopping revolt, which has driven more Canadians out of business, exacerbating the recession created by the high interest rate policy of the government.

I turn to that as the third tenet of Tory economic mismanagement in Canada. They have pursued a policy of high interest rates and it has been a disaster. It was the high interest rate policy that initially caused the recession in the first place. It was one of the major contributing causes to the recession. It is the thing that slowed Canada down and brought Canadian industry to its knees at a time when the rest of the world was not yet experiencing this kind of slow-down. The fact that high interest rates have continued throughout the time that we have lingered in this recession has only served to make matters worse.

Canadians may be easily deceived into thinking that because interest rates have dropped they are somehow low. But in fact if we accept the government's figures that the year-over-year inflation rate is 1.6 per cent in January and 1.7 per cent in February, and if the bank rate is at 7 per cent or 7.5 per cent or 7.75 per cent, then clearly the real interest rate being paid by Canadians is still over 5 per cent, and that is unacceptable. It is too high. It is costing Canadians much more than any other group in the industrialized world is paying in terms of real interest costs.

That high interest cost is a disaster for Canadian business. It means that anybody seeking to carry on or operate a business in Canada and borrow money in the process, pays more than his or her American counterpart. It means that anybody seeking to borrow money for any purpose is going to pay higher rates than his or her American counterpart. The high interest rate keeps the dollar high so that Canadian exports are more expensive than they would otherwise be. If the dollar were allowed to drop to a more reasonable level, closer to where it should be, then Canadian exports would flourish. There would be generation of new jobs in Canada and prosperity could be restored. But the government persists in this high interest rate policy led by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

The fact that the governor is intent on wrestling inflation to the ground is his supposed justification for this ridiculous policy. Frankly we have always managed with some inflation throughout this century. At times it has been unacceptably high, but we have had inflation for a long time. Not since the 1930s have we had deflation. The governor of the bank backed by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance have been supporting this high interest policy which I suggest is unacceptable. The result of it is high unemployment, lost business opportunities, the loss of businesses to the United States, and a difficult market for Canada's export commodities.

I would like to quote from an article that appeared in The Globe and Mail on December 5 by Mario Dalla-Vicenza from Regina. He is senior vice-president and chief financial officer of Ipsco. Here is what he had to say about the government's disastrous high interest rate policy:

> Stable prices may be a legitimate and necessary goal of the Bank of Canada, but the short-sighted and overzealous tactics it is using to achieve this goal are cause for concern. In fact, these tactics are bringing the economy of Canada to its knees.

That is what he said. The minister and the other members of his government clearly ignored this kind of advice. He went on:

> The bank's policy of high interest rates, which brings with it an artificially high value of the Canadian dollar, has crucified the mining, forestry, farming and goods producing sectors of the Canadian economy.

That is the opinion of a respected businessman in western Canada, and we know the government loves to listen to businessmen. The Tories always claim they are running the Government of Canada like a business, but if anybody else ran a business the way they run the Government of Canada they would be out of business.

Don McGillivray, a respected financial journalist, wrote a column on February 25 in The Ottawa Citizen in which he said:

> There never has been political support in Canada for an attempt to wrestle inflation to the ground, no matter what unemployment resulted. There is less support for such a policy now near the end of the second year of a painful recession for which the Bank of Canada must bear part of the blame.
> That doesn't alter the fact that the governor believes himself to be correct. He told the Commons committee that there is no basis for believing that monetary policy can focus on a number of different targets at the same time.
> He seems to live in a more neat and tidy world than the rest of us.

I think everybody in the House would agree with that statement. He continued:

> It's a world where action to achieve one simple goal is unrelentingly pursued, where action can deal with what ails the economy.
> The governor has overreached himself and suffered a rebuke. His policies did not command much confidence on the part of Canadians before. They command less support now.
> Canadians have seen how a single minded pursuit of zero inflation hurts things they care deeply about. They want the central bank to worry too.

"They want the government to worry too", he might have added to the article. The government ignores this problem and has allowed the governor to continue on this ridiculous course that has cost Canadians and has cost Canadians dearly.

It is part of a three-pronged effort on the part of the government to destroy the Canadian economy, it would appear. It does not listen to anybody who has any criticisms or sensible suggestions for improving the situation. I may say that includes the suggestions coming from me in this speech. However the minister may be paying closer attention than he lets on.

The minister brought in a budget that he claimed was a good news budget. The minister sounded optimistic and rosy: everything was going to be fine by 1993 and in 1992 we would get by and with the tax breaks he was offering Canadians everybody would feel good.

Let us just see how the budget was received by Canadians. I suggest Canadians know this budget was not what the government trumped it up to be. It was not all the good news that the government said it was.

I would like to quote first from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. One would think this group, being a group of businessmen, would be one the government would listen to. After all, the government says it is running the Government of Canada like a business. These people are businessmen. I presume they know what they are doing. They certainly know a lot more of what they are doing than the government does.

Let us look at what the Chamber said:

> The chamber, Canada's largest business group, expressed disappointment that the government had once again strayed from its commitment to serious deficit reduction, delaying harsh action for at least another year.

We heard the minister in his speech say how they had cut back and how we were going to have the deficit reduced. Well time will tell. It has gone up for four years, as I said, but it may go down this year.

• (1240)

The news release quotes Tim Reid, president of the chamber, in case the minister did not know. It continued:

> First, he noted that the government's program expenditures are forecast to rise by 4.7 per cent in fiscal 1992–93, well in excess of the 2.7 per cent inflation rate. "That doesn't tell us there's a very firm commitment to containing spending in areas where it counts", said Reid.

A good quote, I thought, and a valid criticism. If the government says it is doing one thing and doing another, there is something wrong. It goes on:

> Secondly, the 1992–93 deficit (now forecast at $27.5 billion) is "significantly higher than had been predicted in earlier budgets"—

It certainly is. My recollection of the 1985 budget was that by this year the deficit would be down to something like $10 billion. Perhaps the hon. member for Oshawa can remember the figures better. I think $8 billion or $10 billion was what it was supposed to be. Now it is at $27 billion. Last year the government told us that it was going to be $24 billion, but I do not want to go through all those figures. I know the minister finds them very tedious.

> —is significantly higher than had been predicted in earlier budgets"—"and far too high when you consider that it will be added to an accumulated debt load that already stands at $420 billion, and is the most severe in the industrial world with the exception of Italy."

Of course the minister and his colleagues like to blame the previous Liberal government for the deficit. They do not know what else to do. After all they have doubled it, but they all say: "Of course it is not our fault. It is all somebody else's fault". Everything is somebody else's fault.

Going back to the news release, it continued:

> Thirdly, there is the debt to GDP ratio, the relationship between the debt and our ability to pay it. Noted Reid, "In the last budget, they promised us that it would fall next year—for the first time in this government's mandate—to under 60 per cent. Now they admit it will rise to over 62 per cent, and that's also one of the worst in the industrialized world".

I have more quotes on that, because for years the government has been planning to get some control on this debt to GDP ratio. One of the things it boasts about is how the debt to GDP ratio is something that it can bring under control. It always puts in figures about how the annual deficit is shrinking as a percentage of the Gross Domestic Product. Of course it is, when we consider that the Gross Domestic Product is usually growing and the government has managed to keep the deficit size a fairly level one. It has gone up, but very slowly.

Let us hear what the government said in its economic and fiscal statement in November 1984. It said:

> A continuously rising ratio of debt to income threatens growth in three ways. It puts upward pressure on interest rates by raising expectations of future inflation and by competing for private savings. It limits the government's ability to meet priority economic and social needs. And it symbolizes a state of economic mismanagement that undermines confidence and threatens the job creating private investment that Canada needs.
> Fiscal policy must ease the burden on monetary policy and contribute directly to increased confidence and to lower interest rates.

That is what they said in 1984. One does wish they had heeded their own advice. They have maintained a large deficit, have continually put upward pressure on interest rates, have raised expectations of future inflation and have competed with private savings. They have ignored their own policy statement for seven or eight years.

In 1989 the minister said:

> The actions taken in this budget are designed first to stabilize, and then to lower the debt to GDP ratio. It stabilizes at just over 56 per cent of GDP in 1990–91.

Well, it did not. It is going to 62 per cent in 1992–93. But the government ignores that: it is just a change and is not a case of incompetent management. It would not admit to that. Everybody in Canada, I would suggest, knows it is.

In the fiscal plan in 1988, the government said:

> By 1991–92 the debt to GDP ratio declines.

It does not. In the February 1991 budget the government said:

> The growth in public debt as a proportion of GDP is halted in 1991–92, the first time its upward trend has been arrested since 1974–75.

Of course that was wrong. It was not. Thereafter, it declines steadily throughout the fiscal framework period.

In other words, the government has been consistently wrong in its dealings with the public debt problems and with deficit problems. It has not been able to get a grip on the subject, despite the rhetoric and statements that it was bringing the debt, the GDP ratio, under control and was bringing it under control right away.

I see the hon. member for Winnipeg South has floated in. I hope that she is enjoying my comments because she is a person who has some influence on the government and could perhaps go to the cabinet meeting some day and urge these ministers to do something to clean up the mess they have created after seven years of mismanagement.

In case anybody thinks that by quoting only the chamber I am giving a distorted view of Canadians' ideas about this budget, I want to quote from a Gallup poll.

[Translation]

> Fewer than one out of four Canadians (23 per cent) who were familiar with the latest federal Budget felt that it would strengthen Canada's economy. Most respondents (59 per cent) felt that the measures announced in the February 25 Budget by the Minister of Finance, Don Mazankowski, would do nothing for the economy, while 18 per cent had no opinion.

This is a poll that was published in today's La Presse.

[English]

Only 23 per cent of Canadians think that the budget is going to do something to help the economy. Everybody else, the vast majority of Canadians, thinks it will do absolutely nothing.

The hon. minister asks if the 1982 results are in it. I do not see the 1982 results in it.

I have another quotation from Don McGillivray. The minister groans. Obviously he does not agree with what Mr. McGillivray writes, but most Canadians realize that Mr. McGillivray is a fair, honest and objective commentator on the government's economic performance. In a recent article he said: "We have lost two years of normal growth in the economy. We have lost the output of about two million workers. We have told this army of Canadians that their country has no use for them. They will bear the scars of this recession for the rest of their lives. If that is not a good reason to kick up a bit of a fuss about the economy, what is?"

That is exactly what we have been trying to do; to get the government to do something to alleviate the unemployment that it has created by these three disastrous policy initiatives.

I am tempted to quote from another very capable source, the hon. member for Ottawa South, my learned and very competent colleague. He made a speech in this House on second reading of this bill on February 28. It was an excellent speech. I would have thought that after hearing a speech as the hon. member for Ottawa South made, the government would have packed its bags and left office right away. It was such a devastating condemnation of its policies that you would think the government would get out. It was obvious that there was something seriously wrong with the Government of Canada.

He said: "This is the tired budget of a tired government, perplexed by the problems that confront it, though many are of its own making; showing no vision, no imagination, not even comprehension of the difficulties Canada must tackle before the end of the century".

That is a fair comment on the budget and one that reflects the views of hundreds of thousands of Canadians across this country. They are appalled at the government's callous attitude.

Finally, I would like to quote from another extremely competent writer on these matters, Bruce Little, an economics reporter for The Globe and Mail. He has had a distinguished career in writing for financial publications in Canada. I believe he was managing editor for The Globe and Mail at one time.

In a recent article he said: "This recession is different. Canada's last downturn was deep, but when it was over, the economy rebounded smartly and cleanly into what turned out to be the long expansion of the 1980s.

This downturn has been shallower but far messier. Almost two full years after the recession began, the economy is still scuttling crab–like across the landscape, unable to set a clear course".

He went on to say: "Corporate profits have been scoured like never before. Last time, pre-tax profits fell 40 per cent in the first year of the recession. In less than two years, they bounced back to pre-recession levels. In this recession, they followed the same track for five quarters, then parted company. In the final three months of 1991, they were 44 per cent below levels reached two years ago".

In other words, corporate profits just bottomed out. Going into the last recession, profits were 11.8 per cent of GDP and went as low as 7 per cent before recovering. This time, profits were only 7.5 per cent of GDP on the way in and have since fallen to 4.1 per cent, the lowest level since the great depression of the 1930s.

It is that kind of grim economic picture painted by economic writers across Canada that one might have thought would be reflected in the budget. One would think that the Minister of Finance would have said that the government has to do something to try to ease this crisis. Instead, the government has done nothing.

The Liberal Party has put forward a series of proposals to the government to suggest that it do something to get the economy rolling again. Two of the proposals have been adopted: the change in the down payment requirements for new housing, and the allowance for the RRSP moneys to be used to finance the purchase of a house. Those are both suggestions put forward by the Leader of the Opposition in the course of a recent pre-budget speech urging the government to take these steps. The government has seen fit to do both.

The other two major parts of the platform have been ignored, namely the assistance for municipalities and assistance for food banks.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in what has transpired here this morning and I want to congratulate the minister. Essentially the minister had nothing to say this morning and he managed to do that in four pages. We should all be immensely grateful that he at least was concise.

To the member for Kingston and the Islands, we should all thank his press clipping service. The clippings expanded substantially on the quality of the speech and they certainly added to the quantity of his speech. The problem is that there is a gem of truth there, but at this time of year the seeds are covered in a certain layer of horse manure, and it will take at lot of heat and light before they germinate. The hope will be that sometime later this year we will actually have a spring in Ottawa and there will be some germination and some growth.

My problem is that the member presents life in a caricature form. He pretends that by reading extensively from newspapers across the country, one can get some sense of the conditions under which most Canadians labour at the moment. I do not believe you can. I believe that those people who write newspaper columns are doing the best they can to present accurately their opinions, the facts as they see them, the effect of the depression on the Canadian economy at the moment. It is very difficult for them, as it is for us in this Chamber. For most Canadians, there will be no trip to Taiwan. There will be no tour of Europe. There will be no break. There will be no respite from the masses. There will be no free lunch. There will be no chance to be inside and warm this winter. For many of our Canadian people, this is going to be the culmination of a very difficult period and it is not getting any better.

That cry of frustration is there and very strong. Some have used the episode of food banks and the fact that they are being used more extensively now, even more perhaps than during the Great Depression in Canada. They are being used by different people. The poor are not quite so easily identified anymore. It is easy to identify those who are homeless. It is not so easy to identify the reasons why people who used to think of themselves as good productive taxpayers in Canada, part of the mainstream fabric of our society, do not have a job anymore.

It is very difficult to listen to the frustration of those people who have done all of the things that their society said they have to do to get a good job and the job is not there any more.

It is difficult to explain to them that when their factory closes these days, it is most likely not to be a lay-off or a downturn or a change in our economy. It is difficult to explain to them why the whole plant has left Canada.

Some will attribute this as being the fault of the global market, the fault of any particular government. It really does not matter to most Canadians who is at fault here. They do not care whether it is this government or that government or somebody in Geneva or somebody in Taiwan. What they care about is their own human condition; that in their own self-interest, having done what society said they ought to do, they do not even have the opportunity to seek gainful employment any more. That is a tragedy that is not carried very often in our public media, not carried very often in our popular press.

It is one of those things worthy of a story once a year, or if someone gets really serious about it, a series of seven or eight stories on how the poor are surviving the depression. I watch the media every day. Members have this fault. We are obsessed by what the media has to say. Every once in a while some television station in some major city will hear of a lay-off, a shut-down. It will rush out there and for about one or two minutes, or if it gets real excited, four or five minutes, it will run a story about people's lives, about the impact of the shutting down of that plant on the economy of Cornwall, Kingston, Oshawa or any other community.

I have yet to see it go back the second day when the cameras are not around and ask people what it is like that day, the third day, the fourth day, and after five and six months. That is the difference in perspective. The Canadian people do not have the luxury of watching their lives fall apart for 30 seconds at a time. For them, it lasts for a much longer period and the ramifications are much worse.

Part of what I would object to in this budget, as I would with the province of Ontario, any of the other provinces or any other budget that I have ever seen, is that the version of restraint that is sometimes preached in this Chamber is a lot different than the one that is reality back home. It is fine for ministers of the Crown to say they spent to much money, so they are going to have to chop this and chop that. It is fine for this government in its latest budget proposal to say it cannot do the things it wants to do, so it will not have a child care program. For a government, that is an economic decision on how to put together a budget, an expression of political priorities. Once the decision is reached, it is over with.

The ministers of the Crown simply have to explain for two or three days, if the reporters are insistent, why it is that children are in poverty in this great wealth called Canada. The ministers of the Crown at best will have to spend a few hours of their time explaining to interest groups and to members of the House of Commons why children cannot have child care, why children will have to live the rest of their lives without it.

To a minister who has to defend this government policy, this is awkward, this is painful, but only for a short period of time. While they do that and while they explain that and while they rationalize all of that, they are mindful, as we all would be, that this will go away. For the child, for the mother, for the parent and for the nation, this will not go away.

I read with interest that the government is considering a few other changes. Excuse me for being cynical, but I heard a minister of the Crown say that medicare is a sacred trust. Some days I wish I had just started in politics. I wish that I did not know any better. I wish that when some minister of the Crown said something was a sacred trust the little alarms did not go off in my head. I have heard that far too many times.

Whenever someone says something is a sacred trust, it is a real good gamble that it is going, that it is in trouble, that somebody somewhere is thinking about really cutting this one.

• (1300)

As someone who has been involved in political life in Canada, it bothers me somewhat that at the end of 20 years, when a minister of the Crown says something is a sacred trust, I get worried. I become concerned about what is really on the agenda. What is going on here? What do they really mean? I have been through it long enough to know that when they start using that kind of language up front, something really dastardly is happening down near the other end. It is similar to the middle of a political campaign when people are stupid enough—I use those words advisedly—to accept anybody from any political stripe when they say: "We are going to institute a national child care policy. We are going to provide child care to people all over Canada". People should say: "Wait a minute. Who are you? Have you every done that before in your lives? Is that really what you want to do? Is that your priority? Did you do the same thing with some other promise that you made and not questioned or not challenged that".

I think the faults in politics are many. Some are inside this Chamber. More of them are outside this Chamber. There are people who say: "I liked the look of his jaw. I liked their campaign jingle. I liked the way their literature is designed. They have a snappy ad that says I should vote this way or that way". The Canadian people have to learn how to make their political judgments in a much tougher way.

There are those who relish the notion that this government is bottoming out in the polls, as they say. It has been at the bottom before. That does not bother it at all. The election is not on at the moment.

I noticed that the minister, in his introductory remarks, said that by 1996 the need to borrow money is going to be reduced to zero. If the Canadian people get a chance to intervene somewhere between now and 1996, it will be reduced to zero a lot earlier than that. I hope that the Canadian people never make this kind of a mistake again.

To be as blunt as I can, this is a political government that has made its priorities clear. It has established who it represents, where its political priorities are, and it did it again with this budget. The new catch phrase is "targeting". The Minister of Finance says he wants to target the moneys a little better. That is exactly what the government did. Let me give an example.

In the field of housing, several people suggested that first time homeowners are having some trouble. Maybe if they had RRSPs you could let them use that money to buy their first home. A small perversion of that scheme is to broaden it just a little bit and say that anybody who has RRSPs can use their money to buy any house. It does not have to be their first house. It does not have to be modest. The government knows that people who have money put away in these kinds of savings plans are also likely to have a house. Therefore, when you read the fine print in the proposals the government made in its budget, you begin to get some understanding that it does not care a hoot whether it is a first time homeowner or not. It knows that it most likely will not be.

If they have money in that kind of a savings plan, they probably are not looking at buying their first house. The early trends in the real estate industry are that it is not first time homeowners, it is second and third time homeowners, and they are buying larger houses and there is a heck of a good tax break for them to do that. Would we not all be stupid if we thought the Canadian people would not read the fine print before they made that kind of an investment? That is exactly what they are doing.

Who is it helping? It is helping the upper and middle-income groups to get into the larger houses. There is nothing wrong with that at all, but to pretend somehow that it is other than a real estate gimmick would be quite wrong. As one who said it was an idea worth considering, I am a little unhappy on how that got targeted at the end of the process to a group that was not asking for more help and away from a group that really needed some help. It bothers me somewhat that they did that.

Here is one of the things I object to in politics these days. The government said, prior to the throne speech, that it was going to allow people to have 5 per cent down payments. That will stimulate sales in real estate somewhat and there is nothing wrong with that at all. It should also have said: "Consumer alert. There are people who should not be getting into 95 per cent mortgages. Take a good look at this. Here is an option you did not have before that you do have now". In the hot real estate markets, real estate companies and those who build homes were already doing some of these things.

In a place called Cookstown, Ontario, just north of Toronto, as an example, let me show the end effects of this. Once the government had established that the 5 per cent limit was right, then it had to turn it over to its bureaucracy at CMHC, very find, hard working, diligent, honest and intelligent civil servants.

Somebody had to decide that there would be regulations. You cannot have laws any more without regulations, and they have to be applied in different ways.

When you go to Cookstown, Ontario, and if you stand on the four corners, you will be standing on the division point between three different areas. On one corner the upper limit for the houses that can have a 5 per cent down payment is $125,000. That was the original idea. Across the street it is $175,000. On the other corner it is $250,000.

That is the same corner. There are three houses and three different parts to that little intersection. People in Canada look at that and say: "What is going on down there? Do these people not know this is all in one small town in central Ontario?" They do, but we see the configuration of the mindset that sets in here so that a program which perhaps makes good sense, when it is announced, when it is translated on the ground, does not make quite such imminent good sense.

The Canadian people are beginning to understand a little bit better. This is a government that, in its budget this year, did not just target the way that it will apply benefits to people, but targeted the way there would be income tax reduction for those whom it thinks are worthwhile in our society, those in upper income groups.

It was interesting that when it looked at the area of Canadian manufacturers, the government thought that offshore manufacturers, offshore investment, ought to get a little better break than Canadians. That is strange for this government, purporting to be a national Canadian government.

I have been interested in following all the arguments around the free trade agreement and the expansion of that agreement into Mexico. I have watched some who have been fierce advocates of free trade with the United States now saying: "Wait a minute. That is foul. The Americans are not playing fair. This is doing bad things to the Honda plant in Alliston. This is doing bad things to the softwood lumber industry in Canada".

Here is what I do not understand. If the government of the day is such a great manager, if it understands industry and manufacturing so well, when did the Americans ever work not in their own best self–interest? I do not remember a time in history when they ever refused to do that, when they ever said otherwise.

An American entrepreneur is not necessarily in business to do good things all around the world. There are lots of Americans who do that, but those who are entrepreneurial in scope, who are in the business manufacturing sector, never pretended that the reason they run a manufacturing plant somewhere in the United States is to benefit Canada. They never pretended that for a moment.

People say that they are interpreting regulations the wrong way. Why would they not? It is in their best interests to do that. That is what they have always done. That is what they are continuing to do.

I saw a very interesting analysis of free trade with Canada and the United States and extending that into Mexico. It essentially said that the purpose of the exercise was simply to provide American manufacturers with unfettered access into Canada and Mexico. That is what the free trade agreement with Canada did, and that is what the one with Mexico purports to do.

If you look at it from that perspective, that is a pretty good deal for an American manufacturer; take away all the restrictions that would come north into Canada, take away all the restrictions that might apply south into Mexico, make sure that you can use all the raw material, all the resources and pit one part of the North American continent against another and then sell madly to both markets.

It is oversimplification. In many ways that is what I see happening with the current free trade agreement with the United States. I see a simple extension of that into Mexico. From an American perspective, it makes eminent, good sense. Americans ought to be enthusiastic about that kind of a trade deal.

Canadians would be stupid to accept that. More and more Canadians are beginning now to say: "Wait a minute. The last time around, when you talked about free trade with the United States, we accepted that the Americans, by and large, are our friends, that we constantly work back and forth between Canada and the United States. Many of our industries here in Canada are branch plants of American industries. Okay, maybe we will try this thing and see whether it works out".

For the part of Canada that I come from in southern Ontario, the manufacturing heartland for Canada, the results have been disastrous.

To go back to that targeting theme that I was talking about a little bit earlier, it is not for everybody.

• (1310)

There are some entrepreneurs who have done quite nicely under the free trade agreement with the United States. The people who have paid the price are the people who generate the wealth, the workers in those plants. They are not there any more. People have been exercising their options to move their plants into the southern United States. It is not quite as rosy as it first looked. It is not quite as good as you might have thought. The benefits are not exactly there. Once you are in place and manufacturing in the States, it is not quite as good as it looks in the brochure but it is kind of late in the day to talk about coming back into Canada. Therein lies the tragedy for this budgetary process.

Mr. McDermid: Some of them are coming back.

Mr. Breaugh: The minister interjects that some of them are coming back, but they will have trouble getting through the borders with all the cross-border shopping. We will wait and see. I am a fair person. I am quite prepared to take a look at the analysis of a free trade agreement and see what the good side is and what the bad side is. Where I come from and for the area I represent, times are tough and we are getting hammered by a free trade agreement that is not stupid from an American perspective. It is a very good agreement from that perspective. It is only stupid from our side of the bargaining table.

I come from Oshawa, a town that has had difficult times this winter. Some people will look at the manufacturing sector, particularly automobiles, and say we kind of weathered the storm there a little bit in Oshawa. We have not, not by a long shot, and we know that. We are being pressured, as a lot of communities are in Canada, by General Motors to take a look at how we operate and what our trade union agreements are and what the community can do and just exactly what can happen that would make General Motors continue to function in our community.

We are looking at all of those things. A lot of these things are not very pleasant for us. A lot of them involve taking apart some of the things on which our successful economic union in Oshawa has been built on over the years: a trade union that can freely bargain for its membership; a company that can produce a quality product and that has access to a market in the United States. These are not simple things that you kind of pull apart.

We are working each and every day to see whether we can come to an agreement with General Motors that will make the Oshawa plants competitive in exactly the same way as the American plants are. We understand that is important, but that is not going to do us much good if we lose our jobs in the process.

In conclusion, I want to say that this is a government that has made its intentions clear. Surely there can be nobody left in Canada who doubts what this government wants to do. It is the obligation of members on this side and the Canadian people to tell it what we think of it.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made reference to promises that were made, glossy brochures, all of these wild and wonderful things that happened during election campaigns, and how the people of Canada should not believe these things. Is he in essence saying that the people of Ontario should not have believed what the NDP promised in Ontario during the last election in its beautiful brochures? Mind you, he may be right, because the NDP in Ontario certainly has not followed through on many of its promises, if any at all.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I watched a motion picture on the weekend called Blaze. It is a motion picture about a gentleman by the name of Earl K. Long, Governor of Louisiana at one time. One of the characters was told by her mother, before she went to New Orleans, that she should never trust a person who says "trust me." One of the first questions she put to Earl K. Long, Governor of the great State of Louisiana, was: "Can I trust you, Governor?" His response was: "Hell, no". It struck me that was a pretty good credo for modern politics. Most politicians, if they were honest, would say: "Wait a minute, this is not about you trusting me, this is about you analysing what I am all about. This is about you analysing my track record. You should understand that I may have all the good intentions in the world today, but if there is no money in the kitty tomorrow I am not going to be able to do the things I want to do".

It is not about reading brochures. It should not be about simply listening to commercials. It should not be about who has the best cosmetician to give them the best look for television. It should not be about who has the best press clipping service. It should be a careful, rational analysis about who works in my best interest, and I mean that in a very warm and personal way.

I suggest that those who would say otherwise have come to learn the grim lesson that my friends in the province of Ontario have had to learn since they took over from my good friends the Liberals. When we went through that election campaign, we began it with my good friend Bob Nixon, a very nice man, Treasurer of Ontario, a longstanding member of the Ontario legislature. Bob said: "Gee, things are great in Ontario. We have got like a $28 million surplus". Imagine that, in six short weeks it dropped to about a $200 million deficit. Was Bob Nixon misleading the people of Ontario? No, he was not. I know the man. Bob Nixon was giving the people of Ontario the best information he had. He was wrong, very wrong, and we all regret that, but he did not mean to mislead anybody. He told them the information he had at that given moment in time, but circumstances change.

All of us had better get used to the idea that we are living in a very volatile society. I remind those Liberals who are gloating just a touch over here. When you get up to 54 per cent, right where David Peterson was at the beginning of that provincial election campaign and you are fighting like mad to cause the folks on this side of the aisle to start up a general election, before you start that chant in this Chamber, why do you not read a little bit about what happened to David Peterson, one of the most popular premiers that Ontario ever had, sitting at 54 per cent at the beginning of the election, and see what happened to him at the end of the process. That is the lesson all of us have to learn.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was quite amused to hear the hon. member at the outset of his remarks say that he wanted us to set aside in effect—he did not use these words—partisan considerations in looking at our assessment of policies and try to look at it from the point of view of what the average Canadian wants or expects from his government. It is of course a perfectly good objective.

I guess what I was trying to say in my speech, and that I know he tried to in his in a different way, was: " If this is what the average Canadian wants, where are you best going to get it". Really in an election campaign, which he talked about last, we come down to a choice. The electorate gets a choice between the group of men and women that the electorate thinks are best able to provide the kind of Canada that the electorate wants, that they are able to provide the kind of policies, the programs, the jobs, the opportunities that the Canadian voter at least wants when he or she makes his or her choice at the polls.

What I think he was trying to say in a different way was support the policies that the New Democratic Party is putting forward as a reasonable alternative to the policies that the Government of Canada is now doing. What he was trying to do was pretend that this was a non-partisan approach to government decision making or electoral decision making and of course, we all know that it is not.

I was a little more open in my comments. It was not any of this cloak and dagger stuff that perhaps he has been using a little facetiously here today in that I made it very clear that the choice of this government was a bad choice for Canada and Canadians across the country regret having chosen this group to be the government.

I wonder if he could tell us if he agrees that perhaps Ontario electors have ended up with a bad choice on two rounds now, both by choosing this government here, which has introduced policies that are inimical to the interests of Ontario, and in the choice of the New Democratic Party government which has adopted policies in the province and has scared investors in the province in a way that is inimical to the best interests of Ontarians.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, let me try to correct my friend on a couple of counts here. I am never non-partisan. I am probably the most fiercely partisan person you have ever met in your life. I have only belonged to one political party all my life. Warts and all, I am with them until the end.

I am not stupid enough to believe that my party is without sin and has never made mistakes. I am one of the few who says that very publicly on as many occasions as I can. I have been elected for 20 years. I have never asked anybody to vote for me yet. I tell them what I think. They match that up against their own best self-interest and they make the decisions.

The member is inviting me to castigate my friends at Queen's Park. I have already done that. It would not be new if I said something nasty about Bob Rae. I will offer this as a matter for your consideration.

I spoke last week to the Treasurer of Ontario briefly, an old friend of mine. He admits quite readily this is the worst possible time for anybody to try to run a government anywhere in the world. At the end of our conversation my friend, Floyd Laughren, the guy they call Pink Floyd, made some decisions that I know are choking him. I know the man well. I know that he has offered some proposals and that his whole heart is not right in there. He is going to have to make some decisions that he really does not want to have to make. At the end of it all I asked him how he was making out. He said: "Mike, I love it. This is what it is all about. This is what I worked all my political life to do, to try to form a government. I do not control what kind of situation we get, good times, bad times, whatever. I am here doing the things I believe in. The people will judge us. They will say whether you are right or wrong, whether you gave it your best shot or not, and that is what it is all about. That is as good as it gets and no matter what you say, no matter what you do, no matter how nifty your jingo is, that is the truth of it all. We all just have to give it the best shot we can. The people will decide".

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the serious matter of this budget I feel I have to make a comment on the statements of my hon. friend from Oshawa when he said he has never asked anyone to vote for him. I noticed the surprise on the faces of some of my colleagues across the way. I can only say that I certainly do ask the people of Halifax to vote for me. I consider it only polite to do so.

To the business at hand which is the business of this year's budget.

The finance minister said that he wanted to deliver a strong bottom line to Canadians. That is indeed what he has done, particularly to our 1.5 million unemployed Canadians by making unemployment a part of this government's economic policy. In spite of promises made in the last budget by the member from Etobicoke Centre—and the promises were for jobs, jobs, jobs—there is still nothing in this budget to improve job prospects for the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed. In fact this government actually admits that unemployment will remain at 10 per cent in this country for two more years, and that is nationally.

I look at two of my colleagues on the other side, one from St. John's East and the other from the South Shore. I know, as do they, that unemployment in their ridings is a whole lot higher than 10 per cent.

What this government is essentially asking Canadians is to put their lives on hold. Even worse than putting their lives on hold, it is asking Canadians to watch their lives go down the tubes.

There was no mention of training—

Mr. McCreath: It won't work in Halifax with that nice new contract.

Ms. Clancy: The contract that begins in 1993? My hon. friend talks about the new contract for Halifax. I presume he is talking about the contract to build the coastal patrol vessel. They are supposed to commence in 1993 and heaven knows, that every loyal Nova Scotian prays that that contract will come into being. Indeed that contract should have been given out six or seven years ago. We might now have a coastal patrol vessel that could go out and do some good work on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, as my hon. friend from St. John's East knows.

As my hon. friend from the South Shore knows the problems on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks relate not too distantly to the fact that we do not have the ships that can go out there to enforce our fisheries law.

Mr. McCreath: Tell us about the cuts in the Armed Forces that the Liberals made.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, for the Trudeau years, if only they were back, and back they will be very soon.

Mr. McCreath: They are still with us.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, indeed, the only good thing left in this country are the remnants from those years.

There was no mention of training for the unemployed to allow them to re-enter the work force. For those of us who represent Atlantic Canada where we have seen the fish plants close, where we have seen in my usually economically fairly sound riding of Halifax 800 jobs gone with the closure of the Sears catalogue shopping centre, with the threatened closures at Imperial Oil in Dartmouth, with closures up and down the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, one would have thought that somebody in this government might have given a moment's consideration to people who not only have no jobs but who have under this government's policy no reasonable hope for a job in the near future.

You know what the theory is, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you what the theory of this government is. The theory of this government is move or starve. That theory is the one they want to put into force in Atlantic Canada. I should think that my colleagues on the other side of this Chamber who represent Atlantic Canadian constituencies would feel just as bad about this as I do. I would not mind hearing from them on that score.

In fact, the federal government, in not mentioning training for the unemployed to allow them to re-enter the work force, cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program, this strategy which is aimed at improving employment training to immigrants, to the disabled and to those people who have been forced upon the welfare rolls in this country. Those are the people, those are the ones with the least hope and this government has cut out for them any possibility of hope for a job in the near future or even, at least until an election, the distant future.

An hon. member: Poppycock.

Ms. Clancy: Codswallop is better.

Mr. McCreath: Who wrote your speech?

Ms. Clancy: I write my own speeches, unlike the member for South Shore.

A lot of these people are now relying on social assistance because their eligibility under unemployment insurance has been exhausted. Why has their eligibility under unemployment insurance been exhausted? I will tell you why. Because this government has taken the unemployment insurance program, particularly in Atlantic Canada, where Atlantic Canadians from the South Shore and from Newfoundland depend upon a seasonal economy and depend upon unemployment insurance for part of their yearly income, and it has gutted it. Gutted it. That is what this government has done. It has gutted it. That number of Canadians forced upon the unemployment rolls and then upon the social assistance rolls can only rise. That is the tragedy that we are facing in this country in 1992. Tory times are tough times.

Coupled with this, there is nothing in the budget to get the economy going again, no strategy to improve our competitiveness. What do we hear from this government all the time? We hear about being competitive. We hear about Canadians being challenged to be competitive. No one in this House, I think, denies that Canadians, given a true level playing field, can be as competitive as people in any other country. It does not mean being competitive with the thought of going into some kind of continental free trade deal with workers who work under ghastly conditions for $1 a day or 30 cents an hour.

Mr. McDermid: You sound like a socialist. What nonsense.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. minister says: "What nonsense". I wish the hon. minister would put his money where his mouth is and tell me what his plans are to start this economy moving again. It is stalled and he knows it is stalled.

Mr. McDermid: It has moved. It has moved.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, moving down. That is where it is moving.

The government speaks of an ever-changing global economy and the need for a highly skilled work force, but it has chosen to abandon those programs that would set us on the road to becoming a truly competitive nation. Thousands of Canadian jobs are moving south of the border, thousands. In the province of Ontario, in the province of Quebec, they are moving, they are gone. In the other provinces, thousands of people are going as well.

Last week I talked to a young doctor in Halifax who would be a stellar addition to the medical profession wherever she chose to practice. She came to see me, among other things, to tell me that she was leaving to go to the United States. Why is she leaving to go to the United States? Because she is overtaxed, because her equally well educated husband cannot find a job. She is working 18 hours a day and, as she says, has no time to see her children. It is no life, so she is leaving for the United States where she can have a more normal life, where her husband will find employment and where she will see her children.

What is this government doing about this kind of brain drain? Not one thing. Thousands of jobs are moving south of the border, thousands of jobs out of Atlantic Canada moving to central Canada or south of the border. Agencies shut down. ICOT in Nova Scotia shut down. The Science Council shut down, the Economic Council shut down. If we are so concerned about training and education and competitiveness, why is this government cutting off its own nose to spite its face?

It is not sensible. It is not rational and it does not portray any kind of foresight on the part of this government. The government has done major damage to post-secondary education in this country by its cuts to Established Programs Financing. Universities in this country—I spoke on this last week—are suffering. My hon. colleague from St. John's knows that the universities in Atlantic Canada are suffering particularly. Dalhousie University had to raise the tuition for its hard-pressed students by 10 per cent this year. Students no longer can make anything close to the money they used to be able to make in the summertimes to even begin to pay their tuition fees, if there were any jobs, which there aren't, so there is no chance for them at all.

I turn to housing in this budget. The home buyers plan, modelled, I must congratulate the government, after the Liberal Party's own proposals, allows first-time home buyers to withdraw up to $20,000 from their RRSPs for down payments on a home. It is expected that the purchase of a home will have an important ripple effect in the manufacturing and construction industry. Approximately 100,000 holders of RRSPs are expected to take advantage of this opportunity. However this move, good as it is in the sector that it helps, will do nothing to improve the housing situation for those that do not have RRSPs and depend on federal aid.

Cuts to the social housing budget mean that funds available for new units will decrease by 50 per cent in three years.

Who of us in this House has not seen on the streets of our major cities the homeless. Who of us, in our constituency offices, has not dealt with single parents looking for decent, affordable housing for themselves and their children? Who of us has not seen women, having left an abusive situation, desperately seeking second stage housing for themselves and for their children to maintain a safe environment.

What is this government doing? It is decreasing the funds available for new units by 50 per cent. Where is the compassion? Where is even the rationale? Is it just throw everybody out on the heap and hope that the fittest will survive?

I suggest that the members of the government should look to their laurels because their own survival is pretty shaky, based on this kind of government policy.

In 1991, $91 million was available for new social housing units. In 1992–93 that went down to $70 million. In 1993 to 1996, only $45 million will be available.

To a lot of people that sounds like a huge amount of money. But it is less than half of what was available last year. We still see more and more of the homeless on the streets of our cities. We still see the under-housed, we hear the complaints, the pleas from people looking for a decent place to live.

Is there anyone in this House who does not believe that all Canadians deserve a decent place to live? Or is their response "let them eat cake"? I am afraid that we know what the response is.

Another casualty of this year's budget on housing is the elimination of the co-operative housing program, which provided non-profit co-operative housing to low and moderate income families. In Nova Scotia alone, this program enabled 2,000 families to secure housing.

Co-operative housing got its start in the province of Nova Scotia, through the efforts of Monsignor Moses Coady and Father James Tompkins of the famed Antigonish movement. Co-operative housing and the co-operatives in Canada in general started in Antigonish many years ago, and it is something that all Canadians have come to understand. It is a good program, it is a solid program, it gives people the opportunity to own their own houses and to have the right and pride of ownership.

What has this government done? It has decimated this program. It has obliterated this program. It says: "Nope, sorry, we don't care any more and we are not going to give you this opportunity".

The members on the opposite side should hang their heads in shame. But, mind you, their heads have been hanging so low for so long it's probably hard to tell. It is all in the degree of angle.

This government claims that the lowering of the personal surtax will result in lower taxes. Certainly it will, for high income earners. This only translates into a $2 dollar a year saving for a family of four with a combined income of $15,000. For families with incomes above $40,000, the so-called tax cut amounts to $44 a year. Some tax break.

Canada is facing serious problems and this budget leaves me wondering if the government is even aware of what it is doing. Unemployment, overfishing, low commodity prices, plant closures, violent crime, drug abuse, hunger, homelessness and more; the list goes on. There is nothing in this budget that deals with any of these problems. This is a government that says: "Do not tell me about it. I do not want to deal with it. I do not want to know about it. Canadians can fish or cut bait". That is not the only thing they are going to cut come the next election.

We have another thing in this budget that relates to education and it is the fact that this government is trying to deceive Canadians by reducing the student's taxable income by $20 a month while at the same time increasing student debt loads. Continuing to charge the GST on books—GST on books, imagine. Let us just stop and think about that for a minute. A tax on learning, a tax on reading in Canada—appalling. It is no wonder I cannot catch the eye of anybody on the other side of the House. They must be ashamed and rightly so.

The government is continuing the regressive 3 per cent surcharge on student loans. That, in particular, is a scandal. As I said before, it is impossible for students in this country today to earn the money during vacation or with part-time jobs to pay their tuition, to keep themselves going. Therefore, what is post-secondary education becoming in this country? It is becoming a privilege of the wealthy.

I come from a part of the country where there are wealthy people, middle income people and poor people. But I also come from a part of the country where for many years, most of them under Liberal governments, post-secondary education was a viable goal for the children of fishermen, the children of farmers and the children of coal miners and steelworkers in every region of Atlantic Canada, the children of plant workers in northern New Brunswick. Is it a viable goal today? No it is not. It is a viable goal for the children of the upper middle class and even then it is a pretty rough go.

Putting a tax of 3 per cent on student loans is shocking. It is absolutely shocking on the part of a government that talks about competitiveness, training and then in the end pays little more than lip service to the exigencies of getting an education in Canada in the 1990s. Starting with the new loans made for the 1992-93 academic year, the government will cancel the six month interest free post-graduation period for students with Canada student loans.

I would make a bet that for a significant number of people in this House, the baby-boomers in this House and there are a fair number of us, we all took advantage of that six-month post-graduation period in which to get ourselves started and under way before we started paying the interest on our student loans. Are the graduates of today less worthy than we were of getting a small break from their government, especially when they have the 3 per cent surcharge to deal with currently?

This regressive measure will increase the debt load of poorer students who rely on Canada student loans to get an education. It will probably put a university education beyond their grasp, absolutely. Some ability to compete! Some ability to make Canada and give Canadian students a level playing field.

Measures introduced by this government since 1986 will result in a $1.6 billion cut in federal support for post-secondary education in 1992-93 and a cumulative cut from 1986 to 1993 of $4.9 billion. Let us look at this compared with the reality of obtaining a post-secondary education. In Nova Scotia, tuition fees have jumped 24 per cent in 1991, and as I mentioned before, are set to rise another 10 per cent this coming fall.

Since 1985-86, tuition fees at Dalhousie have risen by 49.7 per cent. The average cost of room and board rose by $1,200. I could go on and on and on. We all could go on and on and on, but the bottom line—the Minister of Finance has talked about a bottom line budget—is that this budget does nothing to help Canadians who need it most.

It does nothing to jump-start the economy. It does nothing to retrain people crying for jobs, and it does nothing to make Canada competitive and to give Canadians a level playing field in a down-sized economy. This budget is a sham, a scandal and a disgrace.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her lesson in economics. It was a most interesting one.

She left out some details however. It may, indeed, be true that we do not have enough dollars to pay for every whim and fancy of every single Canadian across the country. The member also mentioned that she would like to see us kick-start the economy, but what she did not tell us is how much she would like to borrow in order to do some of the things that she talked about.

How much money would she borrow, where would she get it from and at what cost to Canadian taxpayers? They are already paying 35 cents out of every tax dollar they send to Ottawa to service the debt accumulated by previous governments that the hon. member is very, very familiar with. They are from the past, before 1984.

I guess my question would be: Where does this money come from to pay for all of the things that Canadians would dearly like to have and to pay for all the things that Canadians enjoyed even though they could not afford them in the past? How would the hon. member raise the funds for this? Would she raise taxes?

This government in its recent budget reduced taxes. At least, if it is not a huge amount of money, it is a step in the right direction. It shows a commitment that this government has to reducing the over-all tax burden on ordinary Canadians, a tax burden that Canadians are telling us they no longer can support.

It is not a matter any longer of governments using politically popular programs to re-elect themselves by spending taxpayers' dollars. Taxpayers simply will not accept that.

Perhaps the hon. member could tell us how she would support all of these programs without increasing taxes, without increasing the burden of debt on the taxpayer and somehow, without being cynical and buying votes, how she would do these things?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member for Winnipeg has asked me those questions.

I would just like to begin with a comment that I think Canadians know what it is they can no longer support. They are not some of the things that the hon. member was talking about.

I would also like to make a comment on her statement about education being a whim and a fancy. If she thinks that young people, desiring to get a higher education in this country, are the subjects of whim and fancy, then I am even more frightened for the future of this country while this government stays in power.

Let us get to the meat of the question. The question was: What would I do? How would I pay for it? First of all, we have an unfair tax system in this country. The tax system is all skewed up. This government's people said that when they were in opposition, lo these eight years ago. It is a terrible tax system. It is all fouled up and it is all wrong. It ought to be changed.

This government is in power and has been in power for eight years. What has it done to change the unfairness of the tax system in this country? Zippo. Nothing. This is the government that brought us the GST. That is what it did to change things. It put a tax on the poor and on children. It put a tax on reading, it put a tax on essentials. What did it do to make the tax system in Canada fairer? Not one thing. Nothing.

Make the tax system fairer, that is what my hon. friend needs to do. If she has influence with this government of hers, let us see it done before the next election.

The other thing she said is that the government cut taxes. I thought I dealt with that in my speech. I am sure my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso heard me do so. I am sure I did.

I will repeat this very slowly so that the hon. member hears me.

If you have an income of $15,000 per year and a family of four, you are part of a group into which all too many Canadians fall. This step in the right direction that my hon. friend talks about is worth $2 per year. I am not sure what exactly you could buy for a family of four, GST included, for $2. Perhaps the hon. member can enlighten me. If you have an income of over $40,000, a median income for a family of four, you get $44. I wonder if anybody, including the hon. member, could enlighten me as to what kind of a spending spree you could go on with $44, again GST included.

This goes past the realm of incompetence. I am shocked that the hon. member would put such a naive question. I am shocked that she would insult the intelligence of Canadians to such a degree.

I for once am speechless.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I just want to mention that the hon. member did not answer the question about how she would pay for additional programs spending. She talks about a fairer tax system but I wonder. She does not tell us what that might be. She does not tell us why her government in previous years did not create that system when it had control of this country for most of this century.

I would also suggest to the hon. member that in addition to cutting taxes in this recent budget, the federal government created better opportunities for lower income families through a new child tax credit that gives the lowest income families about $1,700 per year, which is quite a bit of money. You could do quite a bit more than the hon. member pretends. Those people benefit all the way round, lower taxes plus a higher child credit.

The hon. member could perhaps answer my question. Perhaps she does not have an answer. If she does not, maybe she does not want to stand up. She has said she is speechless and perhaps she will remain that way. My question was: How would the hon. member raise the kind of money that it would take to do some of the things that she has suggested in her speech and that Canadians would like to see done? She should share this with us. All members in this House would like to be able to provide all kinds of services to Canadians, but we need to have the money to do this.

Ms. Clancy: Fix the tax system.

Mrs. Dobbie: Simply saying a fairer tax system is not going to provide that kind of money. If you take from one part of the tax system and add burdens to the other part of the tax system, you do not raise more money. Perhaps the hon. member has a magical solution, a magical formula that she has not told anybody yet. We have not been able to find this answer anywhere else.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend from Winnipeg South that step one in the magical formula is issue the writ.

Step two in the magical formula is bring on—

Mr. Van De Walle: You haven't any.

Ms. Clancy: Absolutely. Step two is the change in the tax system. The hon. member's party has been eight years in government. I realize that she like myself arrived in 1988. If the hon. member has no ideas as to how to reform the tax system and she wants to know what the Liberal ideas are about reforming the tax system, can I tell her that should she wish to cross the floor, we will take it under advisement and consider it. I am sure my hon. colleague the Whip could give her a decision. Then she could become privy to the stellar policies of the Liberal Party of Canada.

She wants to talk about jump-starting the economy. I will say this very slowly so that I will not be misunderstood and so everyone, even the hon. member for St. John's East, can understand it. Hear me. We have been telling this government for months now of one, only one project, that would make a difference to this economy, that would jump-start it and start pumping some money into it. That is the infrastructure project. How many times I ask my hon. colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, how many times I ask my hon. colleague for Sudbury, have we suggested this to the government, how many times have we said that this is a major giant step to turning this country and its economy around?

I do not know what we can do, not having the government's budget for self-aggrandizement through advertising in newspapers. Again I say it. I say it now. The infrastructure project, think about it. It is a good idea, just like the RRSP idea was a good idea as long as you do not kill it in the second half of the puzzle.

The hon. member says to me: "What ideas?" Our ideas are put forward every day. I have given a few here and now. I have said what can be done. I have spent three and one-half years telling this government what it can do. Is it any wonder I am depressed when it does not listen to me and when it does not take my advice. Even someone as effervescent as myself can get depressed at the response from this government.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate of third reading of Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the government.

When Canadians go to the bank and ask to have credit extended, the banker wants to know how they are doing financially and what their intentions are for repayment. It is important that we parliamentarians, before we authorize the government to borrow money, see what the government is doing and where the government is going with their economic and financial policies.

In fact, in the past two weeks Canadians have witnessed both the presentation of the budget and the tabling of the estimates. Together they are the primary tools used by the government to enunciate its fiscal, economic and social policies.

The budget is the major statement of the economic direction which the government intends to follow. Last February in this House the government demonstrated to Canadians its intent to continue to follow the road to economic hardship and high unemployment.

We do not have to go through the whole book; we just have to look, for example, at unemployment predictions. For the coming year the government is predicting the same high unemployment rate that we have right now. Therefore, that concludes that the government intends to follow the same direction that produced record layoffs and record bankruptcies.

Just prior to tabling his budget, the Minister of Finance qualified his budget as being realistic, in other words, a budget conceived with today's economic reality in mind. Canadians can only conclude that the minister must have been in another world when he dreamed up his latest budget.

Today a Gallup poll came out on the budget. Only 23 per cent of Canadians believe that the budget is going to do something to help the economy.

If the minister wants to discuss reality, I would tell him that the reality is that 1.5 million Canadians are out of work. The reality is that over 13,000 businesses and 62,000 consumers went bankrupt in 1991. The reality is that Canadians are taxed more today than in any other period in history. The reality is that both business and consumer confidence in the economy is at an all-time low. That is the economic reality in which we find ourselves today.

The problem is that the Conservative government has failed once again to face the reality and address the most important issues. For the minister to acknowledge that the unemployment rate would remain over 10 per cent, as I said before, for the next fiscal period is irresponsible.

Obviously Canadians are going to be suspicious when the Minister of Finance says he intends to follow the same path as his predecessor. Consider what happened since last year's budget was brought down. A year ago the Minister of Finance at the time rose in the House to read his budget speech. I would like to quote just one sentence from Hansard of February 26, 1991. The minister said:

> This budget sets out a Plan for Economic Recovery—a strong, confident recovery that not only puts the recession behind us but leads us forward to continuing growth and renewed prosperity.

Let us look at the programs set out in this budget, the one used by the Minister of Finance today, and we will see that he has not succeeded in leading us to a period of renewed prosperity. We will see that we are far from prosperity. All that the Conservative government's economic program has been able to create is a long list of victims. The victims to whom I refer are the 62,277 Canadian consumers and 13,495 Canadian companies that went bankrupt in 1991. That is an increase of 39 per cent over the previous year. That is far from the road to prosperity promised by the Minister of Finance.

I also refer to the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians and I do not count those who are no longer looking for work because they are discouraged, like many jobless people. The Conservatives' economic policies have not been able to create prosperity in Quebec either. Indeed the province of Quebec lost 68,000 jobs in 1991 and another 4,000 in January 1992. In Quebec 18,319 consumers and 5,217 businesses went bankrupt in 1991. Officially Quebec now has 405,000 unemployed, not counting those who have given up looking for work.

In Montreal the average unemployment rate in 1991 was 12.2 per cent, an increase of 2 per cent over the year before. This negative trend does not seem to end, since unemployment in Montreal rose to 12.4 per cent in February 1992. The government is ignoring the importance of Montreal's economic well-being for Quebec and all of Canada.

The metropolitan area provides nearly half the employment in the province. Unfortunately, according to a recent report, one adult in two in the Montreal region does not work. This is intolerable, in what is one of Canada's major metropolitan areas.

Last year was one of the worst for tourism in the Montreal area, and tourism is not the only sector that is crumbling under the Conservatives. The manufacturing sector in Montreal has also been hard hit.

As the member for Saint-Léonard, a riding where manufacturing plays an important role, I know that eastern Montreal is dying. For 10 years, the number of plant closings and job losses has been very high. We lost 900 jobs when Angus closed down; 380 at Vickers; 900 at Welfab steel products; 500 at Esso; 450 at Gulf; 591 at Steinberg, and the list goes on, Mr. Speaker.

Montreal is on its death bed, with 10,000 more unemployed workers than in 1986. Despair, that is what the Conservative path has led to.

And on top of that, the latest budget does nothing to stimulate job creation in this country. How can we get the economy back on track, when more than 10 per cent of the community is not working, according to official statistics? We proposed a plan to modernize infrastructures. It was a five-point plan, and the government is to be commended for having accepted and implemented two of them, but a week later, interest rates went up again. When people are ready to withdraw $20,000 from their Registered Retirement Savings Plan to buy a house, do you really expect them to when all of a sudden interest rates go up again? This has just destroyed any motivation they had. That is why the economic situation in Montreal continues to be a disaster.

Everyone agrees that to get the country out of this slump we must get consumers to spend. However they are not spending, either because they are unemployed or they are working but their purchasing power is going down. Every weekend we see people cross the border because it is cheaper. Of course the government's high dollar policy does not help.

In fact what the minister gives with one hand he takes away with the other. For instance, a couple with a combined income of $40,000 and two children will receive $44 annually in family allowance. Lest we forget, on January 1, 1991 the GST came into effect. On July 1 our unemployment insurance premiums went up by 24 per cent. According to Statistics Canada we are more heavily taxed today than at any time in our history. I do not remember exactly how many new taxes this government introduced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed with statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

RELEASE OF SECRET DOCUMENTS

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, certain documents released last week, which had been kept secret since 1970, confirmed that clandestine action was taken by Pierre-Elliott Trudeau's Liberal cabinet against Quebec and many Quebec citizens who at the time were considered to be dangerous nationalists.

This unworthy behaviour was an insult to the good faith and intelligence of Quebecers and all Canadians who expected dignity, integrity and justice from their elected representatives.

It is not surprising that these same leaders arbitrarily implemented the War Measures Act that violated the rights of hundreds of Quebecers and stained Canada's reputation as a democracy. It is inconceivable that such leaders held such an attitude against Canadians, all the while claiming to defend democracy.

I do not accept that.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents in Hamilton Mountain have been asking me about the GST, the debt and the deficit. They would like to be assured that GST revenues will not be spent on pre-election goodies.

Last year the government introduced Bill C-21 which calls for all GST revenues to be directed toward deficit reduction. After receiving second reading this bill has been sitting in committee for quite some time. We are waiting to see if the Conservatives practise what they preach on the importance of reducing the deficit. Canadians what to know: Is the government still committed to this legislation?

TRUDEAU GOVERNMENT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Recently released documents have linked the cabinet of Pierre Trudeau to the RCMP theft of Parti Quebecois lists. This is as shocking as it is appalling, to think that any government would use a national police force in this fashion.

In this new age of constitutional committees and conferences, royal commissions and the involvement of ordinary Canadians in nation building by the Prime Minister, Gestapo tactics like those used by the Trudeauites are unthinkable; the October crisis, falsely arresting people, using the RCMP to steal, gathering political information through criminal tactics. Remember what Trudeau said when asked how far he would go: "Watch me", he said. We are still watching, and it makes you wonder what other dirty secrets are in the closet of history.

When Trudeau comes to comment on today's attempts to heal Canada, fractured in 1980, Canadians will wonder how a man who used his office to abuse and deny Canadians their rights could now possibly utter a single word in defence of either rights or freedoms.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Environmental assessment became a hot potato in Quebec over the weekend. Development, regardless of its impact on the environment, has been the trademark of Liberals in Quebec for decades. Take, for example, the flooding caused by the hydroelectric projects James Bay I and II, a total of 25,824 square kilometres. This is six times as much land flooded by one project as is protected by all the provincial and national parks in Quebec combined.

The Brundtland World Commission on the Environment recommends 12 per cent protection as a minimum. Quebec has 0.3 per cent protected lands.

The Quebec Liberal Party voted unanimously over the weekend to "denounce and condemn federal environmental assessment Bill C-13". The great Liberal tradition of being firmly on both sides of every issue was confirmed by all Liberal MPs voting for Bill C-13. Not unlike the weekend remarks of former Prime Minister Trudeau about the Liberal decision to steal the membership lists of the Parti Quebecois, "the record is there; that is all I can say". The member for Vancouver Quadra was the Minister of Justice at the time and Leader of the Opposition was in cabinet. Let us hear from them today.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, this past week a very significant group of parliamentarians met in Vancouver to discuss our role as parliamentarians in relationship to the environment, particularly as it relates to increasing urbanization and development of megacities. There were about 150 delegates representing 60 countries from both developed and developing countries. The meeting resulted in acceptance and publication of the Vancouver Declaration of Global Parliamentarians and Habitat on Human Settlements and Sustainable Development.

I congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley West on his election as chairman of this body and also the member for Ottawa West on her selection as a member of the executive because of her hard work and leadership on women's issues.

We anticipate more good work from this exciting body.

SEX OFFENDERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the problem of dangerous sexual offenders is one that requires action on the part of the government. Convicted sex offenders are sentenced to a term in penitentiary at the conclusion of which they are released into the community. Psychologists and specialists in deviant behaviour know that the likelihood of repetition of the offence is very great. The police know that nothing can be done to restrain the offender until he has reoffended. Another victim and another penitentiary sentence.

Surely it is time to devise a new means of dealing with and treating these offenders. Surely the criminal justice system is ill equipped to protect our children and stop these crimes.

I urge the government to look at the possibility of special treatment facilities for such individuals to protect the defenceless in our society and try to provide some help for these disfigured criminals who cause us all such anguish and hurt.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have with me today a petition signed by some 14,700 residents of southwest Nova Scotia from Shelburne County through to Digby County. It is my intention to present this petition later today to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

They express a concern of the people of southwest Nova Scotia over the possibility that the search and rescue helicopter service which has saved over 40 lives over the course of the past three years will be removed from Yarmouth.

Yesterday some 300 people met at the Yarmouth airport together with municipal, provincial and federal politicians to express their concern and to urge the government not to allow an end to the vitally important search and rescue and fisheries surveillance service.

I join with those residents in urging the government to find the means to ensure that this service remains in place for the benefit of fishermen and their families in southwestern Nova Scotia.

RIVERTON

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, something must be done about the terrible plight of the Canadian forces auxiliary vessel Riverton based in Halifax and crewed by civilian employees of DND.

Repeated pleas by the crew of this vessel have fallen on deaf ears and they paint a sad picture. Cramped quarters, obsolete machinery and inhuman working conditions face these men on the Riverton every minute they are at sea. They have consulted with management and heard nothing. They have complained to management and were told that if they continued to complain they might lose their jobs.

Eight men live in a space that is suitable for two people. There is no recreational space. Fourteen men must eat in a mess the size of a closet. How long will the government allow this situation to continue?

The Riverton is vital to the TRUMP program and to the frigate program but the government makes repeated promises for a refit that never takes place.

The government must keep its promise to refit the Riverton this spring. The top priority must be the installation of adequate crew facilities so that the crew can feel like humans rather than animals.

HELICOPTER PURCHASE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is currently negotiating to buy 50 EHI 101 helicopters from European Helicopters Industries Ltd. in England. Part of the negotiations include a requirement that EHI contract out to Canadian manufacturers for components of equal value to the main contract. Further, Atlantic Canada is to receive 10 per cent of the opportunities provided from these industrial benefits.

It is very important that these guidelines be met and that companies like IMP Aerospace in Amherst, Nova Scotia be given the opportunity to contract for these helicopter components. IMP was recently awarded the AQAP–1 quality recognition from the Department of National Defence which qualifies it as an outstanding manufacturer of airplane components and is now recognized world-wide. In addition, IMP Aerospace from Amherst has also qualified for the Boeing D1900 quality approval certification.

It is most appropriate that this factory have the opportunity to bid on this work considering that it was one of the industries most severely impacted from the termination of the tracker program.

I call on the various departments of government involved to ensure that Atlantic Canada gets its fair share.

STONE CONSOLIDATED PAPER MILL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, this past week the New Brunswick NDP Federal Council of Ridings, while meeting in Moncton, passed a resolution congratulating the workers at the Stone Consolidated Paper Mill in Bathurst. I was pleased to attend this meeting along with our New Brunswick leader, MLA Elizabeth Weir.

Threatened with wage rollbacks and closure, with no guarantees, the workers headed by Mr. Rick Doucet of the Canadian Paperworkers Union held to their position. Their fear was that to capitulate to Stone would have given this industry a beachhead on which to attack the workers who work in this industry which is facing many problems today.

• (1410)

In a statement the union says that this is not a problem created by workers. The New Brunswick workers are well qualified and hard working. We ask that corporate Canada be as responsible as the workers of Bathurst.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the world is rapidly recognizing that atmospheric pollution must be stopped. It is also recognizing that nuclear power will play a major role in achieving that result.

Canada has a significant contribution to offer through our global leadership in nuclear plant design and operation, particularly with development of the Candu III reactor.

In turn my own province of New Brunswick is in a position to create lasting industrial development by seizing the opportunity to build our existing nuclear energy experience to become Canada's centre of excellence in Candu III manufacturing and marketing. This is potential of a world scale.

The nuclear opportunity for New Brunswick may be fleeting. Competition is already in the wings. New Brunswick should act now.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, March 21 marked the anniversary of the Sharpeville massacre and as a result was proclaimed as the international day for the elimination of racial discrimination by the United Nations.

It is celebrated this year at a very timely moment with the encouraging results in the South African referendum.

But we need not go as far as Africa to look at how we correct racial discrimination. We must look at ourselves at home. We can look at the police files against Haitians. We can look at the difficulties experienced by visible minorities in their job search. We can look at the attacks on refugees and immigrants. We can look at the notorious hate literature campaign and certainly the discrimination experienced by aboriginals in our court system.

As an antidote to these events I would like to commend the constructive initial responses by the Citizenship Council of Manitoba which this year distributed 130,000 "No to Racism" stickers throughout the schools and among 90 citizens' groups.

It is a way of showing how the community can draw awareness to the issue of racism and giving individuals the opportunity to express their personal opposition.

In a recent survey multiculture—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has now expired.

UNIVERSITY OF CALGARY

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the University of Calgary law school team which won first place in the Canadian division of the Philip C. Jessup International Law Moot Court Competition. The competition involved nearly all the law schools in Canada. It was held in Saskatoon on February 1 and 2. Members of the University of Calgary team are Jonathan Blakey, Leslie Morris, Hilary Stout, Kerri-Anne Thomas, and Kevin Zemp.

The Jessup competition presents students with an international law problem which they are then required to debate in front of the International Court of Justice. To score well takes considerable finesse and skill. The competition provides a forum for students to practise their debating and analytical skills.

As the Canadian champions the University of Calgary team will travel to Washington, D.C., on March 28 to April 4 for the international round of competition. Approximately 30 countries will be participating.

As second place winner of the Canadian finals, the team from McGill University will also be going to Washington.

On behalf of my constituents in Calgary Southeast and my hon. colleagues here today in the House I would like to wish both teams the best of luck.

CHALLENGE '92

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there is another nail in the coffin of the government's so-called prosperity initiative. Remember that one? It included promoting education and training, doubling the number of scientists, mathematicians and engineers and so on.

Friday when he thought no one was looking the Minister of State for Youth, instead of the usual press conference, sneaked out a bad news news release on the summer employment program called Challenge '92.

After $9 billion in cutbacks have increased college and university fees by as much as 150 per cent, after making student loans more difficult and expensive to repay, and after engineering a recession where youth unemployment has risen to almost 20 per cent, the government announced another cut in real dollars for student summer jobs.

Now funding is only 40 per cent of what it was in 1985 in real dollars and only half as many students will be supported.

Now instead of filling classrooms more youth are filling unemployment lines. That is really some prosperity initiative.

MADE IN CANADA

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, the three words made in Canada mean quality. Made in Canada creates jobs. Made in Canada shows the world that we mean business.

I urge the federal government to initiate a nation-wide program promoting made-in-Canada products. This campaign, supported by retailers, manufacturers and government is to remind consumers that first-rate products are available and being produced here in Canada. A campaign to buy made in Canada will create and maintain jobs for Canadians and boost the economy. This would be a win-win situation.

I urge all Canadians to support made-in-Canada products and look for these three words when they shop.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in 1989 when the Minister of Transport announced huge cuts to VIA Rail services, he promised that for the particularly remote regions we would maintain nine so-called remote routes in the national transportation system so that citizens who do not have other means of transport could still travel.

Now we are seeing the same government go back on that promise. VIA Rail has decided not service some stops between Capreol and Armstrong, Ontario. These stops are valued by tourist operators, cottagers, outdoorsmen and native people who have no other access to the lands.

These cuts are negatively affecting the people who least deserve it. For one tourist resort owner, this cut in service means the train will stop two miles past his resort. Customers must walk back along the track two miles winter and summer. This inconvenience is occurring all along the track and is just one more example of how the chances for northern development have been weakened at a time when they should be strengthened.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Two weeks ago in Toronto, speaking of trade disputes, the Prime Minister accused the United States of acting like a tin pot dictator. We all saw him on television and boy, was he going to be tough. He told Canadian auto workers that he would stand up for them. Last week, when he was in New York, he said that trade disputes were "low-level harassment by functionaries in the administration".

Why did the Prime Minister talk tough in Toronto and wimp out on Wall Street?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Speaking of wimps, how have you all been while I was away?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has of course again, and no doubt inadvertently mislead the House. What I indicated in Toronto was exactly what I indicated in New York. There was no change at all in a statement made in Toronto as opposed to a statement made in New York.

If my hon. friend would like to take the time before she asks her next question to consult and then table both transcripts, I know she would want to do so with an apology.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the person who should be tendering an apology is the Prime Minister who did not stand up for Canadian jobs when he was in New York.

I would like to quote him directly. This is what he said: "I said low-level functionaries. I won't go any further than that. It's not President Bush. It's not his cabinet".

I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. If it is just a couple of low-level functionaries, why have the issues not been resolved and why has the American government not dropped actions on softwood lumber and Hondas?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated from the very beginning—my hon. friend has made my point. That statement was one I made both in Toronto and New York, that the action taken in the United States was not an action initiated by the President of the United States.

My hon. friend from Newfoundland is chuckling. That just indicates ignorance. The fact of the matter is that this action was not initiated by the President of the United States. It was initiated by lobby groups who attacked the American administration which then, at the level of low-level functionaries, responded with an action that damaged very seriously the interests of Canada. It was at that point I indicated that if this kind of action had come from a small country with a tin pot dictator, that would be one thing but coming from a great trading nation like the United States, this was most unworthy. That I said in Toronto, that I said here and in New York.

Thanks to the free trade agreement, we have initiated—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Had it not been for the free trade agreement which gives us—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We are taking it on the chin.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the member for Winnipeg is finding this so entertaining, it is the first laugh he has had in a long time. I will keep it up.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Somebody should probably put a stop to that. The right hon. Prime Minister may wish to complete his answer.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): He's too embarrassed.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Winnipeg says that I am too embarrassed. I will acknowledge to him that I would be very embarrassed today if this was the final word in the United States.

That would have been the final word in the United States prior to 1988, but under the free trade agreement we have access to a dispute settlement mechanism, whereas we would have been dead as doornails under the Liberal policy. Under the dispute settlement mechanism, we have won these cases and we will win these cases on behalf of Canada.

Most recently we had a pork decision which affected so vitally the interests of western producers. Had the hon. member from Winnipeg's view prevailed, the western pork producers would have been down the drain. As it was, their case was safe.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should move on.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister is very embarrassed about his change of position between Toronto and New York.

I will ask him a very specific question. He pretends that it is only bureaucrats and functionaries. However, it is the Commerce Department, headed by Carla Hills who is in cabinet with George Bush. So I ask him again why he was not able to solve this problem with his great friend George Bush, since it comes from the U.S. Commerce Department and directly from Carla Hills.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is again mistaken. The U.S. Commerce Department is not headed by Carla Hills. That is another mistake from the hon. member for Hamilton East.

She was wrong to talk about a flip-flop. It was an error and a lie when she said it in English and it is the same in French.

Mr. Speaker: One moment, please.

[English]

The right hon. Prime Minister is suggesting that the question was a lie. I may have misheard it but I would hope that the right hon. gentleman would certainly correct that immediately.

Mr. Mulroney: I will be happy. I have already indicated that the statement made by my hon. friend in regard to a quotation was false. It was false when she made it in her first question. It was false in her second and it is false in French.

It is not a direct quote. I have invited my hon. friend to produce both transcripts. When she produces both transcripts, she will see that contrary to what she has indicated, I have said exactly the same thing in New York as I did in Toronto. That will come as a surprise to a Liberal.

Mr. Speaker: I think the difficulty is at least in the translation. The Prime Minister is in the position—according to the translation—of having said that the hon. member's statement was a lie.

That may be inadvertent. It may be a mis-translation, but I would ask the right hon. gentleman to make it very clear to the House that that is not what he intended to say.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I indicated in English, and I gave my hon. friend the benefit of the doubt, that I believe that the mistake was inadvertent.

I indicated very clearly that in my judgment the mistake was probably inadvertent. Notwithstanding the very important qualification that I gave my hon. friend, the same error was then repeated again in English and was then repeated again in French. Clearly it was not inadvertent, clearly it is an attempt by my hon. friend to impute to me something that I did not say.

Now if the shoe fits, my hon. friend can wear it.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if hon. members would leave this to the Chair.

As interpreted, the right hon. gentleman indicated that the member putting the question had said something which is a lie. There is a distinction, of course, between a lie and something that is in error or mistaken or otherwise. All I am asking the right hon. gentleman to do is to assure the House that he did not mean the word "lie".

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I will of course withdraw any comment that is at any time unparliamentary. But when the Speaker is examining the record, I know that the Speaker in rendering judgment will want to examine the fact that three times a statement that I affirmed not to be true was repeated by the acting Leader of the Opposition. That was an abuse of Parliament and for that she ought to withdraw.

OLYMPIA & YORK DEVELOPMENT LIMITED

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

The Canadian Press today quotes Tom Van Dusen, a spokesman for the Minister of Finance, as confirming that the government has been approached by the Olympia & York Development Limited about possible assistance from the government in the restructuring of that company's debt.

In view of the involvement of a number of major Canadian financial institutions in the affairs of that huge Canadian multinational company, will he inform the House and Canadians of the options under consideration by the government in this important matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the hon. member that there have been discussions with stakeholders in the Olympia & York company. We have been involved in discussions with the government of Ontario, with financial institutions, both domestically and internationally.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

I ask him if he has also been in discussion with other governments on this matter. Furthermore, in view of the possible implications and extent of this situation, will the minister undertake today to keep Parliament and Canadians fully informed of all the options under consideration as this serious situation evolves?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this and I know he is expressing his genuine concern.

I indicated earlier that there have been discussions with the government of the province of Ontario. The discussions are ongoing with financial institutions, both internationally and domestically. Of course the discussions are at a stage where no definitive decisions have been made, but obviously at the appropriate time the hon. member and others will certainly be fully apprised of the situation.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is quoted today as saying that a social charter as proposed in the Constitution should not be there because we cannot afford it; we cannot afford to provide health care, to feed our citizens, to provide shelter for our citizens.

I want to say that before this government closes the door on the futures of thousands of Canadian children, it should close the door on tax breaks for wealthy Canadians.

We can afford to feed the children of this country. We do not have to give free lunches to corporate executives. Will this government stand up and make a commitment to feeding the poor of this country, the future generations of this country, and cut out the tax breaks for the wealthy who do not need them.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question many times last week while the leader of the NDP, I believe for some good reason I suppose, was not in the House of Commons. I can only repeat what I said at the time. I believe we made a good move with the budget and the child benefit. We put in $2 billion over five years. I also said that we should come forward soon with another package concerning children at risk. There are other policies or initiatives which could be announced dealing with the question of children.

• (1430)

In light of what I said with regard to the social charter, I did not say that I was opposed to having a social charter in the Constitution. However, I did say that when we talk about the social charter it is not enough to say that we should guarantee the young people in Canada food and so on, we have to express exactly how we will pay for this because Canadians want to know.

I know that the word resources is not in the vocabulary of the NDP, but it is in mine.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Surely at this time when we are talking about the unity of our country we have a responsibility, as this Prime Minister and this government committed to in 1989, to eradicate poverty in this country. Yet the Prime Minister's government has abandoned child care, it has abandoned the poor and it has abandoned the unemployed.

I want to ask the Prime Minister now: Will he stand up here today and repudiate the comments that we should not in this country have a social charter that gives some common vision to this country, the common social values that we share, and give some hope to Canadians and hope that we can offer our citizens decency and compassion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the government has abandoned child care. That is not the case. That we have abandoned the poor. That is not the case either. That we have abandoned the unemployed. That is not the case either. My hon. friend knows that.

I think my hon. friend could make her point without indulging in such misleading rhetoric. There is a point to be made without this constant verbal abuse that in no way reflects reality.

My hon. friend asks a question about the minister of health. The minister of health, as I understand it, has indicated many times that he is not in any way opposed to the idea of a social charter, provided that the social charter in the Constitution involves indicating clearly how we are going to pay for it. Now I know that concept is alien to my hon. friend, but that is the only caveat that the minister of health has placed on it. He is saying that all of these socially desirable goals are fair and we could indeed support them provided my hon. friend will join the House in telling the country how all of these will be funded.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Seven hundred thousand children and more than two million Canadians do not have enough to eat in this country. That is reality, not rhetoric.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to ensure that the poor have enough to eat and is he going to change the present tax system? A billion dollars of tax money is now being used to pay for businessmen's free lunches. Is the Prime Minister prepared to end this tax system that favours the well-off and instead use these fiscal resources for the less fortunate? Does the Prime Minister have the political will to do that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, between 1984 and 1989, the rate of poverty fell from 18.1 to 13.6 per cent in Canada. The deteriorating economic conditions in 1990 resulted in a higher number of low income people for the first time in seven years. Still, there were 576,000 fewer low income Canadians in 1990 than in 1984 and 123,000 fewer low income children.

Since 1984 the average family income, adjusted for inflation, has increased 9.7 per cent or $4,600 in 1990. Of course we have a serious problem of wealth distribution in Canada, but we are making significant progress on it, as the data show.

In asking such questions, the hon. member should stop overlooking facts and concentrating on rhetoric. Facts in the end are what govern human behaviour.

CN RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government's own Crown corporation has gone on a $40 million cross-border shopping binge. CN Rail announced today that it is awarding a multi-million dollar contract to build at least 25 locomotives to the General Electric plant in Erie, Pennsylvania.

This decision will cost 1,442 person-years of employment for London, Ontario workers at General Motors Diesel, the Canadian bidder for the job. This decision does not invest in Canadian technology and Canadian workers.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Where is the buy Canadian policy for Crown agencies? Why is this government not investing in Canadian jobs instead of U.S. jobs?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN went out on a bid for the construction of 25 locomotives and had to consider these two bids according to their value. Clearly the lowest bidder was General Electric to which the contract has been awarded.

Because of the implications of a number of MPs on this side of the House, namely the minister himself, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, as well as the hon. member for London—Middlesex, we worked with CN. As a result of that, there are going to be 50 more locomotives that will be rebuilt by CN for an American railroad and 36 locomotives for export which means that the number of jobs available to Canadians through this contract will be twice as much as it would have been had it been given to GM.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the minister tables those commitments and documents, especially if it means Canadian jobs.

London's GM locomotives would contain 61 per cent Canadian content. The employment generated from awarding the contract to General Electric in Pennsylvania would not even be comparable, but while this government is offering jobs to U.S. workers, the buy American clauses in the U.S. prevent Canadian companies from bidding on some U.S. contracts.

I want to task this government: Why is this government allowing U.S. firms to bid on government contracts when the Americans will not offer us the same opportunity? Why has this government not objected to the buy American clauses in the United States under the free trade agreement?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I clearly understand that the member was not listening to the answer because I indicated as part of this contract, 50 locomotives are going to be rebuilt by GE in Canada for Burlington Northern U.S. Railroad. As a result of the contract that has been awarded, there will be jobs for suppliers in Winnipeg, Calgary, Hamilton, Welland, Stoney Creek, London, Kingston, Prescott, Belleville, Fort Erie, Sherbrooke, Montreal, St. Laurent and Point Claire.

The total number of PYs involved in this contract is 448. It would have been 257 under the GM contract.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. This year the Canadian government will be paying foreign students and foreign universities $18 million to study Canada. For example, Canadian taxpayers are funding Pennsylvania State University to study social services for senior citizens in metropolitan Toronto. How can the Prime Minister justify funding foreign universities when Canadian colleges and universities are pleading for more money?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): The minister responsible for the program is away on government business today, but I will certainly bring this matter to his immediate attention on his return.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I will put my supplementary question to the finance minister.

• (1440)

It was his budget that indicates $18 million will be spent to fund foreign students in foreign universities.

How can the Minister of Finance justify eliminating the Court Challenges Program, the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission when it is spending almost the same amount of money to create American jobs and other foreign jobs? Why is his government cross-border shopping for research? Why is he eliminating Canadian jobs and creating foreign jobs?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): The question does not seem to revolve around the Canada Student Loans Program, but certainly, the minister has been working very carefully within the confines of that program. As I indicated to the member, we will get back to him at an early opportunity.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister on a different topic.

Over the weekend, the Prime Minister gave notice that there were transcripts made public of secret testimony given in 1978 by the former RCMP security division head, John Starnes to the McDonald royal commission on RCMP wrongdoings. These were made public over the weekend.

Those documents may link the former Trudeau cabinet to the 1973 RCMP theft of PQ membership lists and other confidential information.

My question is the following. In addition to this information, is the Prime Minister aware or is the government aware of any other evidence to substantiate or corroborate Mr. Starnes' claim that there was a link between the government of that day and the RCMP theft? If indeed there is such evidence, would the Prime Minister be willing to make it public?

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I have great doubts whether that question is in order. First of all, it involves a matter of some years ago and it involves a government other than the government which is here today.

I think it is out of order. The hon. member may wish to consider the matter and see whether on a supplemental he can bring it within order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since this is an ongoing concern of Canadians, what actually happened in 1969 to 1973, and in view of the fact the government is responsible for responding in this House to security questions, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether or not there is any other evidence that the Prime Minister can make public regarding what happened back in 1969 to 1973?

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest respect, it seems to me at the moment that that again is out of order. It may be an issue that can be raised in the House, but it will have to come within the rules.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Right Honourable Prime Minister.

Has the United States consented to binding arbitration of the Honda dispute? Yes or No?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware that I have responded to his question in this regard before.

The matter is subject to discussion between the United States and Canada. It might become a matter of chapter 18 consultation between the federal government and the American government, as is the case with the rules of origin question as it relates to non-mortgage interest with the CAMI operation. If that is the case, then that would be subject to negotiation but it would not be binding.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, once again we see how our present trade deal is so inadequate that it leaves Canada wide open to ongoing U.S. trade harassment and to deindustrialization here in Canada.

With a new trade deal imminent, Canadians have a right to know exactly where this government stands. So I put it to the minister. Will he insist on not only greater North American content rules but also Canadian content rules that will ensure Canadian auto workers their fair share of North American jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand my hon. friend says that he is anxious to see a satisfactory resolution of the rules of origin question as it relates to Honda, and I am sure the CAMI operation as well.

On the other hand he is saying that we want to have higher rules of origin which would damage those very companies if they were made too high.

The member is shaking his head. If my hon. friend understood the implications of the rules of origin, he would know that if we set the rules of origin in Canada too high they would disqualify some of the transplant operations at this point of their existence.

Possibly down the road that might be appropriate, but this is one of the balances we must take into account in the negotiation of this agreement.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I want to offer him a chance to clarify the confusion about the purpose and intent of his trip last week to New York.

The Prime Minister went to New York supposedly to give major U.S. and Canadian newspapers Canada's view about the trade harassment being visited upon this country by the United States government.

While there the Prime Minister referred to the trade harassment in question in terms of responsibility, and I am quoting the Prime Minister: "It is not President Bush; it is not his cabinet". The Prime Minister absolved the U.S. President and absolved the U.S. cabinet of any responsibility.

Is the Prime Minister aware, as first minister of this country, that indeed the softwood lumber action was taken against Canada by the U.S. commerce department whose secretary is a member of George Bush's cabinet?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has of course the facts quite wrong.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Good point.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, he does, Lloyd. He has them completely wrong. The trade harassment issue itself, which we all deplore and which I have denounced very vigorously on behalf of all Canadians, was not initiated by the President of the United States.

Mr. Tobin: Nobody said that.

Mr. Mulroney: That is what I said, precisely. If my hon. friend agrees with me that it was not initiated by the President of the United States—

Mr. Tobin: The secretary of commerce.

Mr. Mulroney: If it was not initiated by the President of the United States then he is agreeing with the premise of my own statement.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the last time the Prime Minister went to New York it was rumoured he was on a job hunting expedition. This week it looked like he got one as spokesman for the U.S. President, not spokesman for the workers of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: I want to ask the Prime Minister again. What is at issue here is not what the Prime Minister said. We know what he said. He absolved the U.S. President and he absolved the U.S. cabinet, all members of the cabinet, of any responsibility for U.S. trade harassment of Canada when in fact it was the secretary responsible for the department of commerce who must have authorized the trade action of the department of commerce against Canada on softwood lumber.

A fact is a fact is a fact, and the Prime Minister saying it is not a fact will not change it.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear all of that last question. My hon. friend has a tendency to diminish a very valid point with unworthy prefatory comments most times. Because I know him well, I know he will regret it and want to withdraw as soon as he leaves the House.

We are on all fours with my hon. friend. We have taken a vigorous stand on behalf of Canadian producers. The only difference that exists between us is that we are in favour of a free trade agreement which now gives us access to a dispute settlement mechanism, whereas my hon. friend is a member of a political party that will—

An hon. member: Tear it up.

Mr. Mulroney: Tear it up, tear up the free trade agreement?

An hon. member: Well, they might renegotiate it.

Mr. Mulroney: Renegotiate it? Change it?

Tell us about that, Brian, when you stand up the next time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

I would like the Minister of Transport to explain to this House, and more important to Canadians, how it is that the only way jobs can be created in Canada is by having CN award a contract to a company in Erie, Pennsylvania.

• (1450)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try it another time. I mentioned a few minutes ago that the contract CN has just awarded to GE is going to produce 518 person-years of work in Canada for Canadian workers, whereas the contract that could have been awarded to GM at a higher cost would have produced 257 person-year jobs in Canada.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

If Ontario Hydro can negotiate with two coal companies, two railroads, two terminal operators and at least one, if not more, shipping companies to ensure that Canadian western coal is purchased for use by Ontario Hydro, surely this government through its Crown corporation could have found a way to ensure that both GE and GM received benefits from this contract.

Explain that to the people of Canada.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again, as I mentioned before, CN went into an open bidding process and there were two bidders. GM was higher; GE was lower. They awarded the contract to GE, but they even improved the contract with GE by updating this arrangement which is going to produce work for suppliers in Winnipeg, Calgary, Hamilton, Welland, Stoney Creek, London, Kingston, Prescott, Belleville, Fort Erie, Sherbrooke, Tracy, Montreal, Saint-Laurent, and Pointe-Claire.

UKRAINE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

The whole world breathed a sigh of relief with the demise of the cold war and the collapse of the Soviet Union. Now it has been replaced with instability, confusion, new armies, and the possibility of new nuclear threats.

Has Canada taken direct action? Are we playing a role to help stabilize this evolving situation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for probably the first substantial question of today.

In point of fact, President Kravchuk of Ukraine called me earlier today to—

Mr. Speaker: It is sort of a case of I thought you would never ask. Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could complete his answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, I was not here when he called the first time. I said: "You can talk to Lloyd", but he said: "No, I will wait".

He raised, on behalf of the Government of Ukraine, some very serious matters which have concerned the House, ranging from the question of destruction of nuclear missiles on Ukrainian territory to the question of Canadian assistance, for which he has expressed gratitude to all members of the House of Commons, but also the ongoing future of the Commonwealth itself.

Mr. Tobin: He will not let us use the Black Sea fleet to protect the 200-mile limit.

Mr. Mulroney: He has expressed concerns about the manner in which the negotiations have been ongoing. He has indicated the Government of Ukraine is ready to make compromises in the interest of keeping the Commonwealth together, but he feels very strongly that the national interests of Ukraine must be respected as well.

He is looking forward to their next meeting in May, but I suppose in a fundamental way he wanted to convey to all members of the House and to the Canadian people the gratitude of his government for the very significant assistance that Canada has provided thus far to all initiatives in the former Soviet Union.

FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Shortly after the budget was tabled the president of the Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers that represents career foreign service officers sent a strong letter to their minister condemning the decision to transfer over 300 officers from the social affairs stream to the immigration department.

In view of the sense of anger and betrayal that this action has met within the department and particularly in view of the fact that over a third of these employees are women, by far the largest proportion, I want to ask the minister: Will he now agree to reconsider this decision to ensure that External is fully able to meet all the challenges of foreign affairs in the 1990s and ensure that these people remain within the External Affairs department?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is out of the House on government business as my friend well knows.

We have reviewed the requirements of the department looking out into the balance of this decade along the lines that my hon. friend has referred to. We believe that the obligations of the department can be met, but I will raise the particular point that my friend has raised with my colleague when she returns.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The other major concern aside from the substance was the way in which this decision was announced.

According to the president, and I quote, "unveiling the announcement in the dead of night by posting press releases in elevators is to display an unheard of level of disrespect to the department's employees".

In view of the fact that this decision is supposed to take effect next week on April 1, will the minister at the very least agree to delay the implementation of this decision until there has been an opportunity for full consultation with all of the employees affected by this and the other transfers within the Department of External Affairs as well?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my answer to that question would be the same as the first one.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for immigration.

In recent weeks there have been increasing revelations of negligence and misbehaviour in the minister's department: board members asleep at hearings, others ridiculing applicants, inhumane deportations, and now we hear that the minister will make extensive changes to the law.

Will the minister in fact soon produce amendments to the act? Will these amendments correct the abuses that I have referred to, or will they simply incorporate the more restrictive recommendations made recently by the Law Reform Commission?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if any amendments are made to the Immigration Act they will be made for the only purpose of trying to improve it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister should be making changes that will clean up his department and give it a fair and human face, instead of making as he did last week announcements to change the immigration regulations which will reduce the number of dependent children who can be sponsored under the family class.

What is the justification for these restrictions on the family class? How many dependants will be cut off as a result of these changes?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have read the regulations. They were pre-published months ago. He had the occasion.

Mr. Allmand: I did.

Mr. Valcourt: He said he did. I did not receive any view from the Liberal Party as to the definition of the family. A lot of Canadians did. When he says in this House that we will reduce the number of dependent children, that is false.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Increasing numbers of refugee claimants from eastern Europe, from the Hispanic countries and from many other countries are being deported.

They probably would have been considered refugees if their cases had been heard promptly. Now they are being deported because the situation in their homelands has changed while they are stuck in the backlog.

These are people who have established themselves in Canada with jobs, children being born here and in some cases by owning homes.

What definition of humanitarian and compassionate grounds does the minister use to justify telling these people to sever their new roots in Canada and go back to a life of uncertainty in their homelands?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a question as to what is the definition of human and compassionate considerations.

I think that Canada stands out in the world as a country affording or giving protection to those who need it. The hon. member suggests, however, an interesting point and one which I am ready to consider.

Maybe we should define in the act or by regulations what we mean by compassionate and human considerations. If the hon. member or members of this House have suggestions so that we can improve the transparency of the Immigration Act, I am all for it.

• (1500)

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): My supplementary is for the same minister. The system is so bad that I have here over 5,000 signatures collected in one afternoon on petitions asking the minister to review and change the policies.

People are committing suicide. They are leaving Canada because this minister does not have any compassion for them. They are being sent back to Lebanon, an unstable war-torn corner of the world. A 10-year old Canadian born girl was sent back to Bangladesh with her parents, a country which she has never seen.

I ask the minister what qualifications must the judges have in order to hear refugee cases, and what guidelines are used to define humanitarian and compassionate grounds which he did not answer in my original question?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to Canada and to the Canadian people, whenever someone raises the question of our immigration system in the House and depicts it as being about sending kids, for instance a 10-year-old, out of Canada, the reality is that Canadians are not told that there are hundreds of thousands of immigrants received in Canada according to the rule of law and the regulations.

Whenever there is someone here illegally, that is he has not passed through the legal process and he has been denied Canada's protection, that person is not in the same bag as the person who does qualify according to our law.

If members of the Liberal Party are for the opening up of immigration to absolutely everyone in the world without consideration let them say so.

FISHERIES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

All users of the Atlantic salmon resource have applauded the conservation measures which the minister has introduced recently in closing the commercial fishery in Atlantic Canada. In order that that investment not be wasted it is very important that a new conservation ethic, a new conservation vision, be established within the province of New Brunswick and other river systems in the Atlantic region.

For several months now recommendations have been made to the minister's department for him to convene such a conference to define that new vision and I would like to ask when that conference will be held.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, senior officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have been consulting extensively with all the user groups in New Brunswick and throughout the maritime provinces on these issues.

We are exploring all possible solutions to the existing concerns about conservation and user conflicts in connection with the salmon resource and the magnificent salmon rivers in New Brunswick.

The hon. member who has asked the question is a tireless advocate of the proper system of conservation in the fishery of New Brunswick and Atlantic Canada and a tower of strength to us in connection with achieving these objectives.

We will set a date for such a conference when we are satisfied that real progress can come as a result of a meeting of all of these user groups.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, regarding the agenda for that conference will the minister recommend or instruct that gill-netting be terminated?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, those who are interested in conservation certainly do not wish to see the continued use of gill-nets in fishing the salmon rivers of New Brunswick.

At the same time, as the hon. member knows we had to consider the situation with reference to the Sparrow decision on aboriginal rights to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes. We are certainly hoping that all groups involved in the fishery, including the aboriginal groups will agree to use some better method of fishing from the point of view of conservation in the rivers of New Brunswick.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My point of order, Mr. Speaker, arises from the question I attempted to ask the Prime Minister earlier today.

I simply want to state on reviewing my question that it was in order and I think out of fairness to both sides of the House you might find time to review the question.

Maybe people on the other side would want time to review the question as well.

With your permission I will pursue it at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly thought at the time that the question was probably out of order. I certainly will look at it and I will hear argument on it. Not argument to change the decision; we cannot do that. But if the hon. member wishes to pursue it, I of course would hear him.

I thank him for the suggestion to defer it to a convenient moment.

TABLING OF FUNDING STATISTICS

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, as promised in February, I am pleased today to table, in both official languages, the funding statistics to which I referred in debate.

In this regard, I would like to make a correction to my February statement where I indicated that the figures were provided by the Association of Colleges and Universities or by the Canadian Association of University Teachers. In fact, they were provided by the National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Societies and Statistics Canada.

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of residents in the Thunder Bay area.

The petitioners raise a concern about a previous promise by the government to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for three years and that recent cumulative increases in the UI premiums are unfair and insensitive to small business during hard economic times and that further job losses due to business closures would further impair the chances for a full economic recovery in Canada.

Therefore, your petitioners call upon Parliament to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates at the 1991 level for one year.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Hamilton, Ontario, Montreal and a number of cities in British Columbia. It notes that in February of 1985 the House of Commons asked the justice committee to prepare a report on equality rights in Canada and that the committee in October submitted a report unanimously recommending that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

It also notes that many years after that promise was made it has yet to be kept and that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has consistently called for this amendment to the Human Rights Act. Therefore the petition urges Parliament to ask that the government immediately bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

PROCEEDS FROM CRIME

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition for the government and the House of Commons signed by hundreds of petitioners from my riding of York West.

They ask and request that the Government of Canada amend the Narcotics Control Act so that the assets seized from drug busts, particularly in metropolitan Toronto, rather than all those assets being put into the general Consolidated Revenue Fund back in Ottawa, be shared equally and fairly with police forces and local organizations so that they, who are on the leading edge in combating the drug abuse cancer that is spreading across Canada, will be able to fight this and fight it successfully.

• (1510)

GRAIN EXPORTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I have the honour to present two petitions today.

The first petition is from a number of people who are very concerned about exports through Canadian ports and particularly through the port of Vancouver.

They ask that whereas Canadian grain has traditionally been exported through Canadian ports and the shipping of grain exports through Canadian ports provides the most direct and least costly route for grain producers, and the shipping of grain through Canadian ports also provides employment to Canadian workers, and whereas the Canadian Wheat Board has arranged for Canadian grain to be exported through the port of Seattle, therefore the petitioners ask that Parliament instruct the Canadian Wheat Board that all Canadian grain exports must proceed through Canadian ports. I certainly fully support that.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): The second petition has to do with the goods and services tax which is applied to feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads.

Since these are necessities for women and the government has decided that the goods and services tax should not apply to certain foods because they are necessities, therefore the many people who have signed this from my riding of Vancouver East ask that Parliament consider removing the GST from women's sanitary products.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and in fact it is my pleasure to stand here today under Standing Order 36 representing the people of Penticton, British Columbia. These people in Penticton have been working hard since January 6 when they found out that Canada Post was replacing their post office with private postal outlets.

They are petitioning Parliament against the closure of the post office, trying to save 12 sorting jobs within that community and to get an answer from Canada Post.

They are asking Parliament to stop the closure and the privatization of postal services in general and to ensure that the citizens and taxpayers of Penticton, British Columbia, have a full service post office which is directly run by Canada Post corporation.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my constituency in which the petitioners are asking that an obvious weakness in our legal system be addressed by this government. This will be added to thousands of others that have come in.

Their concern is one that resulted in the murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991. There are many vulnerable people out there who have little protection under the current system. These petitioners are asking that that problem in our legal system be addressed.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am forced again to rise on a point of order, as a result of the government's inaction to respond to Question No. 110 which has been on the Order Paper since last September.

The government has only 45 days to answer. It is not a complicated question at all. There is no legitimate excuse.

The question merely asks for the expense account of each deputy minister in the government. There are only about three dozen such people. Surely that is not hard to determine.

I would ask that the Chair address this issue. After six months I can no longer put questions on the Order Paper because my previous questions are not being answered. And this goes on and on and on.

The government does not have an excuse because the answer might be embarrassing. That is not provided for in the rules. My constituents want to know the answers to questions, and I am availing myself of the privileges of this House to do so.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member referred to Question No. 110, which is one that was answered I think last week.

Perhaps the question he is referring to is No. 111. My understanding is that the information has been largely collected now. He should be able to expect an answer fairly soon.

I would like to raise this point. The hon. member and others regularly ask questions that have to be circulated to all departments and often all departments and agencies. It is physically impossible for the government to answer those questions in 45 days.

I want to express very clearly and very strongly with the Chair that that cannot be done if they continue to insist on 45-day answers. Then we will be in no position but to give an answer that is incomplete.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

TRUDEAU GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 52 to seek the adjournment of the House to debate an urgent issue of national importance. I would just like to take a moment to give my reasons.

The revelations of the last few days regarding Liberal cabinet authorization to violate the laws of Canada constitutes an urgent issue of national importance. Documents released under federal access law confirm that the Trudeau cabinet ordered the RCM Police to obtain Parti Quebecois documents, including membership lists, clearly contrary to the laws of Canada as passed by this Parliament.

The protection of democratic institutions is the ultimate responsibility of every member elected to this place. If we were to allow these revelations of cabinet endorsed burglary and theft to go unchallenged, there would be good reasons for Canadians to lose faith in the rule of law and to question our collective commitment to open, lawful government.

Yesterday the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pierre Trudeau stated only: "The record is there". Both the present and past Liberal leaders, the member for Vancouver Quadra and the present leader were in the cabinet when the decision was made. Surely during a Standing Order 52 debate, Canadians can learn from them why the cabinet chose to order the RCM Police to break the law and if there were other similar activities.

Unless there is a full debate on these matters, the ability of Parliament to craft laws and of this or any future government to administer them will be injured.

The released documents also implicate persons such as Gordon Robertson, Secretary to the Privy Council and cut to the quick of the reliability of the conclusions reached by the McDonald royal commission into the RCM Police dirty tricks operations of the early 1970s.

Democratic institutions are fragile. It is surely urgent that this matter be fully aired today because, as we learned, Question Period and some other options ordinarily available for the airing of an issue such as this may not be the most appropriate. The options under Standing Order 52 seem to me to be the most appropriate to allow Canadians to know what truly took place.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member and I thank him for giving me notice of this in advance, which gave me a chance to consider it.

First of all, and I say this to all hon. members and especially to the public that may be listening or watching, this is a matter which was of very grave concern to this country for a long period of time. There are members in the House, myself included, who were here when the matter was a subject of debate and then later the matter of the McDonald commission to which the hon. member has referred. However, I still have to apply the rules and while the matter may be important, and I accept the hon. member's concern which I am sure will be shared by others, I do not find that it would be appropriate, at least at the moment, to order an emergency debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992-93

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-61, that an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before Question Period, when the Minister of Finance tells us that he reduces the tax burden of the Canadian people, it is a delusion. The fact of the matter is that, in 1986, 19.9 per cent of each dollar earned went to taxes, while today 22.3 per cent of it goes to taxes, and that is excluding the GST. Just imagine how much higher this figure would be if we were to include the GST!

It is no wonder that the Canadian people are suspicious when the Minister of Finance comes and tells us that he intends to go in the same direction as his predecessor, because we know what the policies of the former Minister of Finance were that have plunged us in this economic slump. Repeated tax hikes, the GST, the US free trade deal, a ridiculous monetary policy and cuts in transfer payments to the provinces are responsible for the slump this country is in today.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, Mr. Speaker, a survey shows—and I will repeat it—that only 23 per cent of Canadians believe that this budget will help the Canadian economy.

How many times have you heard people say that this government's monetary policy is ridiculous? We, in the opposition, are not alone in saying so. Practically all national organizations in Canada and in Quebec, including the Conseil du Patronat, the Manufacturers' Association and the Chamber of Commerce, every one agrees that a high dollar does not help. And, of course, high interest rates definitely did not help the Canadian pulp and paper industry.

We have repeatedly asked this government for many months now to change this monetary policy which is at the root of this recession.In excess of 65 per cent of our exports are shipped across the border to the United States. When our dollar is high, we are not as competitive with the United States, we export less and, as a result, we have fewer jobs and our workers work less.

The government's negligence in terms of its monetary policy is destroying the pulp and paper industry, at a time when the industry is already weakened by the recession and the FTA with the United States.

Canadians want no part of these disastrous economic policies. The government proposes to keep increases in CMHC spending on social housing down to an annual average of 3 per cent. The government hopes to save $622 million during the next five years, and here again, the middle class will be the one to suffer.

As far as housing is concerned—I raised this matter during Oral Question Period a few weeks ago—we are faced with a dramatic situation in Montreal. People need low cost housing, and now this area is going to be cut back. What are we going to tell those people? There are endless waiting lists. Every day, every time we are in our riding offices, we meet people who are looking for low-cost housing, and the Minister of Finance turns around and provides nothing of the kind. We are not the only ones to say this. According to the head of the Fédération des coopératives d'habitation de l'Île de Montréal, Mrs. Monique Blanchet, the federal government's withdrawal from this sector—and I am referring to co-operative housing—will mean that 500 new co-op units will not be built, despite 10,000 applications. Because the government withdrew from co-operative housing, 500 units can't be built this year, despite the fact that 10,000 people are on the waiting list. The situation is serious, and the ministers and the Conservative government have not done a thing. In fact they cut the few resources left in this area.

Low income groups are not the only ones to be hit by the government. Students have also suffered as a result of the Conservative budget. The government says students are an abiding concern, but you would hardly notice that from this budget. Ironically I received a letter from a young student in my riding who deplored the fact that we invest very little in our educational institutions, colleges and universities. If we want to be competitive, that is where we should invest.

Earlier during Question Period, I heard the Minister of Transport bragging that CN had awarded a contract in the United States, when it could have avoided the political fallout by awarding a contract that would have provided jobs in Canada. Meanwhile the government is slashing funding for students, in other words slashing our future. Young people are the future of this country.

If we look at all the countries in the world that invest significantly in their institutions and educational system like Germany, Japan and so many other countries, we see that they are competitive and can compete in this increasingly global environment. But we are doing the opposite.

The government must change direction. If we continue, I have the impression that in the time the government has left, because I know it does not have much time. According to custom, there should be an election this fall, but according to the Constitution, they could continue to govern until the fall of 1993. But if we continue with these policies until the fall of 1993, I think that it will be too late and it will take many years to restore the confidence of our consumers, young people and investors and to continue to give hope and keep this country great.

As Opposition Whip, I do not want to give the impression that I am criticizing only the government. When I see newspaper articles like the one of Wednesday, January 15 in La Presse, which said that Montreal is getting steadily poorer, I find that incredible. It says that manufacturing employment in Montreal declined 28 per cent in two years, between the summer of 1989 and the summer of 1991. The Conservative government was in power then. Of the 66,000 jobs lost, three-quarters disappeared in the first year, even before the recession really hit.

Another article in La Presse said that one out of two adults in Montreal does not work. That is serious: one in two adults. How can we go on? In this great beautiful city of Montreal, which was the pride of all Canadians and all Quebecers, how come one adult in two does not work? That is totally unacceptable.

Another article in La Presse of March 7, 1992 said that thousands of full-time jobs are disappearing. If full-time jobs are disappearing by the thousand, how will we be able to revive our economy? How will we be able to put people back to work? It is not the Official Opposition but rather journalists and economists writing in national newspapers who are saying that.

On the editorial page of La Presse for March 7, 1992, Alain Dubuc, who is a well-known journalist and economist, headlined his article "Economy Assassinated". What a title: "Economy Assassinated". That is where we are at after just seven and a half years with this government. As I said earlier, this government should either change the economic policy that has resulted in this disastrous situation or it should call an election to let the people of Canada pick a government that would give them new hope.

I see that I have hardly a minute left. In closing, then, I would like to say that this government economic policy is truly appalling. As we go down a commercial street in our ridings, every weekend, we can see the for sale or for rent signs in store windows. The showcases are empty. The office towers are empty. It is really depressing. If it is depressing for us who are there only on the weekend, imagine how depressing it must be for the people who live there.

I hope that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the rest of cabinet, as well as all other Conservative members, will insist at their next caucus meeting that these disastrous economic policies be changed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will now have a 10-minute maximum question and comment period. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleague from Montreal that the condition he describes in his community is exactly the same in my community in downtown Toronto.

People are in deep economic pain in this country. There is a very high level of insecurity, and people in all regions of this country are looking to this Chamber for some direction, for some hope.

• (1530)

The government has said on more than one occasion today, and on previous occasions, that when we stand up to criticize the direction its policy is taking us in this country, it always says that we on this side do not have ideas.

We have put ideas forward to the government repeatedly. I want to repeat to the government that it did an all-party report. It was done in 1982 and it was called Employment Opportunities for the Eighties. It listed some 180 different ways in which we could put Canadians back to work.

Repeatedly in this report the government talks about the fact that it is important that we retrain our work force. It also talks about the fact that entrepreneurship in this country is the greatest hope for creating new jobs. We have 1.7 million entrepreneurs in this country.

I believe that entrepreneurship is our greatest hope for revitalizing and getting people off the unemployment rolls, off the welfare rolls and back into the work force, and dignity can be restored and our economy can come back.

Does my colleague from Montreal not share the view that entrepreneurship and retraining are things to which this government has really not given the proper respect or the proper support in terms of using them as catalysts to get people back to work?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for giving me the opportunity to continue to say what I was saying.

I agree with him 100 per cent that this government, in seven and a half years, has been paying lip service to entrepreneurship, to small business.

Two, three or four months before the last election, this government came with all the fanfare and announced a big program: the institute of entrepreneurship. Three and a half years after the election, where is the institute? Nobody knows where it is and nobody knows what it is doing.

My hon. colleague said that there are 1.7 million enterprises in this country. If we would encourage them to create a job each, we would have no unemployment in this country. That is the policy we need.

In the budget we saw the government trying to increase the ceiling of small business loans from $100,000 to $150,000 or $200,000. When I was small business critic I said the economy was good and businesses could use the high ceiling. The government said no.

Now there is no economic growth. Increasing the ceiling to $200,000 will not work because the bank will not give them a penny. What is the use? The government wants to look good.

The government looks good when it increases the ceiling from $100,000 to $200,000 so that the businesses can create business. There is no business.

I said in my closing remarks that when you walk on a commercial street, it is very discouraging. In every store, the windows are empty. There are only two types of signs: "For Rent" or "For Sale". There is no activity. What is the use of increasing the ceiling of the small business loans when there is no small business? There is no need to borrow.

Even if somebody had some ideas, the banks need so much collateral that they will not give a penny. I agree with my colleague that this government only gives lip service to small and medium sized business. When it comes to its friends, big business, then it is open. Today we saw an example during Question Period.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in the debate this afternoon on the borrowing authority.

The borrowing authority is the central, paramount tool that the Government of Canada utilizes in terms of its government expenditures. The borrowing authority is central to the budgetary statements of the Government of Canada, and it is a central issue in terms of the confidence that the government places with regard to running the affairs of our country.

We have seen, over the last number of months, a number of initiatives which have been funded by the Government of Canada which have drawn some serious concerns from Canadians. Some have been in relation to the funding of the prosperity initiative which, by itself, one could argue intellectually is a wonderful concept and we should pursue it. As we have seen on the floor of the House of Commons, with interchanges with government representatives as well as members of the opposition, the government really does not know where it is going on that particular issue, but it is prepared to spend a fair chunk of money in order to consult with different sectors of the Canadian economy.

That is not to suggest that different sectors of the economy ought not to be consulted with, but this government has been in power for eight years, not six months, not nine months, not twelve months. It has been in power for close to eight years. To embark upon this particular initiative at a fairly substantial cost to the taxpayers of this country is something one has to question in terms of the seriousness and the genuineness of this government in view of the fact that we are probably going to be facing a federal election within the next twelve months.

Some have said that perhaps these consultations are a prelude to the federal election which is to come in order for the government to consult with its friends in the private sector in order to ascertain its ideas in trying to put together a platform for the purposes of the next election.

I certainly would not want to argue that. I would hope that the government and ministers opposite would be much more responsible than only looking at a very short-term political high jinks, if you will, of the Canadian people. Some members opposite would certainly agree with my intervention on that.

The facts were drawn out in Question Period today. The Government of Canada is providing a university in the United States with over $18 million to do a study of the social services in the city of Toronto. All it would have to do is contact and have some discussions with the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, who would be able to give example after example of some of the difficulties plaguing that particular community.

The cost is $18 million. I am sure that if the government contacted my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, he would be much more conservative in terms of what he would request from the Government of Canada to pay him in order to provide for the necessary answers so that the government could move forward.

Advertising costs of the government are way out of whack. We have seen that the Minister of Finance has tried to take some steps to curb the escalation of advertising costs of the government.

One of the interesting things is that when this issue is raised, ministers of the Crown will stand in their place and say they thought the opposition wanted the government to provide to the Canadian people information about the various programs it has in place. That is very true, and there are various ways in which the government of Canada can do that without necessarily having to retain the services of friends in high places in order to put together these packages of information to try to sell to the Canadian people.

The argument can be made that if the program in itself is so good, Canadians will recognize the merits of that program and will respond accordingly to the focus of that program.

The government has also announced in its budget something which is dear to my constituents and something that I find somewhat alarming in view of the stage we are at in Canadian economy. It is intending, as it has announced in the budget, to privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

For those in the Chamber and those who may be viewing our proceedings here this afternoon, the Cape Breton Development Corporation was born in 1967–68. The premier of the day, the former leader of the Conservative Party, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, is a great Nova Scotian. He has served this country with great distinction on the floor of the House of Commons. He was the premier of our province and he and a young minister of the Crown at that time, Allan MacEachen, came together and discussed what could be done because numerous coal mines in Cape Breton were being done away with by the private sector; they walked away. They took the key out and just said: "To hell with the community".

Federally we conceived and implemented what is known as the Cape Breton Development Corporation to try to assist the diversification of the local economy and also, in later years, to try to provide alternatives for the uses of coal in Cape Breton. If one were to look at the bottom line of this Crown corporation, one could not be as positive as one would want to be.

One would have to say that without the federal Crown corporation, as so moved and sponsored by the hon. gentleman in the Upper House, Allan J. MacEachen, we in the island of Cape Breton would be more in tune and more inclined to be referred to as a Third World country.

One of the rationales for the conception and subsequent implementation of Devco, as we refer to it in Cape Breton, was that the Nova Scotia Power Corporation would use the coal which is produced from Devco to generate power in the province of Nova Scotia.

The minister responsible for Devco is in the House. The policy of Robert Stanfield, as premier of the province of Nova Scotia, was affirmed by his successor, the late G. I. Smith from Truro, Nova Scotia. It was adopted, promoted and enhanced substantially by a Liberal premier who succeeded him, Gerald Regan. It was once again reaffirmed by his success, Premier John Buchanan, who also sits in the Upper House.

From time to time, I have said things about that particular premier which may not draw a consensus in this House, but I would have to say that he affirmed the consistent policy of the provincial government as it relates to the utilization of coal. The successor to the past premier of the province of Nova Scotia, the hon. Donald Cameron, has not affirmed that policy. He has walked away from that policy. He has cut his hands adrift from the Cape Breton coal industry. He has denied us the opportunity to sell a product which was clearly the understanding or the genesis behind the concept and the implementation of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

You cannot blame the federal minister. You cannot blame the Prime Minister for that. I blame one individual, and that is Donald Cameron, the premier of the province of Nova Scotia.

I say to the federal minister and to the Prime Minister, do not get sucked into the Cameron agenda, which does not put in place its concerns for the real lives and real aspirations of people. To Canadians who happen to live in that region of our country, do not get sucked into buying his request to privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

This was done at the federal level to try to help out a weak sister or weak brother in the province of Nova Scotia in the person of the premier of the province of Nova Scotia.

To the viewing audience, you may ask where the hon. member is going. Let me be very clear.

The premier of this province wants the Cape Breton Development Corporation to be privatized, and the reason is that he is involved to his ears in the sponsoring of the Westray Coal Mine in Pictou County, which is in grave, grave economic difficulties at the present time. The only way that he can justify throwing provincial moneys and getting the assistance of the federal government is to now ask the federal government to privatize Devco so that it will be on the same level playing field. The federal government, unfortunately, has announced its intentions to pursue that.

It is wrong for the government to co-operate, to be co-opted, to be coerced into taking this kind of action with regard to the coal industry in industrial Cape Breton.

Another aspect of the federal budget has been the winding over, if you will, of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. That is wrong. It is bad public policy. It will not service the needs of those individuals who live in eastern Nova Scotia. In point of fact, it will add further uncertainty with regard the privatization of the Cape Breton Development Corporation to an already weakened economy in that part of our country.

It is wrong for several reasons. Regarding Devco, the Prime Minister, in his own words in Cape Breton, made reference that he would not privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Ministers of the Crown indicated that as well. The government has not clearly defined what it means when it says privatization. We do not know if it has some friendly individual who wishes to come in and pick up all the pieces, bleed it for a few years, and then leave the coal mines, as we have seen in the past.

Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was to assume the role of the industrial development division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which was a part of the ACOA legislation placed on the floor of the House of Commons.

It has once again broken its commitment to the people of my district, as well as to the three federal constituencies in Cape Breton.

The minister is going to intervene and say some things and we will have an opportunity to debate. I want us to be clear. I did not support the passage of ACOA because I did not believe the government in 1986–87. It said that the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation would have longevity. I have now been proven correct. It has not had longevity. The government has dubbed us. It has fooled us. They manipulated. They distorted the facts to the people of Cape Breton when they said Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will take over the role of the industrial development division of Devco.

We in this party opposed that because the special relationship that we had with the federal government and the people of Cape Breton would be done away with. It has now happened as a result of the budget of the Minister of Finance.

There were individuals in this House who supported the government in that particular initiative. They thought it was going to be wonderful. It would be the panacea in terms of rectifying the economic ills in Atlantic Canada.

My colleagues to the left, the New Democratic Party, were front line and centre in supporting ACOA but knowing full well and with the full knowledge that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation would not be in existence for a long period of time. In point of fact, it would be done away with sooner as opposed to later.

They knew, so I put both of them in the same bed together. The Tories and the NDP are on the same side when it comes to economic initiatives in industrial Cape Breton. On this one the NDP preach one thing in Halifax, one thing in Cape Breton, and another thing here in Ottawa. They are going to be caught on their own words as we evidenced in this debate on a previous occasion as related to ACOA and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

I would hope the minister could stand in his place today and say: "We are not going to privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation at this time. We will pull back because it is nonsense to proceed with it at this point in time when we have a weakened economy".

The minister laughs. When you have a weakened economy in Cape Breton, can he laugh about that? Can he laugh about that?

An hon. member: Sure he can.

Mr. Dingwall: We have a weakened economy. The corporation has been under substantial downsizing. Both management, as I am sure the minister will attest, and labour are attempting to the best of their abilities to try to make the corporation more viable each and every day.

I do not think that privatization at this time or giving the mandate to pursue that is going to assist the workers, the management and the community in arriving at a solution which is acceptable to all those who are stakeholders with regard to that corporation. I would hope that the minister would avail himself of that opportunity and say that on the floor of the House of Commons.

I suspect that this minister probably had nothing to do with putting the privatization agenda in the statement of the Minister of Finance some weeks ago. Perhaps we will get an opportunity to hear the minister's views.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I just rise to ask a few questions of my hon. friend.

I was on duty this afternoon and was delighted to hear that Cape Breton is the topic for debate on this day when we are discussing the budget. I want to raise a few questions for my hon. friend based upon his interventions.

I think it was Voltaire who said that all happy families are alike and all unhappy families are unhappy in their own different ways. When I look at the Liberals in Nova Scotia, I am reminded of how very unhappy they have been and in so many bizarre ways the last few months, and how they have so much difficulty in agreeing with each other. Pictou County Liberals, Cape Breton Liberals, they can barely talk to each other.

I am from Ontario so I am not a great authority on Liberalism in Nova Scotia, but they are a very unhappy party in that province. I can tell from the hon. member's intervention some of the reasons why. There is a sense of rivalry and distrust there which I really think we should now grow beyond.

More important is his point about privatization of Devco. I have been very privileged over the last two and a half years to have this corporation as a responsibility. I have grown very fond of Cape Breton in these years of looking after that file and visiting that beautiful part of Canada.

I am pleased that shortly we will be having some major announcements under the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Program that will help Cape Breton in important ways. We are going to have some further important capital expansions under Devco which will interest my hon. friend. We have a Devco, by the way, which is now exporting in impressive quantities. I just signed a corporate plan the other day, sending it to Treasury Board. I note that exports for Devco are way up. In fact they are surpassing their financial pro forma projections for 1991–92.

I have to commend as, indeed, my hon. friend did, labour and management in that corporation for their very fine performance this year.

I remind my hon. friend who complains about the premier of Nova Scotia's opinions about Devco that he is not the owner of Devco. The owner of Devco is the Government of Canada, the Parliament of Canada. We make the decisions on whether it is to be privatized or have its nature changed, not the premier of Nova Scotia.

Let me tell you exactly what the budget said. It listed 45 agencies that could be privatized or could be examined as to modalities for privatization and the Devco Corporation, of course, falls into the latter.

The reason I could not resist a chuckle while the hon. member was speaking was that he adamantly refused to consider, ever, ever, privatization for this Crown corporation. It makes me laugh because the Soviet Union is privatizing everything. East Germany is privatizing everything. Eastern Europe is privatizing everything, but a Cape Breton Liberal would never privatize; never, ever privatize the Devco Corporation.

What makes me laugh is that these people are farther to the left than the eastern European socialists or communist parties, let alone the old Soviet Union itself. For the hon. member to not even allow consideration of privatization is an intellectual ostrich-like pose which I think he must be embarrassed to assume.

Let me ask this question. Could the hon. member ever foresee a time when he would privatize a federal Crown corporation and tell me under what conditions? Could he ever foresee a time when he might privatize Devco?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to say this, but the hon. minister started his remarks after I concluded mine and made some references to provincial colleagues in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly. I was quite sincere in my remarks as I attributed them to the former leader of the Conservative Party of Canada, the Hon. Bob Stanfield. I must say that I take strong exception to the political cheap shots of the minister opposite with regard to the scene in the province of Nova Scotia.

An hon. member: He is no Bob Stanfield.

Mr. Dingwall: The minister has not only taken cheap shots, but it shows the total lack of understanding and knowledge the minister and the Government of Canada have with regard to the coal industry, its history and its future.

I will answer the hon. minister very clearly. The minister is so on to himself that he does not even know the dossier. I have said, as early as 1983, 1982, 1985, 1987 and 1988 with regard to the privatization of the Cape Breton Development Corporation—the minister does not understand the dossier—that to privatize Devco, to give it to his friends, the Joe Shannons of the world or whoever it may be, his Sinclair Stevens friends, that kind of individual to come in and be the sole operator of a coal mine, to strip it down to sell off its best parts and make a million dollars or more and then walk away from it in five years, is privatization which I would never support.

I have said both privately and publicly: Check with the unions. I have said to them privately and publicly that we need to have union representatives on the board of directors of this corporation, that employees have to be involved with running this corporation, managing this corporation and in having shares in this corporation.

Do not give me any of this hogwash, as a minister of the Crown, that somehow those of us on this side of the House will never be able to see the day. The minister went on to say: "Devco is owned by the Government of Canada". We know that, but the sole supplier to the Nova Scotia Power Corporation of Devco's product is the provincial government which happens to be run by Don Cameron.

If the minister does not wake up and stand up to this provincial premier to get a better deal for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the federal government, the employees and the community, we are all going to be worse off as a result of this.

I am happy to hear the minister say on the floor of the House of Commons that he, as the federal minister responsible, dissociates, discounts, wants nothing to do with the former Minister for International Trade, the Hon. Pat Carney, who said not long ago as the minister responsible for international trade: "Devco is not to sell its coal on the international market".

I am glad that the minister has now said that statement on the floor of the House of Commons. It is a few years too late, but nevertheless, the minister has said that.

My final comment is that this minister better understand.

Mr. Hockin: Answer the question.

Mr. Dingwall: I said yes to your question. I said yes to the hon. member's question and that is not an issue on the island or anywhere in the province of Nova Scotia.

The issue is the terms and reference with regard to the privatization. I say to the hon. minister: You are making a major faux pas, a major mistake in terms of public policy in this country by asking that Crown corporation at this time in its mandate with a Canadian recession, with a substantial downsizing and the fact that management and labour are working on a daily basis to try to make further reforms to that corporation, to remove itself from all of that hard work, to jump into a dossier with regard to privatization.

The minister cannot understand that the refocusing that will have to take place now for privatization will certainly have a negative impact in the short term, medium term and long term. I am surprised that the minister responsible would be so incompetent on a dossier which is so important to a region of this country.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the borrowing bill before the House today. It is a bill of importance in terms of how the government sets its priorities.

I want to make remarks in a couple of areas. I want to express my concern about what is happening to the country in general. I think Canadians are feeling a general sense that our country is drifting away from us, that we do not have a sense of priorities as a people, as a Parliament since the government across the way is missing in a certain amount of leadership in terms of where it wants to bring this country.

The second part in this is a concern about what is happening to the farm economy in prairie Canada where farmer after farmer is being forced to leave the land through circumstances that are not her fault or his fault in any way whatsoever.

I will start off with the farm economy. In a recent tour of my riding, I had a chance to go to 10 different communities to have public meetings in those communities. I heard from person after person the difficulties they are facing on the farm today in terms of a decent and fair price.

The important thing is that they are not getting a fair price for their products. The important thing to know is that the farmers, relatively speaking, are getting less today than they got in the 1930s for a bushel of grain or for many of the other products that they ship and sell to the marketplace. When that happens, of course, the farmers are going to leave the land. There will be more and more bankruptcies, more and more hardship, leading to social problems for the farmer and the farmer's family. The small towns and villages will gradually lose population, lose businesses, have schools close down, have post offices close down. When that happens, people leave and the thing tends to snowball and more and more. Farm implement dealers leave. Automobile dealerships leave. More and more businesses leave and as a result, we find more and more rural depopulation over the entire prairies.

Very simply put, that is the situation on the prairies today. We are seeing a rapid depopulation of rural Canada, people moving to the towns and the cities, moving in particular outside of rural Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta to the larger cities or off to British Columbia or, indeed, to the province of Ontario.

What is going to happen to the rural society and the rural fabric? What I find is that we have to do two or three things. First of all, the most important thing is that the farmer needs a fair price for the product that the farmer sells in the marketplace. The farmer needs to see some reflection of that price in the cost of producing that bushel of wheat, that pound of beef or that pound of pork he puts on the market. The farmer also needs a return that reflects a decent wage for himself or for herself in producing that farm product. The farmer needs a price that reflects parity between the input costs and a decent wage and what he or she receives from the marketplace. That is not happening today. That is not happening today despite the GRIP and NISA programs, despite the other programs that are in place at both the federal and provincial level.

What we need is a new farm program. We might call it a fair prices program or fair prices bill that will guarantee the farmer a return based on the cost of production.

The second thing that one notices immediately is that our farmers are caught now in a price war, in a trade war, between the Europeans and the Americans. There is a subsidy on grain for export from Europe and the United States to other countries in the world. It is the Canadian farmer who is caught in the middle of this price war and it is the Canadian farmer who is suffering the consequences of that particular war.

Our government has to be more aggressive in putting forward the arguments of our country around the world because it is our farmers and the Australians and the Argentinians and the New Zealanders who are caught in the crossfire of a vicious trade war between the Americans and the Europeans. If it does not stop soon, we are going to see even more farmers leave the land.

The third problem is the problems of the GATT negotiations as it effects the four national supply management marketing boards, the dairy commission, the turkey marketing agency, the chicken marketing board and the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency. Under article XI of the GATT, there is protection for our four national supply management boards.

What is happening now in the GATT negotiations is that the tendency or the momentum is to take away that protection from Canada, from our farmers. If we lose those marketing boards we in effect are going to lose those industries, because without the protection of the supply marketing system the dairy farmer will not survive.

I remember about a month ago when the dairy farmers came to Ottawa. They had a huge demonstration here on Parliament Hill with 25,000 to 35,000 farmers from across the country. I remember the Stillborn family from my riding saying to me in my office: "If the dairy commission goes, it is not long before the dairy farmers go because these huge farm factories in the United States that produce milk will soon be shipping milk into Canada in huge tanker trucks at a lower price that can be produced in this country and undercutting the farmers who produce milk today". We have all kinds of additional costs in this country that you do not have in the United States.

We have the cost of a much more severe climate in this country than they have in parts of the United States. We have social programs which are, of course, expensive to keep in this country so our taxation regime is different than the United States. Without supply management, without the marketing boards, we are going to lose the dairy, chicken, turkey and egg farmers we have now .

I would like to see our Prime Minister take a much stronger stand on behalf of our farmers. I would like to see him fly to Washington, along with a delegation of Canadian farm leaders, and lobby the President of the United States on the position and the point of view of the Canadian farm.

Our problem is that President Bush and the American administration are the main ones pushing to get rid of the Canadian marketing boards so that there would be a greater market for the American farmers in this country.

If you have a market in this country of 26 million or 27 million people and the United States is south of the border, they are looking at that market and they are sort of savouring the market like a fox savours the chicken coop. They want to get inside the chicken coop and they want to feast on it.

Yet we do not see our Prime Minister going to Washington and saying to Mr. Bush: "Look. We have a democratic right to keep our marketing boards. We want to produce for our own market. We are competent and efficient. Our marketing boards are good for the farmers and good for the consumers. Our marketing boards in addition to that mean there are more jobs for the people of this country".

I go back to the Stillborn family from my riding. They explained that not only will we lose the farms if we lose the marketing boards, but we will lose all the jobs, the part-time help of people working on those dairy farms and working on those poultry farms and working on the egg producing farms. Many young people work part time on those jobs. We also lose the full-time jobs that go along with it.

In the city of Yorkton that I represent for example we have the Co-op Dairies which employs a lot of men and women in the dairy producing the milk products that go around our province of Saskatchewan. If we lose the marketing boards, how long will it be before we lose the dairies because if we start using American raw milk we are soon going to be using American cheese, American yogurt, American ice cream and other American products. The same thing is true of course in the chicken, turkey and egg industry as well.

We are looking here at losing the farmer, at losing tens of thousands of jobs for people in the small towns and the cities right across this country. Of course we are losing a stable and reliable market for the consumers of Canada.

Those are some of the problems facing the Canadian farmer today. The important thing is a fair price based on the cost of production. The other important thing is to have a Prime Minister that supports us in the GATT negotiations by going to Washington with the farm leaders and bringing opposition members of Parliament with him to make the case to the President of the United States, to Congress, to the American people why we as Canadians need to keep our marketing boards.

We need a government that is more effective and more outspoken about ending the trade war, the grain wars between the United States and Europe. Those are the three big issues that are facing farmers today.

There is a fourth very important issue and that is the issue of farm debt. Farm debt is there largely because of the problems of farm income. If we look at debt today we find that our farmers are in greater debt than they have been for decades in this country. Many farmers are being forced to leave the land. There is farm bankruptcy after farm bankruptcy.

I know of a couple of cases in my riding where the farm stress situation because of debt have led to some very serious problems. People have contemplated suicide because of the stress on the family, because of what it has done to the children of those particular families that all of a sudden come from a household that does not have the money to buy the basic necessities of life, let alone some of the things that most children want and need for their own development, their own entertainment.

These are the social consequences that are facing rural Canada today. One of the problems we have of course is that in the rural communities people live a long way apart. They live on farms scattered throughout many miles. They live in small villages and on small farms so that we do not see in a vivid and explicit way many of the problems that we tend to see in urban Canada, such as food banks, soup kitchens, people living on the streets, the homeless and people living in small homes, small apartments on minimum wage or people begging on the streets. We see that in urban Canada. In rural Canada much of that poverty, suffering and misery are hidden from public view. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is there.

I conclude this part of my remarks by saying that the most important industry, the fundamental number one industry in this country is the agricultural industry. If we have a strong farming base, and of course fishing and forestry in other parts of the country, in other words the renewable primary industries, we will build a strong country and create jobs for Canadians from one coast to the other.

I do not see that vision today. I do not see that plan today. I do not see that objective today in terms of the government's spending priorities either in the budget or in the borrowing bill in terms of what it wants to borrow money for.

The other point I want to make is that as I travel around this country I feel that Canadians are fearing for Canada. They are wondering what is going to happen to this country of ours. It is not only the farm crisis. There is the unemployment crisis. People are being thrown out of work. There is a recession that is worse than the recession back in the early 1980s, 1981-83. We have a recession that has caused hardship, because we had high interest rates, because we have an overinflated dollar, because we have a trade deal that was signed between this government and the United States which I maintain has given away too much of our sovereignty. The trade deal should be scrapped and should never have been signed in the first place.

That trade deal is hurting this country. In particular, it is hurting manufacturing. We are seeing that in the province of Ontario and it is hurting every single province of this country. Yet we have a government that is now negotiating not just a trade deal between us and the United States but trying to expand that trade deal to include the Mexicans as well. That concerns me when I see the wage rates in Mexico compared to Canada where people are paid one to three dollars an hour compared to $14, $15, $16 an hour here. In Mexico they have no social benefits compared to social benefits in this country, they have little or no environmental regulations or standards compared to what we have today.

When I see those comparisons, when I see those differences I fear for the Canada that we are going to have if this government signs the trade deal with Mexico.

I think Canadians are fearing for their country. They are fearing that their national institutions are slipping away, that CBC is slipping away, the post office, the railway system and the airlines. Canadians say to me now from coast to coast that we want our country back. We want this country back. We want Canada back once again.

[Translation]

We need a country that is stronger and sounder than it is now. We have many economic problems. I mentioned the high rate of unemployment, farmers, the problems we find throughout the country, and the problems we have as a result of the FTA between our country and the United States. We also have to deal with national unity and the Constitution, to achieve unity between Quebec and Canadians across this country.

[English]

It is important that we have a national vision, that we have a national dream, that we start building once again, that we start spending our money in this country on research and development, on education so that we can create jobs. In the long run, I do not think it is any secret on how to create jobs in this country. If you look at Japan, western Europe, parts in the United States and other parts of the world, many of them having fewer resources than us, what they basically do are three things for making their economies more competitive and more efficient. They invest in training. They invest in education and they invest in research and development.

What do we do? We do not invest anywhere nearly as much in those areas as most countries around the world. In research and development, our investment per capita is at roughly the same level as the Republic of Ireland or the country of Egypt. Is it any wonder we in this country are falling further and further behind our neighbours in Europe, the United States and Japan? We do not have the national priority and the national vision to do what other countries have done so well.

• (1620)

Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago, Japan was crushed by nuclear bombs during the Second World War. France was also crushed, like so many European countries. And today, the standard of living in many European countries is as high as it is in Canada or even higher, in some cases, and we see the same phenomenon in Japan.

If people in Japan, France, Germany, Sweden, Switzerland, and many other European countries have a national vision, we could also have a national vision in this country.

[English]

We can do many things in this country. We can educate our people. We can train our people. We can put our people to work on building a strong and independent Canada that can be competitive and efficient and compete with anybody anywhere in the world, but we can only do that if we have a national dream and a national objective and a national motivation to do that. I sense that the government across the way does not have that any more, if indeed it ever did.

The last point is that the people of this country are afraid of losing our social programs. We are seeing examples now, that started a number of years ago, where the federal government is cutting back on the rate of escalation of transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and for medical care.

Some of the statistics that I have here, compiled by the provinces, tell us that over the last five or six years, going on to the end of the 1990s, the provinces will have lost tens of billions of dollars of potential revenue that they would have received if the federal government had not cut back on the Established Programs Financing program or not put a cap on CAP, which is the Canada Assistance Program, for Ontario, British Columbia and the province of Alberta.

These cutbacks by the federal government have put a large burden on the backs of the provinces, have driven up provincial deficits, have caused the provinces to scale down on their commitment to medical care in terms of dollars and have put a greater commitment on the hospitals, universities, school boards and municipalities of this country. As a result of that, the Canadian people are worried about their social programs, about the future of medical care, hospitalization, family allowances and the old age pensions. People in this country want to keep those programs accessible to all and keep them universal to all Canadians.

As we speak in the House of Commons, there is a greater movement in this country to end universality and medical care. In fact, the Reform Party of Canada as its official policy says: "We want to end universal medical care in this country". The Reform Party leader came two weeks ago to Regina, which is the cradle of medical care in Canada, and he challenged the NDP government to cut back on medical care and end universality in medical care. I say to Mr. Manning and the Reform Party, the answer to that is no, no, no. We need in this country universal medical care. We need a recommitment in this country to our social programs.

In ending, that was one reason why I was proud, as a member of the committee on the Constitution, that we included, in an all-party agreement, all three parties, a commitment to a social covenant which talked about medical care, post-secondary education, primary education, the environment, social programs, food and housing and collective bargaining for workers. We need a social covenant. We need to renew that commitment.

I end by saying people want this country back. They want Canada strong and free once again. I guess the way we will have to accomplish that is by changing the government across the way for one that really cares about ordinary people in Canada.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my friend on parts of his remarks. Obviously I cannot agree with him on all of them, but I would ask my hon. friend if he could enlighten the House, and I am particularly referring to his comments on agricultural policy.

My friend knows, as does everyone in this House, that the government has firmly supported the farm groups on supply management and done everything it can and continues to do everything it can to put forward its case. The farmers and farm leaders came to Ottawa and demonstrated in support of the government, as a matter of fact, on our policies and our efforts. What I want to ask my hon. friend about, because he is from the west, is this Reform Party policy. Of the three major parties—the Liberals, the New Democrats and the Conservatives—I do not really see any difference in our support of the supply management policies that have been put forward and that have brought stability to those sectors where they are in place. That puts us all in the same boat.

The Reform Party policy manual, and we have looked at it, is very very thin on agricultural policy of any kind. But Preston Manning is time and time again quoted as saying they would eliminate supply management and marketing boards and destroy what we have built up, whether it has been done federally or provincially, to bring some stability to those areas of agriculture which need it and which endorse it. I do not really believe that it is to the detriment of the consumers. I happen to think it is a good process.

I wonder if my hon. friend could enlighten the House as to why the Reform Party from the west wants to destroy what has brought such stability to agriculture in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: It is hard to answer for Preston Manning and the Reform Party, but I will give it a shot.

First of all, the minister is correct when he says the three national parties are committed to supply management. That is true of our party, the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party. My suggestion here was that the Prime Minister could make a real point by flying to Washington with farm leaders and with members of the opposition to lead a lobby in putting pressure on not only

Mr. Bush but on members of Congress and the national press in the United States. I think that would be useful for the Prime Minister to do. It is a suggestion I made a few weeks ago to the Deputy Prime Minister and I hope that might be considered very seriously in the next few days.

In terms of the Reform Party, let us make it very clear that it is the only national party in this country, if you read its program, that says: "We do not support marketing boards in this country. We do not support marketing boards that are supply management boards", or indeed I suspect other marketing boards as well.

I believe the reason they do not support them is that they are a very, very conservative fringe group in this country which believes that farmers should be left totally to their own in terms of the international competitive forces. That is totally unrealistic in the world of today. Our farmers need the support of marketing boards. We have a colder climate, we are a small country in terms of market, we are right next door to the most powerful largest country in the world, the United States of America. It is a bit like the mouse and the elephant dancing together; unless we have some protection, which we get through marketing boards, the Americans are just going to come in here and trample all over us.

People should be aware that the Reform Party is saying no to marketing boards in this country. It is also saying no to farm subsidies, saying the farmers should be able to fend for themselves. Once again, it is the only party in this country that is saying no to farm subsidies: "Get rid of those farm subsidies". I ask you this: How many farmers in my riding would survive without support now from the federal government or the provinces? The answer to that question is very few indeed, yet the Reform Party is saying to get rid of them.

Finally, in terms of the Reform Party, not just agriculture but in terms of the Reform Party in general, what they are saying to the Canadian people is that there should be a cutback of 10 to 15 per cent right across the board. That is a relevant point to make here because we are dealing here with a government borrowing bill. The Canadian people should be aware of this. They are saying to cut back on everything from 10 to 15 per cent.

What does that mean to the old age pensioner who is barely making a living in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, or in Montreal? A 15 per cent cutback on the old age pension? What does it mean to education? A 15 per cent cutback when already we haven't enough funds to keep our universities and schools funded the way they should be? What does it mean to a sick person? A 15 per cent cutback on medical care in this country?

It is about time the Canadian people saw the Reform Party for what it is and said "no, no, no" to that party that wants to bring this country back into the dark ages.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton–Melville. Quite frankly, in that part of his speech where he talked about the breakdown of rural Canada I am in full support of his recommendations, his ideas. I want to ask him a question. We touched upon it earlier before he began his speech. I raised an issue in this House about two and a half weeks ago when I relayed the story of my experience in the Middle East where I received in conjunction with constituents orders for 140,000 tonnes of food from Canada. That is not 40 boxcars or 400 boxcars of food. That is a combination of 4,000 grain cars and boxcar loads of food that is needed in the Middle East which will be paid for.

• (1630)

Because this food is going to the people of Iraq, and I stress the people of Iraq monitored by the United Nations, monitored not only in terms of shipment but distribution, I believe it is something that as a nation we should be doing, not only in terms of helping the people of Iraq, but also in terms of our own exports, our farming community. It not only has a short-term positive effect, but long-term potential.

I find that it is very difficult to move this kind of an order through the system because of the red tape here and the red tape at the United Nations, the difficulties between reparations and sanctions and humanitarian aid.

I would like to ask the member for Yorkton—Melville a very specific question. He has been a member of this House for almost 20 years. What direction or what thrust does he think that we should be taking to make something like this happen? Not only are the people in his community affected, but farmers all across Canada are affected by this kind of transaction. Could he give the House some advice.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to compliment the member for Broadview—Greenwood for the work he has been doing on this issue in terms of trying to accomplish two things, to help people in the developing world in terms of basic food products which are extremely important and at the same time providing a new market for the products of our Canadian farmers.

Many years ago, back in 1968 when I was first elected, there was a civil war in Nigeria. I was one of the members who flew to Biafra into the war zone and spent some time there with the churches and the Red Cross. I then got involved for several months afterward in trying to get humanitarian aid into Biafra through the church organizations. I am talking of food products, medicines, powdered milk, and things of that sort.

I understand what the member says when one of the big problems we had is the red tape on this end and the red tape on the other end and all the bureaucracy one has to go through.

Surely to goodness in our modern age there must be ways of expediting that, of eliminating that red tape, eliminating some of the bureaucracy, some of the details we have to go through when people are dying of starvation and needing something that we in this country can produce and produce in great abundance. There must be some way we can do that in the modern advanced age of technology. Surely to goodness we have the minds that can come up with a method of making the delivery an awful lot easier.

The second thing is there should be an agency of government which helps the public sector and the private sector to expedite work of this sort, that would go into places like Iraq and Iran and all throughout the Middle East and act sort of like a middle person that would make things a lot easier to accomplish in terms of what Canadian people want to do.

There is so much that we can do. I go back to the trade war with the United States and Europeans. I do not have the statistics with me now, but if you go back a few years you will find that there were massive subsidies of exports of American grain and European grain to the Middle East to places like Iraq and Iran and many other countries. That of course really hurt the Canadian farmer and producer because we do not have the treasury in this country to subsidize in a massive sense or in any sense the export of our grain to other countries around the world.

I think my answer to the member across the way is that there are many things we can do. One is to get rid of some of the red tape.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for London East, Housing; the hon. member for Vancouver East, Violence Against Women; the hon. member for South West Nova, Search and Rescue; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace, Gun Control; and the hon. member for Sudbury, Employment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today we are considering Bill C-61, which deals with our country's economic issues, with the broad economic issues of the day. First of all, I would like to say that as Canadians we all know that we have quite a few economic problems. Instead of getting better, the situation is getting worse every day.

We know that the unemployment rate recently went up to 10.6 per cent, which means we are not coming out of the recession but are still right in the middle of one. Canadians are afraid of what will happen to the economy in the future, and that is why retail sales have not picked up. Canadians are afraid of losing their jobs.

However, this is a direct result of the government's policies. Two years ago the government started with its high dollar and high interest rate policy. According to them it was the only way to make Canada more competitive. As a result, we now have a made-in-Canada recession, created by the policies of this government.

[English]

Our recession in Canada started long before the American recession because it was a made-in-Canada recession. What have we seen today?

In my city of Toronto, the unemployment rate is about 10.5 per cent. There are 211,000 Torontonians looking for work and cannot find it. Every person in this House, from whatever party, knows what it is like when a constituent who is 40 or 50 years of age comes into your office and says: "You are my last hope. I have lost my job. My unemployment insurance has run out. I have sold my car. I have sold my house. Now I am losing my family".

Do we not have a responsibility to those individuals? Do we not realize that more than any other group in this country we are responsible for the tragic plight of these people who face unemployment? We cannot give them hope in terms of saying their jobs are going to come back. So many jobs are not going to come back.

Canada, in the three years since free trade, has lost 345,000 manufacturing jobs. That is 16 per cent of all our manufacturing jobs. Those are the highest paying jobs. They are not lay-offs, they are permanent job losses. The companies have closed up, and in many cases the jobs have gone south of the border.

Look at the auto industry. The auto industry is probably the key to whatever we are going to do in NAFTA. Canada has lost, since free trade came in, three short years, 21,213 auto jobs. That is 21 per cent of our auto jobs. When I asked the government the other day what it intends to do about it, it said that things are rosy and that the United States is losing jobs as well.

The United States, in those same three years, has lost just 9 per cent of its auto jobs. We are losing our automotive jobs at two and a third times the U.S. rate. This is due in large measure to an ill-conceived free trade deal that wiped out the safeguards for auto jobs in Canada. That is why we are losing the jobs much more quickly and they are going south of the border. Things are not well because we are going to continue losing more of those jobs unless this government shows some leadership and is prepared to step in and say: "Enough is enough. We are going to stand up for Canadian workers".

The member for London East raised the issue today of General Motors. It lost a deal at its London plant for 25 locomotives. Who is going to pick up those 25 locomotives and create the jobs? General Electric in the United States is going to.

CN is buying these locomotives. CN has public funding. It is a Crown corporation. Can you imagine anything more stupid than our Crown corporations helping American workers?

We heard the member for York South—Weston who showed how we had increased funding from $.6 million to $17 million for Canadian studies abroad. At the same time here in Canada we are cutting out the Science Council, the Economic Council. At the same time this government is spending $21.2 billion on an ill-conceived prosperity agenda. This prosperity agenda asks stupid questions to which we already know the answers, questions it raised in its 1984 mini budget. What has it been doing? Eight lost years and it did not even answer them.

In effect, Canadians have answered. We have a high pile of studies telling the government what should be done in the area of education, training, research and development, science, technology, innovation, financing entrepreneurs. These studies have done at public expense already. Why did it not read these to get the answers? It had to spend $21.2 billion so it can consult with Canadians. Canadians do not need this consultation. The answers are there.

The government is being political. It is spending over $3 million to simply advertise these meetings. Thirty or forty people are invited by paid consultants to come to these meetings and listen to some of the things the government has to say. The answers are already there. We know this is a government that is not prepared to consult and listen. It is prepared to advertise and tell Canadians what it wants, but it is not a government that is prepared to listen.

Did it listen to big business or exporters about the crushing impact of the high dollar and high interest rates on exports and on jobs in Canada and on the cost of the deficit? Did it listen to small business in terms of its two unemployment insurance premium increases? Why are labour and small business not part of this on-going prosperity agenda consultation process?

This government played fast and free with its own public servants when it limited them to 0 and 3 per cent increases at the same time that it was giving senior officials huge increases, at the same time that was giving the Bank of Canada 6 per cent increases. How stupid. Labour had to back out of this prosperity agenda.

In Canada we all know that if we are going to get our economy turned around, one of the keys has to be that labour and management and governments at all levels must learn to work together. They do in other countries. Canada has the worst record of labour strife and days lost of any country in the OECD. How are we going to get competitive unless we work together for a common purpose? Instead of enhancing that co-operative spirit, the government has been destroying it repeatedly.

What did it do in this budget, which came down about a month ago, to try to remedy the situation? What did it do about this rising unemployment? I will give the government credit on two counts. It accepted the advice that we have been giving it for several years now, consistently, saying that the housing sector is one of the most important sectors in Canada for creating new jobs. We had recommended lowering the down payments and using other possibilities such as pension funds and RRSPs for funding the down payment on homes.

We know that if we can get the 50 per cent of our construction workers who are not working today back on the jobs, we are going to have not only housing, but immediate creation of jobs, if the government accepted these two proposals.

Those proposals did not cost any money. The government was not prepared to go further, as we suggested, in dealing with the municipal infrastructure programs in which we have to build new sewers to look after our environment and stop pollution. All we wanted to do was prepay a couple of those schemes that were on municipal books, to bring them forward a little bit. Was this government prepared to enter into a co-operative program with the provinces and municipalities in itself? Was it prepared to spend, in advance, a little bit of money to create these necessary infrastructures and also get people back to work, giving people the dignity of a job? The best social program is a job, it is not welfare that is augmented and is being paid for by the municipalities at the same time as this government is cutting back its payments for education.

At the same time, from the 1986-87 year until the 1992-93 fiscal year, this government has cut back its transfers to the provinces by $4.9 billion. There has been a $4.9 billion decrease over what it had committed to spend before.

With this type of approach, there is no doubt this is a government that is not prepared to create jobs to arrest this rising unemployment. This government was not prepared in its budget to accept our proposal for more basic training. This government was not prepared to even put $25 million to help with the food banks.

Today, there are two million Canadians using food banks regularly. Seven hundred thousand of those are children and the food banks are stretched—what a travesty in a country that has so much. We have come to rely on them. We have to get these Canadians back to work to give them the training and the education. We have to get the science and technology going.

We know that innovation, entrepreneurship, science and technology and research and development are the keys to the future. What has this government done? The Prime Minister promised everyone of us in this House and all Canadians in 1984 that he was going to double R and D by 1988. It has gone down. It has gone down below the level it was at in 1984. We are now down to the level which is less than half of that of our major OECD competitors.

Where are our young scientists who are going to universities going to get the jobs? The government will say it is the fault of the private sector. Blame it on the private sector, blame everything on somebody else, but the fact is that this is a government that admitted to Canadians that with the high degree of foreign ownership and multinational corporations in Canada, the R and D is just not going to get done here in the private sector. The minister of industry said a couple of years ago that branch plants just do not do R and D. What did this government do in its last budget? It decreased the withholding taxes on payments to foreign multinationals as if this is going to get them to come in here and do an R and D. Was it linked to more funding by these branch plants for R and D? Was it linked to the creation of more jobs in Canada? What a boon to have your withholding tax rate cut in half cut in half when you are sitting with profits and you want to repatriate them to your own home country.

If you are going to get at the problem, that is not the way to do it. We face a real crisis in terms of retaining our jobs and creating them here in Canada. The government is now engaged in the North American free trade agreement negotiations, NAFTA. It has a great deal of hope for these agreements. It said: "We are going into NAFTA and we are going to become part of NAFTA". There are no conditions, no qualifiers. It is an article of faith that free trade with anyone is good. There are not even ant terms.

We have suggested to this government to take our auto sector, which will and must be a deal breaker for NAFTA.

• (1650)

As I have said before, we have lost 21 per cent of our auto jobs under the free trade agreement at a rate two and one-third times the U.S. job loss rate for auto workers.

Are we prepared to stand up for Canada's needs or are we simply ideologues, free trade, marketplace, all those things are to the benefit of us all the time. We have a chance to say that we want a fair deal for Canadian workers. We want Canada to have its fair share of auto jobs.

Every expert recognizes the auto pact lead to the establishment of a high-level automobile industry, a world-competitive automobile industry in Canada going back to 1965. That auto pact basically said: "You will have free trade in North American automobiles, but only if you produce an equivalent number of vehicles in Canada. You can bring one vehicle into Canada duty free if you produce one vehicle in Canada". That is fine. We used our market to guarantee certain jobs. You get our market free, but you have got to produce jobs here.

That safeguard for jobs was wiped out by the free trade agreement. It was wiped out to the point that by 1998, when all the tariffs are gone, the Big Three could pull all their production out of Canada, there could be no auto parts jobs here, they could ship cars into Canada from the United States duty free and not have one job here in Canada.

The Conservatives believe that free trade is a necessary part of globalization. That is naivety of the worst order. What percentage of Japan's auto market is served by foreign auto manufacturers? Three per cent. In the European Community they are debating whether by the year 2000 they will allow foreign penetration to go to either 15 per cent or 17 per cent.

Today in Canada the European, Japanese and Korean auto-makers, the foreign auto-makers, have 37 per cent of our market and produce only 3 per cent of the auto jobs in Canada. Now to me, that is being the Boy Scouts, naive to the nth degree, and we are the ones who suffer for not standing up for our rights, the rights of our workers to use our market to create a fair share of Canadian jobs. Why give it away for nothing? The other countries do not do it. The other countries are not practising free trade. Why should we be the only ones to do it?

In these NAFTA agreements, we have asked the government some very specific questions and we have asked it for some terms and conditions. We want, first of all, a North American tariff level or quota level which is going to get foreign penetration of the North American market back down to international norms. Why should we be higher than our major competitor, the European Community or Japan? Is that asking too much? Is it really?

Second, we want to go back to something like the auto pact. Not only will we give free trade within North America, but we want to make sure that free trade applies in a way that Canadian jobs are not sacrificed. So that means that we have to undo the provisions of the free trade agreement that allow these manufacturers to pull completely out of Canada. As a price for coming into Canada free of duty they should be prepared to create some jobs here. This is what we are asking, that is all.

We are going to have to have not only North American content rules, but country or Canadian content rules if we are going to get back to where we should be in terms of international norms and in terms of Canada's fair share of North American auto jobs. Let us not be the only naive people.

There is a lot of misunderstanding going on with this government. There is a canard out there promoted by this government, that the dispute settlement mechanism under the free trade agreement has just been a wonderful boon for Canadians.

We now have the Honda decision. They can impose tariffs on us and the only right we have is to consult with the Americans about these tariffs they have imposed on us and then after consultations go to a panel. But that panel's decision will not be binding on the United States unless the United States agrees. There is no binding arbitration of the Honda dispute. This is the most potentially damaging decision that has ever been taken to Canada's industrial future. It means that no other country or no other corporation within Canada or outside is going to establish in Canada to service the North American market.

We have got so much to do. I wish I could speak longer.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to my colleague from Willowdale. He has given a very succinct speech. He has an appreciation of all the problems that this country is confronted with. In my particular area I do not think there is one area in which it is illustrated so clearly the mistaken policies of this government as in the cross-border shopping issue.

I live in a border town. I can look across the water and see the United States. I see the devastating effect that cross-border shopping has had on the merchants in these small towns along the St. Lawrence, which is my beat.

I was suggesting to the government, because this has been tried, this is not a stab in the dark. It was tried in one community where they lowered the price of gasoline by giving out coupons. The merchants gave out coupons and lowered the price of gasoline. They found the biggest single attraction to the United States is the price of fuel. Fuel is not a luxury. Most householders, working men and women, have a car and they need that. At one time perhaps fuel was a luxury. It is not now.

I am convinced that if this government would make some kind of a study to determine the amount of revenue generated from the 8.5 cents federal excise tax on fuel, and if it would drop that, drop it totally or reduce it drastically, that it would turn around the economy of these small centres.

When people go to the United States to fill their gas tanks with fuel, while they are there they shop. That seems to me like a rather simple sort of solution to the problem. Take away the attraction. I do not blame the people. I never blamed the Canadian people for going to the United States to shop. With the policies of this government, it is driving them to the United States to shop.

I just wondered if my friend from Willowdale would like to comment on that kind of perception. It is not imagined; it is real. All you have to do is drive through these towns and see the number of shops that were thriving a few years ago. They are closed now. It is hard almost to find a gas station on the main street because there is no sale in Canada for the product.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, my colleague and friend from Leeds—Grenville has brought this issue forward time and time again. What he says is absolutely right.

His contention that the chief cause for cross-border shopping is our high cost of gasoline and diesel fuel has been confirmed by the Liberal task force on deindustrialization and economic renewal and by the border municipalities. The mayors of these cities have told the government to get the cost of fuel down to the U.S. level and we will get rid of part of this whole phenomenon of cross-border shopping which is costing Canadians anywhere from $3 billion to $5 billion in lost sales a year.

The government knows that cross-border shopping is a problem. What did it do? A couple of months ago it brought out its answer. Did it deal with the cost of fuels and bring them down to the U.S. level? It did not even mention the cost of fuels. Its head was in the sand.

What it did do though is it figured out that Canadian cigarettes go into the United States duty free and then they are smuggled back into Canada. The government figured that it could be the tax cop and it would impose the GST on these cigarettes going out of Canada up front so that even if they are smuggled back in here, we have not been cheated at the Canadian revenue base. Did it do any research of people who buy cigarettes? What has happened? People just buy American cigarettes because they are cheaper. That is the stupidity of this government.

The government's tax policies are not based on common sense. What is the result? We are losing our tobacco industry.

Now maybe the tobacco industry is in disfavour, but I will tell you this: Don't kick a tobacco farmer out of Canada until you have another job for him that just pays the same amount of money. That is the obligation.

As the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville has pointed out on a number of occasions, this government thought as to what it was going to do. It said: "We will help you collect the taxes when people come back into Canada, because there is total tax evasion when people come back in. We don't have the officers there to collect the taxes". But it said to the provinces: "We will help you collect your provincial sales taxes if you will implement our GST and start taxing more goods". My God, the provinces are not going to fall for that blackmail, and they have not.

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the member for Willowdale who seems to know a lot about cross-border shopping, even though his riding is a long way from the border.

I hear what he is saying about gasoline tax and cigarette and tobacco taxes. He is saying what a terrible mistake it is. Well, I guess he was not here at the time, but he should reflect upon his colleagues on the Liberal side. For years they did the exact same thing. It is a carry-on from this philosophy in Canada to add those taxes.

I am in agreement that gasoline tax is certainly causing us some problems at the border. But I also submit to my friend across the way that I spent a lot of time last summer devising a plan. I thought would be helpful for us to have a system at the border communities that would help us to have a reduced tax by giving an allowance on the income tax like the northern benefit.

I was interested in the pontificating by the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville. I sent him that proposal. I did not even hear one word of support or interest whatsoever. I think that is a little bit disheartening to do that. I included the opposition members as I did my own members on this side of the House.

There was very little interest, even from the opposition members who have border communities. But I understand within his party there would probably be a problem because the rest of the people say: "Me too". I am sure that he did give it a whirl and they all said: "Yes, we want the same thing too".

But I agree with my friends across the way. We who represent border communities have a problem with cross-border shopping and certainly with the price difference in gasoline. It does not affect the member for Willowdale at all, I do not think. People do not drive from Toronto to buy gasoline, but they do from the border communities and then they buy other things when they are there.

It is a difference in philosophy that has been carried on for years and years. I do not think that he is fair in blaming the government of the day because the Liberal government was in power a lot longer than the Conservative government. It started this whole thing rolling and it has continued on.

I agree with him that it must stop, and we must not have increased gasoline taxes.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, in response to the partially intelligent intervention by the member for Sarnia—Lambton, he is right. It is a real problem. Our task force on deindustrialization travelled throughout that whole area. We saw how communities were being devastated, their downtowns were being wiped out because of cross-border shopping. He knows what is happening in Sarnia—Lambton.

I recall that part of our task force was conducted by the member for Lambton—Middlesex and partly by the member from the Tilbury area. We met truckers who said: "Peterson, we have not filled up our trucks in Canada in the last year. We have to move to the United States". The trucking industry is moving because of this differential of which the member for Sarnia—Lambton talked.

I suspect this was partly facetious, but he said that it was our fault, that we did not respond to his entreaty to have some type of benefits program for border communities. That is the first I have heard of it.

What I wonder is why he could not convince his members. He has the benefit of talking to them in caucus and of working with them. Why could he not convince them? I am sure he tried eloquently to get his members onside for his proposal that might have done something to stop cross-border shopping. Why did they not listen?

I do not condemn the member over there. He was not sitting around a cabinet table when they made these laws. He was just slightly ingenuous when he said that this was a program that we had started.

Cross-border shopping became a major problem when we got free trade, the GST, a high dollar and high interest rates. That is what drove Canadians into shopping across the border and gutting the downtowns of our border communities. Until these policies are reversed, we are not going to get this problem dealt with.

I am sorry that the member was not successful in convincing his colleagues that perhaps they should have listened to him. I will tell hon. members that they should have listened to him. I hope they will listen to him in the future when he tells them to get their dollar down, to get their interest rates down, to get our taxes down and harmonize them. That is one of the problems that is going on right now.

I hope he will be prepared to stand up and say: Get rid of the GST.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992.

Before I start, I would like to comment on the remarks of the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization who opened the debate. During his remarks he stated that the government cannot be crippled by debt any longer and were looking to streamline the economy by cutting spending and not by increasing taxes.

It seemed to me that the minister should be enlightened as to what this government is doing. I would like to comment a little bit on some press releases. For instance, in the Toronto Star on October 21, 1991: "Tax Revolt Brews Among Tory MPs". That is his own MPs on his own side of the House.

"A revolt is brewing among backbench Tory MPs over what they see as excessively high taxes on the middle class. The attitude that the Tories are only pro-business and do not care about the little guy is sinking us", says MP for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

This is coming right from their own side of the House. It identifies very clearly what this government is doing and the policies it is carrying out. Now it is coming back to this House and telling us to approve a borrowing authority so that it can carry on and conduct its business.

I would like to identify some of the things that this government is doing. Taxation comes in many, many forms. Let us take a look at another form of taxation. My riding of Kootenay East identifies pretty broadly with other ridings and the effects on them right across Canada.

I have a large area that is covered by three border crossings, customs crossing to the United States. I have a large resource base in coal mining, silver, lead and zinc mining, and in forestry, natural resource bases. One of the things that the government did was change the Unemployment Insurance Act. Bill C-21 opted out of that program. It introduced a new program to which only the employer and the employees contribute.

It also raised the cost of that program. The business and labour groups are outraged that the federal proposal increased unemployment insurance premiums by 14.3 per cent in January, only six months after a 24 per cent hike.

This is another form of taxation. What is being done in the riding of Kootenay East is taking another large amount of money directly out of those communities and sending it directly to the federal government. Of course, those communities lose. The workers and the employers lose that money, so it is another form of taxation and the money that has left that area.

Mr. Whittaker: When they closed the mine did they use any of that UI money for retraining?

Mr. Parker: That is right. My colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen asks if they used any of the money for retraining. That is the problem. They have got out of this program and now they are not initiating any kind of training or are trying to help these people. The changes have cost the people a lot of money.

Another area is the high interest rate policy. The high interest rate policy of this government has created serious problems for the coal mining companies, for the various business groups, and the other areas within Kootenay East because the high interest rate policies cause them to borrow money. The money leaves the area and of course the area does not have those moneys any more.

The implementation of the GST, is that not another form of taxation? "The GST to hit $16.3 billion target says Jelinek" was a headline in The Ottawa Citizen of October 25, 1991. Seven per cent of every dollar on every item that people buy within that riding immediately is picked up by the business people and shipped off to Ottawa. It is another form of taxation that is taken directly from these people.

Is it any wonder that the people in my riding who have three accesses to the American border are going across that border for shopping? This has affected adversely the small businessman within the Kootenay East area. People are finding out that on a weekend they can get in their cars and drive a short distance, fill up their cars with gasoline, spend a couple of evenings across the border, do their shopping, come back the next day with virtually very little cost and have an entertaining weekend. It certainly affects the economics of the area.

Probably the worst form of taxation that this government has ever brought in was maintaining the high Canadian dollar. The high Canadian dollar in a resource industry area such as mine where we have to depend on the sale of our materials such as coal, silver, lead, zinc and softwood lumber to other markets creates serious havoc. Everyone in Kootenay East knows, and I am sure everyone across Canada knows, that the high Canadian dollar is a direct result of a commitment that this government made.

In fact the former President of the Treasury Board reported that it was a part of the free trade agreement that they maintain the Canadian dollar at a high level during a certain period of time.

It is another form of taxation that is crippling a riding such as mine which depends so totally on the resource base to sell its products. A lot of our coal goes to the Japanese market.

Another very direct form of taxation is the capping of the equalization program for the province of British Columbia. Again the people of Kootenay East are being taxed because when the province does not get its fair share of taxation from the federal government, taxation comes back down to the provincial governments and down to the local governments.

Is it any wonder that the Canadian people are standing up and fighting this government on their taxation policies and what this government is trying to do.

The cuts to our education programs, especially in a riding such as mine where the nearest university is in Vancouver which is a good 400 miles away is another tax. Students have to leave the riding to go to university. We are fortunate enough to have a college there and many students are able to go to the college but those who wish to go to university have tremendous costs. Where are the provisions to assist those people? They are not there.

I want to speak for a few moments if I may about a report that was put out in The Financial Post of October 21, 1991.

> Canada needs a new economic vision and implementing it will require profound and uncomfortable change right across Canadian society, says a landmark report on the economy.
> The $1-million study released yesterday by Harvard University economist Michael Porter is a sweeping indictment of the attitudes and practices of the major players in the economy— business, labour and government.

Mr. Porter gave this government a seven-step solution to our economic problems. This is not a New Democrat but I want to read this report because I think it makes a lot of sense.

> Harvard economist guru Michael Porter, who has advised other countries on prescriptions for success, says Canada must take several steps to become a more competitive economy. Among his recommendations are:
> Become an economy driven by "innovative" export industries.

You are not going to do that with a high Canadian dollar.

> Increase and upgrade the sophistication and productivity of the existing base of resource companies.
> Shift various incentives in government, industrial and regulatory policies to encourage work investment and skills upgrading.

Did you see anywhere in this government's program for competitiveness any of these proposals?

> Build on Canada's regional strengths instead of trying to diversify the economic base over our regions.
> Move quickly and decisively to create a true economic union and effective free trade within Canada.

Can you imagine signing a free trade agreement with the Americans after a century of building a railway system east and west? We signed a free trade agreement with the Americans going north and south and we have not even devised a system within Canada of trading with each other.

I have worked extensively with our coal industry, trying to sell our western Canada coal to the central Canada markets. We are starting to have some success. The only reason we are having that kind of success is because we have a government in Ontario which is starting to listen. It can see the benefits of buying western Canada coal, shipping it across the transportation systems into the Ontario markets and the possibility of those shipments on those railways being able to buy the steel from their steel mills to upgrade the rails that go west again. That is the kind of trade we should be looking at. That is the kind of encouragement that should be taking place.

Transform foreign subsidiaries into companies that serve the Canadian market.

Another sensible suggestion. Why are we not doing it? Probably the most important recommendation, but it is not going to happen from this government, is to "forge more co-operative labour-management relationships". That is essential to any striving country that wishes to get out and be competitive. This government is not putting out that kind of effort, the kind of programs that are going to be required to carry that out.

Is it any wonder as I go through my riding, I hear the people talking about how our country is beginning to fall apart. They want Canada back. They want to get rid of the policies that are splitting and dividing us. They want a government that will bring us back together and a Canadian government that will save our transportation systems, not dismantle them like it did with VIA Rail. They do not want deregulation of our airlines. They do not want the Americans coming up and taking over our transportation systems. Surely to goodness we are innovative enough to be able to bring about the kind of policies in transportation that will serve our people and not let us be dependent on other countries for even travelling across the broad lengths of our own country.

Is it any wonder that no members of the Conservative government are speaking on this bill. I would not if I was a backbencher sitting on that side. God forbid me if I was. I would be ashamed to stand in this House and try to defend the kinds of policies this government is bringing to the Canadian people and to come back to this House and ask for borrowing authority to fulfil those kinds of programs. Is it any wonder that none of you got up in this House to speak on this bill. It does not surprise me a bit.

Many of the other policies that this government has adopted have hurt us in a tremendous way, such as VIA Rail. Ask the people in tourism how it has hurt us in the west with regard to the abolition of VIA Rail through British Columbia.

Mr. Hockin: What about the Rocky Mountaineer?

Mr. Parker: The member across the way asks about the Rocky Mountaineer. The Rocky Mountaineer comes on in probably another month and it will serve for the summer months. That train is booked solid with people from Japan and across the country. To get a reservation on that train is almost impossible.

Mr. Hockin: That is in addition to what was before.

Mr. Parker: It is not in addition. We had a crack Canadian train that travelled across Canada, called The Canadian. Remember The Canadian, that silver bullet, that beautiful passenger train with the good services that travelled across Canada that was dismantled by this government?

An hon. member: Shamefully.

Mr. Parker: Now he says: "What about the Mountaineer?" Try to get a booking on that train. Try to say to the tourism people in my riding that they can conduct a tour—

An hon. member: You are against it because it is private enterprise.

Mr. Parker: I am not against private enterprise. I think the Rocky Mountaineer is a good proposal, but why do away with the transcontinental train and stop other people from travelling.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Nobody rides it.

Mr. Parker: The member for Vancouver Centre says: "nobody rides it". I worked for the railways. I can remember the day when there were seven transcontinental passenger trains going east and west across the country. We did not have the courage or the decency to maintain one good transcontinental train.

I want to say that the same thing is going to happen to our airline industry if we are not very careful. We are now seeing the situation where airlines are finding themselves in difficulty. The Americans are looking at coming in and picking up some of the pieces. We will end up having to make a detour to Seattle to get into Vancouver. Is that the kind of transportation policy we want in this country? I say that is not the kind of vision I have for Canada, nor do many of the people in my riding.

I want to go back to some of the policies this government has carried out with regard to the free trade agreement because I think it is really the cause of what is happening here. That is the cause of the high Canadian dollar and the GST. There is no question about it. They wanted to do away with the manufacturers' tax so they could conform with their free trade agreement

Mr. Hockin: You would keep the manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. Parker: I want to state quite clearly that I want to know where the benefits are. The manufacturers' tax was supposed to have been taken off but I do not see a big decrease in the cost of manufactured goods. I do not see a decrease in the price of the car I purchased.

Mr. Hockin: Read the Consumer Information Act.

Mr. Parker: I want to say something to you in reverse with regard to the free trade agreement. I want to pursue this because the softwood lumber issue is a prime, key example for someone from a resource based area in the lumber industry, such as my area. To slap a duty on our softwood lumber shows very clearly that this government did not protect our own interests with regard to the lumber industry. Many of them may be going broke before the settlement finally comes around if this government is fortunate enough to be able to convince the Americans they are wrong. They should know they are wrong and they should demand that they remove it immediately if they feel the free trade agreement is that important.

My view is that the free trade agreement is what is killing us. We should get rid of it. We should be looking at a trade agreement that deals with sector by sector and try to bring about a more rational agreement than the one today that is killing our farming industries and the various manufacturing industries in Canada.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): My colleague in the NDP mentioned cross-border shopping and the effect it is having on his riding. I was not aware that he was in that particular riding.

We have mentioned here this afternoon that the biggest single feature in attracting Canadians to the United States and border towns is the price of gasoline. That has been identified. The party in power should know our position on it, to drop the 8.5 cents federal tax on gasoline.

We heard from a colleague in the Tory party who agrees with that, I think. He said he agreed with that a little while ago. I suspect he could be speaking for part of his party, although not all of it. I would like to know what the NDP position on this would be. Would you not feel that it would be a good start if we could keep Canadians at home, to shop at home, buy things at home instead of going to the States to shop? I am not condemning Canadians. They have been driven to the States to shop. If we could make it attractive for them to stay and buy fuel oil at home, they might also then stay at home and buy some other things because the main attraction is the price of fuel.

I would like my colleague's reaction to that.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, in my findings in my riding, gasoline is one of the major factors. They go there and gas up their cars. In a place such as Creston, they have an agreement with their company. They have cut the gasoline rates in those areas. We have seen a system where some of the oil companies have identified a problem there. If they are going to keep those servicing bays open, they have to cut their gasoline prices in order to try to alleviate that kind of problem.

I think it is much deeper than that. What I find in my riding is a protest against the taxation policies of this government. That is what they are telling me. "I find a way of going across the border and showing this government. Whether I save any money or not, it is going to be a protest against this government about its taxation policies and how it carries them out". Another very important area, and I am sure that the member knows this, is dairy products. Many of them go over for dairy products because they are able to get dairy products there much cheaper and so on.

I believe that the taxation levels of this government have created that kind of situation. It is a hundredfold worse now that we have the GST because it is a protest. That is the only way these people can get back at this government to notify it that they do not agree with the policies it is carrying out.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my friend for his comments on this particular debate. In speaking in the debate, I noted a number of things that occurred to me throughout the course of his remarks, from the problem of the unemployment insurance, the high unemployment rate, knowing that in his riding within the last couple of years he has had a major problem with the shutdown of a major smelter and mine in his area, problems caused by high interest rates and a high dollar for exporters for his region, in the farming communities in Creston, from the forest industry in his area in Cranbrook and from the mining industry through Kimberley–Firnie and other areas.

One thing occurred to me as he was speaking, and I know that the Minister of State for Small Business would want to pay particular attention to his response on this because it is a small business matter. It is one of the things that this government appears not to have paid much attention to and can actually, I believe, help the small business community and the resource sector is in the area of value added production. It appears that they have not given much attention to it. Over the course of the last three years, I have asked a number of questions of the government on its purchasing policies. I find that it often goes out to contract to the lowest possible purchasers, certainly in the area of food production.

I know the member, coming from an area like Creston, represents an area of agriculture, as is the Okanagan—Similkameen region. We have been trying to encourage value added products in agricultural products. Yet we have seen canneries and jam factories that we had in our areas over the years that have closed down because they are non–competitive supposedly. If you talk to the producers, for instance in Summerland or Bevan, they tell you that they have got all sorts of purchasers. You have got other value–added products that could be made with the drying of fruit and fruit leathers, et cetera, but can they get the federal government to open the bidding process to them? It appears that the federal government cannot do this.

The government could be injecting millions, in fact billions of dollars into this area, creating employment and doing something about the 1.5 million unemployed and the millions of others who have given up at this particular time, creating employment by putting money back into the pockets of those producers, whether it be softwood lumber, in the production of goods from the mining industry, or in the agriculture industry of Kootenay East riding or in fact Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

I want to ask the member for some comments on his views of value–added production and what the government should be doing in turning its purchasing policies toward purchasing locally, purchasing from Canadians for Canadians.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, yes, and I welcome the question from the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Years ago, Bulman tomato juice, the canneries in the Okanagan, the pea growers and various other groups were down there. I think that is the type of thing that the federal government should be getting involved in and encouraging these people to go that extra step. Our Canadian products are equal to anyone's anywhere across Canada.

Had the government stayed within the unemployment insurance, it could have raised the rates to bring about more technology and more training. It could have stayed within that program and used it to deal with the economic problems when mines shut down. It could be used as a training facility to help retrain people, especially older people. Most of the people in these resource–based areas are older people. They are unemployed because of technology or different changes and so on. Had the government stayed within that program maybe I could believe its story about wanting to be competitive, wanting to retrain our people and to get out there and show Canadians how we can do things. But no, the government has opted out of that program. It is standing by and saying that the free enterprise market is going to do it.

I am very much afraid that future Canadians are going to be the ones who are going to suffer for it.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1992–93.

With this legislation, the government is seeking authority from Parliament to borrow some $24.7 billion, as well as another $3.9 billion under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act, which is a tremendous amount of money.

In introducing the bill, the Minister of State for Finance reminded the House that this was the fourth time he had the privilege of introducing a borrowing bill. I found it rather strange that he should be proud of that given the fact that this government had gone so far off on its economic projections so repeatedly and, as a result, was having to come back to Parliament for vastly varying sums, varying according to the plans that it had announced to us previously in its budget papers. Be that as it may, this debate allows us to talk about the context of the request by the government for this additional borrowing authority. That context is provided for in the February 25 budget of the Minister of Finance. I would like to address this debate in that context and speak about the budget of the Minister of Finance.

Like so many other Canadians I listened intently to the presentation of the first budget of the Minister of Finance, and like so many other Canadians I found myself very disheartened by the content or the lack of content or even the relevance of the budget to many of the problems facing Canadians at this time, particularly the Canadians I represent in eastern Nova Scotia.

There were two key priorities for the Minister of Finance to deal with in his budget. The first priority was to deal with the grievous levels of unemployment in this country. Unemployment has been driven up as a result of this government's wrong-headed fiscal and monetary policies which have caused the recession we are currently and seemingly forever in the midst of at this present time.

The first challenge of the minister was to do something to stimulate the economy, to get the economy moving again, and to do something in the short term to bring down this appalling level of unemployment.

The second challenge the Minister of Finance faced was to formulate and to implement measures that would restructure the Canadian economy and would halt the decline in our country's level of competitiveness and productivity which has been eroded seriously during the mandate of this government.

We realized that the Minister of Finance did not have a lot of fiscal room in which to manoeuvre. There was no opportunity to make lavish increases in spending and in new programs that would be very costly for Canadian taxpayers. However, the Minister of Finance had an opportunity and a responsibility to deal with these twin problems facing our economy.

His budget regrettably failed on both counts. Rather than deal with the fundamental problems we face in Canada, the Minister of Finance presented Canadians with a series of empty gestures which do nothing to get Canadians through these difficult times or prepare our economy to deal with the fundamental problems that lie ahead.

Basically what the Minister of Finance did in his budget was to present some gestures primarily directed at the Reform Party, obviously the party that he feels most threatened by, and to offer some small measures to convince the Reform Party that the government was actually listening to it and the constituency in the finance minister's area was tempted by the policies of Preston Manning and his Reform Party group.

As far as my riding is concerned the budget was a non-event. There was very little in it that could be said to be relevant to the problems facing the riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso which I represent. This budget failed to address the fundamental and systemic problems which will continue to plague the Canadian economy and the economy of eastern Nova Scotia, problems that will only intensify until definitive measures are taken to deal with them.

A prime example of the empty gestures found in the budget is the government's decision to sell off or wind up some 46 different agencies such as the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council. These independent organizations were charged with identifying not only the many problems facing our country but also the potential solution to these problems. Yet this government would attempt to score cheap political points by eliminating these important bodies and would dare to suggest however subtly that these bodies had become part of the problem.

The Economic Council of Canada had a point, perhaps coincidentally, in a report released only a few weeks before the budget to the severe productivity problems that this country faced. These productivity problems had been aggravated and had become much more serious during the last six years when this government was in power and when it failed in its first mandate to put measures in place that would deal with those serious problems.

It has only aggravated the situation. It has forced us into a much more critical financial and fiscal situation and made it much more difficult for us to put measures in place to deal with these problems.

On the contrary, the Economic Council of Canada and others represented our best hope of finding solutions to the challenges which confront us. Yet they must give way to the government's covert political agenda, not based on getting Canada working again but rather on short-term and self-motivated political gain.

That is what I call an empty gesture: empty of vision and empty of hope. Like so much of the Reform Party's simplistic dogma, the hollow measures contained in this budget are more style than substance. They do nothing to confront the deep-seated and profound problems which face Canada.

This government and this minister have done nothing but pay lip service to the fundamental and systemic difficulties which confront our economy and us all.

What will this budget do for the countless Canadians who have endured and who are facing bankruptcy? The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council stated in its most recent newsletter that business bankruptcies over the first 10 months of 1991 increased by 42 per cent in Atlantic Canada over the previous years, on top of the big jump in 1990 over 1989.

Last year alone there were 6,500 consumer and business bankruptcies across Canada. That is almost 600 more bankruptcies than in 1990. What is even more frightening is that 5,350 of last year's bankruptcies were consumer or personal bankruptcies. It is difficult to imagine the scale of personal tragedy represented by these figures which in themselves do not even begin to reflect the huge number of Canadians who are avoiding bankruptcy by the skin of their teeth.

What has the Minister of Finance done for them? Why do we not ask the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians who look to this government and to this minister for concrete action on job creation, only to be ignored? All this government did for unemployment was to add to it. We have only to ask the hard working employees of 46 federal agencies who found out on February 25 that their services were no longer required by this government.

Even closer to home for me was the proposal to sell Cape Breton Development Corporation and to wind up the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. It will hardly instil confidence in the people of Cape Breton where the unemployment rate currently hovers over 20 per cent. What does this budget do for them?

In cutting back and folding over agencies designed to stimulate growth in the region of north eastern Nova Scotia, the government is in effect reneging upon a long-standing commitment on the part of successive governments to address regional disparity.

Let us take for example the government's measure to allow Canadians to use up to $20,000 of their registered retirement savings toward the purchase of a home. Very few of my constituents in Cape Breton Highlands—Canso have RRSPs to draw upon to purchase homes. That is not to say that there have not been inquiries on the part of some of my constituents about this program.

Some have asked whether they could work toward paying off their existing mortgages using this program. Many of these same people, however, were not even able to make a RRSP contribution this year, economic conditions being what they are.

Some members of the banking community in my riding tell me that they feel more like priests these days, having to listen to heart-breaking stories of economic hardship and the economic burden which these hardships place upon the family unit. These people face uncertainty as to whether they will have jobs six months from now.

Most are struggling just to make ends meet and to feed their families. How many of my constituents will be able to take advantage of the programs newly announced in the budget? Precious few.

What will this budget do for the housing industry in my region of northeastern Nova Scotia? Virtually nothing.

Of far greater effect would have been provisions for upgrading existing housing, such as providing more funding for the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program or the Rural Assistance Program. It would have been less glamorous but more effective. Effectiveness does not appear to be part of this government's agenda.

This government has talked again and again about the importance of preparing the Canadian economy for the challenges of the new global economy as we move toward the 21st century. It has talked about retraining and the vital importance of building an educated and highly skilled work force. It has talked about how our young people are the key to future prosperity.

This government seems intent on making it impossible for young people to get a decent education or to have a fighting chance upon graduating from college or university. Students are graduating with debt loads averaging between $10,000 and $17,000, only to discover that there are no jobs. They are looking at having to wait up to ten years or more before they can pay off their debts. The Minister of Finance announced in his budget that the Canada Student Loan Program will be privatized, and that the six-month interest-free period for loan repayment following graduation will be eliminated.

This government is refusing to deal with the problem. It is simply shunting it off on to the banks.

What will this do for the 20 to 30 per cent of student loan recipients in my region who are delinquent on their payments? It will make matters worse for them. These people are not deadbeats. They are young people who, at this point in their lives, should be filled with hope and optimism for the future. They are not being given a fighting chance. They are graduating only to find that the odds are completely stacked against them and that the government is only adding to their intolerable burden.

What is this government saying through this budget? It is saying: "That is their problem, not ours".

The budget also makes ominous reference to a new rate structure for student loans, which everyone concerned knows means higher interest rates. How can we expect students to pay more for the opportunity of furthering their education and to pay back these loans faster when they cannot find a job upon graduation? It does not make sense, except to this government.

Students, over 200,000 every year, who rely on student loans will pay the price as their government dithers, offering hollow platitudes instead of concrete measures. The students in my riding do not want empty gestures from this government. Neither do the unemployed nor those Canadians facing bankruptcies. They want and have every right to expect action, specifically on two important fronts.

First, Canadians were looking to this budget to provide some stimulus to get Canada's economy out of this recession. Canadians were not looking for wild and extravagant spending that would indebt the government further. They had a right to expect the minister to give the inflation song a rest and begin to address the real problem in our economy, the 10.6 per cent of able-bodied Canadians who do not have work.

The Minister of Finance proclaimed in his budget a plan to cut spending and taxes in 1992-93 by $1 billion, as if this would solve all of our problems. Surely we know by now that this is not the case. This is little better than conventional wisdom and a timid version of what the government would have us believe is its fiscal policy.

Let us not forget that last year the government told us that through its program of fiscal restraint the deficit would fall below $25 billion in 1992-93. Nothing could be further from the truth. It has now modified its estimates, saying that the debt will be reduced to $27.5 billion. It begs the question, why should we believe it now?

What about the unemployed? Is the government contending that the measures announced in this budget will solve all of the problems by stimulating economic growth? I am sure that is what it would have us believe. Canadians have every right to be doubtful, especially as far as this government is concerned.

I noted in this year's estimates that an additional $1.6 billion will be required to pay for the administration and expenditures of unemployment insurance over last year. As put so bluntly in the government's estimates of 1992-93, the total projected UI expenditures of $20.3 billion reflect the anticipated impact of a continuing recession on unemployment levels.

In light of this statement, what has this government done to address the tragedy of unemployment in this country? It has done nothing, and that is the greatest tragedy of all.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso on his speech on this borrowing bill.

The words he spoke here before the House showed clearly that this government lacks the ability to govern the Canadian people. It lacks in that it has no imagination. The borrowing authority bill is before the House for passage. At the same time, we have passed a budget that has provided absolutely nothing in the way of incentive to Canadians for growth. Nor do we see any vision that this government might have for Canadians to spur them on.

The leader of our party had an idea that this budget should be giving something to stimulate Canadians. He had this idea as a result of many trips across Canada and as a result of many visits by members of Parliament to their constituencies and other places.

I cannot believe we are here borrowing. We saw nothing to give a stimulus to the Canadians to get the economy moving. We saw no restraint except for the ministers' salaries being frozen. At the same time, we know that the civil service is in a wage range that far surpasses members of Parliament who are here to supposedly represent Canadians and bring suggestions to the House. The salaries of the nine top categories in the Public Service are higher, starting with the lowest to the highest, than those of members of Parliament.

In the United States there is a capping on that by saying that the public service in the United States cannot be paid higher than members of the Congress or of the Senate. We do not see that in Canada. We do not even see that initiative on the part of what I call a dead-end government speaking to a Public Service that is not coming up with the ideas, speaking to Crown corporations in this House whose salaries are on the advice of an advisory group to the cabinet.

Today in the House there were two or three questions on the direction of Canadian National Railways to go out and get a contract in the United States.

These Crown corporations and the Public Service are not stimulated with high salaries.

Canadian National Railways goes from about a recommended $317,000 to $396,000. It seems to me that somewhere this government should have talked about that restraint and not restraining the Economic Council of Canada or the Law Reform Commission, which are aids to a sagging government with very few new policy ideas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would remind the hon. member that one normally addresses the Chair.

That being said, I give the floor to the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from South West Nova for her comments and questions.

[English]

My colleague is one of the most assiduous members in this House when it comes to representing the basic economic concerns, not only of her constituents, but of rural Canada. She will know about some of the points I want to raise in response to her questions.

To begin with, as I said earlier, the budget had a challenge.

The budget had a twofold challenge. It was to address the real concerns facing the Canadian economy at this moment, which are jobs and the lack of jobs, and to stimulate the Canadian economy and to put the economy on a footing that would prepare us to be competitive in the next decade and into the next century.

One of the most important sectors is one the government recognized and we on this side of the House also recognized. It is the housing sector. The government adopted suggestions which we made concerning the use of RRSPs and the reduction of down payments for housing. There are many other housing programs through CMHC that could have stimulated the housing sector in my riding and I am sure in the hon. member's riding as well, such as the RRAP. In my riding there are many, many houses that need to be repaired. This would help local contractors and would help seniors, disabled Canadians and others, and would be much more relevant in the rural areas, such as both our ridings.

The minister has been talking about making Canada competitive. We all know that education and investing in people are key. We do not see anything in this budget or in previous budgets to give effect to that commitment. The aspects of the student aid program are certainly not going to make us more competitive or cannot be considered to be an investment in education. They are really only a reversal of previous policies which were against students.

I will conclude on the point about salaries. There is a lot of room to cut the high salaries of chief executives of Crown corporations, a small example of cutting the minister's salary. The point is that cutting the ministers salaries by 5 per cent will not raise a lot of revenue. The fact that it is even an issue demonstrates the bankruptcy to which this government has descended in its management of the economy. The government has to lower salaries because Canadians are beginning to feel that ministers are overpaid because they are unable to address the central problems facing this country and are still dealing with problems that are no longer relevant to Canadians.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, when I travelled to Nova Scotia last year on an economic tour, I saw some of the problems that were related to various policies of this government in rail transport and some of the policies with respect to unemployment insurance and retraining.

When I was in the Atlantic provinces on the goods and services tax hearings, the prediction from his area and other areas was that as a result of the goods and services tax, the underground economy would become greater and greater. It would be caused not only by the goods and services tax, but by some of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government.

I am wondering if the member would have a comment as to his experiences in his riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso with respect to the policy of how the cutbacks in VIA Rail and rail transport affected his area with respect to roads and traditional transport areas. Over the past year and some months since the goods and services tax was put in place, has he seen the problems I have seen in other areas of Canada whereby the goods and services tax is causing the underground economy to mushroom and become much greater?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso: I want to thank the member for his many questions. It will take me a couple of minutes to answer them.

As far as the underground economy being created by the GST is concerned, it is related to the problem of cross-border shopping for those constituencies that are closer to the border.

• (1800)

My constituency is not that close to the border, although the way in which the GST has impacted on it, in addition to elevating the amount of the underground economy as it might be called, has been that it has discouraged some of the industries upon which we rely, such as tourism. It has added to the real problem that we and many of our small businesses face in attracting tourists to our area.

In addition to that, it has been an additional degree of paper burden on our small businesses. The only businesses that have benefited from the GST are the accounting firms.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, Canada's first co-operative housing program was introduced in 1973 under a Liberal government.

In 1986 this government promised to produce 5,000 units of co-op housing a year. This goal was never achieved. Instead, under a Conservative government the number of co-op units constructed has declined and funding for the program has been in jeopardy for the last two years.

Funding for the 1992 program was no different. After extensive lobbying the minister of state for housing announced on December 17, 1991 that the funding for co-op housing would be renewed with a budget of $6.1 million.

As recently as February 19, less than a week before the budget was introduced in this House, the same minister confirmed in writing that the co–op housing budget was secure. Based on his assurances co–op housing groups across the country proceeded with the development of co–op proposals.

In an attempt to justify this broken promise the government is claiming that the co–op housing program is not targeted to those in need of affordable housing. On March 11, 1992, the Minister of Finance criticized the co–op housing program and I quote:

> How is it that it is well targeted when 50 per cent of those who occupy these units are not in effect qualified under the provisions of social housing?

The minister is revealing his ignorance of the co–op housing program. He is correct when he states that 50 per cent of those who occupy co–op housing units are not qualified for social housing.

What he failed to acknowledge is that this same 50 per cent of occupants pay market rents for their co–ops. These units are not subsidized by the government. It is the other 50 per cent that the funding is targeted to.

This statement by the Minister of Finance also contradicts his own colleague, the Minister of State for Housing, who said in his December press release that the co–op housing program is targeted. I quote:

> The revised program will make more effective use of scarce dollars ensuring federal subsidies are fully directed towards a mix of low– and moderate–income families.

These statements prove that while the government was praising that co–op housing program a few months ago, now the Minister of Finance is making excuses for eliminating the successful and cost effective program. It appears this government is willing to alter its conclusion of a program in order to justify its rash decisions.

In his March 11 comments the Minister of Finance also stated that the government had done enough to stimulate housing through its introduction of the RRSP for down payments and the 5 per cent down payment. While I applaud the government for introducing these two programs which I have personally been promoting for a year, I must note that these programs help those Canadians who have savings to purchase a home.

Co–ops meet the needs of a different segment of the Canadian population. By eliminating the co–op housing program this government is eliminating a valuable housing program for the lower and middle income families. It provides mixed income communities, not ghetto housing. The elimination of the co–op housing program will also cost 4,400 construction and manufacturing jobs this year alone, adding to the unemployment insurance expenditures.

This government has also progressively eliminated the federal role in housing through the budgetary process, not through the constitutional dialogue. The cancellation of the co–op housing program, a program that is very popular in many Canadian provinces is just another example of this. The termination of the co–op housing program is an abdication of this government's responsibility to provide adequate and affordable shelter to Canadians in a healthy community environment.

There are over 164,000 Canadians who are on a waiting list for co–op housing. Why is this government abandoning these Canadians? The program is cost effective and offers affordable housing and mixed income communities for seniors, single parents, natives, the disabled, and low–income earners.

Will this government keep its commitment to housing groups and provide the $6.1 million for new co–op housing commitments?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to respond to the concerns about social housing expenditure and the cancellation of the co–op index linked mortgage program.

Social housing expenditures have been growing and were expected to increase by 5 per cent over the fiscal framework. With the recently announced budget, social housing expenditures have been limited to an average growth of 3 per cent for the next five years. It is the same percentage increase as all government programs are targeted for.

In 1992–93 the actual budget available for new commitments will be $70 million. This will mean that even in these tough economic times CMHC will be able not only to maintain its obligations toward the 650,000 households it now assists, but also to provide assistance for additional households, we expect in the neighbourhood of 28,000 this year.

The federal government assists households in need, especially those in real targeted need across the country, through the social housing program. The government will continue to spend approximately $2 billion annually, which totals over $10 billion in the next five years.

With respect to the termination of the co-op index-linked mortgage program, the moderate income households, which are some of the clients that the program supports, now have more opportunities to access affordable, decent housing in the private market.

The scarce dollars that are available cannot be diverted, I repeat cannot be diverted, from those with greater need. Low income Canadians who cannot access decent, affordable and suitable housing in the private market will continue to be assisted through the ongoing social housing programs.

The federal government will continue to support the 14,800 units which have already been built under the co-op ILM program.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, I asked the acting Minister of Employment and Immigration what was being done to meet the needs of immigrant women in violent situations.

She replied that there are already programs to integrate immigrant women into society. She did not seem to realize how inadequate these programs are in meeting the special needs of immigrant women to encourage them to assert their rights, to become independent and to escape violence.

The government showed its lack of concern for minority women when the recent budget rolled back pay equity in the Public Service, cancelled the Court Challenges Program, indefinitely deferred the Race Relations Foundation, changed the Foreign Domestic Program to exclude many women from developing countries and cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program.

There are few shelters specifically suited to assist immigrant women who need to escape violence. Shelters for mainstream women are inadequately funded with no resources for effective cross-cultural staff training.

Violence against women, particularly against immigrant women, is a multi-faceted problem which requires specific government action. Immigrant women are doubly disadvantaged because of racism and sexism. They suffer abuse in silence because the discrimination in our society keeps them in unsafe and vulnerable situations.

Many immigrant women are sponsored by their husbands under the family class. In order to remain in Canada, their sponsorship must be intact. Therefore, many women who suffer violence in their homes are afraid to speak out or to seek help for fear of jeopardizing their immigration status. They cannot leave and are locked into violent situations and so are their children.

The co-chair of the Canadian Panel on Violence against Women, Pat Marshall, said: "Immigrant and visible minority women often have to leave their communities to escape violence and are cut off from their culture". This is not a realistic alternative for many women since their community is often the only support network they have in Canada.

Their lack of language skills also perpetuates the silence in violent situations. When they cannot speak English or French they are insecure and isolated and afraid to leave an abusive partner. The Minister of Employment and Immigration allocated $200 million to increase access to language training for immigrant women. However, this program excludes most immigrant women since it does not offer training allowances or child care. Immigrant women, like many other women in Canada who are primary caregivers in their households, often lack job opportunities and may not have any income of their own. Without training allowances, this government is offering only false hope for many women who continue to be isolated in violent situations.

The lack of professional accreditation for many immigrant women means that they cannot find employment commensurate with their training and experience.

In addition, this government has not implemented employment equity effectively with targets, timetables and penalties. The Canadian Jobs Strategy program was one of the few training resources available to immigrant women, women who want to enter or re-enter the job market.

With this year's cuts, the government has decreased CJS training by 35 per cent for immigrant women. How can immigrant women escape violence in their homes when they cannot be independent economically and socially?

To end violence against women, we need to eliminate inequalities in every facet of our society. Government action is needed now because it is a matter of survival for many immigrant women and their families. Women who are victims of violence must have full protection and refuge from violent situations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but your time has expired.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this government has made a long-term commitment to ending violence against women. Zero tolerance is the goal. An estimated one-quarter of the total Canada Assistance Plan contributions to the provinces and territories are used to provide support to the victims of family violence.

In 1990-91 that amounted to a substantial sum, about $1.5 billion as total expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan exceeded $6 billion.

I know that the hon. member for Vancouver East would agree that economic restraint is a necessity for all governments.

Federal contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan are being limited, capped if you will, under the Federal Expenditure Control Plan in only the three most fiscally strong provinces, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario and to a maximum annual growth rate of 5 per cent per year. This 5 per cent growth is well above the estimated rate of inflation.

I share the hon. member's concern that adequate services be provided to women and their children who have been victims of violence. The $136 million family violence initiative announced last year proposes to expand emergency housing in provinces which have indicated a continuing need to provide emergency temporary shelter. This would provide temporary shelter for approximately 4,000 women and their children in addition to the transition homes already in existence.

Canada is a country which has justly gained a reputation for being one of the most progressive nations in the world in recognizing the extent and seriousness of the problems of violence against women. Even more important, the Government of Canada is taking action on violence against women including the provision of shelters and other services.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I will face you this time.

On March 13 I rose in the House and posed a question on the search and rescue facilities based in Yarmouth. The contract runs out on March 31 this year for the search and rescue service. My colleague from South Shore stood up in the House today and presented a petition signed by 14,793 people from the three counties in the southern end of Nova Scotia. Anyone who sails the waters offshore from our villages knows how important it is to have a search and rescue facility. It was important in the past year because 22 lives were saved because this search and rescue facility was in place in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

Yesterday there was—you would not say a demonstration— a meeting of 250 to 300 people who came out in bitter cold weather. On the platform along with myself and the member for South Shore, there were politicians from every level of government, municipal, provincial, including a minister from the provincial level.

The provincial minister and his colleague, Mr. Huskilson from Shelburne were there along with the wardens from Yarmouth, Clare and Argyle. No one is saying that this is not an essential service. No one wants to see it go.

It may cost somebody a little bit of time to find the money that is needed to provide such an important service. It is not just for tourists who are perhaps boating or for other people who are using it, it is for our own fishermen who are out there daily in weather conditions that makes it sometimes incredible that they go out there.

I want to just reassure the House that this need is not a frivolous demand by the people in this area. The time is coming, April 1, when the contract will have expired. The minister that day said that an announcement would be given shortly. Speaking to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans during a committee last week, he said that the decision was imminent.

The premier of the province has spoken to the Prime Minister. There is another time this week for him to impress upon the Prime Minister how important it is that we retain this. The service is three years old. You cannot give such an important service to people and not keep it going.

The people are becoming dependent on this service. Saving those 22 lives was very important in the last year. That shows how important it is to have that "search light".

We cannot play with the lives. Governments cannot give three years ago, and take it back this year. It is an essential service to have the search and rescue helicopter in Yarmouth.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for South West Nova for again bringing this to our attention, which she did first on March 13.

As well as informing other members from Nova Scotia, I want to inform the House that at the moment no decision has been taken with regard to the disposition of the Yarmouth helicopter contract. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of National Defence are currently reviewing the options to deal with the delivery of search and rescue, and fisheries patrol capabilities in the Yarmouth area.

As you are aware, we have received numerous representations for the continuation of this contract, and in particular, the search and rescue component. The subject of SAR, as you are aware, is a very sensitive and an emotional issue. It is for this reason that we are reviewing all of the options thoroughly.

I trust that in the not too distant future, but that in a matter of days, we will have a decision as to how this will be handled. There has to be that capability for this part of our country on an ongoing basis.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on December 5, 1991 this House passed with a large majority Bill C-17, a bill to revise our gun laws and make them more effective.

Royal assent was given to the bill on that date, December 5, 1991. However, the bill has not in fact become law because regulations have not been tabled in the House and the bill has not been proclaimed law by Order in Council.

On December 6, I asked the minister when those regulations would be tabled and when the bill would be proclaimed. Unfortunately she did not give me an answer on that date.

Here it is now three and a half months later and we still do not have this important bill proclaimed and we still do not have the regulations tabled in this House.

The demand and the need for this law were to plug the weaknesses in the existing gun control legislation. That goes back to December 1989 when 14 young women were assassinated by a a single gunman at the Polytechnique Institute in Montreal.

Here I am again today, as I say three and a half months later, asking the government when this important law will be proclaimed and when the regulations will be tabled.

That law, Bill C-17, was not a perfect law but it introduced some very real and good improvements. For example, under that law it will now take 28 days for an applicant to get a firearms acquisition certificate. The delay will give time for the authorities, the police, to investigate the applicant and see if he is a trustworthy person. It also provides for two guarantors or co-signers on the application form.

It goes into other things such as safe storage of weapons and the requirement for a national training program for those who want to use weapons. Of course one of the major gaps in the law is that it did not cover the control of ammunition, and I regret that. But, as I say, what is there represents a very real improvement.

I understand that the delay rests in part with the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms that is preparing recommendations for the minister with respect to the regulations. I simply want to say this: I hope the regulations that are being prepared by this advisory council are not going to circumvent the wishes of Parliament, because Parliament wanted an effective law.

At the last Gallup poll on this matter in 1991, 80 per cent of Canadians said they wanted tough gun laws. Parliament passed such a law last December. So let's get on with it.

I see the parliamentary secretary here. He served on the committee that heard representations on this matter. I hope he is here to give me some good news today, that he will give me a specific date when we will have this law proclaimed, when we will have the regulations in effect.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the minister shared the member's pleasure that the firearms control provisions in Bill C–17 received such strong support in the Senate when the bill was given royal assent last December. I am confident that the vast majority of Canadians share her view that this new legislation represents a major step toward enhancing public safety in Canada.

I want to assure all members that the Minister of Justice is most anxious the important regulatory and legislative provisions of this act are proclaimed into force at the earliest possible date.

There are, however, important considerations which must be taken into account before various measures can be implemented. Many millions of Canadians are affected. In order that their considerations are reflected, the advice of the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms and other groups that have proposed views on this subject will be taken into account. And consultations have taken place with provincial and territorial attorneys general.

Another very important consideration is that we ensure adequate information, materials and strategies have been developed and put in place so that both criminal justice administrators and gun owners are properly informed and aware of the new requirements before they come into effect.

The hon. member has said that the regulations and the legislation must be effective. They also could be summed up in two other words: what is needed is that they be practical and workable.

The government is planning a phased in approach to proclamation dates respecting the firearms provisions. The Minister of Justice will be announcing the actual proclamation date at the earliest possible time.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, northern Ontario and many other regions in our country are suffering from very high rates of unemployment. Many of these regions have suffered these high rates of unemployment for some time now. As a result they have exhausted UI claims and must rely on social assistance.

In reply to a question I raised in this House on February 11, 1992, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated: "We have in place programs worth $1.8 billion that allow for the training of the unemployed this year".

While I am aware that there are training programs for the unemployed, these programs do not serve the large numbers of recipients of social assistance. They serve only those who are presently collecting UI benefits. If a recipient of UI benefits applies and is accepted on one of these training programs, even though he has applied at the very end of his time to be receiving UI benefits, it matters not. Once he is accepted into this program, he will go on and receive UI benefits for the duration of the training program.

I have had occasion in my riding recently to be aware of people who missed that deadline by about one week. They had collected UI benefits, they applied for a program and they were accepted one week too late. So there is nothing for them. They cannot access the moneys and so they are totally out of it.

I am very interested in making sure that some of these people do have the training that is needed also for them because the person who did not qualify because he was accepted one week too late into the program is certainly just as much in need of retraining as the one previous. I want to say that all unemployed should enjoy the same access to retraining whether they receive social assistance or UI.

This government may state that allowing all access to retraining under the Unemployment Insurance Act would be too costly, and I would agree that we should be as cost effective as possible, but many agencies are trying and have tried to fill these gaps and help these social assistance recipients to access training. Unfortunately and unwisely in the face of the realities of this situation this government is cutting back dollars for this category of unemployed. I refer now to the cutbacks under the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

This makes me question the government's real commitment to training and retraining. I know of one group in particular which will have difficulty moving forward with a national employability project, a group which has a long history of helping the severely disadvantaged poor, namely the Salvation Army.

There are many reasons for the scarcity of dollars being directed to these severely employment disadvantaged. Not least is the cap on transfer payments to the provinces. This does not allow provinces adequate dollars to deal with the increased numbers of welfare recipients. The municipalities are in the same position. They in turn are faced with increased numbers of welfare recipients. They only have the poor, cash strapped property taxpayer and they are obligated to pay more to just offer the basic necessities of living, let alone retraining.

More training programs are urgently needed for this group across the country.

I ask the government, again, will it consider the issue of funding of employability training programs for those who do not qualify for unemployment insurance? Let us ensure that the growing number of social assistance recipients, casualties of this recession, are fully included in labour force development strategies.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member. I know her concern is real and, like so many in the House, would like to see more dollars available for many of these programs.

On behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration Canada, I am pleased to outline some of the programs available to the unemployed.

As the Minister of Employment and Immigration has already mentioned, in 1991–92 approximately $3 billion was made available to provide training and adjustment programs to Canadian workers and employers. In 1992–93, $3.4 billion, an increase of $300 million, has been allocated for training and adjustment.

In 1991–92, Ontario will receive approximately $821 million in training and adjustment funds. It is expected that a good portion of these moneys will be spent in northern Ontario, in the area that she represents.

Under the Labour Force Development Strategy, which is Canada's blueprint for creating a highly and internationally competitive labour force, new programs have been designed to build on the strengths and successes of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Programs like the Employability Improvement Program, with options such as project based training or job opportunities, provide employers with assistance to hire selected candidates.

Last year, more than 600,000 Canadians in all walks of life and all regions, participated in our training and adjustment programs. In the coming year, we expect to help tens of thousands more.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 12 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today decrying the incidence of violence in our society.

The petition is signed by numerous residents of Kingston and Odessa, Ontario. There is one signature from Oshawa and one from that very fine community of Willowdale, represented so ably in this House by the hon. member for Willowdale.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act in order to ensure that crimes of violence against the person are properly dealt with in the courts.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the member for Vancouver Quadra. He has received and asked that this petition be put forward in due form.

There are seven pages of signatures on behalf of the women in his area and others, and men as well, protesting the fact that the GST applies to sanitary napkins.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition to the House which was prepared and signed by residents of east metropolitan Toronto and area, bringing to the attention of the House increases in the incidences of violent crimes.

The petitioners are asking the House to consider that and also to reform the Criminal Code, the Parole Act and the corrections act so that these serious problems of violence in our society may be addressed directly by the House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of railway employees who were suspended for accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules and are presently being unjustly penalized under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Therefore, the petitioners are calling upon Parliament to take immediate steps to specify that accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules do not constitute employee misconduct under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition. The petitioners, again from British Columbia, point out that the sale of lapel buttons depicting a Caucasian male as being in the minority, breeds racial intolerance. This perpetuates racial stereotypes and that practice ought to have no place in a country which prides itself in its multicultural fabric.

The petitioners are urging Parliament to take immediate steps to end this racist initiative.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 206, 220 and 230.

[Text]

Question No. 206—Mr. Gardiner:

Since 1989, how much money has been spent by or reimbursed by the government for designing logos for the Canada 125 Corporation and (a) what companies or individuals received contracts for this work (b) what was the amount of each contract (c) how many logos were designed and paid for by the Canada 125 Corporation?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Since 1989, $71,845 has been spent for designing logos for the Canada 125 Corporation.

(b) $18,550 to Publi Studio and $53,295 to Vision 4

Question No. 220—Mr. Gardiner:

Are any departments or agencies using the Canada 125 logo for any purpose and, if so, are they paying any fees or other monies for permission to use the logo, and if so, (a) how much has been spent by each department or agency today, and (b) how much is budgeted for future use?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): As of February 19, 1992 a total of 49 federal departments and agencies have requested the non-commercial use of the CANADA 125 logo. They have requested the use of the logo for newsletters, various publications, displays, exhibits, envelopes, brochures, banners, posters, et cetera.

The non-commercial use of the CANADA 125 logo is available to all at no charge. No federal department or agency has paid or will be required to pay any fee or other moneys for the use of the CANADA 125 logo.

Question No. 230—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

Since 1985-86 to 1990-91 inclusive, how many person-years have been eliminated as a result of privatization or other departmental re-organizations where they are no longer counted, but indirectly paid through operations?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Between 1985-86 to 1990-91 inclusive, total person-years controlled by the Treasury Board were reduced by 12,377. Departments and agencies achieved these reductions through a combination of various measures including reorganization, changes in program delivery, discontinuation of activities, contracting out and devolution to other levels of government or Indian bands as in the case of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The number of person-year reductions associated with each of the different measures adopted by departments/agencies in achieving these reductions is not available.

It should be noted that in determining the reduction of 12,377 person-years for the period 1985-86 to 1990-91, appropriate statistical adjustments were made to authorized levels for all years where person-years were simply decontrolled, as in the case of RCMP uniformed employees in 1986-87. These adjustments permit a consistent comparative analysis of changes over time.

Privatizations in the Crown corporations area account for a reduction of 41,614 employees in the period post 1984-85 to 1990-91 (exclusive of other reductions through efficiency gains). The number of 41,614 applies to number of employees and not person-years.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today condemns the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

All those who have followed the debates in the House of Commons in recent weeks and months will be fully aware of the absence of adequate information for the Canadian people about the goals and objectives of this government in the current North American free trade discussions. That situation has arisen despite the fact that the all-party committee of this House has called repeatedly on the government and in the strongest terms to make available information about its purposes in being a participant in the North American free trade negotiations.

The motion before us today must be seen against the background of course of the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement. It is not often in life that one gets a second chance. Fortunately, Canada has been provided with an opportunity to correct some of the shortcomings and inadequacies that are clearly embodied in the free trade agreement during the current Canada-Mexico-United States negotiations.

Only the most sanguine among us would argue that the existing United States-Canada free trade agreement has lived up to its promises, certainly the extravagant promises made by the government in 1988. The government's central justification at that time and subsequently was that secure access had been won in the U.S. market despite the increasing United States protectionism. Since then, however, there has been a whole series of more specific trade disputes, from Honda automobiles to softwood lumber. All of those and others have demonstrated just how tenuous and arbitrary that access to the U.S. market remains. Indeed, those trade disputes have underscored what we in the opposition have claimed all along, namely that the eleventh-hour agreement negotiated by the government was essentially unfinished and seriously flawed.

The shaky dispute settlement mechanism that was embodied in that eleventh-hour agreement was no substitute for a binding agreement between the two countries in such areas as subsidies, countervail and content requirements. Unless a clear definition of the rules of trade were to be established, Canada could not hope to enjoy what it sought in the talks, that is a truly level playing field with the United States.

Likewise, only the most obtuse would argue that this argument has adequately prepared Canada for the free trade agreement, not merely the Mexico-Canada-United States agreement but the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement.

Despite the explicit recommendations of the Macdonald royal commission, among many other studies, virtually no attempt was made by this government to link trade liberalization to a comprehensive program of domestic reform. There is no adjustment assistance programs of the required nature for business or for labour, let alone real social reform.

Those were the initiatives which would have enabled Canadians to help manage the transitions and dislocations which inevitably accompany greater trade liberalization.

Equally, little headway was made by the government in the removal of interprovincial trade barriers, barriers which to this day hinder Canadians from realizing their full potential in export trade. They hinder Canadians in realizing the potential of larger and more effective corporations and more effective employment of our labour force to ensure our entry into not only the United States market but global markets which are becoming so evident a feature of the international landscape.

The government continued to pursue a conflicting domestic agenda. An expansionary fiscal policy was combined, quite perversely in my view, with a tight monetary policy. That is to say Canadian industry was gradually handicapped with high interest rates and an over-valued dollar at the very time that Canadian exports were trying to penetrate the U.S. market. The two policies, fiscal and monetary, were in direct contradiction. On the one hand, the government sought freer trade with the United States, and at the same time pursued a monetary policy which not only resulted in higher interest rates but so drove up the Canadian dollar as to render a good number of Canadian exports to the United States and elsewhere non-competitive.

After the experience of the last three years, one would have thought that by now the government might have learned from its past mistakes. Given the fact that the existing free trade agreement was badly fumbled, one would have thought that the government might have approached this new round of negotiations with a strategic game plan; one which at a minimum would have set out Canada's national objectives; one which would have outlined how Canada will challenge and exploit a North American free trade agreement; one which would have laid down a concurrent program of domestic adjustment to help Canadian businesses and Canadian workers to compete effectively in the markets to the south and, indeed, on a global basis.

Finally, one might have expected this government to explain to the Canadian people how North American free trade fits into a wider global trade strategy for Canada.

In short, in all these and in other areas Canada is in real need of a collective response to the end of the post war era and the emergence of economic globalization. Unfortunately, no such plan has been brought forward by this government in response to the circumstances of the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement or of the proposed North American free trade agreement.

The best that Canadians have been offered by this government are bald platitudes about how free trade with Mexico naturally will lead to more jobs in Canada, better opportunities for Canadians and greater investment in Canadian industry. This is the same kind of thinking which assumed that a policy of tearing down the walls and rolling back the state will, unaided, ensure growth and prosperity. This abiding faith in the market's invisible hand has not proved sufficient over the past three years and there is certainly no reason to think that it will prove any more adequate today as we face a North American free trade agreement.

For this reason four central points must be addressed by this government:

First, we need a clear and open statement from the government about its specific objectives in the current negotiations. For example, will a subsidies code be part of the trilateral agreement; will the dispute settlement mechanism be comprehensive and binding; will this agreement include an accession clause to open the door to other potential partners in the western hemisphere; and finally, is this government prepared to hold the line against U.S. demands in such areas as culture, telecommunications and investment?

All these questions are being left unanswered. They are pressing and increasingly pressing, but the government makes no effort to explore and develop them with the people of Canada.

Second, we need to develop a national plan for exploiting the opportunities presented by global freer trade. Many sectors of the Canadian economy exhibit the adverse effects of having evolved behind protectionist walls. Those factors that are common to such industries include a reluctance to innovate and upgrade; a failure to reach and expand beyond a domestic market; an increasingly narrow product range, especially in the export sector; and an aversion to foreign and domestic rivalry.

All this suggests that we in Canada need to change our mind-set about global economic integration. At a minimum, we need a domestic economic environment more conducive to export-led growth. We need to identify those sectors where Canada does, or should, enjoy a competitive advantage and focus our collective energies in these areas. We need to encourage Canadian business to form trade consortia, joint ventures, to gain an early foothold in foreign markets including, for example, the Mexican market. Finally, we need to educate Canadian business about foreign markets including, in this case, Mexico, its economic climate, its culture and, of course, its language, by building linkages among our educational institutions and the private sector.

Third, we must respond to the whole adjustment challenge. Canada remains, unfortunately, without a comprehensive adjustment assistance program for business and labour. Although this was a cornerstone of the government's 1988 free trade package, it was a cornerstone that it failed completely to put in place. The government, for its part, argues that there are already adjustment assistance programs in place, well over 200, it tells us, dispersed among the various provincial and federal jurisdictions. Yet, the very existence of these unconnected ad hoc programs is an argument for consolidating the system and making it more successful.

More to the point, current unemployment figures, over 1.4 million Canadians out of work or 10.2 per cent of the work force, attest to the failure of these programs to help Canadians to adjust. There can be little doubt that our labour intensive sector, such as textiles, will be seriously exposed by a North American free trade agreement.

By the same token, there is every indication that our advanced industries could suffer from labour and capital shortages in the very near future. Are we going to wait until the market's so-called invisible hand works its magic or is there something that the government can do to help the economy respond to market signals? The answer, of course, is a massive and determined program of adjustment assistance which this government has singularly and completely failed to provide.

Fourth, we need to develop a global trade strategy without or with the North American free trade agreement. Canada's growing links with Mexico are part and parcel of our growing links with the world economy as a whole. Yet, the present government has done little to address these fundamental trends. A much vaunted Pacific Rim initiative has yet to progress beyond the rhetorical stage. There has been virtually no attempt, public or private, to exploit the major opportunities presented in the European Community in 1992, nor has the government seized the opportunity of the opening up of eastern Europe as a possible trade option for Canada and, more important, as a back door into the European Community.

As far as Latin America is concerned, the government has failed to formulate, let alone implement, a trade strategy except in reaction to the recent United States and Mexican initiatives, not its own trade initiatives, but initiatives forced on it by the United States and Mexico.

This passive approach to globalization raises serious questions about the direction of Canada's trade policy. It is for that reason that we sought in the motion today more information, open and candid discussion with Canadians about the government's goals and objectives in its trade policy.

For example, a strictly continentalist free trade arrangement will, by definition, make Canadian industry even more focused on the United States market and overly susceptible to the fluctuations of the U.S. economy, such as the current United States recession.

Canada's growing trade deficits, the imbalances that we really must correct are with our partners overseas, especially with Asia, not with the United States with which we continue to enjoy a surplus.

• (1030)

The deteriorating competitive position of the U.S. economy, together with a growing ascendancy of Europe and the Pacific Rim, raise serious doubts as to whether North America is still the benchmark against which Canadian industry must measure itself.

Developments in technology and transport are effectively diminishing geographical barriers, especially for the high value added industries of the future such as telecommunications and financial services. This should allow Canada to be part of a global and not merely a continental economy.

Finally, rising protectionist sentiments in the United States together with indications that its first priority is enhanced trade links with the hemisphere—the current Mexico-Canada-U.S. trade negotiations is merely the first step—raises the question of whether Canada is drifting into a U.S. dominated trade bloc and perhaps a new continentalist form of protection, and thus away from the global economy.

These are all serious issues which the government has yet to address. In its failure to offer Canadians a full account of why it is Canada is participating in the North American free trade agreement and what it is that we seek in those negotiations, the government is merely underlining its bankruptcy of policy to cope with the fact that a global trading and investment world has arrived.

We see a reflection of this in the government's current and expensive policy of sending a group of people across the country to consult on its so-called prosperity initiative.

All Canadians know what has to be done. There is no need for another year of consultation with Canadian people to know that adjustment assistance has been a principal failure of this government. It has rolled back the trade barriers in North America with the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. It now contemplates doing so with regard to Mexico as well and possibly with some other western hemisphere countries, but it offers no reassurance to the Canadian people, Canadian workers or Canadian business that the necessary changes Canada must undertake as it moves from a resource dominated economy to a value added economy are in place to make that transition and to make it in a way that will assure jobs and affluence for the Canadian people.

The failure of this government has been in its lack of candour and open discussion with the Canadian people about what it is that it seeks in the trade negotiations and in its failure to help Canadians adjust to the challenges presented not only by the two free trade agreements under discussion today but in the current Uruguay round of the GATT that effectively presents many of the same challenges with which these two trade agreements confront Canadians.

There is an essential role for the government to play. There is an active role for the government to play, and it is past time that this government came forward with a comprehensive program to assist Canadians to take full advantage of the globalization of trade and investment which is taking place across the world today.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague berating the present free trade agreement and the proposed North American free trade agreement.

I am quite sure he will agree that the free trade agreement we entered into gave us some special privileges over and above our many other trading countries. He is also aware, I think it was three or four years ago, that the American trade deficit was as high as $175 billion. Again, if my memory serves me right, I believe there were between 300 and 400 pieces of legislation in the United States Congress either to prohibit imports, to limit them, or to put a higher tariff on them or a quota.

It certainly has not turned out as well as Canada wanted, but we are in a much more preferential position than a great many of our trading partners and other trading countries. If the existing one is so bad, why are these countries clamouring, and one might say drooling at the mouth, to try to get the same deal?

My colleague can also rest assured that our government, in working out a deal for the North American free agreement, is certainly not going to give anything away. It is going to be a deal that is acceptable to us and advantageous to us.

I would appreciate the member's comments with respect to the free trade agreement and what the Americans would have done if we had not had that. At the present time we have a special disputes tribunal which gives us an opportunity. I think he will agree that if we did not have that any decision by the United States department of commerce, or whatever it is, would just be a fait accompli and we could do nothing about it.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the government member's assurance that in the Mexico–Canada–U.S. talks nothing the government will do will jeopardize Canadian interests.

The point I want to make is that in seeking a reassurance of Canadian interests in such a discussion it is also incumbent upon the government to match the removal or reduction in trade barriers with a dynamic and comprehensive program of assistance at home.

This government in its commitment to withdraw from the markets, as it would itself term it, has not provided that assistance to Canadians.

On the member's second point with regard to secure access, I would ask him whether he is saying in effect that the bottle is half full or half empty. I cannot think that in the light of the prolonged discussion of the pork issue, and more recently the problems that have arisen over softwood lumber and Honda automobiles or Japanese built automobiles in Canada, he can think that we have in effect secured that access which we were promised we would have within the free trade agreement.

I would suggest to him that the evidence in the case for example of the Honda autos is one where the United States has concluded that by harassing—and I believe that I use the Prime Minister's word—a Japanese company making automobiles in Canada it hopes to ensure that future Japanese or other foreign investment is directed into the United States itself rather than into Canada, or possibly in the North American free trade agreement into Mexico, by demonstrating that if an investment is made in either of those other two countries or particularly in Canada, the harassment will lead the foreign investor to conclude that he might as well have invested directly in the United States in the first instance.

I would suggest that is not an effective and secure access system to the U.S. market. The dispute settlement mechanism is prolonged. It is clumsy. It does not provide in the end for binding decisions unless the two parties have reached prior agreement that the decision will be binding. It does not deal effectively with U. S. countervail as it is called in the business. The effectiveness of how to contain the problems of U.S. reaction to Canadian trade initiatives has not been resolved by this agreement. It is for such reasons that we on this side of the House have called for further discussions with the United States to ensure that those aspects of the agreement which are flawed be identified and resolved.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, on occasion this Chamber is allowed to be political. I do think that—

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Barrett: I do think that every four years it is expected of us to go back to the people of this country and say honestly and openly what we would do—

An hon. member: We are going five.

Mr. Barrett: You are going five out of fear, five out of fear.

Beyond the Constitution this debate is perhaps the most important debate of any in this country prior to the next federal election. It is therefore incumbent that every party clearly state what its position is on these issues.

The Conservative Party without fail has been consistent in its position, one which I oppose vigorously. That position was vigorously opposed as well by the then leader of the Liberal Party in the last federal election, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Since that time the Liberal Party, which is now leading in the polls and is expected to stand up and say exactly where it stands on this issue through this speaker and other speakers, has failed to define exactly what its position is.

My question is very clear. Why did they abandon the position of the member for Vancouver Quadra? Why do they spend all their time criticizing the Conservative government by way of nuance, different faces at negotiation, but with exactly the same goals in mind?

There is no doubt that the Liberal Party has adopted the Conservative agenda. It has reinforced the Conservative agenda to the point where one has to ask this question: Why is the United States bullying us now in these areas? It is because the Liberal Party has adopted the same position as the Conservative Party. The Americans see them leading in the polls and there is no official opposition proposal.

That party has abandoned the position of the member for Vancouver Quadra and it owes an explanation to the public of this country as to why it has abandoned that position.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am always amused to hear these facetious little sallies from my friend from British Columbia. However I would ask him a couple of questions in response, and then I will try for a moment to put his mind at rest.

If we want to talk about where parties are, where is the New Democratic Party on the question of trade? We have on the one hand the member saying, as I believe he does, that in the highly unlikely event the NDP were the government it would abrogate the free trade agreement immediately and, second, that it would withdraw from the current negotiations with Mexico.

Mr. Barrett: That's right.

Mr. MacLaren: In an interview with The Financial Post his leader said: "No, we will not do that. We would in fact renegotiate the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement".

And his colleague from Yorkton—Melville said: "Oh, well, we don't like the GATT any more, and if we were in government", highly unlikely though that might be, "we would withdraw from the GATT".

What planet does this party live on? What planet, what world does the NDP inhabit?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for questions or comments has now expired.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join in the debate on behalf of the government and perhaps to put a few of the issues inherent in this motion in their proper context, but not to intervene and mediate the obvious lovers' quarrel between the two opposition parties.

The member for Etobicoke North makes two points really. One is that there is not enough information about the government's objectives that we have taken to these over-all North American free trade talks. The second is that we have not put in place sufficient adjustment measures to prepare our own economy and our own people for the impact of a general North American free trade agreement and the impact of changes that are occurring throughout the world.

I will dispel the myth about not enough information, not enough consultation. I will leave it to my other colleagues for the rest of the day to dispel the myth about a lack of preparation and adjustment measures.

My hon. friend is quite right when he says that the magic of old, the invisible hand of Adam Smith and many of the things that we relied upon in the past to regulate the economies of our own countries, of our own jurisdictions and those of the world, that these old rules no longer work. The magic no longer works. Indeed, the economies are very much influenced today by very powerful global forces, forces over which not one single nation, one single powerful jurisdiction as there may be, has any control.

I would like to put in context the background against which we have made some of these decisions, first of all, to enter into a free trade arrangement with the United States and then to quickly respond when we discovered that the Americans were looking to expand these kinds of arrangements south to Mexico to make sure that our own interests would not be adversely affected.

We live in a new age. It is called the technology age or the information age. There are megatrends that sweep around the planet in microseconds, trends that no one has any ability to steer or to influence to any extent. That is the first context. No one will be able to hide, protect or shelter themselves from these forces of which I spoke.

The population of the planet has doubled in the last 150 years. It will double again in the next 75 years. Anyone who is under any illusion that this trend will not have a very profound and very serious impact on the way we do business with one another, the way we rearrange our own lifestyles, our own quality of life, is very naive.

Since our travels to space we have a keener awareness of the fragility of the planet, of the finite resources that we are using. These resources will have to be shared, not with 4.5 billion but perhaps with 7 billion to 9 billion people in just 75 years from now.

Perhaps it is also because of the fact that peace has broken out. There is no longer a major confrontation between the superpowers. This requires major adjustments in the economies of some of the more powerful countries, particularly the United States and the Soviet Union, an economy which was in the main based on defence production.

All of those things will have a very profound impact on the way we do business. It is an impact, as I said, that will come down on us, which will affect us whether or not we stick our heads in the sand. These are trends that have to be responded to, that have to be faced and managed.

As I said earlier, not even the most powerful among us of the nation states has any capacity to control these trends. Capital moves throughout the world without restrictions in seconds.

Investment decisions are made by corporations that are more powerful today in their global context than most nation states in the world. Investment decisions are being made on the grounds of perhaps less stringent environmental and human rights standards in one part of the world as compared to another.

So there is a call for a new world order. It would have been heresy 10 years ago for a president of the most powerful nation on earth, the United States, to admit and to show readiness to surrender much of the sovereignty of the United States to a new world order.

Why is that? The reason is because of the facts that I have mentioned. Not even that most powerful nation on earth has any control over these new developments. No one will be sheltered, no one will be excused from making the tough decisions that have been made in our country to prepare ourselves for these new events.

Perhaps the changes are so profound that even the political institutions, including our own, may well not be suited to cope with these new developments. We have to prepare ourselves for this concept of a new world order, this concept of globalization.

One of the unfortunate features in our system, and it is not just in the British parliamentary system but most traditional political systems of a free market economy, is what the opposition parties see as their role to stop progress. I am not being critical here. It is an inherent part of our political system. They see it as their role to stop progress at any cost. That is one part of their role. The other part of their role is to lament the fact that there is no progress. That is part of our system and we have to live with that. But I hope the people who look in on some of these debates are fully aware of that.

In developing our own policy and our own strategy, obviously we were inclined to look at the European experience. As we looked around the world we discovered that anywhere free trade has happened things happen quickly and all the developments, in the main, are positive.

In Europe there is the European Economic Community, a consortium or strategic alliance of nations. They fought and killed each other for thousands of years for all kinds of reasons and all of a sudden they have come together to talk about free trade, economic and industrial integration, about a single standard throughout Europe. They go further. They talk about political integration. They are talking about surrendering part of their sovereignty to a larger order, in this case the European Economic Community.

Why would they do this? Well, perhaps they are better students of history and they have a longer history than we have here in our own country. They can think back to the dark ages. Incidentally, countries in eastern Europe tend to relive the Dark Ages by pursuing selfish, parochial interests. Europeans have overcome that and there are good reasons for it. They know that only through that kind of combined strength and by putting aside our parochial interests can we cope with these new trends that are at the same time a bit frightening and daunting. It is human to resist change, particularly such profound changes but of course they are also very, very exciting.

Europeans also know that unless they get their act together, unless they break down the barriers and unless freedom breaks out in eastern Europe there could be an influx of 30 million refugees into the central European space. All of that has to be considered.

It is against that background that this government has established a trade policy and a consultative process that is broader in its scope and deeper in its coverage than has ever been initiated by any government in the history of Canada. That is not an over-statement. It is a consultative process that involves Canadians from all the geographic regions of our country and from all walks of life.

Contrary to what the opposition claims, there have been most extensive consultations. A year before we even considered monitoring and entering into these trade discussions to expand the Canada-U.S. free trade deal to include Mexico, there were discussions with the provinces, labour and business. The SAGITs were reorganized and sectorial discussions and studies were carried out in agriculture, finance and investment. Incidentally these studies were tabled with the standing committee. That happened way back in October of 1980. They have been available publicly for one and one-half years.

Early in 1991 the government published a document entitled "North American Free Trade—Securing Canada's Growth Through Trade". On April 25, 1991, prior to the commencement of the negotiations and our participation in them, the Minister for International Trade spoke at the Financial Post conference. All of us remember that speech where he laid out clearly what our intentions and objectives were in expanding our trade prospects.

After all, it had become apparent at that time that the United States intent was certainly to enter into some kind of an arrangement with the Mexicans. There can be no doubt that all of us, particularly here in this country, would be affected by that.

I am often amused by some of the gloomy predictions that particularly come from the New Democratic Party about how we would be pulled down to the Mexican standards. Our workers, instead of earning $13 an hour would earn $1 an hour and all our environmental protection laws would be scrapped because we would be pulled down to the Mexican standard.

I have two thoughts here. First of all, if that were so and the United States entered into an agreement with Mexico, with Canada sitting on the sidelines, and the United States got pulled down to the Mexican standards, whom would we trade with?

Our auto workers would be eating bark off the trees if the Mexican standards prevailed in the United States. The fact of the matter is, of course, that whenever you have such an arrangement everything polarizes to the highest common denominator.

Mr. Barrett: That is nonsense.

Mr. Oberle: My friend says it is nonsense. I do not know how much he travels. I do not travel that much, but I know that with regard to Portugal, if you had been there 10 years ago and you were to visit Portugal today, you would see what I am talking about.

Mr. Barrett: They have a social charter.

Mr. Oberle: Absolute nonsense. The workers are earning a wage that is equivalent to the standards throughout Europe. The environmental standards have increased and lo and behold, everybody is happier. It was very intelligent the way that it was all planned. The Europeans keep taking in new countries, as they can afford it.

Mr. Barrett: They have a social charter.

Mr. Oberle: They have a social charter, but my hon. friend of course thinks that all the ills would be solved by just writing out a social charter and the very next day everybody would be happy, just like everybody was happy the very next day after we had a human rights charter in the last Constitution. It is not that simple.

These predictions of doom and gloom are just simple nonsense.

We cannot ignore the dangers on the one hand, as I said, and the opportunities on the other that present themselves as we enter into these discussions, and that would have presented themselves if we had not entered into these discussions.

Let us put the North American market in its context. There are 360 million people, the most powerful trading block on earth, with a gross domestic product or an economy that exceeds $6 trillion. Mexico has 85 million to 90 million people who will be added to this trading block. Mexico will be the spring-board to extend our trading arrangements beyond our hemisphere to the south.

Our objectives were clearly spelled out by one of Canada's chief negotiators in a speech on June 3, 1981. He clearly spelled out what the objectives are that he has been told to pursue at the talks. He and his colleagues made 26 major speeches in the country. These are all public documents. Our major objective is the elimination of tariffs, of course. That is the basis of any free trade agreement that is negotiated between any two partners, protecting intellectual property rights, dispute mechanisms, rules of origin, better definitions of rules relating to subsidies, all of these kinds of things, some of which perhaps, as we know today, are a bit weak in the Canada-U.S. arrangement and there is the potential now for us to strengthen those.

Immediately after the launch of the talks on June 12 of last year, situation reports had been issued and published to all stakeholders. Three thousand of these reports have been published. So what is the opposition talking about? As I said, the SAGITs have been reorganized. A broad spectrum of interests have been involved in the negotiations: business, academics, labour, environmental groups.

If the hon. members opposite were really interested in these objectives, they had only to attend the briefings that were organized by the subcommittee on external affairs and international trade. Read any of the many speeches I have mentioned by the minister and the chief negotiator or spend a few minutes pursuing one of the three situation reports that have been published and tabled.

Had they taken any of these initiatives, they would have learned that Canada has five broad objectives in the NAFTA negotiations. I will spell them out just so there can no longer be any doubt. First, barrier free access to Mexico for Canadian goods and services while developing tariff phase out provisions and safeguard mechanisms which reflect Canadian import sensitivities. Second, improved access to the United States markets in such areas as financial services and government procurement. Third, improved conditions under which Canadian business can make strategic alliances with North America to better compete with the Pacific rim and the European Community as well as other parts of the world not so critical. In unity, there is strength and by getting ourselves competitive in our own hemisphere and our own environment here, we will be stronger to approach the markets of the rest of the world, which are so terribly exciting and ensure that Canada remains an attractive site for foreign and domestic investment. That, too, is important. Finally, the establishment and expeditious dispute settlement mechanism.

The record of the government is unequivocal. We consulted with Canadians before we decided to enter the NAFTA negotiations. We have consulted continuously since the negotiations were launched last June. We are continuing to consult on an ongoing basis with the provinces, with the representatives of business and labour, with academics, with environmental interests and with the many Canadians who wish to air their views and have input into these discussions.

We have consulted with our colleagues in the committee to which they have access and in which they really set the agenda.

The objectives of Canada's negotiators have been known for almost a year. The broad consultative process solicits a two-way flow of information.

In short, the motion placed before this House by the opposition does not accurately reflect the facts and it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker, a final word. Instead of condemning the government for having the courage to do some of these things that may perhaps be a bit daunting and frightening, in approaching a path that is still shrouded in the mist of what the future might bring, they should celebrate the fact that we have a government that has a clear fix on the future and is clearly attuned to the horrendous changes and the excitement that is happening throughout the world today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the minister and I want to direct my remarks toward one area of the free trade proposal or policy or agreement. It has to do with that specific area relating to foreign investment.

For many years we have welcomed foreign investment in this country, but when we were the government, we had a review mechanism whereby we would encourage foreign investment.

We would like those foreign investors to not just set up a distribution warehouse and sell their products when they come to this country. We would like them to set up a manufacturing operation so we would not be just hamburger flippers. We would have some skilled jobs for our people.

We would ask foreign investors to put some of their money into research and development so we could develop innovative products in Canada. That system worked for years and years. We built up a manufacturing base in this country to rival anything in the world.

When this free trade agreement came along, it was basically written into the agreement that we would take unlimited foreign investment, but it would also be unfettered foreign investment. In other words there would no longer be any conditions attached to investing in this nation.

As a result of that aspect of the free trade agreement, numerous companies have basically shut down their manufacturing here. They have used their offices here basically as distribution houses, warehouses and sales agencies. Does the minister think that specific chapter of the free trade agreement is working the way it was originally designed? If companies withdraw their manufacturing, they are certainly not going to do R and D. Does he not agree there is some room to review that aspect of the free trade agreement?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, if he used the standard of perfection to assess the early stages of the implementation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, I suppose my hon. friend is right.

The agreement is not perfect. There is room for improvement. As I have pointed out in my speech, there is now an opportunity to make these improvements. At the same time I would also point out to my friend—as is the case in all such cases, particularly if you study the European experience—these agreements bring with them the need to adjust and restructure our own economy. Strengths have to be built upon and we must have the courage to de-emphasize those areas where we just cannot be as competitive as we would like to be in a new trade environment and in the markets.

It has been the tradition in our country in the past to protect an industry in trouble usually with government grants and handouts. You keep it artificially alive. I readily confess to my friend who supports the previous government and its policies that the forest products industry for which I am responsible is undergoing a very serious period of adjustment and restructuring. It has to happen not just because of the agreement with the United States, but because of this concept of globalization.

In the early 1980s during a period of recession, his government opted for a pulp mill modernization program. One half billion dollars were spent propping up companies and plants that had really outlived their usefulness. You cannot make a 50-year-old paper machine compete in today's market and technology. It would be like trying to make a space shuttle out of a DC-3. If the government had the courage to face those necessary adjustments at the time, the industry today would not be in the situation it is in.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am somewhat disappointed in the minister's words. He is talking about the Dark Ages and his words were written for him, I would presume, by the office of the Minister for International Trade.

We on this side of the House brought this opposition day forward to give the government an opportunity to explain to Canadians what it was doing in this deal. I must say I have all these studies and reports the government put out. I must tell you they do not tell Canadians a heck of a lot about what is going on in these negotiations.

Today's Toronto Star reported: "Leaked document reveals massive three-way trade deal". I was at all the briefings with the Minister for International Trade when he came to the parliamentary committee. I was at the committee hearings. Quite frankly, we did not hear a lot of the answers.

We did not hear what the costs and benefits would be to Canada. We did not hear whether or not the government would sign a deal that did not have a dispute settlement mechanism. We did not hear that the government may withdraw a snap-back provision.

We did hear in these reports that horticulture in Canada was in danger of disappearing under this deal. I wonder where the Minister for International Trade is. Why is this minister here speaking on behalf of the government if he does not have the answers to all these questions?

Mr. Oberle: It was not the Minister for International Trade who chose this particular topic for today's opposition debate and motion.

The minister is away on very important business. If the opposition were really interested in having the minister here, someone could probably have telephoned his office to determine whether he would be available today.

I would also like to tell him that nobody ever writes my speeches, ever. I write my own speeches, and in fact I pride myself in doing it. That is why they are sexist.

I do want to say, in fairness to my friend, I am pleased at least one of the opposition members has read some of the reports and has attended some of the meetings. I have a message for my hon. friend from Etobicoke North who said there has been no information out there. Perhaps he can consult with his colleague and avail himself of the reports and discussions out there.

When you enter into negotiations, of course you cannot predict with an absolute degree of certainty what will come out at the end. There is always compromise, give and take. All I can tell my hon. friend in terms of certainty is that no agreement will be signed unless it is beneficial to Canada.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from British Columbia and his points of view with respect to this opposition day motion.

I do not know if the hon. member had the opportunity to read Business Week magazine, a U.S. weekly. It discussed the very issue of trade between United States and Mexico. It highlighted the auto industry in this particular article, and I would urge everybody in this House to read it.

Many U.S. companies are now moving to Mexico in a significant way. This article compared the wages and quality of work of an individual working in a Mexican plant for Chrysler with an auto worker in Detroit. The Mexican worker received $87 per week to weld an automobile, while the worker in Detroit received $16 an hour.

We can no longer argue that Mexico is incapable of producing a high quality automobile. In negotiating any kind of trade agreement, is there not somewhat of a danger that the manufacturing industries we have developed in this country, including the auto industry, may move to Mexico?

Mercedes-Benz is contemplating building a plant in Mexico because it believes Mexicans are as capable as anyone of producing a quality automobile. I only wonder because if we go into this trade—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The period has now expired, but I will give one minute to the minister.

Mr. Oberle: We have to be so concerned about precisely that. We were concerned when the news first reached us that there were definite intentions to develop an agreement between the United States and Mexico. For us to sit on the sidelines would have been folly at the extreme. What impact would such an agreement have on our automotive industry, our energy sector, our forestry sector, and the other manufacturing sectors?

We need to be part of this thing. In the first instance we need to monitor what is happening and participate very effectively when the opportunity arises. We will be affected by any kind of an arrangement anywhere in the world, and particularly by what is contemplated between the United States and Mexico.

It is very critical for us to be part of the negotiations and part of the deal, if there is one.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question addressed to the minister by my friend from Manitoba, the art expert.

The member from Manitoba very clearly sees a significant problem here. We are going to enter into an agreement with a low-wage partner without any social contract such as the one that exists in Europe relevant to worker safety, health care and the environment. That is number one.

Number two, the member has clearly shown an area of concern where the United States is already bullying us. The Honda decision we are struggling with now is over content. This is the harbinger of exactly the kind of pressure the Canadian market will get if we sign the NAFTA without identifying the rules of origin as well as who owns the existing plants once the deal is signed.

The Japanese or Koreans have been enticed to invest partly in the automobile industry here in Canada. There is nothing in this draft agreement to stop them from closing down their factories here once the NAFTA is signed, moving to Mexico and having access to their market under the proposed agreement.

The auto pact is being assaulted daily by the United States—I did not interrupt the minister but I am glad he is interrupting me because he is beginning to understand the United States' pattern of behaviour on this issue. The Honda ruling itself is a signal to other investors offshore that if they come to Canada they will be bullied by the United States, so they should move to either the United States or Mexico.

Why do I say that? Because it is the existing pattern.

I want to further point out to the member that if this agreement had a basic salary component so a low-wage partner would be forced within a time frame to reach the same level as the United States and Canada, massive reinvestment of capital would not be taking place.

Again, I want to give him a specific example. In its recent announcement of closure of plants in the United States and Canada, General Motors also gave a tacit indication of where it is headed. It is headed to Mexico. The Moraine engine plant has closed down. It is going to Mexico and the Mexicans are efficient, capable production workers just as we are in Canada and the United States.

I want to warn the House this member has touched a nerve that is exactly the crux of these questions and he has a perfect right to question the minister. The bottom question is why in the world are there no adjunct discussions about the environment, health and safety, and wages?

You have a perfect question, and that is the question you will find in your constituency when you go home. Canadian people are not stupid. They have to make a political decision about who is at the helm of the ship of this nation. They are disappointed in this government. You are suffering, as you know Mr. Member, at 11 per cent in the polls, but the Canadian people are even more disappointed in the official opposition. It has fallen into the trap of saying it will do the same thing as the Tories only better, without demanding a restructuring.

I delivered myself of those comments by way of thanking that member for his intervention.

I want to correct the record on two accounts before I go into my main discussion. First of all, for the member of the Liberal Party who wanted to know the official position of the New Democratic Party, I read this letter of December 3, 1991, into the record.

To the editor of the Financial Post, 333 King Street, Toronto, Ontario:

Dear Editor:

In your October 26th edition you publish extracts from a lengthy and wide-ranging interview between myself and Diane Francis. On page 1 of the same issue, Ms. Francis draws some conclusions from the interview, among them that the New Democrats have softened their position on the free trade agreement. This conclusion is not accurate. Our party continues to oppose the deal and maintains the position that it ought to be abrogated.

She goes on to say "in six months", and that's our position.

I know that the member will now correct his impression because he is aware that newspapers make mistakes, sometimes even mistakes with the Liberal party.

Here is the position, here is the letter. At the end of my speech I will table this letter so that the member will not be succumbing to the temptation to repeat a canard that is not of whole cloth.

I do want to go on to the Liberal's position and I want to deal with it. On October 22, 1991 my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway, in an opposition day debate, moved a motion which included the words "that this House urge the government to discontinue immediately Canadian participation in the Canada-United States-Mexico free trade negotiations".

A subamendment was moved by the Liberal Party to that motion eliminating that particular section of our motion about the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and the Liberals actually voted against a very motion similar to the one, not exactly the same, as we are discussing today.

Mr. Dingwall: That's stretching it.

Mr. Barrett: Shocked, Mr. Speaker? Well, stretching it, all right.

All right, let us get it straight. We are the only party on record that says we will abrogate the free trade agreement and we are opposed to the current discussions with Canada, the U.S. and Mexico. Let us put that straight.

Mr. Mills: What about your leader's position?

Mr. MacLaren: What about withdrawing from the GATT?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I know I cannot use props but if I could I would hold this up and point to the Liberals' action on our motion. But I will not violate the rules of this House.

Mr. Dingwall: What a distortion.

Mr. Barrett: I read the letter. I will send you a copy and I will table a copy to the House as well. Here is her letter and here is our position, and I will send you an autographed copy because I know you will treasure it.

I want to address myself to a number of areas that are of deep concern to the New Democratic Party.

Number one, I want to say that it is, in my opinion, the responsibility of the Official Opposition to make itself clear so that we stop being bullied by the United States. I believe that because the Liberals have softened their position they have given the Americans a home run and they are taking it. With the Liberals now leading in the polls, and the Americans knowing they have taken a foolish position of renegotiating the deal, they can bully all they want because it won't matter whether the Liberals are in power or the Tories are in power.

I do not believe that the Liberals understand exactly what they have done by saying they will renegotiate. They have not thought that position through. It will take five years to renegotiate the existing FTA. Five years, Mr. Speaker. In that time all the damage that has been done will be totally finalized and there won't be anything left to renegotiate.

The Americans also have a different political system. It is not simply a matter of renegotiating with the President and his cabinet, or the executive. That is one step. Once you are through there then you have got to go to Congress and they will take their pound of flesh; then you have to go to the Senate and they will take their pound of flesh. The Liberal position is a recipe for disaster, compounding what is wrong over here. That is why their former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who understood the American system, who understood American politics, said that if the Liberal Party were elected they would abrogate. People voted for the Liberal party in the last federal election for that abrogation position and let no voter be misunderstood when they demand that position again. Renegotiation by the Liberals is, in fact, a just endorsation of what the Tories have done. There is no other position that can be taken to deal with this issue.

We did have a fundamental difference in committee. The Liberals put a minority report in, and I have a copy here, which opens by saying in effect that we have to be at the table. Then they go on to say: "We would like this, we would like this and we would like this". It is a naive position that their caucus succumbed to for whatever reason. Nonetheless, I was forced much to my regret to put in a detailed, in depth criticism and non-support of the government's position on behalf of my party.

Two of the things I quoted in my minority report need to be repeated in this debate. They are quotes from the leader of the opposition in Mexico, whom many people suggest won the election as Mr. Salinas did win by fraud, as attested to by international observers. By the way, we are dealing with a country that has a violation of human rights that does not meet the standards of the Prime Minister. Even the Liberals acknowledge that. They included that in their amendment to our motion last October.

The Mexican government is harbouring within its system human rights abuses that are without parallel in North America. Over 80 social activists, church activists, religious community activists and trade unionists have been murdered under the Salinas government administration when they made an attempt to rectify unjust labour conditions, horrible environmental conditions and the kind of usury that is taking place in terms of loans for those people in Mexico.

Here is what the leader of the official opposition said, Cuauhtemoc Cardenas, the son of the most famous President in Mexican history, a name that rings with pride throughout all of Mexico and I quote what he said in a speech in Vancouver.

Referring to the United States he said: "Their free trade agenda is simple and narrow. Mexico will sell its cheap labour in order to attract foreign capital while in turn will guarantee the survival of one of the last remaining authoritarian political systems in Latin America".

If this government believed the words of the Prime Minister of this country, we would immediately walk out of those negotiations. Are the words of the Prime Minister hollow about his commitment to human rights? In my opinion, in this instance they certainly are, as documented by Amnesty International.

What is the alternative? I go on to quote Mr. Cardenas: "We maintain that trade must be seen as an investment of development and that a new kind of development model must be at the core of any continental trade negotiations".

I also quote: "We believe that an alternative agreement should include a social charter and be based on common standards for labour, social and environmental rights".

Is there anyone in this House who is opposed to that? The Liberals would not be. The Conservative backbenchers would not be. It is only the intransigence of this government's negotiation position by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that excludes standards for labour, social and environmental rights.

Is this House aware of the incidents of foetal deformity in Brownsville, Texas, as a direct result of the lack of pollution control standards just across the border in the Maquiladora program?

This government spent $50 million on the external affairs committee and services of the committee. It was not enough. A great deal of work has to be done, but not one penny was spent on committee members to go down and see the Maquiladora in Mexico. Not one cent.

We have gone to Russia and solved all the problems in Russia and left the mess for Boris Yeltsin to clean up. We have gone to Czechoslovakia and solved their problems. There are a few left there. We will probably be going other places in the world, as we must go, but not one trip to the Maquiladora to see the horror of what is happening to children and women in those working conditions that Canadians are being asked to compete with under the NAFTA agreement.

There is not one constituency in this country that would stand for the working conditions that exist in the Maquiladora program and not one member of Parliament, regardless of party, would support those kinds of working conditions if they existed in Canada. Yet this government insists on signing an agreement with a country that abuses children on these jobs, that has no health and safety standards and, as far as environmental standards, not one vote would be given to anybody in this House if they supported those in this country, and yet this government wants to sit at the table with Mexico.

• (1130)

Send the committee, it will not do it. Send members of the committee, it will not do it. To my knowledge, I am the only member of this Chamber who has gone to Mexico, met with senators and discussed with them the problems that they are faced with.

Mr. Speller: That is not true.

Mr. Barrett: To my knowledge.

An hon. member: It could be limited.

Mr. Barrett: It may be limited on this subject, but certainly the committee. I would welcome those who have done the same as I have to stand up and tell this House what they have seen, what they have heard and why they would then be opposed to this agreement.

This government is driven by a corporate, colonialist agenda that has no place in a modern society. The Liberal Party is just as much at fault as the government is on the North American free trade agreement. The only clear position that should be taken on this issue is to walk away from the table, start all over from square one and let the people of this country know exactly where we stand.

Mr. Dingwall: Did Bob White tell you that?

Mr. Barrett: One last comment to my very good friend from British Columbia, who has served that province earnestly and with dedication all these years. Despite a disagreement of philosophy, I have admiration for his public service to my province of British Columbia. During his own speech, the member who is the Minister of Forestry said that it was difficult to get Canadian industries and pulp and paper to upgrade their equipment.

The minister spoke specifically about upgrading paper-making machines. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to that minister, that one of the reasons for the delay in capital upgrading of paper-making in this country is tied in directly with the long-term goal of moving peeler logs and chips down the coast into Mexico and closing our own pulp and paper plants because the environmental standards, the capital costs and labour costs in Mexico are zero compared to what is the case here in Canada.

If one is to believe the document that is quoted today in The Toronto Star, one is to accept the fact there is an agreement on intercontinental transportation that would eliminate any barrier whatsoever on the moving of chips, pulp and peeler logs. Pulp can move now, but chips and peeler logs would go.

The provinces have the right to control the export of logs. Why was the question of whole logs thrown in with the softwood decision? It is my opinion that the United States is attempting to lever this government into a position of dropping the 14.5 per cent tariff on softwood if the government takes away the right of the provinces to control the export of peeler logs and chips. Far-fetched, Mr. Speaker? Not at all.

Louisiana Pacific, a major forest company in the United States, within the last two years has closed down its sawmill in northern California, relocated it lock, stock and barrel into Ensenata, Mexico and has moved every single one of its publicly granted logs in its redwood forest holus-bolus down to be processed in Mexico. Louisiana Pacific is again in the front line of the same kind of moves.

I hate to make these kinds of predictions. It is not because it is malice on this government's side. You have a choice between stupidity and cupidity. Because of the goodness in my heart I prefer to take the word stupidity rather than cupidity. That is the reality. The Liberals failed the people of this country after John Turner left. This government has had open ground to go wherever it wants. I am telling you that in New Brunswick, in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, every single long-term job that is affected by peeler logs, chips and pulp is threatened by moving to Mexico.

Mr. Dingwall: You don't know your history.

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend says I do not know my history. It is because I read history that I discovered the sell-out that is taking place in this country.

An hon. member: Ancient history.

Mr. Barrett: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and my last word is that I would advise my Liberal friends in this government to read the works of Professor Harley Shaiken of the University of California, San Diego.

Mr. Shaiken, who is an expert in communications and trade with Mexico and the United States, has written a thorough examination of the impact of the Maquiladora plants on the Ford Escort and the Volkswagen Jetta, both imported into this country from Mexico, high quality workmanship, high quality performance by those automobiles, the automobile workers getting one-fifth of the wage that comparable Canadian auto workers get in Quebec and Ontario. This is a sell-out and this government is too stupid to understand it. And the Liberals think that by going back on the fence they can win an election.

I say this. Let the election be called on this issue. Let the people of this country decide. Not the smoke and mirrors in this Chamber, but let the people of this country decide who is fighting for the working people, who is fighting for Canadian sovereignty. It is not the government and tragically it is not the Liberals. We are left alone in the struggle but we intend to maintain it.

Mr. Speaker, if you will let me put my amendment, I move:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following words:
> and therefore call upon the government to withdraw from the negotiations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments, the hon. Minister of Forestry.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I just want to very briefly reciprocate my hon. friend's generous comments about my public service. I have no less respect and admiration for his exemplary service to the people of my province and the people of Canada.

In fact, in this whole debate there is very little difference in the kind of concern that my hon. friend and I share, except of course to say that he perhaps thinks he has a monopoly on virtue, concern and compassion for the people of Mexico.

Let me ask my hon. friend: Would it be better for the Mexican people, for the people of the Maquiladora region, if the car plant had not gone there, if instead of getting one-third of the wage of the Canadian worker they would get no wage at all as they used to? Would that be the better solution? Would it be the better solution to just build a fence around Mexico and shut them out because they are too poor themselves to afford the environmental standards that our industry has paid for and built, because they are too poor to get access to a job?

Or would it be better for the workers of Mexico to have the borders thrown open and to give them access to the prosperity that we have enjoyed through a free market economy, through private enterprise? Perhaps the one-third of the wage that a worker in the Maquiladora region earns right now, in five years from now, will be one-half and I predict 10 years from now it will be equal to that of the Canadian worker.

My friend really does not have compassion for the people in Mexico and for other poor regions of the world. His compassion is with the Canadian unions. That is who writes the policy for the New Democratic Party. They are the Luddites of another age. They are the people who build a wall around our country and say: "Everybody in the world has to buy everything we can produce, but don't you dare import something that may require us to compete". That is the philosophy of my friend. Despite all my respect for him, it is terribly misguided.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the hon. member, I will take under advisement the amendment moved by the hon. member but it would be appreciated if he would indicate to the Chair the seconder of that motion.

Mr. Barrett: The member for Kamloops, Mr. Speaker.

I welcome the questions raised by my good friend. It is a rare opportunity that my good friend from British Columbia and I have this exchange in the House. I welcome it based on his sincerity and my position defined by him to see whether or not it is sincere.

I refer the minister to what the leader of the opposition in Mexico said, and I repeat:

> We maintain that trade must be seen as an instrument of development and that a new kind of developmental model must be at the core of any continental trade negotiations— We believe that an alternative agreement should include a social charter and be based on common standards for labour, social and environmental rights. Likewise a continental pact of this nature would strengthen our internal struggle for democracy and propitiate a significant improvement in the situation of human rights of Mexicans.

• (1140)

This is a Mexican politician who is making this appeal and he has to make an appeal for votes. If the simplistic view of the minister is all that would prevail in Mexico, then the leader of the opposition would not even be elected.

There is an alternative to what this government is entering into. You do not have to accept any single deal that is placed on the table. That is what I am afraid this government has done. It has not done its homework. It has never displayed any impact studies, sector by sector. Where are they? I asked the minister in this House to table the impact studies and I never got them. I never even got an answer.

Furthermore, when you go to a table to negotiate, you negotiate from your strengths. No one would deny the right of Mexicans or Central Americans or South Americans to participate in a self-driven international new global economy where dignity and respect for sovereignty is what is the first condition.

That applies to us. When it is suggested that I am saying that a wall should be put up around Canada, I do defend the right of the province of British Columbia to control the export of whole logs. If the minister feels that that right should be dispensed with then that means the capital investment we desire and have shepherded in British Columbia, both public and private, because remember, those forests are God-given to the people of this country, not planted by the Conservative Party, not by the Liberal Party, not by the New Democratic Party. None of us can be sanctimonious about God's work, but we have a responsibility to be prudent in dealing with those resources that were God-given.

Why would we agree to ship out whole logs and peeler logs and chips?

An hon. member: We are not.

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend, that is the pressure that is coming. Those are the kinds of barriers that this minister is suggesting we have to drop in the new global economy. I tell you this. The record of this government indicates to me that it has no national philosophy on energy, oil, natural gas, forest products, all the way down the line. That is what we are defending. That is what Mexico is defending. We should not be reduced to their standards. We should join the fight to bring them up to ours.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have to say to the hon. member that I do not feel verbosity really does anything for this debate. I have been involved with the hon. member in this issue for a couple of years now. In fact, I have been to Mexico to talk to Mexican senators about it and I do understand the dangers of going into an agreement like this.

Quite frankly, I would like to ask the hon. member, who spent most of his time attacking my party on this issue, where he was during the last election and where his party was during the last election. As I was out on the campaign trail fighting for Canada, fighting for Canadian sovereignty, his party was somewhat quiet on the whole issue of free trade.

I would say to him that the only reason we have a free trade deal today is because his party spent all its time attacking our former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, instead of attacking the free trade deal. Those are the facts.

I want to ask the hon. member this quite honestly because we in this party have taken a serious look at it. We realize the position we are in, being in opposition. Quite frankly, although I do agree that there are major flaws in such an agreement and there are dangers in such an agreement, I do have to say I agree with my party that we have to be at the table.

We have to be at the table because this government did not put in a position last time in the free trade deal that allowed this mess to happen. It did not put in an extension clause, so any government in the world that wants to come into free trade can now come into it. We have to be there to renegotiate it all.

I ask the hon. member, knowing what he does about this deal, how can he say that we cannot be at the table? How are we going to protect Canadian farmers? How are we going to protect Canadian workers?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, who is at the table? Not the Liberal Party. Who is at the table? Not the New Democrats. Who is at the table is this government and its agenda. Its agenda excludes the very things that you say should be included. Why in the world would you support its position on negotiations and then turn around and say that we may have to renegotiate?

The order of the day, my dear friend, is to say that we want no part and parcel with this government that is so stupid that it has not even included the subjects you raise.

If the Liberal Party were at the table that would be one thing. If the New Democrats were at the table that would be another, but do you trust this government? Are you asking me to trust this government?

Furthermore, on the suggestion of the attack of your leader I think it is well known and I want to reiterate it. I make no apologies for the fact that the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and I are very close personal friends. We have an agreement: I will never vote for him and he will never vote for me. But we are good friends and I ask the member to show anywhere in the record where I attacked him.

As for my own role in the free trade debate, I said consistently "praise for John Turner" even in my own election campaign as I supported my own leader, Ed Broadbent. I will show the member where I said publicly how much I admired John Turner's position. Not many politicians can do that.

I am at the stage of politics where I can do that. I came out of retirement because of this issue. So do not suggest to me that I attacked John Turner or the Liberal position.

I want to tell you in conclusion that the Liberal's position is mistaken, absolutely mistaken. It gives succour and comfort to all of the forces that are out there supporting this agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for questions or comments has now expired. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

I would appreciate it if he would indicate to the Chair whether he has split his time with another member.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for York North.

I think it is a very appropriate time to have an opposition day on this topic. I want to commend my colleague from Etobicoke North for the motion he put forward, the motion that this House condemn the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

I listened intently to the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and I hope that they will realize now that it is the government that is the target in these negotiations. They are the ones that are doing the negotiating. It is not the Liberal Party and I hope they will not make the same mistake again as was made in 1988 when their leader attacked the Liberal Party because we were ahead in the polls at the time. Of course they were desperately trying to grasp on to straws like a drowning person to maintain their place as one of the opposition parties in the House of Commons.

The negotiations that are being conducted at the present time are similar to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. This government is not telling Canadians what it is getting them into because the government itself does not know because it has not done its homework prior to these negotiations.

For example, I just want to give you the fact that in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement it was not until this past month that the Minister of Agriculture finally got a handle on what subsidies and supports are received by United States farmers and food processors. A working paper was published entitled "Assistance Programs for U.S. Agriculture and Food Processors".

It is well known that the U.S. farmers, particularly grain farmers, get about a third to one-half of their income from government subsidies. Yet this government did not pause to look into this. It is only after the fact that it has become known. Now we look at the hardship being inflicted on Canadian farmers and the millions and millions of dollars in subsidies we have had to pay out to them to even remain in business.

The study states the main purpose was to provide information which might be useful in the development of rules for the use of government subsidies as envisaged in the Canada-U.S. trade agreement. Yet this study was published three years after the agreement came into effect. The study was not even commissioned until after the free trade agreement was signed.

Is this how one negotiates with a stronger adversary, by waiting until after the ink on the contract is dry before investigating the strengths and weaknesses of one's adversary?

I would suggest not. I am appalled at what has happened since that trade agreement came into effect. Some 49 food processing plants in Ontario were closed, 83 across Canada, and thousands upon thousands of jobs were lost, jobs that have moved south of the border and now may even move farther south.

It is evident that the government has not been master of its own timetable. Canada has responded to an accelerated agenda largely set by Mexico and the United States. This has contributed to a situation where the government has not only failed to consult the Canadian people and the Official Opposition but has also failed to provide a clear and thorough analysis of the conditions that Canada has placed on its participation, what substantive goals it seeks, and how it proposes to reach those goals.

When this government plays to the corporate agenda it makes a mockery out of this parliamentary system and of the democratic process itself.

There are several areas that I am deeply concerned about as associate critic for trade and associate critic for agriculture. Our premise is that the free trade agreement really ignores the reality of the agricultural geography of North America. Our contention is that with respect to agriculture the free trade agreement is fatally flawed. The reality of Canadian and U.S. agriculture is such that a level playing field is an impossibility. Mother nature dictates that. Furthermore, it is an attempt to impose a model solution that will ultimately undermine the vitality of our industry in Canada.

There are three basic contradictions in the assumptions of the free trade agreement. The first contradiction applies to a more open and secure export market. Canadian agriculture is based on an inherently inferior physical base which plays the major role in reducing over-all productivity by as much as 50 per cent compared to the U.S.

The second is in respect to the protection of domestic production under supply management. While it is true these arrangements are presently sanctioned under article XI(c) of the GATT, they are clearly trade distorting in the bilateral context of the free trade agreement. It is the free trade agreement that is putting pressure on the GATT. If in fact article XI(2)(c) is not maintained, enhanced and clearly spelled out, this will lead to the demise of the poultry and dairy sector in Canada.

Considered together these lead to the conclusion that the free trade agreement will amplify the inherent distinction between the two systems and tend to erode the evolved ones such that Canadian agriculture may not only be less discrete but may decline to become merely the extensive margins of a North American system.

In Canada, 2 per cent of our crop land falls in the highest thermal category versus 81 per cent in the United States. Some 24 per cent of our crop land falls into the adequate moisture category versus 57 per cent in the United States. I submit this translates into a startling situation whereby the United States alone has 130 times the crop land in optimal agroclimatic conditions than Canada has.

Now the government adds a new dimension that allows for us to compete against a nation that does not have the same standard as we do. DDT is still used in Mexico. It has been banned in Canada for many years. There are many other chemicals, pesticides and herbicides we are not allowed to use here in Canada. When they are banned in Canada it means that we have a zero tolerance level. Is it the same for our imported foods? I suggest not. Our regulations indicate that we have minimum levels of standards that allow products into this country produced under conditions entirely different from what we have in Canada.

We had to read about this agreement in The Toronto Star this morning. I had a sneak preview last week in a small newspaper out of Michigan headlined "The opposition to Mexican free trade grows". It spells it out very clearly. Of course The Toronto Star this morning told Canadian people exactly what was happening. It is very evident when I mention the number of food processing plants that closed in Canada.

I want to just go on a little further. The relocation of U.S. food processors in Mexico always disrupts the lives of American workers. Many Americans who have worked in the food industry have lost their jobs and have received no compensation or retraining.

I want to quote a statement by the president of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Easter. He said:

> Consumer prices, however, will remain at constant high levels even though the quality of food will erode as more chemicals are used. The corporations are going to Mexico because they can make higher profits there.

I am appalled at the lack of environmental safeguards in the agreement. It makes a mockery out of the green plan. Why do negotiators not demand that both the United States and Mexico measure up to our standards in terms of automotive emissions, the use of pesticides, herbicides and chemicals that I referred to a moment ago?

Today the Government of Canada has no loyalty to the Canadian people; only to the transnational corporate interests. Rather than leading by example and purchasing Canadian products, we were appalled just recently about the purchase of Canadian needs in the U.S., particularly the order for U.S. built locomotives for a Crown corporation in Canada, Canadian National.

I am also appalled that the purchase of carpet for one of the buildings of this institution was made through a U.S. firm.

When the government talks about Canadian standards and talks about the advantages of buying Canadian, I suggest that it should lead the way. It should show the example. It should maintain our standards here in Canada. If we are going to have free trade with Mexico, let it come up to our standards. Let it bring its wages up to our standards and let it bring its standard of living up to what we have here in Canada for the benefit of all of North America.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in hearing the hon. member speak about how the agricultural and agrifood area will be affected by the North American free trade agreement and, to some extent, how it has already been affected by the free trade agreement.

I was particularly interested in his comments about the food processing industry. It is in that area I would like to direct my question to him. The area that I represent, Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, is a producer of fresh fruits and vegetables. It is also an infant grape growing and wine making area.

Given his comments on what he has been able to read about the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement, I wonder whether in fact he sees the death of our agricultural industry with respect to soft fruits, grapes and vegetables and whether in fact there is any hope in the future for the food processing industry which has already taken major body blows and is down now at eight count and may well be there for the full ten count. I wonder if he might comment and give his view of that under today's tripartite negotiations.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question because I indicated in my address that 83 food processing plants have closed in Canada since January 1989 when free trade came in.

In Ontario where a lot of the soft fruit is grown, as well as in British Columbia, 49 food processing plants have closed and 5,635 jobs were lost. Many of these are gone forever. When this government came into power one of the first things it did was to go through a process it called standardization of regulations. In some cases it meant that the regulations we had in Canada in the food sector, which were among the most stringent in the world, were watered down to compare to that of our neighbours to the south.

I mentioned the fact that many of the pesticides, herbicides and chemicals currently used in other countries are not allowed in Canada. This will have a dramatic impact on our whole system as grade standards and so on are brought down.

I noticed that even the labour rates in the U.S. that are being paid to workers in the orchards and the fruit and vegetables business are very low compared to those in Canada. The writing is on the wall unless we as Canadians step in and insist that our industry be protected and our standards be upheld.

In Mexico the minimum wage rate has dropped by almost 60 cents an hour in the last 10 years. The minimum wage rate is now 59 cents per hour. In the Maquiladora area the rate dropped from $1.36 in 1980 to 99 cents an hour in 1989. In the manufacturing sector there was another massive drop. Those rates are going the wrong way. If we were bringing those workers up to Canadian standards we would not have any fear. But for Canada to enter into an agreement such as we have, an agreement that will undermine the viability of our industry in Canada, I believe it is time that we as Canadians made sure that food production and food processing be made a national security item in Canada.

In 1935 the U.S. Food Security Act was brought in for this very purpose. It was was to protect American workers and their food production sector. We need the same thing in Canada. I think it is high time we got on with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before debate is resumed, the Chair wishes to announce that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops is in order. Resuming debate on the amendment. The hon. member for York West, for 10 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise for my allotted 10 minutes to speak to the motion put by my colleague and neighbour, the member of Parliament for Etobicoke North. I commend him for suggesting:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

I commend the member for Etobicoke North because the debate this morning on the floor of the House of Commons to be viewed by Canadians on all three coasts could not have been better timed. As this debate has already pointed out, we had to rely this morning on The Toronto Star, as have Canadians, to try to learn what the Government of Canada has been dealing with in terms of the other two countries, namely the United States and Mexico, with respect to a North American free trade agreement.

With all due respect, it is a shame that we have to rely on one of our newspapers to begin to enlighten not only Canadians but elected Canadians who are supposed to deal with issues on behalf of the 26 million shareholders of this company called Canada.

The question ought to be: Why is the House of Commons not seized of the issue? Why is the House of Commons not debating the parameters of what it is that Canada should be pushing for or what Canada should not be encouraging? Why is the House of Commons on behalf of Canadians from coast to coast to coast not giving the green light or the red light to this government? What is democracy all about if we talk about it, preach it and the Prime Minister exports it to the Third World countries? He makes great speeches abroad about the ability of people to exercise their democratic franchise. Yet back home, on an issue that is fundamental to the livelihoods of all Canadians, there is silence and ignorance. When there is silence and ignorance, whether it is true or not, there is certain to be fear of the unknown at the very least.

What is the reality today with the existing free trade agreement? There is fear and consternation because we are seeing job losses every day. We are experiencing plant closures. We are witnessing movement of goods, capital and factories southward from our border. We are also witnessing no transition programs.

Do you remember the Prime Minister during that 1988 campaign, which was largely a single issue campaign, saying: "At the very worst, Canadians, there will be people displaced by this free trade agreement. There are bound to be transitional difficulties". But for those difficulties he said: "This government will have the best transitional programs in the western world". Ask a 55 year old worker in your riding or mine who has been put on the unemployment or welfare line because the free trade agreement has dramatically altered his lifestyle by closing a factory. Where are those transition programs for that 50 year old worker?

Those programs are called unemployment insurance. After you have exhausted unemployment insurance it is called welfare. After welfare it is good luck. Those are the transition programs this government has put in place since the free trade agreement.

Canadians are asking themselves where the rewards of the free trade agreement are. Where are the rewards this Prime Minister supported, by third person advertisements in the name of these great multinational corporations? The Business Council on National Issues sent letters to employees saying that if they did not get behind the free trade agreement, their jobs would be in peril. Canadians have a right to know where those rewards are today as a result of the free trade agreement. Are there more rewards or more problems as a result of that free trade agreement?

That is the context of the current reality. Add to that Investment Canada, which basically means it is wide open for foreign investment. This party has never been against foreign investment, but the definition of foreign investment to the Tories equates foreign investment with foreign take-overs and we feel that is wrong.

Our foreign policy no longer seems to be a Canadian one. It is tied more to the orbit of the United States, as friendly and as good neighbours as they may be. We have airlines looking to the south and perhaps a government decision upping the percentage of foreign investment.

Canadians are not only worried about losing their immediate jobs; the country is aggravated by the free trade agreement. There is fear we are losing the ability to control our own future and our own destiny. The decision-making power seems to be flowing away from us with each and every decision this government makes.

Now we are supposed to blindly give a free ride, a blank cheque to this government to negotiate a North American free trade agreement. Can you imagine? Without any information and with the results clear as day on the free trade agreement, Canadians can only respond with a certain amount of genuine fear for themselves and their nation. The Toronto Star tells us today it is no minor tinkering. The document that was leaked, in terms of the working document Canada is working on, talks about no restrictions on importing goods that were processed in Mexico.

Think about that. If unemployment lines are now stretching, what is it going to mean if Mexicans will be able to export to our country, without any hindrance, when their labour rates are 59 cents an hour?

Government members talk about harmonizing truck, rail and bus transport, but our rail system has been gutted already. Our truckers have been virtually thrown off the road after they have been deregulated because they cannot compete with the Americans. Yet shipping, where we can compete the best, is oddly enough not part of that. The trade agreement only covers areas where we cannot compete.

Telecommunications is going to be opened up. The textile industry is going to be opened up. There may be a complete ban on compulsory licensing, which has permitted generic drug firms in Canada to survive and prosper and keep the cost of prescription drugs at a reasonable rate for Canadians. That will be impossible.

They also talk about a dispute mechanism in the North American free trade context similar to the bilateral one which is not working. They expect Canadians to be silent. Are Canadians not supposed to ask this government when it was given the green light to move on these things? What about involving the average citizen, the average Joe, who does give a damn about this country and his or her place in it?

Our party is not as dogmatic as our friends to the left here. This country is a trading country. The Liberal Party has always been a freer trade party. If there has been any history of building walls, it is the party that sits on the government side that has done it. We reserved the right in the last election and we reserve the right again in the next election to say that a deal at any cost is not a deal worth signing. Therefore we bring principles to what should be in or out of a trade agreement. We believe we should be at the table, otherwise who will be protecting and advancing our interests? We believe we should be righting the wrong and using this NAFTA as a way to right the wrong of the FTA.

Canadians must be part of the equation. They cannot be told at the end this is good for them. Canadians must decide for themselves, in conjunction with their Parliament, what is good for themselves, their children and the future of their country.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, thank you for letting me intervene in this debate by making a comment and asking a question of my colleague. I was very much interested in the content of the words he delivered and the passion with which he spoke.

As my colleague already knows, we in the Niagara Peninsula and specifically in the Welland—St. Catharines and Thorold riding have been devastated by this free trade. First our grape growers were virtually wiped out, and the member for Lambton—Middlesex made reference to this in his talk before. In the last week we have had 3,000 layoffs and that is directly attributable, in my opinion, to the free trade deal with the United States. These layoffs were from General Motors in St. Catharines.

We are now trying to regroup in our area and do something for the men and women who were laid off, but if we persist in going ahead with this free trade deal with Mexico, it will prove to be as much of a debacle as the free trade deal is and was with the United States.

The hon. member has mentioned the ordinary citizens of Canada should have some say in this. In my opinion they were coerced in the last election. They were frightened into voting for this government and for a free trade deal. Upon reflection, they know, as we know, this has not been a good deal for our country.

I put the question to the hon. member, my colleague. In your view, will the Mexican free trade deal help or hinder the auto trade in Canada? Will the Mexican free trade deal, like the American free trade deal we have, help or hinder our farmers in this country?

Could he address himself to those two groups?

Mr. Marchi: I would like to thank my hon. friend and colleague for his comment and question.

If the free trade agreement is the benchmark by which this government will conduct itself at the table for NAFTA, we should not only worry about the auto and the agricultural industry, we should worry in general. Since the trade agreement with the United States has been consummated, every poll has pointed to the great dissatisfaction of Canadians, and of the many constituencies that have been affected.

It should be a strong signal to this government that if Canadians do not believe or have confidence in the trade agreement that was negotiated, it should be incumbent on the government to right that wrong by taking Canadians into its confidence.

Can you imagine a country like Canada having energy not only on the table but in the free trade agreement when a country like Mexico at least had the vision and courage to tell the Americans, even before coming to the table, that energy is not up for discussion? That is to say at least they have delineated a point of no return. They drew their line in the sand.

I am not sure what our Prime Minister's line in the sand is, because quite often he governs as if he thinks he owns this country; as if it is a private commodity up for discussion. It should be brought home to him that he does not own this country. This is not his country to play with. This is not his country to experiment with. This is a country he happens to be guiding on a temporary basis, on behalf of Canadians and in their best interests. He owns nothing. But he owes it to Canadians to deal with the NAFTA deal better than he did the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement. He and the government he leads must learn from their mistakes.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate today.

I would like to commend the hon. member for Etobicoke North for introducing this motion today and providing the House with the opportunity to have this debate. I have a high regard for the hon. member. I have read many of his articles and have heard him speak. It is too bad his party does not listen to him once in a while.

The debate today is about the question of Canada's trade negotiations with Mexico, but we should also recognize we are involved in trade negotiations with virtually every country in the world, on a bilateral basis as well as through the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs, the current Uruguay round.

These negotiations have enormous implications for all Canadians. It is good to have a day like today where we can express our views and put some comments and facts on the record so Canadians will have an improved knowledge of just what it is the government is trying to do.

I would just like to offer a quote from the C. D. Howe Institute. It said the following with regard to why Canada should participate in these Mexican—United States—Canada trade talks: "By participating, Canada may gain greater opportunities to trade with a newly outward-looking 85 millions strong market. By standing aloof, Canada risks losing growing Mexican trade to U.S. based companies and losing investment to the United States because only U.S. based firms would have tariff free access to all three markets. If Canada is to be constructively involved in negotiations, it is important that Canada be involved from the beginning".

We are involved from the beginning. We are involved because we want to increase Canada's trade with not only the United States but Mexico and the rest of the world. Canada is the world's second most dependent nation on trade, second only to west Germany.

As a trading nation we must be constantly vigilant, looking for new opportunities. We always have to be looking for new opportunities because there is a continuing, if I can use this word, attrition of old opportunities because the world is a changing place.

When we think about trade, opportunities and even lost plants, and we had a lot of discussion this morning about plant closures and how that affects people, the fact of the matter is plant closures do affect people, unfortunately usually in a negative way because at least for a period of time they will be out of a job until there is some other opportunity at some other new plant.

Plant closures have been a fact of life ever since we have had plants, ever since the industrial revolution in the 1700s. The reason we have plant closures is because over time products become obsolete as new and better ones come into the marketplace.

We do not have too much of a buggy whip manufacturing industry these days or an anvil industry or industries that generally support the horse and carriage largely because something new came along called the automobile.

The fact of the matter is those people who were manufacturers of carriages probably had to find new lines of work and new jobs. What we have to recognize as a government and as a country is that the environment needs to be such that new opportunities can be taken advantage of. We allow new plants, new products, new technologies and take the benefit of them rather than trying to hold on to obsolete products and obsolete plants.

The world is better off with these new technologies. These new technologies are often superior goods and services. They also allow fewer people to produce the same volume of goods and services. Who would want to go back to the days of the pick and shovel in constructing roads? I do not think anyone would. That large machinery and equipment that we use in road construction, forestry, mining and all our industries means that we get the same production or more production from a fewer number of people. What that means is that for a time certain people are displaced from their jobs.

If we create the new opportunities, take advantage of the new technologies that are available, we can find new jobs for those people that are both more productive and more rewarding at the same time and probably with a greater wage or greater standard of living than we have had in the past. That has been the story of the world for close to 300 years now and there is no real reason to think it should change.

Fighting change, as the NDP would propose through its motion here today, is simply counter-productive.

I would like to speak briefly about some of the opportunities that are available through trade with Mexico if we can negotiate a proper agreement. The president of the World Bank described Mexico's own economic reforms going on there as: "One of the most ambitious, courageous and determined programs of economic reform and institutional change recently undertaken by any country".

In 1988 Northern Telecom's telephone equipment sales to Mexico were worth $4 million. In 1989 sales were $27 million. Sales for 1990 were estimated at over $60 million, and anticipated 1991 for over $100 million and 1992 probably even greater. Mexico has only 6 million telephone lines to serve a population of 85 million. In the next 10 years over $10 billion will be spent on telephone equipment.

Canadians just happen to be the most prolific users of telephones in the world, which probably has something to do with our climate. We therefore have become good at developing telephone systems which we can sell throughout the rest of the world.

A Mexican company has awarded Spar Aerospace a $16 million contract for communications systems used in earth stations and satellite dishes. Air transport equipment sales are expanding rapidly. We have already sold Challenger jet aircraft. Additional sales are anticipated in the future. Mexico City plans to spend about $100 million on public transportation. Canadian companies stand a good chance of participating in this equipment purchase and in getting contracts. Mexico must feed more than 85 million people. Canadian exports of dairy breeding cattle are rising and Canadian farmers anticipate further sales of other dairy and grain products.

All of these are new opportunities. They are opportunities to replace certain plants or certain other economic activities that are becoming obsolete in Canada with new and growing and exciting opportunities.

That is what the government is attempting to do in negotiating this deal. We recognize that over time certain plants and processes become obsolete. New technology to allow us to develop pulp and paper, for example, has allowed northern Alberta to become one of the growth areas in pulp manufacturing in Canada.

Its new technologies have now made it possible to harvest a resource that heretofore had simply been regarded as wasteland. What that does is enable us to bring on this new technology, probably the most pollution efficient plants in the world, or at least in Canada. This means, however, that in order to meet those standards other plants in Canada are going to have to adjust, adapt, and themselves invest in new technology to meet those very strict standards that we are trying to bring into Canada with regard to the environment.

As we know, all Canadians consider the environment to be important. They want those standards, but only through technology can we meet those standards and keep our environment safe.

Some people have said that in Mexico they do not have nearly the same environmental standards and Mexico will become a pollution haven. I would like to address that. First of all, I would like to inform members of the House, in case they are unaware, that the environment is a national priority for Mexico. The government has increased eight-fold its spending on the environment in the last decade and would like to spend more. As we all know, it can only spend more if it has more. It will only have more if it can earn more. One of the ways it can earn more is through increased economic opportunities and trading opportunities.

When we look at Third World countries we all say that we would like them to become self-sufficient on their own or at least be able to become less dependent on foreign aid and be able to bring their standards in regard to pollution and the environment up to something more equivalent to ours. We then turn around and deny them an opportunity by keeping trade barriers on products that they can produce and sell in our markets. Sure we are attempting to protect our own jobs, but at the same time we are denying them opportunities. We are denying them opportunities to increase their incomes which would then allow them to increase their imports of products that we can provide for them.

It is not productive for us to restrict trade. In fact, it is productive for us to open up trade because with this new income that they have, they will be able to buy more goods and services from us and give us new opportunities for more technologically advanced industries to produce the products and goods and services that they need.

Earlier on the Minister of Forestry spoke. He addressed the question of wages and the fact that some people have said that the wage cost in Mexico is lower than it is in Canada by a substantial amount. That is true, but that is not any reason to try to restrict trade.

Wages generally represent a relatively small part of the total cost of production, on average between 12 per cent and 15 per cent of the cost of production of goods. Less than 2 per cent of the goods Canada buys abroad comes from Mexico in spite of Mexico's lower wages.

Wages are not the only component that goes into the manufacture or product and therefore not the only component that goes into the eventual price. It can be a factor. However, one is presuming when we compare the relatively higher wages in Canada to those in Mexico that those wages are going to stay where they are.

I would suggest that the exact reverse is what will happen and is what we want to happen. We want those people to become involved in the production of goods and services that they can export to the rest of the world. That will allow them to have increased wages for their workers, an increased standard of living, to provide the kinds of money that are necessary to increase their transportation systems, to address economic priorities and social programs which are so badly needed in a country like Mexico and to bring up their environmental standards closer to the industrialized world.

What we are saying is that by allowing them increased opportunities for trade, not only are they going to be able to increase their own economic development, their own standard of living, but through that increased income that they are going to have, they will be able to offer new trading opportunities for Canadians because we still will have the goods and services that they will require.

It sounds as though we should try to determine where those opportunities might be and how we can take advantage of them so that we can ensure in Canada that we are not somehow restricting our own companies, our own private sector, from taking full advantage of trade with Mexico or for that matter with the rest of the world.

I think that some of the initiatives that have been taken so far are helpful in that direction. I think the government has been trying to use the private sector through information seminars. I will not list here all the things that go on through documents that are produced by the government outlining potential trade opportunities throughout the world. It organizes trade missions such as we have seen.

Recently, we saw a trade mission, led by the Minister for International Trade, to Japan. It opens up new opportunities and contacts for Canadian businessmen. I think these are the kinds of things through which the government can play a constructive role.

I would think that we would want to see increased trade delegations to Mexico to increase the opportunity for Canadians to go on these trade missions, to develop new contacts with industries in Mexico and to allow trade opportunities to be developed.

One of the problems we have in Canada, being a relatively small country compared to the United States, Japan or Germany and having somewhat smaller businesses if you like, is it is not always completely economic or at least affordable for a smaller company to go on its own trade mission to Japan or to Mexico, to finance itself and to try to find the contacts even though the markets may be there.

One of the things that the government really can do to be helpful to business is to provide these opportunities, to lead the way and to lead delegations that can meet their counterparts or the people in these other countries. After that initial contact, most Canadian businesses are resourceful enough to further develop those contacts and put them into a form of trade, either importing or exporting, that benefits Canadians through the acquisition of new products that we can use.

They can be economic products, less costly products if you like for consumers but those contacts can allow us to find new markets for our own products that we can sell to produce income and jobs for Canadians.

Trade has been shown over the last 300 years, ever since the industrial revolution, to be something that benefits all economies. Talking about maintaining barriers and restricting trade is simply an attempt to take us back 300 years. Frankly, it seems to me that members of the House here should be addressing how we can develop those opportunities and use Canadian expertise and technology which we know we have.

We know we are capable of producing goods and services that are as good as any other in the world. We can develop and use that to trade with the world, and not look for ways to impinge trade or maintain trade restrictions.

I want to thank the hon. member for Etobicoke North for proposing this motion today and for selecting this topic for debate because it is an important one. It is one that everyone knows during the last election involved considerable discussion. Probably the next one will too. I think it is healthy that the House had this opportunity today. I thank him for that opportunity.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wish it was all as simple as the member for Edmonton Northwest tells us it is.

You may not know and I believe it is the case that the member has also called for reducing the unemployment payments to the 12 per cent of Edmontonians who are now unemployed. He has called, I gather, publicly for eliminating the corporation tax as well.

In short, I do not think he really understands the problems that go on with most families that live in his constituency or in mine. In a questionnaire that I sent out last summer to all constituents, of those who replied, about 60 per cent were opposed to a free trade agreement with Canada, Mexico and the United States. About 30 per cent were sympathetic or in favour and 10 per cent were undecided.

In view of the present state of the Canadian economy which many people think has been exacerbated by the workings of a very badly negotiated free trade agreement with the United States, I wonder if the member will tell us whether he thinks his government has the intelligence, the will or the knowledge to negotiate a good agreement now with Mexico. It has been so secretive about it that we have to read in one of the newspapers this morning as to what it is likely to have in it.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to respond to both of those points.

The first one was with regard to unemployment insurance. What he says is essentially correct. Unemployment insurance has become perhaps the single largest expenditure of the federal government these days. It is in the range of $20 billion.

Following the premiers' conference on the economy which was held recently, the premier of Ontario called for spending on infrastructure and public works, one of the premiers called for increased training for workers and some premiers called for other things such as reduction in taxes.

I suggested that what we should really be doing is rather than spending $20 billion a year on unproductivity, that is not working, we should perhaps try to use about one-quarter of that to see if we could not put it into some of those things the premiers had suggested. I even outlined in my remarks what we might direct it at.

I suggested to get some of these projects going, we would direct one-third toward public works or capital works as the premier of Ontario was suggesting. That could be matched by the provincial and municipal governments.

I suggested we put one-third into employee training. It seemed to me employee training was far more sensible than employees waiting around for jobs that are not there. I suggested at the time some job creation initiatives as well as some employee retraining would be a more productive use of unemployment insurance payouts.

With regard to the question of whether or not we can negotiate a deal with Mexico given the record of the deal with the United States, I think that this just shows we can get a pretty good deal. I would like to remind the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast that prior to the last election he was having some concerns as to which party he was going to represent.

In making his announcement that he was going to run as a Conservative candidate, he stated that the reason he was going to do so was that he felt the free trade agreement with the United States, on which the election was based, was so important for his constituents and for western Canada that he would support the Conservative Party to ensure that the free trade agreement was supported and would come into place.

It is a little strange now that he would question whether or not based on our record we have the skill to negotiate an agreement with Mexico when, during the last election, he campaigned vigorously suggesting that this agreement was a very important agreement for Canada.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the member has not read my book Inside Outer Canada, but if he would be good enough to read it he would see why I changed my mind on the free trade agreement, as many Canadians in his constituency and mine have also done. The fine print and the practice has turned out to be very different from what many of us were lead in good faith to believe would be the case before the election.

I would ask the member to indicate whether he thinks the free trade agreement with the United States has turned out as well as he was hoping. Again, I would simply put on the record the fact that he is correct that I did feel it would be in the interests of Canada as a whole, and Edmonton in particular, but since then thousands and thousands of jobs have been lost across the country.

I am not saying that free trade was the only cause, but certainly many Canadians in the hon. member's constituency and mine believe that a badly administered and a weak-wristed implementation of the free trade agreement has caused this country's economy to suffer enormously because of it.

We all have the right to change our minds on the basis of new facts learned or new things seen.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I will say yes, we all have the right to change our minds on the basis of new facts and information. I do that quite often. Frankly, that is the reason we have public hearings, committee hearings and things like that, to get the new information which sometimes turns out to be different from what we thought.

If we were not prepared from time to time to change our minds, there would be no point in holding these hearings and discussions and we would not be serving our own constituents or the Parliament of Canada and the Canadian people very well.

• (1240)

As to the question of whether the free trade agreement has turned out as well as one would hope, the answer is that we know we have had a recession in Canada. We also know that recessions come along from time to time. As far as I know, for the last 500 years we have had recessions. The business cycle is somewhat unpredictable. Therefore, the recession has made it difficult for a number of companies to adjust and in some cases it may have been aggravated by the free trade agreement.

We also knew going into the free trade agreement that there would be substantial changes taking place in the economy, both job losses and job gains. I would say to the hon. member that in my opinion we have had more job gains than job losses. I know that has been true in my province of Alberta. We have had more job gains than job losses.

Yes, I think it has been a good deal on balance and it will be an even better deal once the economy of the United States starts to grow again. They have also been through a recession and once new opportunities for increased exports come about, the free trade agreement will be seen as a great deal and a much improved situation.

I would just like to end by saying one more thing. He said that after the election he determined that some of the things in the fine print were maybe a little different than what he had thought.

It seems to me for somebody who is going to be campaigning it is an admission that he did not bother to read the fine print. Maybe everybody does not have to read the fine print, but people who are campaigning on a substantive issue in a serious way should try and do the best they can to inform themselves of the facts. The fine print was there, it was available and the agreement was all out there.

I am not sure that I would want to say: "Look, I have to change my mind because I did not bother to read it". It seems to me that the Minister for International Trade got into some difficulty just because he said something similar and the opposition was quick to jump on it.

I am not sure that should be taken as an excuse. However, I do acknowledge that from time to time we should be prepared to change our minds. That is why we are here, to gain information and to do the best job we can for the country.

I believe the free trade agreement with the United States will prove to be an agreement that no one is going to want to tear up in the future.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, there were allegations a little bit earlier from one of the members from British Columbia that the child labour laws were going to be broken by this new free trade deal. I am in favour of having laws which protect our younger people from going to work at too early an age.

My question is very specific and it is direct. If there is no protection for children in this free trade deal, would the member who has just spoken be prepared to go ahead and sign this deal anyway?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, the member raises a very good question. I must say that I have very little knowledge of the question of child labour laws in Mexico. I would agree with him that we should have laws to protect children from exploitation. We should encourage all other countries in the world to do the same thing.

I would just like to point out one thing, however. In poor countries one of the reasons children are exploited or have to work is because in poor countries there is not enough income within the total economy and within the family for the family to survive. As a result, people often go to work at a very early age rather than getting an education and training which would further them as persons.

Through this agreement we are trying to provide opportunities for increases in employment and opportunity, in economic development, in increased wages for the Mexican people in the hopes that they will have an increased standard of living and will be able to deal with some of their social problems.

This agreement would probably help to alleviate some of the conditions the hon. member has suggested exist there and which I take at face value.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the motion currently before the House which has been introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Etobicoke North could not be more timely nor could it be more relevant. It comes at a time when Canadians are deeply concerned about a great many matters affecting us all. It comes at a time of uncertainty and uncertainty is the greatest enemy that we face in this country.

By uncertainty, I am speaking of economic and constitutional uncertainty and of the uncertainty Canadians have now with regard to their government and some of their most sacred institutions. Canadians wonder whether those truths, which were once held to be self-evident, are being abandoned in the name of such ill-defined terms as globalism and rationalization.

Canadians are not afraid of change. However, the question that we must grapple with is how best to prepare Canadians for change. Some would argue that this should be the government's top priority and that brings us to the motion that is before the House.

To many Canadians, the North American free trade agreement is a frightening prospect, not because Canadians are afraid of competing with the United States or Mexico or anyone for that matter, but rather because Canadians have seen firsthand what the U.S. free trade agreement has done to our economy and to our national psyche.

Canadians have developed a very deep mistrust of this government. They remember the 1988 election when they were asked to decide on the basis of the then proposed Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and to choose between two diametrically opposed positions.

In many cases, the debate which followed was conducted with neither honesty nor forthrightness. Rather, it became emotional, in some cases irrational, with accusations and innuendoes being hurled around about people's motivations and their integrity and financed by a third-party campaign which raised serious doubts about the fundamental basis of our democracy.

Since that election, the promises of the government about the successes in our economy which would ensue as a result of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement have not coincided with the experience of Canadians.

Canadians have seen time and time again and have read in their newspapers that Canadian companies are closing down and moving to the United States. Although the government has repeatedly tried to argue that these job losses, these plant closings were not related to the free trade agreement, they were related to something else, it has not assuaged the concerns of Canadians, particularly those who found themselves unemployed with no chance of re-employment.

Canadians have also seen the United States not respect the terms which purportedly they had negotiated in the free trade agreement. We have seen it recently with softwood lumber; we have seen it even more recently with the Honda decision.

Canadians are now once again seeing a familiar pattern emerge with the North American free trade agreement. They see a government that is unwilling to divulge its agenda with regard to its negotiations with the United States and Mexico. When Canadians attempt to learn their government's priorities with respect to these negotiations they are stymied. They are told that these negotiations are too sensitive for public discussion or for public scrutiny.

The result is nagging doubts about whose interests this government truly represents.

Canadians are thus held as captive audiences, forbidden to see what is unfolding on the stage until the principal actors deem it appropriate. Canadians must follow the process as best they can through politically coded messages coming from the Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister. They are left to wonder and to worry.

Or worse, Canadians find out what is happening through press leaks or through reports coming from agreements being made available to legislatures in the United States or in Mexico, not through the forthright expression of a government willing to come clean about what interests it is pursuing in these talks and what the government's bottom line is and what it is negotiating for and on behalf of Canadians.

What can this government do to address this uncertainty which has shaken the confidence of Canadians so dramatically in recent months? Here I would refer to the motion that is before this House. I would argue that this government should be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade talks. Those are the words of the motion that is before this House today. It is an expression of the absolute failure of this government with respect to these negotiations.

Surely this government can do this much to restore the faith of Canadians in their system of government by coming clean with their elected representatives and by telling the Canadian people through the Parliament of Canada what it is negotiating on behalf of Canadians and keeping Canadians informed every step of the way. That is the exact opposite of what this government has practised since the North American free trade negotiations were initially disclosed and discussed more than one year ago.

The government must begin to address those concerns which Canadians have about their own lives, those of their families and how this deal might impact on them. For instance, in this morning's Toronto Star it is reported that where the new North American free trade agreement is concerned, "there appears to be no specific protection provided in critical areas of the environment, health and safety standards and workers' rights".

Does this mean that Canadian workers will be competing against Mexican workers in the Maquiladora region who earn less than one dollar an hour and live as virtual economic slaves? Is this whom we will be competing against? Is this what Canadian workers will be faced with? It seems to be no longer a question of "if". There are already Canadian companies in Mexico taking advantage of these virtual slave labour conditions. Is this what rationalization means? Is this competitiveness?

Surely this government can indicate to Canadians today whether these standards will be tolerated in a North American free trade agreement. The answer should be self-evident. Yet, this government remains strangely silent. What exactly is going on with these negotiations?

On the environment, can our government not say that there will be no deal unless we receive commitments of environmental protective standards not only from the Mexicans but from the Americans as well? Surely this government can do no less.

What about agriculture? If I read the bracketed text of the North American free trade agreement, in agriculture it proposes that the agreement will call for allowing the Mexican government to subsidize the exporting of the production from these factory farms purchased by investors from Europe, Japan, the United States or any other country, land owned by small farmers in Mexico. The agreement will allow the Mexican government to subsidize the exporting of the production of these lands into the U.S. and into Canada. Effectively, this means that family farmers in these three countries would be seriously harmed under the terms that are in this proposed text.

Is this the text that the Canadian government is about ready to sign with the United States and with Mexico? At the same time, as they are preparing to negotiate, all the while protesting their fidelity to article XI of the GATT, they are preparing to say that Canadian supply management programs are effectively about to be abandoned to this Uruguay round.

In any case, the very least the government can do is let the people know that our interests, our standards of living will not be abandoned in the name of competitiveness and rationalization.

We are not scared to be competitive but we want to know that this government is on our side.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with both interest and admiration to my distinguished friend who has developed some of the considerations involved in this debate with his usual skill and insight.

At the risk of some mild caricature, we have heard today one party, the government party, advance the proposition that everything is fine: "Trust us, the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement is a flawless agreement and equally the North American free trade agreement will bring immense benefit to Canadians". On the other end of the spectrum we have heard our colleagues from the New Democratic Party embrace their usual protectionist stance, looking for some sort of fortress Canada which does not actively seek export markets or engage in the challenges of globalism in both trade and investment.

Somewhere between those two extreme poles the member who has just spoken has developed a position which is worthy of some further discussion. I would seek his comment particularly on how this government has failed to act on providing the assistance to Canadians to accept the challenge of freer trade and to benefit from the reduction and removal of trade barriers around the world. I would ask him whether he sees a need for active government involvement in providing the assistance to Canadians so that they can make a reality of a global trading environment.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my distinguished colleague for his question and to compliment him on the contribution that he has made to defining a middle ground and a middle road for Canada in the pursuit of a trade policy.

Key to this middle road is active government intervention in order to enable Canadian firms and Canadians generally to be competitive on a global stage. We accept the phenomenon of the globalization of economic activity, but we are saying in this party that the federal government has a key role to play and an active role to play, for example, making sure that Canadians are trained and educated to meet the global challenge, that Canadians are not protected necessarily in the means of preventing them from adjusting, but that adjustment measures are in place to enable Canadians to transfer from occupations that become redundant as a result of moving toward more globalized trade and into activities that Canada may be able to benefit from.

Strangely enough the government promised with the free trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. that there would be generous adjustment mechanisms. We have not seen that. As a result, Canadians have found themselves without the proper training and without the proper adjustment assistance as we have paid the price, certainly in the first three years of massive adjustment, combined with a recession which has resulted in Canadians questioning whether or not this government is on its side in terms of preparing Canada for the economy of the future and I suppose contributing to general fears and protectionist sentiments which are growing around the world.

If the government is prepared to embark Canada on a more globalized trading footing, it has to take a responsibility to ensure that Canadians are ready to meet the challenges that lie ahead. That at the same time means that we are not, as the New Democratic Party is so quick to do, turning inward and sticking our heads in the sand and denying that we cannot have agreements with other countries. Surely we can. At the same time these agreements have to recognize environmental standards that must be maintained, that Canada and other countries must work toward health and safety standards, and that our labour force has to be allowed to adjust to the new realities.

FALSE INDIAN ID CARDS

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, it has been several months since the government first became aware of the fact that an association called Amitiés autochtones hors réserve had been issuing so-called Indian ID cards. The cards, which are readily available for $30, supposedly entitle the holder to tax exemptions and other benefits related to Indian status.

What has the government done since September 1991 to prevent further proliferation of these phoney cards? What charges will be laid against the leaders of associations that have swindled Quebecers and the government? How does the government intend to recover thousands of dollars in unpaid taxes, while the real victims are the hundreds of business people who innocently broke the law because the government, whose responsibility it was to inform them, failed to do so?

The appropriate departments failed to deal with a situation that was their responsibility, not that of these businessmen or of the card holders who felt they were entitled to tax exemptions simply because one of their relatives had Indian blood.

In concluding, I would urge the government to organize an ad campaign to inform the public about the rules that apply when an Indian shows his card off the reserve. The integrity of bona fide Indians and our governments is now under a cloud, a situation that must be corrected as soon as possible. The departments have a duty to act quickly.

ALICE HOUSING

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Alice Housing in Nova Scotia provides housing and support services for women and children who have fled abusive situations. As one of the oldest of these projects, Alice Housing is understandably in need of repairs.

The co-ordinator approached CMHC for funding through the next step housing program only to be informed that second stage housing is not eligible for grants under this program. Funding cannot be used to assist existing units even if they are in danger of collapse.

As the situation now stands, the cost of repairing 17 units is equivalent to that of creating one, just one, new unit of second stage housing.

I ask that the minister reconsider his department's regulations. The loss of such a vital service would be a step backward in the struggle to eliminate violence against women and children.

LOBSTER FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, lobster fishermen on the Northumberland Strait in my riding strongly support the Department of Fisheries and Ocean's policy to increase the carapace size of lobster from 2.5 inches to 2.75 inches over a period of four years. They wish to send a very clear message to DFO that there should be no deviation from this conservation measure. In fact the fishermen from Malagash, Pugwash and Wallace established the standard themselves several years ago, as I stated in my statement in the House on April 3, 1990.

If the fishermen are prepared to set this stringent conservation standard, DFO should totally support this measure and I urge them to do so.

FAMILY PLANNING

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the New Democrat government in British Columbia has decided that women, not politicians, not hospital boards, will make decisions about the number and spacing of their children.

B.C. is funding clinics and ensuring that hospital boards cannot refuse to provide abortion services. It is providing $300,000 to support education and information on family planning. It has established a task force on access to contraception and abortion.

Sadly, some members of the Liberal, Conservative, and Bloc Quebecois do not agree. They clearly do not understand how important it is for Canadians to have the information and education they need to prevent unwanted pregnancies. These members deny women and men access to birth control information. Because of them, women will continue to need abortion services. These misguided members defeated Motion No. 44 on family planning.

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, it is now recognized throughout the world that the environment is everyone's concern and that all governments should assume their share of responsibility for it.

Here in Canada, the recent Supreme Court decision in the Oldman case reflected this state of affairs. What is even more important is to have the wisdom to realize that the environment goes beyond artificial geographic boundaries.

Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, passed last Thursday by the House of Commons, is in tune with this new planetary consciousness which tells us that we must respect our physical surroundings and live in harmony with our environment.

With this new law, we will be able to take account of the foreseeable environmental consequences of our projects and activities and to make enlightened decisions in the spirit of sustainable development, which has become a world priority.

S. O. 31

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on the first anniversary of the disastrous Exxon Valdez oil spill, it is fitting to remind ourselves of some basics. First, that the term "sustainable development" is more than just a slogan.

If governments mean what they say they have an obligation, now greater than ever, to prevent accidents, catastrophes, spills, overfishing, overcutting, over-farming, desertification, you name it, all the excesses our society has been prone to committing.

The Valdez oil spill, now a symbol with Love Canal, Bhopal, Chernobyl, reminds us that we have the capability to destroy the very foundation of our society, the environment, without resorting to nuclear arms.

While the threat of nuclear war is fading, the degradation of the environment continues. The transition to an environmentally sustainable world will not be easy, but it is the best option we have.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, March 21 was the international day for the elimination of racial discrimination. It was a day and is a day to promote racial harmony across our great nation. The theme "Together we are better" should be stressed in workplaces, communities, families, and in schools.

Though things are changing there are still many examples of discrimination occurring every day. For instance 90 per cent of placement agencies in this country are asked by clients to reject workers because of their skin colour. This is completely unacceptable.

Let us celebrate our differences while promoting equality for all. If we do not stop racism, who will?

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Cape Breton pensioners' association has requested that the Cape Breton Development Corporation release information on retirement packages that are available to management and employee personnel.

The pensioners' association wants to utilize this information to make a case for the enhancement of benefits presently paid to retired employees who were not part of management.

Officials of the Cape Breton Development Corporation told the association that they will not be given this information and they should hire a lawyer if they want to obtain it.

The corporation is not covered under access to information, so it would seem that this group will have to undertake a lengthy legal procedure in order to obtain information that should be freely available.

• (1410)

Since this is not a matter of national security, I urge the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation to instruct officials responsible for pension plans at the corporation to release this information. The workers have a right to know.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, was drafted to a large extent by Canadians themselves. They have clearly indicated that they want the federal government to change the way it conducts environmental assessments and to meet its responsibilities.

Three series of public consultations took place in the past four years. Bill C-13, adopted on third reading last week, responds directly to the needs and wishes expressed by those who came forward to give their opinions.

The new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will give every one of us the opportunity to express our opinions on federal government decisions concerning developments that could change our lives and affect our environment for good or ill, in accordance with our commitment to sustainable development.

Constitutional questions must be settled at the constitutional table and environmental issues must be dealt with by the environment ministers.

LOUIS RIEL

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has just recognized publicly Louis Riel's role as a founder of Manitoba. That is hypocritical and outrageous! The memory of Louis Riel is being used to promote constitutional reform.

Louis Riel struggled to give his people a country. He was driven out and hanged for that reason. On Saturday, March 15, I went to St. Boniface. I wanted to denounce the contemptuous attitude of the government, which uses a martyr's memory in such a low way. I am proud to belong to the same tradition as Louis Riel. I will never accept his name being used to manipulate Francophones and native people.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, earlier this month a successful career fair was held in Chilliwack.

Called "Destiny 92", it was hosted co-operatively by the Chilliwack Chamber of Commerce, the Chilliwack School District, the University College of the Fraser Valley, Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack, the Chilliwack Public Library and ECIC. This was Chilliwack's first ever career fair.

Large crowds of people of all ages attended. Many were young students while others were mature adults curious about a career change or upgrading. As well as displays by sponsors, there were displays from a variety of fields ranging from police, fire-fighting, trades, and significantly high tech and service industries. In short, if the job exists it was represented at this fair.

My encouragement goes out to those who attended to learn about career choices.

My congratulations go out to Roy McLoughlin and his committee of organizers for a job well done. Thank you Cottenwood Shopping Mall for making the space available for this important career fair.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadian gas producers have been keeping a nervous eye on the huge potential of the Mexican gas industry.

As Doig's Digest has noted: "Mexico's proved reserves, strategically located to interconnect with the Gulf Coast pipeline network linking Texas with U.S. markets, stand at 73 trillion cubic feet. In comparison, Canada has remaining marketable established gas reserves of 79 tcf, which includes 11 tcf in the Mackenzie Delta/Beaufort Sea area".

Mexico can produce in volumes, at prices, and with a proximity to markets which could place Canadian production, especially from frontier or difficult sources, at a severe disadvantage.

The government must do nothing, such as abandoning regulatory control of pipelines, that would throw our domestic market open to cheap Mexican gas. The result would be a devastation of the western and northern petroleum industry similar to that visited on Ontario manufacturing by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Hon. William Winegard, the Minister for Science, announced significant funding for the three federal granting councils.

The budgets for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Humanities Research Council and the Medical Research Council will increase by 4 per cent a year for the next four years. Funds for research and university training will thus increase by $321.5 million between 1992-93 and 1995-96. The new funds will give the councils the room they need to plan their activities and give more support to research and training.

That is very positive for the scientific research community. It is another example of our government's efforts to stimulate scientific research.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the days, months and years to come women implanted with potentially dangerous breast prostheses will come forward for help. They will ask that their implants be removed.

Dow Corning, the implant manufacturer, simply does not care what happens to Canadian women and has offered no money to help them. The federal minister of health says that the provinces should fund removal through our medicare system. But some provincial governments are unwilling to help.

In Manitoba the minister of health said that women with implants for enhancement purposes should seek removal costs from the manufacturer.

Canadian women trusted in this federal government when they assumed that the breast implants had been tested for safety prior to approval. Now they are caught in a tug of war involving the industry and federal and provincial governments.

I urge the minister of health, who guarantees the safety of these implants, to play a leadership role and assure Canadian women this government's lack of vigilance will not cost them another $3,000 when they seek to have these implants removed. Canadian women should not be made to suffer.

TEACHERS' STRIKE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, you and I know that any strike by Ottawa high school teachers is strictly a matter for the province of Ontario.

I am not taking sides in this fist-fight between the Ottawa Board of Education and its 1,000 teachers. But what worries me, what is filling the parents with doubts and fears is what should concern the federal government. What happens to those grade 12 and 13 students especially, who are caught in the middle of this dispute, just as they are on the final approach to entrance requirements for university.

If the two sides in the OBE strike hunker down for a three to four week siege, I want the minister responsible for universities to alert those institutions that highly qualified, innocent victims need some special exemptions to carry on their education.

Surely, it is up to the federal government to help these young people to go on and build the Canada we all love.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

For months we have been asking the government for progress reports on the negotiations between Canada, the United States and Mexico. Today, thanks to Action Canada, we were able to obtain documents that the government refuses to show to Canadians.

The document, which was prepared last year, contains 500 pages in which the economic future of all Canadians is hanging in the balance. Contrary to what the government told us, this document will take precedence over the agreement it signed a few years ago with the United States.

I wish the minister would tell me whether it is true this document will replace the free trade agreement we signed with the United States a few years ago.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. Leader of the Opposition and I am quite sure that he put some considerable thought into his question.

There is a debate going on today and I remind the House of the consideration of an opposition motion:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

The difficult task I have, on behalf of all of you, is to make sure that questions that are asked do not come within the wording of that motion.

I think the first question is acceptable, but I am asking hon. members to keep in mind carefully that I am bound by the rules as we all are.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first let me just put one of my hon. friend's comments in context. He said: "Where the economic future of all Canadians is hanging in the balance".

Trade with the Mexicans is about $2 billion or $2.5 billion which compares with our trade with the Americans of $256 billion, or the total size of our economy which is up in excess of $700 billion.

We should put this all in context. The specific question that my hon. friend has asked is whether a free trade agreement with Mexico would take precedence over the free trade agreement with the United States. The answer is no.

We have said on many, many occasions that if there are to be any changes to the free trade agreement with the United States that they would have to be improvements on that agreement. They would also require the agreement of both the Americans and ourselves.

My hon. friend can be assured that if there are going to be any changes to the free trade agreement with the United States, they will be very, very carefully reviewed and would only be agreed upon if they were improvements.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another question of the minister. It is related to this new development that we have today.

It is a very comprehensive document that covers a lot of the areas that were covered before. In this document, it is indicated that the government decided many months ago that this deal with Mexico will be in place by January 1, 1993. At that time, this government, which does not have much legitimacy in Canada being at 12 per cent in the polls, will be in the fifth year of its mandate.

Will the minister give a guarantee to this country that the government will not sign this deal before we have an election in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I should remind my hon. friend that his predecessor drove an election on free trade and did not do very well in it. I would talk to my hon. friend before jumping to that sort of conclusion.

Mr. Peterson: Call an election, Mike.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If it were my decision, maybe yes.

The question that my hon. friend has posed though is about the date for the coming into force of a free trade agreement including Mexico and the United States.

The date would be put in as an objective, but we have said all along that the timing for an agreement would be driven by the agreement. The agreement would not be driven by the timing.

We want to ensure that we get a good agreement. Depending on the timing of that agreement, it might come before or after an election. Who would know?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has recognized that as far as he is concerned, he would rather have an election before.

In an election before, this time this government will be judged on what it has done. Last time, it was making promises. Now we know that it has not delivered, and Canadian workers are paying a terrible price for the free trade deal.

Will the minister tell his Prime Minister that if the government trusts the Canadian people, it will go to the people first. This time, you will be out of office.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me again put things in perspective here.

An election on a free trade agreement involving 75 per cent of our trade might have been an appropriate thing as the Leader of the Opposition and his predecessor had felt it would. But to have an election that is fought on the basis of less than 1 per cent of our trade surely is a bizarre suggestion.

Is my hon. friend suggesting that other economic issues, the issue of national unity and the issue of social policy are not important, that we should be fighting an election based on 1 per cent of our trade? That is ridiculous.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the health of the Canadian automotive sector which is central to our manufacturing base has rested largely on the auto pact.

It is now clear that the United States is demanding the elimination of the auto pact in the current trade negotiations with Mexico and Canada. Why is this government negotiating a trilateral agreement which does not preserve the terms of the auto pact?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the basis of my hon. friend's question.

We have said all along that our objective in this negotiation is to preserve the auto pact. Our objective is that if there is to be any change in the terms of the auto pact, it would be replaced by something that was equal to or better than the auto pact.

My hon. friend should also be aware that the reason automotive trade is on the table is that currently there are exports by Mexico into Canada of about $1.4 billion of automotive products. It is only $100 million the other way. The reason that is so is because of the auto decrees of the Mexicans which basically result in one-way free trade. They get access to our market duty free; we do not have access to their markets. One of our key objectives in the free trade agreement with the Mexicans is to get better access to their markets.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): I see how effective the automotive provisions of the free trade agreement are in the case of Honda. The minister knows perfectly well that in the current Honda dispute, the United States is exploiting the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, and I use the Prime Minister's phrase, to harass Canadian exports. Moreover, it is no secret now that the United States is seeking higher content requirements in the current trade negotiations.

Can the minister tell the House why his government is negotiating an agreement that will make major changes to the rules of origin and content requirements for automobiles?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Honda problems and the problems with CAMI have pointed out some clear problems with the interpretation of the rules of origin.

We have chapter 18 consultations under way under the free trade agreement to try to resolve that problem. We have set an objective, as I have said in the House on a number of occasions, of clarifying the rules of origin for a North American free trade agreement so that we would avoid the problem. That means setting the rules in advance and making sure that they are clearly understood and transparent so that we would avoid the problems we have now.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, following on the answer from the Minister for International Trade, should there be an election on the Mexico trade issue, we would hope that the Liberals' position was as clear as the last time when they ran in the election.

Referring to the draft text that the Leader of the Official Opposition spoke about today, my question to the Minister for International Trade is it appears in that document that Canada is now going for a system of tariffication on its small agricultural production in terms of supply management, eggs, poultry, et cetera. This is in direct contradiction to the government's statement that it was seeking to strengthen article XI.

Which is the position of Canada: the one in the draft agreement or the one stated by the government publicly? One was secret and one is public. Which one is accurate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): First of all, let me draw some point of agreement between my hon. friend and myself.

The position of members of the Liberal Party in the last election was clear. They opposed the agreement. Right now, it is not clear and I think my hon. friend and I would agree on that. They say they would renegotiate. They do not say what they would renegotiate. If they cannot renegotiate, they do not say they know what they would do. So it is a little bit of a shell game by the Leader of the Opposition.

I wanted to respond specifically to the question of my hon. friend on agricultural objectives in the NAFTA as it related to the supply managed sector.

• (1430)

The position, as I stated in the House just a few days ago, is that we are seeking clarification and strengthening of article XI in the multilateral trade negotiations. That position is identical as far as the negotiations with the Mexicans and the Americans are concerned.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for answering the first part of my question and leaving us all in confusion about who is answering for the Liberals but, nonetheless, we will wait for that.

My second question concerns the draft NAFTA agreement. There are further threats to Canadian jobs in the generic drug industry, textiles, telecommunications, auto parts, transport and now we are looking at new threats in the energy sector.

I ask the minister this question and I have asked it before. Has the government done any impact studies on these areas that I have mentioned and, if so, is the government prepared to release those impact studies so Canadian citizens can see exactly what we are facing in this agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has raised five specific industries. I think my hon. friend is also well aware that the results of the NAFTA are not known. We do not know what the end result will be in these five areas.

I can tell my hon. friend our objectives. I would be happy to go through these one by one if my hon. friend would come to committee and ask me these questions. Then I could provide him with our specific negotiating objective, as I have been prepared to do at previous meetings, but my hon. friend has not been prepared to ask those types of questions.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I asked for the impact studies, not for conversation.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: It appears in the document that has been presented publicly as the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade draft bracketed agreement that there will be an assault on provincial sovereignty.

I want to ask the minister if he is prepared, under that agreement, to shift any of the authority of the provinces to control their own resources. Specifically I want to ask about peeler logs and chips. Is it the position of the Government of Canada that if it signs an agreement with the United States and Mexico that the provincial governments would no longer have the authority to control the export of whole logs, chips or peeler logs from their respective jurisdictions?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have two comments on my friend's question.

My friend referred to a draft bracketed text and that makes my point for me, because it is a draft text. It has the views of three countries reflected in it. It is bracketed. It means the words that are in brackets are not agreed upon. So the document that my hon. friend is referring to is a very preliminary document.

The position on matters that relate to the resource policies of the provincial governments will only be decided in full consultation with the provinces themselves. At this point there is no proposal at all to make any changes in the export of logs.

My hon. friend is well aware that we have weekly discussions with the provinces on all aspects of the agreements and it is on that basis that our policies are developed.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this report is not about scoring cheap political points at the expense of the Liberal Party. The NDP did not understand that in the last election and apparently still do not understand it.

What is at stake here is the future of Canada. I was pleased to hear the minister responsible for trade say in this House that he personally would like to see an election. Unfortunately, his document shows that his government is trying to ram this deal through before we have a chance to go to the people.

Given the minister's comments in the House today, will he make a recommendation to the Prime Minister of Canada that no deal be signed until we go to the Canadian people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend reminds me of a statement made in the 1984 election—there she goes again. Time and time again, my hon. friend stands up and distorts what I have just said about five or ten minutes ago in this House. I never said that there should be an election. I said maybe that is an idea, but I did not support it.

What I did say is let us put this into context. Why would we call an election simply on one issue, an issue that is related to 1 per cent of our trade and a good deal less than the size of our economy, when there are so many other issues.

But what I do wish to ask the hon. member, if she is so anxious to get into a debate on trade, when is the Liberal Party going to state what it would renegotiate? And if it cannot renegotiate, what is its position going to be? Are we going to have it ripped up again?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): The minister is not here to ask questions. Right now you are here to answer them.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member can put her question in a more polite form.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the minister keeps saying that this document has no connection with trade with the Americans and Mexico. In fact, the document discusses free trade in telecommunications, a position that is not shared by this government.

My question for the minister is this: Considering that this document will wipe out farmers in Quebec and across Canada and that it supports tariffication of our agricultural products, unlike the policy announced publicly by this government, is the minister prepared to recommend that a federal election should be held before the document is endorsed?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, clearly my question to the hon. member struck a raw nerve end. I do not think she wants to talk about the trade policy of the Liberal Party.

My hon. friend referred to telecommunications. This is a proposal that has come from the Americans. But just because they put forward a proposal, does that mean we have accepted it? No, we have rejected it.

My hon. friend raises a question concerning farmers. She waves the text in front of us. I have not seen a copy of the text. I have not seen that document. That may be the Liberals' policy on pharmaceuticals in 1969 for all I know.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the document in the section on agriculture, under heading "Canadian Proposal" it says that we are provided for. Tariff equivalency resulting from conversion of non-tariff barriers shall be reduced in accordance with the schedule under the proposed agreement on the Uruguay round.

How could the minister let his colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister, go in front of 20,000 farmers, swear that this government would fight to the last breath tariffication, when this minister had already given away the store, the farm and the country under the NAFTA proposal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there is no giving away the store, the farm and the country, that my hon. friend huffs and puffs about. We have not made any proposal in that direction at all. That is not the Canadian position.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. This is the man who wants to be trusted but who gave us the free trade agreement that betrayed every single trust of Canadians because they have lost their jobs.

I want to ask this question. Why is this government making the same mistake twice? Why in this proposal are we agreeing to a dispute settlement mechanism which has no subsidy code to it, therefore once again making Canadians vulnerable to U.S. trade law, to U.S. harassment, to U.S. intimidation, under a new deal that will give no help whatsoever in solving disputes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend and I have a fundamental disagreement on the free trade agreement with the United States. My hon. friend ignores the fact that exports are up under the free trade agreement with the United States, in spite of the fact that we have a recession in the United States. My hon. friend neglects the fact that the trade surplus between Canada and the United States is up 10 per cent again in spite of the recession in the United States.

There have been benefits. I can give my friend a list of companies which have been major beneficiaries. I can give my friend a list of industries that have been major beneficiaries of the free trade agreement with the United States.

My hon. friend talks about the fact that we do not have a subsidy agreement. We do have a subsidy agreement in the Uruguay round negotiations, in the Dunkel paper that was brought forward on December 20 last year. It is our intention and it is agreed upon that if that is what is the final agreement on the Uruguay round, it will be transferred to the free trade agreement with the United States and I would expect that to be the case with the free trade agreement with Mexico as well.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Minister for International Trade that while trade between Canada and Mexico may be 1 per cent, trade between Canada and the United States is much greater. It is that aspect that we are really concerned about.

My question for the Minister of Transport deals with Canadian Annex 402.1 transportation services, which states that land transportation services, like truck, bus, rail transportation, land site aspects of port activities, freight forwarding, customs brokerage and maintenance and repair of commercial land transportation equipment are given up under the North American free trade agreement. As the minister knows, all of these sectors are vulnerable. They cannot even compete today.

I want to ask him, as the minister responsible for protecting transportation in this country, how he can allow such an agreement to be written.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I remind my friend that any of the negotiating positions we are putting forward in the NAFTA are developed with the provinces and with the industries concerned.

In this case we believe that if we are going to be trading between Canada and Mexico and using our truck transportation services to move the product, surely we want to give our trucking industry the same benefits as their competition. That is what we are trying to achieve. That is the objective that we have in the negotiations, so we can keep the trucks full of cargo going from Canada down to Mexico and back.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Minister for International Trade that almost a year ago we had truckers parked on Parliament Hill, we had truckers parked on bridges connecting Canada and the U.S.A. because they said at that time that they could not compete and they wanted a better deal.

I want to put my question to the Minister of Transport who has responsibility for transportation in this country. How can this government give up our trucking industry, our rail industry and all of our other service industries, including land site activities of ports. We know that if they cannot compete today without a free trade agreement, they are not going to be able to compete if there is one. They are going to go down the tubes. They are going to go south of the border. You have got to stop it.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend does not acknowledge in his question the fact that we have responded. We have dealt with a number of the questions that the truckers expressed to us when they were here on Parliament Hill.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, put forward a package of proposals which touched on excise taxes on fuel, on capital cost allowances and a number of other factors which have improved the competitive position of the Canadian trucking industry.

My hon. friend is wrong when he says that the Canadian trucking industry cannot compete internationally. They can compete internationally. One of the problems that they do have is high provincial excise taxes on fuel. They will not have that in the United States when they are going through the United States to Mexico and we believe that they can compete.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this government is planning to give away, through this trilateral agreement, Canadian control of a key economic lever and a regional development tool. I am talking about our telephone industry.

Why is this government allowing American telephone companies, like AT&T, access to waltz in and dominate these new evolving telephone services. The Canadian people would like to know why the government is surrendering this strategic Canadian sector.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is we are not. The American industry can make proposals to get into our basic telephone system. We have said no.

She asks what about the enhanced industry. In the enhanced sector of the telecommunications industry, the major value-added products, the Canadian industry is a world leader. Surely she should be on my back saying: "We have to get access to the U.S. market. We have to get access to the Mexican market for enhanced telecommunications because we are world leaders there. We can compete. There is extremely good business for us there".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the minister that Canadians want to make the decisions for themselves and they want Canadian ownership of their Canadian properties.

[Translation]

Why has this government already tabled a bill that would leave the telecommunications field wide open to the Americans and thus allow them to take over Canadian industries? Isn't it true that the government is implementing its trade agreement through the back door before it has even been signed?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Communications tabled a bill, I believe on February 27, which reconfirms the 80 per cent ownership of that industry.

That is not the subject of negotiation.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the Minister of Transport on the issue of the proposed NAFTA agreement and the wording in it which the Minister for International Trade has suggested will not be affected as a result of the uneven playing field on which the Canadian transportation industry currently operates.

The minister should know the dangers that have been raised again and again by our truckers most recently, as well as by our rail and other land transporters, have been related to the lack of an even playing field between Canada and the U.S.

Why does the minister not have some solution to this lack of an even playing field to put forward before turning Canada's land transportation industry over to the hub and spoke where Canada will be one of the weak spokes on a U.S. hub?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I just commented in response to a question from the New Democratic Party that we have made some changes to the tax system which affect the competitiveness of the Canadian trucking industry. I think my hon. friend should be calling on some of the provincial governments to match what we have done in order to build upon those changes and help build the level playing field that he is looking for.

As far as the objectives that we have in this proposed agreement with the United States and Mexico, our objective is to enter into any changes in trucking or other land transportation relationships which will strengthen the industry here in Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, let us continue with transportation and go from land to water.

The government knows that in the Jones act, the United States has a major element for protection of important parts of its transportation network. We now know that the government is willing to give up on our land transportation to continental pressures.

How can the government be so cavalier about Canada's land transportation system in the face of very severe U.S. protectionism on the water?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would refer back to an answer I gave in the House two or three months ago, I said that one of our objectives is to break open the Jones act. That is one of the key objectives of the policy.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it refers to the fixed link which will have a very dramatic impact on the economy and provide a tremendous boost to all of Atlantic Canada.

I wonder if the minister could give us an update on the status and outline the economic impact. Also, will the opportunity be made available to the Atlantic region?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I realize, and the House realizes, the interest of my hon. colleague in this project.

I am not a prophet but I can say to him that I do believe that if we can perhaps overcome some of the obstacles and have the enthusiastic support of the Atlantic premiers, this project will provide considerable numbers of jobs during construction. It will obviously enhance tourism and regional economic development.

• (1450)

I believe that with the co-operation of our government and the provinces, this will be a substantial and perhaps very tangible project that will help the economy of Atlantic Canada in years to come.

FALSE INDIAN ID CARDS

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Hundreds of business people in Quebec and Ontario failed to charge taxes on items purchased by holders of false Indian ID cards, fraudulently issued by an organization called Amitiés autochtones hors réserve.

Since the real culprits are the federal departments that failed to take immediate action to deal with this swindle, which has been going on at least since September 1991, could the minister give the House the assurance that instead of harassing these business people, the Department of National Revenue will inform Canadian businesses of the rules that apply when a genuine Indian makes a purchase in their establishment off the reserve?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to assure the House that we do not harass anybody. In fact, yesterday's headlines and an audit report confirmed that tax collectors are being nice. "Tax men gentle, a federal audit finds". In fact, we have become a gentler and a kinder department than the one we we inherited from those hard-headed Liberals.

Specifically, I would like to answer the hon. member by saying that the simple presentation of a native ID card does not exempt anybody. Exemptions of the GST are only allowed for purchases of goods or services on the reserves or if the delivery is made to the reserve.

I will conclude by saying that there is an extensive educational and consultative program with aboriginal people on reserves, as well as across the country, for the benefit of all business people.

OLYMPIA & YORK DEVELOPMENT LTD.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, once more it appears this government is answering the bugle call of Bay Street, calling for a bail-out for bad investments.

It seems the market is quite happy to have the government intervene when the wealthy few play Monopoly with taxpayers' money.

My question is for whoever is answering for the Minister of Finance today. It seems Olympia & York, the Monopoly tycoons have over-built on their version of Park Place and are being forced to restructure an estimated $20 billion, of which more than $2 billion is owed to Canadian banks.

Will the minister assure Canadians that the banks will not get any special tax breaks nor be allowed to write off real estate speculation on the backs of Canadian taxpayers.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the government has had discussions with national financial institutions and international financial institutions together with the Government of Ontario in assuring that there will be little disruption in the financial markets. I believe that is the role of the federal government. No decisions have yet been made. Discussions are ongoing.

I will be pleased to inform the hon. member and the House if any decision is made in the near future.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister of corporate and consumer affairs.

Our experience has been that when Canadian banks have a $2 billion haemorrhage, they turn to their domestic blood banks.

Will the minister immediately order his department to closely monitor bank service charges so they are not used as a blood transfusion for Olympia & York?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as far as the banks are concerned, I would have preferred the hon. member to congratulate us on getting the banks to reduce interest rates on credit cards. This is something the hon. member has been demanding for months, and there has been a significant reduction. I would have preferred that.

However, as far as the hon. member's question is concerned, my department will monitor the situation very closely. Since no decision has been made so far, we will look at the situation very closely, but since no decision has been made one way or another, I have nothing to report at this time.

TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The Minister for International Trade will know that the Prime Minister has repeatedly said, as well as members of the cabinet, that the top priorities of this government in negotiating a trade arrangement with Mexico and the United States included the protection of the environment, protecting health standards, protecting safety and workers' rights.

In this 408 page document released today by the Action Canada Network, there is no reference of substance to the so-called top priorities. I want to ask the Minister for International Trade, what happened to health? What happened to safety? What happened to the commitment to the Canadian environment and to the international environment? What happened to the rights of Canadian workers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware of the fact that we made it clear right from the start that we were not negotiating the matters he refers to as an integral part of the trade agreement.

We have some very extensive discussions under way on the labour standards, on environmental regulations, on environmental protection and enforcement, on a parallel basis with the Mexican administration. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, was in Mexico quite recently in support of our efforts in this regard. We have had discussions with the labour movement in Canada as to how best we should conduct these discussions and negotiations on labour standards. That work continues.

I might say to my hon. friend that it is being effective in drawing out some agreements. My colleague on the environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced something quite recently to assist the Mexicans in enforcement. My hon. friend is well aware that the problem with the Mexicans and the environment is not environmental standards. It is in the enforcement of those standards where we are determined to give them every assistance we can.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, despite the honeyed words of the Minister for International Trade that we are entering into some kind of inconsequential agreement, it is now clear that this is a massive, broad and sweeping agreement as outlined in the document released today.

It includes transportation, telecommunications, agriculture, foreign investment and much more. I want to ask the Minister for International Trade, given the comprehensive nature of this agreement which will entrench the Canada-U.S. trade deal, whether he believes this government at this stage of its life, at its current level of support among the people of Canada, has the moral authority to obligate future governments to try and untangle the mess this government attempts to create once again in matters of trade with third parties.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to the free trade agreement with the United States.

If my hon. friend would study the facts and look at some of the industries that have done well under the free trade agreement with the United States, he would not make these sweeping accusations, these sweeping denunciations of the free trade agreement.

If he had looked at the agriculture sector, if he had looked at the wine sector, if he had looked at the high technology sector, he would see that there are substantial improvements in the competitive position of Canadian companies. If he would look at some of the companies that have been successful in the ladies fashion sector, seeking out market niches in the United States and doing very, very well as a result of the access that they have to that market. It is this sort of blanket denunciation—

Mr. Speaker: I think we have to move on.

OLYMPIA & YORK DEVELOPMENT LTD.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the minister confirmed that discussions were under way about the Olympia & York situation with the Government of Ontario, financial institutions both domestic and international as well as the Bank of Canada and the Bank of England.

Since it has been reported that the Canary Wharf project of London, England is a major factor in the Olympia & York situation I ask the acting minister this question. Is the government discussing solutions in this situation not only with the Bank of England but also directly with the British government itself? If not, will Canada be taking this step as well?

• (1500)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the banks are acting to stabilize the situation with the company both in Canada and internationally.

Our discussions are ongoing together with the province of Ontario. To date they have not involved the Government of Britain.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the acting minister inform the House in greater detail about the role of the NDP Government of Ontario in this Olympia & York discussion?

Furthermore, will the minister confirm to the House that his priority and that of the government itself is to bring about a private sector solution to the Olympia & York problem?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is that the discussions which are ongoing with the province of Ontario are designed to stabilize the financial markets.

The answer to the second part of the question regarding a private sector solution is yes.

Mr. Speaker: There will be two questions: a single question from the hon. member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton and a single question from the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

With the recent announcement of the proposed privatization of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson International Airport, the government has found a way to save millions of dollars in financing terminal modernization and management.

Will the government provide Pearson with some relief by turning the moneys it hopes to save toward the development of alternative airport infrastructures in the region, or will the burden continue to fall on Pearson and the surrounding communities even after the airport's 28 million passenger capacity has been reached in the late 1990s?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the member has asked that question because it gives me the opportunity to remind him that the environmental review panel on the additional runways at Pearson is still outstanding.

When we have this report, and depending on what is decided through that report, we will re-examine the master plan for all southern Ontario airports. At that time we will be able to determine what financial arrangements are possible.

McDONALD COMMISSION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. We all read in the media about part the testimony of a senior RCMP officer who appeared before the McDonald commission.

Eleven years after the commission's report was tabled, Canadians are still waiting for the publication of seven chapters of the report, which deal with some very interesting items, including the theft of PQ membership lists, a barn burning, and so forth.

My question is this: Why is the government so reluctant to release seven chapters that undoubtedly contain the answers to the serious questions that are now being asked?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise my hon. friend that the McDonald commission looked into all of the allegations at the time and considered all of the evidence.

At the present time, unless there is some new evidence, the government has no consideration to opening up any new investigations.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion to amend the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of the motion.

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR CARIBOO—CHILCOTIN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering whether you had an opportunity to review the point of order that I raised last Thursday regarding a statement made in this House by the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member is anxious about that and I will do everything I can to report to the House tomorrow.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren (p. 8670), and the amendment thereto of Mr. Barrett (p. 8685).

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on the topic of North American free trade. It gives members of Parliament and the Canadian public a better chance to understand the deal, as difficult as that may be, given the secretive nature of the negotiations.

I wonder where the cabinet is today and where they have been on this issue. Other than the Minister of Forestry, no other member of the cabinet has spoken on this issue today, or even been here so far for the debate. Given the importance of this deal, I cannot see what could be more important for these ministers than to stand up in public today and explain to Canadians why we should support a North American free trade deal.

The government is hoping to conclude the deal by next month and is rushing through the negotiations. As a result, the majority of Canadians have no idea what is going on. Certainly we all have the right to know. The House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, in its report to Parliament entitled "North American Free Trade", said quite clearly it wanted the Canadian government to consult with Canadians on this issue.

I do not believe this government has responded adequately to the House of Commons call for this request. For instance, I doubt many Canadians realize that a deal reached with the three countries will have major implications for agriculture in this country. Obviously much time and effort has gone into pressuring the government to ensure that our system of supply management is maintained. This is essential to any country that wishes to secure a supply of food for itself.

We have been under international pressure, namely American pressure, to do away with our border protection and supply management.

The importance of a viable Canadian farming sector centres around the ability of a nation to produce its food and secure its supply of food for the present and the future.

Sovereignty and nationalism are inextricably linked to the ability of any nation to feed its people. Without a viable Canadian farming sector there can be no food security for Canadians. This is in danger in these negotiations.

Obviously there is a lot at stake both in Geneva and now at the NAFTA negotiations. In both instances Canadian agriculture is on the bargaining table. Frankly, farmers in this country do have a reason to be worried.

Although we have been given assurances by the government that it will stand by its promise to strengthen article XI of GATT, we know the importance it is placing on reaching GATT and NAFTA agreements. Once again agriculture is at the centre of the negotiations and in fact an obstacle, as some say, to a successful deal.

The Americans are insisting we move to a system of tariffication and end supply management in this country. Given the argument I have just made for the deal, this is potentially dangerous for our agrifood sector in Canada and for Canadian farmers.

Before we rush into another agreement, the government must face some of the facts about the free trade agreement we presently have with the United States. First and foremost, the government must recognize that the free trade deal is not providing secure access to the American market as it was originally intended to do. The dispute mechanism is laughable. It is certainly not a genuine shield against American protectionism. Softwood lumber and Honda automobiles are prime examples of this. We need fair trade rules now. How can we possibly enter into a new trade agreement with so much going wrong with the present one?

What about the impact of the new agreement on the Canadian public and economy? These questions need to be answered. A federal government document indicated there was much to be lost. In fact, it said it could cost jobs and undermine some of our cultural industries. In my reading, the document shows there would be very little Canadian gain, if any.

This government desperately wants a deal, so we are naturally concerned the government would be willing to sign a potentially flawed deal just to get one. Parliament is being denied a chance to examine this proposed North American free trade agreement. We have to find copies of it in little brown envelopes just to find out what is going on in the deal. Even though the American and Mexican legislators have already been briefed, there has been no similar briefing done here. It has been leaked to many newspapers across the country, including the Toronto Star and we still know nothing about this deal. The lack of cabinet involvement in this debate just underscores this point.

We do not even know what the government's minimal objectives are. We need questions answered. What are the economic costs and benefits to Canada? Will this government be part of a trilateral agreement which does not include a subsidy code and or a prompt and binding dispute mechanism? Canadians have a right to know. Canadians have a right to know what the government plans to do with the snap-back mechanism which would permit tariffs to be phased out over a period of time if dumping occurs.

Any agricultural package that does not include a snap-back provision between Canada and the other two countries will certainly help to dismantle the Canadian horticultural industry. How can domestic producers of fresh fruits and vegetables possibly be protected should import prices drop dramatically?

Certainly this is a real threat, given the climate and lower labour costs in Mexico which will allow them to be competitive in a North American market.

What about the inclusion of other countries? Has this government regarded the possible formation of a North and South American free trade area? Canadians have a right to know. The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement did not include any rules for a third country, such as Mexico, jumping in. That is why we are having the debate today. We do not have the so-called preferential access the government here claimed during the last election and which it has claimed over the last few years. What will the cost be to Canada? Where is Canada's so-called preferential treatment? What is the government doing about a subsidy code? What is it doing on a dispute mechanism that will be prompt and binding? When is the government going to share with us in any meaningful way what is going on in these negotiations?

Earlier in the week, the minister said this is commercially confidential information. We do not want commercially confidential information. We want to know what is going on in the negotiations and what the government's bottom lines are. Canadians want an assurance from this government that it will not, once again, sell them out at the negotiating table.

The one thing for sure is that everything is apparently back on the table in these negotiations. Once again, after we have given a little here and a little there, we will end up with another flawed agreement. In other words we will end up with nothing, so let us do ourselves a favour. Let us get these basic questions answered first before we, once again, sign on the dotted line and sign our country away. Let us just think about it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I thank my colleague for his remarks. I noted some particularly insightful comments with respect to agriculture and the pressures that our farmers, in the broadest sense of the term, have suffered during the last few years, not only at the GATT, but also because of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement. He has also indicated this particular trade deal is being negotiated with much too much secrecy. It is unfortunate we have to get our information through leaked documents.

I have three areas I would like him to comment on. I have a particular interest in adjustment programs for workers. We were promised them in the Canada-U.S. trade agreement—the best in the world—and we know what happened. There were none.

Do we have any sense now, from any leaked document or reports in the newspapers, what the negative impact might be on the Canadian worker as a result of this Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement, this North American free trade agreement? Do we have any information at all that might be useful to the Canadian public?

Finally, I am concerned, as I know my colleague is, that environmental standards might deteriorate significantly as a result of that agreement. We know there have been some problems with the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question.

Adjustment programs are something we have been asking the government for since the last deal came in. A study was done on the whole issue which suggested there should be adjustment programs in certain areas to help Canadian workers adjust. Unfortunately the government ignored these requests.

I do not believe the government is even willing to reconsider that. I do have an idea though, from reading through the government's own documents, that these sorts of programs will be needed. The government's own documents suggest many areas across Canada will be adversely affected by this deal. I just do not believe this government has the will necessary to bring in these adjustment programs.

As I said, government documentation and other documentation, including some good work done by the Canadian Labour Congress and groups in the United States, suggest there will be some detrimental impact on Canadian workers.

Unfortunately, we do not really have a lot of work put out by the Minister of Labour, who is supposedly sitting in his position there to help Canadian workers. We have seen nothing from him. He is not even taking part in this debate today to help alleviate some of the fears of these workers. I do not get a sense the government is willing to provide any help for the negative impact on these workers.

In terms of the environment, I am sure my hon. friend has heard the questions by our colleague from Davenport who has been very concerned about the environmental impact of such a deal, and whether or not our environmental standards will be lowered because of such a deal.

I have read about it and talked to certain committees, trying to find out the government's position. The government takes the opposite view that we will raise Mexican standards to the Canadian level. But it really has no plan and has given us no policy papers or information to show how it plans to do it in the context of these negotiations. The fears are there, and I would suggest all those Canadians who are concerned about this issue—and a number of Canadians across Canada are concerned about the environment—write the Minister of the Environment and ask him specifically what he is going to do to protect Canadian environmental systems within the context of this deal.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I want to participate in the debate today because of what I have now learned is in the draft NAFTA agreement. The motion before us condemns the government for its lack of openness and failure to ensure Canadians had access to the draft agreement so they could make some knowledgeable decisions to help put pressure on the government for particular changes. Having read the Canadian annex 402.1, dealing with transportation services, I can understand why they did not want the Canadian public through their MPs to know. It is horrendous.

I want to read some sections because they make me very angry and I think they will make Canadians in the transportation sector even angrier because it is their jobs that are on the line.

Annex 402.1, that is the Canadian version, called chapter 14 for the Mexican version and 05.1A for the American version, says that "this annex shall apply to all measures of a party related to the provision of land transportation services by a national or other party. For purposes of this annex, land transportation services means: (1) truck transportation, (2) bus transportation, (3) rail transportation, (4) landside aspects of port activities, (5) freight forwarding, (6) customs brokerage, (7) warehousing except for those activities covered by chapter", whatever it is called, "financial services: (8) maintenance and repair of commercial land transportation equipment, (9) pipeline operations except for those covered by the energy chapter, and (10) courier services".

That is a very comprehensive list. The only thing that is not on the list is air. As we speak, just down the road at the Chateau the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States are working on a bilateral air agreement which will in effect deregulate air travel between Canada and the U.S.

This agreement as drafted, and I am not exaggerating when I say this, will mean the end of a Canadian based transportation system for road, for rail, road for both trucking and bus. The sheer economies of scale will dictate that it is more efficient to locate the head office, the main branches, whether it is rail or the main routes or what have you, the hubs, in the United States, serving both Canada and Mexico.

We saw that kind of pressure between Canada and the United States certainly a year go when the truckers parked their vehicles outside the House of Commons, tied up traffic in downtown Ottawa for a number days and also in Windsor and other border crossings where they literally blocked access between Canada and the United States. They pointed out rightfully how unlevel the playing field was. Whether it was because of fuel taxes, whether it was because of write–offs, and I do not care whether it is federal responsibility or provincial responsibility, the bottom line was they could not compete.

There were American truckers loading up their products, filling up their gas tanks just south of the border, travelling all the way to Montreal to drop off their products, turning around and going back and in some cases having to be topped up by jerry cans while on the top of the bridge on the international crossing. That is unfair competition.

The minister in the House earlier today said: "But we did things for them, so therefore it is okay". Yes, they did. They gave them some tax breaks in terms of the write-offs. They also gave them some breaks on the 4 cents per litre excise fuel tax. In effect, what they have done though through NAFTA is tear up all those items of assistance that will no longer be allowable under NAFTA if this agreement were ever to be approved.

Why am I so concerned? Let me go back to when this country was formed and the reason that we developed a rail infrastructure that went east-west rather than north-south. Sir John A. Macdonald knew that if we did not have those linkages from east to west, we would very quickly be gobbled up by the United States of America. It would have made more sense to run a railway from Thunder Bay down into the Chicago area, to run a railway from B.C. down the Pacific coast, to run a railway from Toronto down to Buffalo and points south. We never would have had a country. But the reality of 1867 is the reality of today. If we do not have those east-west transportation links owned and operated and maintained and managed by Canadians, we are not going to have a country.

This agreement in effect gives American railroads the right to come and operate on our tracks. It gives American trucking companies the right to come and operate on our roads. It gives American companies the right to come in and handle our cargoes in our ports. They cannot really touch the ships but as soon as it is on land, they can do everything else.

In fact I would like to read one of the American proposals into the record. "The U.S. has proposed that such activities will include the operation and maintenance of docks, loading and unloading of vessels, marine cargo handling, operation and maintenance of piers, ship cleaning, stevedoring, transfer of cargo between ships and trucks, trains, pipelines and wharfs, waterfront terminal operations, boat cleaning, canal operation"—canal operation? Are they going to take over the seaway locks and operate them?—"dismantling of ships, operation of marine railways for drydocking, marine surveyors"—except cargo—"marine wrecking, ships for scrap, and ship classification societies".

That is what the Americans want included in the North American free trade agreement. If this Government of Canada ever says yes then you will see thousands of jobs in the maritime sector taken away from Canadians and given to Americans and eventually given to Mexicans. That is unacceptable. As a society and a country we cannot tolerate that kind of change.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am sharing my time with my colleague. If you would give me the ten-minute notice so we can go into the five-minute question and comment then I will turn it over to my colleague.

There is another aspect I want to raise and again this is a proposal from the Americans. I realize I have just two minutes.

We went through a major debate in this House in this country over whether or not we should control transportation through regulations. The government of the day followed what the Liberals started before them and went for deregulation. Instead of the old means test of whether it met the test of public convenience and necessity, i.e. an economic test, we went for something else.

If the banker gave you the money, you could go and operate the service as long as you had a safety certificate.

The Americans want to include in this North American free trade agreement the following limitation: Limitations on the number of land transportation service providers in the form of numerical quotas, monopolies, exclusive land transportation service providers, or the requirement of an economic means test.

I read that to suggest that the British Columbia government could not prevent an American railroad from operating on the B.C. Railway. The government of Ontario could not prevent them from operating on Ontario Northland. That is what this would mean if Canada ever accepted it.

Mr. Speaker, I have enough here for a 50-minute speech if not more. I realize I do not have the time, but I want to say to you we thought the free trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. was bad. Thank God it did not include transportation. What the NAFTA agreement is trying to do is do what the free trade agreement did not do and that is sell out the rest of the Canadian infrastructure, to sell out our transportation whether it is rail, buses, trucks, part of our ports, even our processors, our freight forwarders, our customs brokers. All of those things are being sold out by this agreement and this government should be stopped now.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my colleague will know that I come from a province where transportation is of particular importance. I want to make sure I have understood clearly the message that he has put forward. He has indicated that subsequent to the Canada–U.S. trade agreement, transportation was not a major item, but in this NAFTA agreement it will touch virtually every sector, whether it is ports, airports, road transportation or any type of transportation. I recall in his initial remarks that he even talked about courier systems. It went that far.

I would like to ask my colleague what impact he believes it would have on a major transportation province such as Manitoba. I recognize that there are a number of other spots across the country that are equally important in terms of transportation. Clearly, Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba are extremely important to Canada and to western Canadians as a transportation centre. Perhaps he could comment.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the member for St. Boniface. There are a couple of areas that will be affected. I could use Winnipeg as an example. More appropriately, we will use Transcona as an example. Transcona has a repair maintenance facility. This is not in the part that is bracketed, not labelled as a U.S.A. suggestion or a Mexican suggestion. This is in Canada's annex, as is.

Land transportation is defined to include maintenance and repair of commercial land transportation equipment. That means if this were to be passed, there would be no prevention of CN or CP having all their maintenance work done south of the border or even further south in Mexico to the loss of thousands of jobs, whether it is in Winnipeg, Thunder Bay, Montreal or Moncton or wherever. Although I realize a lot of those jobs have already gone.

That is in this proposed agreement, that there would be no restriction on where maintenance work had to be done. Therefore, CN as a Crown corporation could not be told: "Thou shalt repair and maintain in Canada".

One of the concerns we had yesterday with the CN announcement of the purchase of the 25 new locomotives from Erie, Pennsylvania, was whether or not there was a maintenance contract as well. We checked and no, there was not. At the very least CN has not predicted the outcome of NAFTA. But certainly that potential is there.

There are other aspects that deal with how a transportation hub like Winnipeg would operate and also in terms of maintenance. There are very specific references in here to maintenance of equipment, of mutual standards that will be used across the three countries which will affect the quality of workmanship done in Transcona. I would suspect it would be a dilution of standards as opposed to everybody coming up to Canada's high standards.

Any way you look at it, it is a rotten deal.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask a short question on the transportation side of the free trade agreement.

I have always had a concern about water in the free trade agreement. I have always believed that if we were to ask the President of the United States for a protocol letter exempting water from the free trade agreement that he would probably refuse to give it to us. That would ultimately lead, in my opinion, to a position where we would be forced to abrogate the deal immediately because most Canadians believe water is not a part of the free trade agreement.

My question is to the senior member of the New Democratic Party. What is your position on water in the free trade agreement?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, there is no question that water should not be part of the free trade agreement. We argued that. My colleague, the member for Kamloops, and I jointly sponsored legislation in this House that would prevent the export of water.

There is an interesting twist though because when we talk about export of water, people tend to think of the bottled variety. We have a situation near Chicago right now where a municipality is looking to divert additional water from Lake Michigan for municipal sewage treatment purposes and then, I assume, dump it into the Mississippi. Right now the IJC controls that. A separate international agreement controls that. Under the free trade agreement maybe they can take us to the dispute settlement mechanism to see how American law is interpreted.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating the proposed North American free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico.

I take the position that this deal is not in the best interests of Canada and in fact can do more harm than good, given the circumstances of the political situation, the bargaining position of the three countries and the differing political institutions that exist in each of the countries.

We have only to go back a few years and look at the negotiations between Canada and the United States to reinforce why I am concerned about some of these problems. Canada and the U.S. had their negotiations. Canada is about one-tenth or one-eleventh the size of the United States. The bargaining positions of the two countries showed in the agreement. Politically the United States is a superpower, but of more importance, in negotiating international agreements with them, is their quite different constitution and their very much different attitude on the powers of Congress and the powers of the President.

Our government went into the negotiations with the naive assumption that the President of the United States spoke for his country in a manner not unlike the way the Prime Minister of our country speaks for this country. That is patently untrue and impossible.

The U.S. Congress holds the rights carefully to its bosom to change trade law and to be responsible ultimately for any international agreement that the United States President and his administration might attempt to negotiate.

Our negotiators, our government in particular, did not seem to be aware of what that means in the long term. Some of us from western Canada that have dealt on a so-called free trade basis with the Americans understood how it worked. We have traded in red meats, beef and hogs for 50 years under a so-called free trade agreement. Any time we start to make inroads into their markets in a way that has a definite economic advantage to Canada, ways and means are found in the Congress of the United States to make certain that trade does not continue at the same pace. So there have always been interruptions to that trade.

After we signed the trade agreement, which the government and its proponents said would forever and ever do away with that kind of dispute problem, immediately we were faced with a pork countervail which has been resolved for the moment, but the resolution of that countervail is still in some doubt. American congressmen and American pork producers are still convinced that because two of the people involved in the countervail action had some doubts about whether American law was being adhered to, the whole process will begin again as soon as the price rises enough to make it worth while for American producers to block the shipments of Canadian pork into that country.

The phrase "according to U.S. law" is something we will have to get used to if we are going to be dealing with so-called free trade agreements with the Americans, whether it is on a bilateral basis, Canada-U.S., or a trilateral basis with Mexico, Canada and the United States.

Essentially Congress will not give up, and has every constitutional right not to give up, the right to permit any president, whether it is President Bush or Reagan or any successor, to give away by international treaty that right. It can be worded as clearly as we like in the agreement that Canada and Mexico or any other country might want to sign, but ultimately Congress can overrule that and whenever there is a dispute, ultimately it is U.S. law that must be adhered to, not the agreement.

As long as we get the ground rules straight, we will have a good ball game. We will also know that because those are the rules we will probably lose most of the innings but we will have a good ball game as long as we understand that. Unfortunately this Prime Minister and this government do not seem to understand what the rules of the ball game are.

We have seen some drafts now, thanks to U.S. freedom of information laws and the propensity of Americans to be able to get information. We also had information from some of the people in Mexico as to what was being discussed.

We could not rely on our own government to supply this kind of information. We had to go overseas to find out just what our country is saying at these talks and what we have agreed to.

Until February 21 or 22, it appears that Canada's negotiating position on agriculture, which I will speak about for a couple of minutes, was pretty much the same negotiating position that it took into the international talks at the Uruguay round starting in 1986, which was and continued to be until some time during 1990 or 1991, a policy of transferring all subsidies and all government interventions in agriculture into a tariff, in other words, tariffication.

Once again, as it was in Uruguay and in the NAFTA, this business of seeking tariffication is the official Government of Canada position. That is unfortunate because at home, under pressure from dairy producers and producers of poultry and eggs that realize that this is the death knell to their commodity production in Canada, the government is saying at GATT that that was not really its position.

It changed it some time in 1990 or 1991, and there is some paper to show that there was a memo sent at that period of time at GATT. So far, there does not seem to be any paper saying that Canada's position on tariffication is any different, except as a hard line tariffication proposal under the NAFTA.

The dairy people, the poultry people and the egg people are once again being forgotten in the negotiations because the government is following a clear, hard line tariffication stance. It is a clear, hard line that suits an economic development model that is dependent on the corporations doing all of the development, but it is not one that fits very well the purposes of ordinary Canadians.

We have thousands and millions of people in Canada who are small business people from farmers to retailers, wholesalers and even small manufacturers. They are not covered by that kind of policy. They are left out. It is presumed they do not matter, that they cannot be globally competitive, which is the watchword or catchword that this government is attempting to follow.

Canadian farmers and small business people will be relegated to the same position that the Mexican peasant will be relegated to if the Mexican government gets its way, which is to make it possible to sell land to international corporations for agricultural development.

That may sound like a fairly innocuous matter when you live way up here, several thousand miles from Mexico, but that country has had several revolutions over those lands that are held in the name of the country of Mexico for the use of thousands and millions of Mexican peasant farmers who have no other access to land. That is their right.

It was fought for several times in several revolutions and this is the only land that the Government of Mexico has available for sale to foreign corporations.

The current Government of Mexico seems intent upon following a policy similar to this government of selling all of its assets. It appears that farmland is going to be one of those assets. The result will be very cheap land to international corporations which will probably sell fruits and vegetables into the more northern parts of North America.

As farmers in this part of the world, we will be hard pressed to continue producing fruits and vegetables at all because of an agreement that is not a fair agreement. It is set out to purposely get rid of small producers, small business people so that a theory of international control can prevail.

We do not think this is fair or practical. It makes no sense economically. It makes even less sense to people who believe in democratic principles. We think it is time these 500 pages were trashed and the negotiations ceased immediately.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I listened with intent to the hon. member. He was concerned about small business and I appreciate his concern.

With the existing free trade agreement, U.S. law certainly applies. What he failed to comment on was that, of course, Canadian law also applies. If Canada feels mistreated, it still has the power within Canadian law to do exactly as the U.S. Congress would like to do in regard to American law.

The question I would like to ask is this. Prior to the free trade agreement, if the U.S. Congress decided to enact some law that was designed to get at some foreign country, and for a moment I will use Brazil as an example, but it could be any country because of some export proposition that is going on, Congress would pass this act which would restrict the exports from Brazil. But it did not deal with countries, it dealt with products. Canadians business would be affected by that enactment of U.S. law against some foreign export into the United States.

Canadian small business would be faced with the challenge in trying to convince the U.S. Congress that Canada and in particular its products ought to be exempted under U.S. law.

Under the U.S. free trade agreement, Canada specifically has to be named in any U.S. law in order for it to be affected. Would the hon. member not agree that it is much better for Canadian small businesses not to have to worry about being side-swiped by some act of the U.S. Congress against some Third World or some other country than it would be to enforce on Canadian small businesses, as it was prior to the free trade agreement, the horrendous cost of trying to convince the U.S. legislatures than in fact the small businesses in Canada was not the cause of their problem.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member raises a very good question.

If he had been reading and analysing the news lately or talking to the kind of small business people that I talk to in my riding where we still attempt to have a softwood lumber industry, he would know that it does not even matter whether they are forced to name Canada or not. They have no compunction about slipping the word Canada or Canadian as an adjective before the product they have decided to act against.

There had no problem naming Canadian Honda cars. They had no compunction about naming Canadian softwood lumber. It does not worry them to add that word. They can say and write Canadian and it does not seem to bother them one iota. I do not think that that clause in the agreement made any change in the attitude of American legislators and made no difference to the access of our small business people to that market.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to take part in this debate. I am delighted to be able to talk about the way this government has deliberately and conscientiously sought the views of a broad cross-section of Canadians on trade policy questions.

Contrary to opposition claims, Canadians' views have been critical of the way in which the government has pursued the North American free trade agreement involving Canada, the United States and Mexico. The opposition wishes to cancel Canadian involvement in NAFTA negotiations.

Hon. members opposite contend that the government has shut Canadians out of the process. In holding this view, they are frankly strangely oblivious to the well organized, carefully planned and thoroughly detailed set of consultations with Canadians that this government has undertaken for more than six years. I regret the opposition's belated awakening to the importance of the North American free trade negotiations.

If they had examined the initiative earlier, hon. members would have been aware of the extensive consultations that have taken place to date. Still, the debate today allows me to outline just how thorough that process has been.

• (1550)

The government has in place a broad and strong network of advisers that has helped us develop our national strategy. The heart of this network is the International Trade Advisory Committee, or ITAC. It is made up of representatives of business, labour organizations, the academic and research communities, consumers, cultural industries and environmental groups.

Its role is to provide a two-way flow of information and advice between the government and the Canadian private sector. In addition to ITAC there are 15 sectoral advisory groups on international trade, known in verbal shorthand as SAGITs.

The SAGITs bring together business, labour, academics, researchers, consumers and environmentalists who are involved in specific sectors of the Canadian economy ranging from the agrifood sector to transportation services. These groups serve as vehicles for the two-way flow of information and advice between the government and particular industrial sectors. The SAGITs are influential in themselves, but the chair of each SAGIT also sits on ITAC, which further enhances their role.

This network was not dreamed up yesterday; it was established in 1985 to provide advice for the negotiations for the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. It continued and still maintains a crucial advisory role in the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations under the GATT, and its assistance has been invaluable in the negotiations toward NAFTA.

ITAC first examined the subject of a NAFTA in 1990 as the government began to consider whether to enter into the three-way negotiations with the United States and Mexico. So hon. members can see that the government had the benefit of its advice in choosing to join the NAFTA. It is a decision that we made in February of 1991.

ITAC meets regularly with the hon. Minister for International Trade, as often as four times a year. The last meeting was in December. Many of the SAGITs meet more frequently still. Some individual SAGITs have discussed NAFTA more than half a dozen times since the actual negotiations began last June in Toronto.

The assistance of ITAC and the SAGITs has not only been useful, it has been vital. With 19 working groups within the negotiations examining often highly technical details, the government's negotiators simply cannot afford to be without expert advice. The government knows full well that for the members of the SAGITs trade is not abstract theory. Trade is their livelihood and trade policy helps to determine their future.

The government has undertaken this consultation process because it is aware of this awesome responsibility. The interests of all participants in the Canadian economy must be carefully taken into account.

Let me stress that these advisory bodies are not representative of business only. Labour, academics, researchers, consumer groups, representatives of cultural industries, and environmentalists all are also active.

The government was particularly pleased when the Canadian Labour Congress decided to join ITAC after the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement in 1989. It was unfortunate that government was unable to benefit from the CLC's wide experience and knowledge during the original free trade agreement negotiations. We were thankful for the participation of the Canadian Federation of Labour which represents an important group of Canadian workers, especially in the important construction industry.

But a truly representative advisory network needs the involvement of the organization that represents the majority of Canadian organized labour. Although the CLC has been vigorous in putting forward its views, the government believes labour's involvement in ITAC and the participation of CLC-affiliated unions in the SAGITs represent a significant step forward to co-operate in economic decision-making.

The participation of the academic community has given positive direction to the consultations. Canadians are becoming increasingly aware of the need to adapt our education to meet the requirements of a fast-evolving global economy. Canadians also recognize that today's knowledge-intensive industries must find effective ways to turn scientific breakthroughs in laboratories into products and services in the marketplace.

In ITAC and the SAGITs educators can gauge the requirements for development of new skills. At the same time, the government can tailor its trade policy to effectively employ the skills and knowledge that educators have so carefully fostered.

The part of the consultation process that has been least noticed, I believe, is the inclusion of environmental representatives on the ITAC and many of the SAGITs. In keeping with the government commitment to take environment into account in major policy initiatives, it was vital that environmental groups be involved in the examination of the NAFTA.

Since the negotiations began, many commentators have raised the environment as an important issue for the NAFTA negotiations. The government agrees.

That is why the agreement will ensure that any of the signatory countries can maintain product health and safety standards superior to international norms.

That is why the government has formed an interdepartmental committee to review the potential environmental impact of a NAFTA on Canada. That is why Canada has increased its environmental co-operation with Mexico announcing last week a $1 million agreement to assist Mexico in improving its environmental enforcement.

That is one reason environmental representatives have been members of ITAC and the SAGITs since last fall. Their contributions have been most constructive and the government is hoping that this new relationship will be productive for all concerned.

Through the contributions of environmental representatives on ITAC and the SAGITs, the government will receive objective advice to ensure that NAFTA and other trade policies effectively take environmental issues into consideration.

The modern economy increasingly needs close co-operation among all participants in the economy. The consultation that now takes place in relation to the NAFTA negotiations is one solid example of that. This process has won the approval of independent observers who have commented on this contribution toward greater co-operation among Canadian economic sectors.

In a study of ITAC and the SAGITs, Helen Moroz, a professor of political studies at Queen's University had this to say and I quote:

> The systematic consultation between the private sector and the government appears to have enhanced the over-all attitudes among the different interests toward one another. Regular contact and the sharing of information proved to establish an understanding and trust between the participants—The process has paved the way for co-operative private sector/government consultation on trade-related and other matters in the future.

Perhaps not all members of the House favour closer economic co-operation to improve the functioning of the Canadian economy, but the government believes that such co-operation and the development of new strategic partnerships among all participants in the economy are keys to Canada's future competitiveness.

Closer co-operation which will in turn encourage more imaginative approaches to economic decision-making will contribute in the end to greater prosperity for all Canadians.

Hon. members of the opposition complain that these consultations do not take place in public, that yet again the government is conducting public business behind closed doors. However, the quiet nature of these discussions does not worry the members of ITAC and SAGITs. I cannot speak for all of them but the confidentiality to which they have sworn themselves provides them the opportunity to be candid and express their views without worrying that they will be heard by the United States, Mexican, or even Japanese or European competitors. The value of advice often rests on the frankness with which it can be given.

When the government knows it is hearing the honest unvarnished views of the private sector, it is better able to act in the interests of all concerned.

• (1600)

I have to stress that even if the opinions expressed in ITAC and the SAGITs meetings do not make headlines, they are being heeded. The opposition charges that the public is not being consulted. But look at the list of the sectors represented by SAGIT: agriculture, food and beverages, apparel and footwear, arts and cultural industries, consumer and household products, energy, chemicals and petrochemicals, financial services, fish and fish products, forest products, industrial and high-technology equipment, minerals and metals, business and professional services, textiles, fur and leather, transportation equipment, transportation services.

I am not trying to bore honourable members. I am only trying to point out that these consultations involve nearly every conceivable corner of the Canadian economy.

The ITAC and the SAGITs do more than bring together the different industrial sectors. They also link the economic factors from one end of the production line to the other, from extraction of raw materials, processing and manufacturing, to transportation, marketing and sales.

These advisory bodies are cross-sectors of Canadian society. They include representatives of small businesses and large. They include members from small towns and big cities. They bring together people from every region of the country. They include francophones and anglophones. There are women and men. There is no sector, barely a corner of productive activity or any region of the country or any job in the private sector in Canada that is not covered in one way or another by one of these sectoral advisory groups and the International Trade Advisory Committee.

These bodies are also constantly being refreshed. The government is continuously reviewing membership to ensure it appropriately represents the changing face of the Canadian economy. An ITAC and a SAGIT member's term is two years. In making the appointments the government strives to ensure an effective mixture of new blood and experience. New ideas are always vital to the consultation process. So also is continuity to ensure that what has been learned in the past is preserved and put to good use.

When the government announced the formation of the ITAC and the SAGITs consultation process more than six years ago, it was undertaking a major new initiative in communications between the public and the private sectors. The government had a plan that it knew was a good plan. But it could not have known how much the advisory network would be challenged and how it would respond. It responded well and effectively.

With the advice we continue to receive from these advisory groups, we will be able to negotiate a North American free trade agreement that serves the interests of all Canadians. When Canadian negotiators go to the bargaining table they are fully aware of the concerns and the ambitions of all sectors of the Canadian economy. That is the best guarantee that a North American free trade agreement, if it can be achieved, will reflect the interests and the ambitions of Canadians across the land.

This government is committed to consultations. Without consultations we simply could not negotiate a North American free trade agreement or pursue a trade policy of any kind. Government does not work in a vacuum. It must be aware of the needs and interests of the community at large. To do this, there is no substitute for a process of close and continuous dialogue. That dialogue, so effectively represented by the ITAC and the SAGITs process will continue.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, when we signed the free trade agreement with the United States, I had always, as a matter of principle, been in favour of free trade with the United States. A few years later, however, we realized that the federal government actually initiated meetings with international organizations on removing farm subsidies, mainly so it could stop subsidizing the production of grain in western Canada. That was the federal government's position here in Ottawa, and it was among the first to submit these proposals at the UN and GATT, proposals which involved removing subsidies, mainly for wheat, proposals that were a flagrant denial of the agricultural system we have had for many years in Quebec. Today, in Quebec, we have a quota system, thanks to which we are able to produce more or less what we need.

Liberalizing trade in agricultural products means undermining a system that we have had in Quebec for many years. Simultaneous negotiations with the United States and Mexico are bound to accelerate developments that will put Quebec at a disadvantage and undermine a system that has been in place in Quebec for many years. We know that the United States is also in favour of getting rid of farm subsidies as soon as possible.

Supposedly, agriculture had not been on the table during the FTA talks, but we realized only a year later that, although the government had said that GATT would be responsible for agriculture and that it would not be on the table during the free trade talks, the federal government was putting pressure on GATT to put agriculture on the table.

I think the current negotiations with the United States and Mexico on agriculture are rather disturbing because we in the opposition have no idea what you are trying to do, and I would appreciate some clarification.

[English]

Mrs. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the subsidy question was not answered at the time of the free trade agreement because the description of the subsidy was very difficult to sort out. It remained to be decided later what subsidy meant.

This is still ongoing, but we have supply management which is certainly part of our dairy products, eggs and milk. At the moment it is before the GATT. GATT has certainly been served notice that the Canadian government definitely supports very strongly supply management for those groups and wants to make stronger article XI.

That is something that is in the process of being evaluated and worked out at the moment. Certainly no trade agreement with Mexico will be sorted out until that has happened. What we can do there with supply management will be what we will effectively do with the NAFTA.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the hon. member who has been speaking to us.

I want to say to her in the first place that we in the Liberal Party are very strongly in favour of freer trade. We have always been in favour of freer trade. When we were in government trade with the United States expanded considerably, so we are a party that believes in freer trade.

However, we are very much opposed to the type of free trade agreement that her government concluded with the United States. We felt that was not in the best interest of Canada. The type of policies that we had adopted while we were in government did lead to an expansion of trade but did not lead to a loss of jobs in the same way as that deal has lead to the loss of jobs in the last few years. We just do not trust the government and the ministers of the government in their negotiations with Mexico and the United States this time, because we feel as a result of what they did the last time they are very likely to do it again. That is why we are asking for full disclosure and full information on these negotiations as they proceed day by day and month by month.

When we look at the deal of 1987-88, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we see that Canadian business is still harassed in the United States. Barriers are still put up against Canadian business when they try to carry on their commerce there. Countervailing duties are imposed. There has been a great loss of jobs in Canada with Canadian plants moving to the United States, plants closing down here, there and everywhere throughout the country. It is particularly serious in my city of Montreal and it is very serious in the Toronto area.

How can the hon. member stand in her place today in this House and say that she is fully assured as a result of the negotiations going on now with Mexico and the United States the same thing will not happen that happened in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement; that as a result of that type of agreement, if it is similar to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we are not once again going to see plants closed down, jobs moving to the United States, Canadian tradesmen, Canadian workers and Canadian business people out of work, bankruptcies increasing, and so on?

How can she say that she is fully assured and fully supportive of that process when she sees what is going on in her own province, especially in the greater Toronto area?

Mrs. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the United States is hearing from its own people about how they are being affected, how they are losing their jobs, how their businesses are being affected, and that the free trade agreement with Canada is the cause of their huge numbers and huge losses.

That is coming from the other side. This is a global problem right now. We are also in a recession. That is certainly the saddest part of it, but we are coming out of it slowly.

Another thing I must say is that we will certainly look at NAFTA having the same dispute settlement mechanism we were able to put into this free trade agreement. It has been a very sound investment for Canada. In fact we are the only country that has such an agreement with the United States, and it has proven to be very effective.

Also I must say in conclusion that this year, since the free trade agreement and with the recession in full bloom, we are still ahead. We have a surplus trade of $5 billion with the United States and that is thanks to the free trade agreement.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment.

First of all, I think the hon. member made an excellent speech. We should not be unrealistic and remain oblivious to what is going on while the globalization of world markets is taking place. If Canada does not get involved now to protect its position in the international community, especially when we realize that Canada is a trading nation that depends on exports, we will be blamed for not doing our job. Our government is doing its job.

When the hon. member for Longueuil says that free trade in the agricultural sector was a disaster because we failed to protect supply management systems, I would ask him to take another look at section 710, in which GATT article XI was kept intact. Article XI is something else. I agree it is hard for people who are regionalists to understand globalization, but when we consider what has been done and how the government is negotiating, whether we are talking about strengthening article XI or the dispute settlement mechanisms we put in place through the FTA, I think the Canadian economy is better off as a result.

As the hon. member pointed out, market restructuring is taking place throughout the world. It is something we cannot escape. We can blame free trade, we can blame GATT, but we certainly cannot blame the federal government for trying to put in place the kind of mechanisms that have proved worth while. In the agricultural sector, for instance, we had a settlement in the pork industry thanks to the binational panel—with members from the United States and Canada—which was able to settle this dispute.

Otherwise, farm producers in Quebec and Canada would still be losing millions of dollars.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in what I consider to be far too short a period of time. I want first of all to thank my colleague from Etobicoke North for his foresight, or I should say soothsayersight, for bringing this particular motion to the House:

> That this House condemn the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

I say that it was either as a soothsayer or with great foresight, because who would have known that we would have got all this information out of The Toronto Star this morning. It is a sad way in Canadian life for Canadian people to learn through a newspaper about what is going to happen to them in their daily lives and the impact on their world of work and their world of play that is going to take place, rather than on the floor of this House of Commons where we have been calling for open and clear understanding and the tabling of documents that would indicate whether or not we as parliamentarians and we as the people of Canada found this to be a proper kind of trade direction.

All I can say is thank goodness for the media. We do not always love them, but certainly they do bring us the kind of information which obviously this government does not feel that it wants to share in the normal and everyday way that would be expected if we could trust its judgment.

I listened to the Minister for International Trade during Question Period answering a whole series of questions. He kept repeating that we should have transparent rules and things should be clearly understood.

I listened to my colleague who just finished talking about ITACs, SAGITs and all such acronyms. I can guarantee that members of the general public of Canada who have lost their jobs, 1.5 million out of work, over 1.5 million or 2 million who are not only on unemployment but have now fallen through the cracks on to social welfare, have never heard of ITAC or SAGIT. They know this minister promised them jobs, jobs and jobs, but they also know that they are out of work. Do not tell us only about the recession. It was very poor planning by this government. It brought in wrong moves at the wrong time. That is what we got as a people with a government that does not exactly know how to plan, nor does it have a strategy for the future that will be in the best interest of its people.

As the critic for culture and communications, I look at how my area of interest is affected. It is my responsibility to question the government in this House. That is the opposition's role. If we look at the communications side, we find it extremely interesting The Toronto Star told us this morning that it was going to open up the Canadian telecommunication industry to the United States and to Mexico. It was also going to ensure that the protection of Canadian cultural industries obtained in the Canada–U.S. deal would remain in place in the new North American free trade agreement.

I would like to be able to address both of these. I will certainly not be able to do so in the time period I have now. However, if we talk about cultural industries, how can one presume that they are protected with clause 2005 which is like a notwithstanding clause? We see what happened to the book publishing industry as the Baie Comeau policy went down in flames to accommodate new considerations by this government. A proper film distribution bill would have helped the film industry in this country.

We see how a former minister, Flora MacDonald, had to water it down. Even then that film distribution bill did not get in because Mr. Jack Valenti, a very strong personality who knows how important the cultural entertainment industry is in terms of revenues to the United States, could not care less what it does to Canada or its sense of development of Canadian peoplehood, Canadian identity and Canadian unity. The mechanism that gets that information to many of those disciplines is through the communication vehicles. That includes all new forms of telecommunications which are very much impacted by this particular agreement.

Telecommunications is a vastly changing and dynamic structure within the whole world.

• (1620)

It is in that sector that the Americans have been trying for years to get their foot, the service sector, whether it is here through the free trade agreement or internationally through GATT. That is where the Americans want to go.

They have never accepted the fact that they did not get there through the first free trade agreement totally to their satisfaction. Now they want to try again.

One of the better ways to do that, of course, is through telecommunications. I know the minister told me during Question Period that I should read the agreement. It is 80 per cent ownership.

I would like the Minister for International Trade to maybe consult with the Minister of Communications who should both know that Bell Canada and B.C. Tel are major telecommunications companies that provide local and long distance services. Yes, they are supposed to be 80 per cent Canadian owned, but they are not 80 per cent of the telephoning universe.

It is the other part of that universe that we are concerned about that is not going to be covered, not going to be protected. It is not going to be open and where the American interests are going to be involved.

Now the minister tells me: "Do not forget, Sheila, you are very avant-garde". Canada is marvellous in the field of telecommunications. We want access to Mexico. We need to have protection right here in Canada for this evolving, dynamic sector. It will be a regional development tool. It is the research and development expertise that can be marketed around the world, but only when we are assured that there is Canadian ownership and Canadian interest involved.

I can tell you that the resellers are much more interested in becoming stabilized in this country and in having protection and not being owned other than by Canadians. They are not the ones who are running to Mexico to get into the telecommunications business.

When they open Canadian telecommunications to the United States and Mexico, I would say it is going to have a very serious impact on the government's potential to use this as an industrial lever, as an economic tool for the development of this country, as we recognize more and more that the fax machine is fairly new to our consciousness, that the telephones that you walk around and carry are new, there are going to be other new things.

If you stop and think about our broadcast industry, how do we know what the newest kind of telecommunications technology will be that will impact on what is carried on our sets, whether it is that little set, that little box, whether it is going to be for programming or non-programming services? How are we going to ensure that we have some Canadian content?

That famous phrase "Canadian content" has one real story behind it. The story behind that is Canadian jobs. Canadian researchers, Canadian development, Canadian technology: because we are good at them, we should give them away and allow AT&T, MCI and Sprint to move in here. We know very well they would be the best and the fastest at gobbling up what could be a very good and lucrative industry for them.

We need it for us. We have enough problems with all the industries, such as the manufacturing industry, going down the tube. A lot of the industrial sectors are a challenge. They are the automobile sector, the magnesium sector, the lumber industry. What are we going to have left?

It is time for this government to be more forthcoming about what its goals are. I do not know what they could possibly be. Maybe those members all want to become part of the United States.

One of the major issues for me in communications is an assurance and a safeguard so that we can have some kind of control over the growth and development of this very new, evolving service sector and assurances that we will control it at least to 80 per cent. I do not think that that is such a terrible thing for us to ask.

When we look at book publishing for an example, film production as another example, or whether we look at the sound recording industry, I think I have made the point time and time again in this House that we are a culturally occupied country. We have to find the levers of economic and cultural development so that we can be assured of maintaining access to foreign cultural materials.

No way are we going to close that down. We do not want to close it down, but we certainly would like to have some little part of it for ourselves. We do not want three out of four being foreign in every single sphere that I just finished mentioning.

I have to laugh sometimes when I hear this government tell us how well it has protected us. It has protected us so well that it put in clause 2005. Peter Murphy, who did the negotiations, said he considered that Canadian cultural issues were a joke during the entire free trade talks. Some joke. I do not find it a joke. You do not find it a joke and I do not think Canadians find it a joke.

He went on to say that the Americans exploited Canadian concerns over losing control of such institutions as the CBC, book publishing and motion picture production as a bargaining chip.

A bargaining chip? Is that what we are to the United States, our culture, our people, our songs, our verses, our music, our books? Well, Mr. Speaker, clause 2005 shows we never got protected from the Americans in the last free trade deal. I wonder what is going to happen in this one.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member on her very informative speech. Certainly she is very familiar and very knowledgeable in the whole area.

I want to ask her a question but before I do I want to comment on this motion that is before the House condemning the federal government for not being fully open with the Canadian people about the negotiations being carried out under the North American free trade agreement.

I find it appalling. In fact it is unbelievable that the Canadian people have to learn about these negotiations through an article carried in The Toronto Star today.

It seems to me that this government is saying "trust us". The Canadian public feel they cannot trust this government after what has happened in the free trade agreement because Canadians were told all kinds of things which have not come about. For example, Canadians were told that they would have an adjustment program. There has been no adjustment program put in place.

I could go on and on but I know my time is limited in questions and comments so I want to ask a question of the hon. member.

Does the member agree that the government owes it to the Canadian people to be more forthright about the current negotiation of the North American free trade agreement?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for the question.

I guess the comment from the member for Halton—Peel gave us the answer. As you were speaking so eloquently about openness, he found it rather deplorable, in fact anathema I guess, to the way we found out about it. The answer from the member for Halton—Peel was that it was planted.

It is a disgrace that the only way the people of Canada and the opposition members of this House, and in fact I would care to say most members of even the government side, even found out what was in the free trade agreement that their ministers had been negotiating was through the release of a plant. That we terrible people, or some people who have Liberal leanings, which means openness of spirit, understanding, let the public know that we do not do things in secret behind closed doors, that is the answer.

The answer is, Mr. Nader of the United States we thank you, and The Toronto Star we thank you, and certainly we give a great big raspberry to the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I must mention that my colleague from Mount Royal and I sit on some committees. I certainly listened to her presentation. I do not agree with it, of course. I find it very pessimistic and closed-minded for somone of her calibre.

That said, three words really struck and almost shocked me. Our colleague from Mount Royal spoke of a "culturally occupied country". I would take that to mean that our culture is like that of an occupied country. I am sure that she said more than she meant and I would certainly like her to take a few moments to restate her position on our living in a culturally occupied country.

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mount Royal has up to one minute.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Outremont. No, I did not make a mistake. I chose my words very carefully and fully aware of what I was talking about.

When three quarters of the books sold in Canada come from abroad, when three quarters of the revenue from films shown in our movie theatres does not stay here in Canada but goes abroad, to the multinationals, when more than three quarters of the magazines sold—

[English]

—through Canadian news stands originate outside of Canada—

when nine tenths of the tapes, songs, records and all that come from outside Canada, I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, hon. members, that we are indeed a culturally occupied country.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to speak on my party's motion which condemns the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its plans, its goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

Trade issues are of utmost importance to Canadians, certainly western Canadians. In large measure our country was built on our exportability. It is what drives the economy of much of our land and many thousands of our fellow citizens.

Yet trade is an area of public policy about which the people of Canada know less than we might. It is not because we are ignorant of its impact on our economy or our social fabric. It is not because we would rather leave these decisions to officials.

Canadians know less about trade than we ought to because this government likes it that way. It fooled many of us once before in the debate over the free trade agreement with the United States and now it wants to hoodwink the people of Canada again over the North American free trade, NAFTA.

All of us in this House are familiar with the old adage: "You can fool some of the people some of the time". Canadians will not be fooled again.

Request after request to the government to inform the House on behalf of 27 million Canadians on the progress of the NAFTA talks has been met with rejection. Such divulging would threaten the talks, they say. "Trust us. We know what is good for Canada."

My colleague for Etobicoke North has risen on numerous occasions to ask the Minister for International Trade for details on the progress of the negotiations. He has asked him for a copy of the bracketed agreement now in circulation, as my colleague from Mount Royal said a minute ago, leaked through Ralph Nader in Washington.

He along with many more on this side of the House have asked the government for even the most general of statements about progress on such items as human rights. Mexico's record on human rights, Mr. Speaker, is not what you and I would want it to be, nor in my view on democracy either, environmental standards, health and safety and the like.

No answers have been forthcoming. It seems that the government is not willing to address these issues until after the deal is done and ready to be rammed through this House with only token debate like so many other pieces of its legislation.

My colleague from Etobicoke North is a reasonable man. He would not ask the government to reveal any information that would compromise the bargaining position of our country. He is a former diplomat of stature. The member for Etobicoke North is probably far more aware of the intricacies of trilateral negotiations than the minister of whom he seeks answers. Yet he is treated by those opposite with things like: "Don't worry, be happy. We'll tell you about the deal when the time is right".

As negotiations enter the home stretch, the time of that right is now. Having seen the economic havoc in this country in part caused by the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the Canadian people hardly want to see this government sign another deal without some concrete precautions. The main issue we are talking about today is the integrity of this government, not simply the pros and cons of a North American free trade agreement. Integrity is not something Canadians are used to seeing from the folks across the way. They are more accustomed to seeing a veil of secrecy descend upon all of their schemes until it is too late to have any impact.

If this government was serious about lending some element of integrity to its trade debate, it would lift the veil of secrecy which currently shields Canadians from knowing all they must know about these negotiations.

In the scheme of things what are we to expect from this government? It has made an art form of state secrecy on very important issues. This is clear from an article on March 13 by Eric Beauchesne of Southam News. The author gave an account of how the Tories have cut funding or access to government departments and agencies and their propensity for publicizing valuable but sometimes embarrassing information.

Mr. Beauchesne wrote: "Stifling the flow of potentially harmful political information has become a Progressive Conservative government trademark".

It is unfortunate that the trademark must descend upon this issue of trade. It is an issue of interest to all of our constituents. We realize that our economic future depends on trade and we must ask ourselves how much we are willing to give up for just secure access to markets without acquiring some type of protection against the countervailing actions taken on items such as softwood lumber.

In 1990 Canada imported $1.7 billion worth of goods from Mexico, accounting for merely 1.3 per cent of our imports. The same year we exported approximately $600 million in goods to Mexico, accounting for .4 per cent of our exports.

In 1990, direct investment in Canada by Mexican firms and individuals accounted for the grand total of $4 million. That is a rather meagre figure in the scheme of things.

These are cursory figures but they say a lot about our relationship with Mexico. I am sure there are ways we can increase our trade with that country if we so desire without having to sign a trilateral free trade deal along with the United States. Why, in a most agonizing recession, does the government insist that our current free trade agreement with the U.S. must be extended to Mexico and changed? For a country that accounts for 1.3 per cent of our imports, the sky will not fall if we ask a few basic questions on the nature of the negotiations.

As a western Canadian, the priority this government has given to trade within North America does not make all that much sense. There is real work to be done in enhancing our relationship with the Asia Pacific where already four of ten residents of the planet live and where a great deal of the consumption and economic growth in the world is taking place.

The notion that economic prosperity and full employment in Canada hinges primarily on free trade with the United States, and perhaps Mexico, is based on a rather outmoded model of international trade. As the developed world lurches toward a diversified and lean approach to economic interrelationships, Canada seems content to stick with its narrow vision of continentalism.

Seeking an enhanced trading relationship with as many strategically important nations as possible remains as much a fundamental component to trade liberalization as the desire to bring down tariffs and non-tariff barriers. The fastest growing market on the face of the earth lies along the Asian rim of the Pacific Ocean. As rapid advances in transportation and communication technology have proven in recent years, one ocean is not a significant geographic barrier in the 1990s.

There are more important reasons, however, why Canada ought to devote more energy and enthusiasm toward building a more rewarding trade relationship with the Asia Pacific.

The Asia Pacific region will be home to approximately 600 million relatively affluent consumers by the turn of the century. The market will be very large and profitable for many Canadian commodities, products and services in addition to natural resources.

The advanced nations of the Asia Pacific are on the cutting edge of technology development and productivity enhancement. A closer and broader relationship with them could result in the fruits of their research and development initiatives and industrial strategies reaching the hands of Canadian firms committed to sustained and comprehensive joint ventures.

Embracing the concept of a broader Asia Pacific–Canada co–operation would begin to improve prospects for diversified economic development and sustained prosperity for about eight million western and northern Canadians. Two–way transfers of technical, education, managerial and professional skills are areas offering particular promise.

A healthy trade relationship with markets in the Asia Pacific region would provide a counterweight to offset the economic and political dominance of the U.S., enhanced by the FTA.

Thousands of people now immigrate to Canada every year from Asia Pacific countries. Many of them are skilled professionals with numerous contacts and an abundance of knowledge pertaining to commercial ventures in their native lands. Many others come to Canada on student visas to attend our universities and colleagues. Many in the Asia Pacific see North America as an exceptional venue for investing capital. An Asia Pacific trade strategy must seek to persuade more ventures of all sizes to focus more attention on direct investment in our country.

Our FTA, as everybody but the government knows, has proven to be a very uneasy commercial accord, to say the least. In the three years since its implementation, it has become clear that Canada under the present agreement will either have to adapt our economic, social and political institutions to reflect those of our more powerful partner, or we can watch our once enviable manufacturing sector disappear. It is hard to see how Canada can achieve a truly global trade profile within a parochial trade bloc.

One of Canada's foremost economists, Sylvia Ostry, addressed the sorry state of Canada's competitiveness in the following way: "Pursuing a purely North American strategy cannot provide a safe haven".

Today, western Canadians, and I think all Canadians, have grown weary of a Europe–centric and a U.S.–centric approach to developing trade priorities. While our neighbour to the south has been a valued and respected commercial partner throughout our history, our neighbours across the Pacific Ocean have redefined international economic order of the future.

Last year 80 per cent of Canada's entire export trade with this region involved the four western provinces. By comparison, the western provinces only accounted for 22 per cent of Canada's exports to the United States. Our proximity in the west to Pacific ports would be ideal for manufacturing interests and high technology industries which wish to establish factories to produce goods for export to Asia.

Japan has become Canada's second largest trading partner with a total export trade value of over $8 billion in 1990, second only to the United States. Trade officials expect Japan to become British Columbia's top trade partner this year.

As well, 54 per cent of all immigrants from Asia Pacific who come to Canada settle in the four western provinces. Many of them, as I have said, are highly energetic entrepreneurial people who can do so much to help us increase our trade with the countries they formerly lived in.

Finally, large firms in the Asia Pacific see Canada as a great venue for investing capital and purchasing securities. Yet generally speaking Canadian firms still do not seem to be aggressive enough in seeking out those sources of capital and trade. This situation persists despite the fact that $4.1 billion in direct investment came to Canada from Hong Kong alone in 1990.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time of the hon. member has now expired.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating my colleague for his speech. In it he pointed out the need for Canada to diversify its trade and expand its trade, particularly into the Pacific region where there is great potential. He points out that this is a natural market for British Columbia and all of western Canada, and of course benefiting the entire country in the long run.

During the last debate on free trade, the debate on the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we in this party expressed grave concern about the negotiations at that time because we firmly believed that that agreement as it was developing would put great pressure on Canadian social programs and would lead to the harmonization of Canadian social programs with American ones. We said that, knowing that in many American states they had virtually no unemployment insurance, they did not have a medicare and hospitalization program, their social safety net on the whole was not as fair and as substantial as ours.

Since the agreement went into effect in 1989, we have seen substantial cutbacks in our unemployment insurance program; cutbacks under the Canadian Assistance Plan to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. We have seen clawbacks on old age security. We have now seen the cancellation of a national day care program, and so on. The direction of social programs in Canada has gone backward and has, in fact, confirmed what we feared and the fear that we expressed in the debate of 1987 and 1988.

I want to ask the hon. member about the present negotiations with Mexico and the United States on this newly proposed free trade agreement.

Does he know enough that would assure him that our social programs, some of them that are the envy of the world, are not going to be still further under threat and subject to a harmonization that would go much broader than the present harmonization. The reason for that is in order to attract business from the United States and Mexico, we have to reduce our commitment to these things, reduce our payments for them and let people fend for themselves.

In this motion, we are asking the government to give us more information. Does he feel that on this particular point that we have enough information?

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague who asked the question may not have seen the article in today's Toronto Star.

You wonder what country other than Canada on the face of the earth would have to refer to a document leaked to Ralph Nader in Washington and reported through one of our newspapers to know what is in an agreement that affects every one of us.

To my colleague for Montreal, the specific reference appears to be: "There appears to be no specific protection provided in critical areas of the environment, health and safety standards, and workers' rights". As I am sure the member knows, to become a member of the European Community, you have to accept 7 of 21 features of a social charter dealing with things like social programs and social safety nets. If I can be quite candid, and I am speaking only for myself, many months ago President Salinas of Mexico stood a short distance ahead of you, Mr. Speaker, and he told us that Mexico had never wavered on the path to democracy. When I heard that, I almost fell off my chair.

I know he has done much. He is making improvements and I salute him for that. But I do not think that in terms of the pantheon of democracy Mexico has yet got a very privileged spot in that place.

A truly democratic system of government is one of the other requirements for membership in the European Community. I would ask those opposite to tell us whether they think that Mexico would qualify for the democratic test as applied by the European Community for membership in that other trading organization.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to make some comments on the NAFTA agreement.

Negotiations toward a North American free trade agreement are one component of the government's over-all economic and trade strategy aimed at enhancing Canada's future growth and competitiveness. The negotiations are seeking to create a North American market, free of tariffs and non-tariff barriers. The agreement would permit the free flow of goods, services and investments among the three countries. It would provide for the protection of intellectual property rights and it would establish a fair and expeditious dispute settlement mechanism. It would create a market of 360 million people, larger than the 12 countries of the European Community.

This is an ambitious undertaking. The agreement is being negotiated at a timely moment. The nations of the world are struggling to complete multilateral negotiations aimed at creating a more level playing field for exporters. As a trade dependent country, Canada will benefit from more open markets globally. While Canada currently ranks eighth in the world in the export of goods, and twelfth in the exported services, our future prosperity depends on building upon this successful track record.

This has nothing to do with playgrounds. Three million jobs in Canada are dependent on exports and are on the line. The export community has underlined the importance of a more focused approach to supporting Canadian businesses in its pursuit to global market opportunities.

The NAFTA negotiations constitute but one step in this direction. To be competitive in the world, our industry must successfully compete in North America. The North American agreement would benefit the wide range of export-oriented Canadian goods, producers and service providers.

I would like to focus my remarks on how the NAFTA will especially help smaller and medium-sized Canadian companies. With a growth population and economic reforms that have opened up its economy, Mexico is becoming North America's fastest-growing market. The country's annual economic growth exceeded 4 per cent in 1991 and imports are increasing by more than 30 per cent annually.

This offers immediate markets for Canadian suppliers of competitive products and services that are urgently needed for Mexico's modernization and diversification. Its potential as a key market is undeniable and the NAFTA will secure the access of this growing market to Canadian exporters.

The success of the recent Canadian Expo '92 in Monterrey, Mexico underscored that a wide range of Canadian firms are already focusing on opportunities created by the launch of the North American negotiations.

More than 200 firms from across Canada representing 11 industrial sectors participated in Canada's largest trade promotion ever held in Latin America. Judging from the results, participation in that show was well worth the effort. There was close to $3 million in on-site sales and an additional $80 million expected over the next 12 to 18 months.

For other small to medium-sized Canadian firms, the NAFTA will provide important opportunities to improve their competitive positions in the more medium term. We strongly believe an agreement will encourage small and medium-sized firms to form the strategic alliances in North America that can give them the needed edge to meet and beat tough offshore competition.

Japanese business success shows how a company should use the best of the resources available to it, whether those resources be domestic or foreign. A North American free trade agreement will permit companies in all three countries to do just that. They will put into action the best of what each country has to offer.

Of course, many smaller Canadian firms have yet to discover Mexico as a market. Just as the free trade agreement encouraged some Canadian firms to think about exports to the United States, for the first time the prospect of a NAFTA has already stimulated unprecedented levels of interest on the part of Canadian firms in the dynamic markets of Latin America.

For the smaller firms focusing on the U.S.A. market, the NAFTA will add to the gains of the FTA. We will not allow the hard-fought deals made in the FTA to be reopened nor accept reductions in benefits that accrue to Canada under this agreement. But if during the NAFTA negotiations we see possibilities for improving the provisions of the FTA in ways that can benefit Canada, then we will do so.

We believe improvements may be possible with respect to such practical matters as more straightforward rules of origin and greater customs co-operation. This is not necessarily the stuff of headlines but it represents real improvements on day-to-day operations of businesses exporting within North America. These are the kinds of improvements that will benefit most small Canadian companies.

In the controversy generated around initiatives such as this one, the main purpose of our efforts sometimes becomes obscure or forgotten. It is plainly stated to reduce obstacles to trade. There is nothing base about this idea especially to a small and dynamic trade-dependent country.

Canadian negotiators will focus on dismantling Mexico's trade barriers which have hampered the efforts of Canadian exporters to compete for a slice of the Mexican market of 85 million people. They will focus on a trilateral deal which will preclude a bilateral U.S.-Mexico trade deal that would have created preferential access for the U.S. and stacked the deck against Canadian businesses and our economy. They will ensure that Canadian manufacturers have access to cost-efficient inputs and that Canadian exporters can forge the strategic alliances in North America needed to improve their competitiveness.

As our export statistics indicate, even small and medium-sized Canadian firms have already shown they have the know-how and ability to make important inroads in international markets. NAFTA will be another important tool to ensure that these firms have a freer environment to capitalize on.

In summary, this debate is not about playgrounds. It is real to the three million Canadians who depend on exports for their livelihood. It is real to the many small and medium-sized Canadian companies which are striving to make further inroads into international markets for the benefit of Canadians who depend on their success.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I thought the analogy of playgrounds was quite good, except all of our playthings are being taken away.

I want to ask the member a simple question. We all recognize that the previous negotiator in the free trade agreement was Simon Reisman. The question I would ask the member is: Who is our chief negotiator now for Canada? If we went out there on the streets in any city in this country, Ottawa, Sault Ste. Marie, or in the member's riding and asked: "Who is the chief negotiator right now for Canada?" I suspect that no one would know.

I want to give that answer. The man's name is John Weekes. John Weekes made a speech on June 3, 1991. I want to give him credit because he has received little credit and little notoriety. No one knows who John Weekes is nor what he is saying about this agreement. I want to cite several excerpts from his speech and I would ask the member to comment on the content of what this person, this chief negotiator said for us. He said: "This government has introduced adjustment programs to help workers adapt to the demands of the modern outward-looking economy". Of course, the government has not and it did not introduce any adjustment programs.

He goes on to say: "We will certainly not allow the hard-fought deals made in the free trade agreement to be reopened". I suspect that is contradictory. "Canada will be seeking improved access to the U.S. government procurement market". That will not happen. It did not happen. It will not happen.

He said: "It is evident that Canadian firms can benefit from the lower cost inputs of the Mexican marketplace". That tells me to let us go take advantage of these Mexican workers.

Finally, the pièce de résistance in the comments: "The Canadian government is very conscious of the need to consult closely with Canadians". He did not say via the Toronto Star. "This is as true for NAFTA as it is with the Uruguay round of the GATT". Is this the close consultation that Mr. Weekes meant, that he would negotiate through the Toronto Star? This is quite a speech. It just flies in the face as to what really has happened in the NAFTA negotiations.

I would ask the member to comment on the speech of John Weekes, our chief negotiator.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his comments. I am sure that he realizes that not every negotiator is the same. Mr. Weekes of course is a low-key negotiator, an individual who likes to negotiate from behind the scenes and has been very effective at that.

I have not seen the comments that my hon. colleague brings forward which are supposed to have been from our negotiator. I am sure that Mr. Weekes is very careful in the things that he says. He has done an exceptional job to date for Canada in the negotiations at NAFTA.

I think too that he talked about a dynamic economy. I believe that is what will happen to Canada when we have the successful conclusion of the NAFTA agreement and the successful conclusion of the GATT.

• (1700)

We are poised to go forward on a steady and strong base here in Canada. We look forward to doing that as we have many Canadians waiting for that opportunity so the economy can expand and continue to employ Canadians in this great country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to speak on this opposition motion put forward by my colleague from Etobicoke North.

I would like to repeat it for those listening this afternoon:

That this House condemn the Government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

The central issue in public life today is trust because of the experience with the last free trade agreement. When I say experience I mean the results that have occurred in our economy, the job losses, the rapid deterioration of our manufacturing base in southern Ontario, the incidents we have had in terms of softwood lumber, the Honda dispute in Alliston, and on and on it goes.

There is the natural feeling that any further negotiation would leave us as a nation more exposed in any kind of a free trade agreement. How could it possibly be a benefit to Canada? How could it possibly be a benefit to those whose lives depend upon exports not only to the United States, but also to the rest of the world?

We are forgetting some of the things that have happened as a result of this free trade agreement in relation to manufacturing, not only the shrinking of the economy but also the way head offices in the United States have basically shut down their manufacturing in Canada. They have basically turned their Canadian operations into nothing more than distribution centres or marketing and sales operations.

There are so many of these incidents happening across the country that we now naturally get the feeling that there is even a greater danger as we continue with a similar trading relationship with Mexico. It is absolutely essential, if we are going to begin any kind of a rebuild on trust in any kind of a trade negotiation, that these discussions be totally open. There should not be any action that looks like we are doing this behind closed doors.

Most of us in this House know that one of the things that Canadians do not like is the fact that we seem to be tying our trade destiny to the United States.

One of the greatest assets that we have in this country is the fact that we are a multicultural nation. Over the last 20 years this country has spent millions and millions of dollars encouraging people to retain their cultural heritage and their language. We have people who have come to this country from all over the world.

When we first started on multiculturalism back in 1971, there was an awful lot of criticism as to why we would be spending taxpayers' money and encouraging people to retain and promote their cultural heritage.

Here we are in the 1990s and the greatest trading asset that we have in this country is the fact that we have people from every part of the world, Canadian citizens, who have retained their cultural heritage and language because of this government's policies. It means they can now go to any country in the world. We do not need to have our trade policy linked and welded to the United States. Naturally we are going to continue to enjoy that great trading relationship, but we should make sure we develop some counterweights.

My colleague from Etobicoke North wrote a paper a few months ago. He suggested it was essential we build counterweights in this country to the United States.

I happen to think one of the counterweights, in terms of trade, is the fact that because of our multicultural fabric, we can send people all over the world.

About five years ago I had the opportunity to work for an auto parts manufacturer, Magna International. We had an opportunity to go to Tokyo to make a presentation to the Toyota operation. We made sure we brought a couple of young Japanese Canadians with us on that trip who were fluent in Japanese and understood the culture. These Japanese Canadians played such an incredibly productive role in our negotiations that we were able to bring back an order that was close to $50 million on our first visit.

That order created a lot of jobs in our factory here in Canada and I dare say it was because we brought Canadians of Japanese origin to that table, who had the facility of language and were so comfortable with the culture.

We can do that in every region of the world. We have had many people go to different parts of the world in the last few years from this House. We have always been able to have very special connections because there has either been someone in our constituency who was from the particular region we were visiting, or they had friends or family there. We have never really fully exploited the linkage of language and culture that we have encouraged, promoted and built in this country over the last 20 years.

I think the government should not be so possessed and preoccupied in terms of the North American scene. It should start putting an added thrust in other parts of the world and use our assets. The owners of small and medium sized businesses need the support and assistance of government to re-establish those linkages. The mere fact they have that facility of language and culture would access us to those markets in very short order. That would allow us to have the counterweight in our trading policy that would give us a much stronger position when we are trading with the Americans.

The other counterweight when it comes to the United States is the fact we have the most fresh water of any nation in the world. It is no secret to anyone in North America that eventually the Americans are going to need our water.

We should make absolutely sure in whatever discussions go on here that water is not part of any trade deal in any way, shape, or form.

I think we would be doing a tremendous disservice to Canadians if we were cloudy on that particular issue.

I support the member for Etobicoke North's motion. There is such a low level of trust in any kind of trade negotiations going on in this country right now, that the government is going to have to bend over backward to rebuild that trust.

• (1710)

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood that counterweights are very important and I would like to pursue the point with him.

The member was talking about his former employment with Magna Corporation. I should report to him that only half an hour ago I spoke with Mr. Frank Stronach who is a very strong supporter of referenda in this country and there are great developments on that front. But I would like to ask him about when he was employed in the Prime Minister's office.

When the member speaks to us today in the House about counterweights, he is certainly reflecting the talk, attitude and ideas of former Prime Minister Trudeau, who often spoke about creating counterweights. I recall Prime Minister Trudeau speaking about the importance of creating counterweights to the United States in the trading partnership. His government was going to negotiate a special deal with the European Community. Canada would forge these new dialogues on a north-south basis and we would build up that kind of counterweight.

At the end of the day, we saw sliding down the banisters and pirouettes behind Her Majesty at some of these meetings that were supposed to be dealing with the economic trade issues. A royal commission on Canada's future economic prospects was set up which, at that time, like most royal commissions, cost a lot of money and took a long time to finally tell us what it wanted to share with us. The recommendations were made to the Mulroney government because there had been a change by then. The recommendations obviously were so persuasive coming from the royal commission created by Prime Minister Trudeau that they caused the Conservative Party to reverse its historic position on trade with the United States without any real internal debate within the Conservative Party.

Could the member go back to his thinking of his time with his former employer and the policies of the Trudeau government, before he is coached by our fellow colleague from another metro Toronto constituency who has a lack of confidence in the member for Broadview—Greenwood who thinks he has to go and pull a few of these Charlie McCarthy things? I am sure the member for Broadview—Greenwood can answer this without any coaching from the member from some other part of metro Toronto.

Mr. Mills: I am happy to hear my friend from Etobicoke—Lakeshore had such a productive conversation with my former employer on referendum. Maybe he can use Mr. Stronach to have some influence on his party and its leader responsible for constitutional affairs to advance the idea of referenda in this country.

No offence to you or those in this House who believe in referenda, but we have not had a strong influence on the minister. Maybe Mr. Stronach can use his charm and maybe we will get somewhere.

I want to go back to the point the member made regarding the royal commission on the economy. My colleague from Willowdale reminded me they did call for adjustments. In other words, you did this free trade deal and you left absolutely no room for any kind of economic adjustments. The Royal Commission on the Economy agreed to free trade, but said there must absolutely be adjustments. He just sort of left those out and that is a key point.

I want to go back to Mr. Trudeau. He was not anti-American as some people try to pretend in their language and newspapers. Mr. Trudeau constantly favoured a global trading position for this country so we were not totally dependent on our American friends to the south. To this day when you travel in Europe, the Middle East—I cannot speak for South America—or some parts of Africa and speak to businessmen there, they have an image of this country and it is Trudeau. It is a good one and they saw him as a positive force on trade. To this day, we owe the former Prime Minister a great deal of debt and gratitude for his trading skills.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is rather embarrassing to see the Tories squabbling. Some are in favour of a referendum and others are opposed to the idea. However, I must say the minister has done a good job, and we support him. We wish him the best of luck with the constitutional proposals.

[English]

It would help our national unity if we had an economy that was vibrant and strong, instead of losing jobs overnight to the United States.

I would like to look at just one sector of our economy that has lost badly in the three years under free trade. It is not just because of free trade, but because of a whole raft of Tory economic policies which tilted the playing field in favour of the Americans, such as our high interest rates policies, our high dollar policies, our high tax policies and our GST. The NDP programs in Ontario are threatening to create labour strife and drive more and more jobs out of province. A previous government did not suggest or enact in Ontario the programs that are now being advocated.

Let us get back to the issue of this government's program for free trade and what it has done to our auto sector. In the three years since free trade, Canada has lost 127,213 automotive jobs in assembly and auto parts manufacturing. That is, 21 per cent of all the jobs in that industry in three years have disappeared.

Now the Tories will tell us some of those jobs have been lost in the United States as well. Of course they have. They have not lost 21 per cent of their automotive jobs, they have lost only 9 per cent of them. So you cannot blame that on the recession. The fact is we are losing jobs more quickly than they are.

They now have an opportunity with the North American free trade agreement to perhaps make some changes to the way in which we trade in automobiles. I hope they will make these changes.

I suggest they consider a North American content rule. Presently we have a free trade agreement in Canada which says you can trade free trade in automotives if you have a 50 per cent North American content. You saw what happened in the Honda case. The Americans claimed they just did not quite meet the 50 per cent level, therefore the Americans could impose taxes on cars made in Ontario and shipped to the United States.

I want this House to reconsider this 50 per cent North American content rule. Are we going to be the only free traders in the world in automotives or not? I wish we had genuine free trade in many things in this world and a level playing field but the reality is, we do not. When you look at foreign penetration of the European Community, they are now arguing among themselves whether by the year 2000 they will allow non-European automobiles into their market to the tune of 15 per cent or 17 per cent. That is the debate. In Japan, foreign automobile makers have 3 per cent of the market. What do we have in Canada? It is 37 per cent. Should we be the only free traders in a world where our competition is not free trading? This is one of the issues we have to face. Free trade may be good for consumers. It may be the right thing to do, but it is not what our competitors do. So let us not be naive.

There are ways in which we can reduce this 37 per cent penetration by foreigners of our automobile markets in North America. I really think in the interests of jobs that we have to consider some of those measures.

People will say that if we do not have unbridled competition we are going to suffer in terms of our competitiveness because we will not be as productive and we will not have the quality. We can overcome those objections by working closely with our auto manufacturers to ensure that they are world class.

I am impressed that under the threat of Japanese competition in the last few years we have increased our productivity and our quality to a point where North American vehicles are good vehicles. Let us start to get those jobs back and continue the progress we have made in terms of quality and productivity.

Are we going to have Canadian content rules, not just greater North American content rules but Canadian content rules in a North American free trade zone? If we do not, we will find ourselves in the precise position we are in today where under the free trade agreement with the United States the big three can pull their production out of Canada. They do not have to buy any Canadian parts. After the year 1998 when all the tariffs are phased out they can ship duty–free into Canada without having one Canadian job here. That is the way the present trade regime works.

In other words, the free trade agreement wiped out the auto pact. Under the auto pact, in return for participating in Canada's market we insisted that they created a certain number of jobs here. For every car brought into Canada duty free one car had to be produced in Canada. A certain degree of protectionism was offered in return for jobs.

That is what we are doing today as well under the entire concept of a North American free trade agreement. There was never any concept that we would allow unlimited free trade on a global basis. We were contemplating that we would have a common tariff against foreign automobiles. We were not going to let the foreigners come in without any duties. Therefore, we have said as a North American group that we are not in favour of free trade. We are in favour of erecting some type of barriers against foreign penetration.

Let us not pretend that we are being globalized and involved in free trade when we say as a group that we are going to erect common barriers. We have established what game we are in. It is protectionism in return for jobs. Now let us make sure we get our fair share of jobs. That is why a common North American barrier against foreign penetration is one way of doing it. Having Canadian content is a way to ensure that we will have our fair share of auto jobs here in Canada.

I suggest that we go back to restoring what we had under the auto pact, those safeguards for Canadian jobs. We do not want to give up all auto jobs here in Canada. In return for other North American partners shipping into Canada duty free, let us make sure that they establish a certain number of jobs in Canada. Why is this important? It is because we do not have a totally level playing field right now.

The big three—GM, Chrysler and Ford—are not Canadian companies. They are located in the United States. They are subject to the pressures of the U.S. government. They are subject to pressures of unions which are far bigger. When it comes to closing plants it is highly probable that we do not have the leverage the United States does in making sure that we keep our fair share of jobs.

Let us look at what has happened in the last three years. We have lost auto jobs at two and a third times the rate the Americans have. This is why when we approach these discussions there is no sector more important than the automotive sector. I want to make sure that this government is realistic in terms of world standards and in terms of standing up for Canadians and Canadian auto workers.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in one part of his speech the member for Willowdale was saying that he believed in free trade, a level playing field and global competitiveness. In another part of his speech he was urging that there be a common North American protectionism for North American jobs in the auto area.

I really have two questions I would like to ask him. I do not suggest that the member for Willowdale is being mischievous in the way he is handling the information. I think he seeks to be informed.

An hon. member: Go for it.

Mr. Boyer: In responding to another member from Etobicoke, I really appreciate the resolution this afternoon. It gives us a chance to air some of these issues.

We have had all this discussion about the auto industry in North America in the context of this resolution on free trade, when all of us who read the document basically know that the free trade agreement was apart from the auto pact. I think it is mischievous to draw all this discussion about what is happening to the North American auto industry into the current discussion we are having as if there were not provisions in the existing trade treaty that govern this, and they do.

The loss of jobs in both Canada and the United States of America in the auto industry is clearly part of something else that is going on related to a recession and related to changing patterns of transportation which we have all been encouraging, frankly, in other debates in this House when we talk about the environment. It is time to square this discussion a bit.

The member is talking about this notion of global competitiveness and linking everything difficult that is happening in our country to this ogre of the trade treaty. How does he account for things that have happened in our country such as the closing of Anaconda in my riding? Machines that make nails have been crated and shipped to Poland and are now making nails in Poland from the company's operations in the United States. That is where the machines have gone and those nails are coming on to the world market. A plant in Toronto with 250 employees that made jewellery went bankrupt in the recession. The equipment was bought by an American for 25 cents on the dollar, crated and shipped to St. Petersburg, formerly Leningrad.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Perhaps the member wants an answer.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that we are in a global economy. Let us not get trapped into saying that a global economy means that there are not barriers being erected.

I have to comment first of all on what the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore said. He is usually a very intelligent, a very erudite person, an author, but he has bought into the Tory propaganda that the free trade agreement did not wipe out the auto pact.

The auto pact was not abolished by the free trade agreement. It was left there, but the means of enforcing the auto pact were taken away. Those means were the tariffs which said that duties had to be paid if one car was not produced in Canada for every car brought in. We wiped out those duties. They will be totally phased out by 1998. They did not eliminate the auto pact in the free trade agreement. They just took away the means of enforcing it, which is the same as wiping it out. Let us not be naive. That is what this government has done.

This member said that I was in favour of free trade. Yes, I am in favour of free trade, but is he saying that in the NAFTA agreement they are not going to erect a common barrier against European, Japanese and Korean vehicles coming into North America? Of course they are. The European community erects common barriers against North American and Japanese cars.

This is unfortunately the way of the world. We are in a world that is not engaged in globalized free trade. We are engaged in a world of trading blocs. Let us make sure, first, that our trading bloc gets its fair share of automotive jobs, automotive production. Second, let us make sure that Canada within our own trading bloc has its fair share.

• (1730)

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in this debate today. I would like to make a few remarks off the top about some of the tenor of the debate so far today.

There has been an awful lot of fear-mongering in this Chamber. As we listened to what some of the members in the opposition were saying, a lot of us reflected back to a debate we heard some three and a half years ago during the free trade agreement negotiations with the United States. I am sure we all remember that.

I vividly remember during the last election campaign going around and people saying to me: "Well, the Liberal candidate was here a little while ago and said we were going to lose our social programs when we have free trade with the Americans". Other people told me: "We have been told we are going to lose medicare once we have free trade with the Americans". Then it was water. They said that we were going to lose control of our own natural resources including water, that water was going to be shipped wholesale from Canada to the United States if we entered into this free trade agreement.

It went beyond that. People were being told during the election campaign that free trade meant Canada would lose its infrastructure, that our whole social infrastructure would be lost. Not only that. They were told that our environmental standards would be eroded. That was a big one.

I remember the NDP television commercials with Ed Broadbent or some older guy walking beside a pond with a child. A clear message was being sent to Canadians night after night that if we signed a free trade agreement our environmental standards would go out the window.

All those free trade agreement bogymen are being dragged back into this Chamber once again in a desperate attempt by opposition people to make Canadians believe what they rightfully and forcefully rejected in 1988. That is all that has been going on here today, and I think Canadians deserve a better level of debate than that.

Canadians have been watching this debate. I am sure many of them are confused and a little frustrated by some of the things being said in this Chamber. People are being confused by the black and white nature of the arguments being put forward. Most Canadians know better. They know that the arguments are not all black and they are not all white. There are shades of grey which really dictate it. There are good things about NAFTA. There are things that are not going to be good about NAFTA. It is the role of the Canadian government now to negotiate strongly and forcefully to get the best deal possible for Canada.

I am sure a lot of Canadians listening to the debate today are a little ticked off as well by the politics of fear which are being brought into this debate. It is not logic, not common sense, not a dispassionate look at what is good and bad for Canada, but just a whole bunch of emotional rhetoric designed to frighten people. That is not what Canadians deserve.

The motion we are talking about today reads:

> That the House condemn the government for its failure to be completely open with Canadians about its principal goals and objectives in the current North American free trade negotiations.

How did we get this particular motion today? It is typical of what goes on in Ottawa. A lot of people got up this morning, read the headlines in the newspaper and turned it into a motion in the House of Commons.

On Sunday The Ottawa Citizen ran the second in a series of articles called "The Human Cost of Free Trade". The front page of The Ottawa Citizen had a picture of an impoverished Mexican peasant. Inside there was no reference at all to any of the particulars of the free trade agreement proposals. It was just simply how bad life was in Mexico. We all feel for Mexican peasants. We all want to make their life better. There is a body of thought that says helping the Mexicans improve their economy not only helps the Mexican peasants; it helps Canadians as well.

Then this morning we had this story "Leaked document reveals massive three-way trade plan" splattered all over the front of The Toronto Star. I saw my "Star" this morning and I was pretty interested in the story. It looked like the second coming. I started reading it and thought: "Surely I am going to have some kind of fair and balanced story".

Who leaked the document? What does the document say? What is the government response? What is the context that this happened in?

The story was written by Linda Diebel. Linda Diebel is a pretty good reporter so I expected a fair and balanced story. What do I find? I find a plant, a Ralph Nader plant, in The Toronto Star. They just swallowed it. They took it all, hook, line and sinker. They had no verification whatsoever.

We have quoted in this story the Citizen Tradewatch Campaign, which is a Ralph Nader established organization. We have the Sierra Club quoted in here. It is an American organization being quoted on the agreement.

We have Public Citizen, which is part of the Consumer Advocate Network of Ralph Nader. We have a lot of people quoted in this story. None of them are Canadian. Nobody in the government was given an opportunity to put this into context. It is a totally incredible, one-sided story.

Therefore I would like to read into the record a couple of comments which were made two and a half hours ago just outside this Chamber. They are contained in a story which ran on the Canadian Press wire about an hour ago.

I will quote verbatim a couple of paragraphs: "'A leaked version of the proposed three-way trade agreement among Canada, the United States and Mexico is simply a preliminary document and does not mean Canada has given anything away', according to International Trade Minister Michael Wilson". If somebody should know, he ought to know.

"'It is a draft text', says the minister. 'The document is a very preliminary document'." The minister adds that just because they put forward the couple of proposals contained in that article, it does not mean that Canada is accepting them. In fact, the minister has said that, for example, the proposal on telecommunications that the Americans put forward has been rejected by Canada. We are not buying it.

This particular agreement that is in The Toronto Star and printed as if it is from the Bible is nothing but a working draft negotiating text. End of story. It does not matter. Nothing in this text matters. The Americans put forward their best case of what they wanted from Canada, it does not matter. We are negotiating a deal. We can reject it.

Canadians are watching this debate based on the premise that this planted story by a left wing, activist group from the United States and bought hook, line and sinker by The Toronto Star is fact. We are here tying up the Chamber of the House of Commons debating something which is not based on fact. It is not based in fact. It is not balanced and it is not reasoned journalism. I think it is an insult to a lot of people to put up with this.

I would like to address the NDP claim in this House that somehow the federal government has been trying to muzzle members of Parliament or conceal the facts of NAFTA while U.S. and Mexican parliamentarians have had full access. That is the way the argument has been developed in the Chamber.

Let us review the facts. The Government of Canada has offered a briefing to members of this House to review not a leaked draft text, but the working text that Canada is now proposing at NAFTA.

Members of this House from the government side and the opposition side have the opportunity of being fully briefed, of having it done after signing an agreement that says that the contents will be kept confidential.

That has been put forward as a position that is diametrically opposed to that which the American and Mexican parliamentarians have been offered. I would like to review it.

What have American legislators been offered by their government in terms of having a look at this agreement? The American government is essentially sustaining the same kinds of criticisms that the Canadian government is right now, that the United States is giving confidential briefings to legislators in the United States but they are classified briefings.

The only people being given confidential briefings are members of Congress and their staffers, and private sector trade advisory members and their staffers. Those briefings are only being given to the Americans after a full security background check has been made into those people who will be at the briefing. It is just the same as that being offered here in Canada. But Canadian parliamentarians who are being offered briefings by the government do not have to go through a security check. They just have to agree that what they see will be confidential.

The NDP in this House has made much of saying Mexican senators have been getting briefings on roughly what is in the free trade negotiating documents. What the Mexican senators have been offered is not a confidential briefing. No confidential briefings whatsoever have been offered any members of the Mexican opposition.

I think what the Government of Canada has been offering in this House has been much more than either the Americans or the Mexicans have been offering to our counterparts in those legislatures.

That is myth number one which we have to address here.

Myth number two is that Canadians in general, not just Canadian legislators, have not been informed adequately about has been going on here, about what the heck the government has been doing in terms of negotiating some kind of a free trade agreement with the Americans and the Mexicans.

It is interesting to note that the government has had more than 48 meetings on the North American free trade proposed agreement since negotiations were launched.

The minister responsible for international trade has personally delivered more than a dozen speeches from Fredericton to Vancouver. In each speech—and I have read them—he details a few more elements of the free trade agreement. If you look at those speeches as a body of material, they give an incredible insight into what the Government of Canada is trying to achieve through these agreements.

The minister has personally written almost 400 letters to Canadians in response to inquiries on the agreement. The chief negotiator, Mr. Weekes, has given 26 speeches to groups of Canadians on the free trade agreement. There have been more than 2,800 copies of Situation Report distributed to Canadians who have made inquiries about the NAFTA. There have been 10 background briefings to the press since September.

The minister has appeared before the standing committee of the House of Commons seven times to answer any questions relating to the free trade agreement.

The minister himself has given a number of speeches from one end of the country to the other. Let me give members a glimpse: the Financial Post Conference on North American Free Trade in Montreal, Council of the Americas and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto, the Central Canada Broadcasters' Association in Toronto, the MacDonald–Cartier Club in Calgary, Canadian–American Committee in Toronto, and the list goes on.

From one end of the country to the other the minister has been there. He has been before the House of Commons committee. There has been no attempt to avoid giving information on free trade.

I submit that the motion that the government has some hidden agenda in terms of the free trade agreement with North America is absolutely political bunk and rhetoric.

There are a couple of words I would like to say on the agreement itself.

Why are we doing this? What are Canada's objectives? Why are we even sitting at the table with the Americans and Mexicans trying to construct a free trade agreement?

The first and most important thing for Canadians, Canadian business people, Canadian entrepreneurs, is the fact that there are 80 million people in Mexico and right now the Mexicans have a lot of barriers to our companies reaching that market of 80 million people. Obviously it would be to our benefit if we could reduce some of those barriers, if we could bring them down and increase the accessibility.

Second, we need to have better access to the United States market. Much has been made today in the House about some of the problems that have come up, whether it has been a ruling on the content of Honda cars, softwood lumber, pork disputes, et cetera.

Some of the hon. members who have raised those things as examples of free trade not really helping us because we still have problems in part are right. We still do have problems. The Americans are very protectionist right now. The Americans want to protect their economy because they are in some of the same dire straits that we are in. They have a recession and an election coming up. They are using trade laws as a way of attacking some of those that are being successful in getting their products into the American market, including Canadians.

The free trade agreement, as we have negotiated it, helps but it does not do everything that is possible. As we sit down with the Americans and the Mexicans now and look once again at free trade, the way it works, the irritants, and so on, if we can possibly make that deal better and remove some of the irritants and strengthen Canada's position, then why would we not do it?

That is the second objective that Canada could have under these negotiations.

Third, we want to make the investment climate better in Canada. There is nothing whatsoever wrong with foreign investment in this country. We welcome foreign investment. It has always built Canada. Other countries are happy when entrepreneurial Canadians go to their countries and invest in their infrastructure; we should be just as happy here.

Those are the three things I would like people to remember about objectives: gain access to a market of 80 million people; try and improve the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement; and make Canada a more attractive place for investment.

Why negotiate a deal with Mexico? Right now it is becoming a very dynamic economy. The Mexicans do not want to be a Third World country, they want to be a first world country. It appears that with the kind of aggression it has right now, it is going to make it. As it improves its economy, as it increases the wealth in that economy, individual Mexicans are going to prosper. They are going to have more money to spend, and that is only good for us in Canada because we want to access that market.

It is clear now that Canada can really play a major role in these trade negotiations by reshaping the way the whole western hemisphere trading patterns are taking place.

Finally, globalization: it is here to stay. We cannot hold it back. It does not matter how much little Canada, with its little market of 26 million people wants to protect our own industries, we cannot do it any more. We cannot buck a trend that the whole world is moving toward. So we have to be at the table with the Americans and the Mexicans. It would be ridiculous for us to walk away. We have to be there to protect our own interests.

A question that comes from a lot of people is: "Okay, we understand that; you've got to be at the table; it would be irresponsible to take a hike, but how can we possibly compete with workers in a country where wages are so incredibly low?" I think that is a really valid question and we have to come up with a reasonable answer or else we risk losing the support of a lot of people in these negotiations.

I would say to those people who worry about that, the answer is that on average about 12 to 15 per cent of the cost of a product is accounted for by wages. It is a fairly low percentage. Less than 2 per cent of the goods that Canada buys abroad come from Mexico. So we are not looking at a very great threat here. It is a really reasonable element of the total cost of producing something that is sent to Canada.

It is also interesting to note that the biggest trading countries in the world are not low wage countries. The biggest trading countries are countries like Canada, the United States, Germany, and Japan. These are countries that have high wages now and yet they still have been able to become the great trading countries of the world. It is not the low wage countries that have been able to take over world trading patterns. They have not been able to do it. For the critics to stand now and say that just because they have low wages in Mexico means they are going to become large trading countries does not follow. We have no experience like that.

I would like to conclude by saying that I do not think Canadians have anything to fear from trade negotiations with any country. We have an environment where we have well-educated workers, we have an excellent infrastructure, we have some of the strongest and largest financial institutions in the whole world. We have a lot in this country that puts us into a very favoured position in terms of trading with anybody in the world.

We cannot hold back world trends. We cannot stand there with our hand up to history, saying: "Stop, Canada wants off here, Canada doesn't want to be part of a globalization of trade". You cannot do it. We must press forward and the government is on the right track. If we cannot get a good deal for Canada we will not take a deal.

• (1750)

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, let me move away from what the hon. member for Halton—Peel has called emotional rhetoric and let us get specific.

An article in The Financial Times on March 16, 1992 concerning the NAFTA talks states:

> Sources familiar with the talks warn that the U.S. side—which is looking over its shoulder at a hawkish Congress—is putting forward proposals that would protect politically powerful regional U.S. industries. The Americans are out to put the boots to us," complains Stephen Beatty, executive director of the Canadian Apparel Manufacturers' Institute.

An hon. member: Stephen Beatty? Where have I heard that name?

Mr. Keyes: Many observers of NAFTA say what little gains Canada made in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement will most certainly be lost under what is being negotiated at NAFTA.

As the hon. member for Halton—Peel well knows, Canada is already under pressure from the U.S. regarding softwood lumber and the Honda dispute. Now I hear the alarm bells starting to sound in the textile industry. In my riding of Hamilton West we have a textile manufacturer which employs 700 to 800 individuals and they are concerned.

Let me give the member an example. Presently, Canadian clothing manufacturers can sell a limited amount of clothing containing foreign fabrics to stores on Fifth Avenue in New York. They cannot sell to the U.S. in bulk clothing that has foreign components. This is why the U.S. has ruled against Honda Civics which is not right because the manufacturing takes place in Canada.

Under the NAFTA, the U.S. is considering that every single fibre resulting in the end product of clothing be North American. They are insisting that the yarn, the cloth and clothing be all North American, no foreign components allowed at all.

This is obviously very consistent and convenient for the U.S., since they have long-established links with the Mexican textile industry, providing the market with cheap U.S.-labelled Mexican-made clothing.

This is the specific question that the member is looking for because he says it is all a bunch of hyperbole and emotional rhetoric, et cetera. These are concerns of our industries in our ridings. I put it to the member: Would he not agree that NAFTA will curb Canadian access to the U.S.-Mexican market under this specific regime having to do with the textile industry?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is a valid concern, a reasonable point and it is one which it will be interesting to see how our negotiators deal with.

I am not going to stand here and say that all the problems are going to be solved with every industrial sector.

Mr. Keyes: They had better be, that's your job.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): It is not my job to tell you that the government is going to solve all the problems in the country, the government cannot. It would be irresponsible for the government or anybody else to say that is going to be the case.

We are, as I said a few moments ago, in a situation where we have a globalization of trade. It is desperately wrong for Canada to try and buck that trend.

The best protection that all of our industries and those men and women in our ridings who work in the industries which are threatened from time to time can have is if Canada has trading agreements, whether it is at the GATT or whether it is with NAFTA or whether it is under FTA, specific trading agreements which have built into them specific dispute settlement mechanisms.

Obviously, the Americans are going to try and get as much as they want out of this deal. I hope that our Canadian negotiators are ruthless and try to get as much as possible out of the deal for Canada. I think it is reasonable that the three countries as they scrap and fight over every little bone in this thing, are all ruthless and fight for their own constituencies just as we do in this House. There is nothing wrong with that. But I think we must have more dispute settlement mechanisms or else we will fall victim to American protectionism. We have very few ways of battling that right now. We are looking at a country that has an economy 10 times larger than ours.

The United States has had a tradition of protectionism. As was quite rightly said, it now has a hawkish Congress. It has a fearful president. There are a lot of forces in the United States which are really fuelling the fires of protectionism. So I think it is more appropriate than ever that Canada try to sit at a table and come up with a set of rules so that we can protect our constituents' interests.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 I also made quite a few speeches to promote free trade. I was convinced that free trade was a good idea, and I still think so today. I also think the globalization of our markets is a good idea for industry. The big problem we had after 1988, after the FTA was signed, was this government's incompetence. Right after the FTA was signed, it failed to put in place the appropriate manpower support programs, for instance.

As soon as the FTA was signed, and this I never could understand, interest rates were raised. The Canadian dollar was also allowed to go up, which prevented small businesses from exporting to the United States. These businesses had already made certain adjustments. They had started to look for markets in the United States and spend money to open those markets.

It was a severe blow to small business, especially in Quebec, and I know what I am talking about. The problem is not free trade with the United States but the failure of the Tory government to keep interest rates and the dollar down. That is the real problem. It created a terrible recession in this country, and that is why we are going to suffer the consequences for the next 10 years. The real problem is that we have a government that does not know how to run the economy.

We also wonder how come the government let the dollar rise as it did, because during the free trade negotiations, the dollar was worth about 76 cents. A few months, barely a year, later, it was up to 85 cents, enough for the former Conservative minister of trade, Sinclair Stevens, to say that there was probably a secret arrangement between the United States and Canada to let the dollar rise, because it was completely unacceptable and incomprehensible.

Will we have the same problem in free trade with Mexico? Will we have the same problem because we will have an incompetent government to negotiate after the agreement? Will we be able to enjoy the fruits of this free trade?

[English]

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the greatest threat that Canada faces in terms of its economy, the certainty of investors abroad, and the ultimate future of Canada, is separatism. I think the hon. member across the way should be ashamed of himself for even sitting in this House.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for Halton—Peel. It is obvious that free trade is going to pose very interesting challenges to businesses and industries in Canada. At the same time, it seems obvious that Canada cannot opt out of the world and exist as a nation behind protectionist barriers and borders serving its own needs and interests.

I want to ask the hon. member for Halton—Peel a question relating to an observation he made early in his speech that indeed the Mexican economy would flourish and benefit by a North American free trade agreement but that Canada too would benefit. In other words, I think he was saying that the pie could be made to grow larger and that there would be benefits not only to the impoverished people of Mexico, but also to Canada.

Opposition critics often leave the impression that we have to be the losers if someone else gains, but in fact common logic would tell us that through free trade and through the elimination of barriers on unnecessary bureaucracy and the creation of more competitive industries, everyone will gain.

Rather than having government policies which look after the Third World and the developing nations by spending money on foreign aid, which this country is committed to at a level of say $2.5 billion a year, I put the question to the hon. member for Halton—Peel. Would it not make much more sense to help those economies to grow and strengthen so that they would not need to rely on foreign aid from the do-gooders who think that we can afford to help the whole world by sending money. They could become truly economically self-sufficient and prosperous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made Friday, March 20, 1992, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion for second reading of Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

EDUCATION

NATIONAL STANDARDS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish a national task force to discuss national standards of education.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I have put before the House and which I am asking the House to support calls for the federal government to establish a task force to discuss national education standards.

The motion arises from extensive research that has convinced me that education is directly linked to competitiveness. Canada's education system needs to be overhauled to make us better able to compete in a changing world economy.

The key to competitiveness is productivity. The productivity of a nation is closely linked to the literacy levels of its citizens. This is especially true today.

The acceleration of technology and the globalization of trade is changing the workplace and placing increasing demand on the work force.

• (1830)

Current skills are devalued and new ones are created at an alarming rate, but Canada's education system is not keeping up with the demand. A high percentage of our work force is illiterate to some degree and unable to cope with new technology.

Tomorrow's workers are graduating from education programs that no longer equip them with the skills required for meaningful employment. The secret of improved productivity is to improve the skill of the average Canadian.

In the 21st century, natural resources, capital and technology will move around the world. A nation's strategic asset will be the skills of its work force. Literacy and human resource development are therefore central to Canada's economic development, and our competitive future as well.

We need to ensure that Canadians are able to cope with the challenges of a changing workplace. One of the most important ways we can do that is to establish national education standards.

Several broad trends are serving to strengthen the ties between literacy levels and productivity. For example, in an advanced economy, there is steady growth and jobs requiring reading and communications skills. Economic structures are changing with the fast growth of high technology and the relative decline of natural resources and traditional manufacturing.

As you know, Canada specializes in resource related goods. In the 1950s and 1960s, this gave countries an edge in the world market. Today, however, there is a great emphasis on high-tech manufactured goods. Resource commodities are being replaced by information and knowledge-intensive goods.

In this new knowledge-based world, trading advantage depends more on acquired knowledge and skills than on a wealth of natural resources. Canadians are losing ground to industrial competitors who are better than they are at manufacturing, inventing, designing and marketing.

Economic structuring means that the nature of jobs is changing. Firms are reorganizing in order to cope with the increasing international competition and market diversification. In both the manufacturing and service sectors of the economy, these trends imply greater demand for information and communications skills, as well as analytical abilities. Companies, for example, are trying to reorder production so they can respond more quickly and with greater flexibility to market shifts. The changes are placing increasing demand on workers to be able to handle varied tasks, respond to unexpected situations, communicate with other workers and management and train more extensively in the use of special technologies.

Jobs with low literacy skill demands are disappearing. In a report entitled "Workforce Literacy: An Economic Challenge for Canada", the Hudson Institute estimates the fastest growing occupation will demand math skills, verbal and communication skills and management abilities. Jobs in blue collar areas, assembly work in most primary industries will be much harder to find. In addition, Canadians will have to be able to learn new skills throughout their working lives to keep up with continual technological change.

According to the Hudson Institute, workers' skills and specialized knowledge become obsolete in about three to five years. Just a decade ago, skills stayed current for seven to 14 years.

The Department of Employment and Immigration predicts that many low-skilled jobs will simply disappear. High school dropouts could corner 46.7 per cent of the job market in 1986. Between 1989 and the year 2000, only 37 per cent of new jobs will be offered to those with less than grade 12 education.

Globalization of the economy also affects productivity. Traditionally, Canadians have lived in a relatively insulated environment created by a history of market production. The current trend toward trade revitalization is placing increasing pressure on Canadian workers.

Take, for example, the free trade agreement. It was designed to enhance wealth through productivity. Inevitably, low productivity jobs will be replaced with those demanding proficiency in basic skills. Yet, even as the demands for literacy and basic skills are increasing, the supply is diminishing.

We are facing a demographic revolution that is depleting the labour market. The availability of workers will decline in the decades ahead. Two-thirds who will be in the work force in the year 2005 are already in the work force today, according to the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre. If this is true, companies can expect tight labour markets. Employment and Immigration figures indicate that in 1986 51 per cent of the population was between the ages of 15 and 34. By 2001, that figure will drop to 40 per cent. However, the percentage of those between the ages of 35 and 54 will increase to almost 50 per cent by the year 2001 compared to 38 per cent in 1986.

Given the declining birth rate, employers will be less able to rely on new young graduates to meet their skill requirements. Until recently, employers have counted on educated young people to bring up-to-date specialized skills to the work force. The pool of highly qualified and highly skilled youth is expected to decline by nearly 25 per cent over the next 10 years.

Along with the need to provide quality education in schools and universities, it is obvious there is also a need to further educate the existing labour force.

In many ways, the Canadian education system is superior among countries with advanced economies. Proportionately, only Denmark and Norway spend more public funds on education than Canada. According to the 1991 World Competitiveness Report, the Canadian government spent $1,350 per capita on education compared to economic contenders such as Germany and Japan which spent $820 and $1,080 per capita respectively.

Traditionally, Canada is also committed to accessibility and fairness in education. Only the United States has a higher percentage of youths between the ages of 20 and 24 enrolled in colleges and universities. However, there seems to be a huge gap between input and output. Canada has the lowest productivity growth of the G-7 countries and a miserable score in key factors of international competitiveness.

In a 1991 survey of 23 countries conducted by the World Economic Forum, Canada ranked poorly in many criteria used to determine competitiveness. The forum looked at factors such as growth of exports, spending on research and development and quantity of skilled labour force. Canada ranked 20th in categories such as export of manufactured products and new business generation and ranked 15th in the availability of skilled labour.

International comparisons generally show we are investing enough to remain competitive as long as the skills our students learn are relevant and applied well. Despite high participation rates and high levels of funding, some of the results of our educational systems have been disappointing. The shortfall is most evident in areas such as literacy and numeracy skills and vocational training.

Nearly 40 per cent of adult Canadians have difficulty reading, writing and doing basic maths tasks, according to a survey of literacy skills used in daily activities. The survey was conducted by Statistics Canada in 1989 on behalf of the National Literacy Secretariat. This study pointed out that literacy is not a problem affecting small, marginal sections of the population. It is a central issue determining the competence of the work force. Estimates vary widely, but it is conceivable that about one-third of workers could do their job better if they were able to use basic reading and writing skills better.

The problem of literacy extends beyond a lack of basic skills. Literacy is a dynamic concept related to the evolving needs of the work force. As the demands of most rewarding jobs rise, the definition of functional illiteracy expands. The literacy survey focused on the ability of people to use their information processing skills. The study suggests the largest problem is with those who can read very simple messages, but are not able to apply these skills to complete complex tasks. Companies are using increasingly complex equipment. Instead of taking verbal instructions from a supervisor, workers now need to read, question and respond to printed instructions from a computer. A wide variety of communication needs constantly emerge in business and can also be classified as literacy related. These may include courses offered in the work place on blueprint reading and business writing.

Employee illiteracy has had quite an impact on Canadian business. In a 1990 study conducted by the Conference Board of Canada, 70 per cent of surveyed companies identified a significant problem with illiteracy. The major challenge facing employers was adjusting to rapid market change. Training and retraining become extremely difficult if employees lack the skills needed to absorb and analyse material.

The study also found that illiteracy hinders companies from bringing in new technology such as computers or high-tech equipment, increases the error rate for input and production processes, increases productivity losses and reduces product or service quality.

The Conference Board study also addressed a number of myths surrounding illiteracy. It found, for example, that first generation immigration affects the illiteracy rate by only 2 percentage points. Indeed, the net impact of first and second generation immigration is positive. According to a demographic review published by Health and Welfare Canada, immigrants, both new and traditional groups, have a higher average level of education compared with those born in Canada.

However, illiteracy strikes all ages but the older generation, in particular, is hit the hardest. A key finding of a Statistics Canada survey is that poor literacy is not limited to select groups of the unemployed and marginalized youth who have dropped out of school. Poor literacy is also found in a significant segment of the older employed adult work force.

For example, only 6 per cent of those between the ages of 16 and 24 have dysfunctional reading levels and only 7 per cent of those between the ages of 25 and 34 have this problem. But this percentage rises to 14 per cent of those between the ages of 35 and 54 and peaks at 36 per cent in the group aged 55 to 64.

It appears that literacy tends to deteriorate over time, partly because individuals do not continue to use their skills sufficiently. This finding has serious implications for an aging work force facing sharply increased training needs.

Those already in the work force will have to learn new jobs and/or new skills to keep up with the global economy. If a large segment have poor literacy skills, the situation will be grave.

Illiteracy is also expensive. The Canadian Business Task Force on Literacy estimates the cost of literacy to society as a whole at about $10 billion a year. It also estimates the cost of illiteracy to businesses at about $4 billion a year in lost productivity, accidents and direct training efforts.

Adult job training is key to increasing basic and technical literacy. There is a vast amount of untapped potential in the Canadian labour force but Canada lags far behind many other countries in adult training. The average Canadian worker participated in 6.7 hours of formal training in 1988. By contrast, an Australian worker received 17 hours; a Swede receive 170 hours and a Japanese 200 hours. Only one-third of Canadian companies provide any training to their employees at all.

In a Conference Board survey, 75 per cent of companies reported problems with basic employee literacy, but only 24 per cent had policies or training programs to deal with the issue.

Currently Canada spends about $5 billion on adult training, roughly one-eighth of the amount invested in formal education. And we are facing other countries that are increasing their investment in work force training. Germany, for example, has increased its expenditure by 45 per cent in the past three years. In Japan, companies are still increasing the time devoted to training. This large shortfall in adult training is clearly unacceptable in competitive terms.

One other major problem is the dropout rate. Nationally 30 per cent of Canadian students drop out of school, in some parts of Canada that number rises to 70 per cent or more. According to the literacy survey, high school completion is key to every day reading skills. For example, 60 per cent of Canadians with only elementary schooling, or without any schooling at all, have very limited reading skills and have difficulty with written materials.

I would like to make a comparison between Canada and some other countries around the world when it comes to our standing on social programs. We will look at the output of that spending.

For example, in the United States they spend 5.3 per cent of their GNP on education; in Canada we spend 7.3 per cent of the GNP on education; West Germany spends 4.4 per cent, and Japan 5 per cent. So Canada spends more than any one of those four countries on education.

The United States spends 4.6 per cent of the GNP; West Germany spends 6.3 per cent; Japan spends 5 per cent; and Canada spends 6.6 per cent on health care.

While we spent more than any one of those four countries on social programs, the results are not very encouraging when we look at the dropout rate.

In Canada, for instance, only 72 per cent of youth aged 17 years are still in school; while in the United States 87 per cent are still in school; in West Germany 89 per cent; and Japan 94 per cent are still in school.

This information was compiled by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

So, Mr. Speaker, after bringing those statistics to your attention, one would suggest that there is room for improvement.

The motion before the House today calls on the government to establish a task force to discuss national education standards. This would involve consultation with the provincial governments and other sectors of Canadian society. Some of these could include incentives to motivate students to complete their education; improve standards in the core subjects of math, grammar and the sciences; strategies for the training and retention of teachers; methods of assessing students across Canada; regular professional development programs for educators; closer links between employers and the education system; and support for disadvantaged young Canadians. I am sure there are many others that we could add.

Learning has become the key to economic success in the new global trade environment. This has made literacy a major economic issue; it is increasingly viewed as essential to economic performance. In order to be competitive, nations need a work force with a high degree of average functional literacy. But no society can have high quality output without high quality inputs.

I would like to close by saying that the only way to get a high standard of quality is to set national quality standards. The problem has already been well documented. Now it is time for the government to take action to implement long-term educational strategies that can help us tap the full potential of our most valuable resources, our intelligent and competent population.

This House could give leadership to the government by agreeing to this motion today.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the House today and address the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to establish a national task force to discuss national standards of education.

It is generally agreed that education has an impact on a country's prosperity, an impact that is felt at all levels of our society and by all its members.

It has become a cliché to say that we live in a constantly changing world. What is unusual in our history is the rapid rate of change we have seen during the past two or three decades.

Before, we could afford to believe that that we would always be able to adjust fairly easily to any changes that would occur.

• (1850)

In Canada, it was felt that our considerable reserve of natural resources would guarantee us an enviable and prosperous standard of living. Today, we see that is not the case. We must now realize that our standard of living will depend less on what we have in the way of natural resources or on our ability to process those resources, and increasingly on knowledge.

Canada, one of the foremost exporters of energy and primary resources, has gradually had to surrender economic power to industrialized countries that have left us far behind in areas like innovation, design, manufacturing and marketing. The increasing globalization of markets has changed the rules of competitiveness. With the creation of large economic and political blocs, whether we are talking about the European Community, the prosperous countries of South East Asia or the new Commonwealth of Independent States of the former Soviet Union, Canada is now facing competition that will become even more fierce in the years to come.

During the past decades, science and technology have become so important to the progress of a country that they must now be considered essential to of our economy, and indeed its prime assets.

Compared with companies in many industrialized countries, Canadian companies invest very little in research and development and rely less on advanced technology. No one will deny that our future prosperity will depend largely on education and training.

This is not the first time the government has considered these issues. In 1986, it made certain commitments that over the years would bring about considerable progress in this field. In 1987, the federal government and the provinces took part in a national seminar on post-secondary education which identified the basic premises for decisions that colleges and universities in Canada will face at the turn of the 21st century.

In 1988, this government introduced a scholarship program for outstanding graduate students in natural sciences, engineering and related disciplines. In the following year, the minister of science established the Network of Centres of Excellence Program, involving universities and hundreds of researchers across this country.

Aware of the important impact of a healthy environment on the quality of life, the environment minister announced in 1991 that $51 million would be spent over a period of six years to help Canadian universities put together a program for funding research and training in environmental studies. And that, Mr. Speaker, is only a fraction of our government's contribution to education.

Whether it is through the Department of the Environment, the Secretary of State, which is very interested in the teaching of official languages, or Statistics Canada, which collects many statistics on education, the federal government has overlooked nothing in making its contribution.

Nevertheless, it recognizes above all that education is an exclusive provincial jurisdiction and it has even suggested that they be responsible for labour force training from now on. That is why we are working with all the provinces and territories, both informally and in specific activities.

Year in and year out, the Government of Canada invests nearly $11 billion in training and education. We definitely consider it an investment because the real dividends it will pay in the form of better education will have a major impact on the standard of living of all Canadians.

We have a considerable interest in education and we believe that this interest must be matched with concrete action and effective measures. With this in mind, last year we launched a dialogue with Canadians, the Prosperity Initiative, on the best ways to meet the challenge of competitiveness.

We know how closely inter-related education, job creation, competitiveness and prosperity are. The Prosperity Initiative deals with these issues in national consultations held by a steering committee representing governments, business, labour, the scientific community, teachers and individuals.

The working papers resulting from these consultations recognize that our technical and scientific achievements are behind those of our competitors, that we do not give knowledge the importance it deserves and that companies do not invest enough in labour force training. This initiative seeks to set priorities for action, especially in the following areas: the implementation of a national strategy of excellence in the field of knowledge in order to acquire the skills necessary to face international competition; giving knowledge the importance it deserves among Canadians; better preparation of young people to enter the labour market; search for ways to encourage young people to take mathematics and science so as to better face international competition in a world that is continually being changed by technology.

We firmly believe that the success of such an undertaking depends in large measure on partnership. Let us have no illusions that the government alone can see the Prosperity Initiative through.

The working paper called Learning Well—Living Well clearly states: "This strategy must recognize the different strengths, needs and concerns of all stakeholders—investors and managers, workers and unions, educators, governments at all levels, and individual Canadians. It must also be a strategy that recognizes that actions are necessary at many levels in our society—at the level of the firm, the industry sector, the region and the country as a whole".

We have thus laid the foundation for joint action that will be the key to our future prosperity and well-being. Along with this initiative, we think that it is up to the federal government to encourage excellence and provincial initiatives to increase Canadians' skills and knowledge.

That is why national education standards seem desirable. That is also why we must praise the proposal of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. These standards could be used to set criteria for improving the quality of education in all regions of the country. They could help us better meet the requirements of the labour market and they could be adapted to international standards and encourage the recognition of diplomas throughout the world and thus give rise to the beneficial exchange of skills between countries. In this spirit, the Prime Minister said three years ago that he would like to see national education standards rivaling those of our keenest competitors.

At the same time, he recognized that provincial jurisdiction in this area must be respected.

[English]

A task force on national education would be an excuse for failure to act precisely at a time when we must act quickly, at a time when federal and provincial governments are working closely together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. Your time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am really quite pleased to see that a connection between education and economic development has become almost a matter of conventional wisdom in this House.

However, the debate in which we are engaged right now must be a terrible disappointment to those who are watching and to those who share a true concern that action be undertaken to improve the situation in our nation with respect to skills and education.

It is not unusual to hear a parliamentary secretary utter irrelevant statements designed for no other purpose than to make the government's inaction look good. It is rather difficult however to deal with the situation in which the proponent of the motion has hardly indicated what the meaning of the motion is.

• (1900)

I would congratulate the member for Ottawa Centre for his rather detailed analysis of a number of facts with respect to competitiveness. It bolsters the case rather abundantly already made that if Canada is to compete effectively, if its productivity is to be enhanced, then what we really should be doing is increasing the opportunities for skills development and educational development among our workers. This is the reason just the other day I proposed a motion in this House that there be established a national council on education.

I am entirely puzzled by the interpretation the member has placed upon his own motion. I will read the motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish a national task force to discuss national standards of education.

I would suspect that 90 per cent of the people reading that motion would interpret it to mean that there should be a national task force to develop appropriate means of testing in some direct or indirect way the level of performance of students in this country.

It is a position which has some legitimacy. It is a position that has been supported by industry. It has been supported by school boards across this country. It has been advocated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Most important, it has been looked at rather closely by the ministers of education in the provinces.

The result has been the development of the school achievements-indicated program which is designed to evaluate the performance of Canadian students, at least to measure the performance of the schools in providing students with essential skills in mathematics and in communications, reading and writing, as I understand it. This was achieved through a great deal of debate and controversy but nevertheless it is in train.

We might address that issue but I want to return to what the member for Ottawa Centre said ever so briefly, that there should be a national task force to look at teacher performance, a number of functional issues in the schools, student performance, the level of science teaching, mathematical skills, and so on to the extent that I really quite lost sight of the focus.

I wish that he had spent more time on his specific proposal and less time on documenting further what is already self-evident.

As if to make matters worse, as I said at the outset, the government member stood up and said that the government did all of these things with respect to its prosperity initiative. Everybody in the country knows that the prosperity initiative has been a lot of sound and fury signifying and amounting to nothing. There is not a single bit of evidence that the government has in fact taken its prosperity initiative seriously insofar as it concerns education and training.

When we were talking about a national educational council, I pointed out that education must involve everything from day care to universities, as well as training both on and off the job. There needed to be an independent facility by which we could establish leadership in respect of the provinces and the various jurisdictions involved in education, the kind of policy leadership, methodology leadership, standards leadership and all of those things that have been looked at very thoroughly in other jurisdictions with respect to improving education and making it more in tune with economic goals for this country.

I regret that the hon. member has not addressed the issue as he propounded it more thoroughly. I had a glimmer that in fact what he was proposing was something akin to the national council on education which I proposed the other day. If that is so, then I strongly support this motion.

In all fairness members of this place, of which there are few in attendance, certainly do have the right to expect that a proposal brought before this House be brought with sufficient specificity that we would understand what the proposal is and not a somewhat redundant analysis of the sort that we have already heard.

I am sure the member does, however, share the view that what really is at issue most fundamentally has been the gross inaction on the part of this government, if not its irresponsibility with respect to everything that has to do with what we are talking about here with respect to creating an opportunity environment for Canadian citizens.

It has in fact cut contributions to post-secondary education. It has in fact made it more difficult for students to attend colleges and universities by virtue of higher tuition fees and by virtue of less accessibility to those institutions. It has cut by $200 million in the last two budgets the funds available for the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Just the other day the minister had the nerve—no, I take that back; he had no nerve at all. He sneaked in here on Friday to announce a program for summer employment support for students. He did this on a day when it would not be noticed because, in fact, what the government had done was it contradicted its prosperity agenda once more by making it that much more difficult for young people to attend post-secondary education institutions. He has the nerve to come in here and talk about what this government has done to improve the situation with respect to training, skills development and education.

If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre shares that view and if the hon. member for Ottawa Centre wants to see this government do something, no matter what it is, to indicate a real commitment to improving opportunities for Canadians, then I agree with him. I am sure that we will both continue to fight to get something besides nonsense out of this government.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak to the motion.

Certainly the motion put forward by my hon. colleague across the way deserves serious consideration. Canadians are certainly very well aware that in today's competitive world, the higher their level of education, the better their chances will be of enjoying a comfortable living.

If the purpose of my hon. friend's motion is to encourage discussion on national standards of education, then I am pleased to inform him that the government is already attempting to do that. The consultations that now are taking place are part of the prosperity initiative that was talked of earlier and it was announced by the government in the Speech from the Throne on May 13.

To quote from that speech: "Canada's ability to prosper in a global economy will be determined by the level of Canadian educational achievement, by the sophistication of our management skills and by our attitudes to work and to change. In the dawning knowledge age, how well we live will depend on how well we learn".

To quote one other passage from the throne speech that also addresses the hon. member's motion: "The time has come to reach a national consensus on performance, goals, partnerships and the priorities for learning. As part of my government's new agenda for prosperity, a discussion paper on learning will be published to stimulate and focus discussion on education and training".

The government fulfilled that promise on October 29 of last year. That was the day the Minister of Employment and Immigration released a discussion paper entitled Learning Well, Living Well which is an essential part of our prosperity initiative as a government. The paper identifies the challenges to learning that Canadians faced during this decade. We all agree to that and I agree with my hon. friend across the way on that. It focuses on the importance of developing a learning culture both at home and in the workplace. It suggests various ways of setting up a system of lifelong learning so that Canadians can acquire the skills needed for their very important working life.

On that same date last October, hon. members will recall that the Minister responsible for Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade tabled a discussion paper entitled "Prosperity through Competitiveness". The minister's paper zeroes in on the four areas we believe will help us to compete more successfully as a country.

First, it is science and technology that includes research, development and technological innovation. The second deals with improving investment in Canada's enterprises and being much more innovative.

The third component addresses the need for an integrated domestic market as a base for Canadian businesses to compete internationally and globally. The fourth area talks about the necessity to open and exploit new international markets.

These two papers are now the focus for consultation, as my hon. colleague knows. It is being managed by the private sector steering group. It is not being managed by the government or government members. The group's members reflect a broad section of Canadians. In September it is planning to produce a plan for action for governments, business, labour, educators, scientists and, of course, ordinary Canadians.

These measures have been undertaken because the future economic health of this great country depends on our ability to compete internationally. That ability will be determined by our level of skills and education. Therefore, the prosperity initiative is closely linked to international competitiveness and learning.

My hon. colleague knows that education falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces. That is true and the federal government fully accepts that. Nevertheless, we are all Canadians. If we are to function as a strong and viable nation, then we must work in partnership; a partnership of federal, provincial, territorial and municipal governments; a partnership of business, of labour, of educators, of parents and students; in sum, a partnership of all Canadians working to ensure the future prosperity of this magnificent land. In other words, we are all moving toward the same goal and I know my hon. colleague's motion means the same, to have a better chance of meeting it.

What we are talking about here are goals, something that we can set our sights on so we can survive and prosper in the 21st century. That is why the prosperity initiative has helped define this discussion by suggesting several Canada-wide goals of excellence; for instance, cutting illiteracy rates in half; ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians obtain high school diplomas or the equivalent by the age of 25; doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering, and the quadrupling of training provided by employers to their employees.

Already, consultations are taking place. For example, more than 150 town hall meetings have been held across our country in small and large communities. The national steering group is also consulting with the national associations and they are seeking expertise from individuals. Cabinet ministers are meeting with representatives of their client groups.

These discussions are being driven by the private sector, not by the government. My hon. friend will be familiar with another example of how consultations have resulted in a new partnership that is working toward national standards. I am referring to the Canadian Labour Force Development Board and I think he referred to that.

Hon. members will recall that the board is comprised of 22 leaders from business, labour, education and training institutions and social action groups. This independent body determines its own priorities and hires its own staff. The board is studying the issue of training and occupational standards. This is extremely important. It means the partnership is working. It sets the tone for a productive relationship between the public and private sectors.

This is not just at the national level. They are now consulting with their local constituency groups, the provinces and the territories to set up a network of 50 to 75 local boards across the country. That initial meeting in my area will take place on April 22, and my community is certainly looking forward to it.

As well, Employment and Immigration is working hand in hand with the private sector bodies to develop occupational standards.

I want to say to my hon. colleague we are certainly in agreement. I certainly agree with his concern and interest in education and educational standards and with his interest in giving Canada's people, from infants to adults, the opportunity to receive education or retraining. It is important in our country today to build upon a solid base of educational expertise and make sure more people have the opportunity for enhanced education and training. Then they will have the kind of incomes we want Canadians to receive and the country will be in the kind of competitive situation we want it to be in.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be standing here in this House this evening to discuss and debate this particular motion which deals with the possible setting up of a national task force to discuss national standards in education.

My colleague from Ottawa Centre is to be commended not only for his address, which reminded us of a number of points that were particularly important to Canada and Canadians today, but also for having undertaken this initiative.

I think it is important, as I begin this particular discussion, to indicate that if we want to set up a task force we must involve some of the key stakeholders from a number of different communities to help us come to grips with this particular problem, so no decision has been made initially. The idea is to have a group of people come together to attempt to work out a solution, therefore national standards need not involve testing or the evaluation of teachers as was suggested. It really could be a statement of goals, objectives, skills for development, something to set one's sights on, as my colleague has just mentioned.

I also want to say in a positive way, I do not want to be partisan on this issue, that the government's intent was really quite noble and there are a number of initiatives out there. In fact, I have said before, perhaps in a moment of passion, the rhetoric was fine, but where was the action? It is not simply the action in terms of the various commissions and groups that have been set up, but where are the concrete results that will bring us to having national standards or goals or objectives or call it what you will?

The other thing I want to mention initially is that it is important for us to recognize that education, almost any way you would define it, is a provincial constitutional responsibility. We accept that, but I also want to say, as strongly as I can, that we are looking for co-operation, not imposition. Surely co-operation is possible and I will come to that later.

One of the questions we must ask is why? Some of my colleagues have answered why from their perspective. Let me tell you why from my particular perspective. There are no real transferable standards in this country if one looks at the whole.

Take, for instance, our universities. If as a university student I want to transfer to another university to take the same program, the credits I already have would not be recognized.

The same applies to community colleges. For instance, if I had a university degree and I wanted to go to a community college, or if I had a college degree and I wanted to go to university, I have no guarantee the courses I had already taken would be evaluated at the same level by another university or college. It is even worse when you leave the province. This kind of situation exists within each province, and of course it is worse when you go to another province.

In high school for instance, it is very difficult for a student to transfer from ninth grade in one province to ninth grade in another province. The same applies to grade schools.

[English]

You would almost think that the trades might be simpler. It is for a number of trades where they have the red seal stamp of approval, that is, where groups have got together and decided what it is that constitutes that particular trade and what one must have in order to practise that trade elsewhere in Canada. But that is not a large number if one looks at all of the trades.

Even in the professions this is a problem. You cannot go from one province to another in a number of professions without having to jump through a whole lot of additional hoops and hurdles.

We must ask the question: Is this really absolutely necessary? Is it functional? Is it something that helps us as a country? I suspect it does not. I have not even raised the question of apprenticeships. We have many that exist in certain provinces that do not exist in others. If you wanted to transfer from one particular program to another, it is extremely difficult and very, very complicated.

This is a labyrinth and that is being kind. We need to bring some sort of order into it. What we are really seeking, at least I am from my particular perspective, is to try to make it much more logical.

When we talk about productivity, competitiveness, globalization, we see other countries reaching out. They have different languages, different systems of education, different traditions and cultures. While we have significant differences in our own nation, those differences are in many instances not as large as they are in other nations. Surely we should be able to do that.

Let us look at Europe. There is increasing co-operation. In some of the Asian countries we see the same thing, as well as in a number of other countries in the world. We want people to be able to practise law, dentistry, carpentry, be a mechanic, a teacher, a pharmacist or do any number of things and be able to go from one area to the other more easily, without having to go through a lot of extras that are particularly debilitating and discouraging for people who have studied.

One of the problems we have in Canada is a lack of co-operation on a number of fronts. I have just completed a report with the co-operation of colleagues. It was less than perfect. We knew that. But we now see the premiers coming in with their own solutions and I wonder what is going to happen to this country in the final analysis.

On the economic scene there is a meeting being held now, or very shortly, and there are people coming in from different parts of the country with their solutions. If we look at social issues such as the provision of quality health care, we get different solutions from different parts of the country. In education there are different solutions from different parts of the country. There is very little meshing, co-operation, understanding, trying to streamline, trying to agree that we can do something in a way that can be portable from one area to another.

The question we have to ask is who speaks for the whole of Canada on those issues, whether they are economic, social, constitutional or educational. I could name a number of other areas such as the environment. Who speaks for the country? Who speaks for Canadians and puts Canadians first?

We are discussing tonight an issue which attempts to ensure that Canadians wherever they study, at whatever level, can take that learning, whether it is knowledge or skills, use it in another setting and be rewarded appropriately for it and be given the credit they deserve. That is what we are talking about. That is what it is all about. I could speak for a long, long time, but I shant. I would simply like to come to the end of my remarks by saying:

[Translation]

We find examples of co-operation throughout the world. In fact, countries whose economy is particularly stable and strong are countries where people have learned to work together, to co-operate. That is what I want for Canada. I do not want to impose a federal vision, but I want Canadians to get together and try and find flexible solutions that respond to the needs of all Canadians.

[English]

You will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that this is a simple, straightforward motion. I think all my colleagues from each of the parties have been in general agreement with its direction and thrust. Therefore I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, for unanimous consent of the House for acceptance of this motion.

There is no vote. It is not binding. It seems to me that if we are sincere in what we have said, we ought to give this motion unanimous consent.

[Translation]

I therefore seek that unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

INDIA

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, Canada does half a billion dollars of trade annually with India. It also provides $93 million more in aid. India is a fellow democratic country.

Amnesty International reports embarrassing human rights abuses on the part of our trading partner. Indian police forces and security personnel routinely visit fear and violence on men, women and children of all ages with a methodical and brutal tyranny.

During the last six years alone, 415 detainees have died at the hands of law enforcement agents who act with apparent impunity and immunity. Rapes, torture and mutilation by these agents have become the modus operandi to maintain order. The victims have been and continue to be members of minority and social and religious groups. Many of those have sought refuge in Canada. One hundred and thirty thousand Canadians identify India as their country of birth.

Now Amnesty International has exposed India's condition for what it is. Canada must press India to either correct these abuses or be confronted with a loss in aid and/or sanctions on trade.

BILL C-13

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-13 was passed last Thursday in the House, we again saw the inconsistencies of the "indépendantistes" in Ottawa. Bill C-13 makes it incumbent on the federal government to set up an assessment process.

On April 9, 1990, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, who was then Minister of the Environment, said in the House that the federal government's jurisdiction was quite clear in the matter of environmental impact assessments. Its jurisdiction stood without question, especially in the case of the James Bay project.

After the leader of the Bloc Quebecois crossed the floor of the House, on October 31, 1990, the Journal de Montréal reported him as saying it was clear Quebec was not doing its job with regard to the environment. It did not want an assessment, so the federal government had to go ahead with it. Ottawa's jurisdiction in this respect was clear and unquestionable, so there was nothing surprising about the fact that the federal government should move into that area.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time the leader of the Bloc Quebecois took a clear stand and told Canadians and Quebecers that his position has not changed and that the federal government needs legislation to conduct its environmental assessments.

SAVE OUR NORTH

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Save Our North Committee is in Ottawa today. The members of this committee which is made up of concerned individuals, municipal representatives and members of local organizations have a common interest in the future of the resource industries of northern Ontario. The committee is committed to working in partnership and co-operation with all levels of government.

The Save Our North Committee is endeavouring to emphasize the critical situation northern Ontario is facing. There are 30 per cent less jobs in the mining sector and this year there will be 33 million less trees planted in Ontario. The tireless hard work of the committee has I believe resulted in proposals which will lead to a new, stronger partnership between the resource industries, northern communities and all levels of government.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, several days ago I rose in this House to chastise the CBC for its confused interpretation of its very own policy on advocacy advertising. I am glad to note that the CBC has shaken its head and in doing so, has shaken away some of its confusion.

On March 18 the CBC announced a change in policy; that is, to paraphrase CBC president, Gérard Veilleux, designed to serve the evolving needs of Canadians by promoting freedom of speech and the legitimate opportunity to be fairly heard.

What this means is that if a Canadian wants to run an ad promoting Canadian unity, then the CBC, Canada's TV station, will run the ad.

This is a welcome step away from creative interpretation. It is a welcome step away from confusion and superficial hypocrisy and a giant leap toward the world of common sense inhabited by most Canadians.

My commendations to the Minister of Communications on the management of the CBC. Yes, indeed, I would like to commend the CBC on its recent policy change and welcome it back to the world of real Canadians.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canada is facing the indignity of U.S. meddling in our forest policy with a delegation of U.S. officials going through the files of the government of British Columbia as they relate to the softwood lumber dispute.

Included in the U.S. delegation is a former lobbyist for the U.S. lumber industry. A spokesman from the Canadian embassy in Washington said the government is going to try again to have this softwood snoop removed from the country.

Now the draft North America free trade agreement is looking for more ways for the Americans to undermine our sovereignty and stick their noses where they do not belong.

Members from this caucus will be going to Washington, D.C., on Tuesday to tell Washington that Canada's sovereignty is not negotiable.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate and thank several groups and individuals who are working together to promote buying at home and stop cross-border shopping. I would like to start with our local weeklies. Last week, 21 weeklies in the area distributed 500,000 copies of a special 20-page insert under the headline "U.S. bargains, an illusion?"

This initiative is only one of several in my riding, including those by the chambers of commerce and local business people in Bedford, Bromont, Sutton, Cowansville, Magog and Farnham. These initiatives are starting to produce results, and I hope people will realize how serious the situation is and that the drawbacks of cross-border shopping have been underestimated. By crossing the border to do our shopping, Mr. Speaker, we are destroying our economy and helping to maintain high levels of unemployment in this country.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, Quebec has a major labour dispute on its hands. Nationair locked out its employees on November 19, and since then there have been practically no negotiations and the parties are no longer talking. The stalemate continues and is largely due to a lack of anti-scab provisions in the Canada Labour Code. Quebec does have anti-scab legislation, which tends to make labour relations more civilized.

The Bloc Quebecois suggested adopting similar provisions last year, but the government side objected. A comparison of both sets of legislation illustrates the inconsistencies in the federal legislation. However, the dispute must be settled, and both parties must be asked to go back to the negotiating table with a mediator. The union must also be requested to stop its boycott of the company as soon as negotiations resume. Finally, the employer must be asked to bargain in good faith, to ensure that the dispute is settled in the interests of the company, the unionized workers and Quebec's economy.

REPENTIGNY SEA CADETS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to salute an original and dynamic initiative from the Repentigny sea cadets, who with the help of the municipality of Repentigny organized a clean-up of the banks of the St. Lawrence in that community. With the participation of the public and many sponsors, Repentigny will become the first city in Quebec to clean up its waterfront on such a scale.

Lieutenant Commander Alain Boissonneault and his cadets have shown exemplary energy and dedication in implementing this project, which proves that cadets can play a positive and constructive role in improving our quality of life. Pollution is the new enemy to beat and the Repentigny sea cadets are the pioneers of a new generation of Canadians. I want to congratulate them and encourage them to continue in that direction and I call on all Canadians to follow the example of the Repentigny sea cadets so that future generations can enjoy a quality environment.

LEBANESE REFUGEES

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the Lebanese refugees ended their hunger strike today at Lebanon House in Montreal. In so doing, they responded to the urgent appeal from my colleagues, the Hon. Warren Allmand, our party's immigration critic; our caucus chairman, the hon. member for Saint-Denis; our esteemed colleague Mac Harb, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, and from me.

• (1410)

We now hope that the minister responsible for immigration and the government will understand that the situation in Lebanon is not what people here in Canada seem to think it is and therefore we ask the government to consider these requests for humanitarian and political reasons.

ETHANOL FUELS

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the efforts of the farmers and other business people in Kent county for their launching of a feasibility study for an ethanol plant. More than 350 people turned out Monday night in my riding since Kent is an obvious site for an ethanol industry.

My riding is the number one corn producer in Canada and Ontario corn growers as a whole produce nearly 75 per cent of the Canadian total. Ethanol makes both economic and environmental sense. It is the fuel of the future, while creating other markets for our grains and helping the local economy.

I will be presenting a petition signed by hundreds of agribusiness people urging greater federal promotion and commitment to ethanol fuels, with a legislated 10 per cent blend for all automotive fuels.

This community-based enterprise makes sense any way you look at it. I support the Chatham ethanol consortium 100 per cent.

INFORMATION ON AIDS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, recently I went to meet students in grades 5 and 6 in schools in my riding in order to personally give them the government's information brochure on AIDS.

For me, it was a wonderful opportunity to realize how receptive our young people are to positive information and how eager they are to have it.

I wish to point out this timely initiative of our minister of health and I thank him on behalf of these young people. I hope that this pamphlet will be followed by many more that are equally constructive.

O CANADA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, when disk jockey Ross Carlin could not find a professional copy of O Canada to play on air during the gulf war, he started an odyssey which came to involve hundreds and hundreds of Canadians. Now, in Canada's 125th year, we have new versions of our national anthem performed by the country's best musicians and artists. Every school in Canada now has a copy of the anthem, thanks to the non-profit O Canada foundation.

It is an honour to rise in my place today and pay tribute to those behind the O Canada foundation—Ross Carlin, Brian Lyon and Hayward Parrott. It is with a glowing heart that I direct the attention of this House to these great Canadians today in the gallery.

SAVE OUR NORTH

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, representatives of Save Our North are in Ottawa today to bring the concern of communities from northern Ontario to all members of the House and to all Canadians. Save Our North is a broad-based coalition of northern Ontario prospectors, workers, concerned individuals and communities whose livelihood is connected to resource industries.

I want to remind everyone that mining, forestry and other resource-based industries are still the backbone of our economy. Northern Ontario communities know that economic diversification is the key to their survival.

However, we cannot forget that if we want economic growth we must look toward resource industries to provide a much-needed economic base.

NATIONAL PHYSIOTHERAPY WEEK

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Physiotherapy Week, an occasion acknowledging the vital role that physiotherapists play in the health care field.

Physiotherapists work in many settings, including acute and extended care hospitals, rehabilitation and mental health centres, private clinics, community and government agencies, educational institutions, sports and recreation centres and industry.

The theme chosen by the Canadian Physiotherapy Association to celebrate this week is "Physiotherapy, Your Key to Independence". Physiotherapists play an important role in helping people remain independent. They help people of all ages and health levels achieve their highest level of physical function.

I invite all Canadians to join me in saluting physiotherapists in recognition of the important contribution that the profession continues to make to the well-being of Canadians.

FARM DEBT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): The total farm debt in Canada stands at about $23 billion, almost the same as the reported debt of Olympia & York. Farmers have millions of acres of land for their security; Olympia & York has 80 some acres along Canary Wharf and a few other pieces here and there.

Twenty per cent of Canada's farmers have already had to restructure their debt load. Almost without exception there has been no write-down of the debt. For most, there was no special bank rate nor special interest rates. In fact, Farm Credit Corporation extracts an extra charge of $5 for every $1,000 worth of debt restructured, after which the long-term interest rate is more than 12 per cent.

The Department of Finance, major Canadian banks, the Canadian and Ontario governments and even the Bank of Canada are rallying to the Olympia & York cause. If Olympia & York gets better treatment than our farmers got, the government and the banks had better provide similar retroactive financing for farmers too. After all, fair is fair.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, on March 21 we celebrated International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, so declared to commemorate the anniversary of the Sharpeville massacre.

We are fortunate to live in this culturally and ethnically diverse country called Canada. However, we continue to be plagued by tensions among our peoples.

Six in ten Canadians believe racism is on the increase and almost 70 per cent say it is a serious issue. White job applicants get three job offers for every one received by visible minorities with similar qualifications and experience.

There are promising statistics as well. Eighty-nine per cent of Canadians support activities to eliminate racial discrimination through public education; 90 per cent support activities to improve equality of employment opportunity.

Only when such measures take root can we truly celebrate. Let us continue to work toward true justice and integrity in Canada.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

As we all know, the European Community has set minimum standards for its social, agricultural, economic and environmental policies.

Yesterday the minister said in the House that working conditions and environmental questions would not be negotiated at the same table as the free trade agreement between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico. I would like to ask the minister whether he can give the House the assurance that if, as and when the free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico is signed, it will not be signed unless minimum standards for working conditions and environmental protection are the same for Canadians and Mexicans.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has raised an interesting point here because he is comparing the European Community and what they are seeking to achieve and the free trade area between Canada, the United States and possibly Mexico.

In Europe, they are seeking a common market which results in a considerably greater degree of political integration. They want to have the same monetary policy, the same currency as well as these other standards which my friend has referred to.

We are not seeking that with the United States nor with Mexico because we do not want to see the political integration that comes with the common market in the arrangements that we would have with the United States or Mexico.

If my hon. friend wants to pursue that sort of line, I ask him if he would want to have the same health care system in Canada as they have in the United States. Does he want to have the same environmental standards in Canada as they have in the United States, the same labour standards? I do not think he would want to do that. It is for that reason that we want to keep those separate and just limit our discussions to trade.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker should know if there is no such agreement. For example, today we read in the press that President Salinas of Mexico had to impose some very drastic measures in the city of Mexico because the level of pollution is four times the level acceptable for human beings.

So I want to know from this minister, can he guarantee to the Canadian people and Canadian workers that just because industry can pollute as much as it wants in Mexico, the jobs of Canadians and the industries of Canada will not go to Mexico and Mexico City?

• (1420)

The Mexicans have invested a considerably greater amount of resources in the enforcement of their environmental standards. They have shut down a major refinery in Mexico City because of the pollution there.

Their standards are comparable to the standards that we have in Canada and that they have in the United States.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friends are laughing. I say to them: Check the facts. Check the facts, and hon. members opposite will find that the standards are the same but the enforcement is not.

It is for that reason that we are seeking better enforcement of the rules through the parallel discussions that we are having and the agreements that we are entering into.

I should just make one other point in that for new investment, if a new plant wants to go into Mexico, it is governed by the standards. It is the enforcement of the standards on existing plants which, if they did it too rigorously, would cause great job losses there.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is a terrible admission on the part of the minister, to tell us that the standards are accepted but not respected.

What we want to know from this government is what it will do if the standards are not respected by Mexicans at the expense of Canadian workers.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the question of the Leader of the Opposition, interestingly enough, is based on a few assumptions.

Among them is the assumption that Mexicans for some odd reason care less about their environment than Canadians do. That is false. They care as much about their environment as we do.

In fact, the other assumption on which the hon. member bases his question is some sort of paternalism from developing countries towards development.

I think if he were to look at the facts he would find that no later than February 25 last, the governments of the United States and Mexico announced a joint border plan to deal with environmental issues, a $450 million initiative.

The Government of Mexico itself has committed its government to increasing the amount of funds very substantially. The Government of Canada will contribute to this effort through a joint agreement signed by Prime Minister Mulroney and President Salinas in March 1990 under which we are going to assist the Mexican government in the enforcement of its environmental laws.

At the end of the day, I have the greatest conviction that this environment and trade deal will be good for Canada. It will also be good for Mexicans.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced in Calgary today the ending of the limits on foreign ownership or investment in the Canadian petroleum industry.

Why did the minister do this when Canada is in the midst of North American free trade negotiations? Why did he give away this major bargaining chip at a time when the energy provisions are part of the North American free trade negotiations?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the announcement that was made earlier today by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has nothing at all to do with the trade issue.

It is entirely within the hands of the country, and it is something that the industry was looking for.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, clearly the parliamentary secretary does not understand the nature of the announcement.

The fact is that it has come at the very time when energy is actively under negotiation in the North American free trade agreement. Mexico, for its part, limits foreign ownership in the petroleum industry.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary who is answering for the minister: Why has the government lifted the limitations on U.S. ownership only and discriminates against the other foreign investors?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the minister responsible for Investment Canada, I make it very clear that the rules for oil and gas are now the same as the rules for manufacturing or other industries.

My hon. friend makes reference to Mexico and the controls that it has on foreign ownership of its energy resources. That is governed by its constitution, and those are not subject to negotiation under the free trade agreement.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday the minister played down the significance of the Canada–United States–Mexico trade deal saying that trade between Canada and Mexico only amounted to one per cent.

Yet, if we look at the draft deal, there are massive changes proposed with both Mexico and the United States in telecommunications, auto parts, transportation, pipelines, courier services, financial services, the drug industry and agriculture to name just a few.

This is not an insignificant deal as the minister is trying to propose to the Canadian people. It is not an insignificant deal between Canada, the United States and Mexico.

My question to the minister is this. How can the minister insist that this deal only concerns one per cent of our trade when it touches every major area of trade in Canada?

It is time the minister came clean with the Canadian people.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was speaking very quickly.

I got a couple of the industries she is talking about. What we are proposing with telecommunications is no different from what the arrangements are under the free trade agreement with the United States.

I cannot understand the position of the New Democratic Party nor the position of the Liberal Party where they are saying they want to protect and limit the size of the market for the high-tech telecommunications industry in Canada. This is an opportunity for them to get into what I believe is a $10 billion market in Mexico. Surely my friend would be pushing us to encourage that and to make it possible.

Now on automobiles, I do not know where my hon. friend has found the information she has because there has been no agreement. There has been nothing written concerning automobiles in the negotiations so far.

We are discussing it because it is a one-way free trade deal with Mexico right now. They have free access to our market. We have many, many barriers to getting into their market. That is one of the reasons there is a significant trade deficit on Canada's part on automotive products with Mexico.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister. One thing is clear to Canadians. It is a one-way trade deal. The jobs go out of Canada. That is what Canadians have seen happen.

[Translation]

The government has repeatedly said in the House that it supported marketing boards in the agricultural sector.

However, in the document released yesterday, the draft North American free trade agreement, that same government is proposing a tariffication system. Why does the government say one thing to farmers here in Canada and the exact opposite to the United States and Mexico?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me be very, very precise on this because my hon. friend is misreading the text.

What is proposed is a tariffication of non-tariff barriers in those parts of agriculture not, let me repeat not, subject to supply management.

In those areas of agriculture which are subject to supply management, the position in the North American free trade negotiations is exactly the same as the position that we set out in the Uruguay round, as was also the case that we agreed on in the agreement between Canada and the United States. In other words, we are seeking a strengthening and clarification of article XI in support of our supply management system.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if the minister feels that he is misunderstood, perhaps the best solution would be if he came clean with the Canadian people and explained this trade deal with Mexico so Canadians could understand every part of it and understand it clearly.

But it is clear from the draft agreement that the Canadian government proposed and supported the very same system of tariffication.

However, it is clear the results of the last trade deal this government signed have lead to increased unemployment with 400,000 jobs lost. We have not seen the adjustment programs this government promised because of that trade deal. The last deal was a failure. This deal proves to be a disaster.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade, why is this government insisting on quick passage of a trade deal on which Canadians have not been given full information and on which this government has not done a full study in terms of implications for Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, in the preamble to her question, has distorted what I just said in my previous answer. It is that sort of distortion which contributes to the misunderstanding that Canadians have of the objectives we have set out for Canada in these trade negotiations.

I would ask my hon. friend, before she distorts the things I am saying, to think very carefully about what she is doing. I explained very clearly, very precisely, what our objective is as it relates to the supply managed areas of the economy and the other areas of agriculture.

My hon. friend also said that I am in a rush to pass this free trade agreement with Mexico. That again is a distortion of what I said in the House yesterday. What I said in the House yesterday was that the agreement would drive the timing. In other words, we want to have a good agreement before we set any deadlines. We are not setting deadlines. What I also said in the House yesterday was that there was nothing magic about the January 1, 1993 date.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the reality is that the Canadian government is pushing for that deadline, and that was obvious in the document yesterday.

My question is for the Minister for International Trade. The majority of steelworkers live and work in the Hamilton area. They were taken to the cleaners in the last free trade agreement, and they are frightened to death that it is going to happen again. They are worried because steel goes into cars and there is not one word in this 408-page document to protect Canadian content rules for automobiles.

[Translation]

There is no protection for the automobile industry in Canada.

[English]

We know what the Mexicans want out of the deal. We know what the Americans want. Why did Canadians not seek protection for the Canadian auto industry in this deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said that the steel industry was taken to the cleaners with the free trade agreement. There was a good deal of support for the free trade agreement with the United States. My hon. friend realizes that and I know she understands it. Again there is a good deal of recasting of history with her statements.

She is saying there is not one word in what she saw in that document yesterday. Correct, there is not one word because we have not put forward a position, nor have the Americans, nor have the Mexicans. We are still discussing on what basis we might be able to come together to help support a strong automotive sector in Canada, the United States and Mexico in competition with the rest of the world.

Those discussions are still continuing, fully involving the industry and fully involving the union in support of the position we will be putting forward.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is not just the opposition members who believe the government does not know what it is doing.

I have sent the minister a copy of an article published in Hamilton today by his colleague, the Conservative member of Parliament for Hamilton—Wentworth. He said, and I quote: "Close to half a million jobs have been lost as a result of the Canada-U.S. free trade deal".

"We've been getting conflicting signals from Barbara McDougall, from Michael Wilson and heaven knows who else".

"Something sneaky is going on behind the scenes concerning the North American free trade deal".

Why is the minister proceeding with these secret negotiations when his own Conservative members say something sneaky is going on?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attach any credibility to the statements that she has just made. What I will say is that the discussions we have been carrying on have been carried on with the full knowledge and full consultation of the industries affected, as well as the provinces.

Let me, if I may, quote from a letter from the Premier of Ontario: "We have appreciated the care with which we have been kept informed of the progress of negotiations and the opportunities to offer suggestions about the development of Canadian positions on the range of issues involved".

I think that clearly says the Premier of Ontario is appreciative of the way we have involved the provinces in the development of our position.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

On the steps of Parliament Hill the Deputy Prime Minister told 40,000 Canadian farmers that he was supporting them at the GATT, that he was rejecting tariffication. Yet on the same day his trade officials put forward proposals in a draft NAFTA which clearly stated that Canada was willing to give in to the Americans on tariffication. Nowhere in this agreement does it distinguish between supply managed and non-supply managed commodities.

Why the contradiction? Why the deception? Why is the minister telling one thing to the Canadian farmers and another to American and Mexican negotiators?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister for International Trade was quite clear just now.

Canada's position on marketing boards at the three-way talks with the United States and Mexico is exactly the same as its position in Geneva. We have tabled equivalents, Mr. Speaker, but we still have to look at the figures. The tariff equivalents tabled during the week of March 1 in Geneva cover all agricultural sectors except marketing boards.

As far as tariff equivalents are concerned, we maintain the position we have had for the past two years: that article XI must be strengthened and clarified. That is the Canadian position, and it has not changed. I think hon. members on the other side should take a careful look at the documents they have in their possession, to see what Canada's position is.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The draft agreement clearly states that Canada has proposed wording on tariff equivalents, and nowhere does it say that there is a difference between supply managed and non-supply managed commodities.

Why has the minister asked his negotiators in Geneva to say one thing and his negotiators in Washington to say another? Why is he misleading Canadian farmers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to be quite precise on this because I know my hon. friend is expressing an interest on behalf of his constituents.

The member is referring to article 502. He should read article 502 also in the context of article 508 which clearly refers to our rights under the GATT and under the free trade agreement.

Under the GATT and the free trade agreement we have retained our rights under article XI(2)(c) which provides us with the ability to support supply management operations. It is on that basis that our position in the NAFTA and our position in the Uruguay round of negotiations is exactly the same, which is to say we are seeking a strengthening and a clarification of article XI.

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

This morning the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced the removal of the last vestiges of significant limitations on foreign investment in the Canadian petroleum industry. All a would-be investor has to do now is take a stroll past the Investment Canada welcome wagon.

This move will create no new investment in our price depressed oil patch. Just today the foreign owned Mobile Oil announced it was laying off 300 employees in Alberta.

My question is: How many dollars worth of new foreign investment does the government estimate will result from this move to sell out even more of Canada's energy industry?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would imagine the hon. member for Edmonton East, a western member, has certainly had representation over the last number of weeks and months from the industry on the difficult times that it is facing.

The marketplace will certainly judge who will be picking up on the investment. I say to the hon. member that all indications we have received so far from the industry have been very positive.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, so they do not know. Let me try again: Between 1980 and 1990 foreign controlled companies operating in Canada removed over $25 billion from this country, including nearly $8 billion in dividends alone.

Again my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, and you have come up in the world. Does the government have an estimate of how much more capital foreign controlled companies will bleed from Canada as a result of this retreat, this capitulation, this abandonment of the Canadian national interest in Canada's energy industry?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for giving me a new position within government.

I want to say to him that it puts the industry on a level playing field. I also want to offer the hon. member the opportunity for a full briefing when the minister gets back tomorrow. I know once he receives that briefing he will certainly be applauding the move by the government.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. In Mexico, the minimum wage as guaranteed by the government is $5.50 per day for skilled workers and $4.65 per day for unskilled workers. In Canada, the rate guaranteed by the government is about $4 per hour. In the light of these figures, could the minister inform the House whether a study has been made to determine the impact of such an agreement on Canada's textile and clothing industry? If so, is he prepared to release this study?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend is referring to one aspect of the nature of competition between Mexico and Canada. What he must draw into his understanding of this is the amount of turnover in labour, which is considerably greater in Mexico than in Canada; the ability of Mexican workers to receive training; the sophisticated nature of the training that is required with some of the products we are selling; the nature of quality in the operations; and the transportation distances between Canada and Mexico. The range of other issues that relate to the total level of competitiveness is much, much more than simply the difference in wage rates.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The Canadian textile institute says that the U.S. is using the NAFTA to renegotiate the rules of origin in the Canada-U.S. trade deal, which would reduce our industry access to the U.S. markets.

Given the U.S. trade harassment, what formal compensation will the Canadian government offer to the textile industry which has already lost over 20,000 jobs since 1988?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me agree with my hon. friend and the Canadian textile institute. The position of the United States and Mexico that is on the table now is one that we fundamentally disagree with. We have made that very clear to them and told them it is unacceptable. Those negotiations are continuing.

As far as my hon. friend is concerned, he neglects to say that a number of apparel manufacturers have been successful in finding niche markets in the United States, selling their great capacity to develop fashions that are attractive to purchasers, and have considerably increased their business in the United States since the free trade agreement came in. That is one of the real success stories we have had.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for International Trade.

Given that the U.S. has continued to use its trade remedy laws to challenge our regional development programs despite the existence of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, will the minister assure this House that nothing in the NAFTA will be allowed to erode further Canada's ability to deliver regional development assistance?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which we have been negotiating in the Uruguay round negotiations in Geneva. If my hon. friend looks at the results of the negotiations at this point, in the Dunkel text of December 20, he will see that regional development support is fully protected. It is fully allowed for in the subsidies code that has been developed. There are other elements of the subsidies code that are a great step forward as far as Canada is concerned compared to what we have today.

I think my hon. friend will be quite happy with what has been achieved there.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Atlantic Canada depends critically on government support for its transportation infrastructure in order to compete in central Canadian and in U.S. markets. Yet this government has undermined our port facilities, shut down VIA Rail service, eliminated At and East subsidy payments, denied support for highway improvement, and is now allowing CN to sell off its rail line from Sydney to Truro, Nova Scotia to U.S. buyers. The NAFTA draft text puts all land transportation on the table. Why is the minister allowing the further erosion of our transportation network through these trade talks?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is again misreading the text that was leaked to The Toronto Star and I would be happy to take him through it.

Unfortunately his party did not accept our offer to be briefed on the text, but if my friend wants to reconsider, I would be happy to take him through it.

What we are trying to achieve with the NAFTA negotiations is the capacity of truckers to take products from Canada, go through the United States, pick up products in the United States so they have a full load, and carry those into Mexico. Surely that will improve the efficiency of the Canadian trucking system so that it can take advantage of the increase in trade that is going to occur as a result of the NAFTA negotiations.

This is a way we can help the industry, not as my friend suggests hurt it.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

Yesterday in The Toronto Star it was claimed that there is no protection in the draft North American free trade agreement for the environment.

Would the minister advise Canadians why it is inappropriate to have such standards in a trade agreement and what he is doing to ensure that Canadians can compete on an environmentally sustainable and level playing field with Mexicans and Americans?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the context of the NAFTA negotiations, the environment is dealt with in four areas.

First of all in the context of the trade negotiations themselves, the standards are dealt with in Part B of the negotiations, if I remember correctly, and that is one of the areas where we are dealing with environmental issues.

The other area is negotiations between Canada, Mexico and the United States on an environmental agreement.

We have also named environmentalists to the different consultative groups that we have assisting the government in the conducting of the negotiations.

Finally, the Government of Canada will be doing an environmental assessment of the potential trade agreement as it comes forward. That is why you will not find, as indicated by the member, something precise on the environment in the draft agreement. It is being dealt with in parallel with the trade negotiations.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In the last three years the federal government's share of funding for medicare and post-secondary education in this country has fallen from 37 per cent to 31 per cent of the cost of those programs. That represents a loss of some $9 billion to the provinces in this fiscal year, and nearly $41 billion over the last 10 years.

In light of that tremendous cutback in the share of funding from the federal government, I want this minister to explain to the House today how the provinces, when they bring in their budgets in the next few weeks, particularly the have-not provinces in Atlantic Canada, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan, will be able to protect medical care, keep it universal and keep it accessible to people in this country without deterrent fees according to the guarantees in the Canada Health Act.

How can they do that in light of these callous cutbacks in the share of funding from the federal Government of Canada? Explain that one. Cut out all the nonsense you told us before and tell us the real facts.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as we have already said, when he says there are cuts in the transfers, we still give more money today to the provinces than we did before.

The member should know that the ministers of health in all provinces of Canada agree that the question of the health care system is not a money problem. He should know that even in Saskatchewan at the last meeting of ministers of health everybody agreed that we have enough money in the system.

It is a question of management. It is a question of system ability, flexibility. We are working on that with the ministers of health, including the minister of Saskatchewan, or any other province of the country.

Once again I repeat what I said last week. Medicare should remain what it is and we will do what should be done for that.

Having said that once again, we will work with the provinces to keep the system and again it is not a question of resources.

• (1450)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this government has hammered Ontario especially hard. It has forced an increase in the provincial debt by $11 billion.

Does this government realize that it takes $16 billion more each year from Ontario than it spends in that province? Does it understand that it cannot milk Ontario in that way and then turn around and treat Ontario unfairly by taking money from it for the Canada Assistance Program? Will it give money to the poor people of Ontario so that they can get through this recession?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the facts belie the accusations that my hon. friend makes. I want to remind the House that between 1984-85 and 1992-93, the fiscal year we are just about to enter, the increase of federal transfers per year, on average, have been 6.2 per cent. That compares with 5 per cent across the country. Ontario has been getting an increase. That is the first point that should be made.

Second, the Ontario government, over the past number of years, has increased its spending over 10 per cent per year on average. The NDP government is carrying right on, like the Liberals did, in spending over 10 per cent more per year where other provinces and the federal government have kept their spending down over this difficult period of time.

So this song that Bob Rae is singing, to my way of thinking, is just setting up the people for a very tough budget that he has to bring in. All of a sudden he has to face reality.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on the question the hon. member has just asked.

Last night Bob Rae called the federal government an absconding debtor and said that the Government of Ontario had been short-changed by $13 billion over the last few years. I want to know if Premier Bob Rae is right in what he is saying? How can we have two different black and white versions of the same story?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out before, the average growth of transfers to the provincial government of Ontario has been 6.2 per cent compared to an average of about 5 per cent.

First of all, the figures that Mr. Rae produced were inaccurate in that he did not take into account some $12 billion in tax point transfers when he was adding it up. He made a slight error of some $12 billion in tax points and $2 billion in cash transfers. There is quite a discrepancy in the amount of money that Mr. Rae has been talking about. I can tell the hon. member that Ontario has been treated fairly in this.

I am interested in the NDP which says that we should be running an account book confederation here. I believe over the years that Ontario has and continues to pay more than its share to help less populated, less industrialized parts of this country. I believe that is our role in Ontario and it should continue.

MCDONALD COMMISSION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Yesterday after Question Period the minister said that he would consult his officials to determine whether or not he would make public the seven chapters missing from the McDonald report.

Can the minister tell us now, today, whether his decision has been made and if he will finally provide a full explanation for the illegal acts that were investigated by the McDonald commission?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to review exactly how many chapters have not been released. I believe, after looking into the matter, that we are now talking about two chapters, chapters 7 and 10. At the present time we are going through the chapters and considering just when it would be appropriate to release them.

The reason I say that, Mr. Speaker, is that the commission when it brought down its report made this comment: "Our recommendation is that out of regard for the public interest in doing everything that is possible to ensure that members of the RCMP and others receive fair trials, our report as to these situations ought not to be made public either until the appropriate prosecutorial authority has decided not to prosecute, or has decided to prosecute and the judicial proceedings have finally been concluded".

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, we know that the charges then pending have now been dealt with by the courts, as far back as last fall. So what is now keeping the department from making those chapters public? I do not understand and the public may wonder whether some people are being protected by this secrecy. I believe it would be very important for the government and I ask the minister: Is it not in the public interest now to remove all suspicion concerning the judicial process and the administration of justice and to release those documents?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that the public interest has to be served and we fully intend to do that.

At the present time we are considering the matter and we will be consulting with the Attorney General of Quebec.

AUTO INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Japanese, European and Korean auto makers now enjoy 37 per cent of Canada's market but account for only 3 per cent of Canadian auto jobs.

My question is for the Minister for International Trade. What precise measures will he insist on in order to ensure our auto workers their fair share of North American jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with the Japanese and the Korean auto manufacturers which have the lion's share of that market share he refers to, and have discussed ways in which they can increase their manufacturing or their use of parts suppliers here in Canada.

That is one of our objectives in the North American free trade negotiations, to see whether there are ways that we can encourage a greater amount of investment or use of parts suppliers in Canada. Certainly we do not want to do anything in the NAFTA that would discourage that.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): That is hopeful, Mr. Speaker.

This government's free trade agreement wiped out the auto pact safeguards that protected Canadian auto jobs. Now, under the free trade agreement, the big three will no longer need one Canadian auto job but will still be able to sell into Canada duty free.

Why will the minister not insist on Canadian content rules that will restore the auto pact safeguards for Canadian jobs and undo the harm caused by his free trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I do not want to get into a debate with my hon. friend. But he knows that we did not change the safeguards.

What we still do have in place, which is very very important—

Mr. Peterson: You wiped them out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we did not wipe them out. What we do have and what is very important as far as the auto pact members are concerned is the duty free import opportunity, if they maintain their auto pact status. That, we have been told by the big three companies and other members of the auto pact, is extremely important to them. We are certainly making sure that this is a part of our negotiating stance in the North American free trade negotiations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Two Canadians, David Spencer and Christine Lamont, are still in Brazilian prisons while the Secretary of State for External Affairs dithers. A Roman Catholic Archbishop of Brazil has written the Prime Minister petitioning him to intervene and ask the Brazilian government to expel David Spencer and Christine Lamont.

A legal opinion prepared by Brazilian lawyers hired by the Department of External Affairs says there is nothing to prevent Canada from asking for their expulsion.

Will the minister please explain why she will not make a formal request of the Government of Brazil for their expulsion?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, let me say that the department did not request a legal opinion, as has been reported.

I appreciate the hon. member is working off press reports. The review of the case is continuing, and it includes consideration of the Brazilian process regarding expulsion. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has not made a decision yet.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, the Brazilian government two months ago said that it would be willing to comply with a Canadian request to expel. The minister promised an answer in February, and now we are near the end of March. Even the Prime Minister has promised to respond to the Cardinal's letter and investigate the situation.

Whoever initiated the legal opinion, and there is some question with respect to that, one thing is for sure. Brazilian lawyers are saying that there is nothing wrong with proceeding with the expulsion. In my view, the minister's failure to act borders on negligence. Will the minister make a formal request today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has completed a preliminary review of the situation.

She has been looking at the legal aspects of the case, and is awaiting further clarification from her legal adviser. We are very much aware of the position of the Archbishop on this. No decision has been taken pending completion of a legal review by the minister.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. We learned yesterday that the minister has been unable to get the support of cabinet to proceed with a water export bill to prohibit large scale export of water from Canada.

We also learned yesterday from the text of the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade agreement that article 1401 would approve non–energy pipelines and article 1404 would restrict cross–border limitations on such pipelines.

Can the minister explain how he can continue to sit in a cabinet that simply views Canada's water as a commodity, or does he expect Canadians to believe that these non–energy pipelines are to take B.C. wine to California or Canadian milk to New York City?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on the water export bill, I do not know, frankly, where the hon. member is coming from on that issue.

He alludes to events, speculations or discussions that to my knowledge have not occurred. On the trade deal with Mexico, I think the hon. member should know as I have indicated before in this House that there will be an environmental assessment of the trade deal, which is a precedent in itself. The government has committed itself to doing environmental assessments of its policies. We intend to pursue this matter. That is something that the hon. member should congratulate us for.

I am sorry that he is off–side. He reminds me of other members in this House who, from time to time, are not very consistent in their views.

Point of Order

[Translation]

I am thinking, for example, of the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, whom I am pleased to welcome to the House. I hope that he will take the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to speak on Bill C–13. The hon. member for Shefford may want to talk to him about that.

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I did refer to correspondence in the House today and read from it. In response to a request from the member for Ottawa—Vanier, I would be pleased to table that correspondence.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR CARIBOO–CHILCOTIN

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo–Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I rise in response to a point of order made by the member for Skeena.

On March 13 I made a statement in the House in regard to the Share groups of British Columbia. In that statement, I expressed a lot of their anger, their outrage and what they felt was a betrayal. It was interpreted by the member for Skeena as a personal attack.

When I read in Beauchesne's about members' statements, it does say, and I quote: "The Speaker has said that these statements ought not to be used to make personal attacks".

Although I intended my statement more as a defence of the Share groups, I must admit on re–reading it that it can be interpreted as a personal attack. As such, I would say to both the member for Skeena and the member from Port Alberni, and in fact to all members of the House, that I should not have made a statement in the House that did appear as a personal attack on other members.

I should have sought and I will seek other ways to deal with this very important matter.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

TAX BENEFITS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today from constituents in Wild Rose. They would like the government to provide more tax benefits to families with children. These petitions were sent to me in 1991 and the recommendations have already been addressed in the 1992 budget.

REFUGEES

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions from residents in the metropolitan Toronto area, Quebec, Manitoba, and right across Canada. All three of them urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants as soon as the refugee claimant has been accepted for landing in Canada.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have here over 150 petitions with quite a few thousand signatures and these are to add to the now over 350,000 signatures which I have personally presented in the House and the thousands that have been presented by other members of Parliament. This is in support of the petition of the parents of Nina de Villiers.

These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system in Canada. They would like Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask this government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and to further reform the Parole Act.

UKRAINE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions here today. One is on behalf of petitioners who endorse the independence of Ukraine, something that happened some time ago. They add now that it has perhaps been achieved under the Commonwealth of Independent States to a certain degree, but it may also be a subtle disguise for another form of oppression and they want to point that out. They also remind Canadians that Ukraine is in dire need of Canadian assistance at this particular point in time.

ACCESS TO EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my second petition concerns education. The petitioners say that the economy is going global and that Canada's economy is changing all the time. They also express their dislike for the service charges on student loans and note that the GST applies to them. They mention as well that $450 million was cut last year and $250 million will be cut this year. The petitioners submit that education is a right and that an educated population can make a positive contribution to Canada's economic and social development.

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston, Sydenham, Elginburg and other parts in between the three communities. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent in our society and to make amendments to the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act to indicate society's abhorrence and the degree of seriousness with which members of the public regard these crimes.

• (1510)

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to raise a number of petitions signed by constituents of my riding of York West. They are essentially requesting that this government amend the Narcotics Control Act so as to ensure that local organizations and police forces will be able to share in the drug seizures that are made as opposed to having all assets going to general revenue funds in Ottawa to the Government of Canada.

It is a very important matter which I hope the Solicitor General will respond in kind in very short order.

JAMES BAY II

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present seven petitions containing about 200 names recognizing that the James Bay II project, if carried out as presently planned, will cause serious damage to the environment and to the lifestyle of the Cree people of northern Quebec.

They call upon Parliament to ensure that a full federal environmental assessment of the proposed James Bay II project is carried out on all aspects under federal jurisdiction.

UKRAINE

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of many of the Ukrainian people in Thunder Bay, Nipigon and other parts of this country.

They ask simply that now that Ukraine has been recognized by our government, that this government continue to show its usual empathy, good judgment and kindness toward the people of Ukraine as they struggle on their road to independence.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and present petitions from a number of constituents from Osoyoos, Okanagan Falls, Oliver, Penticton, Summerland and other places within the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt with respect to Unitel's bid to integrate with the development of an over-all Canadian telecommunications policy.

They are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies on long distance service. They urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted severely by deregulation. They further urge the Minister of Communications to hold local hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition today on behalf of a number of constituents who are concerned about the diversion of water from British Columbia into the United States and northern Mexico, particularly in light of the proposal in the free trade agreement with Mexico and the United States that considers pipelines to be part of the approved transportation system.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition where the petitioners point out that railway employees suspended for accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules are being unjustly penalized under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. They are asking Parliament to take immediate steps to simply specify that accidental violation of the rules does not constitute employee misconduct under these sections of the UI Act.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents in several towns in Ontario who are concerned about the families of people who have been accepted in Canada as refugees but who are not yet landed. They urge the House to call upon the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation and to allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 96. Due to the length of the answer, I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

[Text]

*Question No. 96—Mr. Riis:

Since January 1, 1989, has the government printed any material in connection with overseas trips by the Prime Minister and, if so, (a) for which trips (b) what material was printed (c) in what quantities (d) at what cost?

Hon. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Since January 1, 1989, media briefing material has been produced in support of the Prime Minister's overseas travel. Bellow is a list identifying each trip for which briefing material was produced, the nature of the material, the quantities printed and costs.

This briefing material is widely distributed to journalists, academics and overseas diplomatic missions to reflect Canada's foreign policy positions in these countries and at summit meetings.

The House resumed from Monday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on this bill, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1. Really, this is a bill that gives us an opportunity to talk about the economy of this country. We know that the bill before us today will pass without much difficulty. We at least have an opportunity to put on the record some of our concerns. We have an opportunity to put on the record some of the things our constituents are saying to us when we go back to our ridings or as we travel in other parts of the country.

The number one preoccupation today in this country is how we are going to get the 1.5 million people off unemployment insurance and back to work and how we are going to create jobs for the two million people who are on welfare, additional to the 1.5 million unemployed, so that they too can come back into the work force.

The one thing that has disturbed me about this government's economic thrust—

An hon. member: Just one thing?

Mr. Mills: There are many things, but the one thing in particular in relation to job creation is that it did not come up with one single package in this last budget that is a direct employment program.

• (1520)

I refer specifically to the budget of 1981–1982, a time when we had a similar recession, though it certainly was not as deep as the current recession. During that time we believed it would be a much better approach to put money into capital works projects, infrastructure projects. Therefore we did so right across the country.

Even though it did not solve all of the problems of unemployment, it at least was an effort by the government to deal in hope. We fast tracked proposals for new airports. In Atlantic Canada we funded all kinds of new wharfs and other essential services. We took advantage of a downturn in the economy to put together a package to resolve those infrastructure problems.

This government has refused to put any money into capital works projects. It is always saying that the Liberals just want to increase the deficit and ignore the debt of this nation.

This is an argument which I really have a difficult time in understanding. It is costing the Treasury of Canada today close to $35 billion a year to cover the cost of unemployment insurance and all the welfare payments. Of course, welfare payments are handled by municipalities but most of that money comes to the provinces and ultimately to municipalities from fiscal transfers.

This is a situation in which we are not using our creativity. For another $2 or $3 billion, in addition to the amount we are already spending, we could create ideas to put people back to work. I have mentioned before in this House the program in place in 1980–81 under the then Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Hon. Lloyd Axworthy. It was called the NEED program. Under the NEED program we went to the private sector and said: "If you will take someone off unemployment insurance or welfare and put them on your payroll, put them to work, and train them, even though this is a tough time for the economy, we will subsidize a portion of that person's wage". We gave close to 80 per cent for the first six months, then for the next three months it dropped to about 50 per cent and for the last part of the year it dropped to about 20 per cent.

That was a much more productive use of taxpayer's dollars. Rather than have people sit at home and feel totally discouraged we gave the entrepreneurs of this country an incentive to take someone and put them on their payroll. It could have been in a factory, in training, in an office position, or in marketing. It absolutely amazes me—this government is always talking about free enterprise. It says: "Let the market forces go their way".

There are 1,700,000 entrepreneurs in this country. Many of them are going through a period of doubt, not only because the economy is in rough shape in our country but because it is in rough shape in many parts of the world. The responsibility of those of us in this Chamber who are focused on the economy is to try to provide some leadership, ideas, and stimulus to activate those 1,700,000 entrepreneurs. If half of those entrepreneurs in Canada hired one person within a period of 30 to 60 days we could take nearly one million people off the unemployment insurance rolls.

It seems to me that it would be a much more productive use of taxpayers' dollars to give that money to entrepreneurs and assist them in training someone or putting someone back to work. I have said in this House repeatedly in the last two months, especially since the budget, that I cannot understand why this Conservative government will not take a chance on the entrepreneurs of this country. The entrepreneurs are the greatest hope for new job creation in this country. However, they are hearing and feeling signals of doubt not only about our economy but the economy of the United States and other parts of the world. We need to give them a little spark in order to get them going.

That would be much more productive than just saying: "No, we are not going to do anything. We are holding the course. We are not going to create any new special programs".

The irony of ironies is that at the end of the year, by the time we add in the interest, we are talking about a $35 billion cost.

As we discuss this borrowing bill today it frustrates me to think that we are borrowing $35 billion. That is what this bill is all about, the government wants borrowing authority for close to $35 billion. It drives me a little nuts that we are passing a bill to approve $35 billion for unemployment insurance and welfare payments, from which there is very little return for the taxpayers of Canada.

I would much rather give the authority to the government today for an extra $2 or $3 billion to ignite the entrepreneurship of this country and help to figure out a way to get people back to work. Let us take a chance on the entrepreneurship of this country.

There was a delegation from the north here this morning. Everybody is wearing "Save the North" buttons around today. One gentleman who had lunch with us told us that this year they will not be able to plant approximately 42 million trees for commercial purposes because they cannot, they do not have the funds or they do not have a program to plant these 42 million trees.

My small mind cannot understand that. There are a million and a half people unemployed and another two million people on welfare, and the north is crying out for help. If all of a sudden, seven or eight years from now, we have a shortage of lumber in this country it will send the cost of our housing and other related services sky-rocketing. I just cannot understand it.

If ever there was a time to support a community like the north, especially in an area like forestry, this is it. When there are such large numbers of unemployed we should be planting trees in this country until we are blue in the face. That is not to mention all the environmental aspects. This is a nation that prides itself on leading the way in the environmental movement, a nation whose government came out three years ago with its green plan. I cannot believe that the officials in the Department of the Environment cannot figure out a way to combine with their green plan the fact that there is a shortage of manpower to plant 42 million trees and yet we are paying $35 billion for people who cannot find work.

We have to get back to basics in this country. We have to start using our creativity again.

• (1530)

If our industrial capacity is going through a rough period because of global markets we will have to shift our focus and emphasis to some other area.

I just cannot understand what is wrong with shifting our energy, our focus, into something like forestry, or toward supporting the north.

It is interesting that the delegation that came here today from Sault Ste. Marie, Timmins, and other places in the north told us that they cannot get any attention from the national media for the problems they are having in northern Ontario. They send briefing documents. They send notes. They come to Ottawa and have a good reception, but they cannot get any attention from the national media.

That is a crime. The resources of the north are important not just to our province of Ontario but to every province in this country. For years and years the economies of the north were integral to the standard of life that we enjoy in this country. Our resources in this country have been the cornerstone of our economic plan and have led us into all kinds of new fields in manufacturing and new technologies and everything else.

It is very strange that we cannot give our northern friends, who are in such deep pain right now, the time, the energy, the profile, and the focus to address some of their specific problems.

I was talking to one of my colleagues at lunch today, our Ontario caucus chairman from London, about the difficulty of bringing attention to the north. I said that we should take a page out of the book of the members from Atlantic Canada. Whenever there is a problem in Atlantic Canada there are emergency debates in this House and the best speakers in this House get up and they make sure everybody participates. I applaud the members from Atlantic Canada. Those of us in central Canada must take a page out of their book and start to speak a little more forcefully around here to bring attention to some of the problems in northern Ontario.

I want to repeat that the government is asking for the authority to spend a lot of money here today. If I understand this bill correctly the borrowing authority confirmed by subsection 1 is increased by an amount equal to the lesser of $3.9 billion. I think it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $25 billion. That is a lot of money.

As I said earlier, the government will obviously push this bill through the House in short order. However I wish it would look for other ways to spend this money. Naturally we have a social net in this country, which we all support, for people without jobs or those on welfare. However the government should be reviewing the NEED program. I have said it a half dozen times in this House since mid-January that the NEED program of 1981-82, which Lloyd Axworthy introduced in this House, worked. No one has ever said anything different in this House. We must use the 1.7 million entrepreneurs. They are our greatest hope for creating new jobs in this country.

There is another question I want to challenge the government on. We are heading into the tax season. This government must go back to the drawing board on its tax system. That is another reason small and medium-sized business are not taking the chance any more. They feel so frustrated and burdened by the tax designs in this country. We all know that we have to pay taxes. We are not saying we should not pay taxes, but the tax designs of this country are close to 15,000 pages of unfairness and inefficiency and are just not working.

Mr. Comuzzi: Who understands them?

Mr. Mills: Who understands them is right, as my colleague from Thunder Bay has just said. Even the best lawyers and the best tax accountants are now admitting, some of them even publicly, that the tax designs of this country need radical reform.

It is no secret to anyone in this House. I am so excited to see Governor Jerry Brown still campaigning in the Democratic convention with his 13 per cent single tax. Somebody asked me the other day: "How come Jerry Brown's tax rate is 13 per cent and your idea of the single tax is 20 per cent?" I said: "Naturally, they do not have medicare in the United States, but if Jerry Brown added medicare to his plan, his single tax idea would be up around 18 or 19 per cent".

The idea is starting to catch on in the United States. I dare say that is one of the main reasons he is still in the campaign. People are crying out for radical tax reform not only in Canada, but also in the United States. My goodness, God forbid should he ever win the Democratic nomination and people get to understand what the 13 per cent single tax is all about.

If that system ever became a part of the United States, we would have to harmonize. It would be the first time in our lives we would ever want to harmonize with the United States because if we did not follow their radical reform or their clean up of the tax system, I can tell you there would be a flight of capital out of this place overnight.

That is another area where this government instead of following should be leading. It should be pre-empting. This is what Canadians want.

When the government comes to the House today asking for borrowing authority for close to $25 billion, you would like to ask: "What are you going to do with that $25 billion?" You probably would not mind approving that $25 billion or even $30 billion if you thought that it was going to make a difference somehow with the direction the economy was going.

You would not mind approving maybe even more than that if you thought it was going to ignite the economy, if it was going to activate the 1.7 million entrepreneurs in this country to take a chance on a fellow Canadian and put them back to work. You would not mind, but I just do not get a sense from what I have listened to since the budget that there are any new initiatives coming forward.

So regretfully, we will be signing off here on close to $30 billion and the status quo will continue.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: I would like to designate tomorrow the final allotted day of this supply period.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992-93

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood on the eloquence and the substance of the comments he has just made with respect to the bill that is before the House this afternoon.

I also want to thank him very much on behalf of those of us who represent rural ridings and northern ridings. I want to thank him for the kindness and the empathy and the total understanding that he has and realizes about the particular problems we face, not only in northern Ontario but also in the smaller areas throughout this country.

Those smaller areas seem to be suffering more from the dilemma that this economy finds itself in as a result of the moves and the type of government that is being shown by those on the other side of the House. So I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

I would also like to make a comment. It was I who mentioned to the member for Broadview—Greenwood in the last week that his single tax proposal was remarkably similar to the tax proposal that is being put forward by one of the aspirants for the Democratic presidential nomination in the United States, former Governor Jerry Brown. Our colleagues seemed to have met or you would anticipate that they have met on several occasions because of the remarkable similarity between the tax that he thinks is necessary for the United States and the single tax that my colleague has been such a strong proponent of not only on this side of the House but also in the fine work that he does both in and outside of this country.

I have just one more comment before I get to my question to my colleague. It is interesting when meeting through different parliamentary groups, as we will be meeting next week with the Canada–United States interparliamentary group, and talking with senators and congressmen from the United States, they seem to say in unison that there is a need for a complete overhaul in the tax system to get any degree of fairness.

That is the case when a tax system gets so complicated that no one understands the context and the books as we have here in Canada today. The tax system gets so complicated that the average person can no longer comprehend what he is doing with respect to taxation. He has to run to a tax expert in order to even complete his tax forms. That is remarkably similar to the situation that exists in the United States. I just wanted to pass those comments to my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

The hon. member was at the same meeting that I attended this morning as were my colleagues here to my left, who are supposed to be proponents of strict environmental laws. I just found out this morning that the Ontario provincial government has reduced reforestation in Ontario by 42 per cent. Yesterday it closed a tree nursery in Thunder Bay.

Forestry is the largest single industry in our country and this government has decided not to contribute to all the provinces in any degree for reforestation. I would like my colleague to comment on that matter.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his kind remarks.

I will deal specifically with the province of Ontario's attitude towards forestry. During the period leading up to the last provincial election, the premier of Ontario, who was then a member of the opposition, and I am talking about Bob Rae, you would have thought that this man had nothing else on his mind but the environment. He practically spent every second weekend in Temagami. He was going to be the man on the environment in the province of Ontario. They nicknamed him Temagami Bob. It was an incredible thing. In fact, one time he even got arrested by the police because of his passion for the environment.

What really bugs me is that in the province of Ontario we have so many people out of work, so many people on unemployment, so many people on welfare. There is also the desperate need to do things in the north, like plant trees, reforestation, et cetera. He would much rather pay people to sit at home. I do not buy it. I do not go along with it.

When people are crying out for help, when people want their dignity back, when they would rather go out and plant trees all day than sit at home and watch videos, I cannot understand why Bob Rae does not get back to where he was before he became premier. I challenge him to live up to some of the remarks he made before he was elected premier, when he said he was going to be creative in his process of governing. So far it has just been more of the status quo.

I have always liked Bob Rae. He used to be the federal member of Parliament for my riding. It is nothing personal against him, but I think he needs a little shake right now to get back to basics.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on the borrowing authority, I would like to point out one program as an illustration of what I think is a serious error the government has made.

The error is in the lighthouse destaffing program on the west coast in which it felt that by destaffing lighthouses a substantial amount of money would be saved. Either yesterday or today, the government announced it will not be doing that for political reasons rather than the correct reasons.

I would like to say to the previous speaker that lighthouses are a critical part of the safety network of the coast of British Columbia. Now that the government has cancelled the destaffing program it should go ahead and upgrade those as in the commitment that was made.

We need part of this borrowing authority for upgrading the search and rescue facilities, providing radios, putting ELTs back in those lighthouse stations, and guaranteeing weather reports from each of the lighthouse stations on a regular basis. Basically, a program is needed now that would begin an upgrade of those facilities so that they can, in fact, do the kinds of safety activities that are so important.

It has been almost a year now since this issue was raised and the Minister of Transport has absolutely refused to meet with the seven members of Parliament from the coast of British Columbia from Skeena to Victoria. He will not in any way discuss a matter of absolute critical safety to the people who live there. I think that issue still has to be dealt with in this House.

The cancellation of the destaffing program in the lighthouses is a worthy move by this government and I would congratulate the involvement of a senator from the other place. It is also time to stop fooling around with this issue. It is time to get rolling and upgrade those lighthouses so they can provide the safety network the people along the coast of British Columbia can count on with some degree of certainty.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on that. The member pretty well covered it. But the one little thing he did say that I do not understand is that there were seven members of Parliament on this side of the House who were all in agreement that something should happen and the minister somehow communicated that he would not see them. I find that unbelievable.

There is no steel wall here. When I am having difficulty with the office of someone on this side of the House or in any part of this House, I just get up, walk over, sit down and talk to the person. I say: "Listen, we have two ways to fix this. We can fix it properly and get on with it, otherwise we are going to start sending rockets across the floor of the House".

I believe we have to start using this House a little differently than we have in the past. It is great to put the government in a position where it should be accountable. We should use this House a little more effectively by doing deals just by walking across the floor.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

My point of order is the absolute refusal of the minister to meet with a formal request by seven members of Parliament and the support staff.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate, especially today. Today the government is asking us for its usual massive amount of money so that it can borrow from the Canadian people and borrow overseas in order to carry activities forward.

• (1550)

Some of these activities are important and one does not want to stop such activities from taking place. But this debate is about the direction of government economic policy in this country. In the past 10 years we have seen the creation of a widening gap between a small and privileged elite at the top and the great majority of Canadians, those in the middle, those working Canadians, those poor Canadians.

We in this party have to stand and oppose any support for this government's economic strategy because it is leading in the direction of yet further widening those gaps between richer people and the rest of Canadians.

Let us look at simple things like the number of food banks. It is absolutely tragic that this country, which has a sense of equality, a sense of people working together, a sense of being one community, has seen over the last 10 years a massive increase in food banks.

If we take the period since 1984 under this government, food banks have increased by five times. In fact, if we take the period of this recession which this government has brought to us, food banks have increased from 161 in 1990 to 377 today. It means that over two million Canadians depend on food banks to be able to keep themselves and their families alive. That is just not right. That is not what Canada was supposed to be about when it was created, developed, expanded, it is not part of the value system of Canadians for us to see this massive increase in charity that people are having to count on.

It is wonderful that the charity is taking place, and I compliment the people who work so hard as volunteers at these food banks to at least see to it that these two million Canadians are given nourishment, are given food. But, my God, we should not in Canada in 1992 have an economy that is set up in such a totally mixed up, unfair way, that over two million Canadians have to depend on food banks.

We know that a great proportion of those people are children, and that the fact they are having to depend on food banks for their nourishment is often going to mean that they do not get as good nourishment as they should, and that their future opportunities are therefore going to be hurt.

That is what is happening at the bottom of our income scale. At the top of our income scale we are seeing rich, privileged people becoming richer and richer, more and more privileged. The sales of Mercedes are up just as the number of food banks are up.

We have one category in this world in which this country is the best.

It is not hockey, I am afraid, after the last Olympic Games. The area in which we have the highest per capita across this entire world is the number of billionaires. We have more billionaires per capita than they have in the United States, more than they have in some of the rich Arab sheikhdoms of the Middle East. We have people in this country who are incredibly wealthy. When those people get into trouble, like the Reichmanns with Olympia & York, they do not have to go to food banks. The federal Minister of Finance moves out and directly says we will support the Reichmanns.

We have a country where we have things upside down. This is a process which has been taking place in Canada for at least 12 years. It is something that did not start with this government but goes back to the previous Liberal government. That was the time at which the first big reduction in taxes for the rich and wealthy took place in the country. From a tax rate of 42 per cent the Liberals cut taxes at the top category to 34 per cent, a massive 8 per cent reduction which left the wealthy in this country with far more money in their pockets and left the deficit in this country in much worse shape.

That same Liberal government put into effect huge new limits for Registered Retirement Savings Plans, massive increases that meant that people who receive RRSP benefits could put much more into those RRSP accounts without having to pay tax on them. It was a tremendous tax loophole given by the Liberals.

The Liberals lost in 1984 and when the Conservatives came to power, they set out to prove as quickly as they could that they too were going to help the rich and powerful in this country. They set out to do so by saying the Liberals reduced the top tax rate from 42 to 34 per cent. That is not enough. They reduced it further. They took it from 34 per cent to 29 per cent.

Then they brought in perhaps one of the grossest loopholes which has ever been established and consistently defended by a government in the history of this country. That was the capital gains tax exemption put into effect for people who wanted to invest outside this country, who wanted to speculate on the stock market, who wanted to buy yachts in Florida, who wanted to buy islands in the Mediterranean. They could do so and in doing so did not have to pay a penny of tax on the first $100,000 of capital gains which they received. Not a single penny.

In my constituency there are people who work hard for the money which they receive. They pay tax, and they pay tax, and they pay more tax. But these people at the top receiving capital gains up to $100,000 a year who have not added up to $100,000 lifetime earnings do not pay a single penny on those capital gains. Who does that benefit go to?

• (1600)

We have some figures which have just come out which show for 1989 who those benefits go to. Over 60 per cent of the benefits go to those whose individual incomes are over $100,000 a year. That is .4 per cent of people who are taxpayers in this country. Sixty per cent of the benefits go to .4 per cent of the taxpayers. Something in the order of a quarter of these benefits, believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, go to people who earn as individual incomes over $250,000 per year. This is insanity.

At the same time as these benefits are being handed out, do we see increases in the proportion of Gross Domestic Product going to investment? Not at all. Investment levels in this country as a proportion of Gross Domestic Product have declined in recent years.

These handouts cannot even be defended on the basis that they encourage investment. Maybe they encourage investment in Germany. Maybe they encourage investment in the Caribbean. They do not encourage investment in this country. This past budget followed exactly the same path.

Mr. Speaker, you may have heard, you may have read the headlines which said that this past budget brought in tax reductions. We have had a fairly close look at these tax reductions. In fact what this Conservative government has done is give a little bit of a tax break with one hand and taken more in taxes from most Canadians with the other hand. It has done so by seeing to it that the deductions that people can make for their personal deduction, or their personal exemption, or for their spouses exemption, no longer increase at the rate of inflation.

As a result of that now partial deindexation, the average family this year will pay $300 to $400 extra in income tax. The consequence is that for every single income category, except one, and I will come to that in a minute, people will actually pay more income tax this year under this present Conservative budget than they paid under this past Conservative budget.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what the one exception is? The one exception is those whose individual incomes are over $100,000 per year. Those with an individual income over $100,000 per year will actually save on their taxes this year. They will save $125. That is not a lot but they will save money while all the rest of the income categories, the middle income categories, working Canadians, lower income Canadians, will pay more in income tax.

What is the result of these tremendous changes in the tax system?

This whole system by which the rich have been made richer and the poor and middle-income people in this country squeezed in the past 10 years has resulted in there not being enough income to cover the expenditures which the government has undertaken. A deficit has been the consequence, and it has increased dramatically.

To deal with the deficit the government has attacked not the rich people to whom it has given the benefits but the provinces. It has the provinces. It has frozen equalization payments by putting a ceiling on those equalization payments. It has frozen transfers to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing provisions. It has singled out several provinces—Ontario, British Columbia and potentially Alberta, though it has not affected Alberta yet. Ontario and B.C. have been singled out and told that even if the costs of the Canada Assistance Plan go up because of the recession and the changes in unemployment insurance which this government has introduced, the government will not provide what it has promised to provide, which is a 50 per cent share of those expenses.

What is the result? The result is catastrophic, certainly for my province. In the province of Ontario we have seen an increase in provincial debt of $11 billion due to this government's direct actions. Twenty-eight per cent of the debt of the province of Ontario is a direct result of this government's actions.

In this single year alone the provinces will lose $9.3 billion in total as a result of the various attacks on transfer programs which this government has put into effect, and $4.5 billion of that will hit the province of Ontario. It is not fair. It is not right. It does not conform to the values which Canadians have always held dear. It must change or the future unity of this country will become more and more threatened, more and more under strain and the poor and middle income people will become more and more squeezed as the years go on. We must turn this country right side up and to do that we must have real tax reform ensuring that the people who can afford to pay make a fair contribution.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend, but I do want to correct the record a little bit about some of the things he said.

It is interesting the way we talk about what constitutes a cut. I have always had the notion that when the amount of money spent goes up it is an increase and when the amount of money spent goes down it is a decrease or cut. My hon. friend does not see it that way, nor does his premier who I sometimes have some difficulty understanding.

For example, on Monday of this week Premier Rae sent a letter to the Minister for International Trade thanking him for his tremendous co-operation and full participation in dialogue, and then on Tuesday he blasted the minister for not having any dialogue. I never know when to believe Premier Rae and when not to. I would like to bring to my hon. friend's attention that this federal government has not cut transfers to provinces.

In fact, they have grown by nearly $12 billion since 1984-85, over 5 per cent a year. The transfers to provinces have grown by 5 per cent a year at a time when this government has limited its own expenditure growth to 4 per cent a year. The provinces have had more money coming their way than we have spent on our own programs.

The budget of 1992 contained no measures affecting major transfers to provinces and yet it restrained spending by this government on its own programs. Indeed, the federal government has legislation before the House right now which would provide an additional $600 million in transfers to provinces like my own through equalization, which is of tremendous benefit.

It is important to recognize that federal support for major programs has been growing. It has been increasing not falling. Under the three major transfers—equalization, EPF and CAP—Ontario's payments have increased from $6.1 billion in 1984-85 to $9.9 billion in the fiscal year we are about to begin. That is an increase of 62 per cent.

When programs whose spending is in no way controlled by the Government of Canada but by the principles of provinces such as Ontario and when the provinces impose absolutely no restrictions on their own spending and the sky is the limit in terms of how deep in the taxpayers' pockets they are prepared to go then maybe that is the point at which a responsible federal government should say: "You are going to have to bring your spending into line and you are going to have to control your own spending".

I would like my hon. friend to address this issue and show us how an increase of $12 billion and an increase of 62 per cent to his own province in the three major areas constitutes a cut.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the member for South Shore has raised some interesting points. He says that it is hard to tell when a dialogue is taking place. First, let me deal with that. After the Monday letter that he mentioned there was a leak of the huge documentation of the North American free trade agreement. When the Government of Ontario examined that it certainly became clear that it had not been told the whole story. There had been a lot of things left out of the briefing.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is wrong.

Mr. Langdon: Ontario was given the text? Are you telling me that it was given the text?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes.

Mr. Langdon: The text was in the hands of the province of Ontario?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It had two texts.

Mr. Langdon: If the minister says that is the case I accept it. I would not question the minister's word. I will check with my colleagues in the provincial government to determine to what degree that is accurate.

However, let me return to the question of transfer payments because that is the heart of the argument here. This question is perhaps best illustrated by thinking in these terms. I have a lease for my office in my constituency under which I promise to pay an increased rent year by year. That agreement is between myself and the person who provides that constituency office. It exists over a period of years. Precisely the same kind of agreement existed between the Government of Canada and the provinces with respect to EPF, equalization, and the Canada Assistance Plan. Yet unilaterally the federal government said that it would change that agreement.

I suppose I could go to my landlord and say: "Well, I promised to pay you so much money but I'm just not going to". If I did that I would be guilty of breaking a legal contract and my landlord could take me to court and force me to pay that money.

Federal governments can get away with that kind of thing. However, it is exactly the same. The breaking of an agreement which has taken place in each of these areas has cost the governments of provinces across this country $41 billion since 1982–83.

It is not just the Conservatives who did this, the Liberals did it too. We are talking about big sums of money. In this particular year it is costing provinces across this country $9.3 billion because the federal government is not keeping the promises it made.

It is possible for the government to writhe and wriggle, but there is no way for it to say that it is meeting commitments which it made in the past because it is not. There is no way for it to challenge the numbers because they were very carefully compiled, and not by partisan people but by the non-partisan civil service of the province of Ontario.

The consequence, the direct detailed answer, can be seen in the study by the province of Ontario. It is not something from NDP research. It has come from non-partisan civil servants who have worked the numbers out and given the people of this country a very clear sense of what is taking place.

The member also suggested that the Government of Ontario has not attempted to limit spending. Let me tell that member that after the past provincial election for the first time there was a government in place in Ontario which tried to do something about expenditure and the way in which expenditure is getting out of control. For the first time it put into place a management board which, through the kind of Treasury Board activities that take place at the federal level, would ensure that there would be controls on spending. It put into place controls on expenditures for health care outside of the province of Ontario, something which the previous Liberal government had just let run loose.

We have a government which is attempting, under extremely difficult circumstances, to deal with a very tough recession, which was brought on by this government here in Ottawa.

Mr. Blais: That is not true.

Mr. Langdon: That is absolutely true. The Conference Board of Canada, which is also a non-partisan body, has said that this is a made-in-Canada recession brought about by the policies of this government. The people on the other side may not like hearing it but that is the reality. This recession has hurt people across the country. It has increased the deficit. It has seriously damaged middle-income and lower-income people.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to the constituents of Hamilton West to rise on third reading of Bill C-61, an act which would provide borrowing authority of close to $25 billion for this tired government's misguided operations for the coming fiscal year.

What irritates me the most, and those constituents that I represent, is that it is a request for a huge sum of money to continue to allow the government to do a lousy job.

• (1620)

The first budget of the new Minister of Finance sadly but truly carries on the traditions of his predecessor. This budget sustains that tradition because it is full of all the same hollow predictions, the same cooking of the books that the previous minister became a professional at. It is the same hopelessness which is now the hallmark of, and I will say it again, this very tired administration.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would certainly request your observation. When my hon. friend suggests that the former Minister of Finance was cooking the books, it seems to me he is imputing a motive that is highly improper.

An hon. member: Debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is debate but I would like to hear the point of order before anybody hollers "debate".

The hon. member for Hamilton West has the floor.

An hon. member: On debate?

Mr. Keyes: Yes, on debate, Mr. Speaker. I yelled out "debate". On the first two words that the hon. member uttered I could tell the direction in which he was headed. It was clearly obvious to me. Mr. Speaker, I respect the Chair and its duties in this hallowed hall.

The government now has high unemployment as part of its over-all economic plan. Unemployment has become a feature of fiscal planning. Without trying to create new jobs or trying to retrain Canadian workers for more modern skills, this government has actually cut funding for job training by $100 million. Funding for the Canadian Jobs Strategy was cut back severely. It is telling Canadian workers and those who are unemployed in this country: "You are now on your own". The government, it seems, has given up on trying to create jobs for Canadians in this budget. It has seen the unemployment figures and secretly is so shocked that it is incapable of action.

It knows that the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives stated in a report that 461,000 jobs have been lost because of the free trade deal. It knows these jobs will not come back on their own. Clearly, cutting job retraining by $100 million is a non-starter.

In the area of education the Conservative government is equally short-sighted. This year alone the government will eliminate $240 million from education and transfers to the provinces. Between 1986 and 1995 cuts to transfer payments will be almost $30 billion; $10 billion in education and $20 billion in health care.

How can the government believe our country will become competitive without investing in our future? Education, it seems to me, is the first place to start. Cutting $240 million is going to set us back years.

Let me turn to another aspect of competitiveness for a moment. The debate in this House yesterday focused on trade and unemployment. I call it unemployment, not employment. In light of the disaster visited upon this country as a result of the free trade deal, members were debating the prospects of the NAFTA, or the North American free trade agreement between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico.

During the last election the Conservative government promised that the Canada-U.S. free trade deal would create thousands of new jobs, thousands of new opportunities in this country. It has not. The government also promised that any workers laid off because of the free trade deal would be placed in the most generous retraining programs anywhere. They have not.

Now, in light of a North American free trade deal we again hear these promises in the wind, promises of Canadian jobs. Is this its only job creation strategy? If it is, again this country is in deep trouble.

Listen to these figures. The Institute for International Economics claims that under a North American trade deal Mexico would gain 600,000 jobs. The U.S. would gain 130,000 jobs. Behind door number three, the consolation prize for Canada. Canada would lose another 5,000 jobs; 5,000 jobs added to the 461,000 jobs lost already by this government's trade policies.

Last year, in the previous minister's budget, unemployment was forecast at over 10 per cent. That is probably the only forecast this government ever got right. Nationally, there are 1.5 million Canadians unemployed and the jobless rate stands at 10.6 per cent. In my hometown of Hamilton the rate is just slightly behind, but not too far, at 9.8 per cent.

The unemployment lines are swelling, but this government has thrown its hands in the air. For most Canadians times are tough. However, that is not so if you are a friend of the government.

I ask the House to consider the position of Ron Lawless, chief executive officer of VIA Rail and chief executive officer of CN Rail. That in itself is a blatant conflict of interest. He has just had his term extended by this government. Perhaps it is one of those last-ditch pay-offs to a fellow Tory by a government that continues to sink in the polls.

The policies of CN Rail must be condoned by this government since it is a Crown corporation with a CEO who is a true friend of this government. CN's tribute to Canada? CN has, after a long tendering process, awarded a contract to build diesel locomotives to an American company in Pittsburgh. It is a contract worth millions and millions of dollars. The competitor for the contract is a company located in Windsor, Ontario, General Motors of Canada. This is a most pitiful display of fence-sitting when you have a government which controls a Crown agency such as CN and is in a position to do something for hundreds of laid-off Canadian workers, but which instead throws up its hands, or perhaps more accurately, turns a blind eye to the needs of a Canadian industry.

Then there is another friend of the government. While the government waged a war on inflation, the casualties of which numbered in the thousands and thousands, the general leading the battle was the Governor of the Bank of Canada. He along with his colonels and sergeants were given an average wage increase of 6.6 per cent. At the same time, the Governor of the bank, John Crow, had the absolute audacity to preach to Canadians that they must tighten their belts, that they must ease up on increases in wages when contracts come up for renewal. These are the friends of the Tories.

Canadians have paid a price for these sorts of tactics. Canadians are tired of paying taxes to a government that continues to demand more and in return gives less and squanders away their tax money.

Here is an example of that kind of frustration, a letter from a constituent.

• (1630)

"Canadians are just plain sick of being taxed to death. There appears to be no other way to make the politicians pay attention and as usual, the Tories are just too blind to see the writing on the wall. The Tories put you in mind of Marie Antoinette's statement: Let them eat cake. Hell, who can afford the bread?", says the letter writer. "The French had a revolution, the Americans had a tea party, the Canadians, I guess most of us will probably end up in jail, convicted cross-border smugglers. Like Otto Jelinek's brother, who has moved his factory to the U.S., I have really had enough. I am moving to the U.S.A." This is from one of the letter writers.

We have another one here, Mr. Speaker. She writes: "I believe that the Canadian public has been mischievously misled and defrauded by the finance minister and the Tory party about the benefits of the GST and the management of the national debt that has led this country through divisive measures to an unnecessary recession. This Canadian voter demands an immediate re-evaluation of the GST, cuts in government spending and government restraint. Please forward the following message to the other side from me. Je me souviens. Je me souviens. I remember. I'm sure he'll understand". It is signed.

That is just a small sampling of the letters we are getting in our offices, I am sure on all sides of this House. People are concerned about high levels of taxation. They might be put at greater ease if they felt the government was spending money wisely, but nobody believes it. The costs are continually passed down to the provinces.

Hospitals and health care are areas which Canadians feel must be adequately financed, but health care is receiving less. In fact, I have another letter from a hospital in my constituency. The chairman of the board of trustees writes: "As you know, funding constraints are hitting Ontario hospitals very hard this year and Chedoke McMaster Hospital is no exception. We will face a $10.25 million deficit in 1992–93. There will be a small reduction of 10 beds at Chedoke and as a result of more efficient use of services we are projecting however an increase in the number of patients who will be seen at the Chedoke campus. Three wards at the McMaster site will be consolidated into two units. A total of 55 beds will close at McMaster".

The government has run up costs in this country and at the same time has run up the deficit. It has also run down transfer payments to the provinces that have put them, the provinces, in an economic straitjacket. When the provinces do not have the money they need for the programs, the onus is put on the municipalities also to come up with the shortfall.

I want to give an example. It is an example of another broken promise, another broken Tory promise. This one involves the minister for the region, the Minister of State for Transport and the member of Parliament for Lincoln. Hamiltonians when applying for unemployment insurance must often wait up to 12 weeks before receiving their first cheque. To carry them over the sometimes three month wait, they apply for welfare. The problem is that when their UI cheque finally arrives, it covers the entire period from when the claimant began to receive welfare from the regional municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth in this case.

The region asks for the overlapped UI amounts back so as to cover the welfare they had to pay out. But alas, fewer than 10 per cent of those claimants pay that overlap payment back. In taking stock of the issue, the region has asked the minister from the Hamilton area, our voice in cabinet for the region of Hamilton, the Minister of State for Transport, the member for Lincoln, and her sidekick the member for Burlington, to help them arrange a system with the federal government whereby the region would automatically, through assignment, be reassigned the overlapping UI amount. At present this overlap costs the region about $10 million a year.

If you can believe it, Mr. Speaker, when we were in the meeting with the regional committee and the social service representatives, the member for Burlington incredibly said: "As I understand it, those UI cheques are getting out to the claimants in two or three weeks." You can imagine the groan that brought from the social service workers from the region sitting at the table.

They have both promised the health and social service committee of the regional municipality of Hamilton—Wentworth that they would look into the problem and report back. In fact the Minister of State for Transport at that time said she would get back before their next meeting. The matter was shuffled off to another department.

Yes, the minister did get back on the very day of the next meeting, if you can imagine, having that committee wait for the fax to sing out her message at the nth hour, to say essentially what she had said at the committee, "This is a wonderful idea. Why don't I take it back with me and do something about it for you". Well she did. She forwarded it on to another department. We have not heard from them since.

In so doing, both these individuals have failed their constituents and Hamiltonians who rely on them as their voice from our area. They have also failed the government since the region asked to be used as a test case for this type of procedure which would have saved the federal government millions of extra dollars.

My time is short so I want to wrap up by saying that Canadians are, without any doubt, outraged with the economic and fiscal policies of this government. This government does not have the confidence of the constituents of Hamilton West or those everyday Canadians living sea to sea to sea.

The recession that Canadians are still suffering through today got started a long time before the U.S. recession. Canadians know ours is a made-in-Canada recession, induced by the economic and fiscal policies of this government.

Canadians are tired of this government and if we could, tomorrow, on a vote on this matter stand up and defeat the government, we will welcome an election to take them on today, at the polls, just to see what the true feeling is of the Canadian public.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question concerning the borrowing authority and the proper expenditure of funds.

On the coast of British Columbia on the west coast of Canada the government proposes to de-staff a number of light stations, to remove their eyes and ears as it were. That de-staffing was reportedly proposed to save the government money. In fact, it exposed those areas to vandalism, to very expensive repairs and in fact in the long haul would have likely have cost as much as it had saved.

• (1640)

At the same time it would have blown a very large hole in the safety net of British Columbia. Those light keepers keep in radio communication with ships and aircraft, with tourists in the area who run into all kinds of difficulties, with charter boats and fishers, sports fishing folks. It is a tremendous part of the Canadian west coast safety transportation net.

There is another proposal that the government is going to attempt to carry out to save money and it is going to be catastrophic. It is the closure of the Cape St. James weather station about mid-point on the coast of British Columbia in the Pacific Ocean. The closing of that light station is going to mean a tremendous loss of weather reporting and information. It is going to be an absolute disaster.

The government has decided it would cancel the program to de-staff those light stations. But there must be a continuing expenditure on upgrading those services so that the lives and safety of British Columbians on the west coast of Canada can be protected by proper transportation safety infrastructure.

At some of the light stations, there needs to be a vessel to render aid to mariners in the area and there needs to be a method of launching those vessels. The government needs to put in VHF radio equipment so that the keepers can talk to aircraft and people at sea in the area. There also needs to be proper updated weather equipment so that regular weather reporting can be given from these areas so people who are flying in the area or at sea can get decent weather reports which are absolutely critical to safety.

The government needs to be congratulated on reversing the de-staffing program but this cannot stop now. It must go ahead with an upgrading service to assure British Columbians that this government is serious about their lives and well-being.

Again I can stress that the Cape St. James weather reporting office must be retained. The proposal to close it in 1992 is absolutely wrong. It is dangerous and it must be stopped.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Victoria—Haliburton)): Is there a question there somewhere or is that a statement? I am not quite certain.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on several different occasions the Minister of Transport was requested to meet with members of Parliament from the coast of British Columbia to discuss this and he absolutely refused.

It was a formal written request by those members of Parliament to meet with the minister and the staff. A rejection by the minister's staff almost displayed contempt about the meeting that this was a fait accompli and British Columbians would have to live with the consequences.

I am been here for 13 years and I have never, ever seen a display of what I would call contempt in rejecting a formal written request by a group of members of Parliament to meet. We are not talking about a casual conversation across the floor, we are talking about a group of members of Parliament who are seriously concerned about the lives and safety of their constituents and the failure and outright rejection of a minister to meet on a matter of that importance.

In 13 years, I have never seen the like of it. That is the first point, a minister rejecting a request to meet and the second, a subject area so critical to the constituents. The bunker mentality that must be at work there is phenomenal.

A letter has been submitted to the minister by the same members of Parliament asking to meet on a further upgrading of those light stations and the transportation safety net. If the minister and his staff are concerned at all about lives and safety of people on the west coast, that meeting must go ahead. It must go ahead as soon as possible. The question is has the member ever experienced a like situation.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I have had the privilege of being a part of the standing committee on transport since my election in 1988. The transport committee first got together in 1989. I say to my hon. friend in the NDP "you ain't seen nothin'" until you sit in on transport meetings on the very rare occasions the government does see the error of its ways. Unfortunately, of course, that does not happen often enough.

At every meeting with the minister or every briefing from the department or anything which has anything to do with transport, it is stated time and time again, either by Transport Canada or the minister himself or the deputy minister or those in the department who may brief us on any particular issue, that the number one priority is safety; not saving money, not flying quickly from one city to another, not taking the train in a comfortable fashion or providing a route here or there. Safety is the number one priority of Transport Canada as it should be.

Unfortunately in certain circumstances I wonder if safety is not sacrificed in the name of the almighty buck. It is a very dangerous policy. We have a decision to make very shortly. In light of the royal commission on transportation, which we are about to receive some time this year, we will hope to see an inter-modal, integrated system of transportation in this country. A part of that integrated system is the importance of airports, the importance of Toronto international airport as one of two hubs in this country, Vancouver being the other.

Mr. Speaker, somewhere along the line somebody decided that we are going to have an expansion of Pearson International Airport. That is the way it has got to be and we are going to do that by building three additional runways at Pearson. Oh yes, there is an environmental assessment going on right now and they are travelling and getting information, but I will say it here and I will say it now, three additional runways at Pearson International Airport are a fait accompli. The environmental assessment will do nothing more than advise the government: "Okay, you can have your runways, but if you are going to have them, you are going to have to put these time restrictions on them or you are going to have to put this kind of noise restriction on them or you are going to have to do this or that", but they will get the runways.

That decision is going to be made even before the royal commission on transportation has its chance to report, even though we have airports in and around the Toronto area like Hamilton airport that has the capability to handle the excess traffic at Pearson.

The government does what the government wants to do. All the sensible, constructive dialogue coming from this side, all the debating points that the government backbenchers make goes unheard. Some of them are saying: "Do you know what? You are right. You are absolutely right. That is what we ought to do.". It goes unheard by those in the front benches, the executive of the government, which runs this country. The executive—the 42—what is it? How many cabinet ministers do you have? Forty-two? Forty-four?

An hon. member: Too many.

Mr. Keyes: Yes, that is right. Too many. They are the ones who run the country. They make all the decisions and that is just a crying shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. I would like to bring to the attention of the House that 20-minute speeches and 10 minutes of questions and comments have now been terminated. We are now into the 10-minute speeches with no questions or comments. The next speaker will be the hon. member for York West, then the hon. member for St. Boniface and then the hon. member for New Westminster-Burnaby.

• (1650)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I will have to reduce my 40-page speech to something in the neighbourhood of some 20 pages. I will try to abbreviate it, but one could write volumes on this government's action or lack thereof in terms of our economic future.

My colleague from Hamilton just finished his speech. Basically he delineated the woes and the fact that this government comes to Canadians via this Parliament for authority to borrow in the order of some $25 to $26 billion.

I suppose Canadians at home and those in the factories who are working still are asking themselves what this huge amount of money, which seems difficult to define for a great many Canadians, means in terms of government action vis-à-vis the economy.

Obviously for Canadians this borrowing bill is part and parcel or the centrepiece of the recent budget handed down in this Chamber. Canadians measured that budget according to some yardsticks. One of those yardsticks was jobs, that is to say, if they were unemployed or fearful of losing their jobs and they tuned in on this budget, they hoped to be inspired or given some hope for the future of this country and for themselves.

The problem is that a job creation program in the budget was non-existent. There was not a comprehensive strategy contained in those documents or in the speech of the Minister of Finance to put Canadians back to work. It was void of an answer for the 1.5 million Canadians who found themselves unemployed, another million Canadians who found themselves on the welfare rolls, and students who completed university training and could not find their niche in the world to start the careers for which they were trained. It did not really have answers for those older workers who all of a sudden found themselves unemployed and having a very difficult time trying to find employers who were willing to invest in them again.

It is very in vogue in some quarters of this House to make Canadians who unfortunately find themselves in one of those categories the scapegoats, particularly during tough economic times. It becomes very easy, very simplistic and very fashionable to put the blame on them, that somehow those Canadians are a drag or a drain on Canada and its economy, when those very Canadians were looking for some answers.

We spend in the neighbourhood of some $30 billion to maintain people on unemployment insurance. After they have exhausted unemployment insurance we maintain them on the welfare rolls rather than take a portion of those moneys and apply it to job creation, however this government wished to define it. We as a Liberal caucus and Liberal Party tabled a number of suggestions in this House and offered them to the government. One or two of those points have been adopted, and I give the government credit for that.

However, in terms of the job creation stimulus, to invest some of the $30 billion that otherwise gets spent automatically without any questions asked to keep people at home would not have been an aggravation to our debt. In fact it would have been an investment in people. It would have given dignity back to Canadians. It would have put them back to work. They would have become more productive. It would have increased revenues and increased their salaries which in turn, hopefully, would find those dollars being spent back in the economy. Then they could be utilized to reduce our debt load.

Otherwise, if Canadians are not working, they are not going to be productive consumers. If they are scared about their future, they are not going to buy new automobiles or a second colour television set. It is quite logical. Therefore, without any inducement or stimulus in terms of job creation, the economy in the long run will suffer.

It seems that this government hides behind the question of the debt load. We are all concerned about and should be responsible for that debt load, but that argument should not prevent assisting Canadians to get off the unemployment lines, off the welfare rolls, and become productive again, thus increasing revenues. It would have been money well spent, money that unfortunately is still tied up keeping people at home.

What about the question of tax relief? We have a government that over the last number of years since 1984 has brought in 40 new or increased taxes. The average Canadian today is paying some $1,500 more than in 1984. Yet this government wants to be applauded for reducing taxes for a $15,000 to $20,000 wage earner by $2 a year, or a $30,000 wage earner by some $12. That is on top of a GST which, it is well known, has aggravated the situation both for individual Canadians and individual businesses.

Municipal and property taxes are increasing, and we have taxpayers who at the end of the month—and we all know them because we meet them in our constituency offices—are having a heck of a time making ends meet. After some seven or eight years of tax increases, GST and excise taxes, the government wants to be applauded because a $30,000 wage earner will now be saving $12.

Can you imagine the irony of that argument? Can you imagine the senior citizen who will receive a notice this month that he or she will get an increase of 37 cents a month? Can you imagine, 37 cents a month for a pensioner in this country? That means senior citizens will have to get together to buy a cup of coffee. If I were a senior citizen I would probably send back the 37 cents. Canadians are not that desperate and undignified to receive a 37-cent increase in their monthly pensions. What an insult and what an embarrassment to our senior citizens.

What about small business persons in this country? What have the ministers of this Conservative government said about small business in every budget since 1984? They have said that small business is the cornerstone and the engine of our economy. It is the job creator. Yet a businessman who happens to be in the small business category opens up the budget to see what there is for the small business sector and finds nothing. The only thing for them in this budget was the increased threshold of small business development loans from $100,000 to $200,000.

The riddle is—and you know it, Mr. Speaker, because you speak to small business people in western Canada—that those people cannot even get the $100,000 financing from their banks, never mind $200,000. It is gimmickry; it is public relations. But, when that is stripped away, we see that small business is having a tougher time under this Conservative government which purports to be more pro-business than under any other previous government. That is one of the reasons there is movement of goods, capital and business entities south of the border.

I see you indicating that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I would have liked to have touched on the free trade agreement, the NAFTA, and the question that the whole working middle-class sector is shrinking. It is one of the features that has distinguished our country from others. All countries of the world have their rich and their poor. We have been able to distinguish ourselves in the latitude we have in our working middle class. Regrettably that sector in society is shrinking. It is under attack. There are no answers in this budget.

• (1700)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak today on this bill. The purpose is really quite simple. It will in effect allow this particular Tory government, which has since its election eight years ago prided itself in its fiscal management, to operate with a deficit yet again. This bill provides the government with the authority to operate at a deficit in the neighbourhood of $28 billion to $30 billion.

Just a few years ago in the 1988–89 budget the Prime Minister forecasted a deficit of $19.5 billion, which shows us just how much we can believe this particular government and how inaccurate its projections really are.

Let me say, however, that this is a well packaged budget. It has all of the right colours and the right ribbons in the right places and what have you. It tries to give Canadians an impression that it is positive, that it is doing something helpful for them. But when we start looking at it, when we get into the very essence of this budget, we find out that there are serious problems.

What are people saying about it? I talked to a number of people, and here are some of their comments: "What is wrong with this budget? There is a concern that the government has now made unemployment part of its economic plan". We are talking about unemployment being over 10 per cent. It is right there in the budget. Those are the kinds of goals that it has.

There is a concern as well with this 1 per cent cut in surtax. Whenever we talk about a tax cut it suggests all kinds of windfall benefits. This 1 per cent cut in surtax will mean a savings of $2 a year for a family of four whose combined income totals $15,000.

What about the changes related to the child benefits. That translates into an additional $4 per month for families earning between $30,000 and $40,000 a year. It is not enough to buy even a hamburger and a glass of milk.

This budget is also silent on the national child care program. We remember the announcements that were made, the promises: les engagements. There is nothing there and we know what has happened since then. They have said: "No way".

Important institutions like the Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council of Canada have been eliminated, along with the Co–operative Housing Program. That is what is in this budget.

What is in it for farmers? Nothing. What is in it for fishermen and women from the Atlantic provinces? Nothing. What is in it for workers? If a worker sees this budget, what hope does he or she have? None.

What about our seniors, which my colleague has already mentioned? There is nothing in this budget, but subsequent to it there was 37 cents a month. Can we possibly imagine that?

What is in it for youth? The government had this 3 per cent administrative tax on student loans. It said it intended to take it out. I wanted to see that. On the other hand, it removed six months' interest that the students were not paying. They will be paying six months' interest more. My calculation shows that if it removes that 3 per cent tax or $20 million, it will go and collect $30 million from the students. That is how it is treating young people.

Research and development is the very pillar of a dynamic, progressive society such as ours. What is the government doing? It is investing $240 million over five years. It is very easy to do that when the transfers are cut by $250 million–plus this year alone.

What about the revenues? This is what people are saying. They said: "Look, weren't the revenues roughly $70 billion seven–plus years ago?" That is correct, but now they are in excess of $130 billion. The government has almost doubled its revenues, and yet what has happened to the deficit and what has happened to the debt? It has more than doubled.

Where is the goods and services tax money? What kinds of surprises does the government have for us? Is it so bad that it does not want to tell Canadians for fear that the recession it brought about will be seen as worse than what it really is telling Canadians? Or, is it so good that it is salting it away for the election so that it can start dishing it out and trying to buy its way back in? I talked about the deficit and the debt. These are figures from the fiscal monitor, the budget papers. In 1983–84, it was $167.985 billion. What was the percentage of that debt to GDP? It was 41.4 per cent. It is going to be in 1991–92; $419.8 billion and the ratio of that debt to GDP; 61.5 per cent.

There is a $167 billion to a $419 billion increase, a ratio of 41.4 per cent to 61.5 per cent. That is what has happened in spite of the fact that the revenues have almost doubled for eight years. What is the media saying about it? I selected just a few items at random. Here is one from Le Droit, dated today:

[Translation]

"One hundred tonnes of food a day"; why one hundred tonnes of food? "The number of food banks in Canada is now five times what it was in 1984, and these banks now distribute one hundred tonnes of food daily. The number of food banks across the country has increased from 161 in 1990 to 292 in 1991 and 377 today. It seems that 40 per cent of the two million Canadians who receive food from these banks are young people under 18. Two million Canadians received food aid at least once in 1991, and 65 per cent of these were on welfare". Two million people on welfare as well. "Ten per cent of the people who go to food banks have a college or university degree, and 22 per cent have finished high school".

I didn't make this up. Here is the article. I have another quote from the same article: "Seven hundred young people under 18 needed some form of food aid in 1992". That is the kind of budget we have.

I also have a list of all the agencies that were subject to cutbacks. Why?

[English]

They wanted to suggest that this was one way of cutting the deficit and the debt. We know that in relationship to the total expenditures of government, this is a very, very small saving. What have they cut? The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Law Reform Commission, the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada. I could go on. These are organizations that led the way, that told us what it is that we need to be concerned about.

Here is another article in The Ottawa Citizen, March 25, 1992. I want to quote this article entitled "Merging of councils may be unproductive marriage":

> The federal budget announced the reunification of the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. This announcement might be interpreted as ending a trial separation.

It goes on to say:

> To understand our changing society, Canada needs the research capability provided by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

I want to quote another part of this article:

> The prospect facing the great challenges of our times without a growing and visible agency for the humanities and social sciences is chilling. Canada desperately needs a strong and concerted policy for research and development.

What about the Winnipeg Free Press, just shortly after the budget? It says that the government decided to do away with the Social Sciences Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada. Why? Because they were getting in the way.

The Court Challenges Program, why? Because it was getting in the way. Why was it getting in the way? Because there were many people on the right wing of the political agenda who felt that this was an appropriate way to go. There are a number of other Canadians who will remember that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is a lot more I could say about this, but my point is that in this budget the government tried to give the impression that it was doing something constructive. It cut programs that are vital to this country and to all Canadians. The government claims it is doing something, but at the same time it takes away far more than it contributes. This government is tired and has no longer any sense of where it is going, which is reflected in the budget and in this legislation.

• (1710)

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have several words to say today. I want to start with three words: equality, fairness, and hope. That is not what this budget is about. This budget is about inequality, cuts, and hardship.

We have before us today a bill which would allow the government to carry out the very few things it undertook to carry out this year, but there is no child care program, no pay equity for Public Service employees, no hope for Canadian women. There are continuing cuts to social assistance, battered women's shelters, care homes for seniors, people with disabilities, detox centres, to existing child care centres. All of these are funded through the Canada Assistance Plan. The chokehold on education and health continues.

In this budget, the so-called new and improved child benefit really is a hoax. Canadians lose a universal social program, family allowance, and the government creates what it calls the new and improved system of child benefit.

This child benefit in fact creates two classes of children in our society, two classes of the poor. It creates what this government deems to be the deserving poor and they appear to look on other disadvantaged children in our society as the undeserving poor.

We see a society where food banks are the only growth industry in this country, where food banks have been on the rise but not programs to help people who are disadvantaged and poor.

It is disgusting that in our country 700,000 children should be the recipients of food from food banks. It is painful and it is disgusting that this is the situation in a country as wealthy as Canada.

I have three more words for the government: Court Challenges Program. This program allowed women, aboriginal people, racial minorities and people with disabilities to bring equality cases through the court, to help define the equality provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Now the only people who will have these rights are the people who can afford them.

The program was axed without warning. The only warning in reality is this government's contempt for the groups that are mentioned. The government has suggested that perhaps some federal departments could fund equality cases. But the government is often the target of many equality charges and this would put the government in a position of deciding which cases against itself it would deem to fund, if any.

Even short-sighted people like ministers of this government should be able to see that that is a clear and unfair conflict of interest. The Court Challenges Program operated independently of the government and did not make decisions based on what would or would not be politically embarrassing for the government.

The elimination of the Court Challenges Program actually renders the Charter of Rights and Freedoms meaningless. The disadvantaged people in our society who need the protection of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will no longer have access through the courts to gain those rights and freedoms they are told are theirs under the charter.

I have also heard Conservative members in this House having the gall to suggest that perhaps the provinces should pick up the cost for court cases under federal legislation. It seems that this government wants the provinces to pick up the tab for everything while giving them less and less money, less and less resources to pay for these things.

This government runs the Canadian economy with a single-minded Conservative ideology and expects the provinces and others to clean up the mess. As usual the people who are burdened with this cleaning up are women. Women are bearing a disproportionate brunt of the government's fiscal mismanagement. A hundred million dollars was cut from training programs. I have been hearing many disturbing things about this cut.

Several women's organizations which provide job counselling have apparently had to close because government funding has been withdrawn, the remainder apparently being told to cater mostly, or only, to people on unemployment insurance in order to get the funding. These are organizations whose client lists are made up mainly of older women attempting to return to the paid work force or of young people who have not yet broken into the paid work force or single mothers or other women who are living in poverty, who are trying desperately to get jobs and to get into the paid economy.

They serve battered women who have had the courage to leave and to try to break free from an abusive relationship. These are not people who are already on unemployment insurance. They are in fact even worse off than those people who are on UI. Now these women may be doomed to stay on welfare as a direct result of this government's policies. Yes, we understand that the money does have to come from somewhere. It should come from the people who can afford it, not from the disadvantaged.

In this budget, the Tories have cancelled the federal co-op housing program. Homeless people, poor people, these are not the people who should be paying for this government's fiscal mismanagement. Many members of this House do not appear to understand what co-op housing is meant to be.

A minority of the units in co-op housing is given to people with higher incomes who pay market rents for their units. These units are not subsidized. The majority of units are given to people who cannot afford to pay market rent. They usually pay approximately 25 per cent of their income and participate in the running of the co-op on a democratic basis.

People with low, moderate and higher incomes live and make decisions together. It is an empowering experience and it gets away from the ghettoizing of peoples in our society. The government clearly does not want to empower people, nor does it appear to be able to imagine living with people who are disadvantaged. Perhaps if the Prime Minister or the finance minister lived in the same buildings as people who were struggling to make ends meet, people who were poor and disadvantaged, they would not be able to deny that these people exist. They would not be able to rationalize that: "Only 750,000 children are using food banks.". They would see those children every day, going to school hungry and they might care enough to do something about it.

No one expects miracles. No one expects poverty to be wiped out overnight. The very last act of the former leader of my party in Parliament, Mr. Broadbent, was to successfully present a motion to this House to eradicate child poverty by the year 2000. We understand that children are poor because their parents are poor. Children are poor because they are living in a poor family.

Eliminating access to training, perpetuating economic inequality between men and women through an abandonment of pay equity, choking child care so that women cannot seek employment because they have nowhere to put their children where they will receive good care, are actions which create and reinforce child poverty. No one expects the government to end poverty tomorrow, but it is not even moving in a direction which would relieve and reduce poverty and eliminate it in the longer term.

The excuse for cutting back social programs that we hear over and over again here in this House is the deficit, the deficit and more of the deficit and even in this, the Tories are failing. They are billions of dollars off their target for deficit reduction. A recent study has shown that social spending has not caused the deficit, a study by Statistics Canada. The deficit is not being reduced by cutting social spending. The only thing that is being reduced is the quality of life of most Canadians.

Women's groups have warned this government about the effects of this budget on child care. Every year another nail is being driven in the coffin of child care. Universality is being eliminated for some social programs. Can others be far behind? This government is fundamentally opposed to the principle of universality and is moving to destroy it.

Family Allowance: The only program specifically directed to women has been abolished. The Prime Minister attempted to deindex the old age pension at the same time as it first deindexed family allowance. Pensioners are getting the enormous increase this year of 37 cents. I would think that the members on the other side of the House would hang their heads in shame. Thirty-seven cents to the members of our society who built this nation. Thirty-seven cents, what can they do with that amount? It is the lowest increase in 18 years. Maybe the old age pension is next on the chopping block. Then health care. The government has already been keeping funds from the provinces for health care services.

I have now been in this House for three and a half years. During that time I have learned that nothing is sacred to this government except its own interests. It is time to bring caring and responsibility to politics. It is time to really bring change. It is time for a leader who has experienced what it means to try to make ends meet, to start a small business and to survive.

Both leaders of the other two parties in this House are wealthy male lawyers with no experience in the struggle to raise a family with a limited income. They have not experienced first hand the disastrous economic policies of the previous administration and this administration, and it shows in their lack of judgment and understanding.

It is time for a change. It is time for a real change in the direction of this Parliament and this House.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the member for New Westminster gave us a list of items, almost all of which are exclusively within provincial jurisdiction, such as social programs.

Twenty-four hours from now the provincial legislature in British Columbia will be hearing the budget of the Minister of Finance for the province of British Columbia. It will be interesting to note, as a result of rumours coming to us now, whether the speech she has just given would not be better given to her colleagues in British Columbia than to this House.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

In the ten minutes allotted to me I would like to speak not of what was in the budget but of what the budget did not contain.

This borrowing bill asks for $24.7 billion and an additional $3.9 billion to cover a shortfall in this current fiscal year. Well, that is money. How the world has come to revolve around the yen, the Deutschmark, the pound and the dollar. It is as if all the hungry mouths, empty lives, broken hearts and souls have no place in the machinations of the Minister of Finance.

Throughout my time in the House of Commons since 1988 I have tried by whatever means possible to convince the members opposite to open their minds to the larger picture. A country cannot be healthy if one million children live in poverty, and jobs and businesses are being lost as never before. This will only continue with the budget just brought forward by this government.

Society is like a web, everything is attached to something else. In order for it to function as a whole each strand of the web must be strong. A child is one strand in the web. For a child to have the best chance of growing up healthy the child must be born healthy. Yet in Canada 21,000 babies are born underweight each year. This often leads to a lifetime of illness and lost productivity potential.

Why are children born underweight? The main cause is that the mothers are under-fed. Feed the mother and feed the child. A healthy child will probably grow into a healthy adult, a sound citizen, a taxpayer and a parent to more healthy children.

For $500,000, which is the amount of money this government is spending on promoting its child benefit package, 1,234 needy pregnant women could have been given prenatal nutritional counselling at $45 per month for the duration of their pregnancy. The result would be many more Canadian babies born with normal weights. Our gift to their mothers would be food and our gift to the children would be health. It is a gift justly deserved.

It is said that in times of old when a ship was sinking the captain would yell: "Into the lifeboats, women and children first." Due to the seriousness of this issue I took the time to write a special article that has been published in The Medical Post on March 3, 1992. I will refer to it in my comments.

It is time for this government to begin launching such lifeboats. One of the firsts should be a "healthy babies strategy" for Canada.

This strategy would help ensure our babies are healthy at birth by guaranteeing adequate food and pre-natal counselling for all pregnant women, especially those who are poor.

According to the World Health Organization, a baby should weigh at least 2.5 kilograms when born. Babies below this weight risk ill-health and even a decrease in intelligence. They often suffer disabilities—mental and physical—which shackle them throughout their lives. Respiratory illnesses and brain haemorrhaging are frequent afflictions for these newborns.

The subcommittee on poverty was mandated by Parliament to direct the government in aiding the poor. This subcommittee of Parliament recommended that such a special nutritional supplement program be given during pregnancy, particularly the needy.

Every town, village and city in this country has its own child victims of poverty. Every hospital knows them. They walk through any urban centre. Winnipeg's shopping malls and housing projects will leave a memory of certain sickly, spindly teenagers and children fixed in your mind. I ask: "How many of these children were born underweight and undernourished?"

The cost of these children to the heart of our country cannot be calculated. The cost in dollars is estimated to be millions. Yet the federal health department has not acted on the committee's report although it was obligated to respond by the middle of this month. It has missed the deadline.

The federal government has made the deficit, not children, its crusade issue.

If the deficit is so important, why unnecessarily spend $26 million on the Spicer commission? Why spend $9 million to study the constitutional proposals? Why all these public relations campaigns? If we put them all together the healthy babies strategy begins to look like a real bargain.

Today in Canada there are over one million children living in poverty. Many of these children were born poor and unhealthy and will remain so unless changes are made in the way our society treats its most fragile citizens, our babies. The time has come to provide a lifeboat for these babies.

Let us now speak of the child benefits package that this government has proposed, the so-called white paper. It was unveiled as a sparkling gem of the Tory budget. However, it has been revealed to be a lump of coal. This program was heralded by the health minister and the Minister of Finance as a program to put more money into the hands of the poor. It was supposed to simplify the child benefits system. Yet the very first thing it did was to make two classes of poor, the deserving poor and the non-deserving poor, as though you can distinguish among the poor. The poor need help and they are all deserving.

Research done by Mr. Ken Battle of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy shows how misleading this child benefit package really is. It is a carrot meant to come into effect months before the next projected election, but it will decrease rapidly as it is indexed below the rate of inflation.

Let me read from the very same white paper: "The monthly payments will be adjusted annually for increases in the Consumer Price Index", it continues, "in excess of 3 per cent". That is the killer. It is not indexed to inflation.

For every gain made by the working poor, the changes to the family allowance system will set them back in other ways. One national newspaper calculated the effects of the budget on the pocket-books of three families.

A family earning $65,000 a year will be $124 ahead at tax time. Meanwhile, a working couple with three children earning $22,000 will only be $73 ahead. What can a family of five do with $73? It might possibly buy a child a snowsuit. What the government gives with one hand, it takes with the other through the loss of the dependent child credit and increases in the CPP premium.

The biggest kick in the teeth to families came when the government pitted people in need of child care against people in need of increased family benefits. A slippery government survey with twisted questions provided the government with the rationale for its decision to kill child care. The argument used by the Conservatives was, and I quote: "We fed hungry children. They were our first priority".

That is ridiculous. Children are the least of Conservative priorities. A trip to any food bank will demonstrate that. This government has accomplished nothing with the child benefits package and crushed the hopes of families who helped put them into office in the 1984 and 1988 elections because of its pledge of universal child care. This government has betrayed the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to have one more minute to conclude. It all came back to money. The country cannot afford child care. I submit that the country cannot afford not to have child care. It is part of caring for the family and making our workers more productive. How can a mother work, and over 60 per cent of mothers do work outside their homes, when they must worry about who is caring for their children? How many families can afford not to have dual incomes in these tough economic times? Parents have to work and children need care.

The government has to reconcile the two and realize that good non-profit child care is a necessity, not an accessory.

Money does not make a country, people make a country. If people are jobless, sick, living in poverty and abused, a country cannot be strong. Canada is weakening by the day, dragged down by this government's confused economic policies and loss of social direction.

This borrowing bill, which asks for $24.7 billion and an additional $3.9 billion to cover a shortfall in this government's fiscal year, can be passed by this government with its majority vote. However, the constituents of Winnipeg North are not very happy.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek unanimous consent of the House to revert to presenting reports from committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992-93

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate on the borrowing bill because it gives me an opportunity to speak on last month's budget presentation.

The budget of 1992 presented an opportunity for the government to change the course of its policies, to in effect change the course of Canada. I submit that this government failed to meet that opportunity, to exploit that opportunity. I think it can be safely and accurately said that the 1992 budget was a hope that never materialized, a hope that was never acted upon.

We could say that this government follows the policies of the administration in Washington. It was George Bush, the President of the U.S.A., who said the other day, and I will not quote him verbatim, but I think he said in effect that he really did not want to fiddle with the American economy. He wanted to allow the economy to right itself on its own, in other words to just wait until the economy pulled itself out of the doldrums.

The government here in Ottawa is following the same course. It really does not want to do anything about the economy; it just wants to let the economy find its way all by itself.

This budget could have been a blueprint; it could have been a road map. It could have been a new vision for Canada, but that is not what happened. In my opinion, it is a hodge-podge of a budget, a budget that is really all over the map, a budget that is anything but coherent.

Now there were a couple of good ideas in it, ideas that I think—not I think, I know—were stolen from this side. For example, the 5 per cent minimum down payment for home buyers came from this side of the House as did the use of RRSPs to finance home purchases. I congratulate the government for following up on those ideas.

Let us look at some other areas of the budget. The finance minister had a lot to say about the tax reductions in the budget. Well, those reductions are a laugh. They have been alluded to before, but let me refer to them again.

Take the reduction in the surtax. For a family earning $40,000, the reduction is $27. For a family earning $20,000, the cut in the surtax is $6 and if you make $15,000 a year, the cut is a paltry $2. Who is the largest winner when it comes to the surtax cut? It is the family earning $100,000. The cut for them is $111. Remember, these cuts in the surtax come after the government increased income taxes well over $1,000 since the government came to power in 1984.

Let us talk for a moment about the much-heralded child benefits package. That is the package that will, come next year, eliminate family allowance altogether, but the government pointed out that what it was going to do is it will take the family allowance money and give it to the poor.

When examining the budget, what does it reveal? It reveals that if you are the poorest of the poor, you will get nothing extra. Not one nickel and that has been admitted to by the government.

Admittedly yes, there is some help to the extent of $500 a year for the so-called working poor. But once a family gets up around $40,000 a year, there is very little help, very little extra help under the child benefits package. In fact, according to calculations that I have seen at $40,000 a year income, it comes to about $44 a year.

I was reading a column the other day written by Frances Russell of the Winnipeg Free Press. She put this so-called child benefits package in the proper context. Let me read just a part of her column. It goes like this:

> The drive to take baby bonuses away from bank presidents finally reached its destination last Tuesday.

That was the Tuesday the budget was presented.

• (1740)

Again I continue from the column:

> The bank president won't get his $34.88 a month, that is $418.56 a year, per child any more. But if that child is in day care, the bank president will save an additional $450 in taxes just as a result of the $1,000 increase in the child care expense deduction.
> That deduction now stands at $5,000 for each child under age seven and $3,000 for other eligible children.
> At the maximum 29 per cent tax bracket, the $5,000 deduction translates into a tax saving of $2,250 per year for that bank president if he has one child in care, $3,600 if he has two.
> The family allowance pales.
> Meanwhile, maximum tax savings at the lowest 17 per cent bracket are only $1,350 for the first child. And most low and lower middle income parents can't afford sufficiently expensive child care to qualify even for that.
> The government's decision to cut the income surtax is equally perverse.

In my opinion, that puts the so-called child benefit package in context.

Now, in other areas of the budget, is there help for agriculture? You have to have a very sharp eye. There is almost nothing for agriculture. Is there help for small business? Again you better have a very sharp eye because you will find very little help. There is something when it comes to increasing the ceiling for development loans but again, examination will reveal it really is no help at all.

When it comes to the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, is there help in this budget? Well, we just have to ask the 1.5 million unemployed whether there is hope. Again, the answer is no and in fact, the budget admits that. The Minister of Finance admits that because he says in the budget that he would expect the unemployment rate of about 10 to 10.5 per cent to continue for the next two years. There is very little hope for the unemployed.

The government failed to pick up on the suggestion of developing a so-called infrastructure program, working on developing our public works in the country, bridges, roads, those kinds of things. That would have been a great stimulus to the economy.

The abolition of the so-called advisory bodies for the federal government made no sense at all. The abolition of the Economic Council of Canada makes no sense at all. The abolition of the Science Council again is a real crazy idea. Will it save the taxpayer any money? I doubt it. I would think that what this government will do is that it will take the money that was saved from the elimination of the advisory councils. It will take the money and give it to its friends in the private consulting field. That would be my guess.

The matter of the GST. I wanted to touch on that because again a lot of people were hoping that maybe in the budget there would be some revelation about changing the GST in some respects. Again nothing at all, no hope in the budget with respect to the GST.

I want to read into the record a short letter from a constituent who has been fighting with the government over certain aspects of the GST. I will read the section of the letter which is self-explanatory.

> I personally feel that the GST system has been set up in such a way as to benefit most middle-to-large corporations. The ruling that I am asking the government to change in order to allow self-employed and employees of insurance businesses to be allowed to claim "Input Tax Credits" on their expenses for all business purposes is not unrealistic. What is fair for the goose should be equally fair for the gander. Why is it always the ordinary taxpayer that has to feel the brunt of any tax changes. If you and I both buy the same item at a store at the same time, we should both pay the same price and tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret, the hon. member's time is now terminated. He has had an extra two minutes. I am sorry.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to say just a few words and put some comments on the record about this legislation we are debating today. It gives me an opportunity to comment on the government's budget and economic program and in particular, the concerns I have had about the need for fairer taxes in Canada.

What we are debating today is a very interesting piece of legislation. It is a short bill, two pages long. Bill C–61 is an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992. I say it is an interesting bill largely because in these two pages the government is requesting the authority from this House to approve its ability to borrow funds.

Given the responsibility of governing, obviously any party would seek the agreement of this House to authorize its expenditures and raising of funds. The biggest question and concern that we have today is the way this government is raising its funds and in some areas, the misguided spending of funds it raises from Canadian individuals and corporations.

This bill is a pretty expensive piece of paper. We are talking about a piece of paper that is worth $24.7 billion. That is a pretty big number. I wrote it out with all the zeros so that we could keep track of it, nine zeros after the 24. It is a big chunk of money.

It is reason enough to have a debate today to ensure that we put on the record the concerns that members on this side of the House have about this government's economic policy and the problems and concerns I have as it relates to the question of fair taxes.

I mentioned those two particular concepts because it is very clear that this government has developed an economic program whereby it is fixated by the so–called marketplace and the invisible hand of the marketplace. It is more like the very visible hand of George Bush in Washington, D.C.

I am convinced more every day by the evidence that has come from various independent bodies, from the government itself and information I have compiled into what I call my fair tax information kit which anyone who is watching is welcome to inquire about. I know you might be interested in reading this, Mr. Speaker.

I am more convinced than ever after reading the information from government and independent bodies that the most critical decision we have to make, and so far the only party prepared to make that decision is the New Democrats, is that we must scrap the GST and bring in a fair tax system. I am convinced of that. I think the information is there.

In taking a looking at the GFT as Connie Colter, the chanteuse from Saskatchewan, called it, when we see the effect that tax is having on communities across Canada, and in particular of the major community in my riding of Prince George, we are talking about $42 million being sucked out of the economy through the GST bunkers that the government has built throughout the country.

That has a phenomenal impact on the Canadian economy. That is the reason provincial governments are very reluctant now to harmonize this tax with the federal government because they know the damage the "GFT" has done to the Canadian economy. They know the double whammy that Canadian consumers would be hit with if any provincial government moved to try and harmonize with the GST. They know the serious damage that would be done to the consumer. Some people are predicting conservatively that the GST is taking between $400 and $700 per person out of Canadian pockets on top of what was there before. I think it is clear when you talk to, maybe not officials in Ottawa here, maybe not even with Revenue Canada, but the average Canadian. We know the average Canadian is still very concerned over this government's decision to bring in the goods and services tax. I know they are looking forward to having that as an issue in the next election.

We have looked at some of the concerns about the debt and taxation and my view is that we can have a fair tax system in the country. When we suggest this to government members, they say: "Well, what is your alternative?" That is fair enough, I expect them to ask that.

The reason I welcome their comments is because prior to the GST debate, our party presented alternatives to the goods and services tax. We went through the proposals, came up with our proposals and I think responded to what the then minister of finance was saying when he asked us to come up with alternatives. Our thinking cannot be any fuzzier than these guys. I think the evidence shows that our information will go much further than the government's to date.

We have had some interesting support come forward. I am referring in particular to the one proposal that has been presented by our caucus and that is concerning the business entertainment deduction. I have a very interesting quote I would like to read to you from Canadian Business. It is the editor in chief, Mr. Alexander Ross. I quote:

> It pains me to be on the same side of an issue as the NDP's Audrey McLaughlin, the member for Yukon who recently suggested that enough is enough. But I think it's time that you and I and my friend Patrick and all those portly chaps in their plush banquettes at Winston's—

And we know who used to hang out at Winston's.

> —started paying for their own drinks and big lunches for a change.

That says that the work our caucus has done in presenting alternatives to the taxation measures presented by this government is correct. So when we are faced with voting on a bill that is trying to borrow some $24 billion, we would hope that Canadians can be assured that it is going to be spent on the proper items and proper things.

I would like to comment briefly on what was not dealt with dramatically in the budget, and that is some very important matters to my area in northern B.C. I think about the infrastructure program that has been mentioned, the importance of upgrading the Yellowhead highway, which may have been part of an announcement today or at least there were rumours of that from the first ministers' meeting. There is also a very important program in our area, the northern tax allowance. Basically it has been scrapped by this government with the endorsement of the Reform Party which is opposed to it completely.

I think it is an indication that the government's economic policy is fixated on a marketplace that is hurting the average Canadian and imposes an unfair tax system. That is why we have so many people across the country concerned about what this government is doing and the need for new direction for the Canadian economy.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C–61, which is the borrowing authority for this government. I want to make my comments, taking into account the recent budget by the Minister of Finance, because clearly that budget sets out the government's fiscal and monetary policy for the next year.

We have to recognize the Minister of Finance is able to put together what some political junkies would call a very skilful political document, in that he gives a token reduction in taxes later this year or next year, and a few social policy things that seem to do something. In some ways some people would describe it as a used car salesman's budget in that he is trying to give the old tin Lizzie a new paint job, bumped out the fenders and tarted up the old tin Lizzie and made it look somewhat better but if you look under the hood of the Canadian economy, it really does not look any better than it did before the budget.

Clearly that budget spells out that we are going to face extremely high unemployment, over 10 per cent, 1.5 million Canadians this year and most of next year unemployed, that the deficit which the government is preoccupied with really is not going down. Every year it misses those deadlines. We really do not have much improvement.

I think that the document is designed to respond to the fear and dread that the government has and the Tory members from Alberta have about Preston Manning and the Reform Party. We see the wholesale slaughter of all kinds of government agencies, agencies which often give independent advice, like the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, which have been very critical of the government. It is a campaign to get rid of all the critics.

Governments by their very nature tend to operate on a three or four year horizon, whereas groups like the Science Council and the Economic Council are there to look ahead at long-term needs and most governments draw great advice from them.

As we look under the hood of this masterpiece by the Minister of Finance, we do not see much encouragement for the future. However, the government did adopt a couple of recommendations by the Leader of the Official Opposition, the idea of using RRSP funds to stimulate the housing market. We applaud that decision by the government. The decision to cut some $75 million out of the government's propaganda campaign, that of course is acknowledged and appreciated. The government did reduce the excise tax on ethanol.

Most of these things were at the urging of the Official Opposition. The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex is in the House tonight. He has had a bill on the Order Paper encouraging the use of ethanol for at least three or four years. The government has finally responded but now we have to wait and see whether it will put in place a program to promote an effective renewable fuels program and not just reduce the excise tax. That is an important action, but there needs to be whole promotion, a research program, a development program to actually get to those renewable fuels.

If we look at that document we see that the poor and the unemployed are still poor and unemployed. For instance, the tax reductions that are talked about really amount to practically nothing. A family of four earning $15,000 a year will get a $2 tax saving. The child benefit, which has been alluded to as a great step forward, a family of four with a $30,000 income will get $4 per month more.

The budget makes little feinting moves toward some improvement but the basic problem of a country, the falling apart of our whole economy, the unemployment, nothing has really changed by this budget. I take one example.

The agriculture productivity council which is advising the government on how we might maintain the further processing of agriculture products made a recommendation just about a week before the budget of the Minister of Finance came down. It said that the capital cost allowance for new capital investments to stimulate the food processing industry, which after all is the second largest processing and manufacturing industry in this country, should have the capital cost write-off doubled from 25 per cent to 50 per cent.

They said even at that they might not do very well but there would be put in place a really strong stimulus to try to regain an industry where we have lost some 70 plants across this country, and over 18,000 jobs since the free trade deal came in. If we lose the food processing industry, we lose the market for those thousands of producers in this country who are under great attack because of the negotiations at the GATT and the free trade deal. The government and the Minister of Finance increased the capital cost write-off by 5 per cent to 30 per cent. That is just a token gesture. It does not go anywhere near what was recommended by that productivity advisory council.

We see that across the whole landscape of our processing and manufacturing industries, which are totally in the doldrums these days. That is just an example of the lack of a massive program to try to get this country back on the rails.

The Leader of the Opposition recommended that there be some public capital works projects to try to get the economy going again, to try to reduce unemployment, to give confidence to the private sector. None of that was in this budget.

I recall in the recession of 1981–1982 we had a massive capital works program and by 1983 we were seeing the economy pull out of that recession. I recall that we had programs for unemployment that helped those economies.

This recession is much worse than in 1981–1982 because we have seen plants shut down which we do not expect to ever see open again. At that time it was a case of industries laying off and taking people back. What we need is a reconstruction program for the Canadian economy.

Just as we saw the productivity council on food processing recommend a doubling of the capital cost write-off, we need strong incentives for research and development and application of new techniques because after all we were in competition with not just the United States but European countries in that sector. None of those things were done in a manner large enough or strong enough in this budget to really turn the situation around and recoup.

We are disappointed that this budget has not gone nearly far enough. On top of that we see groups like the Science Council, like the Economic Council, who are after all a sort of long distance radar, looking ahead to the direction, standing back from the politics of the day, or the economics of the day or short blips in the economy, and looking at the long sweep of history.

Yet those agencies which are independent and operate on a global basis and are in a position to advise the government what direction it should be taking and giving independent advice, sometimes critical advice, have been killed off by the government.

We will not have that advice for the long term.

Mr. Speaker, I think this budget really gives us great concern as to where the government is going, how we are going to get out of this recession and how we are going to put the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work back to work.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this borrowing bill. In so doing, there are three areas I would like to cover. I want to talk about the situation as I see it in the economy right now, some of which was referred to by my friend from Algoma. I want to have a look at the situation in the taxation business in the period of the seven-plus years of this government. I also want to have a look at what has happened to the deficit. Those three areas I hope to be able to cover in the time I have.

To begin with, after years of wax and wain, but essentially what was an improvement in the economy and relatively good times as far as the expansion of the economy was concerned, what are we left with today? The budget that I am referring to is the eighth budget in eight years, pretty well, and what has all this amounted to?

We heard the promises of jobs, jobs, jobs. We have now a situation in which the national rate of unemployment is currently 10.3 per cent. It is expected to remain, in the budget's own words, at 10 per cent throughout this year, 1992. We have a net loss of 91,000 jobs experienced in the manufacturing sector alone in 1991 and the total unemployment insurance bill for last year is now expected to come to close to $18 billion. That is phenomenal, that is phenomenal.

We have a growing percentage of the unemployed who are exhausting their benefits without finding work, and today we have more than 1.4 million Canadians unemployed; 2.2 million are on welfare; and 1 million children live in poverty.

In my province alone we have 31,000 people employed in the fishing industry—fishermen, trawlermen, inshore, offshore and plant workers—and as I stand and speak to you tonight 8,000 of them are without employment. In my riding alone, on February 14, literally with the stroke of a pen, 850 employees in the plant in Port Union-Catalina were to be laid off within a week; 155 trawlermen with the same stroke of the pen, and on the same day, ironically, the announcement was made of a cutback in Hibernia where 850 people were to lose their jobs.

If that is not a double whammy, I don't know what is.

During the first 11 months of last year over 57,000 consumers and 12,500 businesses declared bankruptcy in Canada. That was an increase of 42 per cent over the same period in 1990. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which is a reputable organization, predicted that 1,000 manufacturers will go bankrupt in the coming year, resulting in an estimated loss of 100,000 jobs.

In November of 1984—I was not a member at the time—but the government of the day, the Conservative government, outlined the vision of how the Canadian economy could be put on a solid future-oriented footing. I took heart, as a lot of Canadians did, with this. Their approach was to build a strong economy relying completely on market forces, believing that the government's role in the economy should be minimal.

As part of this strategy the government cut expenditures for education, research and development, and training. It did not introduce adjustment programs until after the implementation of the free trade agreement. As part of this strategy, until quite recently, a higher interest high dollar policy that has been spoken about so often in this House was encouraged.

The government indeed has not fostered growth. It has relinquished the responsibility to monitor the market forces and has inhibited the economic recovery. The real story is not only what the government has done to the economy over the last seven years, but essentially what it has failed to do. This is one of the problems I have.

One of the things that it has done is to have drastically increased taxes. Since coming to power in 1984, the Conservatives have implemented 40 changes to the tax system that directly affect Canadian individuals. This count, of course, does not include the implementation of the goods and services tax, the most hated tax in the world, which single-handedly caused the greatest damage to consumer confidence and is partly responsible for the recession that we have today.

I am going to quote the global economic study released in June of last year that revealed that the tax burden faced by an average Canadian family was $1,530 greater in 1991 than it was in 1984. In 1991, Canadian households paid a total of $17.2 billion more in taxes, net of transfers, than they would have paid if the 1984 tax system were still in place—$17.2 billion. Even families earning less than $10,000 on average, and that is not very much money, experienced a small increase of $85 in federal taxes.

The impression that one would like to have and certainly one that the government would like to create is that the latest budget offers Canadians a significant tax break when in fact it does not. The reduction in the personal income surtax, and I would remind you, this is a tax that was introduced by the Conservative government in 1986 and subsequently increased on two occasions, offers very little relief to Canadians. You have heard the figures many times. I am not going to repeat them.

Essentially it benefits high income earners more than low income earners. The only figure I want to quote is that for a family of four with a combined income of $15,000, this tax cut will result in savings of only $2 for 1992 whereas if the same family had an income of $75,000, they would have saved $74 in 1992.

I remember the first budget of this government. I was not a member of Parliament at the time, but the first budget was in May 1985. The comment was made in that budget that this budget represented a major step toward controlling the growth of the federal debt.

The prediction was made that the deficit would be $33.8 billion in that year, but in fact it turned out to be $34.6 billion. The federal debt that needed controlling at that time was $224 billion. After seven more budgets, seven more years, the budget now stands from $34.6 billion all the way down to $31.5 billion, a decrease of practically nothing compared to each promise that was made in each budget at a time when the economy was relatively healthy, at a time when the goods and services tax was put on to Canadians, at a time when taxes were raised on the average Canadian $17.2 billion, at a time when social services were cut, unemployment insurance. The government got out of unemployment insurance. VIA Rail was cut. Health insurance is beginning to look a little bit marginal, social programs that were supposed to be a social trust.

I do not understand why the deficit is still the way it is. One of the things I wanted to quote here in the time that I have remaining is a C.D. Howe Institute analysis of the February 1987 budget. I happened to come across it and if you would just permit me to finish off here. The title of it was "An Opportunity Missed" and it said in 1987:

> In the face of the increasing difficulty in maintaining the appearance of downward deficit track, the government has resorted to asset sales and fiscal tricks to fulfil its principles. This is not the way to reduce the underlying imbalance between spending and revenues. It is merely a way to finance it. The ongoing budget deficit appears to be stuck at just over $30 billion.

That is what they said. This seems to be the situation today. Five years later, this Minister of Finance rose to tell us that the budget was going to be around $31 billion which was higher than last year, which was higher than the year before and the year before that.

Mr. Speaker, we are looking for some improvement. I regret to say that this budget has not produced it.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, tonight I would like to address my remarks to a program that the federal government attempted to impose on the transportation system on the coast of British Columbia. That was the program to destaff the lighthouses, essentially to remove staff and automate them.

The coast of British Columbia is about 500 miles of the worst place to conduct transportation anywhere in this country. It is mountains, oceans, continuous fog, rain and storms off the Pacific. There are only two ways to get back and forth and that is by aircraft or by vessel.

The destaffing of the lighthouses, and this is the second time the government has tried it, is really putting a major hole in the transportation safety net on the coast of B.C. British Columbians are firmly convinced that this will impact their lives and safety in the work they do and in their transportation.

The cancellation of that ill-founded and ill-conceived destaffing program resulted from what was an uprising on the coast of B.C. There were meetings held in Prince Rupert, well attended meetings of people who were irate, concerned and committed to doing something about it. They attended meetings in Prince Rupert, Port Hardy, and Campbell River. There were meetings scheduled in Victoria, Nanaimo, Parksville in the Alberni area, and they too would have formed committees to go after the government and attempt to reverse this.

Thousands of letters, thousands of phone calls, thousands of petitions have eventually turned the government again. Certainly this was not partisan in terms of one political group attempting to achieve it, or members of Parliament, or folks from one political group. It represented people from all walks of life, members of Parliament, MLAs, again from all political parties. By joining together over a matter they felt very strongly about, this matter has now been changed.

It is not good enough. This is only half the job. The government tried this twice and again just recently has announced that it is again abandoning the idea. Again, it is only half the job.

What needs to happen now is the government must get involved in a light station upgrading program. Some time ago when the Coast Guard abandoned this destaffing project previously on the west coast, it began a study called "The Future Upgrading of Light Stations". There were to be seven volumes or seven areas of study. The first volume of this study was completed and adopted at the regional level and referred to the national office of the Coast Guard for consideration. And there it sits.

Really, if the transportation safety net in British Columbia is to be workable and secure for the people who live and work there, this future of light stations report has got to be brought back, dusted off, and implemented.

One of the key elements of it is a redefinition of the job description of a lightkeeper. A lightkeeper does not simply turn on a fog horn and a light. They are involved in aid to mariners. They have rescued people, saved their lives, prevented property damage and have done basically a tremendous job as the ears and eyes of the safety system along the coast of British Columbia.

They are available where they have provided their own radio equipment to talk to people in aircraft and in vessels in the area, giving them advice about weather, about marine or air hazards in the area, and those are very well appreciated.

Unfortunately in the FURL report the government made a commitment that it would provide up to date VHF radio equipment so that that communication can become a regular published feature for those light station keepers. It must happen. Safety for safety reasons, it is imperative.

It is ironic that the government does not supply binoculars to the light station keeper. If the light station keepers are to be able to monitor what is going on in the area around the light station they have to provide their own. It would be a reasonable thing and recommended again by the report that a simple pair of binoculars, that simple expenditure, can save peoples' lives.

A vitally important area in upgrading is putting weather reporting equipment in those light stations. The ability to give timely and accurate weather reports for marine and aviation purposes is absolutely critical. It was recommended in the upgrading report. It sits on the shelf.

Some stations have outmoded equipment. They do not report on a regular basis, and the reports are almost useless. They are doing half a job. They do not provide the kind of safety back-up that is required in the weather reporting system out there. They need proper equipment in those light stations. The lightkeepers need to be trained and they need to report regularly and at special times when important changes occur in the weather so that the transportation system can use that information. It will save lives and it will make the whole system safer.

It is ironic that in providing aid to mariners some stations do not have reliable vessels. They have no reliable way of launching those vessels. Of course in some cases where the light is separated from the office of the light station keeper, they do not provide a survival suit for the individual who may wind up stranded in an area surrounded by water or in the water. It is important that each one of these light station keepers have access to a survival suit so if they are going to render aid to mariners, at least they are not endangering their own lives. It is absolutely critical that that be provided.

There were meetings in Prince Rupert and Port Hardy. The central coast of British Columbia is a very difficult and dangerous area to work in. Generally the flights that originate in Vancouver, Vancouver Island, and Prince Rupert, proceeding along the coast via the central coast depend very heavily on the Cape St. James weather station. Without that you are literally flying or sailing blind into the area. It is probably the loss of one of the most important weather information systems to people who use that system of any resource that exists.

The government is talking about closing it in 1992. It is going to save some money. But if it saves some money by closing that weather station, it will kill people. It will become very, very unsafe to operate in the area.

I do not say that; the Coast Guard helicopter pilots say it. They say that when they leave Prince Rupert they have no information to work with. If they go out in bad weather to effect a rescue or possibly to assist someone who is having difficulty, then they are in turn placing themselves in danger because they have no information to work with.

One of the most important assets or resources they have is that Cape St. James weather station. It is absolutely critical that the government reverse its decision to close that station. There will be a continuing fight in this House. The meetings on the coast will continue. This must be turned around. Those light stations must be upgraded.

In the FURL report, there is a volume ready to go for implementation, but there were to be seven of these. It is time now to do the second half of this upgrading. Let us get the public consultation meetings going again. Let us pick up the ideas on how to upgrade those things so the safety net is solid. Let us cancel the plans to close the Cape St. James weather station.

Above all, the minister must meet with the seven members of Parliament who represent the coast of British Columbia. There is a letter on its way to the minister's desk to say that the job is half done. Well done for that part of it. No more destaffing. But let us get the other half of the job done, the one that will really provide some protection to the lives and safety of people on the west coast. Please, let us have a meeting with those members and get some understanding of where we go from here.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased this afternoon to have the opportunity to touch this problem from a different perspective, having spoken to many of the people I represent from Nipigon, Red Rock, Dorion, Hurkett, Pass Lake, Kakabeka Falls, Murillo, Gull Bay, Armstrong and eventually Thunder Bay. That is primarily the vantage point from which I speak. I am going to try to express to this House what I have been hearing from the areas that I have just mentioned.

What truly disturbs me about this budget and particularly about this borrowing bill is that we seem to have failed in our purpose in Canada. What I am hearing is that Canada no longer has a common direction on which to focus. Canada no longer has a common goal. We no longer have a national purpose around which all Canadians can rally and engender the feeling of pride that we once had in our country and around which all Canadians can feel secure and comfortable about the many fine institutions that it has taken this federal government of ours so many years to build.

These are institutions like our educational system that we value in every province and every territory in our country that is free and open for all to participate. It is an educational system that qualifies as one of the best in the world when we get into our secondary level and our post-secondary level. We have a skills training program at our college level that we should be supporting in so many ways.

Another institution is a system of government that shows empathy, care and concern for many of our fellow Canadians at different times in our lives when we need a little assistance from the governments.

Another institution with its pimples and its warts, our national health care system with those pitfalls is the envy of every country in the world. Every country, especially the United States, is trying to emulate it.

What we lack is a national purpose around which all Canadians can once again sense that feeling of national pride, that feeling of loyalty to a unified country we are all trying to achieve. I think unfortunately it is because of the borrowing bill we are talking about and the budget and the several budgets that have gone before that today this is missing in Canada. This bill fails in every way to re-establish those values and virtues most Canadians grew up with.

When I say most Canadians, I look around and I see my colleague from Essex, my colleague from Spadina, you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleague from Chatham. I am sure we all grew up with a feeling of loyalty and love for our country. I sense that is no longer prevalent today. I am not so sure that our colleague, the Minister of Justice, would be of our age group so I will not include her.

We still believe in our future. I am not sure that if this present trend continues that those for whom we toil and work today, our children and our grandchildren, particularly my grandchildren, Bradley, Joseph and Victoria, will ever again sense that feeling we experienced in our childhood and enjoyed the institutions that this country Canada afforded to each and every one of us.

In the few moments I have left, let me try to explain what I have just said. One of the worst mistakes we have seen in the Government of Canada in the last several years, perhaps the gravest error, is what this government has attempted to do with respect to the economy. It has tried to change the basic direction of our economy that has been in existence historically for well over 115 years.

The heritage, the wealth of our economy, the employment our economy created in Canada up until the term of office of this government have always been based on a resource-based industry. There is nothing to be ashamed of when we are referred to as the drawers of water and the hewers of wood. As a matter of fact, it is a compliment to all of those who work outside the larger centres in, the forestry industry, the mining industry and the agricultural industry, who on the odd occasion have to get down and get their hands dirty. There is nothing to be ashamed of in the fact that the strength and the wealth of our country is based on our resources.

When we talk about resources, let us just take a moment and see what we have. With respect to my friend from Chatham, in agriculture I think of that wonderful area that produces so many fruits and vegetables in the spring, summer and fall in southwestern Ontario, where I have had the opportunity to participate for so many years.

When we talk of agriculture we are not excluding Ontario and other parts of the country, but our minds go to the west and wheat. Every time we talk about wheat it is synonymous with food. It seems we cannot talk about wheat without thinking of food.

I know that my colleague is thinking of using wheat for other purposes, in the energy business. I compliment him for the work and the tremendous energy that he has put toward that venture.

• (1830)

But wheat is still primarily synonymous with food in our country. When we think of so many people who are hungry not just in Canada but in the world, we have a tremendous challenge in Canada to become the bread-basket of the world, to be able to feed all of those people. Not just to feed the people in Canada, but all of those hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of people throughout the world who need wheat and need food. How great it would be for our country to be the leader in providing food for the millions of people who need it.

Our agricultural products can do that. The resources of our farming communities, the wealth that we have in our western provinces, given the opportunity we can produce more than enough food than is necessary throughout the world.

We have resources in energy. We have resources in forestry. It is the largest single industry in Canada. It produces $40 billion a year, $20 billion in export payments. It produces 800,000 jobs a year in this country. We have mining.

Those are all the fundamental industries that make up the resource-based industry that Canada has. We should start to reassess our future economically and put it back to the resource-based industry that has made Canada strong for 115 of the last 124 years. By going back to our roots, to the resource-based industry, we can build a base whereby we can then take a challenge in other areas of the economic spectrum.

I am not sure that we took that direction under this government, under this borrowing bill, and under this budget and the several budgets that have been placed before this House. We have failed to recognize the value of the resource-based industries in this country and, as a result, we find ourselves in the dilemma that we are today.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow on the heels of my learned colleague who has underscored the real problem with this bill. It indicates that the government, as my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon says, does not have a vision for this country, nor has it indicated a purpose.

I would like to concentrate for a moment on the government's record. It is asking for $24.7 billion and Canadians have to ask why. For what reason is this government yet again asking for more money?

Since the 1989 budget there has been a 16.5 per cent increase in government revenues. To all intents and purposes that means that there has been a 16.5 per cent increase in taxation, because that money has had to come from some place, keeping in mind that we are in the middle of a recession.

During that same period, my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon and others on this side of the House will recall for everyone present and all of those who are following this debate that the national debt has increased by a further 27.3 per cent.

So when the government asks for money, there must be a reason for that money, for its utilization. For what purposes do we collect taxes unless we are going to put them to use for our citizens? But as my colleague has indicated, that purpose is not altogether clear.

Before I go on to some of those analyses, it is important or at least instructive for those present to recall that from the time this government came into power in 1984 until this last budget, income taxes have increased by 64 per cent. Sales taxes have increased by 236 per cent. Gasoline taxes, one of the big inducements to cross-border shopping, have increased by 479 per cent. And yet we still have a debt. We have a burgeoning debt. It has gone up by 27.3 per cent over that same period.

Most Canadians might be able to stomach that increase in taxation, all that money. We would say yes, we are willing to contribute to the greater need of our country. But for what purposes has that money been used? Has it been used to redress the regional inequities in this country?

Let us just think for a moment about the population distribution. Atlantic Canada, as one example, houses 8.6 per cent of Canada's population. Yet that population is only able to pay 5.8 per cent in income taxes to our general revenues. When we consider both provincial and federal revenues, they pay 5.7 per cent.

One might stop and say that is unfair, that they should be paying more. They are incapable of paying more because over the course of the last two Parliaments the government has been unwilling to address a crying need, that is regional disparity.

I will continue again with Atlantic Canada, just to give an indication of how remiss the government has been in addressing the needs of Canadians. When that population, that 8.6 per cent of Canada's population, files its income tax returns, 57.6 per cent of all its net revenues include UI, old age security and family allowances. The people of Atlantic Canada depend on the largess—and that is not a very nice term—of Canadians elsewhere.

By comparison, my own province of Ontario has a much lower distribution or contribution to those types of programs. Despite the fact that the people of Ontario comprise 36.7 per cent of Canada's population, they are contributing 45.7 per cent to national revenues.

We have not addressed the inequities we see through both revenue accumulation and revenue distribution by this government. Even worse, have we addressed the areas where Canadians can grow? Have we addressed the imbalances we see in the economy of the country?

You know as well as others, Mr. Speaker, that about 30 cents out of every dollar earned in Canada comes from international trade. We have a negative balance of trade with Japan, with the European Economic Community, with other OECD countries, and with all other countries. The only country with which we have a positive trade balance is the United States. This in itself is a cause for shame for all of Canada, because we do 75 per cent of our business with the United States. No other country in the world is so dependent on one client, on one market as Canada.

Is this government using the resources it is asking Canadians to contribute for the purposes of redressing these kinds of imbalances?

Even in our trade with the United States we have a negative balance in all areas except that which my hon. colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon indicated, and that is in the primary resource area. Imagine, the only positive component of our international trade which contributes 30 cents out of every dollar earned in Canada comes from our primary resources.

In effect we are a Third World economy with a First World standard of living. But for how much longer can we continue in that vein? For how much longer can the economy of Canada sustain the kind of lifestyle to which Canadians have become accustomed or to which they would like to become accustomed? We need only go to some of the less advantaged areas of Canada.

I cited some examples from Atlantic Canada. I think they underscore the disparities we have nation-wide.

• (1840)

The government comes to us today and says: "We want another $24.7 billion". We would be happy to give it that money if we had along with that request an indication of an agenda or an objective the government and this country could follow for the purposes of growth.

My colleagues as well have alluded to the problems that we have in terms of unity. How can we speak of national unity when we appear to be bereft of national purpose? How can we speak about harmony and productivity when the government has essentially abandoned its obligation to address economic disparity on a regional basis, economic disparity on a personal basis, and when its only solution to all ills of this nation is to increase taxation and decrease expenditures.

A study was recently put out about the problems of Canada with respect to its demography, its population, and why it cannot be competitive. It does not mean that Canadians are incapable of producing an intellectual level of inhabitant capable of competing with others world-wide. That is not the problem. In fact once Canadians get to the university stage, the post-graduate degree level and beyond, they can compete with others of similar education world-wide.

The technology of today and the technology of tomorrow require a semi-skilled or skilled worker able to make adjustments from day to day, year to year, and for that they require a high level of education.

Even this government through its ministers has indicated that by the end of this century we will need a minimum of five years of post-secondary school education and/or training for the typical job, for 55 per cent of all jobs that will be created by year 2000.

Through this bill we do not even have an indication of whether the government will in fact put in some adjustment policies, some transitional policies that will help those who are already in the marketplace or in the work field to move over. Nor does it have an indication that it is willing to contribute to the education of tomorrow's citizens, today's young people.

For those reasons we cannot support this bill.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak on Bill C-61. This is the borrowing bill; not boring but borrowing. The government has asked permission to borrow $24.7 billion. Of course it has already told us in the budget how it is going to spend it.

The government has told us it is going to be trying to hold down the national debt by cutting back on payments to provinces, by cutting back on all kinds of services to people, and by cutting back on basic things like health, education and the legal services that people need to defend themselves in the courts against questionable legislation.

The government's argument is that it has to cut back because there is a big national debt and a deficit every year and we are paying all this money on the debt. What it does not tell us is that year by year it has been allowing the richest individuals in the country and the richest, biggest corporations in the country to get away with little or no tax. If these corporations and individuals paid tax even at the rate they did say 20 years ago, we would have more money in the government's coffers to spend than we are spending now and no debt.

It is a con game that the government is playing, to say it has to borrow more money and at the same time it has to cut back on the services that the big majority of the Canadian people need to use like education and health.

I have just a few examples of corporations that make plenty of money but pay no tax. Leading off, there is privatized Air Canada. In 1989 it made $231 million and paid no tax. There is Bramalea, one of the real estate development companies in the metro Toronto area.

The cost of shelter has gone up outrageously in Toronto and the Toronto area for the last two or three decades. It is really shameful how people are being forced out of town by the price of housing, and it is largely because of the near-monopolization of land and what can be built on the land by companies like Bramalea and not only their monopolization of land but their pipeline into the taxpayers' pocket through their tax exemptions. In 1989 Bramalea made $123.1 million before tax and paid no tax.

Canadian Pacific Hotels is a rich, rich corporation. It was given land to build the railroad and run a railroad for the company. Now it is crying poor. It has cut out passenger service on many lines. It has even even cut out whole lines. It is too poor because it hived off the land as separate projects such as CP Hotels. It made $46.9 million in 1989 and it paid what? It paid $2.1 million tax or about 4 per cent, just a pittance compared to the percentage that every working person and many retired people and unemployed people have to pay.

In 1989 Confederation Life Insurance made $103.1 million before tax and paid no tax.

Hemlo Gold Mines, we read about it in the financial pages of The Globe and Mail. It is doing pretty well with $54 million profit before tax and no tax paid. In fact it got a tax rebate. It got $1.9 million given to it from the taxes paid by people who earn much, much less than it does.

Power Financial Corporation, the big shot from Quebec, married to the premier of Quebec, $209.2 million before tax. It did pay a little tax. It paid 3.3 per cent. That is ridiculous.

Tridel Enterprises, another of the outfits that is inflating land price and forcing people out of their homes or forcing people to go to food banks because they have paid it all in their rent, made $79.4 million before tax and paid no tax.

I could go on with dozens and dozens more, but that is not what I want to do. I want to point out some of the taxes that used to be paid and are no longer paid. The big one is the capital gains tax. Anybody can get $100,000 tax-free on capital gains once in his lifetime and even after the $100,000 only three-quarters of the gains would be taxed. Almost all of that goes to the rich. At least half of the capital gains goes to the top 1 per cent of the people in this country.

The Prime Minister said years ago: "We need more rich people". He is certainly making them rich by taking the taxes from the poor and giving them to the rich.

There is the business entertainment tax, which is also another $1 billion taken from the taxes of the poor for the rich. There used to be a tax on inheritance, a tax on wealth. There is not any more, and yet there again the bottom 40 per cent of Canada's families own virtually no wealth. In other words, almost half the people in Canada have no wealth that they own. The top 5 per cent of people in Canada own half, 50 per cent, of the wealth of this country. They control the lives of most of the other people in this country. Yet the revenue they get from their wealth is often untaxed and the wealth itself pays no tax. Australia is about the only other industrialized country that does not charge any wealth tax.

• (1850)

When this government cries poor, and says: "We can't give so much to the universities. We can't give so much to health. We have to reduce what we are paying to the public assistance in the provinces", the provinces have to take up the slack because the government has cut people off unemployment insurance through its legislation.

This government says it cannot afford to pay the share that years ago it promised to pay. It is absolutely false. The only thing it needs to do is restore the tax system that we used to have 20 years ago and it would be able to pay all these things and have money left over.

My party will not be voting for this borrowing bill. We have to make a protest against the way this government is deceiving the Canadian people and robbing them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. member for South Shore on a point of order.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and an agreement has been reached not to see the clock until the hon. member for Ottawa West has completed her remarks, at which time the question will be put with the vote deferred until tomorrow afternoon at six o'clock.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I do not imagine that that motion gives me unlimited time tonight to speak as long as I want. I will respect the normal time limit on speeches.

However, as I was sitting here preparing to speak on a bill that authorizes the borrowing of $24 billion, I was thinking, what are we going to do with that money? What are we creating? I tend to think often in terms of what are we creating for our children.

I think this country, our history, everything we have achieved has been based on having an eye on the future, constantly having a vision of where we are heading, what we hope to accomplish, where our place is in the world. It started long ago at the time of Confederation when we had this crazy and wonderful dream that somehow this handful of people living in the eastern part of the north half of the North American continent could create a country that would eventually spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans and to the Arctic Ocean.

It seemed like an unachievable dream but people believed in it and they started investing in it because they knew what it could mean for the future. They saw the expanse of a continent with vast resources, tremendous natural beauty and all kinds of potential.

We invested in a transportation system. Later we invested in a communications network. Still later we started investing in a social network so that the people who lived in the various climates of this country, the various parts of Canada, could share opportunities together and could have a sense of belonging because somehow different though we were, far from each other as we were, we all shared a common purpose as a nation. We all shared a common commitment to our future together.

When I was leaving high school, it was a wonderful time to be leaving high school. No young person coming out of school, whether they were going on to university or starting to work, really had to wonder whether they were going to be able to get a job and earn an income. The opportunities were there in Canada at that time, lots of opportunities.

Yet we are at a time now where when I talk to my constituents, when I listen to them on the telephone, when I go to meetings and I talk casually to people in a shopping centre on a Saturday afternoon, what do I hear? I hear fear, I hear despair, I hear cynicism, I hear anger. Mostly I hear fear, fear about whether we are going to have a future, fear about whether there will be opportunities for our children, fear about whether we are going to be able to breathe the air that protects our earth, fear about whether we can trust our elected representatives and our political leaders to manage our resources wisely so that for the next 125 years, as for the past 125, Canadians can believe in the future, can believe in equality, can believe in sharing and can believe in opportunities for all our children.

This budget, perhaps more than any other, feeds that sense of fear because it really turns a blind eye to the main concerns of Canadians and to the main challenges that confront us in the next year. It turns a blind eye to the more than 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed, to another 2.5 million who are living on social assistance and to all the spouses and children of those individuals who are also caught in that trap of no hope and no fulfilment through employment in our society.

I talked to seniors which I met in my constituency office last Friday afternoon who are worried that now that the co–op program has been cancelled, the co–operative they built together for themselves half a dozen years ago will somehow be deprived of subsidies and that they will not be able to afford to live in the housing that they built under the co–operative housing program.

I see that the spending on social housing is going to be limited to an increase which may be lower than the rate of inflation and indeed their fears about whether they can continue to live in the housing that they built themselves may indeed be valid.

I see words being used that do not really describe the situation. I see what I can best call duplicity in this budget. People are concerned about the environment. The government knows this is one of the main concerns of Canadians. It also knows it is one of our main economic opportunities to create a special area of Canadian expertise in the global marketplace. Yet we have the green plan that was going to be the government's great contribution to saving the environment and suddenly the expenditures for that program are being re–profiled. Now you can re–profile upward or you can re–profile downward. Why does the government not simply say honestly: "We are not putting the money into the green plan because we do not believe in it. It was a nice little public relation gesture but if it is going to cost us money we are not going to invest in the environment".

That is another area where our children wonder what is their future. Are they going to have clean water they can drink? Are they going to have woods they can walk in? Are they going to have air they can breathe? Are they going to have land we can grow our food on?

We have the cancellation of a whole group of agencies that have provided an important public role by monitoring, not the short-term objectives of government but what the long-term objectives for the nation should be.

The cancellation of the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council, the Law Reform Commission, the Pay Research Bureau are the destruction of institutions that make an invaluable contribution. Government members can get up as often as they want and say: "Knowledge is the key to our future. Our human resources and investing in our people are the key to our future". They then cancel and obliterate those bodies that keep us on track investing in research and development, in ensuring we are establishing a healthy economy, in ensuring that we are investing in the training that we need, in ensuring that our laws continue to protect the rights of Canadians.

If those kinds of institutions which allow us to work for the future and plan for the future are not longer there, then we really are back to decision making based on tomorrow's poll or next week's election. That is not what Canadians are counting on us for in this House.

That is not what the next generation is counting on us for. They want us investing in training. They want us investing in knowledge so that in the near future we will not have 35 per cent of our young children not even finishing high school and we will not have 15 per cent of our population illiterate and not even able to function in a modern society in normal day to day living.

Yet we have had continual cutbacks in training budgets by the government. We have had continual cutbacks in funding to education—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made earlier today I will now put the question to the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to order made earlier today a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred until 6 p.m. tomorrow.

It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ENVIRONMENT

MOTION TO ESTABLISH A NATIONAL WATER TREATMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing, in co-operation with the provinces, regional municipalities and other municipalities, a national water treatment, waste water treatment and storm sewer program to ensure a more secure and healthy environment for Canadians.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I present today, which was seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland—for which my profound thanks—was tabled on May 15, 1991. Its purpose is to develop, in co-operation with the provinces, regional municipalities and other municipalities, a national water treatment, waste water treatment and storm sewer program to ensure a more secure and healthy environment for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I have tabled the same motion in every session since 1987, because I believe the problem is a serious one and deserves our undivided attention. I read yesterday in Le Droit that the provincial premiers meeting in Toronto were asking for a similar program which they felt would bring the country out of this recession.

I am very pleased this item was also on the agenda today at the First Ministers' Conference on the Economy, and I hope the federal government will stop shirking its responsibility in this respect.

The Liberal Party has for many years recognized the urgency of dealing with the problems of municipal infrastructure. On September 22, 1988, Mr. John Turner, leader of the Liberal Party of Canada at the time and Leader of the Official Opposition, promised that the Liberal government would implement a national program to rebuild municipal infrastructure.

On January 31, 1992, our present leader, Mr. Chrétien, reconfirmed this commitment. He promised federal subsidies totalling $1 billion. Nearly two-thirds of the jobs created as a result of this decision would be in the construction and industrial sectors, while 90 per cent of the materials used in construction would be Canadian made.

Mr. Speaker, studies have shown that a federal investment of $1 billion in infrastructure, considering the additional tax revenues and the savings in unemployment insurance and welfare, would represent a net cost to Canada of only $300 million. Mr. Chrétien said at the time that the initial investment of $1 billion would take advantage of lower debt charges as a result of falling interest rates.

[English]

Everybody agrees that such an infrastructure program would be of benefit to Canada. Pat MacMahon, the director of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and Mayor of Yellowknife is reported as saying in the Toronto Star of December 18, 1991 and I quote:

> The key to kick-starting the economy is to get unemployed blue and white collar workers on a job, paying taxes and spending again. The reality is that this country's municipal infrastructure is crumbling. The money would not only finance job creation but make the municipalities more attractive to business and residents.

Doug Peters, executive vice-president and chief economist for the Toronto-Dominion Bank said, and I quote from the Toronto Star of December 18, 1991:

> It's a hell of a good idea. These kinds of programs have had a high job content and very little waste in the past.

George Saba, chief economist for Montreal Trust said in the Toronto Star of December 18, 1991 that public spending at the local level is an attractive proposal because, and I quote Mr. Saba:

> We're not spending to consume, we're spending to invest.

The Canadian Labour Congress also supported the program. It said:

> Anything that stimulates job growth and gives our domestic market some security after the ravages of free trade will help.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Rivard, president of the executive committee of the Quebec City urban community, said and I quote:

> Every day, 500,000 litres of waste water are dumped into the St. Lawrence, 51 metric tonnes of suspended waste. The total amount dumped daily is three times the volume of the Quebec City coliseum or the volume of 15,000 garbage trucks.

Mr. Speaker, this testimony was heard by the Liberal committee on infrastructure in Canada.

Does this make any sense at all, at a time when in Canada we are spending million of dollars to clean up our waterways? We are spending million of dollars to clean up rivers like the St. Lawrence, while obsolete or simply non-existent infrastructure is polluting our waterways.

In my own riding of Ottawa—Vanier, Mr. Claude Laviolette, director of public works with the city of Vanier, said that it would take $600,000 a year for five years to repair the widespread deterioration of our highway system that has taken place during the past five years. This while Vanier already invested $300,000 in 1991 and the same amount again in 1992. Like most local municipalities, the city of Vanier has already spent its total budget for snow removal this year and will have to reduce amounts that would normally have been earmarked for rehabilitation of aging infrastructure.

According to Mr. Léo Goyer, who acts as commissioner for the Department of Environmental Services in Ottawa—Carleton, the region will have to spend $285 million over the next 10 years to maintain its infrastructure and protect the environment for our water supply. It will spend almost as much—$200 million during the same period—on waste water treatment. A municipal infrastructure program would allow the region to ease the substantial tax increases taxpayers have faced in recent years. This increase has doubled the cost of water in the last 10 years. The sewer surcharge has gone from 5 per cent to 106 per cent in the past four or five years.

According to Mr. Goyer, the RMOC has lost ground on the prevention front and a tripartite federal–provincial–municipal program would help slow the deterioration.

My city, Ottawa, for its part must spend $830 million to rebuild its outdated infrastructure. For lack of federal aid, the city of Ottawa will need 20 to 35 years to rebuild its roads, sidewalks and sewers. It will take 20 years to redo an essential project for separating the storm and sanitary sewers in downtown Ottawa. These costs do not even include normal system maintenance.

• (1910)

In a letter he sent to me on October 25, 1988, then–Mayor Durrell of Ottawa wrote:

> The never–ending discussions to find who is responsible, like those to date with the federal government, only make matters worse. The federal government has already helped municipalities, so it knew about the state of urban infrastructure. However, the situation has never been as urgent as it is today.

Mr. Speaker, the municipal infrastructure program is of the utmost importance. If we want to leave a healthy environment for our children and the generations that will come after us, we must act quickly. Canada's highway system, an investment of over $100 billion, is now threatened by inadequate funding.

In Ontario, 138 of 371 sewage treatment plants do not meet provincial standards. In Newfoundland, more than 48,000 homes do not have adequate water and sewage services and 80 per cent of the population drinks improperly treated water.

In 1986, Canadians spent more than $80 million for bottled drinking water. It is unbelievable that in Canada, the richest country in drinking water, we spent $80 million to buy bottled water!

As the Liberal report on Canadian infrastructure indicates, this is hardly a surprise when we know that the residents of many Canadian regions cannot eat fish from the lakes and rivers that supply their drinking water, because that fish poses a threat to their health.

What about the beaches, right here in the capital, which are closed to bathers during the summer because of too much pollution caused by sewage? We can think of Mooney's Bay, Westboro Beach, Constance Bay, Britannia Beach and many others which are completely closed because of water pollution.

In Ottawa, there have been many cases of ground water contamination, not from septic tanks, but from municipal dumps where household and industrial rubbish are buried. During the degradation process of the rubbish, some liquids leak and eventually, through gravity, contaminate ground water. Worse still, in some cases drinking water is contaminated by highly polluting industrial rubbish such as polychlorinated biphenyls, shellac, solvents, as well as heavy metals.

The federal government is certainly aware of the problem since, as I said last week, it contributed to polluting our water by pouring toxic products in it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, pollution is not only an issue of municipal jurisdiction. It is a national issue and we have to do something about it.

In a report entitled "A Green Plan for a Green Canada", a committee composed of representatives from aboriginal organizations and groups for the protection of the environment wrote: "The federal government has had a great influence on the evolution of Canadian cities. It must continue to play a role and make those cities more pleasant by participating in the solution of problems such as air and water pollution, as well as the elimination of waste. The federal responsibility as regards the protection of Canadians' health is in itself sufficient justification for the government to be a leader and to take energic action."

The contribution of the federal government in the development of infrastructure is not something new. The main contribution of the federal government in the development of water and water treatment systems was made through the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation in 1961 and ended in 1980 with the program for community equipment such as main sewers, water supply systems, aqueducts, and all those things.

At that time I was parliamentary secretary for the urban affairs minister and I can tell you that the program was very well received. It also created jobs here in Canada and made an important contribution to municipalities by helping them meet their needs for drinking water.

In my opinion, the allegations made by the President of the Treasury Board, and even by the Deputy Prime Minister, to the effect that the federal government does not have to get involved in municipal infrastructure is false. The federal government has been involved in the past and it must again face its responsibilities.

The municipal governments alone are not responsible for water resources and roads; these are a social responsibility of all levels of government. If a municipality does not have the funds needed to set up sewage treatment plants, it will dump its waste water into our lakes and rivers, as many municipalities now do. In fact, only two thirds of Canadians are connected to sewage treatment facilities. Who suffers? Everyone, the surrounding cities, towns and villages, the provinces, the federal government that tries to clean up our rivers. Ironically, Mr. Speaker, our cities, towns and villages still allow sewage to go untreated into our rivers. We suffer and future generations will suffer as a result.

Can we continue to neglect such a precious resource as pure drinking water? The provinces, municipalities, environmentalists, economists—everyone agrees that a municipal infrastructure program is essential. Not only would it help improve the quality of life for Canadians and clean up the environment for future generations but we trust that it would give hope to the 1.4 million unemployed Canadians, according to the statistics for February 1992, and perhaps provide work as well for the 2.3 million on welfare. According to figures I obtained, in March 1991, 2.3 million people collected welfare benefits.

So, Mr. Speaker, we absolutely must have a national program to help municipalities set up water purification systems to preserve water quality. The sewage infrastructure may be invisible in many cases, but the results are not. However, in many municipalities, the infrastructure is a hundred years old and needs to be restored.

In a debate not long ago here in this House, I said that even in Ottawa, there were still wooden sewer pipes. Imagine! They won't last long, Mr. Speaker. We must act.

At a time when the environment dominates Canadians' thinking and influences their everyday action, how can we afford not to have more efficient infrastructure for a healthier environment?

As with any other environmental problem, the solution lies at the bottom of the problem. Let us therefore start at the grass roots and give cities, towns and villages adequate municipal infrastructure for a healthier, cleaner environment. Many municipalities have outdated infrastructure that does not even meet government standards. For lack of financial resources and government programs, they cannot make the required improvements.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities, a recognized leader in the movement to solve the very serious crisis that we are going through, said in 1988 that over $15 billion would have to be invested in Canada's sewers and roads. Three years later, the total is now $20 billion and will keep on growing if the problem is not solved as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, that is why it is important to act now. The motion that I present to you gives the government an opportunity to act. I therefore call on the government to follow through on this proposal and give Canada an appropriate municipal infrastructure for water and sewage treatment so that we can leave our children a healthy, beautiful, clean country.

[English]

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, this motion urges the establishment of a national waste water treatment and storm water program, purportedly to ensure a more secure and healthy environment for Canadians. It reflects the concern of many Canadians about the quality of their drinking water, the health of our rivers and lakes, and the state of disrepair of the infrastructure in some of our cities and towns. Indeed, some Canadian municipalities are now facing an $8 billion to $10 billion bill to shore up crumbling water and sewer treatment and delivery systems.

However, is a national program the answer to this dilemma? Absolutely not. I think such a program would be fiscally irresponsible. It would not encourage municipal accountability to their taxpayers. It would not reward municipalities that have practised prudent management of their infrastructure and it would not encourage conservation and careful treatment of one of our most valuable natural resources.

The jurisdiction for municipal infrastructure is quite clear. It is provincial. This is one of the most basic provincial responsibilities and one that should not be interfered with at a time when all levels of government are trying to rationalize and streamline governmental programs.

As well, any such new initiative would be totally inconsistent with the federal government's own imperative of deficit reduction. However, this does not mean that the federal government has no interest in a fiscally sound solution to the infrastructure problem. The federal government, in fact, has come up with a realistic and permanent solution in its federal water policy—realistic water pricing.

Realistic water pricing would make users conscious of the real value of the resource and delivery systems and would reduce the demand on those systems. It would encourage efficiency through improved technology and lead to water conservation. Indeed, provinces should prepare timetables and require municipalities to submit plans to bring their water and pollution control systems up to standard.

The Canadian municipal water industry is large and diversified. One indicator of its size is that the industry pumps over five billion cubic metres of water through its systems every year. What is too often forgotten is that there is a return trip for this water and a substantial and costly job of cleaning up the water through sewage treatment. This is a major industry in its own right, generating $3 billion in annual revenues. It serves municipalities of all sizes and types in every area of the country.

Since water is produced to potable standards, this industry has heavy responsibilities in the public health area. It delivers service around the clock at bargain basement prices, an average of about 60 cents per cubic metre as of 1991. Because the industry is so well run it rarely reaches the public spotlight. But believe me, there is no more important industry in the country or one that touches more Canadians' everyday lives and yet the municipal water industry is currently beset with problems. Perhaps the most serious of these involves insufficient money to repair, upgrade and expand its physical plant to assure its long-term viability.

Why should these problems have arisen? It is because the industry has catered to our every wish for water servicing, giving us all the water we want and at the prices we want. This is the key to answering why the industry has such financial difficulties.

These issues lie at the centre of the private member's motion. They deserve our careful consideration in assessing the options available to reach a solution.

First of all, let us begin with the stated policy of this government. The green plan and the federal water policy both support the user-pay principle for water servicing. The water policy states this in terms of using realistic pricing to meet the full cost of supplying water and treating the resulting waste.

The federal government has consistently declined to co-sponsor a general financing program for repairing, upgrading and expanding water systems. Instead, the federal water policy maintains that there should be much more emphasis placed on demand-side measures to improve municipal water management.

These measures include more effective pricing arrangements for water servicing, better public education, the adoption of universal metering and much more research and development of new equipment and new management methods.

I know that in my municipality in the city of North York, when we changed our water pricing from a bulk discount to a flat rate for everybody, we had enormous changes with major manufacturers where they suddenly put in recycling equipment and practised conservation. Throughout this country there are many municipalities that do not even have water meters on every home and business in their particular municipality. These are simply measures that are no longer acceptable in this day and age. So the issue of water pricing is a crucial one. It both explains why the Canadian industry is financially non-viable at the present time and offers the solution to the problem.

Municipal water services are extremely cheap in Canada today. The average residence pays under $20 per month to have water delivered through the public system and the waste removed. This is less than the monthly cost of cable television.

I ask you, which is more important? Put another way, as mentioned already, a cubic metre of water, which is the amount an average residence uses daily, costs about 60 cents. This, incidentally, includes charges for sewage treatment. For the sake of comparison, a soft drink of similar quantity costs about $800.

In earlier years the senior levels of government contributed heavily to the cost of water infrastructure. The federal government alone contributed about $2 billion between 1961 and 1978. Because of its deficit reduction program and also because of efforts at fiscal disentanglement, it stopped this program in 1980. The provinces are now faced with major commitments of their own and are coming to the same conclusion; that is, if user-pay makes sense anywhere it is in the area of municipal infrastructure.

This leads to the conclusion that such funding will have to come from local sources in the future, primarily through user-pay pricing policies.

It is the role of the federal government to encourage resource managers to manage their resources wisely, not to fund infrastructure. Let us look in more detail at the economic issues involved and how local government can handle this problem.

It is estimated that the backlog of work required for water system renovation is in the neighbourhood of $10 billion. This money is required to put Canada's water infrastructure into adequate shape to meet the requirements of the future. Major areas requiring work are the Great Lakes basin and St. Lawrence River basin, the lower Fraser basin and much of the Atlantic provinces.

We know that municipalities have annual water rate revenues totalling about $3 billion nation-wide. For Ontario alone this total is $1.3 billion. We also know that water bills, on average, are below $20 per month, less than the cost of a case of beer.

If municipalities were to double their water prices, imposing no onerous burden on users, the additional revenue raised would fall somewhere between $2 billion and $2.5 billion annually. Even if one subtracts a small loss of revenue due to the resulting conservation efforts and rationalization of water demand, the revenue raising capability of such a move would still be enormous.

A connection to the infrastructure financing problem is clear: A doubling of water rates would, in the aggregate, raise sufficient funds to self-finance within five years the requirements of water infrastructure renovation.

These are average figures. There would be variations from community to community. Since the job is so big, it would take a decade or more to carry out.

Some municipalities could start quickly, others would take years to get going, others have already done this. In any event, governments would want to phase in this renovation over the long term rather than generate a cost-exploding boom.

Many benefits would accrue from user-pay pricing for water services. Decreased demands would occur automatically and would lower over the long run the capital needs for expanding systems. Increased local expenditures on properly financed infrastructure renewal would put the country back to work. A user-pay approach would also target specific local needs and increase efficiency significantly.

The problem with general funding programs is that they may cross-subsidize richer communities at the expense of poorer ones, and large users at the expense of small and often lower income ones.

On a more general level, there is little doubt that where resource prices reflect the true costs of developing or obtaining resource supplies, societies become more efficient. For example, nations which passed along the full cost of energy price hikes in the 1970s are now the most well-off in terms of the GNP and other aggregate measures. Countries which protect the consumers from the full impact have deteriorated with respect to their international economic position. Thus, resource evaluation policies have a direct effect on economic advancement.

Exactly the same factors work with respect to water supplies. The full-cost, user-pay pricing forms one element of enhancing Canada's competitiveness.

• (1930)

It is undeniable that user-pay pricing holds the key to a renewed municipal water industry. General funding programs in effect perpetuate the economic inadequacies of the current system. We need to promote more efficient resource use and improve management methods in the industry. User-pay pricing presents a major opportunity to achieve this.

This is the federal role, and within it the federal government is encouraging water resource management agencies at the local level to institute appropriate water conservation and sustainable programs through the development and demonstration of these options.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the member for Ottawa—Vanier for his motion, it is a noteworthy one. We must be persistent in this area of municipal infrastructure. He has tackled it in a creative way by isolating water from the whole area of municipal infrastructure, which I certainly endorse.

However, I am also quite realistic. If this is ever to happen I suggest that when the federal government does come onside—and it would certainly appear from the previous member's statement that this government is not prepared to get involved in a big way, although I understand there may have been a positive announcement earlier today. I have no details of that. I believe it pertains to the highway system in this country. I would salute such an initiative.

Nevertheless, isolating the water and isolating the roadways are both positive initiatives. However, I hope that anything that will be done will be under a tripartite agreement among the three levels of government. I do not believe that any one level can afford to decide what must be done for the communities and for the infrastructure of this country.

It is absolutely imperative that we all participate because the price tag has risen from $12 billion to $15 billion and now to $20 billion and everyone is still saying: "We can't afford to do it." When will we be able to afford to do it? We could not afford to do it in good times. We cannot afford to do it in bad times. There are no other times available to us.

In the meantime the infrastructure of the country is crumbling beneath us. I will give some examples later on.

I would like to quote an individual by the name of Don Gamble. He says: "Water is to Canadians as the Alps are to the Swiss, something that transcends the resource. It is so much a part of how Canadians see themselves. We are a land of rivers and lakes. Our history is built on it". The previous speaker said: "Well, it is your water, but we sure as heck want to charge you for it".

Marjorie Lamb asks: "Will our great-grandchildren be able to drink the water we use to hose down the dog?" That is an interesting statement because I read that 100 municipalities in this country pour raw sewage into the waterways. What a damnable statistic to even quote. I am poetic today. I have been reminded of the line: "water water everywhere". However, there may not be anything to drink and that must be a concern.

This jurisdictional argument has to stop because, as the government says, there is only one taxpayer. Surely this issue demands that all three levels participate on an issue that is important to all Canadians.

The government talks about a prosperity agenda and competitiveness. If we are to become competitive and there is indeed prosperity around the corner, for which we all wish so very much, will our infrastructure be able to accommodate this new prosperity if our bridges, our roadways, our sewer systems and our water resources are not capable of handling the new economy which we hope will burgeon? Of course, we are still waiting.

How serious is it? Japan, and I do not want to follow everything that Japan does, has embarked on a municipal infrastructure renewal to the tune of a trillion dollars. It recognizes that it is going to have to address this problem now. Japan is not waiting and saying: "Well it is not our responsibility, it must be somebody else's".

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities has been lobbying and has spoken loud and clear for years and years and years on this issue.

Parties from time to time have come onside and said: "Yes, we endorse it". The Liberal Party did support municipal infrastructure until the early eighties. It did so in an ad hoc way. It would participate in individual programs but never participated in a national agenda, which is now absolutely essential. It too dropped out of that scene even on an ad hoc basis. This federal government has basically dropped out of it completely.

One of the ministers, I have forgotten who it was, said: "We don't get much of a bang for our buck. If we participate in municipal infrastructure we don't get the credit that perhaps we are deserving of for the money we put in". FCM has been extremely persistent, it tabled a report just a month ago.

I would like to add that just about everybody is for this. They are in favour of it. For heaven's sake even Matthew Barrett, the president of the Bank of Montreal, said: "Let's reduce the interest rates, let's take those hundreds of millions of dollars from that and invest it in the infrastructure". He is an unlikely individual to come forward and make a statement like that. We salute him, we salute the premiers, we salute the provincial governments and we salute the 1,200 plus municipalities across the country that are saying that we have to address this problem. It would appear that the only people that are not onside is this government.

The previous speaker talked about the deficit. We are for deficit reduction. All studies exaggerate sometimes, but we can cut it off somewhere in the middle. It says: "Tax revenues generated by this public works project would limit the effect on the accumulated national debt to a little more than $400 million over five years. At the same time, 63,000 jobs would be created for each year of the program". Money well spent.

FCM made a commitment to seven basic principles. I am sure the member for Ottawa—Vanier knows that the first principle was the need for access to clean water for all Canadians. It lists water as number one.

I have a whole series of clippings and I would like to cite a few. Paradise, Newfoundland is a town of 4,000 people, 10 minutes from St. John's. Only 20 per cent of Paradise is serviced with water and sewer: "We require about $8 million from government to provide full servicing and we received $50,000". It is the same for towns throughout Newfoundland: Pouch Cove, Portugal Cove, Bell Island, Paradise, Conception Bay South, Conception Harbour, Collier's and Marysvale. They do not have potable drinking water.

We will go from Newfoundland to the north. We will go from coast to coast. In Yellowknife: "Massive decay is not unique to old cities or to large ones. In the late 1940s in Yellowknife, the federal government installed a corrugated metal sewer system lined with moss for insulation. In the early 1980s work crews dug down to the pipes and found nothing left but a gelatinous tube of moss through which sewage still flowed".

That is another point that we should point out. Much of our infrastructure was built in the 1940s. The life of most infrastructure is 20 to 25 years. It is 50 years later and it is not being replaced. The cost of maintenance is much more costly than replacement. Studies have shown that it will cost us 10 times as much if we ignore the maintenance of our infrastructure system.

In Halifax and Dartmouth raw waste streams through clay and brick sewers straight into the harbour, as it has for 100 years. Winnipeg needs $145 million to improve preventive maintenance at its sewage facility.

My own community says: "We need $15 million a year to take care of our infrastructure. Our community invests $5 million". It cannot afford to do anything else. I think most communities are in the same position. Our major employer cannot pay its taxes.

How could a member get up and say: "It's up to the cities, increase their user-pays. Let us have user-pay for everything including water, our greatest resource". Perhaps this government wants to sell it. I wonder if it will charge them the user-pay fee it might want to charge Canadians and it is our own water. Again I salute the member for Ottawa—Vanier. I think it is a very noteworthy motion and I hope the government is listening.

• (1940)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I want congratulate my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier for his motion. It is extremely timely, especially in light of the fact that health and health issues have been identified by Canadians as priority issues.

The motion deals with the question of water and water quality but I just want to shift a little bit from that to talk about a task force which I co-chaired with my colleague from Nepean. Last year with the help of my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and other colleagues in our Liberal caucus, we travelled across Canada to meet with people who are at the municipal level and dealing with the issue up close.

I want to tell you this. When we came back, we prepared a report that clearly makes the case for federal assistance. We were in certain parts of Nova Scotia where raw sewage is being dumped directly into the ocean. As well, in some parts of Canada they have no infrastructure whatsoever. For instance in certain parts of Newfoundland, in fact in the vast majority of Newfoundland, sewage treatment plants simply do not exist at all.

From town to town, from city to city, day after day, we heard the same story from officials, that unless they get some sort of federal assistance, there is no way they will be able to rely on the local tax base to update their infrastructure. Why I say infrastructure is because we have run-off coming as a result of deficiencies in the existing systems that takes rain and whatever residues that might fall into sewage systems and takes it directly into the sewage treatment plants before it is sent back to the rivers. The messier the sewer system is, the more difficult it is for us to treat it and as the result of that there is cost involved. Unless we do quality work at that end, when it comes to water purification and water treatment, we are going to pay the cost.

I do not have to reiterate and make the case all over again for the need for federal government funds in the area of infrastructure. I think the Leader of the Opposition has made the case very well when he committed our party to put funds toward infrastructure. He has committed the Liberal Party to enter into a partnership with the provinces and the municipalities in the area of infrastructure simply because our party recognized the fact that with that kind of partnership you not only help the municipalities, you deal with the problem. At the same time you encourage economic growth, you encourage economic development and you create jobs, you generate revenues, you activate the economies and you collect more taxes. Every dollar you put in, I could assure you that probably you get another dollar at the other end in terms of revenues from different sources.

We have to look at the whole issue as an investment rather than looking at it as expenditures. There are things we have to consider as expenditures, but there are others things we have to look at as investment. Certainly putting money into infrastructure is an investment.

When my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier addresses the question of water, he is certainly recognizing full well the fact that a series of other things have to take place as well.

I want to commend him because as I indicated earlier, it is a timely motion. Being a member of this House from this region, the member recognizes the fact that there are deficiencies in our Ottawa-Carleton region. I want to list the different water facilities in our region and bring to the attention of the House the cost to maintain those facilities and bring them up to date.

For example, the Ottawa-Carleton region with a population of approximately 600,000 has a few facilities, one of which is called the Britannia Water Filtration Plant. This facility is currently under construction at a cost of $33.5 million. This facility is required in order to increase production capability from 225 million litres per day to 360 million litres per day so that the tremendous needs of the community can be met.

We have another plant, the Lemieux Island Filtration Plant, which is 50 years old. We have to retrofit this plant immediately at a cost of $37 million.

Also, at the present time the Ottawa-Carleton region is studying the water filtration plant process modifications in order to maintain state-of-the-art treated water quality. These modifications will cost the region approximately $23 million and will provide for potential deterioration of raw water quality and anticipated enhanced provincial standards.

As a result of provincial government direction to this region, water filtration plant waste water disposal will be required. That particular project will cost this region $38 million.

In order to sustain development in our region in the major growth areas of Orleans, Hazeldean, and Barrhaven, additional reservoir and pumping facilities costing approximately $40 million must be undertaken within the next few years. In a region with a population of approximately 600,000 people the need is now in excess of $172 million. That is not the total cost.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention that completion of sewage treatment facilities for this region is going to cost in excess of $400 million.

Every time work is to be done on a sewage treatment plant or on water facilities, it is necessary to go to the source of the problem and that is the sewage system itself. When you have water run-off and raw sewage, you have to separate the systems so they will be easier to deal with at the end of the day. That particular project will cost in excess of $1 billion at both the regional and municipal levels.

The reason I bring those issues to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is that day after day our municipalities are faced with tremendous pressure to provide services that otherwise should be provided by the provincial or federal government. To that extent, when we consider water purification, the need for water purification plants and the need for federal funding for water purification plants across our country, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier knows full well that water if not properly treated is going to affect the health of the nation.

Knowing full well that health is everybody's business, federally, provincially, as well as municipally, it is only fair for the federal government to recognize its role and responsibility to provide services in the area.

Having heard the eloquent presentation of my colleagues in the House of Commons, it seems there is a tremendous consensus on this issue.

• (1950)

In conclusion I would like to ask this House for its unanimous approval of the motion as presented by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and I would like to commend him on his excellent work in the area.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the motion the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has put before this House today is very well-intentioned. He wants Canadians to have access to good quality drinking water supplies. I think that no one can object to such a wish, as formulated by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

However, what I am somewhat more reluctant about, especially after the speech he made, is his approach. He wants the federal government, as heavily in debt as it is—everybody knows that Canada's national debt of Canada, the federal debt has now reached $400 billion—to take a whip and flog itself some more by increasing spending on something that is outside its jurisdiction.

I think that the Canadian people, including the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, know full well that water purification—because the motion he has put to us is indeed about water purification or water treatment—is primarily a municipal responsibility. Whether you live in Quebec, in Ontario or in any other Canadian province, with the exception of Indian reservations, this responsibility is entirely, primarily and directly incumbent upon the municipal authorities. Water purification, be it in Shawinigan, in the municipality of Saint-Georges-de-Champlain, in my riding, or in the city of Ottawa or the city of Vanier, for that matter, is a municipal responsibility.

Over and above that level of government, the provinces have responsibilities too, because municipalities are an arm of the provincial government. Take for instance a case I am familiar with, Mr. Speaker, that of Quebec. In that province, we have an organization called the Société québécoise d'assainissement des eaux which has been operating in Quebec since the 1970s. It is responsible for carrying out, in conjunction with the municipalities, cities, towns and parishes of the province, an extensive water purification program.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, come to think of it, that organization has nearly completed what it had set out to do. It was responsible for building new water treatment systems in most of Quebec's regions, and in most cases it did. For instance, in Montreal, vast water treatment systems were built by the city, in co-operation with the Quebec government.

In my region, in the electoral district of Saint-Maurice, the same procedure was followed in many cases. About 10 years ago, the town of Grand'Mère and the Société québécoise d'assainissement des eaux were involved in building one of these systems, which is now being paid for by taxpayers. Next door, Shawinigan will be doing this shortly. They have been waiting for about 10 years, but now money is available from the Government of Quebec and the municipalities of Shawinigan and Shawinigan South. It means that taxpayers in Shawinigan and Shawinigan South, thanks to up to 90 per cent funding by the Société québécoise d'assainissement des eaux, will be able to deal with local water treatment problems.

However, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier would like to have a pan-Canadian water treatment company in addition to the municipal authorities and the Société québécoise d'assainissement des eaux. Mr. Speaker, I think we already have more than enough overlap and that Canadian municipalities also have the authority to tax their residents. When they want to do construction, build an arena or repair sewer or water mains, every Canadian municipality has that authority. The Quebec government can provide assistance, and I imagine the same is true in other provinces.

So why are the Liberals again tabling a motion to get the federal government to spend even more money, a government that already has far more debt than the provinces or the municipalities? Why should we get the federal government deeper into debt and make it harder for this government to do what it already does, instead of letting the municipalities and provincial governments take care of this?

A while ago, the member for Ottawa—Vanier shocked us by saying we should be crying because in Ottawa, imagine, in Ottawa, our nation's capital there are still wooden sewer pipes. I think we could find the same in many Canadian towns. However, discovering a problem is very different from wanting to solve it.

If there are still sewer pipes made of wood in Ottawa, it does not concern the federal government in any way. Although, for this city, it is somewhat of a habit to call upon the federal government. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Ottawa is privileged compared to the average Canadian city. I know the member for Ottawa—Vanier will not be pleased when hearing this but Ottawa's infrastructure is paid in part by Canadian taxpayers, through the National Capital Commission which invests millions and millions of dollars in embellishing and improving the city. In Shawinigan, there is no national capital commission for Shawinigan to bolster the city's budget by picking the pockets of Canadian taxpayers.

That's why I think the member for Ottawa—Vanier should find another reason for us to cry about Ottawa's fate because it is the only city in Canada which can enjoy a face-lift paid for by all Canadians. In fact, I have nothing against that. Ottawa is our national capital and it is probably an essential part of the federal government's role to take on some of the capital's responsibilities. We should however stay within reasonable limits. There are citizens here in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, there are Ottawa taxpayers and they must bear their share of the burden.

If some sewer pipes burst this evening in Ottawa, the city must look into it and pay for the necessary repairs out of its own municipal budget. To use the Canadian taxpayers' money for such a purpose is next to indecent.

The member for Ottawa—Vanier brought up another very important subject; the drinking of bottled waters of all sorts in Canada. He mentioned a total of $80 million, and he is right. But you should compare that with the situation in Scandinavian countries—Sweden, Finland and Norway—where the same phenomenon exists, Mr. Speaker.

The truth is that, according to very precise studies, the quality of bottled water in Canada in no better than the quality of municipal tap water. People don't believe that, but this is what studies show. Without exception, studies done by provincial governments show that tap water in most Canadian cities is of the same quality as bottled water, and in some instances even better.

So when he says that because Canadians spend $80 million on bottled water we should commit billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to solve that problem, I say it ispsychological more than anything else.

I would go even further, Mr. Speaker. Canadian lakes have waters of excellent quality. We have people who specialize in bottling water of good quality, but despite that Canadians prefer water imported from France like Perrier or Evian. They are the two best sellers in Canada, not Monclair or any other Canadian water. Canadians, when they want to drink water, go for imported water when we have huge reserves of high quality drinking water.

In my opinion, that is a false problem that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wants to raise with us. It is probably the big habit of the Liberal Party of Canada to seek to abolish all municipal and provincial governments and to bring all powers to the federal government, as Mr. Clyde Wells would have liked at a certain point, that is a unitary state where Ottawa would take care of everything.

We must still have municipal powers, and powers mean responsibilities. Municipal governments should take their responsibilities and provincial governments should take theirs. I think that, despite the good intentions of my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, his proposal cannot be accepted in view of the circumstances since the Liberal Party of Canada would like again Ottawa to take over a problem which is not its responsibility. God knows, and on that I would agree with Him, that here in Ottawa, we have enough problems, responsibilities and jurisdictions, particularly on the national unity issue. We should deal most of all with federal problems and let provinces and municipalities solve theirs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is one minute left.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I laud the member opposite for bringing his concern forward. I also had the opportunity in committee to hear his proposal. I am not going to have the opportunity to speak to it at great length, but of course municipal infrastructure is very important to our country.

I also laud the House of Commons and the government. In many ways they are looking at conservation and the environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

DRYDEN AIR CRASH

FINAL REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the final report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario crash at Dryden, Ontario, and the Minister of Transport's initial response to the recommendations of this final report.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Pursuant to section 61 of the Canadian Human Rights Act and Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour on behalf of the Minister of Justice to table the annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission for the year 1991.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of railway employees from western Canada. They point out that railway employees who are suspended for accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules are currently being unjustly penalized under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

They are asking Parliament to take immediate steps to indicate specifically that accidental violation of the Canadian rail operating rules does not constitute employee misconduct under sections 28 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and are asking us to take immediate steps to rectify this very serious situation.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Madam Speaker, the petitioners are from British Columbia and simply indicate their opposition to any plan to divert a fresh water river from Canada into the United States and northern Mexico as presently being planned on the North Thompson River.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): It is my honour and duty to present a petition from a number of residents of Quebec, from the City of Quebec, Sillery, Gatineau, St-Jean-Chrysostôme, and also from Ottawa, who are concerned for the families of people who have come to Canada and have been declared to be refugees. Their concern is because of the damage done in the separation of the families for several years.

Therefore, they ask Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation, and to allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

FOREIGN DOMESTIC WORKERS PROGRAM

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I also have another petition from residents of West Lorne, Ottawa, Chatham, Quebec City, Val Thérèse, Nepean, Thornhill, North Bay, Belleville and from Grand Falls, Newfoundland. These petitioners are concerned for the status of foreign domestic workers under the government's program.

They call on Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to give foreign domestic workers the option not to live in the homes of their employers outside working hours, that work experience should take precedence over any formal training, that domestic work be recognized as an occupation needed in Canada, and that the necessary points be awarded toward permanent resident status.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North) moved:

That this House express its concern at the threat to Canada's health care system expressed by the stated intention of the Liberal premiers of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland to forgo universality and embrace user and deterrent fees for health services.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, in a process which is often used now on opposition days, I want to announce to you that the first speaking time for the New Democratic Party will be shared between the members for Surrey North and for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

They will each have a 10-minute presentation followed by a five-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I rise to lead off the debate on this motion.

Canada has a reputation world-wide for one of the best health care systems, not only because of the quality of health care, but also the fact that it covers all of our citizens regardless of their financial means.

However, Canada's health care system is under a tremendous amount of pressure and is in grave difficulty because it is being attacked from a number of sources.

First of all, we do have a serious problem in the very quick escalation of costs. Health care costs are rising because of a number of factors.

New technologies particularly built into institutions are very, very expensive. Many of these new technologies have not been proven, but we still embrace them because we want to make sure that we keep up with the latest in technology.

There has been far too heavy an emphasis on acute care hospitals simply because of the way our health care system was developed. We are beginning to realize that providing more hospital beds and putting more people in hospitals is not the way to improve health.

Drug prices are escalating dramatically. The highest and most rapid increase in all our health care in the last number of years has been through an increase in drug prices. This has continued and has been made more difficult because of the government's stand with Bill C-22 and the extending of patents to multinational drug companies. It has increased our drug costs 30 per cent.

It is not accidental that the person who is the spokesperson for the multinational drug companies is Judy Erola, the former Liberal consumer affairs minister. There is the person who was responsible for protecting consumers in this country, and now she is the person who is the front for the multinational drug companies. It is like the shepherd becoming the front for the wolves.

We have pressures because of increased costs around physicians services. There is a growing recognition in this country that we have trained too many doctors and that the doctors are poorly distributed.

Therefore, we have on the one hand pressures because of escalating costs. On the other hand, we have the federal government reneging on its responsibilities to share with the provinces the cost of health care.

This government and the previous Liberal government have systematically off-loaded on to the provinces. By the turn of the century, $64 billion will have been cut from health care and health care transfer payments to the provinces by the federal government.

These cuts started in 1977 when the Liberals abandoned the concept of 50/50 cost sharing and forced the provinces to block funding. Even after block funding was put in place, it is the Liberals who started the off-loading with their six and five program and with the revenue guarantee withdrawal.

The western provinces this year will be losing $2.4 billion in transfer payments from the federal government. Out of that, $738 million or one-third will be as a direct result of the cumulative effect of the Liberal cutbacks in the early 1980s.

In the province of Ontario the operating deficit this year will be $5.4 billion. It would have been only $1.8 billion if it had not been for the offloading of the federal government. The province of British Columbia has a deficit of approximately $1.7 billion in this current year, of which $1.1 billion is the direct result of the offloading by the federal government. This year alone, all of the provinces will lose close to $9 billion. The money the British Columbia government will lose over the next period of time amounts to $6.8 billion, of which $2.6 billion is the direct result of the cuts initiated by the Liberals in the early 1980s.

It is all very nice for the Liberals to stand up and condemn the present government, as they well should, for its decision to abandon its responsibility in shared programs with the provinces, but it is hypocritical when one looks at the fact that one-third of all of the cutbacks are the responsibility of previous Liberal administrations. They are not the responsibility of this current government. It simply learned from the Liberals and now do it with more oomph.

What we have in Canada is two way pressure on our health system; escalating costs and reduction of funding from the federal government.

There is no question that we have to undertake restructuring in our health care system to provide more community based services and to provide more preventable programs. We must do so within principles that are accepted by the Canadian public, principles of universality, accessibility, public administration and the fact that there will not be user or deterrent fees.

What we have seen over the last several months is Liberal administrations, Liberal premiers, one after another, advocating the introduction of user and deterrent fees.

Clyde Wells has stated: "We may have to look at the whole principle of universality in our social programs and look at the extent we might have to limit universality". Frank McKenna again has called for the introduction of user fees and expresses the point that he does not see why we should not be able to introduce "some modest deductibility", as he said, which is a euphemism for user fees.

We have both Mr. Côté and Mr. Remillard of the province of Quebec calling for the introduction of user fees and for the federal government to change the health act to allow it. We have them introducing legislation to allow user fees in acute care hospitals. The only other major politicians advocating user fees are Preston Manning and the Reform Party. They clearly are on the same wave length as the Liberals premiers. Preston Manning has said very clearly that he does not think we can pay 100 per cent of the bills for 100 per cent of the people. That is going to result in a two-tiered health care system, and will mean that the affordability of health care is going to be taken away from the poor.

I would like to close by contrasting what the Liberal premiers have been proposing with the stand taken by New Democratic administrations. I would like to quote the statement of finance minister Glenn Clark of the province of British Columbia, speaking on behalf of all NDP administrations in this country. He said:

> All three NDP administrations will be leading the attack on the federal government if Ottawa tries to water down the Canada Health Act to allow those other provinces to impose user fees. At a time when our health care system is in crisis, we cannot abandon our principles.

This House must reconfirm our commitment to the principles of medicare, to universality, to accessibility, to the prohibition of user fees and deterrent fees. We must reject clearly the solutions being proposed by Liberal premiers.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, let me begin by giving a warning to the Canadian public. Anybody who thought that this was going to be about Canada's health care system, forget it. This is going to be a debate about political advantage. This is going to be another instance in the House of Commons where the New Democratic Party is going to show its holier than thou attitude. "We sit on the sidelines and criticize".

It was not the socialists of Canada that created the health care system. It was the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker who introduced hospital care. It was successive Liberal governments that fostered the health care system and I give them credit for that. We have reached a stage where we cannot carry on with the current hospital and health care system.

The abuse within the health care system has created a situation where we cannot afford to progress. The reason is there are no caps. There are no caps internally, there are no caps externally; the health care system is running itself. As responsible government, as responsible persons, we have to step in and ensure that we can fund the health care system.

We will hear the members of the New Democratic Party describe the level of service in Canada. Health services have declined in Canada for the last five years. Anybody will attest to that fact. There are line-ups in hospital emergency sections, it is difficult to book surgery and so on. So we have to do something. For anybody to stand and say that we must continue the attitudes, the concepts and the principles on which our health care system is based is nuts.

Let me talk about universality. How can we continue the concept of universality? It was a concept designed to avoid things like means testing systems and so on. Now it is starting to destroy the system because universality, the principle which the New Democratic Party mentioned, is affecting accessibility. We cannot have them both unless we are willing to unleash millions and billions of public and taxpayers' dollars. Responsibility dictates that we cannot do that. Let us hear the New Democratic Party come up with some real solutions to the problems.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, one of the things that is very obvious is that the Tories have completely abandoned the Prime Minister when he said that universal social programs were a sacred trust.

The member stands up now and says that the Tory party no longer believes in universality. Universality must be protected because it ensures that the weakest are eligible for service. We cannot maintain the principles and develop alternatives within our health care system to allow for the continuation. The minister of health—and I must say he has been steadfast on this, under great pressure from even his own province—had the foresight to say that there will be no user fees. We will not allow those Liberal administrations to introduce user fees. Although the minister talks a good principle, unfortunately he is part of a government that is cutting back on resources of the provinces to be able to meet those principles and to be able to meet those standards.

• (1030)

I want to talk a bit about Established Programs Financing. The government always tries to pretend that it controls it because of the escalating costs. The transfer payments to the provinces under Established Programs Financing had nothing to do with the costs. They were based on the growth in the gross national productivity of this country. In other words as the wealth of the country increased the transfer payments increased. That is the only way they increased except with the addition of population.

This government has said that in spite of the fact we have an increase in our growth of productivity, increase in our ability to pay, ability being based on the increase in the economy, we are going to slash our transfer payments arbitrarily and cut back on the formula for transfer payments.

That is what has happened. It is not that there has been a slowdown up until the last year or two in the economy as much as the fact that this government has simply said that it is not going to meet its responsibilities for a cost shared program. It is going to break its responsibilities for a joint partnership with the provinces.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The five-minute period for questions and comments has already expired. We now begin the second ten-minute period of debate. I therefore give the floor to the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

[English]

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know the 20-minute period has been cut down to 10, but I understood that after each speaker there would be a 5-minute question and answer period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It was held. There was a question from the hon. member for Halifax West and there was an answer. As both the question and answer were long, the five minutes have expired.

Mr. Flis: I apologize, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, it is important that Canadians know where the various political parties across this country stand on health care. It is important because Canadians rightly view their health care system as an indicator of how society is organized and how it reflects our concern for those who are less well off.

What we have done in Canada, to Canada's credit and in fact with the participation of all the political parties, is institute a health care system which is the pride of Canada and the envy of the world. We have managed to develop a health care system which ensures that nobody fears for their home, for their security, or for their family in the event that they get sick. It provides for a system in which they are provided with health care services to the extent that they need them when that need arises.

That is an important indicator of how Canada and Canadians feel about addressing issues and concerns of people who are in adversity.

It is also important that all political parties stand and be accounted for with regard to their view on health care. We have seen over the last few years cuts by the Progressive Conservative government into the support services, the financial support to the provinces to maintain their health care systems. In doing so, the present government built upon cuts which were instituted by the Liberal governments before it.

At the federal level we have seen both Conservative and Liberal governments cutting financial assistance to our health care system, in a sense pushing the costs of health care further to the provinces and in the end building pressure as we have seen for user fees and deterrent fees for Canadians themselves to be forced to pay some of the costs.

It is important at this time in our history to know that Liberal premiers of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland have been arguing for, pushing for, and asking for the right to institute user fees and deterrent fees. At a time when Canadians are buffeted by a recession, by increasingly high unemployment rates, and by tough, tough times, these Liberal premiers are pushing a further burden and a further worry on to Canadians citizens by telling them that they want to institute user fees for health care, that they want to institute deterrent fees for health care.

We all know—and the studies show it clearly—that the institution of user fees in the health care system would, as Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, the well-known Canadian expert on health care indicated, simply deter the poor and have no effect on the demands of those in the middle and high income categories.

In other words, if we institute user fees it is a direct attack on those in Canada who are less able to support themselves and less able to access the services that they need.

Pushing for user fees is a direct attack on the rights of those Canadians who are less able to fund the services they need in times of health problems.

In Canada we essentially have a conspiracy against our health care system in which we have the Reform Party, the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party ganging up on health care and ganging up on the right of Canadian citizens to access health care free of charge, paid for through the tax system but free to them at the time at which they access those services, free to them at the time when they most need it, and free to them at the time when they are most desperate.

At the beginning of this month we had Preston Manning of the Reform Party arguing that we should do away with the universal aspects of medicare. He said that we should charge people for hospital services and institute user fees.

We have, then, the Reform Party arguing for user fees. We have resolutions passed at Conservative Party conventions arguing for the institution of user fees. We have the former minister of health, the member for Provencher, arguing for user fees in discussions in Manitoba. We have important elements of the government arguing for an end to universality and institution of user fees. We heard just a minute ago from the member for Halifax

West indeed pursuing that argument, arguing for the end to universality.

As I have mentioned, we have heard clear statements from the premier of Quebec, from the minister of health in Quebec and from the minister of finance in Quebec that it is time Quebec be permitted to institute user fees. What the Quebec government should be doing clearly is protecting Quebec citizens from financial ruin in the event of the need to access health care. It should not be loading a further financial burden on them when they become sick.

When Dr. Augustin Roy, head of the Quebec Corporation of Physicians, was faced with the suggestion that the Quebec government wanted to institute user fees, he said that it would be the end of the Canadian dream of free universal and accessible health care. "It is only a matter of time", he said, "before a two-tier system emerges: one for the rich and one for the poor".

That is what this issue is about. It is a question of whether or not Canadian political parties are standing up for a health care system which is the same for everyone, or whether we are looking for one which is privileged for the rich and less accessible and more expensive for the poor.

The Liberal premiers of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland have clearly chosen that we should go toward a system which is two-tiered: one for the rich and one for the poor. We in the New Democratic Party and Canadians as a whole refute that suggestion complete, entirely and without any question.

This is not an issue which is debatable to Canadians. Canadians are proud of their health care system. It serves them well. It is unbecoming for the Liberal Party to attack medicare, to attack the very health care system which has served Canada so well. It is also unbecoming for the Reform Party to attack medicare and pretend that it does not want to undermine universality, when quite clearly it does and when quite clearly the leader of the Reform Party has made it plain on a number of occasions that that is his and his party's wish.

We have significant elements of the Conservative caucus and the Conservative Party, both at conventions and in caucus meetings, for example the Alberta caucus of the Conservative Party, arguing for user fees. We have important parts of the government side arguing for the institution of user fees too. What we have here is a gang-up of parties which represent the rich and the elite in Canada. The Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the Reform Party are ganging up on our health care system, which is something that Canadians quite clearly do not want.

As all Canadians know, at the time of Tommy Douglas and the CCF in Saskatchewan in 1962, the New Democratic Party instituted the health care system in Saskatchewan, ran it without any financial support from the federal government, and argued and pushed for it right through the federal system so that in the end it was introduced by the Lester Pearson government.

The New Democratic Party, the CCF, has been committed to health care from the beginning, remains committed to health care, and will continue to be committed to health care. It is unfortunate that neither the Liberal Party nor the Conservative Party can maintain that commitment.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I hope you saw the halo around the head of the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing when he was speaking. Unfortunately the NDP has never learned how to put motions on the Order Paper.

We could have had an excellent debate today had the New Democrats learned how to table a motion. They make an important issue like Canada's health care a partisan issue. Here they are attacking three Liberal premiers and immediately it turns into a partisan debate, not a debate around our health care system.

I would like to ask the hon. member why the NDP motion did not include the fact that the premiers of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Ontario, the NDP premiers of those three provinces, are closing health centres, are closing beds, and are laying off health care personnel, with nurses going to the United States. Three NDP premiers have already broken the universality. Why was that not included in the NDP motion?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, the member raises an important issue. He asks us why we would want to make this a partisan issue.

It is quite clear that there is one party only which speaks for health care in this country, one party that speaks for the interests of Canadians in health care. In my province of Saskatchewan, for example, it is the case that some hospitals are going to be closed. The population is changing and it is necessary to reassess how we deliver those services. But it is not necessary to reassess whether or not we are opposed to user fees, whether or not we are opposed to deterrent fees. Canadians are opposed to them. Liberal premiers should be opposed to them. The Liberal Party should be opposed to them. Members on the government side should be opposed to them but they are not; they are arguing for user fees.

The member may be upset that this becomes somewhat a partisan issue, but it is clear the New Democratic premiers and the New Democratic Party federally are supportive of a universal, accessible health care system. We will never accept user fees and deterrent fees, unlike the premiers of Quebec, Newfoundland and New Brunswick.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am used to being surprised by the NDP, but my surprise today is something different. I understand that it is always defending what is best for everybody.

However, if the NDP wants a political debate, that is fine. Canadians have a lot of questions about their health care system. Many times I said with regard to user fees and the great principles of the system that we stand on those principles. I said that last week and again yesterday. I stated publicly in terms of user fees that I was opposed and that so far I believe there is no contradiction.

What surprises me is today they are coming with something where they are concerned about the provinces. I am wondering why they do not go to Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland and ask the legislatures to pass something they want. Instead, they raise the question in the House.

My own perception is there is a vast and strong majority of members of Parliament who agree with that. If they want a political debate, that is fine. I believe that it is typical of the NDP, create a problem when we know that the problem is not there. They want to be the defenders of the system. We already are. They created it and we continue it.

I do not understand. I would like to emphasize again that if they want to make a political debate, that is fine, but this is not the place when it concerns the provinces. I stand on what I said, but they will not prevent Canadians asking questions about their system. They are worried.

We saw the premiers yesterday. Even NDP premiers, I can say, maybe not officially, are worried about that. When we have a $13 billion deficit, we worry about a lot of things in the system.

I say that if Canadians ask questions about the system, that is fine, but why do my friends raise that question here today when the question is not relevant to the kind of statement I made? I believe this has been the government stand since the beginning.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, first of all perhaps I could thank the minister for his statements opposed to user fees, consistently arguing against user fees under some pressure, I am sure, from his own colleagues and from his own province. I think it is important that the health minister for Canada argues strongly for the Canada Health Act and the provisions of that health act. This motion, as the minister will know, is not criticizing the minister's position on this question.

I think it is important for Canadians to know where the political parties in this country stand on health care. It is one of the issues that they will be addressing when they go to the polls at the next election. It is important that they know that Liberal premiers across this country are saying we should have user fees when Canadians do not want them, that there are significant segments within the Conservative Party arguing for user fees when Canadians do not want them and that the Reform Party is arguing for user fees too.

Each of those parties is undermining the universality and the accessibility of our health care system. It is important that Canadians understand that. It is important that Canadians know that the New Democratic Party stands for a universally accessible program and will not ever give into user fees or deterrent fees.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise and speak to this debate. Certainly, I have spoken on this issue a number of times. I would like to now bring to this Chamber my thoughts.

On March 19, 1991, barely a year and a week ago today, I stood here on behalf of the Liberal caucus asking that this House reaffirm its commitment to medicare. My request was quite simple: "That this House, with all its members, reaffirm its commitment to medicare", which underlines the Liberal commitment to universal medicare. The government, led by the then former minister of health, voted the motion down.

How about the NDP? My hon. friend from Surrey North who brought forward the motion today turned to the then health minister during debate and said: "I must say that for once I agree with the minister. There is no question that this motion", referring to my motion, "is being put forward facetiously by the Liberals in the hope that the government will vote against it". In truth, I never brought forward a motion of dubious intent. I ask if the member for Surrey North can make the same claim today.

I note that this motion put before us asks:

> That this House express its concern at the threat to Canada's health care system expressed by the stated intention of the Liberal premiers of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland to forgo universality and embrace user and deterrent fees.

This is one of the most ill placed, illogical, underhanded attacks on the Liberal Party that I have ever seen, but I will not dwell on that, nor on the ethics of the member from Surrey North who introduced this motion.

I will speak to the real problems of the health care system: the cuts, the limits in transfer payments, particularly cash transfer payments by the federal Conservative government and the need for solutions.

Every province in this country is fighting to provide adequate health care. Last night's national news carried the stories on the efforts of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick to reform their health care systems, but even reforms come at a cost.

New Brunswick will close 300 to 400 hospital beds and turn three hospitals into out patient health centres; 250 health care professionals will lose their jobs. Hospital boards will be dissolved.

These reforms are a bitter pill to swallow for this province which was left a legacy of user fees and health care troubles by the Conservative government before it. During the New Brunswick throne speech last month, New Brunswick committed itself to severe restructuring, but it was not without bitterness toward the federal government. Health Minister Russell King said he told the federal health minister that his province and others are having a hard time keeping up with health costs when Ottawa continues to cut back on transfer payments.

Nonetheless, New Brunswick bit the bullet. Its premier and health minister are trying very hard to manage costs without jeopardizing national standards. Can we not give them credit for this instead of calling the minister a threat to universality? I say what absolute rubbish on the part of the New Democratic Party. What absolute hypocrisy, Madam Speaker.

I have closely watched the movements of the government and health department of British Columbia whose royal commission on health care has suggested innovative ways to cut costs and increase efficiency. Last night I saw examples of community-based health care at its finest in a special project in Victoria that aims to help seniors in their homes instead of bringing them into hospitals. I hope it will prove successful and be adopted in all regions of the country.

May I draw members' attention to the fact that all provinces, even so-called wealthy provinces like British Columbia and Ontario, run by New Democratic governments, have had to cut jobs and close beds because of cuts and limits in federal transfer payments. Regardless of political stripe, I applaud any effort by provinces to make health care reforms by trying not to sacrifice service and care. I think efforts like these deserve the approval and respect of this Parliament.

In Saskatchewan, run by a NDP government, hospitals are preparing for a $113 million cut in grants from the provincial government. Again, this is a bitter pill to swallow, but Saskatchewan cannot afford other options. Across the country, Ontario, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Quebec, all provinces have been forced to cut and cut and cut again, but none of the provinces have compromised the Canada Health Act, and I am glad.

I admit I am concerned about the possibility of a $5 emergency room user fee in Quebec. I have made myself clear on this issue on several occasions in and out of this Chamber but thankfully health minister Marc-Yvan Côté of Quebec seems to be rethinking that controversial move. On Monday he announced that the fee would not be implemented.

I hope that 12 months from now our situation in Canada will be changed and no user fees will be introduced in this country.

This motion by the NDP has criticized, among others, Quebec, accusing it of intending to impose user fees. Is this criticism fair? I too will be concerned if the Quebec government proceeds with the application of user fees. But I did not pass judgment. The government of Quebec, in its 1989 report labelled, Improving Health and Well-being in Quebec—Orientations states and I quote: "Some of the advantages generally attributed to deterrent charges are mostly theoretical and this formula has major drawbacks that outweigh its advantages".

The report concludes and I quote: "Therefore, recourse to deterrent charges cannot be an acceptable source of financing and the department favours turning to alternate sources of revenue".

If only the New Democratic Party health critic had done his homework, had read this report, he would not be so quick to prejudge and impute ill intention to the Quebec government. This type of political cheap shot certainly detracts from national unity and does not serve to unite us to find solutions to our health care crisis in the country.

This brings me to the second part of my debate, changing our situation. With skyrocketing medical costs, reform of the system is inevitable. But it is reform through the size of a gun, a gun held by the federal government that we must question, through Bill C-69 and Bill C-20 which limit increases in transfer payments and provide penalties to provinces. The provinces have suffered unbearably.

In my own province of Manitoba, the hospital where I used to work, the Health Sciences Centre, has been forced to close over 120 beds and lay off 500 hospital staff. Health Minister Donald Orchard said he had no choice. That is a Tory health Minister in the province of Manitoba. He has been steadily reworking the health care system for the past year and a half.

Meanwhile in Newfoundland, Premier Clyde Wells points to blatant unfairness in the federal position. His province does not have the tax base to recoup lost cost transfer payments. His health care system has been slashed to the bone. Last year alone 438 acute care beds were eliminated and some 300 hospital nurses lost their jobs.

Waiting lines are longer. Hospitals have cut back services. In one case a pregnant woman in Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, had to travel to a full service hospital and spend a week in a hotel room at her own expense waiting for her labour to begin. Her own community hospital could not provide care for her due to budget cuts.

In Ontario, 35 nurses from the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario lost their jobs because the hospital said it could not pay their salaries. Ontario, with a rich tax base, is suffering from a double whammy of federal cuts and recessionary woes. Like Newfoundland, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and the rest of the provinces, drastic changes have become the order of the day.

Financial troubles sit like spectres beside every hospital bed in Canada, but our country is not alone in its struggle to service its citizens. There is trouble all over the world. Anyone with an eye on the American and British election campaigns will notice health is a hot topic. Health insurance and two-tiered systems have come up in speeches and advertising campaigns. For the United States, the push is for a national health care system. For Britain, the Labour Party is claiming the Conservatives have drifted too far from universal health care rules.

• (1100)

There is no question that health care is held dear not only by Canadians but also by people the world over. Healers from time immemorial have retained a special place in our social value system. They helped others realize good health. Anything that stands in the way of accessing proper care and medical guidance also stands in the way of good health. User fees are such a thing.

Our party brought medicare to Canadians as a concept in 1919 and delivered the Canada Health Act in 1984. My party and I do not believe in user fees. At our national convention last month we voted for universality. The New Democratic Party, with its selective memory, completely forgot about that.

It was not my party that called for user fees at the national convention. It was not my party executive who wrote to the finance minister asking that user fees or user pay become policy for the government. In fact, I am very proud that during a recent trip to Washington the leader of the Liberal Party defended medicare while others remained silent. Even the NDPers were silent. Did they come and join our forces? It was the Liberal leader who stood before all Americans and said that the Canadian health care system is the best.

What a hypocrisy on the part of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Where are they?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Nowhere to be found. If you do not believe that I, as Liberal health critic, have defended the Canada Health Act with every ounce of my strength then you must have been asleep for the past four years. Inside this House and beyond I have never ceased to protect our right of citizenship to our health care system.

I have articles here from The Montreal Gazette, the North Times in my constituency of Winnipeg North, The Ottawa Citizen, the Winnipeg Free Press, The Globe and Mail, The Medical Post and Saint John's The Telegraph–Journal all telling the country just how I feel on this issue. I will not belabour the point and quote them at this time. Anyone, particularly the member for Surrey North who brought this very unsavoury motion, can call my office and I will urgently deliver all these clippings.

Without question I believe and so do my colleagues, that user fees will block access to medical treatment for the poor. The need for user fees is unfounded and their collection calls for additional bureaucracy. Fees also tie up the time of doctors, nurses and administrators. They deter patients from seeking medical care, often delaying diagnosis until the illness is much more complicated to treat. I must emphasize that this has been proven over the past two decades by study after study after study that has been done both in and outside Canada.

I know the member for Surrey North will ride his old hobby–horse that it was the Liberals who first changed the method of cash transfers to the provinces followed by the Conservatives five times in eight years. But let me point out to the member that the Liberal Party is indeed a very dynamic party. We listen to the times and we propose initiatives. We commit ourselves and re–commit ourselves to the Liberal principle of universal medicare for all.

It is a party that has done the right thing at the right time for the right reasons, but would never have wreaked havoc upon the system with the same Tory pattern. I tell the member for Surrey North that one cannot get away with making that comparison.

Yale University political policy professor, Ted Marmor, was recently interviewed by journalist Frances Russell. He explained his surprise by the way the business community believes and our government is fighting the deficit, declining productivity and stagnation by cutting and privatizing the health care system.

He says: "The truth is opposite. Canada has managed to arrange broad health insurance coverage to its entire population, to deliver in general quite decent care, and to pay about 25 per cent less of its gross national product".

As well he pointed out that Canada holds down over–all costs without the gaps, ills, and despair prevalent in the American medical system.

Now I ask the hon. member for Surrey North whether it is not time to realize the Liberals are not the threat to medicare. We are not the enemy; we are the defenders. We want the federal government to reconfirm financial support. That should be our common goal, not wasting our time on facetious motions such as this one.

Everyone in this chamber knows the federal Conservatives are not prepared to back down from their stand on transfer payments. No amount of pressure from us or the provinces can make them see the damage they are inflicting on the provinces.

So our path is clear. We must bring down this government. Let us turn our attention and energy to this task, a task which may end in the resurrection and preservation of our medicare system.

In conclusion I move, seconded by the member for Eglinton—Lawrence:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the period and by adding the following:
> and implemented by the actions of the NDP premiers of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia to close health care centres, dismiss health care personnel and reduce health care services, all of which is a direct and inevitable result of the withdrawal of the federal government from its long-standing obligations to support health care in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will reserve on this and come back to the House on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague from Winnipeg North with regard to the health care system. I do share some of his concerns and would like to ask him a question.

First, I want to reiterate that the minister of health and welfare has stood behind the Canada Health Act, has stood behind the five pillars, and his party certainly supports what is contained within the Canada Health Act.

It is very interesting that over the last few years there have been seven or eight—I know of seven—national studies done with regard to the health care system in Canada. All of these studies have said that it is not more money that is needed; it is indeed that we have to become more effective and more efficient.

This appears to be one area where, I believe it was Victoria took a lead with regard to a community hospital in servicing the constituents in the Victoria area outside the hospital and indeed lowering the costs. As more and more of us not only in this House but also all across the country get older it is going to increase some of the costs. Leaving that aside, we have to become more efficient and more effective.

I wonder if the hon. member has had any discussions with the health care minister in his province or with any other ministers across the country.

The minister of health and welfare has met three times in the last nine months that I know of, and perhaps more, discussing the national health care act and the effects of it on Canadians and the need for improvement. He has also made a commitment to meet with the health ministers and the finance ministers of the provinces within the next two months to discuss this particular issue.

• (1110)

Let us take a look at the ways to improve the efficiency and to improve the delivery. Let us get rid of the, if I may be so bold as to use the word misuses—I did not say abuses—within the system whether they be on the public's part, the institution's part, the medical profession's part, or the consumer's part. Let us be more interested and let us see how we can take the good system we have and improve it.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to respond to those comments and questions.

First I would like to say that indeed we have been monitoring the health care system in the country. We have been in contact with the provinces. At the proper time we will let you know the results of those consultations.

In so far as the comment made by the hon. member about the misuse in the system is concerned, I have a document here. It is a study released in April 1991 by the National Health and Welfare Department of this government looking at the effectiveness of user fees.

It is clear that the cases of misuse and abuse that have happened in the system are few and far between and that is not the major problem confronting the system. We should lay to rest this myth. There has not been any abuse that could be documented to a great extent on the part of the providers of health care, doctors, nurses, and others, as well as on the part of the Canadian public, the consumers of health care.

We should respect and we should recognize the commitment of these people to deliver service and the responsibility and respect that Canadians have for the health care system. When Canadians go to see a doctor, when they go to visit a hospital, it is truly because patients need to be assured that they are healthy.

There is no doubt that the limits in transfer payments, the cuts in transfer payments, are causing problems. If there is a problem in a system akin to a patient with illness, one does not kill the patient first and then start to revive the patient in an attempt to cure the patient later.

If, as has been predicted by health economists, the federal Tory government in trying to cure the ills of the health care system first continues to withdraw, as has been predicted by health care economists, its contributions and obligations to cost share health care in this country to a substantial extent, we may not have a system to reform at the end.

I submit and I challenge the government, as we reform the system, to continue to provide the adequate and necessary financial resources the provinces at this time badly need.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, of course I was pleased to second the amendment to the motion of my hon. colleague for Winnipeg North.

As will have been noticed over the course of this last hour, it was thanks to his intervention that we introduced an element of sanity and intelligence in the discussion. The Liberal caucus does take this debate seriously even though we were finally graced a few moments ago with a lone representative from the New Democratic Party that submitted the original motion.

We care about the issue. We have dealt with it on a continuous basis. I want to compliment the member for having laid out all of the principles of the issue itself.

There is a concern that I have in representing constituents from my riding in the Toronto area. In Ontario and specifically in Toronto an erosion of the health care system is seen. The erosion has been witnessed rather unfortunately by many of my constituents and many other citizens of both Toronto and Ontario generally in the last couple of years as the current government cuts back on the amount of expenditures and amount of commitment both in principle and in finances that it puts at the disposal of our health care system.

Perhaps part of that reason is that we are in a deep recession. I am being very kind, because statistics indicate that we are in a depression.

Economically speaking, and from a revenue side, from taxes, the population of the province of Ontario contributes annually approximately 45.7 per cent of all revenues that are drawn by this government.

Over the course of the last couple of years, because of the enormous negative impact of the recession on the economy of Ontario, we have seen a drop in manufacturing output by 13 per cent. We have seen a decrease of 23 per cent in employment in the manufacturing sector.

I do not want to talk about the other sectors just yet, but the net effect of all of that is that there has been less in terms of revenue available and there have been greater demands on the system.

How did the Government of Ontario respond? You will forgive me, I hope, for making this comment. I ask the indulgence of my colleague who has moved this amendment because I do not want to engage in a blatantly partisan debate. The fact of the matter is that what has happened is that the Government of Ontario, an NDP government, went from a surplus situation in the budget to increasing the deficit portion of its budget to $9 billion.

One would have thought, as a citizen of that great province, as a contributor in taxation to those provincial revenues, that the $9 billion would have been utilized in order to enhance the kind of systems that we in this House have established for all Canadians.

Medicare is one of those pillars of social stability. It is $9 billion from 1990 until this year. It is supposed to go up to about $11 billion. As a taxpaying constituent of that province, I look upon that government, that NDP government, that guardian, that saviour of medical social programs, and I ask, what did you do with my money?

My colleagues from the NDP in this House stand, bold faced with the hypocrisy that is unmitigated, and say to me as a constituent of the province of Ontario that the medicare program is being threatened by Liberal premiers in other provinces in Canada, knowing that in Ontario we contribute 45.7 per cent to general revenues in all of Canada, that we do have a base and we have a government in Ontario that is supposed to be the guardian of all those programs.

How can those members stand here before this House and insult the intelligence of all members by being absent when my colleague lays out all of the issues of the medicare program, or worse, impose upon this House a decision to debate—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in this debate.

Let me say, in case there is the slightest bit of confusion anywhere, that this debate today is not about medicare. There is a need for a debate about medicare. There is a need for a serious, constructive and genuine debate about the future of health care delivery services in Canada. This debate today, initiated by the New Democratic Party on a so-called urgent basis, is not about medicare.

Seldom have I seen this. Let me make myself clear. In all parties we are all guilty, we should be honest enough to admit, on occasion of seeking partisan advantage, seeking to establish the ideas and policies of our opponents in less than a healthy light, seeking to propose that the policies and proposals of our own party be seen in the best possible light. That is part of the competitive political process. That is normal. That is healthy. That is what the British parliamentary adversarial system is all about. We are all guilty to a degree in political life or in any competitive venture, whatever it happens to be, of manoeuvring to the best advantage.

Even in an adversarial political environment, seldom, if ever, has Parliament seen such a hypocritical, self-serving, fundamentally dishonest motion as the motion put before the floor of this Parliament today. It is absolutely incredible. I pick up my news clipping service first thing in the morning, with my cup of coffee and my muffin which I should not have because my waste is expanding much quicker than my brain ever could as a consequence of reading this paper.

I pick up the paper and I read a big banner headline: "Saskatchewan cuts social spending". I quote the minister of finance for the NDP in Saskatchewan: "We are going to have to cut several hundred millions of dollars. We are going to have to look at every expenditure the government makes. We are doing that. We are looking at every program the government delivers to determine which programs we may be able to eliminate. Nothing is going to be sacred. We have a long way to go. We are determined to live within our means".

Let me get personal. I hope I have the indulgence of my wife for this. My wife is an employee of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario. My family lives here in Ottawa because otherwise, like many MPs, I would not have a family life. My riding is so far away. My wife is a part-time employee, a term employee. My wife, along with many others in the intensive care unit of the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, got her letter, compliments of the Government of Ontario, two days ago, advising her that she had been laid off.

Which government sent that letter? Which party is in power? The New Democratic Party of Ontario is in power. It sent my wife her letter telling her that due to cutbacks being imposed upon the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, she, along with many others, would no longer be employed on the current basis on which she is employed at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario.

When I see the New Democratic Party bleeding all over the rich green carpet of the House of Commons, holding in its ribs as it loses itself in grief and in turmoil, tantalized and tormented about the loss of health care services in Canada, and putting forward a motion alleging to want to save health care in Canada—a silly, vexatious, juvenile, hypocritical, false, transparent and foolish motion—I find myself moved to come to this Chamber and respond to this motion. I said in the beginning the motion is not about health care in this country; not at all, not in the least. It is a motion purely designed for the most transparent and despicable political motive. That is what it is, a motion which says this House condemns actions that may be taken by Liberal provinces.

How much more transparent can you get? How much more self-serving could a political party be? Frankly, lest I have not made myself clear, how much more stupid could a political party be? What an insult to the intelligence of Canadians. Does this party believe that all Canadians are somehow mushrooms—keep them in the dark and feed them some moist product from time to time and they will grow? Does it feel that Canadians are unable to see this transparent and despicable political move, that they will not see the game that is being played?

It is the second time this week I have seen this party engage in the most base kind of politics. Earlier this week, the constitutional critic for the New Democratic Party, who says he has spent the last year of his life, along with others, in the interest of Canada trying to keep this country together and united, trying to keep this country from severing into many pieces, stood up in the House and commented on a story that was in the news about RCMP break-ins, illegal break-ins, of the Parti Quebecois in Quebec.

Even though there has already been a royal commission of enquiry into that affair which has laid out all the facts before the people of Canada, which has said that the RCMP acted illegally and without the knowledge of the government of the day or the Cabinet of the day, in the interest of national unity, the NDP said: "Let us have a royal commission of enquiry into the royal commission of enquiry.".

The NDP was saying it should have received an award as best supporting actor of the Bloc Quebecois. The NDP was saying that in the interest of scoring cheap political points, it was prepared to tell the sovereignists of Quebec and the separatists in Quebec that about their worst nightmare, the notion that somehow a national government, any national government, is conspiring to spy on people; that any national government, Liberal, NDP or Conservative, would go out and engage in illegal activities is a valid assumption. The NDP attempted to validate the worst kind of nonsense about federalism in the interests of narrow, partisan political advantage. That is what it did and it should think about what that kind of statement does to this country. It should think about what that kind of gesture does to the glue—what little is left—that keeps this country together?

That is exactly what the NDP has done again today with this motion. It is pure hypocrisy. I come from Newfoundland and Labrador, one of the poorest provinces, if not the poorest, in Canada. Just as has happened in NDP Saskatchewan, NDP Ontario and NDP British Columbia, Newfoundland and Labrador has had health care cutbacks. I do not like it. Nobody in Newfoundland and Labrador likes it, and we have had those cutbacks because there has been a reduction of the transfer payments from the national government to the provinces for provision of health care in this country.

Does anyone know what the single biggest contributing factor to the continuing decline of health care in little old Newfoundland and Labrador is? The biggest single contributor to cutbacks in health care in the poorest provinces of Canada is the stalled economic engine in the province of Ontario. Who has their foot on the gas in the province of Ontario? Who has got the gear shift stuck in neutral in the province of Ontario? Who is running the wheels right off the car in the province of Ontario? Premier Bob Rae and his NDP administration.

I hope those members of the NDP, who have crawled out of this Chamber, who have gone to find cover out by the coffee machine, understand intrinsically in their heart of hearts that this base political motion today is indefensible. I hope they understand that the debate today is not about health care, as initiated by the New Democratic Party.

I am convinced there were members opposite who were embarrassed in their seats. They know that I speak absolutely the truth. Some of them are going to be forced to get to their feet and show what great hockey players they are, what great acolytes of Gretzky they are, as they try to stick-handle their way out of the embarrassing mess they have created today.

I hope at least one of them will come clean and admit that the country needs a discussion about health care. Those of us who believe in universality of health care need to pull like-minded people together. We need to ensure that our health care system survives, because it is one of the few benefits of Canadian citizenship that is constant across this land. It does not matter whether one lives in Newfoundland or Labrador or in Ontario. It does not matter whether one is rich or poor, whether one speaks English or French, or whether one is gentile or Jew. It does not matter whether one is black or white. As a condition of citizenship in this country one is offered the best service that can be provided, and it ought to remain that way. We are committed to that kind of universal access to our health care system.

However, we are not going to defend health care by playing political games. We are not going to defend health care by trying to shoot the messenger. The reason there have been cutbacks in Newfoundland is that money has been cut back for health care to Newfoundland, a Liberal government. The reason there have been cutbacks in Saskatchewan is that money has been cut back in the province of Saskatchewan, an NDP government. The reason there have been cutbacks in Nova Scotia is that money has been cut back in transfer payments to Nova Scotia, a Progressive Conservative government. The reason there were cutbacks in British Columbia before the last election is that money was cut back in transfer payments to British Columbia, a Socred government.

It makes no difference the colour of the political stripe of the government in the respective province. If the money is not there it cannot be spent. The question is whether or not we collectively as a nation hold up as an important value and condition of citizenship the provision of quality accessible medical care in this country. That is what matters.

This important debate is something that ought to unite the country at a time when it is fractured. It is something that ought to pull us together at a time when a great deal pulls us apart. It is something that ought to appeal to those things we believe in rather than appeal to those things we oppose. Trying to turn this one little bit of crazy glue, if I can put it that way, that still keeps this country together into something for partisan advantage is a tragic mistake.

If the New Democrats retain one iota of that traditional sense of being able to rise above it all, to put aside the game of power, the outs being out and the ins being in and the outs trying to get back in, and to speak of values once again, if they can find even a last smidgen, a residue of that conviction in their now tortured political partisan souls, they will stand and apologize for this motion. They will withdraw this motion. They will say that they understand, as I do, that medicare is too important in the context of the current debate about unity in this country to be so tainted, to be so stained, to be so warped, to be so twisted, to be so used in the worst partisan way. They will withdraw this motion. They will apologize. They will cease and desist from these cheap partisan attacks.

I know that there is some discomfort for New Democrats in seeing their party go down in the polls consistently for the last number of months while the Liberal Party has gone up in the polls consistently for the last couple of months. But I want to tell my colleagues something. They should no more be alarmed at their consistently going down in the polls than I am taking any great joy in the fact that the Liberal Party has consistently gone up. The only election that counts is the one when the public decides at the next general election who is to occupy the seats in this place. It is wrong, short-sighted, unprincipled and unhelpful to have their actions, to have their so-called beliefs or to have their values jettisoned or dictated as a result of the latest opinion polls.

I say to my colleagues who sit to the left with whom I do not always agree: "Please put aside such transparent partisanship, such self-serving rhetoric, such nonsensical motions". I say to them: "Please find a residue of your heretofore souls, come to your senses and once again make a contribution, as little as it is, to serving Canada rather than contributing to its destruction".

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has put on his usual Wayne Gretzky performance of rhetoric and insult, but it is clear that his main object was to take people's attention away from the embarrassment—perhaps he feels an embarrassment or perhaps he does not; I will give him a chance to say so—of the fact that his premier stated an intention to change one of the fundamental principles of the health care system we have.

Mr. Tobin: Where is the quote?

Mr. Heap: He is putting forward the suggestion that we should consider user fees. User fees would be a fundamental attack on the universality and the public funding which are principles of the medicare system.

Instead of addressing that issue the hon. member has chosen to attack some of the NDP provinces for having announced cutbacks in the programs of certain hospitals and other medical facilities. I guess he is predicting that the third NDP province will in its budget.

Nobody is proud of lay-offs. No party, certainly in this House, advocates lay-offs for the sake of lay-offs. Whether it be the NDP governments of this country, the Liberal governments in the provinces of this country or Conservative led provinces of this country, the lay-offs in the health system are certainly a matter of regret. They are not in themselves an attack on the medicare system, nor are they an attack on the principle of universality. If there is less money, there is less money.

The Ontario government has had a greater reduction in federal social assistance payments than eight other of the provinces. Eight of them have been held at 50 per cent as the federal share, but Ontario has been cut to 31 per cent by the federal government. The only other one that has been cut below 50 per cent so far has been British Columbia. We have yet to hear from British Columbia.

Ontario has been cut by a very large amount of money by the federal government in some of the programs on which the Ontario government relies. That is the reason for the lay-offs.

Mr. Tobin: Question.

Mr. Heap: It would be the reason for the lay-offs in any other province as well.

I ask the hon. member, since he has been interrupting me with comments, to stand and explain the action of the premier of Newfoundland in his statements regarding fee for service, his statements suggesting that there should be better health care if the so-called rich were asked to pay more but without defining how far down the rich would go to introduce the idea of fee for service, or if any kind of payment other than out of the public purse for health care would endanger the health care for the large majority of people in Newfoundland as well as the large majority in Ontario.

I ask the hon. member to tell us where his premier stands.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, the member says I was interrupting him. Indeed I did, to say to him: "Where is the quote?" He is telling us what Premier Wells allegedly has said. I tell the member, given that he is going to stand and put words in the premier's mouth, that he ought to have the care, the consideration and the veracity, which means conviction to express the truth, to tell us what Mr. Wells said, to quote directly from him. The member conveniently did not hear me. It is not surprising he did not hear me because he is not representing accurately, truthfully or correctly what is being said by some premiers in this province and in this country.

What are premiers saying? Premiers are saying that if you continue to cut unilaterally and arbitrarily hundreds of millions of dollars from the health care budget, if you are operating hospitals and health care facilities on the assumption that money is being transferred and suddenly large junks of that money are no longer being transferred, you borrow some more if you have the capacity to borrow. Newfoundland does not have that capacity. Ontario might, I do not know, but it is fast losing it. Alberta and British Columbia might, but Newfoundland does not have that capacity to borrow.

What do the premiers say? The premiers said: "If I am not able to borrow, I either have to make cuts or I have to consider bringing in additional revenue". That is what the premier said. The premier did not say it was the policy of the government to bring in user fees. The premier did not say he was going to announce user fees. The premier said: "This is what the health care system is being driven to". It was a cry of alarm.

The member for St. John's East who is across the way knows that his city has seen dramatic cutbacks in the health care service. His province is currently undergoing an advertising campaign by the nurses talking about the quality of health care in Newfoundland and Labrador. The same is happening in New Brunswick because nurses themselves who are the primary caregivers are seeing that the health care system is sick.

What is equally worrisome, and I say with great respect perhaps equally sick in the context of how my colleague is thinking, is when he says that it is the policy of the New Democratic Party that cutbacks and lay-offs in the health care system of and by themselves are not an attack on universality.

Let me make clear to the member that the Liberal Party of Canada, the Liberal Party as represented in this House of Commons, the Liberal Party as represented by the leader of our party who went to Washington and defended Canadian health care, believes that these unilateral cuts in transfer payments to health care are an attack on universality. We are not prepared to play little semantic games. We understand that the reason that cutbacks are happening in every province, be they Liberal, NDP or Conservative, the reason people are being laid off and the reason the quality of health care is being reduced is the cuts to transfer payments.

I am appalled and amazed that my friend from the New Democratic Party, in the interest of defending Bob Rae or Roy Romanow or his colleague out in British Columbia, the newly elected leader out there, would say: 'You know, those cutbacks being made in Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia, those lay-offs of nurses and of health care professionals, the closure of some wings of hospitals, the elimination of beds, are not attacks on universality, because even if we reduce our health care system to a band-aid station at least we will all have the same access to the same band-aids". That is the NDP mentality. As long as the lowest common denominator is equally available to everybody it is not a cutback.

That is outrageous. Our battle cannot just be to keep the system universal even if what is universal is our accessibility to a poor system. Our battle has to be to keep a quality system, not to allow one level of government to dictate to every other level of government the quality of health care; to have an intelligent, informed debate about choices; and to ensure that health care is maintained in this country in a manner that it becomes a matter of pride and right of Canadian citizenship.

I fear for my colleagues in the NDP. I fear they have lost their way. I fear they are still trapped in the politics of yesterday, the division between right and left, the promotion of class warfare, this whole notion of making the rich pay or making the poor pay, and the setting of one segment of society against another segment of society. They are so lost in the politics of yesterday that they miss the onslaught of change that is upon us and the requirement for modern day political parties to manage change, not merely to stand and be drowned by it.

I say to my colleague that I understand the great and glorious days of the revolution, but the revolution is over. Canada must move forward into the 1990s and beyond.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, there is never anything in this House quite so entertaining as the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte when he is in full flight.

I certainly do not intend to even try to compete at the rhetorical level with the hon. member or with the pious way he set upon his NDP colleagues for this motion. The way in which he responded points up the existence of some sensitivity in the Liberal ranks with respect to the whole question of user fees.

I would like to respond to something that was said earlier by the hon. member from Etobicoke. He talked about the Ontario NDP government on one hand and blamed it for the deficit in Ontario, after having earlier gone on about the incredibly deep recession that Canada was experiencing, particularly Ontario.

If we want to talk about not seeking unfair partisan advantage and not bending the truth in order to suit one's political agenda, the Liberals cannot have it both ways with respect to Ontario.

They cannot talk about the tremendous effect of the recession in Ontario and then in the very next sentence blame the deficit in Ontario on the Ontario NDP government. Surely, there is some connection between the recession in Ontario and the deficit that the government there has had to create as a result of the economic conditions that prevail in that province.

It was also certainly stretching the truth to say that the Ontario NDP had inherited a balanced budget. We know that is not the case, but that was the impression that the Liberal government of the day tried to create during the election campaign that brought the NDP to power.

In listening to the hon. member from Newfoundland, he pointed out something that maybe is at the heart of the debate here. He said that if the provincial budgets continue to be squeezed, to have the life squeezed out of them by unilateral federal cutbacks in Established Programs Financing, in Canada Assistance Program financing, in equalization payments or whatever the case may be, then at some point, particularly with respect to health care, provincial governments are faced with this choice between the devil and the deep blue sea, so to speak.

We have to respond either through cutbacks or through seeking out new sources of revenue. This is where the argument about user fees comes in.

The member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte did not want to make a distinction between the introduction of user fees and cutbacks in health care, seeing them both as equally an attack on medicare.

What we have before us here in the form of the NDP motion is a motion which says that we do not accept that way of looking at the problem, that cutbacks and user fees are sort of equivalent.

• (1150)

I will try to explain why we do take genuine offence at the suggestion by Liberal premiers that user fees are somehow the solution to the problem.

What we are talking about here is problem and solution. The problem in the first place is unilateral federal cutbacks to health care dollars, a violation of the agreements, written and political, which existed in the 1960s and 1970s with respect to medicare being a federally and provincially cost shared program.

That is the source of the problem, and I say to the hon. member that it has its origin in the Liberal government of which he was a part, and in which he may even have been a cabinet minister in his dying days.

It was the Liberal government of 1982 which brought in the first unilateral cutback to Establish Programs Financing. The same government went to a great deal of trouble through the Canada Health Act to prevent user fees.

Obviously the Liberal government of that day, whether this member accepted it or not at that time, made a distinction between cutbacks and user fees. The same government cut back on health care dollars but at the same time brought in tough legislation to deal with user fees. That government then made a distinction, which the member was unwilling to make today, between the effect that user fees have, not just on the practical, but also on the philosophical underpinnings of medicare and the effect that cutbacks have.

I would agree that at some point cutbacks themselves become a threat to medicare. If your publicly funded health care system is so devastated, so much a shell of its former self that people come to think negatively about it, then that becomes an attack on medicare by virtue of the fact that people then begin to want and seek out alternatives to that publicly funded health care system.

Cutbacks can be a threat to medicare in and of themselves. The cutbacks we have seen, which began in 1982 but which accelerated under the Progressive Conservative Party starting in 1984, are a threat to medicare.

An even greater threat to medicare is when premiers, whether they be Liberal or anybody else, and in this case they happen to be Liberals, say that the solution to that problem is the reintroduction of user fees. That is where there is, I would hope we can admit here, a genuine distinction to be made between the problem, which is federal cutbacks to the provinces, which in turn leads to provincial cutbacks in health care services, and a legitimate disagreement about what the response should be to that reality. Some Liberal premiers have suggested that user fees are part of the legitimate response to that problem.

What we are saying here today is that we reject that as part of the solution. We reject it because it is part and parcel of what we have always been about, and that makes us different from the Liberals. We do not have a history. It is not the NDP in Saskatchewan that fought the introduction of medicare the way they did at that time.

There is a mixed bag over there when it comes to medicare, although it was a Liberal government that brought in medicare in the 1960s. This is to be acknowledged, but it was not something that the Liberals would have done if it had not been for the pressure brought to bear on them by the existence already of medicare in Saskatchewan, and by the fact that they had minority governments at that time and pressure was brought to bear on them by the NDP in the House at that time.

This is all a matter of historical record and is not designed to take away from the fact that I am sure there were some Liberals at the time who were genuinely keen on finally bringing into reality the promise that the Liberals had made at their convention in 1919.

The fact is that there is a distinction to be made between introduction of user fees and other ways of solving the problem that we now have.

The real solution is the reintroduction of full federal cost sharing. The solution is to restore the partnership. The solution is to not have the federal government slowly but surely getting out of the business of living up to its commitment to these federally and provincially cost shared programs.

That does not seem to be in the cards this side of the next election. We have a government that seems committed to off-loading its deficit on to the provinces in a way that is not only wrong from the point of view of off-loading the deficit, but also has this effect on fundamental services, such as health care, that the provinces are there to provide.

Unashamedly, in spite of everything that the member said, we condemn anyone who suggests that the solution at this point is user fees. There is a problem.

I was the NDP health critic for four years, between 1980 and 1984, and I spent most of my time trying to encourage the Liberal government of the day and health minister Monique Begin to bring in the Canada Health Act to deal with user fees. There was a consensus in the country that user fees were inimical to the value system of medicare. There was a unanimous vote in this House in April 1984 against user fees.

When we get up and condemn anyone who suggests that user fees be brought back, all we are speaking from is not just a consensus, but a unanimous action of the Canadian Parliament taken in 1984 with the passage of the Canada Health Act.

I say to the hon. member who takes such offence that we should be critical of those who would suggest going against the spirit of that unanimous act. What is it that he has taken offence to, unless he is embarrassed by the fact that it is his Liberal colleagues who have made this suggestion?

With respect to the cutbacks that are being brought in by various NDP governments in health care services, no one enjoys this, and particularly I know New Democrats do not enjoy it. I think the hon. member, if I understood him correctly, tried to make the point that this is happening all across the country.

Why is it happening all across the country? It is happening all across the country because all provinces are affected by the federal withdrawal from this program. It does not really matter whether you are Progressive Conservative, NDP or Liberal, if you are a provincial government, you are affected by these unilateral withdrawals from these programs. The temptation is to point fingers and say that one cutback is worse than the other or that if a certain party were in power this cutback would not happen, et cetera.

The fact is that cutbacks are happening. They are happening because we have finally got to the point at which that train of events which was started by the Liberals in 1982 is beginning to have its worst effect. We are not trimming fat any more from the system; we are trimming the system. That will be a threat to medicare.

The solution is not user fees. Study after study has shown that user fees, unless they are really hefty, cost as much to collect as they bring in. Not only that, but they tend to discourage the wrong people from seeking out health care services.

That is why we are dead against them. I venture to say we would be dead against them if in desperation some NDP premier were to suggest it. I would quarrel with him as much as I would quarrel with Mr. McKenna, Mr. Wells, or anybody else who has suggested that.

We do have a problem. It is not exactly a problem that has just arisen. I refer to Hansard, April 2, 1984, third reading of the Canada Health Act, and I quote from page 2605:

> There are questions having to do with the allocation of health care dollars because there is not an infinite amount of money, and there will be difficult decisions to be made —there are difficult decisions about the allocation of health care resources. Canadians will have to pay more attention to how their health care dollars are being spent. We will have to find a way as we did through medicare when we found a way to go beyond the allocation of health care resources by the marketplace and we will have to find a way to go beyond the present system which lays itself open more and more to the charge that bureaucrats are allocating health care resources by political and fiscal imperatives instead of health care imperatives.

• (1200)

That is what we have now, exactly what I predicted on April 2, 1984. The Minister of Finance might as well be the minister of health in the provinces and in the country, because all the health care decisions are being made not by the medical community or the medical community in co-operation with other people who are concerned, which is the way it should be, but by bureaucrats in the Department of Finance.

That is wrong. There is a problem. We do have a health care system which more and more looks like it is making infinite demands on a finite amount of money.

There is also the question, as predicted in this speech, which some people might want to have a look at, if they are interested, of the demographic problem which was building then and which is even worse now. I suggested at that time that we try and build the kind of infrastructure that would help us to deal with that demographic time bomb that was gathering at that time with the aging of our population. Nothing was done by the Liberal government of that day or by subsequent governments.

Finally, there is the question of the expensive technologies, diagnostic and therapeutic, which more and more place a strain on our health care system. We are going to have to find a way to say what things we can afford to do and what things we cannot. That will be difficult because some things which are very expensive are also very personal. For instance, if you are talking about quadruple bypasses or whatever the case may be, something very expensive, individualized treatment, that person has a name. The person who is eligible for that treatment and who did not get it because there was a waiting list or who died before it was available or whatever has a name and can be identified.

That kind of acute treatment is very prone, and I do not say this is wrong but it is a fact, to the manipulation of our emotions and our natural sense of caring about that one person. The same amount of money that is spent on some of that high tech stuff could be spent on cleaner water for reserves or some other preventive kind of thing. None of those people have names. None of those people have faces. You do not have a big article in the local Sun about the baby who was saved because there was cleaner water on the reserves because you do not know which baby it was that was saved by cleaner water. All you can know intellectually is that many were saved by cleaner water.

We have this tug on our emotions, how to spend this money on the identifiable individually speaking or on the non-identifiable socially speaking but which nevertheless might be money better spent depending on what we finally decide.

To be honest, medicare was conceived in a day and age when people could not foresee the never ending spiral of technological advances that have driven up the cost of health care the way they have. Ultimately we would all be safer if we were accompanied by a doctor wherever we went. Perhaps, depending on who the doctor was.

An hon. member: Then you would need a lawyer.

Mr. Blaikie: Someone says then you might need to be accompanied by a lawyer wherever you went, or a priest.

In any event, the fact is that there will have to be limits to what can be publicly funded. Nobody really argues about this. There are things which are not funded by medicare. There may have to be more things which are not funded by medicare. But we do not want to make those decisions as a result of having our backs falsely to the wall because the federal government is pulling out of its commitment to medicare. We want to have to make those tough decisions about what we can afford and what we cannot once we have both the federal and provincial governments living up to their commitment to the system. Whatever problems we have after that will be real problems rather than the political problems that are foisted on us by a lack of commitment on the part of a particular government to medicare.

Once we solve that problem, we can get about the very, very difficult decisions that will have to be made. I think they will be difficult for NDP governments as well as Conservative and Liberal governments. They will be difficult for everybody concerned. The solution will not be an uncritical return to the notion that user fees somehow will get us out of the mess we are in.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, the problem with opposition days is that you sometimes do not get to know what is on until you get the Order Paper in the morning. When I saw the topic on the Order Paper this morning I immediately became very angry because I felt what an excellent debate we could have had in this House had we kept partisan politics out of it. The NDP, as always, takes every issue and turns it into partisan politics instead of having a good debate.

I contacted the hospitals in my riding to see how they are affected by the cutbacks and so on. It goes all the way from the cut in transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces, and then the New Democratic government's cuts to the hospitals. I found out, for example, from Mr. Cliff Nordal, president and CEO of the Queen Elizabeth Hospital right in my riding—and I wish they could be given the Award of Canada or something for the excellent service they are giving—that there has been only a 1 per cent increase for hospitals this year, with 2 per cent in the next two years for health care in general, but the costs are going up much more than that.

He claims that the changes in federal benefits—that is the UI, CPP, workmen's compensation—are adding 15 per cent to the hospital costs. That is nothing the hospital puts on, but they have to pay their workers' UI, CPP and workmen's comp.

The Ontario Nurses Union has just negotiated an 8 per cent raise. The other unions are coming up for arbitration, and they will probably get the same. Another factor that is hurting this hospital, and I am sure others, is pay equity. Pay equity alone is making a big dent in the budget. The whole thing has left the Queen Elizabeth Hospital with a $2.8 million deficit, and has forced the closure of 82 chronic care beds. This is a loss of jobs but, more important, with the aging population and the demographics of our community this is a loss in our ability to care for the people.

I believe in pay equity, but if the provincial New Democratic government brings in that legislation, surely it cannot expect the hospitals to pick up that additional cost. Would the member agree that if the New Democratic government has brought in legislation on pay equity, it should then come in with the bucks also? I would like to pose that to the hon. member.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, before I give the floor back to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, I would like to tell the House that we have many problems with the amendment as presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I would suggest at this time that we go on with the period of questions and comments after which, before we start on debate again, I would be prepared to listen to some argument. I want to give the opposition time to prepare and then we can decide on whether or not this amendment is admissible.

• (1210)

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the member for Parkdale—High Park follows in the tradition of some of his colleagues who spoke earlier. On the one hand they want to blame the federal government, which is appropriate, for cutting back moneys to the provinces, in this case Ontario, and at the same time hold the province of Ontario responsible for the consequences of those cutbacks which they themselves, that is to say the Liberal member and his colleagues, place the responsibility for at the foot of the federal government. They cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I first of all want to congratulate the member for Winnipeg Transcona for a very thoughtful speech on this issue that the debate today is all about and to credit him for a speech he made previously about some of the concerns our provinces are having about health care.

My question to him relates to some of the very important problems faced by many of us representing northern, remote and rural ridings, and that is the way our health care system has developed. There are some legitimate arguments that in large urban areas there is evidence that we are actually overdoctored. They may be fine for the urban areas but it is a real problem for those of us who represent rural areas where communities have a difficult time attracting medical practitioners and others.

In the case of my riding I think of two communities. Valemount at the eastern end of the riding has to advertise in magazines in the U.K. and elsewhere and most recently another community, Fort St. James, a two-hour drive from Prince George, is having the same problem.

I would like to ask the member, from his experience on this issue, how we can deal with the current problems in health care and also be able to respond to the needs of the smaller communities that have a difficult time in attracting medical practitioners.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I am glad the member raises the question of health care services in remote areas. I might refer him to the same speech of April 2, 1984, where I do not talk about his riding in particular but I say:

> There are many other questions we will have to face, but I do not have the time to go into them. There will be the question of transportation in northern Ontario, for instance, and other remote parts of the country where people do not, in a sense, have equal access to hospital care. They must spend a lot more money than people living in urban centres to provide their families with the kind of hospital care which may be recommended by their physicians.

This was a problem which at that time was brought to my attention by a fellow who lived in Thunder Bay, who is now the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, but who at that time was very active in the promotion of improved health care services for people in northern Ontario.

The problem the member raises is related in the sense of how to get doctors into these communities. I come from a tradition in the church where people are expected after their graduation to serve in remote communities as a condition of their education. It costs a whole lot less to put somebody through the ministry than it does to put them through medicine. Yet we have all kinds of people, and we do not begrudge them this, who are getting a very expensive education in medicine. It seems to me that instead of all going to the lower mainland in B.C., or the golden horseshoe in Ontario or whatever the case may be, although it is not quite as golden as it used to be, that they should be expected in some way or another to put something back into the community by rendering some significant service in these more remote communities.

Part of the problem with the health care system now is that we have no way of rationing the number of doctors who are all trying to make a living out of the same population. We get areas in which there is a very high concentration of doctors, and it is only natural that they are going to be in a system which is demand driven but open-ended in the sense of the government reimbursing positions for the fees that they charge, but you are going to run into problems.

What we need to look at is some way of rationalizing the distribution of physicians. Some people have suggested, and it has even been implemented, only having so many billing numbers in a certain area and things like that. I am not convinced that is the answer. We do need to look, particularly when it comes to remote areas, at how we get doctors out into that area. It has something to do with an expectation that is either laid on or very much encouraged that these people have something to give back to the country that provided them with their education.

Mr. Karpoff: On a point of order, this is the first supply day in which the government has not put up a minister, parliamentary secretary or even a backbencher to defend medicare. I am wondering if we can get some indication from the government whether its silence is that it is now tacitly agreeing with the ending of universality.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, as a backbencher in that list the member mentioned, the government is very anxious and interested to debate medicare. So far, all we have debated are the political intentions of one party or another, and I suspect when we discuss the health care system in this country, which is critically important, you might see the government participating. So far, frankly, it is great entertainment to watch people stealing out of each other's milk bowls.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, another comment on the same subject.

Our concern rests with the fact that a few weeks ago at an earlier federal-provincial conference, I believe it was the Prime Minister, or perhaps another spokesman for the government, who was very quick to disassociate and distance himself and the policy of his government regarding universality when the Liberal premier of New Brunswick had opened up that possibility.

Comparing the silence that has existed in this debate and in the last few days to the continuing questions regarding universality raised by other Liberal premiers makes us worry that perhaps the government, having seen this idea thrown around a little more broadly, is doing some rethinking on its part. We would welcome, and the Canadian people would be very much assured in this matter, some continuing commitment from the government that despite the advocacy of inroads on universality by the Liberal premiers, its policy is still going to be constant with regard to the principle of universality and medicare.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the reason we do not have the minister of health here or the kind of defence of medicare that we might otherwise expect is that there is no commitment to medicare on that side of the House.

I sat in this House for four years as the NDP health critic and not once in that so-called medicare crisis did an Official Opposition member, a Conservative, raise the question of user fees, which were a problem in the early 80s.

• (1220)

If it had not been for the combined efforts of the NDP in raising the question with the government and the personal commitment of the minister of health and welfare at the time, Monique Begin, nothing would have happened. It certainly would not have happened as a result of the efforts of the Official Opposition.

The only commitment that exists on that side of the House is not to reveal, in any open way, the fact that it does not have any commitment to medicare. It was against it from the first.

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I have been advised that you are prepared to rule against our amendment based on the fact that you claim there are some new concepts being introduced in our amendment.

Let me remind you, Madam Speaker, that this motion is about the threat to our health care system and that you certainly recognize that health care is a shared responsibility of all levels of government in this country, and that governments are interdependent under our system of co-operative federalism.

This opposition motion expresses the concern of this House about the threat to the Canadian health care system by the actions of incumbent government cutbacks.

It is this motion which introduces the concept of incumbent governments. The amendment merely enlarges on the descriptive part of the motion. The motion itself refers to the expressed intentions of certain premiers of some of the incumbent governments which threaten the health care system.

Our amendment adds to this bill of particulars the actions of other incumbent governments and provincial premiers and really sets the situation in its proper context.

The provincial premiers are being compelled by the federal government into this action. It is the federal government which really poses the threat.

In other words, the amendment does not add any new concepts to the main motion. It merely clarifies the nature of the threats referred to in the motion. That is why I believe the motion is in order.

Mr. Blaikie: I would submit that this opposition day motion before the House has a clear scope. It is an expression of concern for views expressed by the leaders of three provincial governments, specifically the Liberal premiers of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

What the Liberal amendment seeks to do is add an entirely new element to the motion. It adds references to the actions of three other governments, as opposed to the opinions of three leaders.

Beauchesne's sixth edition is clear on this point. Paragraph 579(1) states:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

This is based on a Speaker's ruling of 1923 which has been consistently applied over the past decades. I am sure that when you have had an opportunity to consider the matter you will see that the motion we have before us in the form of the Liberal subamendment is out of order on the face of it.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I would like to debate and argue that our amendment to the motion is very much in order.

Why do I say that? Citation 929 indicates:

> On an allotted day, during consideration of the business of Supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion.

Fortunately, Madam Speaker, before you could have had the time to decide on the procedural correctness of the amendment, debate in the House has already ensued.

We already heard the argument of the member for Winnipeg Transcona that there is a relationship between user fees and cutbacks from the federal government. That is now a fact in so far as an argument is concerned.

You cannot divide user fees and cutbacks. That is what the member from Winnipeg Transcona said. It is part of the debate. Who made the cutbacks? The federal government made it. You cannot isolate the federal government from this debate or we will have no debate.

If you look at the main motion by the NDP, the main focus is the threat to Canada's health care system; the system itself. It is not the stated intention of the Liberal premiers. It was only used as one.

Is the New Democratic Party telling us, the members, that the threat to the health care system is due to only one factor? During its arguments it has admitted it is not. I would submit, to allow for full debate on this issue, that the Chair allow the Liberal amendment to prosper so that we can have a healthy debate.

Canadians can listen to all the pros and cons. Let Canadians decide, and not on a procedural basis. We have to nip in the bud a fundamental principle of reality today.

Mr. Martin: Madam Speaker, it is difficult to understand the reasoning of the members of the NDP who would argue against our amendment.

The essence of our amendment is that as a result of the withdrawal of the federal government from its longstanding obligations, the health care system is in peril. Section 81(11) says that opposition motions may relate to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

The argument is very clear. If our amendment is not acceptable because it is not related to the principle of the motion, and our amendment relates to the federal government, then the original motion should not be allowed. An opposition motion must relate to an issue relating to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

The argument is very clear. Our amendment must be accepted, and if our amendment is not accepted, it can only be on the ground that the original motion itself is out of order.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, the last two speakers who are trying to cite that this amendment should be in order have convinced you of the opposite.

This is a different debate. The original motion focused on two main elements: the opinions of the three Liberal premiers' administrations and on the introduction of user fees.

This amendment totally shifts the debate to a different subject. Based on the citation from the member from Winnipeg, the Chair clearly has no choice but to rule it out of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask for the indulgence of the House to take into consideration for a little while longer the new arguments which have been brought to me. I will come back to the House in a few minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, normally I would be very glad to take part in such a debate. But today I have mixed feelings. Why?

[English]

As I indicated, I am usually quite enthused about participating in a discussion such as this one. Today, it is not really the case.

Intellectually I want to talk about the problem, but I am also angry because the motion, with all due respect to my colleagues, some of whom I respect a great deal, is particularly petty. It is a motion that takes a singularly important issue to Canadians, the health care of all Canadians, and trivializes it.

• (1230)

It debases it. It makes it totally, completely, uniquely political by trying to identify three Liberal premiers as the victims, if you wish, those who have perpetuated this. I am really disappointed.

Why has the NDP not talked about the real problem, the cause of where we are today and what we might be able to do in terms of something constructive and positive and respond to the health needs of all Canadians?

We all know that all provinces have been adversely affected. We all know that is as a result of the federal cutbacks, but there are other reasons as well and I shall go into them. Why did my colleagues from the New Democratic Party single out just Liberal premiers? Why did they not single out actions by the Saskatchewan government, an NDP government, I might add? Let me quote from an article dated today: "Saskatchewan cuts social spending". I want to quote from a Canadian press article: "The Saskatchewan government is cutting $115 million in funding for hospitals, schools and municipalities". It goes on. It warned yesterday that the provincial budget will include even deeper cuts. Why did they not mention the New Democratic Party of Saskatchewan, the New Democratic Government of Saskatchewan?

What has Bob Rae's NDP government done in a province that has been among the better-off financially, recognizing that it has had problems? Let me quote from a recent article: "As a result of actions by the New Democratic Party, the New Democratic Government of Ontario, the Ontario Hospital Association has issued serious warnings; lay-offs of up to 13,000 hospital employees and 3,600 bed closures in hospitals". How do you like that? That is one of the actions.

Here is another article: "Hospitals will have to close and they will have to lay off staff". This is a New Democratic failure to preserve the medicare system.

I will quote another article about the behaviour of the New Democratic government in Ontario: "2,000 Ontario Hospital Jobs at Risk. The 1 per cent funding increase for Ontario hospitals this year could bring the loss of 2,000 hospital jobs across the province, said the finance minister".

Another article describes the situation of two individuals who are suffering from schizophrenia. One is able to get a drug that permits that person to cope with that particular difficulty, while the other does not. Why? The New Democratic government of Ontario will not provide the necessary kind of assistance.

I quote these particular articles because we need to acknowledge that all governments are having difficulties. It is inappropriate, insensitive and blantantly political to pick on a few individuals to try to make political hay out of an issue that is of such great importance to all Canadians. As I indicated, it trivializes it, it debases it.

[Translation]

Frankly it is disgusting and Canadians will see it that way.

[English]

What kinds of attitudes should we be taking on this issue? Let me quote my colleague from Winnipeg North who said on March 19, 1991, on an opposition day by this party dedicated to this topic: "Mr. Speaker, yesterday I sat in the House in amazement listening to a partisan New Democrat painting his party as a champion of medicare. His holier than thou rhetoric failed to mention that all first ministers of all political stripes and the Prime Minister agreed to discuss user fees at their meeting last night". This is not the first time that they have tried to do this.

Why? Obviously they have been looking at the polls. Obviously they are more concerned about the popularity of the Liberal Party of Canada than they are about the issue of medicare, about health care for Canadians.

I have another one here: "Medicare belongs to all of us, to all Canadians. It is shared by every member of this House and all of their constituents. Medicare is no less prized in Winnipeg North than it is in Kelowna, British Columbia, or Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. Medicare is the undeniable right of every Canadian citizen. It belongs to my sons and their children to follow. It belongs to the children of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his colleagues and their children. It is perhaps the most precious thing all Canadians have to pass on to the next generation".

That is what my colleague from Winnipeg North said. He goes on: "Medicare is not a partisan issue and ought not to be". That is the kind of attitude we need. That is the kind of leadership that we need if we are going to come to grips with this critically important issue to all Canadians.

Using an issue such as health care, picking on certain premiers because of their political party membership, while premiers of other political parties have done the same or more, is political pettiness, political smallness at its worse. I expected much more from the NDP. I am sorry that we have had to stoop to that particular level.

I would have wanted the truth. Why is the current health system having difficulties? Clearly there are cuts to health care. Between 1986 and 1995 there will have been 20 billion fewer dollars transferred to provinces. Obviously, that is a lot of money and it is difficult to accommodate to those kinds of changes. Let there be no doubt about it. That is a major problem.

There was the made-in-Canada recession. This recession has caused a lot of difficulties in health care, in education and in other social programs. There are people who want more and better care. That is a change in attitude that has taken on some significant importance.

I had hoped that the NDP would have mentioned that one of the problems—I am delighted and I hope I am one of the individuals who will enjoy this—is that Canadians are living longer. They live longer and therefore they need more health care for longer periods of time.

I had hoped that it would have mentioned that health costs are increasing at alarming rates and tried to understand why that is so. I had hoped that it would have recognized that we need a different kind of response to health care problems today if we are going to respond to the health of Canadians.

What might some of these be? I go to some former debates. I recognize again the contribution and the leadership that my colleague from Winnipeg North has given. I want to quote from that particular opposition day dedicated to health care by the Liberal Party of Canada, on March 19, 1991. He said: "Daily our health care system is becoming more taxed and stricken with debt and fiscal restraint". He points out that the purchase of new equipment, even the maintenance of old equipment, becomes extremely difficult to fund. He points out as well that research funding has been cut. He goes on to say: "I believe by not focusing more attention on prevention we cannot hope to maintain services while coping with burgeoning health costs".

He points out some other difficulties: "I believe by not focusing more attention on the prevention we cannot hope to maintain services". He also says that we have to become more creative in responding to the needs that are out there. He points out as well that it is becoming increasingly difficult to find qualified nurses and qualified doctors, and this is particularly so in smaller, more isolated areas, and for a certain particular population, very often those which have particularly unique problems that have to be dealt with in the health care area.

My colleague also has identified the need for treatment facilities for new diseases and for the elderly. "Care centres for the elderly are desperately needed as their numbers swell with the addition of the baby boom generation".

Here are some of the points that my colleague has made, that other colleagues as well have identified, ones we need to come to grips with. We have fewer dollars being transferred to provinces. We have a changing demography in this country; people living longer, wanting more health care and better care.

Because of these various factors, the situation is changing.

[Translation]

When things change it is often extremely difficult for this government or any other to deal with the changed situation.

• (1240)

People often try to find targets and criticize instead of proposing creative solutions. That is what bothers me today. I am very troubled that such an important issue for all Canadians was used for political purposes, knowing that if we had chosen to discuss and talk things over together in order to find solutions we might have been able to do something good for our people.

[English]

A more appropriate motion might have been to collectively discuss, in an open kind of way, what kinds of solutions we could find to maintain and hopefully improve the health system for the benefit of Canadians. I would hope that perhaps during the rest of the day, in the time that is left, that is exactly what we would do.

[Translation]

I would like to recapitulate very briefly, since I am getting to the end of my speech. It is unfortunate that today and on many other occasions important issues are exploited for political purposes, for purely political gain.

I realize it is only human to want to put your best foot forward and try and woo Canadian voters. I think it is quite acceptable in certain situations, but I think we should be sensible and realize that there are times when it is appropriate to try and play certain political games, and times when we must consider the major issues of the day and try to find solutions that will help Canadians and help our country come up with programs that will provide a more satisfactory response to the needs of Canadians.

[English]

Therefore, I would like to come to the end of this particular discussion by asking my colleagues to commit themselves for the rest of the day to looking at solutions to these problems. There are fewer dollars; there are changing demographics; there are changing attitudes of the people who want better and more significant care. All of this is there and there are many, many more issues as well. Surely it would be a much more productive day if at the end of it all we could say: "Here is an idea, here are two or three ideas that might do something significant in terms of responding to the health care needs of Canadians, all Canadians, whether they live in urban centres or in smaller communities or in isolated areas of our great country".

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I have a brief comment and two questions for the member for St. Boniface.

We have heard a great deal today and in the past of those across this country in senior positions in political parties who have argued for the introduction of user fees. We have heard it, as the motion indicates, from three Liberal premiers across this country. We have heard it from the leader of the Reform Party; we have heard it from the former minister of health, the member for Provencher, and from caucuses within the Conservative Party.

We have not heard it and we will not hear from the New Democratic Party any suggestion that user fees should be introduced into the Canadian health care system because of the danger and the damage that it will cause. We have heard it from the Liberals, the Reform Party and the Conservative Party.

I have two questions for the member. Does he not feel that it is important that political parties clearly put on the record for the Canadian people what their views are with regard to user fees and deterrent fees in the health care system? Does he not think that it is important to ask where these political parties stand on this question?

The second question is does he or does he not agree with his colleagues, the premiers of Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador and New Brunswick, that user fees should be introduced into the Canadian health care system?

These are very simple questions.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I do appreciate the questions and I wish those questions had been asked in the way in which my colleague has just presented the questions. I think they are really quite fair. They do not smack of this political pettiness that I mentioned before in their particular motion.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duhamel: My colleague will have an opportunity to stand up and debate me if he would like to. I would welcome that challenge. This motion is political pettiness. My colleague has just asked two important questions and I shall answer them.

First of all, he talks about three Liberal premiers having made statements to the effect that they would welcome, endorse or implement user fees. I would like to see the proof. Put the proof on the table where that has been stated unequivocally, and no fudging.

Yesterday on Canada AM one of the premiers was asked whether he endorsed user fees—one of those three premiers. He said no. Who is right in all of this? Are your colleagues trying to take advantage of you? I would like you to answer that question. Perhaps your own colleagues have not done their homework. They are getting trapped and at the end of the day they are going to hang because they have been petty, because they have been cheap, because they have debased the political process.

Is it important to ask the question? Yes. I applaud the way in which you have asked it and I thank you.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague who has again demonstrated that, at least from this side of the House, the Liberal party is more than interested in getting into the substance of debate rather than engaging in what the NDP has put forward in its motion in a misperception of what might be construed as an issue.

Again, even in the questions that have been raised by both my colleagues, both from the great City of Winnipeg, we have had no substance.

That last question I asked my colleague referred to a "may", a "consider", and a possible review that is alleged to have been voiced by the three provincial premiers, none of whom have anything to do with this House. It was a direct attempt to try to put the Liberal Party of Canada in this House on the record as defenders of the provincial premiers, people who have been elected by their provinces, by their electorate, for issues that are germane to their provinces. They are going to try to make the Liberal Party of Canada the defenders of those provincial interests.

As my colleague has indicated, the Liberal Party of Canada is more than prepared and willing to come to to the defence of Canadians everywhere, no matter what their stripe.

It is instructive to keep in mind that the proponents of that motion fail very selectively to indicate that at the premier's conference of February, all premiers together, with the Prime Minister of Canada—that does not include the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada who was already on the record as being very much in favour of universal access to medicare—agreed to review the medicare process in Canada. It was only after the conference that the NDP premiers came out and said: "Guess what? We did not like what transpired in that discussion. It was not to our advantage, and so we have rediscovered our support for universality of the medicare system. We do not believe in user fees. We do not believe in any kind of limitation". They sure as heck believed that when they went in and accepted that as an agenda item in that First Ministers' Conference. We were not there, but your representatives were there.

• (1250)

My colleague from St. Boniface has introduced some very important items in this debate. I wonder whether my colleague would be so good as to reiterate for the NDP movers of the motion that we are here to discuss substance, and would he please advise them what the essence of that substance might be.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for his comments and for his questions.

There are three points I want to make. If my colleagues from the NDP want to be as fair as they claim they want to be, they will acknowledge that the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada has publicly defended universality.

I would like to see one of them stand up and say it.

Second, I take serious offence with the NDP's manipulation of data, and I want to give one example with respect to Quebec. Please listen. You have one seat and I have to tell you it is going to get worse from here on in.

I want to read this into the record. This motion by the NDP has criticized Quebec, accusing it of intending to impose user fees. Is this criticism fair? I too would be concerned if the Quebec government were to proceed with the application of user fees, "but I did not pass judgment", says my colleague from Winnipeg North.

The government of Quebec's 1989 report Improving Health and the Well-being of Quebec: Orientations states: "Some of the advantages generally attributed to deterrent charges are most theoretical and this formula has major drawbacks that outweigh the advantages."

The report concludes: "Therefore, recourse to the deterrent changes cannot be an acceptable source of financing and the department favours turning to alternate sources of revenue."

If only the NDP health critic had read this report he would not be so quick to prejudge and impute ill-intention to the Quebec government. That is the blatant kind of political cynicism that is going on.

With respect to the issue, it is a very simple one. There are a number of changes that are occurring. From 1986 to 1995, $30 billion fewer dollars will be transferred for health and education. Roughly $20 billion of that was for health. That is a major problem to which the provinces need to respond in order to attempt to accommodate current realities.

I mentioned the changing demographics. We have a population that is living longer. We have more people in the seniors range. When people live longer, normally they require more health care. As they become more and more sensitive and knowledgeable as to what is available in terms of health care, they require and request better health care.

We have those various factors at play.

What is it that we need to do? Rather than trying to be petty and suggesting that someone has done something to someone else, what we need to do is come to grips with those basic problems.

How are we going to find the nurses and the doctors for the smaller and isolated areas? How are we going to provide the health care that Canadians need? That ought to be the essence of this debate.

As I said at the closing of my remarks, I would hope that the whole rest of the day would be focused upon finding solutions, rather than make petty political points because the Liberals happen to be higher in the polls than the NDP. It figured out, finally, that we are its biggest political enemy.

What silliness and insensitivity when we are talking about the health care of Canadians.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I find this an interesting debate today because it is perhaps an exercise in classic Liberalism.

The concept of making the rich pay is not new in Canada. It was first, as I recall, put forward by the Marxist-Leninist party some time ago in Canadian politics and has only recently been adopted by the Liberals in some portions.

I was interested in the previous speaker not being clear as to which of the Liberal governments have put forward proposals in a very specific way for user fees. One would have thought he might have been aware of a bill put forward by the Quebec Liberal government in bill 120, which proposes, among other things, a tax for those who can afford it on medical services received yearly or a $5 fee for every visit to a doctor, and several other practices that have to deal with the receiving of care and extra charges or user fees, as they are well known.

One would have thought if the government of Quebec had gone so far as to table a study paper on the matter and introduce proposed legislation, Bill 120, that members of the Liberal Party here in Ottawa might have been aware that it is pretty specific. That is writing it down; that is putting a document in the public domain; that is introducing legislation. That ought to be a fairly clear indication, even to them, that some of their provincial counterparts are pretty firmly on the hook for user fees.

They seem not to have read people who have gone out of their way to put on public record their positions. They seem to be rather unsure of the proposals made by Premier Frank McKenna who was quoted in the Toronto Globe & Mail on February 10, 1992. It is not a widely read Canadian newspaper. Sometimes it is referred to as a bit of a rag.

Mr. Volpe: It is a rag.

Mr. Breaugh: The member for Don Mills just reaffirmed that the Liberals seem to feel that The Globe & Mail is a rag. I will quote from The Globe & Mail of that day. Premier Frank McKenna said:

> I believe that the wealthiest of Canadians are prepared to pay some deductible for their health care in order to ensure that we can continue to provide the poorest of Canadians with universal accessible health care. I don't believe there is another nation in the world that has such an open-ended system of health care where they simply give the dollars out no matter what the amount to health care providers and recipients without asking for some modest deductible in return from those who cannot afford to pay it.

The Marxist-Lenonists used to have a much less wordy version of that: "Make the rich pay".

I would also refer to another paper which is perhaps not widely read in the Liberal caucus. It is a local paper here in Ottawa, The Ottawa Citizen. On December 30, 1991 it was quoting the premier of Newfoundland, Clyde Wells:

> "We may have to look at the whole principle of universality in our social programs and look at the extent that we might have to limit the universality. Canadians would probably be open to such changes if politicians are honest about the state of the country's finances", he said. "I do not think people would be hostile to that type of change as long as they are aware of the economic problems that we face", he said.

It seems to me that there are at least three places on record, on paper, pretty specific, in which a Liberal provincial government has indicated that it is going toward the area of user fees. It seems to me that those members, and they have now left the Chamber, seemed unsure of what their provincial counterparts had to say on the matter. We cannot impose an obligation on them to read newspapers like The Globe & Mail or The Citizen or The Montreal Gazette. If they were unsure or unable to get that kind of information through their caucus brothers and sisters, we now have attempted to provide them with that service. The Liberal Party, in at least three of our provinces, has come very clearly on record in favour of user fees.

I have heard some abuse of my good friend and colleague, Mr. Robert Rae, the premier of Ontario, and I want to rush to his defence this morning. I do not always do this, but today is the day.

I noticed the conference of the first ministers in Toronto in which the premier of Ontario was beginning to fight back against a federal government that has caused a great deal of anxiety. I want to say that it is about time that the premiers of all the provinces decided to kick the government in the shins a little bit to put on the public record just exactly what has transpired in the last decade or so concerning the transfer payments to the provinces which have a direct impact on their programs.

If people do not like it, so be it. Bob Rae, congratulations to you. Kick the government in the shins again. The government deserves it. It deserves to be a matter of great public controversy precisely whether the government has carried out its responsibilities. In my opinion, and I would suggest that it is now shared by every provincial government in the country, it has not. That ought to be a matter of great public debate and dialogue, and if the federal government does not like it, tough luck.

It has put the boots to Canadians in hospitals, providing medical care in a wide variety of circumstances across this country for long enough. It has put provincial governments and municipal governments and local hospitals at risk for long enough.

It should not be a mysterious debate about who has the best finance department. It ought to be a substantive debate about what one level of government, the federal level, has done to the provinces, the municipalities and their local hospitals by clearly reneging on its own financial responsibilities.

We will continue this debate later in the afternoon, but it will not get any softer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we rise for lunch, I would like to tell the House that I have chosen to consult with the Speaker over this lunch period. One of us will rule after Question Period.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

FATHER ROLLAND BRUNELLE

M. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, today I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Father Rolland Brunelle.

Recently Father Brunelle was made a knight of the National Order of Quebec. He was awarded this high honour by the premier of Quebec, in recognition of his exceptional contribution to the community.

This award was well deserved. Father Brunelle has dedicated his life to teaching music and for more than 50 years has passed on his love of music to hundreds of young people, some of whom have become famous musicians.

Throughout his career Father Brunelle won the admiration and respect of the community in Joliette, which expressed its appreciation by celebrating his 50th anniversary as a teacher of music last year.

Father Brunelle's contribution and his dedication to young people and the local community are examples to us all.

On behalf of the House I wish to congratulate Father Brunelle on receiving this well deserved award.

MYANMAR

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is beyond understanding that Canada still recognizes and supports the current military dictatorship in Myanmar which continues to rule by force and which has been twice rejected by Myanmar's 40 million citizens through widespread demonstrations and the ballot box.

In attempts to further delay transferring its power to the National League for Democracy, which won the 1990 general elections, the illegitimate dictatorship is waging a cruel war against Muslims and ethnic minorities, causing almost 200,000 refugees to flee to neighbouring countries. Indeed, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva issued an urgent plea for assistance, saying the situation has turned into one of the world's major refugee crises. Amnesty International has confirmed reports of widespread human rights violations, including torture, rape and killings.

I call on this government to recognize the Myanmar national coalition government as the government legally elected by the people, support UN economic sanctions and an arms embargo on Myanmar, suspend all Petro-Canada operations and to redirect all government to government and multilateral assistance to the refugees and those in legitimate need.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval–Est): Mr. Speaker, I support what was said yesterday in the House by the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie about the resumptions of negotiations between the union and Nationair in the presence of Mr. Courchesne, the mediator appointed by the Minister of Labour.

Time is of the essence, even if Mr. Nolan, the Toronto based leader of the flight attendants union who is also employed by Air Canada, has said repeatedly that closing down Nationair did not bother him at all.

It is hard to understand why a union affiliated with the QFL, whose president, Mr. Daoust, says he is very concerned about the well–being of Nationair employees, could make such inappropriate and indeed dangerous statements.

The campaign to boycott, smear and destroy Mirabel's biggest carrier most stop.

In any case, in view of QFL leader Daoust's dedication to the interests of Quebec workers, I am confident that with a show of good will on both sides, negotiations will be resumed.

It is time a settlement was reached. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie and myself are prepared to provide some form of special mediation, if necessary, to speed up the settlement of this dispute before it is too late.

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I join with others in the House today to express my sadness and that of my party and leader at the death of Barbara Frum. Ms. Frum had a long, varied and accomplished career in journalism. Throughout and until the end she brought curiosity and insight to virtually every interview and every issue she approached.

She became one of the pre–eminent journalists in our nation's history. She succeeded because she knew the issues. She made them understandable for the rest of us. She asked the questions people wanted answered and cared about how the issues touched our lives.

She accomplished all of this as a woman in what had been a very male profession. She was, is and will be for a long time, a role model and inspiration to generations of young women. If the face and character of journalism have changed in Canada, Barbara Frum was certainly at the centre of that change.

My leader said today that perhaps more than anything else, Barbara Frum was a guest we welcomed into our home every night. Her presence will be missed. The sadness we express today is a sadness I know that is shared by all Canadians.

On behalf of myself, my leader and my party, I offer our heartfelt condolences to Ms. Frum's family and her friends.

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, echoing the comments of my colleague for Kamloops, like many millions of Canadians, I am shattered by the death of Barbara Frum.

As a journalist by profession, I met Barbara and associated with her on a number of occasions. I was even honoured to be interviewed by Canada's finest woman journalist on radio's As It Happens and CBC–TVs The Journal over the years from heaven knows where.

I did not necessarily share Barbara Frum's political views, but I am one Canadian who greatly admired her objective approach to journalism and her unabashed way of questioning anybody who needed to be questioned.

Barbara's sense of values and her forthright statements of those values, which you could sense just by watching her eyes, made her one of the giants of the Canadian broadcasting industry.

Barbara Frum will be missed by her legion of Canadian fans. I know I will miss her.

S. O. 31

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, we were all saddened this morning when we woke to the news of the death of Barbara Frum at the early age of 54. She had struggled valiantly these last few years with leukaemia, heroically never letting her pain show to millions of Canadians every night.

One of Canada's greatest journalists, she was a role model and pioneer for women and set extraordinary standards of professionalism.

We first became aware of Barbara Frum's insightful interviewing skills on CBC Radio through As It Happens, as we were kept updated on Canadian public affairs.

In 1982 she left radio, breaking into CBC television with The Journal. For a decade Barbara Frum entered our homes nightly, bringing us in-depth interviews with world leaders from a Canadian perspective, as well as keeping us informed about issues affecting Canada in an ever probing way. She shall be sorely missed by family, friends and the Canadian public. Heartfelt condolences.

May her memory be blessed and may the mourners be comforted among all those who mourn in Zion and Jerusalem.

Y'hee zichron baruch. Hamakom yinachem etchem betoch shaaré tizion v'Yerushalayim.

SARNIA, ONTARIO

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton) Mr. Speaker, the April 1992 issue of Chatelaine has recently hit the news stands. Included in this issue is an article listing the top 10 towns and small cities in Canada in which to live. The article boasts that those chosen towns and cities have an irrepressible spirit, while being safe, affordable and neighbourly.

It is with great pleasure and pride that I inform all members that Sarnia, Ontario, has been included in this top 10 list. With a good regional employment rate, relatively low housing costs, an established economic base and a strong sense of community, Sarnia has always topped the list for myself, of course, and all residents of our area.

I am pleased that the magazine has acknowledged what the people of Sarnia have known for a long time. Now all Canadians will know what a great place Sarnia is to live, work and raise a family.

ENGLISH AS A SECOND LANGUAGE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the future of Canada's only national English as a Second Language organization is in jeopardy.

TESL Canada, a non-profit organization, depends largely upon grants from the federal government for funding. Seven months ago, there was a proposal submitted to the Secretary of State to continue a program entitled "Community Support and Participation Program" for the development of an ESL learners' national network.

This is the fourth year of the program. The decision to fund or not to fund is at the minister's discretion. When an official was asked whether the program would be funded, the official answered: "I do not know".

Will this government commit today to funding the ESL program? Will this government commit to the future of new Canadians? Will this government recognize the contributions of immigrants to our society?

• (1410)

Finally, will the minister ensure the survival of this important program?

DEVELOPMENT ON ABORIGINAL PEOPLES' LANDS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, speaking to members of the Canadian Club in Montreal, including 10 representatives from Hydro Quebec, Chief Billy Diamond of the Waskaghanish Cree stated that aboriginal people wanted to be partners in resource development on their lands so as to enjoy the financial benefits and limit any negative impact on the natural and human environment. He went on to say that it was necessary to set up a partnership with non-native entrepreneurs and establish a better relationship with the government so that native concerns would be given due consideration and long-term development would benefit consumers in the north as well as the south.

According to Mr. Diamond, private and public developers will start taking aboriginal people seriously when they have no other alternative.

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, today in Halifax the Minister of Veterans Affairs has finally announced that the government will introduce legislation to recognize the service in wartime of Canada's merchant mariners.

On my own behalf and on behalf of our party, and particularly the member for Regina—Lumsden who has worked on this cause for years, we applaud the announcement as far as it goes.

Regretfully, however, the announcement falls short of acceptance by the government of the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs which called for the full recognition of merchant mariners as veterans with the same status and benefits as Armed Forces veterans.

In World War II and other conflicts, Canada's merchant mariners served this country with courage and sacrifice. Finally they are getting some of the recognition they deserve. I am sure all members of this House will honour their contribution to freedom and pledge to work to see that the promised legislation fully meets the recognition to which they are fully entitled.

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a great day for Canada's merchant seamen. Just a few hours ago the Minister of Veterans Affairs announced in Halifax that Canada's wartime merchant mariners will soon be enjoying all the benefits now available to veterans of our wartime Armed Forces.

Merchant mariners do have some access to most of the programs and benefits available to other veterans, but there are significant omissions and differences that really rankle them.

New legislation will be introduced to close all the gaps. This means that long-term care will be available to the merchant navy veterans. More of them will have the opportunity to qualify for the veterans independence program. The old six-month restriction has been torpedoed, as have obstacles to disability pensions.

Ever since the end of the Second World War, merchant mariners have been fighting for veteran status. I am proud that my government is the one to do something about it and I commend this minister for making it happen.

On March 17 I told the House about my late uncle, Captain Ernest Shatford of the merchant navy. These changes have come too late for him, but I know he would be absolutely delighted that his shipmates have won their battle.

CORE AREA INITIATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Core Area Initiative Program of Winnipeg has five days left to live. It is losing funding from both the Tory federal government and the Tory provincial government. Meanwhile, Winnipeg and particularly inner city residents stand to suffer.

How can this government allow a Liberal initiative that has taught job skills to over 2,600 citizens, most of whom remain employed, to die?

As well, the core area initiative works to get young Canadians off the streets and helps revitalize the face of the inner city. Is the problem with this government lack of commitment, failure of leadership, or both? I tell this government it has only five days left to prove its worth to Winnipegers.

Give the core area initiative a new lease on life. Do not let this success story perish. It has served Winnipegers well.

Oral Questions

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in celebrating Barbara Frum's life.

She was more than the reigning queen of Canadian broadcasting. She was a case study in courage.

The first time I met Barbara Frum was in a Toronto television studio 10 years ago. We arrived at the makeup room at the same time and I was struck by her appearance. After watching her on television for so long, I was surprised to see that in person her hair was thin and her features troubled.

Only later did I learn of her battle with leukaemia, a battle which would have ended weaker lives a lot sooner. Barbara's battle, not to excel in life but simply to keep on living, was an inspiration.

I came later to meet her entrepreneurial husband, Murray, and her son, David, who has become in his own right, an outstanding journalist. The Frum family, by any standard, is exceptional and special.

This day we are sad at Barbara Frum's passing. But we are also inspired by her.

Those of us who knew her, who were challenged by her on national television, who felt her energy and her bite, know that this is not just the loss of an important journalist, it is the loss of a person who had an appetite for life. It is the loss of someone who challenged disease and death the same way she took on the politicians and that, as many of us in this House know, was with a fury.

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in expressing our appreciation on the recent announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in considering merchant seamen for veterans' benefits.

I was a member of the Standing Committee on Defence and Veterans Affairs which studied this matter. The testimony that we heard from the merchant seamen involved and those who participated on behalf of their colleagues, the merchant sailors who were involved in the world wars and particularly World War II, was commendable.

I recall, as a young boy in Newfoundland, the experiences of those involved even in the coastal trade, plus the Atlantic Canadians who were involved in very dangerous trips across the Atlantic and indeed up as far as Murmansk.

I am speaking on behalf of my party and the leader of the Liberal Party, who is delighted to see that this action has been taken by the government and that the brave action of those merchant seamen who helped us in the wars at sea and their contribution are finally being fully appreciated by the government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want this government to invest in their future. This government does not have to take my word for it, it only has to read the results of a recent survey from the hon. member for Mississauga South.

More than 70 per cent of respondents were in favour of allowing unemployed Canadians to continue to collect benefits while attending school and more than 80 per cent of the respondents were also in favour of the government spending more money to finance training programs.

It is imperative, however, that the training funds should not be taken from the unemployment insurance account. The government pulled out of its financial commitment to the account through the adoption of Bill C–21 at the beginning of this recession.

It is time for this government to get back in and show its commitment to the future of Canadian workers.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AVIATION SAFETY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and concerns the release this morning of the report on the inquiry into the Dryden crash.

I would like to say at the outset of this series of questions that I am sure all Canadians were relieved to hear Justice Moshansky say this morning that some of his concerns about aviation safety have been and are being acted upon. However, he also was clear in stating that the Air Ontario crash at Dryden did not just happen, it was allowed to happen, effectively laying at the foot of this government the death of 24 people.

This conclusion is a very serious one to which the government must respond. Will the government, in the face of this conclusion by Mr. Justice Moshansky and the grave consequences of such a fundamental mistake in the government's policy, accept its responsibility? How does the government propose to make retribution for its policy mistake?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Ottawa South, who was at the press conference this morning, knows that I have indicated that safety in the air in Canada has improved tremendously over the past decade. In 1981 there were 700 aircraft accidents in Canada. In 1991 there were 449 accidents.

We will never be satisfied until we have a zero accident rate, but I think the fact that the situation has improved by 35 per cent over a period of 10 years is an indication that our priority has been on safety.

The report we received this morning is very exhaustive and comprehensive. It contains 191 recommendations. I have indicated that since August of last year I have established an implementation team consisting of 20 persons from Transport Canada and all other segments of the aviation industry to implement these 191 recommendations.

Right now we have already completed 33 of these recommendations. We have indicated that we concur with 61 of the recommendations and action is under way, so already 49 per cent of the 191 recommendations have been implemented. Of the others, the implementation team will start work on them immediately.

• (1420)

I have taken the commitment that I will make public an interim report on the work of that team within the next six months.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, according to the inquiry made public this morning, it is clear that the air safety of the Canadian public is not a priority for this government.

I quote the Moshansky report:

> The need for increased resources within the Aviation Regulation Directorate to meet the growth and demands expected to be generated by the policy of economic regulatory reform was predicted and well documented in several reports and studies.

Since this government has not acted on the many warnings given to it, would the minister agree to set up an independent task force on air safety, which would report regularly to Parliament on the government's performance in regulating air safety?

[English]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that in 1984–85 there were 456 inspectors at Transport Canada. In 1991–92 there are 569 inspectors. This indicates, I think, that safety continues to be our prime concern.

I would point out that there were five million movements of aircraft in Canada last year. We had 449 accidents. While we are not complacent, I think this indicates that our record for safety is not diminishing, it is improving and this has been confirmed by the report of the Transportation Safety Board over the past few years.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister really misses the point here. What happened and what Justice Moshansky has reported is that what occurred in the mid-1980s in Canada was a mid-air collision between contradictory federal government policies, that of airline deregulation and deficit reduction.

I quote from the report:

> The effect of economic regulatory reform combined with deficit reduction—created a synergy that, in my opinion based on the evidence before this Commission, had an adverse impact on the effective application of safety standards."

Why did the government fail to ensure public safety in the air?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that we received from Justice Moshansky this morning a very comprehensive and thorough report containing 191 recommendations. Forty-nine per cent of these recommendations are already under way.

When Justice Moshansky tabled two interim reports earlier, action was taken on these recommendations immediately, and the safety record has been excellent because we have reduced the number of accidents in Canadian skies over the past 10 years.

The indication that Justice Moshansky himself has given is that he has confidence in the safety standards of aviation in Canada. Upon being questioned by a member of the press this morning, he reiterated that he himself has no qualms about travelling with air carriers in Canadian skies.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the words of Justice Moshansky, this accident did not happen by chance, it was allowed to happen. It could have been avoided.

As far back as 1985, the Nielsen task force report advised this government to "immediately increase the resources devoted to licensing, certification and enforcement in the regulation of air safety". Increase them.

Why did the government choose to ignore that advice, actually decrease resources and thereby jeopardize safety in the name of economic policy?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to mention that I informed the public this morning that I have no problems with the 191 recommendations contained in the report of Mr. Justice Moshansky.

I have also indicated that if this report was a decision of the court, I would have immediately asked our lawyers to file an appeal. I strenuously reject and object to the language that has been used that tends to put the blame on the thousands of men and women who have been, and still are active in Transport Canada and in the employment of air carriers.

To connote that these people may have allowed an accident to happen is sheer nonsense.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the hundreds of men and women in Transport Canada, the foot soldiers of Transport Canada are not to blame. They were the ones who came to this minister and blamed the minister and his policies for this action. That is what happened.

Justice Moshansky said very clearly this morning that deregulation in air transportation came into play with an inconsistent government policy of fiscal restraint. Those are his words.

The Deputy Prime Minister received warnings from within Transport Canada, the foot soldiers we are speaking of, that safety was being compromised under deregulation. He got the advice. He refused the advice. The Deputy Prime Minister owes Canadians an explanation.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in his statement this morning, Justice Moshansky said in part: "After more than two years of intensive investigation and public hearings, I have concluded that this accident did not just happen by chance. It was allowed to happen". Later on, he said: "thereby abetting the carriers' permissive, corporate attitude".

I think this is lacking in justice to these thousands of men and women who are still active in the aviation system in Canada or who have previously been active. They are dedicated persons who contribute all their efforts to make the sky over Canada as safe as it is. There were five million movements of aircraft last year, we had 449 accidents, which is a 35 per cent improvement over 1981.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, five different Ministers of Transport have stood up in their places in this House and said: "When it comes to economic deregulation, safety will not be compromised".

Justice Moshansky, in the report that he released this morning, pointed out how very hollow those words were. A succession of staff reports, as far back as 1984 and then continuing past the white paper The Freedom to Move warned the Minister of Transport of the dangers of deregulation as it relates to safety. A number of times in this House members rose to point the same thing out to the Minister of Transport.

Knowing all of this, why did the government not change things so that the Dryden crash could have been prevented?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I will repeat for my friend across the aisle that the number of inspectors in 1984–85 was 456. In 1991–92 it is 569.

This is a clear indication that we have not reduced our preoccupation with safety, resulting in 35 per cent fewer accidents last year than in 1981. This is an indication that we have not relaxed our preoccupation with safety.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister is quite committed to quoting figures in his answers today. Let me quote back to him Transport Canada's estimates for 1992–93 which on page 240, dealing with aviation regulation client base and aviation regulation workload, the graph shows a flat line between 1988–89 and 1992–93 for inspections done by his staff on air carriers.

• (1430)

If his own estimates show no change in the number of inspections and yet he says there are more inspectors, I want to ask the minister what has he got them doing? They certainly are not out there inspecting any more than they were five years ago.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the record stands for itself. We had 700 accidents in 1981 when the movement of aircraft was much lower than today. Last year with five million movements of aircraft in Canada we had 449 accidents.

This is no consolation for the people who have been involved, but this is definitely an improvement of 35 per cent which indicates that we have continued to be very much preoccupied by safety in the sky. Again, proof that the Canadian sky is safe is the fact that Mr. Justice Moshansky has said today that he has no qualms using the Canadian carriers.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, as the minister just repeated in the House, he said this morning at his press conference: "I can assure Canadians that Canada's aviation system is safe". That is basically the same kind of language that his four predecessors used in this House as far back as 1984.

What proof can he give to the Canadian public, other than numbers of inspectors, that it really is safer out there, that every time people get on a plane, they will get off again at their destination?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Again, I repeat that there are fewer accidents. In 1991 there were fewer accidents with five million movements of aircraft. We had a reduction over the 10-year period of 35 per cent in the accident record. That by itself is an indication that the sky in Canada is safe and that we are still and always will be committed to safety. The prime objective of Transport Canada is to keep the sky of Canada as safe as possible.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In December 1985, the then-Deputy Prime Minister unequivocally promised in this House that he would strengthen air safety. Today, in a very damning report, Judge Moshansky says on page 887 that the senior management of Transport Canada was effectively paralyzed by the government. The Deputy Prime Minister's own credibility is at stake. Can he tell us why he did not keep his word?

[English]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we know that the opposition party has always been very much against deregulation as it has been against so many other things that this government has done to improve the situation in Canada.

I repeat again that the record of the aviation industry in Canada over the past 10 years has shown an improvement of 35 per cent in the accident rate despite an additional number of movements. There were five million movements in 1991 with 449 accidents compared to 700 accidents in 1981. This is a clear demonstration that deregulation has not impaired the safety of the Canadian sky.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Obviously the Minister of Transport is trying today to cover up the mistakes made by the Conservative government when it deregulated. It is easy for him to say that the opposition opposed it at the time. He is right: both opposition parties opposed it, as well as the Canadian Pilots Association and the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association. The only one in step was the then Minister of Transport, and we know the consequences today. One thing is very clear: a many-page report directly condemns the government for this incident. Twenty-four people died because the necessary action was not taken. The government did not provide the Department of Transport with the funds required to have the air safety controls that the minister at the time had promised but did not deliver.

Will the minister at least have the decency in this House to admit some responsibility for what happened in the Dryden accident?

[English]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice Moshansky says in his statement today:

"Rarely are aviation accidents the result of a single cause. Modern air transportation is a complex enterprise. Similarly complex are the causes of aircraft accidents. This was certainly the case with the crash of the Air Ontario F-28 jet at Dryden".

He has made 191 recommendations. We have already started to act on 49 per cent of those recommendations. I have put in place an implementation team to make sure we have all the recommendations adhered to within the next six months.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The facts from the government's own department and agencies clearly demonstrate that the government's deregulation policy has compromised air safety.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, given the dramatic increase of aircraft movements following deregulation and the fact that the number of near-misses over airports since 1985 have increased over 300 per cent, why did this government freeze the number of air traffic controllers in 1985, resulting in 400 fewer controllers than are needed today to establish bare minimum safety levels? What kind of safety standards and safety planning is that?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transport has had a program in existence for three years to increase the number of air traffic controllers to cope with the increase in traffic that we have experienced over the last three years.

By the beginning of 1994 we will have in place the full number of air traffic controllers needed so that the present air controllers will have less overtime.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Deregulation resulted in more aircraft movements carrying more passengers at virtually every Canadian airport.

I ask the minister why it is that his director of air safety and standards division today confirmed for me that there are only 31 commercial aircraft inspectors in operation for the entire country today, when a secret document from the Department of Transport three years ago, for that period suggested that they at least needed 44 inspectors, never mind the needs of today.

When is this minister and this government going to place public safety before Conservative ideology?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to hear the member mention all these increases in the number of passengers and aircraft.

I can say that there were 3.677 million hours of flying in Canada last year, 5 million movements and 66 million emplanements and disembarkments. This indicates that deregulation has worked well for the public. It is further enhanced by the fact that we have a 35 per cent decrease in the number of accidents over that same period.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first of all it is very clear from the minister's failure to respond to this report that he has no option but to resign. However, my question has to do with another report which was filed today. My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

• (1440)

The Citizens' Inquiry into Peace and Security has published its report today. The report comes after hundreds of presentations from people all across Canada from all walks of life. It calls for a complete transformation of international and foreign policy for this country.

Will the government respond to what is being described as a tremendous desire on the part of the Canadian people to at least play a part in formulating Canada's policy in this area and establish a full public comprehensive study of foreign and defence policy in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will refer the hon. member's representation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing that there is no minister directly responsible. I will come back again to the Deputy Prime Minister and ask this question.

As I said, the report calls for a complete transformation of our understanding of security so that it is more than just military security, but also environmental, political, economic and social security.

Will the government accept the fundamental recommendation of this report and agree that our foreign policy in this country needs transformation now that the cold war is finally over?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, without responding directly to this report which has just been filed I can assure my hon. friend, as I indicated in the House last week and at committee yesterday, that I have asked the director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to undertake a complete review as to Canada's security to make sure in the context of all of the changes that have taken place that our priorities are right and our resources are in the right places.

The government is aware of that aspect of my hon. friend's question. I do agree that there is an aspect of it that is within the purview of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the Deputy Prime Minister indicated, she will be addressing that report when she returns to the House.

AVIATION SAFETY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have observed Question Period very carefully. I am appalled by the reaction of the government.

Here we have a report to the effect that the Minister of Transport of the day put ideology ahead of security and people died in a plane accident in Dryden. There is a tradition in this House that when an independent inquiry blames a minister for his bad judgment he is to accept responsibility in this House.

I would like to know from the Deputy Prime Minister who was the then Minister of Transport: Does he accept the blame put forward by the judge today?

An hon. member: He is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition has put a question to a former minister. That is out of order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition may put the question again to the minister.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am asking a question of the leader of the government in the House today, the Deputy Prime Minister. When the government is blamed in a report like that, we need an answer from the government.

It so happens that the Deputy Prime Minister is the former Minister of Transport, but he is still the Deputy Prime Minister and the one who speaks for this government in this House today.

I want to know if this government will accept its responsibility and as the minister who was responsible for that disaster to face its—

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition it is still out of order. The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to know the impact of deregulation I suggest that the government speak to the regions of the country. In northern Ontario services have been cut, funding for airports has been reduced and, most important, safety has been allowed to be compromised.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport: How many more Drydens will it take before the government wakes up to the reality that public safety in this country has been sacrificed at the altar of deregulation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the member must have been writing his question rather than listening to the questions that were asked before his turn came about.

I have clearly indicated that in 1981 there were 700 accidents with less aircraft movements. In 1991 there were 449 accidents with five million aircraft movements in this country and over three million hours of flight.

This is an indication that we have improved the safety record in the skies over Canada during that period. This demonstrates very clearly that deregulation has not impaired the safety record of Canada, which is second to none.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the families of the 24 victims of the Dryden crash will be comforted by the minister's lack of commitment to safety in the airline industry.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The problem now is that that kind of preamble is going to create disorder. It is not an easy subject, and I think that in keeping with the decorum of this place questions do not have to impute the character or motives of the minister.

The hon. member has plenty of room to ask questions and I ask him to put his question appropriately.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I can understand—

Mr. McCreath: Why don't you just tell him to get out of the gutter?

Mr. Speaker: The comment that the Chair just heard is not helpful either.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, if the member opposite had seen the air crash and been there as I was, he may think a little differently about his comments.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member, who obviously has a very intense and appropriate interest in this, would put his question.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I do have a question for the minister.

Some 19 months after the Dryden crash, the Dryden airport lost its full-time fire-fighting service. A report issued three years before the crash stated that north-western Ontario was a dangerous flying zone and the accident rate in this area was higher than the national average.

I put this question to the minister. Will the minister assure this House today that Justice Moshansky's recommendations dealing with the Dryden municipal airport's crash, fire-fighting and rescue services will be implemented immediately?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, in August 1991 I established an implementation team consisting of over 20 persons from within Transport Canada, the employers, the associations and the labour unions, to prepare a program to implement the recommendations.

We have already acted on 49 per cent of these recommendations. The implementation team will be working on all the recommendations. I have taken the stand that I will be making public a report within six months of what exactly the implementation team has done from today until that time.

MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the government had a chance to show leadership by getting people back to work in this country by launching a broad program to upgrade infrastructure across Canada. Instead the Minister of Finance spent his time insulting people.

Why did this government not act to achieve the 63,000 new jobs that a municipal infrastructure program would bring? Why will it not close tax loopholes and use that money to increase our infrastructure and put people back to work?

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the meeting that was held over the past two days among first ministers was a very productive meeting.

There were a number of topics covered including the issues of infrastructure, training, international trade, interprovincial trade, agriculture and fisheries. All sectors are experiencing difficulty.

I think that the communiqué or the decisions that were issued which form part of the communiqué clearly indicate that infrastructure is a priority, particularly highway infrastructure. I invite the hon. member to read the decision that was taken with respect to highway infrastructure, a national highways policy, and I think he will be encouraged by that.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact there was no new money committed by this government to the program which the Federation of Canadian Municipalities suggested of $1.5 billion a year, something that would have put 63,000 people back to work. I say to the government that that is shameful.

I want to ask not just about the infrastructure program but about transfer payments too. Why will this government not simply admit that it is wrong to pay only 31 per cent of the cost of the Canada Assistance Program for the province of Ontario when it promised to pay 50 per cent of those costs? Why will the government not pay its share for the cost of the recession which it created?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, transfer payments to the province of Ontario have risen at an annual rate of 6.2 per cent per year since 1984–85. That is an increase of over 60 per cent since 1984–85, a total of $10 billion out of the $39 billion that will be provided to the provinces in fiscal transfers and in tax transfers.

The premier of Ontario wants us either to tax more or drive up the deficit. He even went as far as saying that he might want to take a bit away from the have not provinces in the form of equalization payments.

DRYDEN AIR CRASH

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the Dryden air crash.

When the Deputy Prime Minister was Minister of Transport, he stated in this House on January 30, 1986 that safety was the number one priority with regard to air safety. Again on the issue of air safety, on June 27, 1986 the Deputy Prime Minister who was the Minister of Transport at the time said, and I quote: "Neither are we prepared to sacrifice safety, nor shall we".

My question for the government is this: Why did the Deputy Prime Minister mislead Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member has set up a preamble and then put a question: "Why did the Deputy Prime Minister mislead Canadians?"

The hon. member may want to say: Why did he inadvertently mislead Canadians, but the way the question was put I think it is a straight allegation that whatever he was doing must have been pretty well intentional.

I would ask the hon. member who knows that we cannot accept that to consider his position and put a question which I can accept.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the government was negligent at the time. The minister assured this House and assured Canadians that it was safe to travel the skies, to take aeroplane rides in this country. We now know, through the work of a royal commission and through the words of a Supreme Court judge, that this accident was allowed to happen. Someone had to allow this accident to happen.

Surely the issue is one of responsibility. This government and that minister must take responsibility for the fact that 24 people were killed in an airline crash at Dryden in 1989. Will the minister accept responsibility on the part—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I think the questions are moving rapidly out of order. I am going on to the next question.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the First Ministers' Conference on the economy reached little agreement on any questions of substance, and that at the very time the United States and Mexico are marshalling all their resources to take advantage of North American free trade.

In place of the so-called prosperity agenda that this government launched, what is this government prepared to do to help Canadians meet the competitive challenges of freer trade? Why must it take three more years to achieve freer trade even among our own provinces?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have to respond to both the preamble and the question.

The government has done a number of things to help companies become more competitive. Five items in the recent budget of the Minister of Finance are directly related to improving the competitiveness of Canadian companies. Just before Christmas there was a package of announcements that helped the trucking industry meet the competitive challenges it is facing. Those are two examples that provide in a very fundamental way assistance to Canadian companies to become more competitive.

My hon. friend asks about the interprovincial trade barriers. As far as I am concerned I would like to see those dealt with right away, but they are barriers that are established by the provinces. We have taken the initiative as the federal government in pushing the process along. We have set a timetable. We have set specific elements in the timetable, and we are committed to reaching that objective at the earliest date possible but no later than 1995.

But it is up to the provinces to make the changes in their legislation because it is their legislation which is imposing the barriers.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, it is not sufficient for this government to forgo its responsibility for interprovincial trade barriers. It knows it can provide leadership and it lamentably failed to do so yesterday.

It is not only in that area it failed to act. There was no immediate commitment at the conference yesterday to adjustment assistance or to job retraining.

Can the minister explain what retraining and adjustment programs the government plans to offer in the event of a North American free trade agreement? How will they be strengthened and co-ordinated with the provinces? What is this government doing?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is talking about when he says that we did not provide leadership.

The federal government is calling the meetings. The federal government is establishing the timetable. We set the objective of 1995. We are forcing the issue. If my hon. friend has any other ideas as to how we can provide more leadership than that, let him say so, but let us just forget the loose rhetoric.

As far as his particular question on adjustment, there was a discussion at the meeting yesterday on adjustment, as I understand, and there is an agreement on the part of the provinces and the federal government to look at the over 400 programs of adjustment provided by the federal and provincial governments.

As far as the federal government is concerned, we have made some significant movements in increasing the level of training as a result of Bill C-21, which his side delayed for a full year. That is increasing the amount of funding for training by $750 million. That is a major contribution to helping people train and retrain in response to the changing economic circumstances.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of energy.

The Atomic Energy Commission has been negotiating for many months now for the prototype development of the CANDU III reactor and the establishment of a centre for nuclear excellence in Canada to manufacture and market that reactor around the world.

Most of those negotiations for years have been going on with New Brunswick and suddenly last year a deal was struck with Saskatchewan. That province has withdrawn and I read in the Canadian press earlier this week that a deal is now being negotiated with Alberta.

I would like to ask the minister how many suitors are in line for this development. What is the status of the matter at this time?

• (1500)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first of all regarding the Saskatchewan deal, the point to be made is that the deal expired on March 20. I will be meeting with Saskatchewan representatives on March 31. If they want to reverse the decision they have announced prior, I will be willing to hear that from them. We will wait for any further decisions on Saskatchewan until I have that meeting.

Regarding the Alberta situation, I was as surprised as anyone to read what was happening. I have informed AECL that it is not to follow the relationship with Alberta as it was doing the last number of days. I think that relationship has now ended.

Third, in respect to New Brunswick, the member is right, we have been dealing with New Brunswick a long time and remain open with New Brunswick to see if we can conclude a deal on Candu III.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday, as the minister will know, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources threw Canada's strategic energy industry wide open to American ownership and control. At the time, the parliamentary secretary to the energy minister said that this had "nothing at all to do with" the North American free trade agreement.

This government gave up one of Canada's last levers of control over our own energy industry and got nothing in return for this astounding sell out. What else does the government plan to give away in the great Canadian fire sale; softwood lumber, water, medicare, the north?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, how about the member for Edmonton East?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: They wouldn't take him.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I responded to that question yesterday, but I will do so again.

The decision that was announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday is related to the specific condition of the energy industry in Canada which I think my hon. friend is well aware of. If he is not, he should be. The rules that have been in place have resulted in an evaluation of assets in the hands of Canadian firms that is less than the evaluation of assets in the hands of other firms. This is to put the oil and gas industry on the same basis as other industries, such as the manufacturing sector.

My hon. friend, if he was in the House yesterday, would have heard me comment on the relationship between this and the NAFTA. In my judgment there is no relationship here. It would not have resulted in any negotiating leverage, as is suggested by my friend.

TRADE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

In reference to the FTA adjustment programs, the Prime Minister said: "We shall ensure that innovative and generous adjustment and retraining programs will be introduced whenever required".

With Canada now on the verge of an important trade deal with the United States of America and Mexico, is the minister willing to immediately introduce to this House the adjustment programs which were promised during the last federal election campaign?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend I am sure will realize that flowing from the Prime Minister's comments there is a commission headed by Jean de Grandpré which was designed to review the adjustment programs of the Government of Canada and make recommendations. That commission had representatives of business and labour on it. One of the key recommendations was to increase the amount of training programs to make it easier for individuals to move from one occupation to another.

As I said in response to his colleague, that has been done. We have increased that amount by $750 million. It would have come into place faster except his party held up the legislation for one full year.

Mr. Speaker: I will come to the hon. member in a moment. There may be several points of order. I know the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition wishes to raise a matter and I will hear him and I will hear the hon. member for York South—Weston.

I have to announce as follows. Since today is the final allotted day for the supply period ending March 26, 1992, the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of supply bills.

In view of recent practices, do hon. members agree that these bills be distributed now?

Point of Order

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, prior to me putting my usual business question, I seek the guidance of the Chair.

The Leader of the Opposition as well as my colleague from York South—Weston asked a question of the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as the leader of the government on the floor of the House of Commons.

Statements were referred to regarding comments made by the Deputy Prime Minister in his previous incarnation on the floor of the House of Commons.

The questions that were asked of the Deputy Prime Minister, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, and I seek your guidance, were made to that minister in his capacity as the leader of the government asking as to whether or not this government assumes responsibilities for a very, very serious report with regard to the Dryden air disaster.

I seek the assistance of the Chair to indicate as to why the Chair was so quick to rule those questions out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Let me respond to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

I do not know that I was that quick. I was listening pretty carefully. Second, the thrust of the questions as I remember them—I do not have the "blues" in front of me—was basically directed at a former minister as to whatever capacity they may have been asked now as to whether or not that former minister ought to do something, for instance, resign.

It can be argued, I suppose, that there is a fine line here, but that is the way I ruled at that time and I guess we are stuck with the ruling. I cannot undo it.

I will look very carefully at the exchange and I will see if I can assist members. The hon. member has asked why. There is the reason. When I look at everything that was said, perhaps his question will seem very pointed indeed.

I am just saying that at the time that was my impression of the situation and that was my ruling.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, I think has another matter to raise before we get into the usual question which arises out of another argument that took place this morning on a procedural point.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, with regard to my questions during Question Period, you ruled both of my questions out of order.

The first question was ruled out of order, not on the basis that it was directed at the wrong minister but on the basis that I was accusing the minister of deliberately misleading Canadians. I did not say that.

In my question, I asked the government why Canadians were misled when the former transport minister assured Canadians that safety was the number one priority.

A judge of the Supreme Court of Alberta has now concluded that this accident "was allowed to happen but there was some responsibility on the part of this government". It seems to me that it was an appropriate question to ask.

There was no suggestion that the minister deliberately misled the House on numerous occasions in 1985, 1986 or 1987, but the facts now bear out that contention that in fact the minister did mislead the House. Safety was not the number one priority of this government at the time. Restraint was.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I must object to going on and on, repeating into the record that misinformation and so on.

The hon. member stood up and quoted remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister when he was formerly the Minister of Transport and then asked why the minister misled the House and misled Canadians. In other words, he implied that what he was saying was false and then said: "Will he resign?"

• (1510)

Citation 367 of Beauchesne's is very clear, very straightforward. "A question may not be asked of a former minister seeking information with regard to transactions during his term of office".

The question was out of order, quite properly decided so by the Speaker. I do not think this should be as an opportunity to repeat accusations by way of this point of order which was ruled out of order in the first place and ought not to have been asked by someone who respects the traditions of this House.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I know you have made your ruling and I accept your ruling. You were going to reflect, check the "blues", examine Hansard, perhaps check the tape.

I just want to clarify for the Chair that the Leader of the Opposition did not ask for the resignation of any minister involved in the process. In fact the Leader of the Opposition asked as to whether or not the Deputy Prime Minister would assume responsibility on behalf of the Government of Canada, which I suggest to the Chair is quite a distinction in terms of what the government House leader has just said to my colleague for York South—Weston. There is a major distinction.

I do not think it inappropriate that colleagues on this side of the House, when ruled out of order by the Chair, rightly or wrongly, however one wishes to perceive that, should have an opportunity to ask questions of the Chair so that they can clarify any misunderstandings or interpretations that they may have of the rules of this House in order to preclude another opportunity in the very near future to ask a question which might be out of order.

That is the intent of the hon. member. I find it rather disconcerting that the government House leader would stand in his place and try to dictate the policy which the Chair should follow and indeed what this House should follow.

Mr. Speaker: Let everybody back up for a few moments. Much of this Question Period has been taken up with what amounts to a national tragedy. As a consequence, some very tough questions have been asked. Some answers have been given. We have had a bit of a procedural disagreement as to whether or not some questions should have been allowed or should not have been allowed.

I do not think it is in keeping with the gravity and sadness of the issue to carry on now and get into a long procedural debate about what the "blues" may or may not show.

I am trying to co-operate with all sides on this matter. I will look at and consider it. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond does accept my ruling and does realize that once having made the ruling, that is where we are.

I have not been adverse to hearing members from time to time if it is helpful in asking for some clarification. Perhaps I can do that. I think we should let this go for now and accept the fact that I will look at it and discuss it further with members.

I am concerned about one other matter. Several perhaps. One, there was an argument about noon with respect to an amendment. I would not ordinarily do this because the argument was pretty well closed off. If the hon. opposition House leader wishes to address me shortly on it, I will hear it. Then I will have to go and make up my mind. I have already done some consideration. If the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond wishes to do that, I will hear him briefly.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if I might just pose a business question and then give you a brief intervention with regard to the admissibility of the amendment. Perhaps the hon. government House leader could indicate to the House the business for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and the remaining part of the week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the government will call Bill C-21, debt servicing and reduction, for debate at report stage. On Monday, we hopefully will be able to complete the debate on Bill C-21.

On Tuesday, it is my intention at this point in time to call an allotted day. I will confirm that on Monday. In terms of business for the rest of the week, I would like to use the usual channels and discuss with the opposition House leaders the business for the remainder of next week.

ADMISSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, briefly, there was some discussion earlier this day with regard to the admissibility of the amendment which was put forward by my colleague which reads in part:

Point of Order

That the motion be amended by deleting the period and adding the following:

—and implemented by the actions of the NDP premiers of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia to close health care centres, dismiss health care personnel, reduce health care services, all of which is a direct, inevitable result of the withdrawal of the federal government from its long-standing obligations to support health care in Canada.

Standing Order 81, subsection (11) says:

Opposition motions on allotted days may be moved only by Members in opposition to the government and may relate to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and also may be used for the purposes of considering reports from standing committees relating to the consideration of estimates therein.

I suggest that this particular Standing Order 81(11) is as wide as possible but it would prevent an allotted day on a purely provincial matter such as rural drainage, municipal infrastructure or anything of that nature.

However, in our system of complex intergovernmental relations, particularly on the subject of health care, where there is assured jurisdiction both provincially and federally, I would think that for the purposes of Standing Order 81(11), any motion put under this standing order must fall inherently within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Any matter that does not fall within the federal jurisdiction cannot, under this standing order, be put to the House.

If Your Honour reads the amendment, it refers, of course, to provincial jurisdictions. I make no mistake of that. But it also refers very clearly and unequivocally to the withdrawal of the federal government from its long-standing obligations to support health care in Canada.

Just because the withdrawal of federal government is nowhere mentioned in the main motion but is mentioned in the amendment, should not preclude us as an opposition party from submitting that amendment.

I would suggest that if logic is to follow and Your Honour were to find, based on the grounds that this particular amendment is beyond the scope of Standing Order 81(11) because it is not within the federal jurisdiction, you would logically have to find that the motion itself is inadmissible. Therefore, the main motion would be ruled out of order.

I think that in the fitness of time, so to speak, when the Chair looks at the amendment and looks at the main motion you will see quite clearly that the subject matter we are debating is in perfect order. It is in keeping with the main motion with the exception of the words "withdrawing of federal government support".

I suggest that after a close examination of Standing Order 81(11), if one were to include the words "federal government" it is quite appropriate, thereby making the amendment an appropriate amendment in which this House should have the opportunity to give an adjudication whatever their beliefs may be.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should give the House notice. This matter was very thoroughly debated this morning. Out of courtesy, because I was not in the chair and I will have to make the ruling, I have indicated that I would hear further argument briefly.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I will make my comments very brief. I appreciate that we did have a discussion earlier on the appropriateness of the amendment. I want to make two points to my hon. friend, the government House leader who made a valiant effort to suggest it ought to be in order.

When the Chair looks at the amendment it refers specifically to New Democrat provincial governments. The main motion refers explicitly to Liberal governments. Under the rule of relevancy, Mr. Speaker, if you were to support the amendment, the discussion and debate in the House would have to be focused on the amendment exclusively. In other words, the discussion would have to focus around the activities of New Democrat provincial governments, which would be in direct contradiction to the thrust of the motion.

Mr. Speaker, obviously in your position, the rule of relevancy is enforced and I know my hon. friend, who is going to replace you shortly, always enforces the rule of relevancy. It would be impossible to do that under the amendment being proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: I am getting mixed signals from the loyal opposition. The hon. House leader.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there is only one Official Opposition in this House, if I might remind the Chair. I suggest to the Chair that my hon. friend from the left has made his point.

He talked about relevancy. The issue and the test ought to be, that if one is so certain of the substantive part of the case, the case ought to be made in order to give the test which has been drawn to the attention of the House, so that all members will then be in a position to make a final adjudication on the floor of this House.

To suggest, because one provincial government versus another provincial government is irrelevant and ought not to be put to the House is in my view backing off the debate and being very afraid to put the case before this House.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, you mentioned that this was debated earlier. I was here through the whole morning, through the entire debate. Madam Speaker raised this but she did not allow any debate on the floor.

I went with the mover of the amendment to one of your advisers and we had a brief discussion. I used to give your adviser the same arguments as our House leader made and that is why I will not take the time of the House to repeat them.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I may have received some gross misinformation. I thought that there was quite a number of members up on this matter. The hon. member has indicated that there was not. I am puzzled.

Mr. Flis: It is my error, Mr. Speaker. I understand there were brief interventions but the Speaker reserved to rule on it.

My argument to your adviser was that if the amendment is out of order, then the motion would also have to be ruled out of order because it is dealing with provincial matters, not the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can take the matter away and look at it carefully. I will come back as soon as I can. I thank hon. members for their interventions.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Karpoff (p. 8826).

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I believe I had something like 13 minutes left for my remarks.

I want to begin with a little bit of history which I think is important. Medicare began in this country in one of the poorest of our provinces in the middle of very depressed economic conditions by a government that did not represent a large population.

It is important to take it back to those roots. It clarifies something which is vital to understanding what medicare is all about. Medicare is not free medical care for anybody. Medicare is about the co-operative movement. It is about people bonding together to provide for themselves as a group those things which they really could not accomplish as individuals.

I watched Canada AM this morning. I saw a very prominent Canadian physician talk about free medical care. That is wrong. There is no free medical care in Canada that I know of. You and I, Mr. Speaker, all of us in Canada pay for our own medical care through our taxation process. It is a co-operative movement. It is not about getting something for nothing. It is about sharing all of our resources collectively to provide for a common need: medical care.

Until about 1977 there was an agreement in force between our provinces and the federal government that the cost of his particular program would be shared evenly between the provinces and the federal government on a roughly a 50 / 50 basis.

I happen to have been the health critic for the New Democratic Party in the Ontario legislature at the time when block funding was introduced. At that time many of us had a concern that centred around that shared cost.

There were many advantages, I suppose, to block funding, to changing the funding formulas. They became more complicated. Supposedly they provided more flexibility, but the one thing that concerned many of us was that it would take away that basic share, that simple straightforward notion that the provinces and the federal government would be equal participants in medicare.

That, of course, has turned out to be the truth. The shift has been downward. One can argue and of course many will that more dollars go to some provinces than others, that more dollars go now and the percentages may be less, but the truth is that most of our provinces are well below the shared equal funding technique that was used in 1977. Most of them have dropped to somewhere in the low to mid-thirties as a percentage of the funding for medicare that they get in their province.

In a place like Ontario, or Quebec, or any of our industrialized provinces that are very hard hit by this depression, there is an immense cash flow problem at the moment. It has put traumatic squeezes on a number of things, and one of them is medicare.

As a critic who had an opportunity in the 1970s to go around and look at hospital and health care in Ontario—and many people here have had the same opportunity—as you go across Canada you will see some magnificent concepts in providing medical care. You will see some of the world's finest technology. You will see some of the world's finest practitioners. You will see some of the greatest facilities we have ever been able to conceive in terms of providing medical care in place. You will also see some of the problems that people talk about, hospitals across the road from one another that do not even talk to one another, let alone co-ordinate the care that they provide as new technology comes into the field of health care.

Vast expenditures of money are needed now that were not even conceived of 20 or 30 years ago. We have equipment that costs $1 million or $2 million just in capital costs to get the equipment in place. Then of course one facility wants to have exactly the same kinds of equipment as the facility across the road, and across Canada.

Many people have tried their best to co-ordinate the provision of health care services, to provide district health councils, to look at community health care clinics, to look at health care centres, to provide for prevention, to look at a number of ways in which one could be more cost effective in the providing of medical care for our citizens.

It is not an easy task and there are those who work in the health care field across Canada who have been aware of this for many years now and have been trying to improve the use of tax dollars. They know it is difficult. There are a number of vested interests at work that have key decision-making positions.

I am often reminded that in many of our urban centres with high-tech facilities, downtown Toronto being an example, some days you will find the world's finest physicians practising medicine, with great technology and great care, and great back-up teams.

Other days you will find virtually no physicians at work in that hospital facility and the care is provided by nurses, technicians and other people who have been given special kinds of training on special kinds of equipment.

The nature of the provision of medical care has changed a lot in the last two decades, and it is about to change a good deal more. Provincial governments all across Canada are struggling now to turn the provision of health care into something that is non-traditional.

In many parts of the country others who were the first people into the medical care system struggle, for example, midwives across Canada—even though it seems that the giving of birth is something that has been around for a long time, and midwifery as a profession has been around for a long time—have not been recognized for very long. In the giving of birth there is a range of facilities available, from midwives in the home to very high-tech units in urban centres.

We try to match up how we get people from rural areas or the far north for example into these high-tech centres and provide transportation systems that are useful. That is not an easy thing to do but I am aware that people are trying to do that. The unfortunate thing is to introduce a cost squeeze in the middle of this or to divert the argument into something like user fees as being a solution is unfortunate.

• (1530)

Now these are not new notions. They have been around for some time. For example, in many parts of Canada we have looked south of the border and we have said: "We are not going to establish some new technology in the provision of care for the human heart, when somewhere across the border there is a similar institution that has all of the equipment and personnel now.

Why don't we send our people down there?" We have tried that.

One of the lessons we have learned is that in the United States health care is a business, as opposed to Canada where it is something other than a business. But in the United States, the first motive driving the health care system is making money. The Americans accept that; Canadians do not.

In Canada, if a doctor challenges the right or the ability of a patient to pay for health care at the door of the hospital, there is quite a fuss about that. Every once in a while an incident of this kind happens. There is quite a fuss because Canada is a place where supposedly, you cannot be denied care simply because someone has challenged your ability to pay. That is news in Canada. That is not news in the United States. In the United States that is daily practice at almost every hospital, because almost every hospital is not a public facility but rather a private business. So there are distinctions to be made.

For a long while in Canada we used to say: "Well, in some fields we simply do not have the facilities". An example of this would be in matters of addiction, drug addiction in particular. "Why don't we use some of those wonderful facilities we hear about in the United States and send our people down there?"

We soon find out about the business part of health care in the United States. We soon find out that there is absolutely no accountability in the process at all. If an American hospital is offered an unending amount of money, it will take the unending amount of money. No question about it. And the provision of care is the second consideration, not the first.

We have learned some hard lessons. In many of our provincial governments and in many of our local hospitals we are now going through the long tough grind of trying to provide reasonable, rational health care for our citizens. That is not an easy task.

If there was a simple solution to this it would have been thought of long ago. There is one thing that is just beginning to dawn. This whole concept is just beginning to come back to people like myself, the politicians in Canada. That is that there is very little we can do in Canada that does not sooner or later wind up at the door of a hospital, at a medicare facility. Now we do not think of that very often, but it is true.

I was reminded a little while ago when we embarked upon great campaigns informing people about AIDS and about the use of drugs of exactly how many people die in this country because of those compared to the number of people who die in this country because of accidents on our highways. It is dramatic.

Now all of us would tend to say: "Oh yes, the use of drugs. That is directly respondent to a medical care system". But the connection between the number of people who die on our highways and in hospitals is made most dramatically by those people who are involved in the accidents, and not thought of often by those who are not.

Workers who die in the workplace because of the conditions there are not always thought of as being a medicare matter. It is sometimes considered to be workers' rights or occupational health and safety. Occasionally environmental considerations come into it. But when workers get sick because of the place where they earn their living, the second place they go to is the hospital, the medical care system.

We had a committee on child poverty. They began to talk a little bit about how sensible it is to take a young mother with poor nutrition habits, who has a child within her, and refuse to feed her before the child is born. At a certain point in time, people say that a child is an expense and when the child is born we will know how to cope with that expense. But until the child is born we do not recognize that and we are not prepared to deal with that. Even a hard-headed business person ought to be able to recognize the cost effectiveness of seeing that the mother and child are fed properly as opposed to not doing that and then dealing with the medical ramifications for the rest of the child's life. Those of us who have been teachers have seen that in our schools. Those of us who have been social workers have seen that on our streets.

The ramifications of almost all that we do in our society come back to our medical care system. That is a tragedy that has not been dealt with. One should look at the hard-headed economics of this. I suspect the government of the day wants only to look at the economics of it but look at the long-term economics of it. Look at the cost to Canada, the cost to our taxpayers. Look at the cost to our citizens of not providing decent health care, a rationalized system, but as good as we can for the dollars that we have. That is what is missing today.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the comments made by the previous speaker especially because of his experience in the provincial legislature before coming to this House.

When I heard that this was the debate this morning, I called the hospitals in my riding, St. Joseph's Health Centre, the Queen Elizabeth Hospital and the Runnymede Chronic Care Hospital, which serves my riding, the west end of Toronto, and a bit of Etobicoke. The complaint that I hear most often from the hospitals is that the costs of running a hospital have gone up drastically. This is through no fault of the hospitals.

As an example, they tell me of the increase in UI payments that the hospitals have to make, in workmen's compensation payments, the OHIP costs and the pay equity costs. These are all additional costs that have been brought in by the federal government with the UI increase and by the provincial governments with the pay equity. That total varies from hospital to hospital, but the increases have gone up as much as 15 per cent and more.

Now they tell me that what the government, the provincial NDP government, is giving the hospitals is a one per cent increase. Now how can a hospital operate when two higher levels of government have laid on a 15 per cent increase in operating a hospital and the NDP government comes along and gives a one per cent increase.

With the hon. member's experience here and in the provincial legislature, I would like to hear some concrete suggestion how we can come out of this. The hospitals cannot survive at this pace. Hospitals that are providing love and care and dignity in people's senior years, especially chronic care hospitals such as the Runnymede Chronic Care Hospital, are going to fold.

It is the motion of the NDP. I wonder if we could have a concrete suggestion here to solve this dilemma.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question particularly since I visited most of those institutions, when the Tories were the government in Ontario and later on when the Liberals were the government in Ontario. The arguments have not really changed a great deal.

It comes down to this. Through three political parties, we have all come to the same conclusion. There is a need to sort out, not in the short-term but in the long run, how our institutions function. For example, I saw the premier of Ontario address the problem in a way that I think is substantive and worth while and I would recommend to governments across Canada.

The Liberals, when they were the government in Ontario, closed hospitals down. It did not do much good. That has been tried. That is not a solution. When the Tories and the Liberals were in government in Ontario, they closed hospital beds. That is not a solution. The alternatives, user fees, closing beds, closing hospitals, are not solutions because they are not the problem.

The solution that has been put forward by many across Canada now is the one that all of us should use as our model and should start to think about. That is, all who are part and parcel of the health care system, not governments on high, not administrators on high, not doctors on high, not anyone on high, but everyone who is involved in the process must now sit down and rationalize the whole system of providing medical care.

It should go from top to bottom, not excluding anyone, starting with the chief administrative officer in any hospital and going right down to the person who cleans the floors. Each and every one of them should be an active participant in evaluating and assessing and deciding how the system will go from there. That is part of the solution.

• (1540)

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, as a constituent of the province of Ontario, one of the so-called have provinces, I have been watching what the NDP government and the premier of that province have been doing to our health care since they got elected.

I have been watching carefully the erosion of our right to have medicare. The member said that we in Canada are given care and if we are denied the care, it makes headlines.

It is not unusual that in the States, when going to a doctor, the first thing looked at is that gold American Express card. If you are lucky to have similar other cards, those will be looked at. But some of our constituents and some of our people do not have these American Express cards or anything else.

Yet, we in the province of Ontario clearly are facing the deterioration of our medicare. I know he will agree with me, but what I want to say to the member is that the approach taken by the New Democratic Party today was maybe not the right approach that we have to sit down and talk about medicare, as the minister said: "We have to discuss it".

It should not be one-sided, and it should not be partisan. The question that I have to ask him is the following: Does he not see that if we go into NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement or if we go into free trade the way that we went with the United States, then we are moving into that situation of using a gold American Express card in order to get an operation? This government should take responsibility for that. Clearly that will hurt the medicare system in Canada.

Does he not see that that clearly will put a burden on our medicare and the way that we are going to look after our citizens?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, when the Liberals were the government in Ontario I supported the introduction of what was referred to as a smart card. It was an OHIP card which would allow the province of Ontario to track who was using the medical system and what kind of services were provided to them. It would keep track in a more efficient way what was happening in the health care system.

That is a good solution. It is not an ultimate solution. It did not solve a whole lot of problems, but it is one of the things that we do not know about the provision of medical care services in Ontario and in Canada that I think we should know. That has not been exactly a crashing success, but I remained undeterred. It was a good idea at the time and I said so. I still think so.

The member has raised an interesting concept for all of us. As I said in my remarks, in the United States health care is a business, without question and without apology. It is a simple and straightforward business proposition for profit. That is about as far away from the medical care system that we in Canada know and enjoy.

Unfortunately, in places like Mexico and many other countries in the world, it is neither a medical care system such as we know it or a business as the Americans know it. It exists in no form that we would even recognize, much less so than in either of those two well-established countries.

I share a little bit some of the concerns about the free trade agreement with the States and with the North American free trade agreement. That will be further erosion of what we in Canada have come to treasure as being very important to the nature and the culture of our country. I share that concern with him.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Oshawa a question, recognizing his immense experience in the provincial legislature as it relates to health care. Of course, his constituency and mine are side by side. We have experienced similar problems in probably all issues, but certainly in the health care issue.

The province of Ontario is undergoing some problems in health care, not unlike the rest of Canada. I have heard the minister of health in the province of Ontario say that in fact it is not the money that is the problem.

The member made reference that the solution is a combined solution that everybody must participate in. With that comment in mind, I would wonder why it is that the New Democratic Party has been so critical of the federal government when it says: "These are the dollars we have available for you. That is all you are going to get", when the minister of health for the province of Ontario is saying the same thing to the hospitals: "This is all the money we have available for you. This is all you are going to get. You will have to collectively work within that framework". Is that any different than what the federal government is saying to the provinces when it says it is only going to give 2 per cent more, or whatever the dollars are?

Mr. Breaugh: The member and I share a certain part of Ontario and that is about all we share together. I do not mind that, it is fair ball.

The question he has put to the House is an interesting one. Were we not in a self-generated depression here, the cries of financial failure from all across Canada would be somewhat different. The political reality is, as someone else said, that Ontario is a have not province.

In the good old days, Ontario was a province that could share with other provinces in Canada that did not quite have the same economic and industrial base. It could share moneys without any difficulty at all. But today, in the middle of this depression, Ontario unfortunately has joined the ranks of those who do not have extra cash. Therefore, that poses the initial problem.

The second thing is that it is compounded when the federal Government of Canada reneges on its agreement. When the federal Government of Canada does not pay its fair share, the province of Ontario has more than a right, an obligation to join with other provinces and cry foul.

Those agreements are things that the provinces and the people of Ontario have a right to expect the federal government to respect to the very iota of intent. That is why they are crying foul. It is not one province, it is a lot of them, all at the same time saying that the federal government is not carrying its fair share of the responsibility. That is an argument this government had better listen to.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. When the member for Oshawa began his remarks, he cited remarks made by the Quebec premier on Bill C-120 where they talked about possible user fees. He quoted Premier McKenna and Premier Wells talking about this dilemma of health care. He was very selective in his remarks about Liberal governments.

It is very important that he remember what the NDP treasurer for the province of Ontario said on January 13, 1992, talking about this dilemma we have with health care and the difficulties we are all in. I am certainly not condoning the federal government's cutbacks in transfers to the provinces, but it is important that we have on the record what the NDP have said in the province of Ontario, and I quote: "Unless we get the system operating in a way that is in keeping with our ability to pay for it, we will see user fees or free enterprise medicine. God help us all". That was Floyd Laughren, the treasurer of the province of Ontario.

I am not trying to take a shot at the member for Oshawa or Mr. Laughren, but I get a little bit uptight when the NDP sometimes comes on like they are the only ones with answers and the only ones who really care about the health care system in this country. We all care. It is a difficult issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know whether that is a comment or a question. The hon. member has an answer. If he would like to comment briefly, I will listen to him.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, very briefly. I want to apologize for reading into the record the quote from The Ottawa Citizen from Clyde Wells and the quote from Frank McKenna in the The Globe and Mail. I think we also read from The Montreal Gazette. I apologize for reading into the record of the House of Commons the direct quotes from newspapers across Canada of various Liberal governments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Before I recognize the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence, the Speaker would like to make a ruling.

• (1550)

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, shortly after Question Period there was a further extension of a point of order which had been brought this morning relating to the amendment by the Official Opposition to the motion which has been proposed in this allotted day by the New Democratic Party. As I say, there was argument this morning and further argument this afternoon. I of course am indebted to all hon. members for their contribution. By the way, I have read back through the arguments that were made this morning.

The Chair has considered the arguments that were raised earlier today by hon. members on the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. As stated in Erskine May's 21st edition, page 339:

> The effect of moving an amendment is to restrict the field of debate which would otherwise be open on a question.

I am going to repeat that:

> The effect of moving an amendment is to restrict the field of debate which would otherwise be open on a question.

The hon. member for Sudbury pointed out that the intention of the amendment was to expand the scope of the debate, and although it may be a laudable objective, unfortunately it is, in my view, out of order procedurally.

Other members, including the members for Winnipeg Transcona and Winnipeg North, mentioned a new proposition being introduced or made reference to citation 929 of Beauchesne's sixth edition. The Chair feels the amendment must not provide the basis for a different debate.

Furthermore, as explained in the Chair's ruling of March 16, 1971, when the opposition parties agree on the choice of subject for an allotted day, and I am quoting Speaker Lamoureux: "the spirit of fair play would require that the day not be taken away by means of an amendment".

The Standing Order requiring notice would be pointless if, after notice had been given, the motion were amended to make possible the consideration of an entirely new facet of the question.

There was further argument given of course this afternoon and I certainly listened to it, but I do not think I need to make further comment than what I have done. As a consequence, for these reasons I will have to rule the amendment out of order. That of course does not preclude another amendment being moved.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Before I listen to my hon. friend from Eglinton—Lawrence, and I await his remarks with interest, I simply want to remind the House that today we are debating appropriation bills. One is $1,175 million and the other appropriation bill is $13 billion-plus. This is a very serious debate. Obviously this is an opportunity for members to register their concerns.

Depending on which speaker we are listening to, we are hearing concerns in terms of the erosion of health care in the country.

I was simply wondering if my friends from the government party plan to participate in the debate. It just seems to be inappropriate that we should have such an important debate without any participation from my colleagues from the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have questions as to why someone is or is not rising. I do not think the Chair can intrude. I am going to return the chair to my colleague.

As I have said, hon. members may wish to put another amendment, keeping in mind of course the comments of the Chair.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, several points have been made over the course of debate in the morning and have carried on over the course of the afternoon. To show that we are not partisan at all in this debate and that we do have the interests of all Canadians at heart, I want to compliment the hon. member who just completed his debate because, quite frankly, it took me a little bit by surprise. Up until that point, the party that had been moving the amendment had been completely fruitless in its presentations, totally devoid of substance and completely off the mark when we were talking about medicare. What they had initially started to talk about was simply a finger pointing exercise. The hon. member in spite of his presentation had begun with a finger pointing exercise directed at provincial premiers of the Liberal Party.

He has now changed his tune. He wants to talk about the substance of medicare. The rest of his intervention read like an apology for what is going on in Ontario specifically, but with all NDP governments throughout the country. It is unfortunate that we are reduced to this kind of a debate. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Oshawa was reduced to making an apology for members of his own party who have been indicating that they are the stalwart defenders of all that is holy and all that is sacrosanct in this country, including medicare.

All through the debate they have been more scarce than government members and government ministers. I am glad that there is at least one to listen so that we can get some of the things on the record.

My hon. colleague from Oshawa indicated earlier that he was willing to debate substance. He did that in response to my hon. colleague from Winnipeg—St. Boniface. While my colleague from Winnipeg—St. Boniface is not here to throw out the challenge again, and throw out the gauntlet for him, he has suggested that there is an opportunity for us to debate the substance of medicare and our relative position on it.

Since the NDP has reneged on the opportunity to do so in the House today, my colleague from Winnipeg—St. Boniface, or in fact anyone from this side of the House, is willing to debate the member for Oshawa, if he can muster up enough support of any other member from the rest of his caucus on the question of medicare and social assistance programs, anywhere. We will even go to Oshawa.

The apology that the member would have us all consider includes the fact that poor Ontario no longer has any cash, so it cannot deal with medicare in the way that it would have wanted to deal with medicare. That does not prevent members of the NDP from pointing fingers and saying: "Look at those nasty Liberal provincial premiers. They are actually talking about considering ways to take a look at medicare. They are looking at perhaps restructuring the way that we deal with the finances of medicare".

Meanwhile Ontario, my province, much to my chagrin, although it is not my government, has already given an indication of what it will do. In fact, the premier of Ontario lets his actions do his talking and not his accusations. He will be judged by what he has done. Remember what we are talking about is the principle of universality and accessibility to a medicare program.

Even a few government members have taken the trouble to point out that it has been Liberal federal governments that have established the building blocks of medicare and hospital programs throughout this country. Even they acknowledge that we are on the side of what is right because history speaks with its facts on behalf of what we have done. We will be judged by our record.

Here is the NDP record. I am only going to read part of it here, largely because I cannot see all of this writing without my glasses. In the central region in this last budget, can you believe because we are talking about universality and accessibility, you have got to have a facility to go to. You have got to have health professionals for any assistance that you need. But where are they? You can maintain the principle of universality and accessibility to everybody, but if you close the door on them, and you do not provide the service, what good is that rhetoric?

In the central region, York County hospital will lay off 90 employees and close 90 acute care beds. In metropolitan Toronto the NDP Government of Ontario, the premier of the NDP, host of defenders of what is right at Mount Sinai Hospital, in an attempt to save $3.6 million will lay off 59 full-time and 31 part-time employees on April 1. What a surprise, including 51 registered nursing assistants and laboratory workers.

• (1600)

In the Hamilton-Niagara region, Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital plans to lay off 80 full-time and part-time employees. In addition to staff reductions, the hospital will close a 34-bed acute care unit, cut another by 12 beds and cut financing for its community health service centre.

If this is what the NDP government of Ontario wants to put forward as its indication, its hallmark, its standard of what constitutes universal health care and medicare, what it considers is standard for the principle of universal access to medicare throughout the country, then I would hope that the mover of this motion would have the courage to stand up and say, "Yes, we will be judged by our actions while we wag our tongue at those nasty Liberal premiers who are actually considering what might happen".

And for what? Because the member for Oshawa says we must take a look at all the ways to save money. We have to look at this because we do not have any extra cash.

Is this in fact true? I indicated earlier in a question that the province of Ontario, when the NDP government took control, was in a surplus situation, no deficit.

An hon. member: Oh, come one.

Mr. Volpe: It seems we have discovered that when truth speaks even stones hear.

We went from a surplus situation to that first budget by an NDP government when there was an increase to a deficit situation of some $9 billion.

I was pretty good in math but I still cannot count that far. In one year the government, the NDP Government of Ontario, went out and gathered up, through debts, another $9 billion to do what?

Mrs. Gaffney: It's all those Amex cards they carry around.

Mr. Volpe: Of course it must be some of those credit cards. You are right.

If the principle of universality was not the main theme, if the medical health program was not the main theme, if the hospital system in Ontario was not the main theme, or the encouragement of all health care professionals to stay in the province of Ontario, then for what did they raise this money?

If we are going to be judged by our actions then the NDP members who have proposed this particular motion should do a mea culpa. Perhaps an examination of conscience might be a first step.

The province of Ontario is suffering greatıy, there is no question. I indicated before that the recession induced by the government opposite has created a terrible economic environment for Ontario. Its manufacturing base is decreased by about 25 per cent. If we cannot raise taxes from Ontario, from where are we going to get funds to distribute to all Canadians.

What we are doing is killing the goose that lays the golden egg.

That does not mean that the money is not there for Ontario. In fact, when it comes to transfers from the federal government to Ontario for health care and services, Ontario received 41 per cent of the over-all total. Now that is my province with 36 per cent of the population.

Yes, there have been reductions. I regret those reductions but I cannot accept the argument that there is no money coming to Ontario. What I can accept is that the government of the day is being irresponsible with the way it is using that money. It is being irresponsible in the same way that the government is being with its economic policies.

Then it comes crying to the general public and says it has no money. It has to close down these hospitals, but it still believes in universality.

It says it is sorry that patients have to wait from two to eight months before they can get to see a specialist, before they can receive the care that they need because the province does not have any money.

But it really does believe that everybody should have access to health care whenever they need it, whenever they want it, but do not need it for another eight months my friend.

Some of this silly frivolous nonsense is spilling over on to the NDP. They are using an allotted day to point their fingers at other premiers who are thinking about ways to get around the problem. The province of Ontario decides that the solution is to borrow $9 billion last year, $11 billion this coming year, to provide the kind of services that it says is essential. I believe they are essential but that the province should be responsible in the way that it administers the money it borrows.

There is no question in my mind that what is happening is a great scam and the NDP caucus at the federal level is now standing up for the provinces at great risk to itself by introducing such a frivolous motion. It is a silly motion to hide the fact that the provincial Government of Ontario and the other provincial NDP Governments of Saskatchewan and British Columbia are going to engage in some massive tax increases that are going to make them very unpopular by trying to point the finger at federal or at Liberal provincial premiers elsewhere.

Canadians are fed up with that kind of tactic. Canadians are fed up with tax increases. The Conservative government opposite since the 1989 budget alone increased taxation by 16.5 per cent. That followed what they trumpet as the largest and the most productive economic period in Canadian history. They would have had more money from the economy than they ever would have needed, yet they increased taxation by a further 16.5 per cent.

Worst than that, they did what the NDP government in Ontario and the NDP government in Saskatchewan is doing, and what the NDP government in British Columbia is threatening today and that is increase the public debt and the deficit in order to save the day. The government opposite since 1989 increased the public debt by 27.3 per cent. I shudder to think what the NDP governments in those three provinces, including my own province, are going to do in the upcoming budget.

I shudder because I know I have to pay that bill. I know that my colleagues and my constituents have to pay that bill. I know as well that every time the government opposite at the federal level increased its rate of taxation, the provincial governments sneaked in with an additional portion. They received a cut of that tax increase without having to admit that they were raising taxes.

My colleague for Broadview—Greenwood would say this would be a great time to talk about a single tax. I hope he gets an opportunity to deal with that. At least, it would deprive some of these provincial premiers of the opportunity to scam a few more bucks out of the unsuspecting taxpayer.

What I do object to, aside from the fact that taxation has increased so much, is that as it takes your money out of your pocket, it turns around with crocodile tears and says: "But really, we do not have any money, we have to cut services. We cannot give you health care, we cannot give you education grants any more, we have to reduce this, we have to reduce that. Believe me with my hand on my heart, I believe in universality. I believe in the public good. We are pristine still in the way we abide by our ideology. Please do not ask us to prove it because the proof is in the pudding".

What we see are tax increases, cuts in services and a total abdication of the responsibility that comes to an incumbent in office.

I do not agree with my colleague who spoke earlier about there being an equal partnership in the medicare system. In principle it is true. But what has happened is that on one side the government of the day at the federal level is saying: "It is time the provinces carried their load". And on the other side the NDP provincial governments, especially in Ontario, are saying: "I am sorry, but we are going to wash our hands of this. Our federal cousins please point the finger elsewhere". We cannot have that.

• (1610)

Therefore, I am going to move an amendment to that motion. My amendment is seconded by my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and the hon. member for Winnipeg North who is not in his seat. He is anxious to be part of this.

All my colleagues present have come to this House like the rain in spring—which we finally see today—and which brings new life to Parliament and to this debate.

I move, seconded by my colleague from Winnipeg North and my other colleagues here:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "system".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I have a copy of the amendment? The hon. member can continue with questions and comments while I have a look at the amendment.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before the Speaker rules on the validity of the amendment I would presume that he will give us an opportunity to take a look at it and present arguments as to whether we think it is a legitimate, appropriate and a procedurally correct amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think once the Speaker rules on it, it will be validity enough. Yes, it is a good motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your wise decision. In fact, there was a meeting of minds on this important issue, because after the Speaker and you yourself, advised by the able officers of this House, had ruled the first amendment we submitted to the House out of order, I immediately went to see those same advisers at the table and suggested they insert a period. While I was discussing this with our friends and advisers, our critic, the member for Winnipeg North and also the member for Eglinton—Lawrence already had the text of this amendment, which is quite in order. I want to thank you for having ruled immediately, prima facie that it was in order.

We can now debate "that this House express its concern at the threat to Canada's health system". That is what the NDP should have said, instead of trying to embarrass members who have a lot to say about our health system. There is widespread concern among Canadians, and what was said by my esteemed colleague from Toronto and other members has certainly raised some questions in my mind.

In a society, there are a number of choices to make. When public moneys become scarce, certain priorities must be identified. Obviously, the first thing people in my riding think about as they grow older is health care, which is the centrepiece of our social programs and must not be tampered with. Although I try and see them as often as I can, I must apologize to the people who are listening and who would like to see us more often. Unfortunately, in Ottawa the House sits five days a week, eight or ten months a year. And the same applies to hon. members opposite. When we visit senior citizens' homes, their main concern is not where to spend their holidays, because often they cannot afford holidays, but they want the assurance that they can count on proper medical care.

[English]

I regret that the NDP has chosen this kind of approach for such a very serious subject. By politicizing this important issue, we are obliged to become partisan. As far as I am concerned, the government has the responsibility which it will take when it votes. We have the responsibility to talk about a real subject. I am glad that my colleague from the opposition—there is no such a thing as an Official Opposition. There is only one opposition, and other parties. It is a concept that we always say the Official Opposition and the other opposition. There is in the British parliamentary system only one opposition, it is Her Royal Majesty's Loyal Opposition; the others are simply parties.

They have chosen to attack only Liberals. As we say in law "face value". It is, I regret to say, almost ridiculous. It is like everybody else, the three NDP parties, as my colleague said, were perfection on earth. Mr. McKenna in New Brunswick and M. Bourassa in Quebec and, as far as Newfoundland is concerned I will pass, no comment.

[Translation]

Finally I would like to say that Quebec is certainly not a novice at health care administration. The minister and the cabinet are doing everything they can to have the best health care system in the world.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I understand that you found the amendment of the member from Eglinton in order, which means that all the words after the word "system" are deleted.

Can you explain to me whether that means it would be in order to discuss the particular policies and practices and statements of particular provincial governments or provincial officials, or would it not be in order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I find no problem with that. I think that is relevant.

Do you have another point of order?

Mr. Heap: One further clarification.

The objection being made by some members of the Liberal group was that we should not be talking about certain premiers and their statements, and so on. I had supposed that the purpose intended by the amendment, which you have accepted, was to rule those out of order. Therefore, I thought it would perhaps be in the same way out of order to introduce criticism of people who had made that criticism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will watch the debate very carefully, and if I feel that members are stepping out of line I will call them back to relevancy.

If the hon. member for Saint-Denis would come to a conclusion, please.

Mr. Prud'homme: I will come to a conclusion, and I always like listening to my dear esteemed colleague from Toronto.

It is only a comment I was making for the true meaning and intention of what was put to us for discussion. The true meaning of what was in front of us for discussion has been put aside by Mr. Speaker as a result of our amendment. So I will bow to that and be more relevant.

I can say that this House expresses its concern at the threat to Canada's health care system. People always like to do some Quebec bashing. I was only, as a good member of Parliament from Quebec, as you would expect from a member from Ontario, defending my government when it needs to be defended here. That is what I was trying to do.

Having said that, I will come back to that later on in my speech, most likely. But I wanted to say that I was extremely stimulated by the comment made by my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence. That was why I spontaneously got up while I was preparing for an amendment that was already put forward by my colleague, and I thank him for that.

I shall come back during the debate, if time allows.

• (1620)

[Translation]

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Saint-Denis. I feel obliged to accept his compliments and I hope that in future if something I say makes him want to take part in the debate, he will do so. That would make me quite happy.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for my hon. colleague. He talks about the fact that we should talk about the record. I would ask him to make a couple of comments about the record of the federal Liberal government when it was in office as it relates to the cutback in expenditures for health care. He is very careful to say that it is the Tories who have been cutting back on transfer payments.

Let me just give a couple of figures and then I would like him to comment. In 1979–80 transfer payments to the province of Ontario accounted for 47 per cent of the health care expenditures. By the time the Liberals left office in 1984, this had been reduced to 41 per cent. It was further eroded to 34 per cent and now today there are figures showing it is 31 per cent. The reality was that the erosion started with the Liberals in 1980 and by 1984 when they left, it was down to 41 per cent.

In my own province of British Columbia, by 1994–95, we will have lost $6.8 billion in cutbacks in transfer payments and EPF. Out of those, $2.6 billion or 40 per cent nearly are the direct result of actions taken by the Liberal government in 1982 and 1983.

Those are the actions of the Liberal government. It was the one that started the erosion of the health care system and the erosion of the provinces' ability to pay. I would like him to comment on those two figures. Are those not the actions of the federal Liberal government? Did it not start cutbacks to the provinces for health care?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I would have hoped that in the calculation of the numerical and financial impact of the decisions by Liberal governments of the day with respect to health care that he would not have used the actuarial type of figures that are currently bandied about with respect to all kinds of potentials that emanate from pension plans.

I would have hoped that he would have stuck with the absolute figures as they related in 1983 and 1984 dollars. He has not chosen to do that and I choose not to answer hypothetical questions from the past.

On the second item, it might be appropriate for my hon. colleague to remember that those agreements were precisely that. They were negotiated agreements between the federal and provincial governments of the day that determined what would be the proportion of federal contribution and what would be the proportion of provincial contribution. That is not the case right now.

I think the fact that three provinces took the federal government to court on its unilateral actions would indicate that initially when those cuts were made they were done in the spirit of negotiations and they were accepted according to the conditions of the day.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House put forward by the NDP is in itself a false motion. It does not tell the truth.

In other words, the mover of the motion from the NDP has been day dreaming or perhaps he had a dream last night in which he claims now that the premier of Newfoundland wants to forgo universality and embrace user and deterrent fees for health services. That is not true.

Why can somebody not now move in this House an amendment saying that the leader of the NDP is opposed to universality? Why not? This is a fib here. This is not true. It is a downright fabrication of the truth. I cannot say it is a lie, I cannot call anybody a liar. I know that, but it is a fabrication of the truth. It is not true.

Perhaps the member moving the motion does not know that it is not true. I do not know, but I am telling him now that it is absolutely untrue. How do you vote on a motion that contains false information, that has dug up something that says the premier of Newfoundland made a statement and has put forward a position which is not true? When the motion is put, how do you vote on it? Can you vote for it or can you vote against it when you know what is contained in the motion is false, completely and utterly untrue, never said by the premier of Newfoundland, never, not in writing. He has never said it in his speech, he has never said it on the radio, he has never said it on television. It is a fabrication, an outright untruth by the NDP, spreading rumours about what a premier of a provincial government said.

If the NDP had shown the honesty that they should be showing, they would have gone back and found out what the premier of the province of Newfoundland said and they would have discovered—

Mr. Karpoff: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I am requesting clarification of your ruling that the Liberal amendment was in order. The way I interpreted what you had said is that you agreed the motion would stop at the area where it says health care system, that the other parts of the motion that had been moved by the New Democratic Party were no longer permissible for debate.

The hon. member is getting up and he is not focusing on the first sentence that is now what is before this House. He is focusing on the very subject that the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was listening very carefully to the hon. member and I was going to call him to relevancy. I was busy talking to another member here at the chair. I appreciate what the hon. member for Surrey North has said and I would appreciate it if the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls would come to relevancy, please.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I was coming to the point that I wanted to make, but I first of all had to make it be known that there is a rumour circulating around here, put forward by the NDP, that the premier of Newfoundland made certain statements which he did not make and which are not on the official record anywhere.

Now, getting to my point. My point is this, Mr. Speaker, and I will be very brief about the point I am about to make. The most important thing in this country is our health care system. The most important thing in this nation that we have to protect is our health care system and provincial governments in this country, especially the poor ones, that is the poor provincial governments that do not have the funding to enable them to provide the same level of health care that we have in some other provinces in this nation, that have to close hospital beds, that are unable to buy the equipment necessary to provide good health care in 1992, having the equipment and being able to put up the heavy cost of operating new equipment.

The provinces find themselves in a position where they are just unable to foot the bill. The very area where this federal government has cut back is in the transfers for those very things.

• (1630)

As the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out on many occasions, they have allowed through our tax system, a decrease in the amount of money that flows to the Government of Canada through our income tax system from very wealthy Canadians and very wealthy corporations in this country. It thereby decreases again the revenues flowing to the provincial governments through our income tax system.

When filling out an income tax form, if you are residing in the province of Newfoundland, you fill out the form and come to the federal tax payable. Then you take 62 per cent of it and that is what goes to the provincial government.

When there are individuals in this nation who make $500,000 a year and pay not one penny of income tax as we have under this government, and the numbers are rising, then you know that the revenues to the provinces are drying up.

The Auditor General put it quite simply back in 1987 when he said in his report that members of this Chamber and the Parliament of Canada are always trying to produce a more energy efficient engine and no matter how much they make it energy efficient, they are still finding that the same amount of fuel is being consumed, until they discover tiny holes in the gas tank. The Auditor General called it tax expenditures.

The Government of Canada has done nothing about it. Provinces like Newfoundland have found that through the tax system their revenues have dried up. Their revenues have started to go down. The transfers from the federal government have started to go down. And here they are trying to operate a health care system and hospitals on both those decreases in revenues.

In conclusion, I take strong exception to anybody who makes a statement about the premier of Newfoundland who is trying to do his best, honest as the day is long, day by day trying to run a province on very little money. To have anybody misquote him in a statement before this House, I hope the NDP now will have the honesty to stand up and say that he did not make this statement ever and that they withdraw it from the record of this Chamber.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in response to my Liberal friend from Gander—Grand Falls, he got rather excited as is his tendency and that is fine. This is the place to get excited when you feel strongly about things. He seemed to suggest that the basis of the motion put forward by the New Democratic Party today was somehow based on falsehoods.

Particularly he mentioned comments that we suggested the premier of Newfoundland had said. Quoting here from The Ottawa Citizen of December 30, 1991, the newspaper story was: "Social programs. Wells questions universality", and I quote Premier Clyde Wells of Newfoundland: "We may have to look at the whole principle of universality in our social programs and look at the extent that we might have to limit the universality".

He goes on: "Canadians would probably be open to such changes if politicians are honest about the state of the country's finances".

He goes on further: "I do not think people would be hostile to that type of change as long as they are aware of the economic problems that we face".

I do not think it is stretching anyone's imagination too far or even a little bit to suggest that quote as I just read it, if it is reasonably accurate, and we assume that it is because we have not heard anything specifically to the contrary, lends full credibility to the suggestions put forth by the New Democratic Party in its motion today.

If there are any apologies to be forthcoming regarding this matter, I would suggest that they come from my friend from Newfoundland and certainly not from the New Democratic Party.

We stand by the submissions we have made. We think the point we have been making all afternoon is well taken.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, here is the NDP again.

Based upon a quote in a newspaper, a newspaper column quoting a provincial premier as the hon. gentleman put it, the NDP puts forward a suggestion in this House that the premier of Newfoundland, because of that quote in The Ottawa Citizen, wants to forgo universality and embrace user and deterrent fees for health services.

I can tell you this. I listened very carefully to a discussion on television and later on national radio concerning the premier of Newfoundland and what he meant when he said what he said. He did not say what he was quoted as saying in that newspaper article. I listened to it for two days in a row on our national radio and national television system.

I think I got it pretty clear as other Canadians who heard it and saw it did, as to what the premier of Newfoundland meant when he made the statement that he made which was not the statement that the hon. member claims he made in a newspaper that quotes him as saying he made a statement he did not make.

The premier, in his statements, was referring to the fact that in our society today, it has become all to common to have people of extreme means, people who have hundreds of millions of dollars pay nothing to the maintenance of our social security safety net at all. That is what he was talking about when he made his official statement in a speech in southern Ontario.

The premier of Newfoundland is the biggest defender of our health and welfare systems. I can assure you of that. I have known him for many years and I can tell you he is. But it is getting pretty difficult with the cuts that are coming from this government and also the examples given by NDP governments that are cutting back everything.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to carry on from where my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls left off.

I do not think there would be anyone in this country who would ever doubt that Premier Wells has always talked about national programs with national standards. If there is one thing that this country will remember him for, it is the fact that he went to the wall over maintaining national standards.

Most Canadians would really question the NDP's sincerity when it comes to taking a shot at Premier Wells caving in on national health standards. This is just one point that Canadians are not going to buy.

There is a consistency here though with the NDP. During the last election, and I really think we should remind Canadians about this, I remember my leader at that time, the member for Vancouver Quadra, fought a tremendous campaign against this free trade agreement. Most Canadians would agree. If I remember correctly, it was the NDP who tried to suggest that the Liberal Party should just fold up its tent and it would be a two-party system after the last election.

• (1640)

Had the NDP really been sincere about its campaign against free trade, I do not think those cheap shots at our leader would have been taken. We will make sure to remind NDP members if they get into this game too often. All of a sudden they seem to think there is a bit of a surge or something happening in the polls, although I do not see it right now and instead of taking on the government, they take on the Liberal Party.

To politicize the health care issue the way it has today and I am a member of Parliament from Toronto, I am from the province of Ontario, Canadians will not buy the fact that the NDP care more about the health care system than other members in this House.

I want to read some quotes from NDP ministers. I hate doing this because on a debate like this today we should really be putting our creative processes to work. We should be finding ways to be more efficient with the health care system in this country, certainly without cutting back on the service, the access, or all the things we cherished in this country, and the things that have made us so special.

Here is a quote from the treasurer of the province of Ontario, Mr. Floyd Laughren on January 13, 1992: "Unless we get the system operating in a way that is in keeping with our ability to pay for it we will see user fees or free enterprise medicine". God help us all.

I want to read another quote from Frances Lankin, another prominent NDP member, on November 9, 1991: "I don't know if there is a way in which we can build a system, a drug benefit program that is fair. It might involve looking at a co-payment structure".

Here is Michael Decter, the deputy minister of health, November 14, 1991, and I quote directly: "Do we want to pay for cholesterol-lowering drugs for people over 65 when the advice is that they do almost nothing to reduce their health risk? Should we continue to pay for useless treatment? We are looking very hard at the type of services delivered and what are the outcomes". And I quote directly from the NDP deputy minister of health: "For instance, we spend large amounts of money treating lung cancer which frankly does not do much good".

Regretfully I lost my father to lung cancer about three months before I was elected to this House. I want you to know that the hospitals in Ontario, the Princess Margaret Hospital, and other hospitals in that province do not feel they are wasting their time and they feel that those services, trying to save lives, are every bit as important.

I am so upset at this NDP motion today. In my riding of Broadview—Greenwood there is Riverdale Hospital. It is the largest chronic care hospital in this nation, close to 800 beds. This is a hospital that is 100 years old. In Toronto's oldest community newspaper The Cabbagetown News for Riverdale: "Future of Riverdale Hospital Remains Uncertain, Community Gathering to Discuss Options".

I cannot believe that that would be happening in my riding which had been an NDP riding for 25 years. Just the fact that they are even tampering with health care is beyond belief. The NDP is causing so much uncertainty in health care in the province of Ontario that it has no right to put forward a resolution in this House today casting aspersions on all other members of this House. This kind of sanctimonious stuff is not going to sell across this country. This is a tough and complex issue and Canadians know it. There is no way that we are going to let the NDP get away with this one-way trip.

In the central region of the province of Ontario, York County Hospital laid off 90 employees and closed 90 acute care beds last year. The Mount Sinai Hospital just laid off 59 full time and 31 part time employees, including 51 registered nursing assistants and laboratory workers. The Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital in Hamilton-Niagara is shutting down beds and laying off people. The county of Bruce General Hospital in the southwestern region, a hospital that enjoys a number one efficiency ranking when compared to its peers across the province, will lay off nine part-time nurses, freeze salaries and close 20 beds. The Sudbury Memorial Hospital in the northern region laid off 12 people, the majority of whom are nurses. The Kingston Hospital in the eastern region is closing beds. I could go on and on.

The problem is that the financial resources that this nation requires to maintain the health care system of this country are large and Canadians know it. It is a tough and complex issue.

I had hoped that the NDP would have put forward a motion today where it would have challenged all members to put forward some creative ideas. I want to give you an example. St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto last year on efficiency in linens, towels, bedsheets, et cetera, operating linens, in one year saved $250,000. If that is multiplied by every hospital in the province of Ontario or every hospital in the nation then we could maybe get at things.

In my riding of Broadview—Greenwood, I have two of the finest hospitals in the province, Riverdale Hospital, as I mentioned earlier, the largest acute or chronic care hospital in the country, and the East General Hospital. In the last six months, both of these hospitals have come under attack. I think if the NDP is really serious about health care in this country then it should be asking all of us in this House for help.

The NDP right now is in charge of the largest hospital care unit in the nation, namely in the province, and it needs our help. When it starts to politicize the issue, the debate goes nowhere.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to ask a question of my colleague from Danforth. Before I ask the question, I would like to say this. I have been really saddened to hear the debate and to read this motion that is before us today. I think that we have slipped as parliamentarians for the people of Canada. We have slipped and slipped very badly.

When a motion by a party is put forward of the type that we have here today for debate, when we have a health care issue in this country that, as the member for Broadview—Greenwood said, we should all be discussing, that we become this partisan for someone's own personal reasons, I think it is a disgrace. I find it absolutely disgraceful.

I would like to hear the comments of the member for Broadview—Greenwood. He did mention the fact that during the last election the NDP did not challenge the government on the free trade issue. The Liberals were the only party to challenge the government on that issue. I am thoroughly convinced that we would not have a Conservative government in this country today if the NDP had fought the free trade agreement as we did in that last election.

• (1650)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier to my colleague, I would not be sitting here today if it were not for the debating skills of the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. If the NDP had not taken so many cheap shots at him who knows where we could have been, maybe on the other side of the House.

But I want to address your point about politicization which you made in your opening comments.

I have a paper here in my hands from Michael M. Rachlis, MD, who wrote the book Second Opinion. He is a constituent of mine. He is a member of the New Democratic Party and is probably one of the most brilliant people in this country when it comes to reform and change in the health care system in this country. I am sure that members of the New Democratic Party agree with my judgment on Dr. Rachlis.

I have put this paper forward. I have put his book forward on the floor of this House more than once, and I will continue to do so. The NDP should go to Dr. Rachlis' book which talks about ways and means of reforming and bringing more efficiency to the health care system of Canada. Had that been the thrust of our debate today we would have served the people of Canada a lot better.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear the member talk about Michael Rachlis' position. If members have heard his position, one of the things that he diametrically opposes is any form of user fees, a two-tiered health care system or deterrent fees.

What I find very interesting in this whole discussion today is that the Liberals are standing up and saying we should not have raised the issue. Shame on us, we should not have raised the issue. I have not heard any of them stand up and flatly say: "We in the Liberal Party at all levels, federally and provincially, repudiate the introduction of user fees."

That is what is sticking in their craw, they cannot say that because there are several prominent Liberals in this country who are repeatedly advocating that as a solution to medicare.

We have not denied that there are problems, that there have to be changes and innovations. We certainly have not denied that the financial squeeze that the Liberals and now the Tories have put on the health care system is creating problems. But we have said clearly: "One solution is we will not abandon our principles".

I would ask the member if he will stand up and on behalf of his party, at all levels of government, repudiate the introduction of user fees and deterrent fees.

Mr. Mills: The people of Canada—

An hon. member: Will you or won't you?

Mr. Mills: Yes. I will tell you one thing, for the Liberal Party of Canada—

Mr. Samson: You are attacking the federal NDP.

Mr. Mills: Yes, I am attacking the federal NDP.

Mr. Samson: You are attacking the provincial NDP.

Mr. Mills: I am giving you direct quotes from the province of Ontario. I can only speak for the Liberal Party of Canada and the Liberal Party of Canada has always maintained that in no way, shape or form should we tamper with the health care system of this country. When it comes to universal health care, my leader has said that, my former leader has said that, and all of our leaders will say that, and Clyde Wells—

Mr. Samson: The provincial Liberals, do you support them or not?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would appreciate very much if you would allow the hon. member to answer. I still have another questioner.

Mr. Mills: As the member for Gander—Grand Falls said earlier, there is no stronger person in this country committed to national standards and national programs and not just in health care. We all know that in this country.

I think he cited the premier of New Brunswick. I cannot speak for the premier of New Brunswick. I do not speak for the city of Toronto, any more than he speaks for Premier Romanow.

When I was responding, I was giving direct quotes from the position of the NDP in the province of Ontario. I was only giving those direct quotes to point out the fact that even in the province of Ontario, which is a fairly wealthy province, they too as NDPers are finding it very difficult to deal with this complex issue.

In the process of debate, in the process of looking at options and alternatives and ways of maintaining the health care system, some of their own members, including their treasurer and their health minister and their deputy minister of health have put forward ideas that suggest they are not endorsing national standards.

I will put it right on the record now. I for one moment do not believe that the remarks of Frances Lankin or Michael Decter are carved in stone, that they are against treating people with lung cancer. He is throwing out hypotheses here, not very bright, for advancing debate.

My point is in the process of advancing debate, do not grab some little clip that somebody makes and try to make it a national story.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a very short question or comment.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member. As I do not have much time I would like to ask him a short question. He was mentioning St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto.

As we know, the budget for hospitals has been increased by 1 per cent. St. Michael's was obliged to close 100 beds, so naturally the service cannot be as good. They have discovered at St. Michael's that they have a debt of $63 million that apparently was lost somewhere in the accounting, but now they are aware of it.

Naturally there is a question of debt for some of the hospitals and if there is no increase in funding, I wonder how he sees them managing to provide good services.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, as I have been saying all afternoon, this is a very tough, complex issue. In order to handle the deficit, the debt of this nation, we have to expand wealth. We have to create more wealth. I make no secret, I am a single tax person. We have to reform the tax system. That gets more productivity going in this country, which will generate more wealth. That will ultimately give us the resources we need to look after the deficits of these hospitals.

This is a long, complex equation we are involved with here. I certainly am not trying to simplify the difficulty of it. If we are going to expand wealth creation in this country, we are going to have to start treating people more fairly through the tax designs. I think that is our only shot and the current system we have in place is a disincentive to that wealth creation.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, this is a supply day debate. I would like to read what it says about this: "It is a fundamental element of the principle underlying financial procedures of Parliament, the idea that Parliament does not grant supply until the opposition has had the opportunity to demonstrate why it should be refused. This opportunity takes the form of debate on designated supply days".

In this House this afternoon we have not had a debate because the federal government—

• (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I would just like to say to the hon. member that the next speaker is the hon. member for Victoria. He will have 20 minutes, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

The next two speakers will be the hon. member for Beauharnois–Salaberry for 10 minutes plus 5 minutes questions and comments and his follow up will be Carleton—Charlotte for another 10 minutes and 5 minutes for questions and comments.

If we have more time, I will come back to you.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me to begin my remarks by wondering what has happened to the government members. This is supposed to be a debate on supply, but we will have an opportunity, I gather, to hear from some government supporters before the debate is over.

This motion is before the House to give all of us an opportunity to look at the growing concern there is in this country about health care and to examine the position of all parties in this House, including Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, which purports to hold itself out as an alternative government in this country. It is important that the people of Canada get an opportunity to hear the position of the Liberal Party on this critical issue because all Canadians have been concerned increasingly about the state of our health care and, in particular, our medical insurance program in this country.

The concern began with the successive cutbacks in federal support for medicare, health and education programs. The concern rose further during the free trade debate when it became clear that the government was trading away vital protection for our social programs and beginning to join with the United States in driving down our medicare, our health programs and our social programs in order to harmonize, as the word was, our economy with that of the United States. Concerns were raised during the election campaign and never properly answered. We have seen since that election the government continuing on its path to deprive the provinces of the necessary financial support to sustain a universal, public medical care program in this country. Now that program is under attack.

What we see in the Liberal provinces of this country are the cracks beginning in the principle of universality, accessibility of public medicare in this country. It thus becomes critically important that we hear from the Liberal Party in this House its position. What is intriguing is that in the debate so far, we have not heard the federal Liberal Party make a clear, unequivocal commitment against user fees and deterrent fees for health care. We are still waiting for the federal Liberal Party to make that commitment.

I rise in this debate because I want to recall for the Canadian people some history about medicare.

Mrs. Gaffney: Ha.

Mr. Brewin: My Liberal friend says "Ha". She says "Ha". Let us take it back a bit. The Liberal Party first promised health insurance in this country in 1919. In 1919 it was promised. Election after election after election the Liberal Party promised health insurance and election after election, despite the fact that in virtually all of the elections after that period they formed a majority government, they failed to deliver for the Canadian people.

It was only when the government of Saskatchewan in 1962, without any assistance from the federal Liberal government of the day—

Mr. Harvard: Who was the government in 1962?

Mr. Brewin: My friend makes a good point. It was the Conservatives that were the government in 1962.

Mr. Harvard: Thank you.

Mr. Brewin: I withdraw the allegation: without any support from Liberal governments despite 50 years of promises. When they were finally thrown out by the Canadian people in 1957, what happened? It was only then that the NDP government in Saskatchewan, all alone, without federal support, introduced medicare into Canada. It was at that point and only that point, with the federal Liberals in a minority position in this House, that a national medicare system came into being.

I was in Saskatchewan during the doctor's strike in 1962 against the NDP legislation introduced by the Woodrow Lloyd government, following the government of Tommy Douglas. It was the Liberals who were on the front line of the Keep Our Doctors Committee who opposed and fought and withdrew the services of doctors against the democratic decision of the people of Saskatchewan to bring in a medicare program. It was the Liberals who turned up later as candidates who led the attack on medicare in Saskatchewan.

I can remember the Hon. Paul Martin, Senior, who was Minister of National Health and Welfare for many years, who took the kind of typical Liberal line of the day, going back to Mackenzie King saying: "We believe in health insurance, but we cannot do it this year". There were always excuses as to why the Liberal party could not produce medicare. It was only when they were politically forced to by the pioneering legislative act of the government of Saskatchewan that the Liberal Party finally caved in and adopted a national medicare program.

Here we are now with government revenues in trouble as a result, I may say, of Liberal tax policies in the 1960s and the 1970s, giving away billions of dollars to the corporate sector in this country, putting the government in irremedial debt, compounded by the high interest policies of this government which has driven us into a recession so that our health services are now again in trouble.

One thing needs to be clear. That is that our party is unequivocally committed to a universal medicare program. We have been in the past, we are today and we will be in the future. We are unalterably opposed to the use of user fees or deterrent fees as a way of bailing out the health care system from the economic ruin the Conservative and Liberal governments successively have put this country into.

It is clear from all of the studies that user fees will not do what is advertised for them. They will not reduce health costs. They will simply transfer the burden of health costs on to those who are least able to afford it. We cannot take a step in that path.

It is a real shame that we in this House have to debate the issues of the increasing pressure on this national institution of medicare. I think if Canadians were asked what it was that held Canada together, if they looked for a single symbol of Canada, it would be our medicare system. The underlying philosophy of the medicare system is not that it is simply a service provided by government, but rather it is an obligation we as a community have to each of our citizens.

We have decided as a country that we want to ensure that medical services are available to all regardless of income and that income is no deterrent to access to medical services. That fundamental social reform that was enacted in a pioneering way in Saskatchewan and then spread across the country has become for Canadians a part of our national heritage and it must not be touched. We must work to preserve it, but we must ensure that in finding the funds necessary to establish an efficient, effective and accessible health care system that we do not look to the poor, but we look to those who have been given so many breaks under the tax system of successive Liberal and Conservative governments.

Here we are fighting to hold a system that is in place. I wish to finish my remarks by saying that I hope that we do not see medicare as the last great social reform in this country. Not only can we preserve our medicare system as a right for all Canadians, for all members of the human family, but we begin to look at other programs in which this principle might be applied.

We have as we look around us the clear reform this country must now move to after we settle our medicare program in place and as we preserve it. Recently in Victoria, I had an opportunity to talk to many parents and child care workers. It is clearly evident that our child care system is in chaos. The workers are underpaid and in many cases, under-qualified. The opportunities and places are inadequate. It is clear that we must take the principles that underlie our medicare system, our universal, accessible, high quality medicare system, and apply that to child care so that the people in this country, particularly the new generation of this country, can have equal opportunity and access to good and high quality services. We owe it to our children.

We have seen in the comments made by Liberal premiers in this country that the Liberal commitment such as it was to medicare is now ending. We have not heard Liberals in this House rise to refute the substance of the argument. They shout with fury at the fact the point is even on the floor of the House.

It is important that this issue be clarified. I think we have heard the answer today and I look forward to the support of the rest of the members of this House on this important motion.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could seek the unanimous consent of the House to waive the customary 10-minute question and answer period so that the government members who are finally going to get up are allowed to speak their full amount of time.

The House will adjourn at 5.45 p.m. If we take another 10 minutes the two speakers are not going to get the opportunity to stand and enter into the debate. We in the New Democratic Party would be willing to waive our right to a 10-minute answer and question period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I have heard the request from the member. I have already had requests for questions and answers.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, we are more than delighted to take part in the debate. Whatever your decision is, we will certainly go along with you.

The question to the member is simply this. Reflecting on part of what he said at his opening, somehow they always drag in the old free trade debate going back to the 1988 election in the sense that it is going to endanger or threaten our health care system in this country. It does hit a raw nerve.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it has just been drawn to my attention the fact that you signalled me to an end with only 10 minutes to go. I have 20 minutes in my speech. You signalled—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): The point is that I was not signalling you to an end of your speech. I was trying to signal the person who was going to ask the question because I had two people asking me. Indeed I am sure if you have more that you wish to use, you have another eight minutes. I am sure the House would agree that you do so.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite content to leave my eight minutes and turn them over to a member from the government side if the government member would like to use it, if I have that right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): You did sit down. I believe the government is prepared to put up speakers. I do not think there is any problem this way. In fact, you have used some of the time they would have used. So can we let the hon. member continue his question and then you will answer.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, normally there is a period of comments and questions.

I think you did not allow that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I thank the hon. member for his advice, but I was trying to do that when I had a group of points of order.

I would like to proceed with questions and comments.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, after watching this in the last five minutes, it is no wonder the Canadian people are puzzled as to what we actually do in this House.

To try to sort through some of it, and going back to the member's comments, I do appreciate the fact that there was a little confusion on his length of time. I appreciate his giving up his time to allow us to be engaged in this.

Going back to the old free trade debate, and the one that is always held up, and the idea that engaging in any kind of a trade agreement with any country in the world threatens our health care system, I want to go through a couple of numbers that I would like the hon. member to respond to.

They are in relation to the percentages of Gross Domestic Product, in other words, the resources of Canada that actually go into maintaining a health care system in this country versus the United States.

I agree with the member. We have the best health care system in the world. The fact is that we dedicated fewer financial resources to maintaining the best health care system in the world than the Americans did. They have one of the worst health care systems in the world.

In specific numbers, we dedicate about 9 per cent of GDP to health care, and in the U.S., the figure is 12 per cent. It leaves out 30 per cent of the population.

This idea of that threatening our system is bizarre. Why would we abandon a system that is cheaper to deliver than the American system?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that the American system is a complete hodgepodge and many employers in the United States do not have to pay any health insurance costs whatever.

Because of the free trade agreement, our companies and our employees are obliged to compete often against companies in the United States which pay no such costs. It is very clear that the government knew this when it signed the free trade agreement and it has imposed this pressure on the Canadian economy.

That is one element of the pressure that is now on our health care system, and we are seeing it come to pass. Another product of the free trade agreement is that we are in a terrible recession. Job after job has been lost and government revenues, particularly in the central provinces, have virtually collapsed.

The free trade agreement is a contributor to the problem, but it is not the only contributor to the problem. There have been others, and certainly the more recent economic policies of the government, the high interest rates, the GST, have driven the whole country into a terrible position. We all know that. The country knows that and I do not think we need to look past it to understand why our medicare system is now in a crisis.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I was listening to the member for Victoria during comments and questions, he talked about Mr. Paul Martin Sr.

I would like to indicate that he was an illustrious member of this Chamber and is a Canadian who tells us he has a real love for the country. He gives a real example of a social conscience in his books which I recommend that the hon. member read.

I am glad that for the first time—I had made this point repeatedly in the past, which the NDP had not acknowledged—the NDP, through the member for Victoria, has acknowledged that it was the Liberal Party that conceived of the idea of medicare in 1919.

Like any human being, an idea has to have a beginning. From the idea, the federal Liberal Party gave birth to our Canadian health care system.

In 1984 we continued to nurture it. Last year on March 19, 1991 we introduced in this House a motion that recommits us to medicare. I am very pleased that for the first time the NDP has acknowledged that the Liberal Party of Canada conceived medicare, gave birth to medicare, and continues to nurture medicare.

• (1720)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the memory of the member for Winnipeg North on these matters is a little short. The fact remains that the Liberal Party had to be pitchforked into it and despite promises election after election, it failed to keep it.

However, I do appreciate the belief and conviction that my hon. friend brings to the subject of medicare. It is unfortunate he has found himself in the wrong party. He was the one who correctly characterized Mr. McKenna's suggestions about user fees and deterrent fees when he stated in an article in The Globe and Mail: "It was part of a brainwashing approach" to build support for user fees. I am aghast even at the suggestion. They are certainly building the pressure. I am afraid that it is becoming a trend. All the studies in Canada show we should not adopt user fees. It would hurt the poorest and neediest. The cost of administration would be enormous and it is likely to damage efficiency and equity.

The member understands. Unfortunately his party does not understand and cannot be counted upon to protect universal medicare in this country.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as many people have stated here today, we are in a time of great financial crisis across the country. We are finding that hospitals are laying off staff and closing beds. At a time when health care is in a financial crisis, the New Democratic Party of British Columbia has ordered its hospitals, ignoring democratically elected hospital boards, to perform abortions. It has ordered these hospitals to do so. The vast majority of these operations are not medically required. The same philosophy permeates the Government of Ontario.

I wonder how the member from Victoria can justify these actions at a time when there are line-ups for life-saving medical treatments.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the member for offering me an opportunity to say how proud I am at the action of the Government of B.C., particularly the minister of health who provincially represents the same area that I do in the federal House, the hon. Elizabeth Cull, who has had the courage to offer the women of British Columbia, particularly the interior of British Columbia, the choice of medical services in this respect. I am very proud of what she has done and I am very glad the member has given me an opportunity to put that on the record.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to pose a question to the hon. member for Victoria.

Everybody says we have the best medical care system in the world. The problem is that to have a bypass operation in Vancouver, British Columbia, you have to wait a year. It was suggested that some people should go to the United States to have the operation performed there. How does he explain that?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that is not true.

I acknowledge that there are some terrible difficulties in the medical system in this country. The issue is how we resolve them. One of the real practical problems is generated by the genius of medical science, which has created all kinds of opportunities to keep some of us older folks living a lot longer than we might otherwise live. We get into questions of priorities and choices that we have never had to face before. At least we are trying to struggle with the concept that the choice should not be determined by the size of a person's wallet.

I certainly support the B.C. government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry and then the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, those watching us on television this afternoon must really wonder what is going on in this House when New Democrats continually attack Liberals and Liberals attack New Democrats. It is time for some members on this side to get up, but I suspect that it was arranged with the Liberals, because they are so eager to be in power that they told the NDP, "Attack us. We will know what it was to be in power".

Mr. Speaker, I commend you for your wisdom in accepting an amendment to the resolution. Everyone should perhaps look at what happened yesterday and the day before, March 24 and 25, in Toronto, even though some partisan attacks were made at the first ministers' conference. The worst thing I saw there was when a premier told the Prime Minister that to get a constitutional agreement he would have to offer some economic incentive. I find it absolutely horrible that one would put this country's future on the same level as public works announcements or things like that.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on accepting the motion that would remove all partisanship from it. I am pleased to mention that on the 25th and 26th, the first ministers met in Toronto. They came back with the agenda they had decided on February 10 and they agreed to share among themselves the various issues that they had put forward then. They worked together on ten fields of activity.

Mr. Romanow and Ms. Cournoyea agreed to handle the famous issue of effectiveness and efficiency in social programs, especially the difficult and critical matter of health care. They will speed up their work and I think that we will have at least preliminary results in two months.

Bob Rae and Mr. McKenna will look after training programs. Gary Filmon agreed to direct the work on interprovincial trade. Foreign trade will come under Mr. Harcourt, agriculture under Mr. Romanow, and infrastructure will especially interest or at least come under Mr. Cameron of Nova Scotia.

Fisheries will be Premier Wells' responsibility. The federal government agreed to concentrate on the issues of fiscal and financial co-ordination, another difficult and crucial area.

Regarding health care, it was decided to speed up the proceedings. Two months from now, there will be a meeting of federal, provincial and territorial ministers to discuss health care services. As I said earlier, Mr. Romanow and Ms. Cournoyea will be in charge of this sector.

In fact, the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada agreed, and perhaps we should realize this in the House as well, that all social programs including health care depended on the economy's capacity for generating employment and wealth. Earlier, my colleague referred to these difficult times. The fact is, to quote a colleague sitting behind me, they always want to blame it on free trade. Unfortunately we are in a period of economic restructuring, and we have to live with the problems this creates. There are considerable challenges to be faced, but there is no point in looking for scapegoats.

At the First Ministers' Conference agreement was reached on a number of principles, in order to help increase the economy's capacity to generate employment and wealth. For instance, in the discussion on trade barriers, it was agreed that it was vital to speed up reduction of those barriers. The Minister for International Trade referred to this again this afternoon. The question is often brought up in the House, but it is not something the federal government can deal with alone. Trade barriers are also and mostly a matter of provincial legislation.

However, if we take down interprovincial barriers to trade, there may be times when we have instances of unfair competition between various provinces. In any case, this item will be given careful consideration.

There will be a joint review of the potential trade challenges facing Canada abroad during the next decade. We are now talking about free trade between Canada and the United States, between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico, and we are faced with new developments in Europe. How will these trade challenges determine our position during the next 10 years? What about our relations with the Asian bloc, South America, and so forth? It is important for Canada to determine ways in which it can become a major intervenor.

Another item on which the first ministers agreed was that Transport ministers would consider what could be done about our national highway network. Some felt this was a modest beginning, but it is a start.

We must also consider that by developing our social programs to include an increasing number of programs for training and retraining, we may be making some people too dependent on the system, so that once these people have gone through the whole process of manpower training, social programs, social welfare at the provincial level, unemployment insurance, and so forth, it will be very difficult for them to get out of this potentially vicious circle.

We will have to start looking at ways to prevent this dependency on social programs. We also would like to encourage the private sector to invest in training. My riding, Beauharnois—Salaberry, is located along the American border, and I think it would be wonderful if we could do some of the things that are being done in other provinces to discourage cross-border shopping. That is one of the items on which the 11 first ministers were agreed and where they intend to take some kind of action.

We were talking about economic growth. In conclusion, I would like to repeat what was said by Matthew Barrett, President of the Bank of Montreal, in referring to the economy but especially to the unity of this country: "The message is clear: a divided Canada will be far less able to meet the competition than a united Canada, and the sum of its parts will not be equal to the value of the whole".

These are difficult times for the economy but we are also going through a difficult time in our history as far as national unity is concerned. The repeated partisan attacks we saw this afternoon in the House are certainly not very edifying for Canadians who are listening. I think we should use our precious time to do what we were elected to do and concentrate on the real problems, not only the problems besetting our economy but the problems of the neediest in a rich and prosperous country that is the envy of the whole world.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest and I found it interesting that when a government member finally decided to rise and discuss this matter, he avoided discussion of health care and federal transfer payments completely.

I would like to ask the member if he is aware that the EPF program was based on the idea that money would be transferred to the provinces based on the increase in the Gross National Product. In other words, if the economy did not grow, the dollars being transferred would not grow.

We had a decision, initially by the Liberals in 1982 and then in 1983, and then again twice by the Conservatives which said that they did not care that the economy was expanding, that the money was there for health care, they were going to unilaterally cut back on transfer payments.

Was the member really aware that the EPF was based on an expansion in the economy and that the expansion took place but the Tories reneged on that formula?

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: Mr. Speaker, I first thank my colleague for congratulating us on taking part in the debate. If he and his colleagues had been less obstinate, we would perhaps have had an opportunity to participate before.

I know what my colleague said. In the beginning, we thought about creating this program. A problem we have in our society is that when our economists think of a program of course they always think in terms of growth at a constant rate. That is very common. When the health program was thought up in the early 1960s, there were going to be more and more people paying into it and fewer and fewer at the top drawing on it. On one hand it is true, but on the other hand we must still live with certain realities. The population growth rate has diminished, but when I look at the figures for the province of Quebec, and we have them for all the provinces, in 1984–85 transfers to Quebec for health were $8.153 billion. It is ironic to say that they declined because in 1992–93 they are $11 billion.

In Ontario they were $6 billion and are now $9 billion. In Manitoba they went from $1.1 billion to $1.9 or nearly $2 billion. In British Columbia, the hon. member's province, they were $2.260 billion and are now $3.292 billion.

The problem with these transfers though—and I agree with my colleague there—is that the amount transferred is always a little less than the demand. But in real terms it goes up.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in your absence just a few moments ago, I was on my feet in the question and answer portion of a member's debate. I mentioned the fact that if the Canadian people were watching today, they would be totally confused as to what we were talking about, and some say arguing about, in this debate. It looked like NDP versus Liberal most of the day. They were not attacking us; they were attacking each other.

What I want to do is to read the original motion. I know there have been some changes to it. The motion put forward by the hon. member opposite states:

> That this House express its concern at the threat to Canada's health care system expressed by the stated intention of the Liberal premiers of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland to forego universality and to embrace user and deterrent fees for health services.

Looking at this motion objectively we can understand why it created so much concern on the opposite side of the House. If I or any member of this House wanted to go on the attack, to attack any provincial premier, it is pretty easy to do.

I can stand up here today and rail, point fingers at and criticize the province of New Brunswick. Yesterday they had to deal with certain realities in my home province of New Brunswick. It is the reality that comes with assuming power.

That is something that members opposite do not understand. It is a responsibility that you take on when you form the government. It would be easy for me to stand up here tonight and point my finger at Premier McKenna back in New Brunswick. I will allow the opposition in New Brunswick to do that but I am not going to do it. It serves no useful purpose for me stand up in this House and condemn Premier McKenna for some of the decisions that he had to make.

Why would any premier want to cut services in his home province, whether it is Clyde Wells, Frank McKenna or someone else. Even Bob Rae is an example. Why would they want to do it? The only reason they do it is because that aspect of responsibility that members opposite do not understand because they have not been there. They do not have to balance the sheet at the end of the day. They do not have to be responsible to the taxpayers. All they have to do is tilt and rail and criticize. Nothing will be accomplished in this House if we continually do that. It is awful easy for us to fall into that particular trap.

Yesterday in the province of New Brunswick the premier had to deal with that reality of governing. There are two things that he has to take into consideration, that this government has to take into consideration when it comes to dollars, we have to manage the finances of this country and we have to manage the resources that the Canadian taxpayers give us.

We are finally realizing in this country, and the provinces are realizing it as well finally, that there is only one taxpayer. There is only one of us and it does not make a bit of difference whether we are talking provincial, federal or municipal taxes. It is the same person who pays those taxes. It is the same person at the end of the day and the family of that person who pay the price if those taxes are not spent wisely.

• (1740)

That is the mistake we have made in this country for the last 25 years. I think the former Minister of Finance expressed it best about six months ago when he said: "For the first 100 years of this country we lived off of our resources", a statement which no one here will argue with, no one. In the last 25 years, do you know what we did? Again referring to the minister, "we lived off our credit".

The amazing thing we are finally realizing as governments and regardless of what party we take part in or belong to is that we cannot live on credit. At the end of the day there is a huge price to pay for pulling out that credit card every time we want to deliver services. That is what we have done in this country regardless of political stripe.

If we made a mistake as a party after coming to this place and forming the government in 1984, it is probably realizing that too late. I am not quite sure that the public was ready to accept the types of things we have had to do as a government to bring everything into line, but finally it is because we set the example in this House from the day that I was elected.

All of us in this House are the first generation of politicians elected in 1988 that have not been able to go back to our constituencies with cheque-books in our back pockets to fix every difficulty in the riding. That is the easy trap that politicians have fallen into in this country in the last 25 years: If there is a problem in the riding, write a cheque; the government will come good for it.

Finally we realized that all of those good intentions had a price and it has created a huge mountain of debt over this government. It has created a huge mountain of debt over provincial governments. The interesting thing about this is that the NDP of Ontario is finally realizing what that mountain of debt does to the ability of the premier to fix things back home.

Bob Rae will bring down his budget in the next couple of weeks in Ontario.

An hon. member: Who?

Mr. Thompson: Bob Rae and his finance minister. If you want to be technical, the finance minister of the province of Ontario. When they have to come to grips with reality it is going to make us feds look like little pikers, because they have some real difficulties that they cannot dodge. They cannot duck that bullet of reality that is coming right straight at them, in the face.

He is going to have to do the same types of things that the premier of my province had to do yesterday. He did not want to do that any more than I would want to do it or Bob Rae will have to do it, but again it is called reality. It cannot be dodged. We cannot duck it any longer.

The interesting thing is that government in a sense reflect society as a whole. There is a strange chemistry that works out, that sorts itself out at the end of the day. If we look at government debt in this country in relation to Gross Domestic Product, do you know where we are in terms of percentages? We are right about at the 80 per cent range. In other words, with all the goods and services bought and sold and everything produced in this country, at the end of the day, we are right up there on the debt side, to about 80 per cent, which is very high.

On the provincial, municipal and federal sides of the equation it totals about 80 per cent. The interesting thing is that in the private sector we are almost at the same number. The other interesting thing about this whole equation is that on the individual side of it, individual consumer debt, you and I as citizens of the country are just about at the same percentage level.

Governments over the years have forgotten where those tax dollars came from and have just continued to overspend in these last 25 years. Finally we have premiers, prime ministers, cabinets and governments from coast to coast that realize we have to take control of this thing. Regardless of whether it is an NDP government in B.C. or a Liberal government in Newfoundland, from coast to coast the premiers have finally decided that we have to work together on this matter to bring it back down to reality. If that means that we have to cut services or increase taxes to get it back on the road to recovery, that is what we are going to do. That is what the premiers are saying. It has nothing to do with politics, but it has a whole lot to do with reality. That is what this government is doing.

Our increases to the provinces have continued and will continue, but we are entering that part of the equation that has been missing for many years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments as there is not enough time.

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 81(15) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

Accordingly the first question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1992-93

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, laid upon the table Monday, March 9, 1992, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion on division?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find there might be a disposition within the House to apply the vote which has just been taken on division to the introduction of the supply bill, the second reading, the clauses of the supply bill, concurrence at report stage, and third reading of the supply bill.

Before doing so, I would just like to direct a question to the government House leader as to whether the bill is in its usual form.

Mr. Andre: The bill is in its usual form, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion and the response of the government House leader. Is the House in agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-65, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1992, be read the first time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time, read the second time, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That this House concur in Interim Supply as follows:

That a sum not exceeding $13,987,844,162.99 being composed of:

(1) three-twelfths ($9,905,754,038.00) of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, which were laid upon the Table Thursday, February 27, 1992, and except those items below:

(2) eleven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Energy, Mines and Resources Vote L15, Transport Vote 15, and Treasury Board Vote 10 (Schedule A) of the said Estimates, $198,390,500.00;

(3) ten-twelfths of the total of the amount of Agriculture Vote 25, (Schedule B) of the said Estimates, $413,341,666.67;

(4) nine-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Public Works Vote 15, and Treasury Board Vote 5 (Schedule C) of the said Estimates $353,018,250.00;

(5) seven-twelfths of the total of the amount of Labour Vote 15 (Schedule D) of the said Estimates, $1,146,833.33;

(6) six-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Votes 10 and 45, and Labour Vote 5, and Solicitor General Vote 5 and Transport Vote L55 (Schedule E) of the said Estimates, $174,068,000.00;

(7) five-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Vote 15, and Communications Vote 50, and Environment Vote 1, and Indian Affairs and Northern Development Votes 15, L25, 30 and 50, and Transport Vote 1 (Schedule F) of the said Estimates, $1,800,393,708.34; and

(8) four-twelfths of the total of the amounts of Agriculture Votes 10 and 20, and Communications Votes 30, 35, 75 and 100, and Employment and Immigration Vote 20, and Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote 35, and Industry, Science and Technology Votes 20 and 25, and Justice Vote 1, and National Health and Welfare Vote 15 and Secretary of State Vote 25, and Supply and Services Votes 1 and 5 (Schedule G) of the said Estimates, $1,141,731,166.65.

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Considering the time of day, I wonder if you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote that we have just taken to the introduction of supply Bill C–66, to the second reading of the supply bill, to the clauses in the supply bill, the concurrence at report stage of the bill, third reading of the supply bill, as well as to the deferred division on Bill C–61.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we are going to think about it, but in the meantime I am wondering if the government House leader could indicate to the House as to whether or not the bill is in the usual form, and we will agree with the suggestion by my colleague to the left.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the proportions requested in the bill are intended to provide all necessary requirements for the Government of Canada up until June 30, 1992. In no instance is the total amount of any item being released by the bill. The form of the supply bill is the usual one of interim supply bills.

The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion and the House has heard the government House leader. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-66, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1993, be read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that the bill be read the second time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

REMEMBRANCE DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth) moved that Bill C–289, an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure and an honour for me to have had this bill drawn. For those who are perhaps watching and do not know the process here, private members' bills are submitted and a draw takes place. From that draw some bills are picked which are votable motions. I have been extremely lucky in this particular instance that this bill has been drawn as a votable motion.

An hon. member: Perhaps it was lucky for the 700,000 Legionnaires across Canada as well.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): My colleague says: "Perhaps it was lucky for the 700,000 Legionnaires across Canada as well".

I want to go through what the intent of this bill is. It is a very short bill. It is Bill C–289 and the effect of this bill is quite simple.

The effect of the bill is that every collective agreement entered into pursuant to the Public Service Staff Relations Act shall do a few things. First, Remembrance Day is to be a holiday. Second, no employee in a bargaining unit shall be required to work on Remembrance Day unless it is essential for the public safety or public interest that the work be done on that day. Third, an employee who is required to work on Remembrance Day shall receive extra remuneration or benefit in respect thereof.

A lot of people would ask is that not the case already? It certainly was what I thought had been the case up until about a year ago.

Let us go back and talk a little bit first about what is Remembrance Day and why we honour those who have served and have given the supreme sacrifice of their lives in the pursuit of peace through Canada's Armed Forces.

Remembrance Day is celebrated on November 11. Remembrance Day services take place at the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month. That was the exact time in 1918 when World War I ended. For a period of time, between 1923 and 1931 or 1932, it was called Armistice Day. It was commemorated at the same time as Thanksgiving.

That changed in 1931 when there was an act of Parliament called the Holidays Act that recognized November 11 as a holiday, as it did with two other holidays. Therein lies some of the concern and some of the confusion and most of the problem.

A holiday does not really have any legal weight when dealing with collective agreements entered into by the Government of Canada under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. That is part of the problem.

Remembrance Day was not recognized in 1931 through the Holidays Act just to give people a day off to go to the beach or to have a long weekend. That is not the intent of the Remembrance Day. The intent of Remembrance Day is clear. It is for Canadians to honour by way of a special day those individuals who gave their lives in the pursuit of peace through the Canadian Armed Forces.

I want to give a few little statistics here just so it is clear for everybody. During World War I, Canada had a lot of troops that served overseas. Of those troops that served overseas, there were approximately 60,000 who lost their lives. In World War II, there were over one million Canadians, close to 1.1 million Canadians who served overseas. A substantial number of them gave the supreme sacrifice of their lives.

Although there were fewer individuals, men and women, who lost their lives in World War II, it was still a tragic event. Young men and women who had chosen to serve their country in a time of need, collectively to stop the Nazi movement through Europe in an effort to go and preserve peace and give freedom back to oppressed peoples, to stop a horrible war, they went and paid the supreme sacrifice.

There were many mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers who lost their most precious loved ones during those conflicts.

Finally in the last year the Korean war was recognized as a war and those who served as full veterans. In the Korean war, 312 Canadians paid the supreme sacrifice. They never returned.

Remembrance Day was a day to remember those who gave the supreme sacrifice, who gave their lives. It was also a time for Canadians to set aside everything and reflect on the horrors of war. It was a time for Canadians to sit down and remember clearly that the price of peace is eternal vigilance.

• (1840)

I do not have to remind anybody in this Chamber that just in the last few years we had to debate a war. Not in the 1950s or 1960s, but we had a debate on the 1990s war in the Persian Gulf.

As a member from Dartmouth I know where most of the men and women who serve in the Canadian Navy on the east coast are stationed. We have the naval air support wing and CFB Shearwater and the Sea King helicopters.

I was one of those individuals who went down on the shores of Halifax harbour and watched with a great deal of pride but a lot of fear, as we sent our men and women from the Canadian Armed Forces into a potential theatre of war. We were lucky this time because in that war they all came back. They all came back, by the grace of God and a lot of skill.

But Remembrance Day is a special day. It is a day when we should always remember those who have gone before us.

The problem that we have is one that occurred about two years ago during the collective bargaining process between Canada Post and one of its unions.

It was a tough negotiation process. Both sides were entrenched in their positions and it was not coming along very well. It became the subject of an article which was reported in the news that Canada Post had indicated that Remembrance Day was a negotiable holiday for the employees of Canada Post. That shocked almost everybody. It certainly shocked the employees. It shocked the 700,000 veterans around this country, Legion members, that Remembrance Day might be a bargaining chip that can be bargained away during the collective bargaining process, particularly in agreements under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The federal government, in negotiating contracts, did not have any legal obligation to ensure that Remembrance Day was a statutory paid holiday. Indeed, there was no weight in law that compelled any government or anybody negotiating on behalf of the government not to negotiate away Remembrance Day. I always thought it was a given.

My father, who is a veteran, served overseas and was wounded twice. He actually served with Dan MacDonald, the former minister of veterans affairs for P.E.I. He was with the hon. Dan MacDonald when Dan lost his arm and his leg in Italy. I called my father. My father said: "This is ridiculous. Of course Remembrance Day is a statutory holiday, particularly in the federal civil service".

But that is by convention, not by statute. It is a difficult issue for some of us to grapple with because I did not believe it. We checked with the department and they were not sure. So we checked with the Library of Parliament. Sure enough, it came back that Remembrance Day, although it is a holiday under the Holidays Act, is not necessarily a day that has to be given as a paid holiday in collective agreements negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, or indeed under any other act like the Canada Labour Code.

Clearly what this bill tries to do is not to change the status quo because luckily until now the status quo has been that it has always been negotiated as a holiday to be celebrated on November 11. But what this bill does is to ensure that it will always be a holiday in federal Public Service contracts, and that that holiday will always take place on November 11.

Picture it: The further we get away from World War I and World War II and the Korean war, the further we get away from those particular awful periods in our history, the less likely it becomes that the public is going to honour Remembrance Day the way that it was originally meant to be done. We all know that.

When I went to school, when I was growing up in Cape Breton Island, I clearly remember that Remembrance Day was one of the biggest days of the year. It was not a day that was a holiday. It was a day that in the weeks leading up to it we did essays, there were always poster contests and essay contests. We had people from the Legion who came in and talked about the war.

Then Remembrance Day itself was a big day. It was the biggest day in my town of New Waterford, because on Remembrance Day there was the biggest parade and everybody came out. Everybody came out because that little town in World War II, had the highest rate of enlistment per capita of any town in the British Commonwealth, in the British Empire.

It was a big day because there were a lot of families in that town who lost loved ones. There were a lot of people like my father, for whom Remembrance Day was the best day and the worst day of the year.

It was the best day of the year because he felt proud he had served and that his community, even in all those years after the war would still come out and honour him and his colleagues.

But it was a sad day for him. It was a day when he had to stand with his buddies and after the services, after the march and after the parade, they would go back into the Legion and sit down and shed a few tears and tell a few stories, because they lost some of their best friends. They were in slick trenches next to their best friends in the world when they lost their lives. Those memories are never, ever forgotten by those who served.

This bill is timely. There is one little problem with this bill. I thought most members of this House would be prepared to put a piece of legislation in place, in the spirit of co-operation in this House. It is something that clearly does not cause the federal treasury any further encumbrances.

It is not a partisan issue. But it clearly sends a message from the Parliament of Canada to those men and women who have served in the Canadian Armed Forces, to the families of those who have given the supreme sacrifice in fighting world wars and in Korea.

The message is that we do remember and we are prepared to take unusual steps, such as this bill, a one-page bill. It simply says: 'You do not have to worry. As the world changes and as we get further and further and further from those world wars and the Korean war, because the federal government is going to make sure that at some future point we do not have to worry about Remembrance Day being negotiated away so that somebody has an extra day in the middle of the summer, so it is more attractive to trade that day for some other benefit".

That is not why Remembrance Day was part of the Holidays Act. It was not so that someone got a benefit. It was so that we would all remember the horrors of war and to give thanks that we live in a country that is peaceful. Most of all, it is that we remember those young men and women who gave their lives in the pursuit of peace on behalf of Canada. That is clearly what the bill does. It does not do any more nor does it do any less than that.

I just want to point out a couple of other things because some members are still saying to me: "Are you sure this is not covered? Are you sure that under the Holidays Act the negotiators for the government through the Public Service Commission does not have to give it?" No, they do not have to give it.

In clause M20.01, it says this is a negotiated item. This is what was negotiated. It says: "Subject to clause M20.02 the following days shall be designated paid holidays for employees". It goes through the list and (h) is Remembrance Day.

If this was in law already it would not have to be a negotiated clause in the collective master agreement with the Public Service Alliance of Canada. This is the master agreement. It is a negotiable holiday. I do not think anybody in this House thought it was a negotiable holiday.

Treasury Board has some concerns, so I am told, and I understand it. Treasury Board says: "Well, we do not know that we should support this bill. Not because it changes the status quo, but it may tie our hands in the future from negotiating things in the collective bargaining process". That is exactly what I am trying to do. There are some crazy trends going on out there.

Remember that it was the post office, a Crown corporation that said in negotiations a year and a half ago that this was a negotiable item. The post office was the first to put it on the table. Maybe at some future time, when this government or future governments are having difficulty with the Public Service unions in the country it will say: "No, we are not going to give you Remembrance Day. We are going to hold Remembrance Day over your head until you give us something back".

It goes completely against the intent of the original legislation. It goes completely against the declaration of Armistice Day back in the 1920s. It certainly goes against the spirit of Canadians who have chosen over the years to keep Remembrance Day sacred.

Treasury Board is afraid this might create a precedent. Somehow somebody else is going to come in with another day and say: "We are going to make sure this is a compulsory statutory holiday that is in law and is non-negotiable".

• (1850)

That is a ridiculous argument. Remembrance Day is a special holiday. There is none other like it in Canada. We have the July 1 holiday. That is a very special day for us in this country. We have Christmas and we have some other holidays as well.

This is the one day that is not meant as a celebratory day. It is meant as a reflective day. We have to remember that it is there in honour of those individuals who gave their lives for this country. It is why it is called Remembrance Day. That is why it is not veterans' day. It is Remembrance Day, clearly.

The Treasury Board's concerns are a little deeper than that as well. We are trying to address this because I know that sometimes bureaucrats get on these things and think if it comes from a Liberal and they are working for the Tory government that they automatically have to find reasons why they cannot pass these things.

I understand that. These things happen. It is a partisan place. This is not a partisan bill, and I want to make that clear. Every member in this Chamber has a legion, as least one, in the riding. Some members have as many as nine. Every legion in the country that has been apprised of this bill has fully supported the intent of the bill. The president of the Dominion Command has written to the three leaders and has written to the minister involved, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, indicating that he wants the members of this place to support this bill, not because it gives the legion anything that it did not think it already had, but because it makes sure that it does not lose what it thought it already had.

Legion members, every year when they go down to the cenotaphs on November 11, in many towns, villages and cities across this country, find that fewer and fewer people come out. In some parts of this country, the shopping malls are still open on November 11. This bill does not seek to change that, but it says the federal government, the Government of Canada, will make that Remembrance Day will not fall by the wayside as a bargaining chip in future collective agreements that come under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The Treasury Board is concerned that if this goes into law, it will remove the ability of concerned parties to structure benefit levels. Remembrance Day is a holiday for virtually all public sector employees. This bill is not designed to alter benefit levels or change anything like that. It is an effort to by statute ensure that the status quo does not change. That is it. That is all it does.

The Treasury Board is also concerned that this bill, if passed, would mean that thousands of non-unionized public servants would not be affected by it because of taxable collective agreements. The Government of Canada currently treats those non-unionized management personnel the say way, when it gives its holidays out, as it does its unionized personnel. It is a bogus argument.

The government is concerned most of all that if this bill passes it is going to set a precedent and that all kinds of other special interest groups are going to come in here and try to tie the hands of the Treasury Board and say: "Here are the days that you cannot negotiate that are going to be in law and you are going to have to give them to your public servants".

I urge the members of this House to do the right thing. It is not because it is my bill. Anyone could have put this forward. We all have legions. We have recently debated war, and some members of this Chamber, one of whom is the member from New Brunswick, even had children who served in the Persian Gulf war. It is pretty close to us right now.

There is something we can do here that will show that this Chamber does work, that it is not always highly partisan and that it does recognize the contribution of those who have served the country through our Canadian Armed Forces. I am asking members of all political stripes in this House to look at this bill and see if we can put a very positive statement out from this House that is currently the subject of much criticism by the public. The members of this House can work together and pass legislation which will be of benefit to all Canadians and make all Canadians proud of the service that has been rendered by the men and women who have served in the wars in which Canada has participated.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate. I want to begin by thanking the hon. member for Dartmouth on his reference to my son.

It is a good point to pick up on this debate. I am not sure how old I look to the folks back home. I am not that old. I think I am the only member in this House who had a son who served on the ground in the Persian gulf war. He is only 22. I can remember the night that I had to make a big decision as to whether I vote in favour of us entering that conflict. It was probably one of the most difficult votes that I have had to take as a member of Parliament. I sided with the government and I sided in our defence of freedom and democracy and for the things we always stood for as a country. I am very proud of having voted in that way. I am very proud of what my son did in that conflict.

Now he is a veteran of a foreign war which was brought to my attention by the Minister of Veteran's Affairs one day. It is strange when he put it in that context; my son is now a veteran of a foreign war. It has a certain ring to it. Reflecting on what the member for Dartmouth mentioned, there is no group of people in Canadian society that we have higher regard for than those men and women who served us so well overseas during World War 1, World War 11, and the Korean War. We have a special place in our hearts for all those men and women. It is important for us to recognize that this evening as we debate this bill.

Their role was a very special one. We recognize in a very special way those respective roles in those wars. There is no group of men and women in the world that received more from the respective governments than the men and women who are veterans in this country.

In this moment in our history when we are struggling to keep this country together and maintain the Canadian unity we all desire, there is no group of people working harder than us for individual Canadians in the Canadian Legion. In my own riding, I have had numerous legions. As the members said, all of us will have at least one legion. I suppose if I added them up, there would be dozens of legions in my riding. It is a very rural riding and very wide spread. Just about every little town and village has its own legion. They have just done some remarkable things back in my riding in this Canadian unity debate. They set up their own little committees and their own task forces to examine Canadian unity and what it means to them.

I have tabled in this House some of their papers, some of their reports, on Canadian unity which were considered by our committee and have been sent to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. They are very reflective. They could only come from a group of men and women that had the sense of determination and search for freedom as in World War 1 and World War 11. These people certainly carry their share of a load in this country. I am speaking again for every constituency in this country.

What the hon. member is suggesting in his bill does nothing to heighten that level of observance for Remembrance Day. That is the thing we have to remember. It does nothing, because we observe it as no other country in this world does. Remembrance Day is for all the right reasons, because we know the sacrifices they have made and given for their country. In many cases they have given their lives. What it would amount to is a legislative benefit, and that is where I have a problem. A legislative benefit simply means one thing. There is a cost attached to it. If you are talking about sacrifices and costs, we can have an emotional argument which we will all accept. There is no cost too great for those people who served us. No one disagrees with that.

It does not heighten our awareness of that very special day.

• (1900)

Within the federal bureaucracy, the Public Service, there is a dollar attached to that recognition. At a time when all Canadians have had enough with taxes and government expense, what do we do? That is the question that we have to ask ourselves.

The best thing to do, obviously, is to pass this thing if we had no other considerations to make; just stand up and pass it, because it is the thing that would make us feel better at the end of the day.

With government comes responsibility, and it almost goes back to where I left off before we had our recorded votes this evening. With government comes responsibility, and governments for the first time are recognizing that every time we stand up in this House and pass something, no matter how small or how big, if it is a money bill, there is a price attached to it that the Canadian taxpayers have to pay. I guess we all pay because there is only one taxpayer, as I reminded you earlier today. There is only one.

That is where we have to reflect on this thing. What are we doing if we pass it? We are just putting a little bit more of a burden on the Canadian taxpayers.

Having been in business for a number of years before I arrived here, and most of the time strictly in sales in which you have to go out and make it happen yourself, every time there is a holiday and the country shuts down in a sense, it has something to do with productivity. We lose a days work or there is a day that the Canadian taxpayer has to make up for. There are only so many working days in the year.

We can count the number of government employees we have in this country. Let me go through some of those numbers. They are astounding figures. There are more than 210,000 federal employees, 187,000 of whom are unionized. The annual payroll of these employees is $7 billion.

With other considerations taken in, it comes to a total figure of something like $8.3 billion. Out of that, and this is reflective of this government and what we do for our Armed Forces, $4.2 billion is paid annually to the Armed Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

There we go. One does not have to be a genius in mathematics to calculate what the cost would be. That is the part I want to emphasize. We recognize the holiday. We recognize the contribution of our war veterans like no other country in the world and I am very proud of that.

Before I sit down, recognizing what we have done for our veterans, I want to emphasize what the Minister of Veterans Affairs did today for the veterans of Canada in Halifax. He announced today that this government will soon introduce legislation for Canada's merchant navy veterans. That is one that will bring a smile to the face of the member opposite because he has worked very hard for that. Many of us have.

Recognizing the special role that our merchant marine played in Canada's World War II effort is very good news for all of us.

To conclude, I want to use that announcement today by Mr. Merrithew as an indication of how seriously we take the veterans of this country. As I began, there is no group of people that has dedicated more or done more for the country than that particular group of people.

I am very pleased with what we have done as a government and I look forward to a continuation of this debate.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate. In doing, so I want to start out by complimenting the member for Dartmouth on his initiative. He said in his opening remarks that any member could have done this and that is true, but he did it. I think he deserves a lot of credit from all sides of the House for this initiative.

It is an important bill because in a lot of ways Canada is slowly forgetting why we gather on November 11. It is because at the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month we pause to remember those who fought for Canada. A lot of people fought and died.

When I hear the hon. member across the floor say that there is a cost associated with this bill, a cost associated with ensuring that at the very least federal public employees have the day off so that should they choose to, they can join members of Parliament at the cenotaph to remember and to lay wreaths, I regret the hon. member made that kind of comparison. The cost in human lives in World War I, World War II, the Korean war and, may I add, some of our peacekeeping initiatives as a nation cannot be measured in dollars and cents.

On the other hand, this Bill C-289 takes the monetary aspect of Remembrance Day off of the bargaining table. Neither side can use Remembrance Day as a bargaining chip to deal with wage increases or fringe benefits or working conditions or what have you. That is the underlying significance of this private member's initiative.

I would ask government members, assuming that what we just heard from their member who spoke is symptomatic of their feeling about this proposal, to reconsider.

On the other hand, I would have preferred the member, and again the onus is on me because I have not done it, to bring forward a bill that makes it a national holiday, that forces all of us to lay down our tools to remember.

I can say to you that on Remembrance Day at the cenotaph in Thunder Bay, and I am sure it is the same in Dartmouth, Winnipeg, Victoria and Iqaluit, that members of our Royal Canadian Legions will talk about why the school kids have to be in school today and why the mall is open. They are pleased that the federal public employees have the day off. They are pleased that provincial employees have the day off. They are pleased that the municipal employees have the day off. They are pleased that those members of that bargaining unit, in conjunction with their employer, have decided to make that day a holiday. In effect, they have traded off a day off to remember for some monetary or language aspect of their collective agreement. As we know, at the bargaining table you do not get something for nothing.

This is an important bill. It is important to all of us who recognize what those men and women did for us in the three major wars and the gulf and the peacekeeping initiatives which they are still involved in. We have a responsibility to them and the memory of them to set aside a day to remember them and to celebrate the democracy that we have because they gave their lives or they gave up an arm or leg or whatever. We all know them and I suspect we all have them in our own family. Members have heard me speak in this House before about my father who was a member of the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders, captured at the landing of Dieppe, and spent 32 months in a Nazi prison camp.

There are all sorts of stories like that. Yes, we hear about them on Remembrance Day. Sometimes the stories are a little embellished, as good story tellers are wont to do, but there is also a tear in the eye. It is an important day and we should recognize it as something more than to be bargained for at the bargaining table.

Look at the young people, the children of the baby boom who come down with their teachers to the cenotaph, who had been instructed in the history of World War I, World War II, the Korean war and, I suspect now, slowly they will be instructed about the gulf. They look in awe at these, dare I say it, old men in their legion uniforms marching, still in step, as they make their way to the cenotaph to honour their comrades. The very least that we should do is ensure that it is not a matter for the bargaining table.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise this evening to support this bill. I wish to congratulate my college from Dartmouth on the tremendous presentation he made here tonight. I do not think we really need to add that much to what he has said to convince people in this House that this bill needs to be supported.

I am seconding the motion for this bill mainly because I believe the the six legions in my riding would like me to stand in my place here tonight and to support this bill. I am sure that all legions in my province of Prince Edward Island and all Islanders know or remember what our veterans have gone through and deserve.

I would like to also congratulate our present Minister of Veterans Affairs for his announcement today in Halifax where he announced that the merchant marine veterans would come under veterans affairs legislation. This is something that is very long overdue. These people served in dangerous waters around the world, especially during the Second World War. I congratulate the government and the minister for finally recognizing the contributions these people made.

The previous speaker said that people are forgetting. Indeed, that is correct. I know the veterans in my riding are very afraid that people will eventually forget entirely the great sacrifice which they and their friends made in the first war, the second war, the Korean war. There is a fear among veterans that one of these days in the not-too-distant future, people will forget entirely and their great sacrifice will be something which we may have read about in history books when we were kids.

We have to remember that while they are viewed as old men today, there are still a few First World War veterans living. There are still quite a number of Second World War veterans living. The thing you have to remember about these old men, these old soldiers, these veterans is that when they went to war, they were kids. They were 17, 18, 19, 20 years old and they were put in a life and death position where they had to not only defend themselves and their comrades, but they were there with the attitude and the belief that they were not there as a waste of time or they were not there in vain. They were there to defend a great principle, the principle of democracy and freedom in this world. I have an 18-year old son. If he would have been 18 at the time of the First World War or 18 years old at the time of the Second World War, he would have been signing up to go overseas to possibly give up his life. It is quite a thing to contemplate. Yet many of these people who signed up were under age.

I remember being in Vimy a year ago last November. There was a celebration there with the oldest Canadian veteran of the First World War who is now living in Maine. He had signed up when he was 15 years old. He somehow got into the First World War when he was 15 years old. To think that these people were so young. Most of these people who died were basically kids. They were not people in their 30s or 40s. These were what we call today teenagers and very, very young men who were just beginning their lives.

That one of these days that we as Canadians will forget the contribution that they made is something that we should not contemplate.

This bill is a beginning. I disagree with the government member from Carleton—Charlotte who tied this in as a cost to the taxpayer. If we are just talking about civil servants, they already have the day off through negotiations. To take it out of the negotiating process is not adding a penny to the cost of Remembrance Day.

We are forgetting that no wars of any great magnitude have been fought in this country. It is our people who went to Europe and to Asia to fight these wars. It is the 75th anniversary of the Battle of Vimy Ridge which was the battle as far as Canada is concerned. It was a watershed battle where we discovered our nationhood in many historians' views. We became of age in the Battle of Vimy Ridge 75 years ago.

As I said, I had the pleasure of visiting that grand memorial we have there. All around the Belgian plains and all around the French fields of Flanders you will see many monuments and many graveyards from the First and Second World Wars. The Europeans have had a long and bloody history that I guess our forefathers thought we were going to avoid when we came to North America to start a new life, that we would be no longer embroiled in the battles and the bloody wars of Europe. Such was not our fate.

In the fields of Flanders I think there are still five Frenchmen a year who are killed because of munitions that are coming up through the ground. Farmers who are harrowing and ploughing run over this still live ammunition and get blown up. There is on average still five French citizens a year who die because of the First World War.

You will see monuments there from South Africa and from the enemy which at that time was Germany. They have some fantastic monuments there remembering their dead. The thing about the Europeans is the respect, the admiration and the time they take to come to our memorials. The great respect that they had for the Canadian soldier is still there. They and their ancestors have gone through bloody wars. They have seen their country ravaged. They are very thankful for the efforts that the Canadians made to maintain their freedom, not just our freedom. It was the freedom of the Europeans, the freedom of France, the freedom of England and the freedom of all Europe. They still remember with great reverence the sacrifice that our Canadian soldiers made.

In conclusion, I ask this House to take this bill very seriously and to give a lot of thought to remembering our Legionnaires and our veterans when we are voting on this bill. I think if we do that we will be supporting this bill and we will be taking the first step into guaranteeing that this Remembrance Day will always be remembered by the Canadian people.

• (1920)

Mr. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am very pleased to take part in the birth of this veterans bill, as we may call it. We have to recognize the veterans.

We can be very proud of the role that they have played after the wars also. Probably when they returned, they came into a new world, after seeing a lot of destruction and everything else on the battlefields. They came back with the many experiences they had during the wars over in Europe and in other wars that they had participated in.

They brought back a lot of insight. They were great builders and have been great builders of our country. We can honour the dead but we cannot bring them back. I think that probably this is something we should be doing, we should show through our legions and through our other organizations what the veterans have done. Probably to many people this would be a lost history if we do not do something about it. This is why I am supporting this bill.

I think our veterans over the years have made contributions in many, many ways that has made Canada the nation that it is today from sea to sea.

We cannot look at just any one part of our country. Our contribution in the world wars, my friends, has been great. There is no one individual, no one party, or anyone else who can say we did this and we did that. We did it collectively, my friends, and we can be proud of this. We are proud in the eyes of the world, proud of the contribution that Canadians have made.

We are proud in the eyes of the world of what our legions have done to promote many things in our society. Look at the contribution they make to the younger generations, what they have done for our senior citizens, what they have done for all segments of our community.

You can go into rural Ontario, you can go into metropolitan Toronto, or any other major city in our country that you may wish to speak of, and I have been in to a lot of them. I have been to the legions in western Canada, I have been to the legions in northwestern Ontario, I have been in to the legions in the maritimes. We are proud. I am proud, very proud to attend a legion rally or function, wherever it may be, for the spirit that is behind it. This spirit is not enhanced in any one area, it is a broad spirit, it is the spirit of the Canadian soldier in his war effort.

This is what we have to talk about, my friends. We have to be proud of that. We have to tell that to this growing world which is changing so very fast, changing every day; We have got to instil in them too what our soldiers have done in the wars in foreign countries, their contributions, as I have said before, to this great Canadian nation of ours.

They have helped toward building Canada into a better place to be. They have helped in fostering some group or some child who probably has had some obstacle in life that has prohibited them from taking part in the great society we have, in sports and in many other things. You see the wheelchairs the legion has provided and the programs they promote for making wheelchairs available to our seniors and our disabled.

This is why I think that we all should be very proud of our Canadian Legions. We all should be very proud when we attend Armistice Day celebrations, which our legions take a big part in. We should be proud in the community functions that would not exist without the Royal Canadian Legion.

This is why I can sponsor this bill. This is why I can speak on this bill. I want to speak on this bill in the spirit that encompasses our great country of Canada. In encompassing that great vast area that we are proud of and we talk about, we have to think we are not the only producers of our lifestyle. We have to think of these other organizations that contribute so much to making Canada what we are all so proud of today, the envy of our great nation to the south, the Americans. They would love to have some of the things that we have had and we have at this time which they probably for some reason or other cannot afford to have.

These are things that a small nation can take pride in and shows the spirit of its people. This is something we have to boast about.

We cannot leave the Canadian Legion aside when we speak about of the great spirit of our country. They have been a big part of it and we wish them to be in the future.

I hopefully will be participating at some other stage in this bill. I want to congratulate the sponsor and I think, as others have said, that it is probably something that is long overdue.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House for the opportunity to speak on Bill C–289. I want to congratulate my colleague from Dartmouth for presenting this bill before the House and my colleague from Egmont for seconding it, which is an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements.

This bill is about the traditional values that this country is known for. This bill is a tribute, as the previous speaker said, to the spirit of the Canadian soldier, the spirit of integrity, the spirit of someone who was there to make sacrifices.

When my colleague from Egmont talked earlier about the fact that some of our soldiers went over to serve in World War II at the ages of 17 and 18, he was so right. My father was a member of the RCAF. He was 17 years old when he was sent over to England and I remember him telling me on more than one occasion of his flights in Halifaxes and Lancasters, in planes that rattled and shook and the fear that they had, the nervousness that they had when they were flying over Europe.

I think that today it is almost impossible for us to imagine what it was like. I have a son 15 years old. I cannot imagine two more years from now sending him off to fight in a war, flying in a plane like a Halifax or a Lancaster. There would be no way.

It is very important for all of us to make sure that the very special day, Remembrance Day, is enshrined in the basic culture of this country. What we do not want to do is create a situation where this day can be diminished in any way, shape or form.

As the speaker said previously there is really no extra cost to the taxpayer. We are already giving this day to public servants to celebrate and bear witness. There is no additional cost.

By passing this bill we will enshrine Remembrance Day in a way that it cannot be diminished in any way, shape or form.

As time goes on and there will be fewer and fewer people with us who have that very special feeling of remembrance for those experiences in World War I, World War II, or the Korean war.

We are going to need the instrument, the Public Service of Canada, to make sure that memory is carried on. In remembering that day, we are also remembering values that are so important to making sure that the character of this nation stays strong.

This bill is on behalf of all of those people who have served in those wars for Canada, fighting for democracy, freedom and peace. In my own riding I know the members of Todd Morden Branch 10, the Royal Canadian Legion and the Greek Veterans Branch 265 would hold me accountable if I did not stand and lend by support on this bill. I am very happy to have had this opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, for several minutes, I have heard touching tributes to our veterans and legionnaires. Of course I share my colleagues' opinions on the importance of remembering what they did.

What I have trouble understanding is that this really has little to do with the bill that was presented. It does not seek to designate a national holiday. That is already done. What it attempts to do is to change collective agreements. It would meddle and decide for the union what should be in the collective agreement, without the agreement of the parties and without considering the federal Public Sector Compensation Act passed by the House of Commons on October 1, 1991. This is an affront to the unions which had hard times last summer, as we all recall.

Furthermore, this bill is a threat to management rights, in that our managers could no longer provide services to the public unless public safety was involved. We have gone from the noble principle of recognizing our veterans and legionnaires to interfering in a labour agreement, and I find that unfortunate.

You will no doubt remember, Mr. Speaker, all the difficulties in applying this principle during a strike and that the Supreme Court had to deal with this question in the air traffic controllers' case nearly 10 years ago.

The worst thing about this bill is that it is unnecessary. To our knowledge, all Public Service collective agreements already provide for Remembrance Day as a paid holiday and any public servant required to work on that day is entitled to overtime. However, no collective agreement restricts management rights as drastically as Bill C–289.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me that my time is almost up. In conclusion I will say that I am sorry but, as I said at the beginning, this bill has nothing to do with giving our veterans due recognition. If we need such a bill to recognize our veterans, I think that something is missing somewhere. In its programs the government recognizes Remembrance Day, compensates workers for it and ensures that it will always be present in the minds of all Canadians.

DEBT SERVICING AND ACCOUNT REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are six motions in amendment at report stage to Bill C-21.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, and Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, are identical. After consultation, I chose Motion No. 2 to be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, and Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, are identical. Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, and Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, are also identical. After consultation, I have selected Motions Nos. 4 and 6 for debate. They will be grouped for debate, with a vote on Motion No. 4 applying to Motion No. 6.

I will now submit Motion No. 2 to the House.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 22 and 23 at page 1 and lines 1 to 20 at page 2.

He said: Madam Speaker, I certainly want to say first of all that your decision on the appropriate way to proceed this morning has been first rate.

I would like to explain there might seem to have been some duplication between my hon. friend from Essex—Windsor and myself. The reality is that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is busy today pursuing duties outside the House. As a result he is unable to be here.

• (1010)

He was hoping to be here, so that is the reason for what appears to be duplication. It is not duplication. The fact is that I am pinch-hitting for my hon. friend. I appreciate the support that my friends from the Official Opposition give as well.

I want to begin my discussion in the debate on Motion No. 2 by identifying first what became clear in committee. That is, this bill is essentially a phoney bill.

The bill is an effort by the government to justify the goods and services tax by suggesting that the surplus revenues raised by the goods and services tax would be used to reduce the deficit and pay down the debt and therefore, the structuring of this special accounting procedure.

All it is is a bit of smoke and mirrors in an effort to say that this goods and services tax is good for Canada because it will be used to pay down the deficit. That is absolute nonsense. If the government was interested in paying down the deficit, it is simply a matter of having excess funds at the end of the year depending on various programs, and that would occur naturally.

There is no need for a special account or special legislation. It is simply a matter of good government. Since we do not have good government, obviously the government has had to come up with some type of imagery to give the impression at least, that it is attempting to do this.

I say that as sort of a preliminary statement. Anybody who is taking this as a serious initiative by the government obviously does not recognize the pure politics of this. I feel very saddened that politics has had to become involved in this critical issue in terms of deficit and debt reduction. Once again, that is the government's decision.

What this amendment does is it says that in the legislation generally, it identifies the GST surpluses to be used to reduce the deficit and pay down the debt. It also includes the possible sale of select Crown corporations, the proceeds of which would be used again to reduce the deficit or pay down the debt.

What has become clear when looking at the reaction that various witnesses have provided is that this provides the government with an opportunity to hold some fire sales and start selling off, if you like, government assets.

Mr. Milliken: They've been doing that already.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands reminds me, unfortunately, that they have already started to do this in some rather illogical ways.

Setting that aside, what this will do is provide the government with the incentive to hold a fire sale and sell off valuable government assets to, at the last minute, probably before an election, pay down the deficit, or at least to give this impression.

In the best interests of the country, Canadians have said that this is not the appropriate course of action and that Canadians do not support this course of action. It would simply not be a logical clause to have continue with the legislation.

My hon. colleague from Essex—Windsor, and now through my own motion, simply says: "Let us eliminate from the legislation, that particular sector". Anybody who has studied this with any detail would support this initiative.

I know my hon. friend across the way has indicated some interest in this provision. We are simply saying with this motion: "Let us remove the lines at the bottom of page 1 and the first 20 lines on the top of page 2". That would essentially eliminate the Crown corporations from being part of this phoney deficit reduction legislation.

It is as straightforward as that. If we would simply adopt this motion, we could proceed then and deal quickly with the remainder.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we are considering Bill C–21, an Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

This government announced a wonderful measure to create through legislation a fund where all the net revenue from the GST, sales of companies, privatization and money that some Canadians want to give to the government would go for the sole purpose of reducing our national debt and/or our interest payments on it.

My colleague opposite says that we should take out the money from any sale of companies that the government owns, i.e. privatization, to see what we get from the GST. Madam Speaker, I think it is completely frivolous to want what Canadians do not want. Why have only the amount collected from the GST, when the books for the fund to be created will be audited annually by the Canadian government's accountant, so that we will be able to identify very clearly the net receipts from the GST. We will also be able to identify very clearly the net receipts from the privatization of companies and also identify the amounts received from Canadians.

I should tell the hon. member that in 10 months, the Canadian government has already received $375,000 from some Canadian taxpayers and this money was used to pay the interest on the debt and thus lower the tax burden. It is important to point out that so far $375,000 has been received from Canadian taxpayers in addition to the income taxes that they have to pay. Madam Speaker, that shows how important Canadians consider this bill to be and how important it is for them to have a fund where the money needed to pay the interest on our debts and eventually pay them off can go.

Madam Speaker, you will remember as I do that when we were elected in 1984, we talked about the countless Crown corporations, most of which operated at a loss, and we all knew that they were competing with private enterprise. In 1984, Canadians gave us a clear mandate to get rid of companies that cost us money and competed with private enterprise.

In 1988, Madam Speaker, in the riding of Trois-Rivières, I listed the companies that had been sold or privatized and said that we would continue to do so. The riding of Trois-Rivières gave a clear mandate to your humble servant and the Conservative Party to continue to get rid of the lame ducks which the previous government had bought or set up and so on.

What we are saying today is that the money from the sale of companies, that is the net proceeds, in addition to GST revenue, will be used to reduce the interest payable on the debt and eventually to reduce the debt itself.

The only justification for the NDP motion, Madam Speaker, is allegedly to avoid any possible fire sales. This government to date has privatized companies remarkably well. It has managed to get some Crown corporations back on track and sell them at a profit. The object of the exercise is to dispose of them, but at the same time make money and/or stop losing it. Do not forget that every time the government puts money in a company it owns that competes with the private sector, Canadians' taxes are being used to give a Crown corporation money to compete with other companies that do not have public funds. That is completely illogical, Madam Speaker.

• (1020)

Whence the importance of privatizing companies, and because we have a deficit and a national debt, it is also important to take this money to reduce the interest on the debt and/or the debt itself. Even if we removed the proceeds of privatization from this fund, the government could still sell the companies. Every time it sells a company, it is done publicly and advertised and can be audited by any accountant or lawyer in the country. So my colleague's suggestion of not including privatization proceeds in the fund because it might lead to fire sales makes no sense at all.

Madam Speaker, I hope that this House will reject this motion as quickly as possible so that this bill as presented can pass third reading in the shortest time, especially since that is what Canadians want.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, it is very appropriate today that I support the motion from the House leader of the New Democratic Party. I support it because this government has a track record of dismantling just about every federal national institution that exists in this country. So often we have seen that the process or the management of the dissolution or the dismantling has really not been in the best interests of Canadian taxpayers.

Just think of the Air Canada transaction where it went to the market and dumped the first portion of shares. Independent analysts said that it was dumping those shares at approximately $2 below share value. That is not the right way to go.

What did it do with the proceeds of the shares on Air Canada? It did not take the proceeds and put them back into the federal treasury. It took the proceeds of the shares on the sale of Air Canada and put them into that portion of the corporation that had been privatized. This was almost like a double-dip for the person who had acquired the shares. There was absolutely no public accountability and no debate on that particular transaction.

Before Christmas we passed a bill in this House which essentially allowed the sale of Crown lands by just choosing three independent people to do an appraisal. Once you get those three independent appraisals, the government by Order in Council is allowed to make the transaction. In other words it does not have to come to Parliament.

This Government of Canada has on its balance sheet billions and billions of dollars in assets. They could be in land, buildings, airports, harbours or Crown corporations. Under that bill which we passed before Christmas there is no accountability on the disposition of those lands.

We have a depressed market in our country right now. Let us take, for example, my part of the country. We have tens of thousands of acres in Pickering that we assembled for the super airport that we should have but never did build. It was our government that did not build it, but we made a mistake I believe. There are thousands and thousands of acres there for sale as of the last budget. We just have to read the newspaper today to see what is happening to the Reichmanns. Olympia & York real estate right now is in the gutter, it is so depressed, it is so low. Therefore, the value of those Crown lands at this moment are very low.

Technically, Public Works Canada could get three independent appraisals on the value of the lands. People could put in bids. They would all be low. Even if they took the highest bid, because the market is depressed, it would literally be a giveaway. Two years, three years from now we may need that land not only for a possible airport, we may need it to lever the province for housing or some other project. I do not know. We will kick ourselves because we gave the government the power to basically get rid of it, sell it off, all in the name of debt reduction.

I always use the example of the House of Commons. Technically speaking, with the act that we passed before Christmas combined with this bill, this government has the power by Order in Council to take bids on this Crown land, this House of Commons. Technically speaking, it could sell it without any debate on the floor of this House. That is a fact, all in the name of debt reduction.

Mr. Thompson: That is not a bad idea.

Mr. Mills: The hon. member said that it is not a bad idea. I am sure most Canadians would probably agree with him most days, that it is not a bad idea.

The member for the New Democratic Party in putting forward this motion is trying in a genuine way to put the brakes on this presidential style government where it can just do everything by Order in Council, where there is no debate, no discussion on the floor of the House of Commons.

I gave the example before of the federal presence lands, the Crown lands, Crown buildings in the province of Quebec. We have billions and billions of dollars of Crown lands in the province of Quebec. Let us imagine after the next election the possibility of a péquiste government. Let us imagine that Mr. Parizeau—it is not impossible—could be the premier. Let us imagine he said to his minister of finance: "Let's go and buy off all the federal lands in the province of Quebec". The cabinet here might say: "Listen, in the name of debt reduction, in the name of deficit reduction, let's do a deal with this minister of finance". It is technically possible.

Mr. Vincent: There is no money.

Mr. Mills: What do you mean, no money?

Mr. Vincent: Quebec won't have any money.

Mr. Mills: What do you mean Quebec will not have any money? It does not need any money. All it needs is paper, an IOU. It is no different than the deal that we made with terminal 3. It is no different than the deal that Bobby Rae is trying with the dome stadium in Toronto. Here is a $700 million dome stadium and what is he doing? He is trying to sell it. I think we have actually caused them to rethink it because we have talked about it in this House a few times.

What the private sector says is: "Listen, premier of Ontario, we will buy this $700 million dome stadium. We will give you $100 million now and we will take a $225 million debenture, which we will not start paying the interest on until 20 years from now". Each of the 10 partners put in $10 million for the down payment. They borrowed that $10 million from the bank which means that it is only interest on $10 million. It is only costing them in cash $1 million each to get the $100 million and with the $100 million they have a $700 million deal. Mr. Parizeau, and I say this with respect to some of my business colleagues in Toronto, is just as smart as those guys. I can tell you right now, if he could see an opportunity to cherry pick, buy off the federal lands, the Crown lands in the province of Quebec, under this bill, it could happen by Order in Council without any public debate in this Chamber. I do not think that is right. In fact, if I had my way around here right now, I would be reinforcing the federal presence, not just in the province of Quebec, but in every part of this country.

Madam Speaker, I see you giving me the signal to wrap it up. It is not too often that I agree with the NDP, but on this particular motion I believe they are right on track and I give it my full support.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the motion, the deletion basically that my colleague from Kamloops moved and I seconded.

At the outset, I want to read into the record that clause because people who are watching and people who read Hansard need to know the specifics of what we are talking. The area to be deleted is clause 4, subclauses (b) and (c) which read as follows:

(b) the amount, if any, by which any amount received as consideration for the sale of shares in the capital stock of a Crown corporation or of a corporation that was previously a Crown corporation or that is a successor to a Crown corporation exceeds the value of the shares as shown in the accounts of Canada immediately before the time of the sale;

(c) the amount, if any, by which any amount received on the winding up of a particular Crown corporation or of a particular corporation that was previously a Crown corporation or a successor to a Crown corporation exceeds the value of the shares of, or the interest of the government in, the particular Crown corporation or of the particular corporation, as the case may be, as shown in the accounts of Canada at the end of the last fiscal year of the government before the commencement of the winding up; or

An hon. member: Now we understand them.

Mr. Angus: I want to touch on two specific aspects. Let us look at the sale of CN Explorations. It is a Crown corporation that is part of CN Rail. That Crown corporation has some annual revenue that goes to CN, the parent Crown corporation. As we know, CN, like CP, is not in the best financial shape. It is no different than the airlines. It is haemorrhaging. We have seen that in the thousands of jobs that have been cut. We have seen it in the thousands of miles of tracks that have been ripped up.

If this bill passes with this clause included in it, it means that when CN Route is sold, it does not get the money to help it to survive. The money is siphoned off to this phoney debt reduction or deficit reduction plan and there is no benefit. Quite frankly, if CN does not get the use of either the ongoing revenue from CN Explorations or the benefit of the capital from its sale, we are going to have to pay elsewhere. We are going to have to pay in terms of more job losses. We know that CN Rail is in a process of restructuring. I am sure it has kept Ron Lawless on for another three months so he can finish the dastardly deeds he started years ago in terms of the downsizing. We will pay in terms of higher rates, or the taxpayer will pay in terms of additional funds from the treasury that go to sustain the ongoing operations of CN Rail.

This clause has got to go. As phoney as the bill itself is, this clause makes it even worse.

An hon. member: Which clause?

Mr. Angus: I am dealing with clause 4 and the deletion of subclauses (b) and (c). Let me take us back to the sell-off of Air Canada, Canada's flagship in the air. The government sold 100 per cent of its shares. If this bill with this particular clause had been in place then, that revenue would have gone for deficit reduction as opposed to where it should have gone, which is to increase safety for the airlines. The Government of Canada has had 70 vacancies in aircraft inspectors for several years, 70 inspectors short of what there should be. In the future this kind of sell-off would prevent the reallocation of resources, the reallocation of the capital gained by the sale of a Crown corporation back into that same industry.

It is not clear from my wording of this whether or not any of the funds that will be gained, and I use that term loosely, from the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto, the most profitable airport in our system, will be used by Transport Canada again for improvements in the system.

We already know that the revenue to the federal treasury which will result from this privatization will be considerably less than the revenue the treasury gets today from the profits of Pearson airport. We know it will be less. It is just basic economics, I suggest. If we have a profit centre then part of that revenue goes to pay for that profit centre as opposed to being total profit coming to the federal treasury.

I support my colleague's amendment. I think it makes eminent sense. However, as I said before, the whole bill is dumb, phoney and misleading. It is not going to work in any case.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I would also like to contribute a few comments to the debate this morning on the report stage of Bill C-21.

I have been listening to the debate since we started at ten o'clock, and it is my impression that the government is acting after the fact, like the bank that left the door open and then decided to take all kinds of security measures after its safe was cracked during the night.

Earlier, I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance talk about privatization and how the government sold a number of Crown corporations. I already made it clear during the debate on second reading that I did not agree with the bill as a whole. I think that if the government wants to reduce the debt, it should introduce an accounting system that makes sense, which is what the rest of the country wants.

Through our Income Tax Act, we tell our business people how to keep their accounts and report their assets and liabilities, but the government still uses a cash accounting system. I think that is the problem. However, to get back to Crown corporations, Madam Speaker, during the past seven and a half years this government has either sold or privatized all Crown corporations that were crucial to the survival of this country.

An hon. member: They gave them away.

Mr. Gagliano: Yes, they gave them away, as the hon. member for Toronto said. It was a fire sale, and not just the ones that were losing money, but Crown corporations that were making a profit.

• (1040)

Because it is their philosophy to leave everything up to the private sector and let the market decide what happens to this country, they privatized practically everything. And now they say: If anything is sold, we have to do it according to the rules and put the money in a special debt reduction fund. Again, this is like the bank with its security measures after the fact. It is all a bit late in the game. That is what they are doing with this bill, and that is why I am against this motion. And not only should clause 4 be deleted, the whole bill should be dropped.

We had a report from the Auditor General who wanted to clean up the government's finances and even suggested standardized financial statements that would be accessible to all Canadians, so they could see the government's accounting activities for themselves. They are now operating on a cash accounting basis. And what is the government trying to do with this bill? It would have Canadians believe it is tidying up its finances, and that surplus moneys from the GST and sales of Crown corporations will all go straight into the debt reduction account. Madam Speaker, that is a lot of smoke and mirrors. In fact, it does not mean a thing. A government that tells Canadians that it wants to reduce the national debt while it is doing the exact opposite should not be surprised that today, Canadians no longer trust their political leaders.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some very brief submissions on Bill C–21. I did not intend to speak, but when I listened to my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and my friend and colleague from Montreal I felt compelled to make a few comments about Bill C–21.

As other members have indicated, this is a fraudulent, if I could use the term, piece of legislation. It does not mean anything. It is an attempt by the government to hoodwink Canadians into believing that something serious is being done about the national debt which stands at about $410 billion.

What it has done is bring forward Bill C–21. It is four or five pages long. There are eight sections to it. In effect it has brought in an act of Parliament to open up an account. This is like any individual home owner in the country deciding to open up a special bank account to deal solely with the mortgage on the house and once the interest is paid off to use the account to pay down the debt. Does that mean that the mortgage will be paid off any quicker? Does it mean that fewer interest payments will be made just because a separate account has been opened to pay for the mortgage? Somehow money has to go into this account in order to service the debt on the mortgage, to make the interest payments.

The government is saying that it will set up this special mortgage account to help pay off the interest on the debt over a long period of time. If it keeps its fingers crossed, once the deficit is eliminated it will be able to use the surplus to help pay off this huge national debt. Once it has eliminated the deficit it is going to have either a balanced budget or a surplus.

I can use the analogy of a homeowner with a mortgage account again. If he sells a car or some furniture, he can take that money and put it in the mortgage account to help make the monthly mortgage payment or to help reduce the mortgage on the house.

It is all smoke and mirrors. It may look tidy because a separate statement might come in at the end of every month and at the end of the year the bank may send something saying that x number of payments have been made on the mortgage debt. But ultimately there is only one income coming in and all the expenses to be met. The home owner is really not any further ahead by setting up a special mortgage account. It does not do anything.

What is the net result of wasting our time here this morning and wasting everyone's time setting up a different bank account? Perhaps I am missing something and a government member could stand up to clarify it. Is there any real advantage to this bill being passed? Are we going to accelerate our mortgage payments on the national debt? Are we somehow going to get a better deal from the banks and pay less interest? What does it do? It does not do anything. It sets up another bureaucracy. It helps the Poindexters who push paper around to have a little extra work to do.

The reason I object to this nonsense is that Canadians want this place to be relevant. When they see the Parliament of Canada debating a stupid bill, Bill C-21, it makes them wonder. It makes thinking Canadians wonder about the priorities of this Parliament.

We have 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed. We have over 2 million Canadians on welfare. We have people suffering out there because of the economic crisis. Instead of debating creative ways of putting people back to work and getting this country working again, instead of talking about what is of real concern to Canadians, we are debating setting up another bank account.

The government is setting us up for the next election. It is going to say to Canadians that it brought in the GST but it is not spending the GST on silly little things; it is taking all the revenues from the GST and from the sale of Crown assets and using that money to pay off the national debt.

A debt is a debt is a debt. Whether it is one account, 50 accounts or 150 accounts, the debt still has to be paid. The government wants Canadians to believe that somehow we are that much further ahead because these moneys will be used to pay off the debt.

We have heard the old adage about selling family assets to pay the rent, selling the furniture to pay the rent or to pay the mortgage. Let us think of the stupidity of that. If we keep selling the furniture to pay the rent, sooner or later all the furniture is going to be gone, but the rental payment has to be made at the beginning of the month. And sooner or later the sheriff is going to come knocking on the door.

The government is not kidding anybody by passing this special piece of legislation so that whenever it sells a Crown asset it will help pay the interest payment on the debt. As a country we have a limited amount of Crown assets of Crown corporations. If the government keeps selling federally owned lands, sooner or later it is all gone. It is history. There is no accountability as my friend from Broadview—Greenwood says. That is of major concern to people on this side of the House. There has to be some accountability.

We do not want cabinet ministers behind closed doors up a couple of floors from where we are speaking making decisions to sell off assets that belong to each and every Canadian without having some degree of accountability in this House.

• (1050)

If the government wants to sell the furniture to pay the rent then we, as the tenants or homeowners, at least should have the right to know what furniture is being sold off and on what conditions. That should be discussed in the family, not in a closet upstairs.

This place is where the government is held accountable. This place is where the government should come forward to explain its actions, not in some back room a few floors away from this Chamber.

In closing, let me just repeat what a waste of time it is, what misplaced priorities this government is demonstrating by bringing forward this phoney and fraudulent piece of legislation. Canadians out there are demanding that this Parliament become relevant and do something important, that it deal with the real issues and the real problems facing Canadians, but we are wasting our time discussing and debating setting up another bank account.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I completely agree with what my colleagues have said about this matter. We are speaking to the motions by the member for Kamloops.

The bill reminds me of a ceremony that was held to honour a local business person. The speakers said that he had made a lot of money in the flower business and so on, and talked about what a great fellow he was.

After all of the speeches were given he got up to speak for himself. He said that as a matter of fact he was not in flowers. He was in fertilizer. He did not make money in flowers, actually he lost money. Finally, he was not involved in fertilizers, his brother was. That is a joke.

The bill is what we are talking about. I thought that joke was quite relevant. I left British Columbia out of the story. I was going to place the joke in B.C. but I decided not to in deference to my friends from B.C. They still did not laugh.

We have an enormous financial problem in Canada, brought on in very large measure by the government opposite. As has been pointed out, the former Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre, added more red ink, more debt to the backs of young people, old people and middle-aged people than any other finance minister in Canadian history.

Government members run around the country telling anybody who will listen to them, which is increasingly not very many, that they are the paragons of fiscal virtue. I think that the debt was $168 billion when they came into office in 1984. It is now rapidly going over $420 billion. By the way, much of it is held outside of Canada.

When the Germans, the Japanese and the Taiwanese get tired of buying this government's debt paper, and to be fair the papers of the provinces and the private sector, if that day ever comes we will have an enormous problem in this country.

Our children are going to have an even greater problem because of the financial profligacy of this government and other governments—I concede that—over many, many years.

The government is introducing Bill C-21 and pretending to Canadians that it is actually going to use the GST funds to reduce the debt. When we bear in mind that there will be a deficit of at least $20 billion in the account for the next five years, how can any serious, intelligent person take the government seriously?

How can we ask Canadians to believe in this kind of measure?

There is the old statement that nobody ever went broke in Canada. Actually, it was an American story. I will put it in British Columbia.

There is the old story that nobody ever went broke in the United States underestimating the intelligence of the American people. I would put it to those opposite that this kind of bill will just increase the cynicism across Canada. It will tell everybody who has passed their grade 9 examinations and who has ever looked at an economics book, and I submit that virtually no one on that side of the House has ever studied economics, that this is a complete farce.

This is the debt servicing and reduction account act. Is there one member on the other side who actually believes that this is actually anything other than smoke and mirrors? I would ask them to raise their hand. Not a single hand goes up. Those members do not even believe in it themselves.

They do not know over there whether they are Keynesians or Milton Friedman economists. I would bet that if we asked one of them if they could tell the difference between John Maynard Keynes and Milton Friedman they would have great difficulty in telling us the difference between their economic theories.

Keynesian economists argue that government must spend generously to kick-start stalled economies in times of difficulty. However, among weak-willed politicians the second half of Keynes' advice is virtually never followed. He said that we must save money in good times, which we had up until about a year and a half ago.

This country has completed six years of prosperity. However, the Mulroney government has run six years of large deficits totalling about $210 billion. It tells us that it is because compound interest only began in 1984, it did not exist before then.

Today this government has neither a sound fiscal policy nor even much ability to borrow money from people who have managed their economies more soundly in other parts of the world.

The monetarists say that inflation can be avoided if central banks will ensure that the money in an economy increases at the same rate as real growth in that economy. Specifically, central bank governors, like John Crow, must carefully control the amount of currency, bank deposits and other money instruments to ensure that the supply does not expand excessively and thereby cause prices to rise.

I will readily concede that Mr. Crow has done a great deal to bring inflation down. As we have heard many times, inflation is at an all-time low point. But at what price? How many of those in the constituency of Red Deer are unemployed today? In Edmonton the rate is more than 12 per cent. I think 40,000 or 50,000

Edmontonians are out of work. They do not want to be out of work.

At what point do we take the monetarist philosophy—Mr. Crow is certainly the best-known practitioner of it in this country—and say that at some point we have to ease up, we must circulate more currency, more purchasing power, more M-1 and more M-2 in the economy?

This bill is simply part of an effort by those opposite to convince Canadians that they are doing something when the only thing they are doing is trying to grind the economy into cement. If they do not realize that then they do not realize anything.

My party is in favour of these amendments and would urge those opposite to recognize that there are real people out there, real men and women, who want to work. Margaret Thatcher would be delighted with the policies that this government is following, so would Ronald Reagan. However, the era of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher is, thank goodness, now gone. We now have to move on to other things, such as creating wealth and getting people back to work.

Will the government be satisfied with 15 per cent unemployment, 20 per cent? I do not have the foggiest idea what motivates those opposite because it certainly is not their constituents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 2 negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the House agree to calling it eleven o'clock and proceeding with members' statements?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FRESH WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, for years the federal government has steadfastly refused to state categorically that Canada's fresh water is not for sale to the United States and not for sale to Mexico.

However, we now learn from the leaked North America free trade agreement, the one that was leaked to us by Ralph Nader as opposed to being presented to us by the federal government, that article 1401 states that non-energy pipelines will now be used to move products from Canada through the United States and into northern Mexico. What is a non-energy pipeline?

If a pipeline conduit is not to be used for natural gas or oil, it is likely not to be used for sewage or for wine. This is a back door, under the table, secret deal. It is an underhanded, not up front approach to provide the ways and means to transfer water from one basin into another.

To be more specific, the North America free trade agreement is enabling legislation to divert and deliver Canadian fresh water into the parched American southwest and into the desperately fresh water deficient areas of northern Mexico.

If the federal government plans to sell Canada's rivers and lakes to Mexico—

WORLD THEATRE DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Madam Speaker, today is World Theatre Day, and I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all those who have made the theatre their special form of expression and, as has been said from time immemorial, the best cure for anxiety.

I would like to mention the outstanding work being done by all stage performers and writers for the stage, by professionals, amateurs and volunteers. To overlook their contribution would have been unforgivable.

As its subject is the human condition, the theatre is a reflection of society and mankind, and its impact is felt well beyond the stage itself. Whether it moves us or makes us think, the theatre contributes to the development of society and mankind.

Speaking on behalf of the federal Minister of Communications and on behalf of all parliamentarians here in the House, I again wish to pay tribute to the entire theatre community which gives us food for thought, to paraphrase Victor Hugo.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon member's time has expired. The hon. member for Stormont—Dundas.

ARCTIC WINTER GAMES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, recently I had the opportunity to attend the 1992 Arctic Winter Games at Whitehorse in the Yukon. The games are a unique blend of sport and cultural events which bring the peoples of the north together for a week of competition and international friendship.

Athletes and artisans from Greenland, Alaska and Russia joined with Canada's representatives from the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and northern Alberta.

The games featured such sports as hockey, figure skating, and cross-country skiing along with sports that are native to the Arctic region, such as the high kick, dog sledding, and snow-shoeing.

On behalf of this House, I congratulate the 1992 Arctic Winter Games Host Society. I would also like to thank the major funding partners of the games: the city of Whitehorse, the Government of the Yukon, Sport Canada and the Yukon Lotteries Commission, along with the many other sponsors and volunteers for their efforts in making the games a very enjoyable experience for the participants and spectators.

I wish to remind members and Canadians that the next Arctic Winter Games are scheduled to be held in Slave Lake, Alberta in March of 1994.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, my constituents continue to offer me thoughtful advice and comment.

Margaret Armstrong of Acton writes:

> Raising two small children and trying to run a home on one income is very difficult with the current tax set-up.

Brian Holahan of Caledon writes:

> Everything in this country is great, except for the excesses of government. After a shake-up, we'll be all right. The bottom line is balance the budget quickly, or you and I will go down in history as jerks.

John Ptolemy writes me:

> We are taxed every way we turn. I am doubly penalized by the current tax system which allows two spouses who both work to have their incomes taxed separately while in my case, where I am the only income-earner, I cannot split my income with my spouse.

Finally, Ena Mellor of Bolton writes:

> I think it is most unfortunate that people generally have lost faith in politicians. To a large extent, I think the media is to blame. The press seems to have set itself up as the official opposition.

Madam Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of bringing these voices of my constituents into Parliament.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada came to Quebec to give notice of his failure to deliver what Quebecers were expecting on the constitutional front.

Forget about national reconciliation with honour and enthusiasm. That is now over and done with, and scare tactics, blackmail and nasty attacks are the order of the day.

Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is becoming increasingly isolated. After wooing PQ votes in 1984 and 1988, he has now made an about face. Even worse, yesterday he attacked those who sincerely want to renew Canada.

He rejected the timeframe of Bill 150, adopted in the National Assembly by the Quebec Liberals. He condemned the Quebec Liberal Party's Allaire report, calling it a plan to dismember the country. He rejected the consensus of the Bélanger–Campeau report, calling it the end of Canada.

In fact, the Prime Minister of Canada condemned the premier of Quebec, because Mr. Bourassa voted for Bill 150, he signed the Allaire report and he signed the Bélanger–Campeau report. The Prime Minister—

ROAD THROUGH PARC DES LAURENTIDES

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean region is separated from the greater Quebec area by the natural barrier of the Parc des Laurentides, also called the killer road. It is imperative to make this road safe for the well–being of our region at every level, economic, social, cultural and indeed at the family level, for all the people from the Saguenay and Lac–Saint–Jean area who are now living in Quebec City, in Montreal and elsewhere.

Given the structural problems confronting our region's economy, there is a need to focus our economic development on small and medium–sized export businesses which will have to use this antediluvian road. Statistics show that people from everywhere are afraid to venture on such a goat path, as it was referred to by a former premier of Quebec. I think that arrangements could be made with the Quebec government to meet a growing need of our region.

In closing, Madam Speaker, dare I say that, for our region 300,000 strong to have a stronger sense of our Quebec and Canadian identity means among other things extending the Trans–Canada Highway into our region.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, a federally owned Crown corporation, has said no to the request made by the Devco Pensioners Association for information pertaining to retirement packages.

The Devco Pensioners Association is being denied this information even though it is already available to management and some senior employees. The Pensioners Association has been advised that if it requires this information it should seek legal counsel and go to court.

I call upon the minister responsible for this Crown corporation to instruct its senior representatives to release this information to this association. This kind of behaviour on the part of a federally owned Crown corporation is unacceptable.

The workers have a right to know what is going on. This attempt to hide information only serves to enhance suspicion as to how this corporation is being run and how certain employees are being given preferential treatment.

Once again, I urge the minister responsible for this Crown corporation to instruct those officials with Devco to release this information to the Pensioners Association and demonstrate a little honesty.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN TOUR

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, as you know, service clubs throughout all of Canada make a tremendous contribution to the quality of life in each of our communities. They have earned our collective thanks for that.

In addition to the many good works which all of them perform on a regular ongoing basis, one group in particular, the Kinsmen and Kinettes of Canada, have launched a national unity campaign which is particularly worthy of mention.

Since the beginning of January the Kin family's "Proud to be Canadian" tour has been travelling across Canada, having commenced virtually simultaneously on the east and west coasts. They are providing Canadians everywhere, particularly our youth, with the opportunity to sign specially designed Canadian flags as a show of hope and love for the country.

I applaud Kinsmen and Kinettes for reminding us that we as Canadians have every reason to be proud of our achievements in this our 125th anniversary.

I applaud them as well for encouraging us to join together as we will do in early May in Brandon—Souris, to express our appreciation for the privileges that a united Canada has provided, the privileges which we all too often take for granted.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, if a government raised taxes, cut medicare programs and did not create any new jobs in its budget, what colour would its political stripes be?

An hon. member: Tory blue.

Mr. Boudria: No, my colleagues. I have just described a neo-Conservative NDP government of British Columbia. Provincial New Democrats behave like Liberals when in opposition, but in government those chameleons turn Tory blue.

The federal Tories brought us the GST. The provincial New Democrats in Ontario and B.C. have given us the GSP, the go south policy. Our NDP comrades are increasing the burden on business and creating an economic climate which is driving jobs south of the border.

Those silk-stocking brothers and sisters of Queen's Park and Victoria should know that Canada is losing 1,000 jobs a day. But they do not care. They are interested in propagating the socialist dogma, not helping people. Locally it will not last. Soon Premiers Wilson and McLeod will join Prime Minister Chrétien thereby providing good government for Canadians.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my concern today is about the letter from the premier of Ontario that the Minister for International Trade released a couple of days ago regarding the free trade deal with Mexico. I think that was an improper thing to do. It was a breach of confidentiality.

What really concerns me is with the national unity debate coming up, it seems to me that this adds to the tension between governments. It is not a helpful thing to do in terms of national unity in this country.

At this particular time we need confidence between the premiers and the Prime Minister. We do not need a breach of trust. We need to build up a relationship that is positive and where there is confidence among all the parties in this country.

I think the appropriate thing for the Minister for International Trade to do would be to apologize to the premier of Ontario. I think that would go a long way toward rebuilding trust in this country and helping solve the tensions that plague us in terms of national unity.

HELP FIGHT LIVER DISEASE MONTH

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, March is being proclaimed as Help Fight Liver Disease Month by the Canadian Liver Foundation. There are over 100 known liver diseases. Some of these diseases are genetic, others are environment or lifestyle related.

Currently two million Canadians suffer from some form of liver disease. Under its mandate to reduce the incidents and impact of all liver diseases, the foundation provides support for research and education.

During this month, thousands of volunteers of the Canadian Liver Foundation will be staffing booths in shopping malls and public places across the country to provide information on liver diseases and to enlist the support of the public in its effort to provide programs for patients and their families.

On behalf of the members of this House, I wish to commend the many volunteers of the Canadian Liver Foundation and encourage all Canadians to support the programs and services of the Canadian Liver Foundation.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, a recent study by Statistics Canada shows that the number of food bank users has increased by 69 per cent in Quebec between the spring of 1989 and the fall of 1990. The poverty that appears to exist in the province is even more striking in the city of Montreal.

Food banks in Montreal alone give out 12 tonnes of food each day, enough to fill the Olympic Stadium field eight feet high ten times a year. That is absolutely outrageous. Government must spare no effort to put an end to such an atrocity. The Government remains idle while Montreal is growing poorer by the day. The Tories are letting one of this country's major cities become destitute.

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, yesterday was a great day for our wartime merchant mariners. They learned that very soon they will be known as merchant navy veterans. Three little words, but they mean a lot. They mean that our wartime high-seas mariners will have access to the same package of programs and benefits as members of the wartime Armed Forces.

As a member of the House Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, I congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs for reacting so positively to our recommendations. The committee had heard how merchant seamen felt their contribution to the allied victory had not been properly appreciated. We learned of their long battle to be given the same status as members of the army, the navy and the air force.

Thankfully, we have a Minister of Veterans Affairs open-minded enough to examine anew the role of the merchant navy, to sift out the myths and preconceptions and to conclude that our merchant mariners deserve access to every part of the finest veterans programs in the world.

I join the minister in saying to Canada's merchant navy veterans, welcome aboard.

FISHERMEN'S PROTEST

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, this Sunday, eight trawlers and hundreds of Canadian fishermen are heading out to the Grand Banks for a peaceful protest against foreign overfishing. These fishermen, primarily from Newfoundland, are telling Canada and the world that we must manage our fishing resource properly and that the Canadian government should assume jurisdiction over this area.

Our leader, the member for Yukon, is in Newfoundland today to meet with fishermen and to hear from them firsthand about their concerns.

Our support goes out to these courageous fishermen who are defending their jobs and Canada's fishery. Our support is with them and we look forward to their safe return.

PREMIER BOB RAE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, today's The Toronto Star reports that Ontario Premier Bob Rae went to, where else, Buffalo, New York to make a speech. One wonders if it was to receive a Man of the Year award from Buffalo City Council. He has done more to assist municipal renewal in that city than anyone since the Prime Minister brought in the GST.

The combination of the goods and services tax and NDP policies have driven millions of Canadians across the border to shop, work and carry on business.

Now the premier travels to Buffalo, no doubt because he can find a larger audience of Canadians there than he can in metropolitan Toronto.

His speech was an apology for his latest bungled and embarrassing efforts at nation building. He insists that in spite of the name calling and public attacks on the federal government, he is really trying to strengthen national unity.

The Minister of Finance of course says exactly the same thing. Canadians must wonder which is the lesser of these two evils.

TAXATION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Madam Speaker, several months prior to the handing down of the budget in this House, our Minister of Finance engaged in a very wide-ranging discussion with business people and other Canadians to see what they wanted in our budget.

Evidently the Minister of Finance in British Columbia did not do that. The Minister of Finance here got one message from across Canada. That is there is only one taxpayer. In addition to that, that taxpayer is paying too much. In order to help the taxpayer, the federal government had to cut taxes and had to cut operating costs. Because of the program of restraint in this government, the average cost of operations has decreased 2.2 per cent since 1984.

The budget handed down yesterday in British Columbia increased the government operating costs in that province by 6.8 per cent, about three times the cost of inflation.

The federal government cut taxes. The British Columbia government increased taxes. It is now 9.2 per cent more.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Yesterday, the Canadian Human Rights Commission issued a real indictment of this government's record on equality. Women, children, seniors, aboriginals, people with disabilities, visible minorities, gays and lesbians, all were the victims of ongoing discrimination by this government.

What specific measures does the Minister of Justice intend to take to address the outrageous discrimination outlined in the Canadian Human Rights Commission report?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member mistakes the tone and the content of the report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The Canadian Human Rights Commission in its annual report is always concerned to point out where we might better our record.

It is true that relative to other countries of the world, Canada has an enviable and very respected record in the area of human rights. I do not think Question Period is the appropriate place to list in great detail all of our initiatives simply because it would take too long.

I would indicate, for example, in the area of gender equality in terms of the subject matters which are in my own purview, dramatic efforts have been made to expand the responsiveness of the law, particularly the criminal justice system to the reality of Canadian women. I have been involved in appointing a record number of women to the bench. I have appointed more women to the bench than any other Minister of Justice in this country's history and have been very pleased to do so and will continue to do so.

In addition, the very first national conference of its kind on women, law and the administration of justice was held in June 1991 in Vancouver, which for the first time brought together key decision makers and policy makers in this country, senior members of the judiciary and representatives of over 60 national organizations who promote the equal participation of women.

I could go on and on. This is not the proper context in which we should do that. The government has a very fine record in this area.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to zero in on a specific area the minister should be familiar with.

Six and a half years ago, an all-party committee of this House recommended that sexual orientation be included as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The minister is quoted yesterday as saying that her department would get around to the issue as soon as it had time. "It is not for lack of people working flat out. It is a very controversial issue". Six and a half years later, 15 years after the first inclusion in a human rights act in Canada, why is the minister putting politics ahead of principle of this very important issue?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, obtaining principle results takes time in the process of government. Since the Equality for All report, the Government of Canada has taken the position in the courts of this land that sexual orientation, for example, is an analogous ground under section 15 of the charter. That is the position we have taken in the courts.

• (1120)

It was in fact the wish of the various groups seeking changes in the Canadian Human Rights Act that amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act be considered as a comprehensive package. That was a decision and approach taken by my predecessors in responding to the Equality for All report and equality initiatives in 1986. That has unfortunately made it more difficult to move the dossier ahead simply because we are dealing with a variety of issues.

I met recently in Ottawa with representatives of the various equality-seeking groups who would like to see changes in the Canadian Human Rights Act. I indicated that I had hoped to bring forward changes by the end of the last calendar year and simply the burden of work in my department made it impossible to do that.

The gun control legislation took longer than we expected and there simply was not enough staff time. We are now working full out on that particular file and I hope to be able to bring forward some positive things that I hope will delight the hon. member by the time we rise for the summer.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, 15 years ago, the Quebec Government was the first in Canada to acknowledge that people should not suffer discrimination because of their sexual preferences. Today, 15 years later, the minister says in the House that the government is still working on it.

Why did she not endorse the policy established by a unanimous committee of this House six and a half years ago? Madam Speaker, why does the Minister of Justice continue to discriminate directly against people whose sexual preferences do not coincide with those of the majority?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, there is no need for the government to respond to this report today. Six years ago, the government clearly announced its intentions in its response to the parliamentary committee's report. I am now working on those intentions to flesh them out, and I hope that before the summer recess I will be able to table the government's statutory response in the House.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice who under the federal jurisdiction has major responsibilities to protect minorities across this country.

The Canadian Human Rights Commissioner says in his report that the Government of Canada has failed in its job practices to hire and promote women, aboriginals, people with disabilities, and visible minorities fairly.

I want to ask the Minister of Justice what the government is going to do to correct its dismal record as it protects human rights in this country.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is referring to the hiring practices of the Government of Canada. I think he is well aware that this government has certainly a record better than that of the government by the party of which he is a member in expanding employment in the Public Service to members of a variety of groups previously discriminated against.

There is a committee of the House of Commons which is in fact reviewing the Employment Equity Act and will be reporting by May 1 of this year. I think a more appropriate response will be able to be given when that parliamentary committee presents its report on its review of the Employment Equity Act as it affects the government.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The Minister of Justice should talk to the Minister of Finance. She will find out that the Government of Canada on the one hand has rolled back pay equity for women in the Public Service, while on the other hand its own appointed commissioner has said clearly and unequivocally that this undermines the progress as it relates to women.

I want to ask the Minister of Justice, who has an awesome responsibility in federal jurisdiction, when she will stand up for the women of this country, put some teeth into the Human Rights Act and implement programs in order to assist those Canadians.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have been standing up for Canadian women as long as I have been in public life, which is a very long time and significantly predates my arrival in this House.

The legislation with respect to sexual assault, for example, I think is probably the first legislation under the Criminal Code in this country that attempts to reflect adequately the reality of life as it is lived by Canadian women. The Government of Canada has not rolled back the commitment to pay equity. On the contrary, we are the only government in this country that not only accepted pay equity but made retroactive payments in pay equity. There is a dispute now between the Government of Canada and the union on the basis on which that payment should be made.

The Minister of Finance indicated in his budget that when a decision comes down in 1993, retroactive payments made under that decision, if the government should lose the argument, will be made only until 1990. The Government of Canada continues to make extraordinary payments to meet pay equity requirements of over $80 million a year. We made retroactive payments of $317 million a year at a time of severe fiscal restraint. We indicated then, with our financial priorities, the priorities we attached to this at a time when there was extraordinary pressure on the government. Fiscally the government of Canada made those retroactive payments and committed itself to pay equity.

That is the truth of the situation. We are the only government in Canada that has made that financial commitment.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday we learned that the Montreal Board of Trade released a major economic report, reflecting the views of over 100 leading business representatives from Canada and abroad, which indicated that Canada has lost 400,000 manufacturing and industry jobs since the free trade agreement came into effect. Specifically, they identified the reasons as the high dollar policy of the government, the free trade agreement and the contradictory policies of this government.

Will the Acting Prime Minister take responsibility for what the board of trade identifies as a reason for the industrialization of our country and take some action by bringing down the high dollar value, cancelling the free trade agreement and abandoning this ridiculous pursuit of a North American free trade agreement?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The short answer is no, Madam Speaker, we will not of course cancel the free trade agreement. As a matter of fact there are many, many success stories regarding the free trade agreement, including in my own riding. Perhaps the hon. member would like to come to Brampton some time and visit some of the companies that have done very well because of the free trade agreement. In fact, they say to me that if we did not have the free trade agreement, it would have been a lot rougher getting through the recessionary period we have just gone through.

Everybody looks for a scapegoat when we go through a difficult period of time. The Montreal Board of Trade is no different. I believe that now is the time we have to work on training, retraining, restructuring and that we have to bring Canada into the position where it will be competitive in winding up this decade and heading into the 21st century. That is what this government is doing in co-operation, I might say, with the provinces. That was one of the major subjects discussed at the First Ministers' Conference.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, the hon. minister can say anything he likes, but 100 leading business voices have indicated that one of the major policies this government has introduced that is causing this de-industrialization is the free trade agreement with the United States. It is unfortunate that we have to rely on Ralph Nader for the representatives of the people of Canada to understand what the 500 pages of the NAFTA are all about.

I want to ask my hon. friend the following question. The government knows it has absolutely no mandate from the people of Canada to sign into the North American free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico, absolutely no mandate at all. Will he do the right thing and say that the government will not commit the country to this agreement before it has the support of the people of Canada to do so?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that there has been a great deal of consultation on the NAFTA situation. The SAGITs have been meeting. The ITACs have been meeting. There has obviously been considerable consultation with the provinces, with the public service of the provinces and we will continue with that consultation.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, when the Bush administration signed a preliminary tariff on Canadian softwood imports, Canadian lumber reloaders learned that the tariff does not just apply to the wood, it also applies to transportation, handling and any further changes to the lumber before it leaves the country.

I have received a letter and have discussed the situation with a company from Fort Erie, Ontario, Barrick Distribution Limited. I quote from the letter: "Our company is now very reluctantly looking to relocate in New York State immediately. We will have to hire American workers and lay off our Canadian employees". This company is an innocent victim of the tariff and more closures are expected across the country.

• (1130)

What action is the government going to take so that these kinds of operations will be protected and we will not be sold out again by this government under the free trade deal and NAFTA?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as I told my hon. friend in the House before, we have naturally protested not just this aspect of the latest imposition of a countervail duty which adds an additional burden to value-added manufacturers, but also includes the freight component of some of the products that are being shipped.

That is why we have unleashed a very strong response to this action. We have mounting support from the consumers in the United States. We have a preliminary determination. There are two more steps in this particular process, after which it will be appealed under section 19 of the free trade agreement, at which point we will of course be vindicated.

AVIATION SAFETY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister said outside the House that he was satisfied that all the legal aspects of aviation safety were in place before deregulation.

In his report on the crash at Dryden which was tabled yesterday, Justice Moshansky said that this kind of argument was unacceptable. Does the government agree with Justice Moshansky that the government has an obligation to Canadian passengers to ensure their safety, well beyond the basic legal requirements?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, before answering the question, perhaps I may express, on behalf of the government, my heartfelt sympathy with the survivors and families of the victims of the terrible accident that occurred on March 10, 1989, and I do so at a time when we are again debating a subject, which must bring back some very sad memories.

Mr. Lapierre: It's about time.

Mr. Rocheleau: A little late in the day.

Mr. Corbeil: I see the Bloc Quebecois is more interested in shouting insults across the floor, but I don't think this is the right time.

As far as the question is concerned, I may remind the hon. member that in its preliminary report, the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation said more than a year ago, and I quote:

[English]

"The federal government introduced in 1985 sweeping changes to the Aeronautics Act designed to give Canadian aviation its most progressive safety legislation in more than 60 years and to implement the major recommendations of the inquiry into aviation safety headed by Justice Charles Dubin".

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, that response is absolutely appalling. What is unacceptable is the idea that the government would hide behind the tragedy and not respond to serious, important questions about the safety of Canadian air travellers.

The Dryden air crash report recommended that when the transport department identifies a shortage of resources to ensure safety, this information should be communicated up the line to the minister. In its response, the government says: "A policy will be developed".

Is this not an admission that successive ministers of transport have failed in their responsibility to obtain the information that they require to ensure Canadian passenger safety?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, yesterday I mentioned the fact that as soon as the Moshansky commission's report was tabled, the government tabled its response to the 191 recommendations.

I also mentioned that to deal with these 191 recommendations, we had set up an implementation team consisting of 20 members recruited from the Department of Transport and from the industry, including the associations, employers, and employees. I made a commitment that six months from now we would table a public report on the work done by the team during that time.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, in 1989 a leaked memo from the chief of operations and certification of inspectors at Transport Canada noted, and I will quote from that memo: "Air carrier inspection is no longer capable of meeting even minimum requirements". Transport Canada warned the minister in 1989. Justice Moshansky warned the minister again yesterday.

When will the minister provide the required number of commercial jet aircraft inspectors to ensure safety in the skies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, yesterday I provided all the statistics, and these show that we have the number of inspectors required. I would like to refer the hon. member to the 1989 annual report of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board which says this: "The above statistics indicate that the 1980s was a decade of significant improvement in Canadian aviation safety." In its 1990 report, the board said that accident statistics for aircraft licensed in Canada were a clear indication that the last decade was marked by a significant improvement in aviation safety in Canada.

Madam Speaker, I believe that throughout that time, the Department of Transport continued to give aviation safety the priority it deserves.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, the minister's rhetoric gives us the government position and makes it quite clear that it will continue to put at risk the lives of the air travelling public in this country to save a buck. That is what he is saying.

Just yesterday the director of air carrier standards and operations at Transport Canada confirmed that according to his own department's figures, at least 10 more inspectors are needed immediately for commercial air carrier inspections. Will the minister immediately hire 10 additional commercial jet aircraft inspectors? Yes or no?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it was interesting to hear what the chairman of the Moshansky commission, Mr. Justice Moshansky, said this morning in an interview on Canada AM. When asked whether it was safe to fly in Canada, he said: "Yes, I think it is safe to fly in Canada. I think we have one of the safest transportation systems in the world. That is not to say it is perfect. The thrust of my report was to identify deficiencies which should be corrected in order to bring it closer to perfection".

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, yesterday Justice Moshansky brought down a report dealing with the commercial aviation industry. I emphasize commercial aviation industry. Also yesterday, in defence of the government's record on safety the minister said: "In 1981 there were 700 aircraft accidents in Canada. In 1991 there were 449 accidents".

What the minister failed to tell this House and Canadians is that when it comes to commercial aviation in this country, according to the Canadian Aviation Safety Board reports, there has been an increase of 34 per cent in the number of accidents between 1984, the year that this government came to power, and 1991.

I ask the minister to explain why he chose to give statistics dealing with the broad base of the aviation industry, including the general aviation sector and the government sector, as opposed to the real stats which deal with commercial aviation which was what the Moshansky report was all about. Why did he not do that?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I repeat again, Madam Speaker, that the report from the transport safety board for 1989 indicates that the 1980s was a decade of significant improvement in Canadian aviation safety. I think all kinds of aircraft are very important in aviation safety because people travel in all kinds of aircraft.

• (1140)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, obviously the minister does not get it yet. Perhaps he is relying on some of those same senior bureaucrats to give him the statistics to show that things are rosy as opposed to the real statistics.

I want to draw the minister's attention to a poster issued by the Aviation Safety Programs of Transport Canada that hangs in aircraft hangars and offices throughout this country. It says: "If you think safety is too costly, try an accident".

Given this new information, about which it would appear he did not know, concerning the number of commercial accidents and the increase of 34 per cent since 1984, would he now reconsider his lack of action in terms of additional safety inspectors, whether it is the 10 mentioned today or the 70 vacancies that are out there in the industry, and do something today to give a concrete indication that he is going to make sure that airlines are safe in this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the person to give the best testimony on that is the person who has just completed the two years of investigation and tabled his report a couple of weeks ago.

Interviewed this morning on CBC Newsworld, Justice Moshansky said: "I agree that the Canadian skies are safe". We have one of the safest aviation systems in the world. However, that is not to say that it is perfect. It must also be remembered that this investigation was regarding an accident at a particular point in time. Certainly some positive steps have been taken by the department to correct a lot of the deficiencies which we discovered during the inquiry and so has the carrier.

I repeat again, we have put in place an implementation team of 20 persons who will look into the 191 recommendations of the report.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The government is currently considering a proposal to replace air traffic controllers with flight service specialists in smaller airports, such as Charlottetown. Pilots and air traffic controllers have condemned the government's proposal for safety reasons.

In light of yesterday's condemning report on the Dryden air accident, will the minister commit today to maintaining air traffic controllers at smaller airports? Will he stop cost cutting at the expense of air safety?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, one of our main responsibilities as the government of this country is to be fiscally responsible without putting in jeopardy the safety of the people who are flying. It is for this reason that we are spending over $1.5 billion in transforming our safety system to automation. At the same time, we are consulting the aviation industry at the present time as to what we should do with a number of FSS and control towers. The consultations are not completed and when they are we will then make decisions.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the minister's denials of a problem are quite shocking when the report on the Dryden crash contains a litany of repeated warnings that there were simply not enough people to ensure air safety.

My colleague for Hamilton West raised one of those warnings in the House in 1990 with this report on the government's budget that said the result would be cutbacks in training, enforcement, inspections and increased risks to the travelling public. The minister at that time said: "We will never compromise safety".

Will the minister admit today that safety has been compromised? Will he tell Canadians specifically what he is going to do to restore travelling safety?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, all the Ministers of Transport since this government has been in power have indicated that we will never compromise on safety. We have never compromised on safety.

We already have our response to the Dryden commission.

I mentioned yesterday that we had already started implementing 49 per cent of those recommendations. We have put in place a team of 20 people to look into it. Judge Moshansky himself said again this morning: "I agree that the Canadian skies are safe. We have one of the safest aviation systems in the world".

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries.

As the minister knows, this coming Sunday evening 100 fishermen will sail on six trawlers toward the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. Once there, they will claim custodial management of these waters for Canada in protest against the rape and pillage of the groundfish stocks by the European community. They will place markers to this effect.

Would the minister tell the House what support he intends for this historic expedition?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the expedition that the hon. member refers to is one that is privately organized by the industry and the fishermen's union of Newfoundland and Labrador in particular. I have already indicated my support for the concept of this expedition, which is to be peaceful and non-violent.

I do not intend to go out with them, because I do not think they would appreciate a politician attempting to horn in on this genuine demonstration which the people of Newfoundland and Labrador are going forward with on Sunday.

They have my full support. We intend to have fishery patrol boats in the area carrying out their normal duties but ready in case any incident occurs where their aid or assistance might be needed. My office will be doing all it can to help the cause.

In addition, we are providing briefings for all the journalists who are assembling there from Europe and elsewhere. This is one of the documents that we are sending out: The Fragile Fishery, Sustainable Development of the Northwest Atlantic Fishery.

The Prime Minister himself is going to lead a delegation to Rio de Janeiro in June for the UNCED conference, particularly to put forward and gain support for our resolution and—

An hon. member: Why don't you go out with them?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we should go on. I am sure the hon. minister will be able to add further information on the supplemental.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question in response to the minister's answer. He did say that he supported this, as he was quoted in The Evening Telegram. In fact a week ago, on March 20, the headlines read: "Protest on High Seas gets Crosbie's Blessing".

From what the minister said he certainly does support this, but he also knows there is risk involved so I would like a little more moral support. I would like more support than ministerial blessing.

Could I specifically ask the minister if he would ensure that there is a destroyer escort or a government patrol vessel in direct support of this very delicate undertaking?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, this is a delicate undertaking. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my support is equally delicate.

There are no plans to have any Canadian naval vessels in the area, because we do not believe there are going to be any hostilities. This is a peaceful, non-violent demonstration carried out by responsible people, not by certain other demagogues who have appeared on the scene in recent months, discharged from the provincial cabinet and now looking for a cause to ride back to power on.

An hon. member: John Efford has done a lot for fisheries.

Mr. Crosbie: John Efford is a demagogue attempting to ride to power on the backs of the Newfoundland fishermen.

I am supporting this cause. It is a private initiative. They have every right to demonstrate on the high seas just as people demonstrate outside the House of Commons. There is a risk demonstrating outside the House of Commons. There is a risk demonstrating everywhere. But in a free and democratic country that is a risk we gladly assume. I am not changing my opinion about Mr. Efford's attempts at demagoguery and his attempts to seize the cause.

• (1150)

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is to whomever is answering on behalf of the minister of energy.

Recently a delegation of B.C. New Democrat MPs visited the Hanford nuclear reservation in Washington state, which is home to some 63 per cent of all the high-level nuclear waste produced by the U.S. Millions of litres of lethal radioactive waste are stored in 177 underground tanks at Hanford, and 24 of these tanks contain unstable chemical complexes which are in a potentially explosive situation.

Would the minister confirm that although the probability is small an explosion of one or more of these tanks would lead to a catastrophic event releasing large amounts of radiation into the atmosphere?

Would the minister also explain what emergency responses and measures Canada has taken to protect the neighbouring Canadian public should such an event take place?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am sure all members of this House share the concern that Canada be spared the kind of tragedy that did befall the people of the Soviet Union and has emanated from nuclear disasters in other parts of the world.

As well, the minister of energy in this government is vigilant to take every precaution to ensure the well-being of Canadians. I understand he will be taking a delegation or considering looking into the question of any risk arising from the Hanford nuclear station.

I think I should point out as the hon. member himself has indicated that although the risk may be very small we must take every necessary precaution, recognizing that the world increasingly relies on nuclear power and Canada has the finest nuclear power production capacity through our CANDU system of any nation in the world.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, in 1957 an explosion in similar storage tanks in Kyshtym in the Soviet Union spread radioactive contaminants some 200 kilometres downwind. The British Columbia border is only 250 kilometres from Hanford as the wind blows.

Would the minister confirm whether or not this government supports the recent comments of Canada's chief of environmental radiation hazards that Canadian officials really do not have a handle on what is going on at Hanford?

Will he also confirm that Canada and the United States, as confirmed in our discussions with U.S. officials, do not at this time have a co-ordinated emergency response plan put into place to protect the Canadian public should such a catastrophic event occur at Hanford?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I certainly would not confirm any of the kind of alarmist statements and scenarios that the hon. member is raising in this House in attempting to raise his political profile in British Columbia. This is not responsible.

When the hon. minister of energy returns to the House he will of course address the concerns raised by the hon. member. But I would once again suggest that he stop this fear-mongering and deal responsibly with the questions of energy policy and the necessary energy resources that this country relies upon.

LEBANON

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

Yesterday the Department of External Affairs issued a travel directive advising Canadians not to travel to Lebanon due to extreme danger in that country. The directive says, and I quote: "There is ongoing incidents of violence and threat of kidnapping. In these circumstances visitors expose themselves to serious harm".

In these circumstances why is the minister still deporting refugee claimants to Lebanon? Why is there no moratorium on deportations to that country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, moratoriums encourage non-bona fide claimants who know they will not face removal when refused. Processing these claims wastes resources and delays processing of genuine claimants.

We have decided that we are removing people who are not in need of Canada's protection, but we do it on a case-by-case review. Every consideration is given to every individual case to avoid sending them to a situation where they could be in jeopardy.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, does the Minister of Employment and Immigration speak to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? He is deporting people who live in south Lebanon where there is still a war going on. The Canadian embassy is closed in Lebanon. It is still closed due to security reasons.

Yesterday the minister advised Canadians not to visit that country because of threats of violence and kidnapping. Will the minister explain why he is deporting refugees to Lebanon when the Secretary of State for External Affairs says it is too dangerous for people to visit that country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I understand that for a Liberal it is hard to make the distinction between a Canadian citizen and a citizen of another country who comes to Canada and has to be removed. I know that the hon. member cannot make the distinction, but I invite him to consider it.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The economic study released yesterday by the Montreal Board of Trade calculated that between June and December 1991 we were losing 1,000 jobs in Canada each day, thanks in large measure to the free trade agreement.

Rather than feuding with the NDP premier of Ontario and engaging in a public relations campaign aimed at damage control, when will this government come to grips with the failures of this economic agenda which is ravaging Canadian jobs in record numbers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I find it rather interesting that the Liberal Party would ask a question like that. Back in 1981 and 1982 when jobs were being lost because of a recession they did not have the free trade agreement to blame. Now we have a free trade agreement in place and because of the recession period we have gone through they are blaming the whole recession on the free trade agreement. It is utter nonsense and the hon. member knows that. He should not be making such outlandish statements.

This government has brought in a responsible budget which cuts taxes, which cuts spending, and which cuts the deficit. In fact it is designed to get people back to work in this country.

Some of the provincial governments are bringing in budgets that unfortunately are taking from their taxpayers the tax cuts the federal government made. That is unfortunate because I think those are required at this time to get the economy going again.

The hon. member stands up here day after day and blames the free trade agreement when in fact he knows that that has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, it is not a Liberal Party report. It is a report of the Board of Trade of Montreal that was based on interviews with Canadian businessmen and businesswomen in this country.

The report also added that since 1989 some 400,000 jobs were lost in the Canadian manufacturing sector and another 200,000 Canadians were laid off in both the retail and wholesale areas of our economy.

How can the government possibly contemplate aggravating this already dismal record by moving head-first into the Mexican round of trade talks without first rectifying the economic pain that is being felt by Canadians at this moment as a result of the first trade round, namely the free trade agreement?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, as the Minister for International Trade said in the House just the other day, NAFTA talks about 1 per cent of our total trade.

It is unusual that we get so upset talking about a trade agreement with Mexico. In terms of the free trade agreement with the United States, I wonder why they do not talk about Canadian Thermos Inc., Polymer International, Keeprite that went to Brantford, Hughes Aircraft in Midland, or Freightliner in London.

I have a whole series of good news items specifically as a result of the free trade agreement. All they have are the bad news items day after day after day.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, Max Yalden has decried an underpowered and expendable human rights act.

The government has stonewalled the sexual orientation amendment, eliminated a court challenge, shelved the race relations institute and has been the target itself of racism complaints at NRC, Health and Welfare and CIDA. It has fired many of those who have complained about racism. It has compromised pay equity. CIDA is being sued for discrimination and this government refuses to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will now put his question.

Mr. McCurdy: This government along with the Liberal Party has refused—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member please put his question now or I will go to somebody else.

Mr. McCurdy: My question for the Minister of Justice on behalf of the government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Answering on behalf of the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am listening to the question.

Mr. McCurdy: If the hon. members would acknowledge that they should shut up so I can be heard, I will ask the question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that he can be heard. The hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR RESEARCH ON CULTURAL ENTERPRISES

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I will put my question to the person who is answering for the President of the Treasury Board. The president of the Canadian Institute for Research on Cultural Enterprises said that his institute must provide the government with a return on its investment in cultural enterprises. To do so, the institute is abusing its power to take over the technology of a small company that it subsidized. It cut off funds to this company, forcing it to lay off its staff. It tried to seize this company's goods.

Does the minister support the actions of the institute or will he promise to end the wrongful pressure exercised by this monster which the government has created?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I do not know of the specific example, but I will certainly take notice of the question and get back to the hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, earlier in Question Period the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development answering a question on behalf of the Minister of the Environment suggested that the comments I had made were in fact alarmist over-reactions.

I just wanted to set the record straight, Madam Speaker. The comments that I made were reiterations, public comments, from the chief of Canada's environmental radiation hazards branch. They were not my comments. They were also comments by officials at the Hanford nuclear reservation itself.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should know that this is not a question of privilege. It is not even a point of order. It is a question of debate, and I am sure there will be another venue where the hon. member will be able to put his point across to the House.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 23RD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I move that the 23rd report of the Standing Committee on House Management, presented to the House on Friday, February 14, 1992, be concurred in.

It certainly is a pleasure for me to present and speak to this particular committee report. It has been an honour to take part in the debate and discussions relating to the experimental guidelines governing the broadcasting of committee meetings. That was a result of Standing Order 119.1(2).

I just want to quote a few things from the report because I think they are very important for all members here and certainly for the public.

> On the one hand, there is the desire for openness of democratic political institutions and freedom of the press.

We can all understand and recognize that.

> On the other hand, there are serious concerns of parliamentary privilege and the effects of broadcasting on parliamentary institutions.
> There are many strong arguments in favour of the broadcasting of committee proceedings. A great deal of important work is done by members in committees and the public should have an opportunity to see this—The broadcasting of the proceedings of committees would provide a more balanced view of the parliamentary process and would enhance the public's perception and appreciation of the work of Parliament and parliamentarians.
> The risk is that the collegiality of committees could be destroyed and replaced by a more partisan and adversarial approach by all parties.

That is something we do not want to happen.

> The public has a right to know what is going on in Parliament but it is important to remember that it is a legislative body rather than a television program.

The committee's task was to establish guidelines for broadcasting that would preserve the collegial and informal atmosphere of committee meetings, thus providing a more balanced view of the parliamentary process.

We studied a couple of reports that have been very important and very instrumental in bringing this final report together. Watching the House at Work, the Cook report, provided a lot of background information and impetus to this report.

The other one was The Role and Importance of Committees, the 1985 report of the McGrath committee because that certainly changed the role of committees. It changed the importance of committees in my view. We have taken those two reports, combined them with the views, the information we heard from many, many witnesses.

Of particular importance was the information we received in the provincial legislatures of Ontario and Quebec. They took us through their process and helped us with it. We understood it and certainly, it allowed us to make decisions. In some cases it changed our views and opinions of the particular process.

It was necessary to distinguish two aspects of broadcasting. First, there is recording whereby we have gavel to gavel coverage of the committee meeting. Second, there is reporting, that is, allowing the electronic media access to committee meetings to coverage of the proceedings for recording purposes.

The committee, in its wisdom, decided upon a phasing-in approach to broadcasting, first to allow the media to record the sound or audio feed of all public committee meetings. The technology for this is already in place. This can be used by print and radio journalists very easily and television journalists could use it together with a picture of the person speaking.

We would also like to see the audio of all committee proceedings broadcast, either through OASIS or by closed-circuit FM radio. This would enable members and their staff and the media to monitor committee meetings.

Two problems presented themselves with the next phase of broadcasting. We wanted to make sure that the House was going to have the responsibility of recording and distributing tape proceedings, but those costs would be astronomical. In addition, there are just too many committee meetings to have all of them broadcast on the parliamentary channel.

• (1210)

The committee recommends one committee room would be set up on a non-permanent basis using existing or rented equipment at a minimum cost. The proceedings would be recorded gavel to gavel and broadcast live on OASIS and on a delayed basis on the parliamentary channel.

The recording of proceedings would be undertaken by or on behalf of the House and under direct control and supervision of the House personnel.

Given the multitude of committee meetings per day, a decision-making process must be put in place to determine which committee will be broadcast. We believe the decision should be made by the House leaders and if the House leaders are unable to agree the matter could be referred to the management committee.

We expect that a system will be devised whereby the committees and their chairmen will indicate their desire to have particular proceedings broadcast. The House leaders, of course, would take that into account, as well as public interest and fairness and reflecting the views of the different members.

We believe the issue of broadcasting committees will need to be reviewed after six months, as well as having a system set up to review complaints.

That is the essence of the report. I would just like to make one final comment if I may, and that is concerning the co-operation of the members on the committee. I want to particularly comment to the members from Saint-Léonard, Kingston and the Islands and particularly the member from Saint-Denis, who is here but is not listening to me at the present time.

Mr. Prud'homme: I am paying very close attention.

Mr. Cole: It was very interesting to have one of the more senior members of this House with very strong views sitting on this committee. He approached this committee with open-mindedness and co-operation. He, along with myself and many others, have changed our views from the start of the process which resulted in a report that I think we can all be very proud of.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I am just delighted to be able to participate in this debate this afternoon. I know many of my colleagues will want to participate as well as the afternoon progresses.

At the outset, I want to congratulate a number of my colleagues, including the hon. member who has just spoken, on the report which he has filed with this House. I congratulate my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, my colleague from Saint-Léonard and, of course, my very distinguished colleague from Saint-Denis who is a veteran of this House and has been a veteran of that particular committee and the subject matter for quite some time. I want to pay tribute to him and to all of those individuals who have worked so hard in trying to arrive at a solution to what we believed was a problem.

I believe my colleague from Kingston and the Islands will, later on in the debate, clearly spell out what the goals and the objectives were and how there has been a substantial watering down of the undertakings that we thought we had.

Nevertheless, there is some agreement. I do not speak for other political parties or members of other political parties, but I would hope that there would be a spirit of co-operation where we could have some unanimous support for this particular initiative, to provide audio feed by the House of Commons for all public committee meetings. That in itself will be helpful to our deliberations and helpful to those who are interested in the subject matter that we deal with.

Members will therefore be able to keep abreast of committee hearings from their own offices, whether they be in the Confederation building, Wellington building, Centre Block, West Block, East Block or indeed any other block that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader wishes to have some of his members. I know there are some of his members that perhaps he would like to have in places, some might even say cell blocks, but who knows.

It has been our position because of the importance of committees and how they have increased over the years that the broadcasting of committee meetings is quite important. I would like to give a couple of examples if I may.

Sometime ago in a previous Parliament, I had the honour of being the critic for consumer and corporate affairs where we debated quite vigorously the contents of a bill commonly referred to as Bill C-21. My hon. colleague may be apprised of that subject matter. It was with regard to the generic and pharmaceutical industries in this country.

We have testimony from ordinary Canadians to academics, to labour representatives, to specialists involved in that field. It would have been a wonderful exchange for Canadians to see in a public forum, on a broadcast network, the kinds of comments and interventions which were being made on the subject matter.

I have to be very candid. Not all the witnesses to which I have referred were supportive of the position I was putting forward at the committee. The government members did have a number of interveners who came before the committee and concluded that the government was on the right track. Notwithstanding the differences of opinion between the opposing sides, I underline the significance for Canadians to see members of Parliament at work on important subject matter.

The second point I wish to bring to the attention of the House is that all too often young Canadians as well as those who view our proceedings have the impression that the only thing members of Parliament do is from time to time ask questions during Question Period when they are given the opportunity.

An hon. member: When the caucus chairman is not asking questions.

Mr. Dingwall: When that opportunity presents itself, as capable as my colleague here to the left, who has had numerous questions on the floor of the House of Commons, going back many years—

An hon. member: Not as many as I should.

Mr. Dingwall: They would think that all of the duties of my colleague to the left would be to ask questions. Everywhere I go, and I know my colleague to the left probably hears these stories as well, people are always asking me: "Mr. Nunziata, when are you going to ask some more questions?"

Mr. Nunziata: Because the House leader plays favourites.

Mr. Dingwall: They do that. I think that this report will assist Curly Moe and Curly Day in being exposed to other subject matters than the venue of Question Period.

It must be realized that Canadians think that all we do is Question Period. They are not given the opportunity to see us in committee on important subject matters. I made reference, for instance, to Bill C–21, the pharmaceutical act. I make reference to a bill which has passed this House and is in the Upper Chamber, Bill C–13, the Environmental Assessment Act.

Of course, one of the most important committees in this House is the one for which my colleague is the lead critic as the employment critic. He is on employment equity. That subject matter should be aired not only on Question Period, as the hon. member has done so many times, but should be given an opportunity in committee in order that we hear the different views on the subject matter as well as hearing from ordinary Canadians who have a particular interest in the subject matter we are debating.

That is fundamental to the way in which we proceed with the legislative agenda of the government because it is their right to pursue that kind of agenda.

On this particular report for which I have paid tribute to my colleague for Saint–Denis, I do not know if he was listening earlier, I wish to reiterate the significant contribution he has made to developing this report.

We are hoping to set up a permanent room to be used by a committee which will broadcast its hearings in order to provide better coverage and access to information by the media and by the public. There is a lot of media in this country other than the national networks that would be interested in some of the subject matter. I made references to national concerns. There are regional concerns which have a particular bearing on the economy and on the important social programs which affect different regions of this country. I make reference to small craft harbours which would be an item which would be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans. That would be of significant importance to those of us who come from the Atlantic region.

• (1220)

I make reference to things which pertain to the oilseeds industry in this country which would come under the auspices of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I am sure there would be individuals both from western Canada and Ontario who would want to be seized of that particular subject matter in order to be better informed on the issue and also to make members of Parliament accountable.

I have heard time and time again in this Chamber and privately, if I may, Madam Speaker, that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader always talks about the fundamental issue of accountability. Accountability is important, but I think Canadians should see and hear and receive our spoken word, which would subsequently be reported in Hansard. They should receive all of this information so that they will have an opportunity to say their member of Parliament is either accountable to what we believe to be important or not accountable.

I would hope that this will proceed and will get the support of all members of this House. I know that a number of my colleagues, and in their absence, Madam Speaker, I want you to know that my colleagues from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Halifax, Cardigan, Winnipeg South Centre and Winnipeg North all wanted to participate today in this particular debate in order that they may put their concerns on the record.

In point of fact just yesterday my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and I had extended conversation with regard to the subject matter of broadcasting of committee meetings. In fact, my colleague brought to my attention some very pertinent information I was not aware of at the time and I know later on in our deliberations we will want to hear from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who will make a stirring address on the floor of the House of Commons.

I wish to close my brief remarks unless there is unanimous consent for me to continue.

An hon. member: Filibuster.

Mr. Dingwall: No, I would not filibuster. That is not my intention. But I want the parliamentary secretary to know that my colleague from Kingston and the Islands will clearly spell out that although this is a compromise of the different views, it is certainly not the standard that we thought the government wished to pursue. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands will give a chapter and verse, detailed, t's crossed, i's dotted, precise information on that point.

Madam Speaker, I want to thank you and I want to thank all of those members, including the hon. member opposite who led off this debate on this report, for their interventions. I hope that this kind of co-operation, notwithstanding it was a compromise, can continue and that it will be unanimous. I say that without speaking to other individuals in this Chamber. I think it quite important that we proceed in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, if I am not mistaken the House leader for the Official Opposition asked if there would be unanimous consent for him to extend his remarks.

I want to indicate to him that I think that may not be a bad idea. We are looking at possibly concurring in the 23rd, 24th, 27th, 22nd, and 28th reports. Maybe what we could do is debate them all together and then we would be more than happy to have him take some more time to do that if that is what the House would be willing to do.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, there are two issues here. The first issue is unanimous support for me to continue with my speech on report No. 23. I do not think there is agreement.

The second issue is to take in other reports and to weave them in under the auspices of report No. 23. I wish that I could co-operate with the hon. member because it is a reasonable suggestion. I have to inform the Chair and the hon. member that my colleagues wish to speak to certain reports, not to others and as a result, I cannot give unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask my colleague a few questions.

We do not often have the chance to ask our esteemed House leader questions in the House of Commons, so I would like to take this opportunity to ask him a question or two about report No. 23.

We have here a report of the House management committee which is a committee that consists of senior representatives of all three political parties. I agree with my friend and colleague that we ought to have more openness as far as committees are concerned, and the public ought to have an opportunity to listen in on the work of committees and to see the work of other committees.

I would like to ask the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition whether he and his colleagues, perhaps the member for Saint-Denis and others can indicate, are prepared to have the affairs of the House management committee opened up and broadcast so that other Canadians and MPs can listen in or see what the elite members of the House of Commons, the senior members, the important MPs in this House are discussing in order for there to be more credibility to the whole process.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I am not used to responding to questions of a substantive nature.

I want to say to my hon. colleague that he does make a worthy and important positive suggestion. I want to clarify the premise of his question. All members of this House are distinguished. All members of this House have certain responsibilities, however, the only difference is that some may be around a little bit longer than others.

I would find nothing inherently wrong with the proceeding of the deliberations under the House management committee having the opportunity to be broadcast on the network. Members would answer to the general public and Canadians would understand some of the items and issues that they are discussing. They could be brought home.

In response to his very positive suggestion, I think that is something that hon. members, including my colleagues from Saint-Léonard, Kingston and the Islands and Saint-Denis, would want to take under due consideration. Perhaps when deliberations of the House management committee resume, it might be able to raise that and perhaps report back to the hon. member as to whether or not the positive suggestion that he makes can be accommodated by the House management committee.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I just want to intervene to put a quick question to my hon. friend who has given a good speech on this particular report.

It is one that does have an awful lot of support on all sides of the House. As chairman, I want to thank his members who have worked so hard on the committee report, the members of the New Democratic Party and certainly the members on my own side who have done that.

I just listened to the last exchange, and I want to raise one particular point for the hon. member to comment on. It seems to me I heard the member for York South—Weston indicate that he thought that perhaps the management committee should adopt a more open style. I am paraphrasing and using my own words, but I want to put to the House leader of the Official Opposition as to whether he is aware that since the committee was changed and has become the management committee, now virtually all of its meetings are held in public. We have opened up that process including our most recent review of the estimates of the House of Commons. Our idea is to accomplish exactly what the hon. member for York South—Weston has asked us to consider, to let Canadians see what we, as members of Parliament, are trying to address in terms of the administration of our own affairs.

• (1230)

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his kind intervention and to remind him that yes, I was fully aware that the deliberations of the house management committee were more public than they ever have been in the past.

I think the point my colleague from York South—Weston was attempting to make is that yes, be public but perhaps our deliberations could be broadcast, whether it is on the CBC network or the CTV or the parliamentary channel.

I think that was the intent of his question, withstanding the fact that our deliberations are public and are open. I want to give credit where credit is due.

The chairman of that committee deserves a certain degree of credit. I also want to give due credit to the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the hon. member for Saint-Léonard and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who I believe, if one was to review the Hansard of the deliberations and the minutes of the meeting, were very supportive and initiated the concept of more openness. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary will be able to carry this openness even further in other deliberations that we have on the floor of the House.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the wise comments made in this House by the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. He has mentioned the importance of broadcasting our committee deliberations.

I want to remind him and all hon. members of the important work of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations on which committee, of course, I have the honour and privilege to serve.

Madam Speaker, as you will know because of your vast knowledge of parliamentary matters, that committee deals with a tremendous number of government departments and agencies, everything from Canada Post, which has so mismanaged the postal affairs of this nation, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the National Capital Commission, the Department of Supply and Services, the Department of Public Works and a number of other agencies.

I want to ask my colleague if he agrees with me that it would be important for Canadians to have the opportunity to see the important work this committee is doing. In addition, I want to raise at this point the matter of the special committee dealing with Bill C-43, the conflict of interest rules. That is a very important committee as well. It deals with the integrity of government. I am sure that Canadians would want to have the opportunity to see this committee as well.

I invite my colleague to respond as to whether he thinks, as I do, that it would be very important for Canadians to avail themselves of the opportunity to see the work done by those two parliamentary committees and others of course.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question.

I do not think there is any doubt in my mind or in the minds of Canadians that it would be very advantageous to have senior officials of Canada Post come before a committee to give testimony, not only on the operations of Canada Post but also on the public policy they have been carrying out for the last number of years.

It would be even more interesting to have the president come before the committee and explain on television, so that Canadians could see, the kind of salary this individual receives as well as the kind of bonus this individual receives.

In other words, you lay off workers and you get a big bonus. You shut down post offices, you get a bonus. I think Canadians would like to see the facial expression of that particular president of Canada Post, as well as government members who sit in that committee supporting the closure of rural post offices, the supporting of the substantial bonuses which have been given to Canada Post. You know, some of these bonuses exceed what any individual would deem to be fair, reasonable and appropriate in the circumstances, when there are Canadians who are lined up at food banks across this country.

I say to my colleague that I agree most heartily that that particular committee which he has made reference to is important. It does important work. It is important to have officials of Canada Post and other organizations come before the respective committees and give testimony in front of the members. It ought to be broadcast so that we can all see that there will be no doubt in terms of the quality of the questions that the opposition members raise, in terms of the support that government members give willingly to the large bonuses and the closing down of rural post offices and the dislocation of jobs, the disruption of communities, et cetera.

I think Canadians would like to see that and I want to thank my hon. colleague for raising that important matter.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to join in the debate on this issue this afternoon.

It seems to me that this is a fairly straightforward issue, the matter of broadcasting some committee hearings of the House of Commons.

We support this rather enthusiastically, Madam Speaker, and I want to indicate why. As members of the New Democratic Party, we have had a chance to participate in the discussions.

The one sense that Canadians have generally is a feeling of powerlessness, the fact that there is very little that they can do about a government that is relatively arrogant in almost all policy areas.

I must say that at times all of us as members of Parliament experience a similar feeling, that in spite of the excellent efforts one makes, the government often tends to ignore the proposals, the suggestions, the recommendations, the alternatives and proceeds merrily on its way.

I suppose for the public it is not always clear and Canadians looking in on the operations of the House of Commons, listening to our debate, Question Period and the comments that are made here, get a distorted view of what actually happens in the Parliament of Canada.

I think that some of the best moments of people working together in the best interests of the country, of people setting aside their partisan differences in an effort to generate policy recommendations, takes place in committees.

If the people of Canada had an opportunity from time to time to look in at the work that committees do, whether it is on forestry or agriculture or foreign policy or trade policy or tax policy, they would see that when members of Parliament sit down together, with the odd exception, there is a genuine willingness to co-operate and work together in the best interests of developing good policy.

The problem is not the work by parliamentarians, but when those recommendations or proposals go to the government essentially they are often ignored. They are simply left on some shelf to gather dust while the government goes merrily on its way in its sort of "Father knows best" approach to government.

I think that by setting aside one of our committee rooms so that the proceedings can be televised, it would allow people in the comfort of their living rooms, rec rooms, bedrooms, kitchens, wherever they watch television, to actually have a chance to watch the proceedings of a committee at work.

It would serve a number of purposes. First of all, it would on occasion indicate that members of Parliament can work together co-operatively, as I indicated earlier.

Second, and perhaps most important in my judgment, is that often when we deal with controversial pieces of legislation or develop policies in a certain area, we bring in witnesses. Those witnesses tend to be people or groups with expertise in aspects of the legislation or the policy being debated, and they often provide excellent input into the decision-making.

It would be useful for the people of Canada to see from time to time when, for example, we are dealing with cuts to health care or cuts to post-secondary education, witness after witness pointing out why the government should abandon its course of cutting and destroying medicare, or why the government should abandon its course of turning its back on post-secondary education and retraining programs. When we hear witness after witness, expert after expert, point out in very detailed terms why the government should change its course and to know that the government will ignore those recommendations, will ignore what is often the unanimous recommendation of the committee, I think it would be useful. It would remind Canadians just how out of touch or how arrogant the government has become.

• (1240)

For those reasons, it makes a good deal of sense. While all of the committees obviously cannot be televised—I see that as being rather chaotic when you consider the number of special committees or standing committees that might be sitting at any one time—I think it would be appropriate, at least on this experimental basis for the House leaders to attempt to determine which committees are dealing with subject matter that would be of most interest to Canadian viewers generally, in terms of understanding the inner workings of Parliament.

The fact there is a recommendation that all committees which are sitting would at least be available to others through an audio outlet is another step in the right direction. The more we can open up this place, the more we can expose how the Parliament of Canada actually works, other than simply the floor of the House of Commons, would be a useful step forward.

As we struggle to give more jurisdiction and more responsibility to the committees working on behalf of Parliament, if the people of Canada could look in on those proceedings, I think that members of Parliament would continue not only their generally good work, but the government would feel more inclined to follow the advice and to adopt the recommendations that the committee reports inevitably come up with.

I simply want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that I appreciate the hard work that has been done by all of the members, including of course the representatives of the New Democratic Party and that when the time comes to support this committee report we will be voting in the affirmative.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague's speech. I found it very interesting and I see that the New Democratic Party supports this report. This afternoon, I will have an opportunity to speak, but in this period for questions and comments, I just want to tell my colleague that often here in the House we are tempted in the heat of debate during Oral Question Period to say, in asking a question, "In the absence of the Minister of Finance, I direct my question to such and such a minister." It often happens that tempers flare in the heat of debate and someone might say that a certain member is not present. However, it does not necessarily mean that the member who is not in the House is not doing his work, for he might very well not be in the House, for example now when we are debating this motion, but attending a meeting, sitting on a committee or looking after other parliamentary responsibilities.

So I would like to know his opinion on this subject. Will this report allow people through television or radio to have a better idea of the work done by committees? Many committees sit at the same time as the House during the week. Such a report would make the work done by MPs better known, as well as the important role of parliamentary, standing, legislative or even special committees. Could I have my colleague's comments on that?

[English]

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague raises a good issue. I think that right now is a good example. Anybody who might be watching these proceedings and listening to me at this moment would get the impression that there are not very many people here working.

Well, that is partly true, they are not in their seats here working. I can assure the House that all of the individuals who would normally be sitting in the seats around mine are at work.

As my hon. friend has indicated, televising some of the committee work and providing audio feeds from all of the committees would introduce Canadians generally to the fact that members of Parliament do much more than simply appear and speak in the House of Commons.

I suspect that for most of us this is one of our smaller tasks. We probably spend the least amount of our time doing this.

Last year there were over 1,000 committee meetings of the Parliament of Canada. Those were all of the standing committees, special joint committees, and so on. There were over 1,000 meetings involving over 2,000 hours of work by members of the House of Commons.

As a member of Parliament who has been here for a few years and has had the opportunity to participate in a number of committees over those years, I could say that most of that work was very productive and very positive. Whether it was in the areas of agriculture, forestry, recreation, or taxation, it was time very well spent.

In response to the question from my hon. colleague, I do think that televising some of the committee proceedings and providing audio sourcing for all of the committees will certainly help the public's understanding of the kind of work being done here other than what takes place on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Kamloops, as House leader for his party, has taken an active role in the discussions leading to the report that has come before the House. He was not a member of the House management committee that produced the report but I know that he actively encouraged the members of his party who were serving on that committee.

My question to him is whether he agrees with the report in what it does not say. Perhaps this is an odd way to put a question. However I think that, perhaps like me, he expected that the rules relating to the televising of committee proceedings in this House would be liberalized considerably.

This report goes some way to achieving that goal by setting up a single room from which the proceedings of any committee could be televised, if it was in that room. However, it does not permit indiscriminate televising of other committees nor does it permit committees to make their own decisions as to whether they will be televised unless they are able to arrange accommodation in the single room.

He knows as well as I do that at any one time there could be five or six committees of this House sitting. Clearly it will be difficult, particularly when most committee meetings take place Tuesdays, Wednesday afternoons, and Thursdays. When that is the case it will be difficult to squeeze very many committees into this room in the course of a day. There will be some limit.

Does the hon. member think that in accepting and putting forward this proposal the government has really honoured the commitment to allow for televising of committees that it made when rule changes were made in the spring of last year?

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, in response to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands I certainly did encourage our colleagues on the committee—the hon. members for Oshawa, Thunder Bay—Atikokan, and others who participated—to support this. They did an excellent job in coming up with a unanimous report in terms of recommendations.

The point he raises is most appropriate. There was a willingness of members of the House to open up the system completely, to say that we have excellent standing committees doing work that ought to be made public, that the people of Canada ought to be made aware of, particularly when the government members simply ignore the reality, when they ignore the recommendations and opinions of people who understand some of these issues certainly better than we do.

There was a recommendation that we open up the committees, that we televise them or allow television cameras in, allow the media to come in and film the proceedings and tell the people of Canada what is going on.

The government chose not to do that and has come up with this rather laundered version of that feeling.

• (1250)

I suspect that in this business you sometimes simply inch forward. Having one committee room televised so that people can see the proceedings and the news media can take advantage of those proceedings on a regular basis will enable the government to see the advantage of opening up this process.

It does indicate a reneging on the part of the government in terms of our original position. It indicates that it was not prepared to open up the House of Commons as we would have liked to have seen it done. However it is a small step forward and perhaps we should at least be thankful for that.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to make it clear here that just because committees can sit in this committee room equipped with television does not mean that the public will have access. The public will have access only if the news media decides to broadcast any part of it.

Some people might be confused in thinking that certain committees will be televised live to television sets right across the country. However, in effect, and this is what the House leader for the New Democratic Party confirmed, the opportunity would simply be there for television stations—

An hon. member: It will be live.

Mr. Nunziata: The member indicates that it will be live. What channel will be used? Perhaps I can put a series of questions to the hon. House leader. First, can he confirm that the proceedings of any committees sitting in that particular room will be broadcast live across the country?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Nunziata: Can he also indicate the channel? Will it be the parliamentary channel or a separate channel? I would also like to ask the hon. member what the cost of all this is? Who will bear the cost of financing the implementation of the recommendations in the 23rd report of the House management committee? Surely, before the committee was in a position to make this recommendation it would have considered the entire cost of implementing the recommendations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately there is no time left for the hon. member for Kamloops to answer. Maybe he could do it in one minute or less.

Mr. Riis: May I make another suggestion, Madam Speaker? I appreciate that my time has run out but I think the questions raised by my hon. colleague are questions that will be on a lot of people's minds and are appropriate.

I personally was not a member of the committee. Therefore, I wonder if we could seek unanimous consent to have those questions directed to my hon. colleague who introduced this report for his response. I would need unanimous consent to have these questions directed to my colleague.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Then the hon. member may answer.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, this is the way the committee operates, we kind of stretch things on occasion.

I did not hear the first part of the member's question. However, I would like to talk a little bit about the cost, the controls and some of the projections we have received from staff with regard to how this would be handled in terms of cost. There are two or three options to be decided by the management committee as to how it would be done. It can be done on a temporary basis for six months with a capital cost of approximately $35,000. It would cost about $130 to project it.

There are a number of options for televising in one particular room. In one particular case, it can be done for about $125,000. The costs to operate that are more substantive because the equipment is not as sophisticated. We could go to another more sophisticated system and that would reduce the operating costs by about one-quarter. The more expensive system has a pay-back in terms of operating costs. Those are decisions that would have to be made at that time.

As for the radio broadcast, that would be done with existing equipment. There would be very little if any cost, except perhaps some mini-radio or whatever in member's offices to pick up a speaker system or something. It may even be possible to do it over the present television system.

The other thing which I think the member asked concerned—he will have to correct me if I am wrong—when the meetings would be telecast. The point was that Parliament would come first. The House of Commons would come first.

If the House was not sitting, for instance, and a committee meeting was going on then the committee would go live on the parliamentary channel. The committee could be delayed maybe three or four hours and played after the House finished sitting on the parliamentary channel. There is a lot of space on the parliamentary channel that is not being used. The purpose was to use that space on the parliamentary channel that is not presently being used on a slight delay when the House is sitting.

If it is played later the date and time of the meeting would be displayed on the screen at all times so that the public watching it would recognize that it was taped two or three days ago. There is a lot of time on that channel. There are the weekends and times like that. Meetings that took place during the week could be broadcast the following weekend. That may help to answer his question, although I did not hear the beginning of the member's question.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate. I am still a member of the House management committee and this committee is operating as usual, with sub-committees. But we want to stress, for the benefit of the people who are watching us or listening to us, the importance of the task we have set out to do with the mandate we were given, which is to look into the broadcasting of all proceedings of the House. At every committee meeting I attended, we heard interesting evidence from several witnesses. I will refer to that in my speech.

First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that it was not just in recent months that the House management committee started looking into the matter of broadcasting. It has been a subject of discussion for years in committee. Besides, my colleague from Saint-Denis participated in the discussions and did an excellent job at that.

Before the advent of radio and television, we had and we still have what we call Hansard. I think that ever since the proceedings of the House started to be televised, the challenge has been to produce an electronic Hansard. I think that, as was mentioned earlier, other reports along the same lines were produced and we took them into consideration. We have also considered the evidence from several witnesses, namely those representing the media and the press gallery people. They have requested that all proceedings of standing committees, legislative committees or special committees of the House be completely open. We had to reach a compromise vis-à-vis this request. Madam Speaker, there is also the issue of costs that must be taken into account and our listeners must think about that. Of course, we would like all proceedings to be public, for we have nothing to hide, but this implies a cost in order to ensure that everybody gets the same information.

We had to take all those factors into account to come up with a report such as today's which, of course, is not perfect because it will not enable us to meet all the requests. But given our resources and the present situation in the country, I believe that we have struck a balance with this report. Once it will be implemented, we will certainly find flaws that we will be able to correct and we will also be able to improve on it. I hope that with time all our proceedings, particularly at the committees, will be broadcast, as is already the case here in the House of Commons.

I would also like to explain to those who listen to us, because we are talking to all our listeners, that the objective of this report is to inform Canadians and to keep them aware of all the activities of their members and of the Government of Canada. The idea is to make sure that Canadians are well informed, and there is no doubt that this costs money. Let us take the House of Commons. Right now, there are not very many of us in the House. But this is not to say that the members that are not here are not doing anything or are on vacation. They sit on committees, they attend meetings or they work in their offices. Our job does not only involve being here in the House and taking part in debates. There are other places where debates take place.

So it would now be appropriate to tell Canadians about the committees that exist. We often talk about committees, but I believe that we should name them and explain how they work. Their work is important. I will not go back and explain how they used to work, but right now our committees are divided into envelopes. For instance, the human resources sector includes among others, the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, on which eight members sit, five representing the government, two representing the Official Opposition and one representing the New Democratic Party. There is also the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons; the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship; the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women; and the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

For each sector, there are also two legislative committees. Those are standing committees that can call ministers and that discuss the activities of departments. However, we have set up these legislative committees specifically to study bills after second reading to speed up the work of the House.

The other sector that I would like to tell you about is the natural resources envelope. That sector includes the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, the Standing Committee on Environment, the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries, as well as two legislative committees.

There is also the economics envelope which includes the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, the Standing Committee on Finance—obviously this economics envelope must include the committee, on finance—the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development. There is also the transport committee, which is also very important, as well as two legislative committees.

Finally, there is the departmental envelope which includes the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations—

Mr. Boudria: A very good committee.

Mr. Gagliano: My colleague does an exceptional job. There is, of course, the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, the Standing Committee on Official Languages, as well as two legislative committees.

As you can see, we have many committees meeting from Monday to Friday while this House is sitting. Some even start earlier than the House at times. The Canadian people are not aware of the important work accomplished by these committees. I should point out that most of the time witnesses of national stature are invited. National groups come and testify before them to give members of both sides of this House very important suggestions on how to manage the country, how to look to the future, how Canada can become a more prosperous country on the cutting edge. And only members of this House and a few reporters—from the print media—are allowed to attend the meetings and take notes. On the other hand, the electronic media, such as radio and television, are not allowed in, except perhaps just before the meeting is called to order to get some footage for the evening news.

Regarding the committee report before us, there is no doubt that the members of this House, as everybody else, would like complete coverage of committee proceedings so that people can get all the information they need. There is, however, a financial problem, a problem with the costs involved, but also with knowing which committee should take precedence over which, when, and so on. That is why we have concluded that the best thing would be to have a room, either here in Center Block, or in another building on Parliament Hill, equipped for the broadcasting of committee proceedings. It would then be up to this House, to the three parties, to our House leaders to get together, as we are doing now, and discuss the matter and come to a decision. A number of important things have happened over the past few years, including the repatriation of the Constitution, the Al–Mashat incident, and the GST. It is easy to recognize the great significance of an issue or a policy change such as those. Therefore, an agreement could easily be reached as to which committee should meet in a room equipped for the broadcasting of its proceedings. There will always be a committee whose proceedings will be broadcast.

Another step forward. Unfortunately, my various duties as Whip have prevented me—because I never want to be too far from the House—from travelling as extensively as some other members of the committee who have visited the Ontario Legislature to see how things are done there. It appears that there were some things to learn from that legislature, some innovative ideas. Committee members spent an entire day there and had a very nice welcome. The operation of the system was explained to them and they talked with members of the Ontario Legislature to determine whether some elements could apply here.

Another group of members visited the Quebec National Assembly also to check what kind of innovations could apply in this House.

These two visits were significant enough to allow the committee to draw conclusions and prepare the report being debated today, which has met with approval from all three political parties. I imagine that pretty soon we will be able to implement this new system.

• (1310)

As I was saying, part of the problem was solved by having one room permanently equipped for television broadcasting. For the other committees we decided to use the system they have at the Quebec National Assembly. I do not know whether the legislature in Toronto has the same system, but in Quebec City they have an audio system which provides a feed from all committee meetings. This feed is available to members in their offices, where they can listen to committee proceedings and there will also be a feed to the press gallery.

So we have made some progress. Once the report is adopted, we will have a room that is permanently equipped for broadcasting committee proceedings. However, it will be up to the House to decide whether broadcasting will be gavel to gavel, while all other committees will be able to provide an audio feed of their proceedings and debates.

I think perhaps it was not understood that the main objective was to televise the sittings of House committees, but I think we have made some very important progress. Once the report is adopted, we will be able broadcast major committee proceedings.

At the present time, all Canadians watch the debates of the House, including Oral Question Period, but very few people except for members, their assistants and a few journalists are aware of the important issues being discussed in more than 20 standing committees, in addition to the legislative committees. With this system, people will not only be able to listen to exchanges between members but also to testimony by experts and important groups in Canada which appear before those committees and provide further material for discussion, to help us improve our laws and improve the well–being of our young people, our children and grandchildren, so they can look foward to a decent future in this country.

Consequently, the committee first recommends that the audio feed provided by the House of Commons of public committee meetings be able to be recorded. The committee also recommends that the audio feed of all public committee meetings be made available to members of Parliament, their staffs and the Parliamentary Press Gallery on Parliament Hill, and be used for broadcasting purposes. So if the press wishes to do so, it can use the audio tape for its news reports.

Here are some more recommendations, and there are quite a few. The committee recommends that the House of Commons should initially equip one committee room for broadcasting, and the proceedings of all committees meeting in this room should be taped in full, made available to the media, and broadcast as part of the parliamentary channel.

I think that my colleague from York South—Weston just asked on which channel. I think that it will be on the parliamentary channel. So everything will always be broadcast on the parliamentary channel. Of course journalists will be able to use it for their news reports.

The fifth recommendation is as follows: the date of the committee meeting must appear on the screen at all times in legible print.

Here is the sixth recommendation: the decision as to which committees shall meet in this room will be made by the House leaders, or, if they are unable to agree, by the Standing Committee on House Management.

We know that according to tradition, our House leaders meet regularly to discuss and that they often reach consensus. So the House leaders will make the decision. If there is no agreement, the Standing Committee on House Management will decide which committee can sit in the room equipped for broadcasting.

The seventh recommendation is: all committees of the House of Commons, including standing, legislative and special committees, would be entitled to meet in the specially equipped room to have their meetings broadcast, provided that priority shall be given to those committees that do not have a special order from the House permitting any meeting or series of meetings to be broadcast.

Next, the eighth recommendation is as follows: the committee recommends that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be amended to provide as follows: "108.(3) The mandate of the Standing Committee on (a) House Management shall include, in addition to the duties set forth in Standing Order 104, and among other matters: (v) the review of and report on the radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees".

I think that is very important, because it is something being added to the mandate of the standing committee of the House.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my colleague. I agree with everything that he said in terms of making sure our committees are reported on the same conditions as the House of Commons. What I do not understand is why they only want to have one committee room.

I share the view of the hon. member that probably the best work in this House of Commons is done in committee. One of the reasons why it is the best is that many expert witnesses from all over the country, sometimes from all over the world, appear before committees. Their testimony sometimes forms the basis of policy that is developed in this country.

If we only cover one committee, or have the capability of only covering one committee, I think we are going to end up creating two or three classes of legislative work. The camera equipment is obviously going to be a large capital cost in the beginning. Once we get over that hurdle it would not be that difficult to get another channel just to do committee work. Televising committee meetings is great training. It is great experience for people.

I ask my colleague who is an entrepreneur: why are we going at this thing in half measure? Why are we creating a situation where all of a sudden the only committee that is going to be televised is the finance committee because everyone wants to be on the finance committee? Then all of a sudden we have created two tiers of committees. When we were conducting the GST hearings in the finance committee there was a line-up. Everybody wanted to appear and everybody wanted to sit on the finance committee and they could not find anybody to do the other committees.

For example, yesterday we had a committee meeting on tourism and we could barely get a quorum. We had some of the best witnesses on tourism from all over the country; they were experts in their field. Even though tourism is an important issue we can bet our bottom dollar if in the next room over the finance committee was being televised that is where everyone would want to be.

My colleague is described by our House leader as one of those elite members of the management board. I ask him: Why do we not bite the bullet right now? If we are going to do this—and I am sure we will get unanimous support for this idea—let us not do it in half measure. Let us do all committees all of the time and let us get another parliamentary channel.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his questions and comments.

I said in my speech that the objective was to create an electronic Hansard for everything that is being done around this place. Unfortunately there are two considerations. First, this place does not move as fast as my hon. colleague and myself would like it to move. What we accomplished in this report is a step in the right direction.

Second, there is a major capital cost involved. It is not just to install cameras and some wires. I listed all the committees that we have. Aside from all the legislative and special committees, there are over 20 permanent committees sitting from Monday to Friday. People might think we have a lot of large rooms here, but according to the experts we were told that it would require major capital cost allowances for renovations. If we look at all the rooms that we have, most of our committee rooms do not have enough space. We have to remodel these rooms before we can install equipment.

We have to act fast. This thing was started years and years ago. We have had enough study. We have to start somewhere. We were told that if we wanted to start right away at least one room could be accommodated. We have at least one room where we do not have to do any alternations. We do not have to knock walls down, remove floors and so on. We just have to install some cameras and we have the cameras. Perhaps we will have to buy a couple of new ones, which is not a major expenditure. We could start right away. So that is what we went for.

We have something that is just the beginning. We hope that gradually over today and next week this report will be implemented. The management committee now has the mandate to supervise this new thing. If it is good and it needs some improvement, we will make it. In the meantime we will look to find other means, other rooms and other equipment, as much as we can.

We know we are living in a very tight economic situation. As soon as we can move, we will definitely add more committee rooms which will be televised. I encourage my colleague to keep pushing members of the management committee like myself so that we can have more committee rooms equipped with television cameras like the first one we will be creating very soon.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened to the remarks and particularly the questions and comments—these last few moments regarding an indication and a willingness to televise the proceedings of this House and its committees as much as possible. I am just wondering if the hon. member can give me an assurance that we will be able to complete all those reports this afternoon which will allow us to do just that, to open up the process for private members, the cameras, and so on.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary, who is also chairman of the House management committee, for his collaboration. We had a lot of meetings and he was very patient during them. He knows very well that it took almost a year before we arrived at this report. I am sure he would agree with me that we had a lot of time in the committee to hear witnesses, to ask questions and to get answers. But I am sure he would like to give an opportunity to all members who want to ask questions this afternoon. I think, if he is patient enough, he might get the report before the end of the day. That is the only commitment I can make so far.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the motion today to adopt the 23rd report of the broadcasting of committee meetings.

First of all let me say to the House that perhaps I will not take all of my 20 minutes to make these remarks but, then again, at the urging of some of my colleagues one never knows.

I should explain to members across the way the position of my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I on this issue. That is very important. Because of the importance of the committees, as the member for Saint-Léonard has said, it is very crucial that the broadcasting of committees take place.

I am pleased to say to the parliamentary secretary that I for one will definitely vote in favour of that motion when the time comes. I also want him to know that I agree with the decision of the management committee to review the experimental guidelines that will be in the report after a six-month trial period.

I had the opportunity in a previous incarnation, shall we say, to sit in the Ontario legislature where it was permitted—

Mr. Nunziata: An excellent member you were.

Mr. Boudria: I want to express my heartfelt thanks to the very distinguished and learned member for York South—Weston for his complimentary words.

In the days when I was in the Ontario legislature a form of televising of committees was permitted. However it was not a particularly good way of doing it. At that time camera crews were allowed to walk into the room physically, cameras on their shoulders and someone else carrying the extended boom microphone. They would walk around the table between members, cameras on their shoulders, sometimes taking pictures of documents which a member might have been looking at.

I was not too crazy about that system, Mr. Speaker, as you can pretty well understand. If you were reading correspondence from Mrs. Smith explaining a particular constituency problem, you literally had to hide your papers when a camera was carried into the room.

I understand that system has been done away with now. Of course we are not going to do anything like that here. We have to respect the privacy not of the member—that is secondary—but of the information that members might have with them. We do carry around constituency cases, issues that we refer to for the purposes of making speeches, addressing committees, and so on. Frankly I do not think it is proper that the briefing notes we might have, or even personal correspondence or issues involving an individual Canadian, could be viewed via a particular report.

In addition, the committee rooms in the legislature would allow sound recording equipment everywhere. Some members might be tempted to say: "What is wrong with that?" Here is what is wrong with it.

A reporter would walk into the room with a little cassette recorder, plunk it down in front of you in the committee room or between two MPs, perhaps even two MPs who did not have the floor at that particular time. You could not even whisper to your colleague beside you to ask his or her advice on the situation that you might be discussing because there was a dumb tape recorder between the two of you. Obviously again, not appropriate.

I do not object to allowing reporters to plug their microphones into the broadcast system of the committee. I do not object to that. It does not make any difference. It is all on the record anyway. Nor do I object, on an experimental basis, at some point in the future designating an area in one of our committee rooms, perhaps by having a stand of sorts.

If a camera crew wants to come in, they can film to their heart's content, providing they are on that particular podium where they have to be in order to take camera shots of the room. They should not disrupt witnesses, walk between people in the room, take pictures of documents on a table and so on. You can see how ridiculous a situation can get, and it was pretty far out at that particular time in the Ontario legislature.

I understand they have cleaned up that particular act and you can understand why they would want to. Basically, what we are advocating here is, hopefully, going to pass in the fullness of time once all my colleagues have had an opportunity to speak on this particular issue. What is proposed is to have one room in which there would be the televising of committees.

Some members say that that will only permit one committee to be televised. Not so, because obviously the same committee does not meet 12 hours a day. Committee meetings usually last about an hour and a half, some sit for two hours. For instance, if the finance committee wants to meet in that particular room from 9.30 a.m. to 11 a.m., it might do so. From 11 a.m. until 1 p.m., a second committee might use it and, after Question Period, another committee might meet from 3.30 p.m. to 5 p.m. in that particular room. Then perhaps, there might be another committee in the evening.

The point I am making is just because there is one room, it does not mean that only one committee meeting per day can be televised. Indeed, it could very well be, if the demand is there, that four or five different committees per day could be broadcast on television.

This is certainly a good start. I totally agree with the member for York South—Weston because he very astutely—he is always very astute, of course—pointed out earlier today that we should be conscious of the cost of doing this. That is, indeed, quite appropriate to bring up at this time.

By having just one room and utilizing it with greater frequency, I think it is a good marriage of the principle that we want Canadians to see many parliamentary committees on television, if that is what they want or if the media wants to obtain footage and so on of the proceedings of those committees. At the same time, we have to have due regard for the taxpayers and not develop something which will be too costly and that we cannot afford.

I congratulate the member for York South—Weston who brought up that point a little earlier this day. Indeed, he was quite correct as he usually is.

[Translation]

We are discussing the 23rd report of this committee. It might be good to review together the various recommendations made by this committee.

So here they are. The first recommendation is to allow the recording of the audio feed provided by the House of Commons for public committee meetings. I was just talking about that. It allows a journalist to connect his tape recorder to the committee sound system. Frankly, this is not a major development and it is easy to do. I definitely have the impression that media people cheated a little from time to time, that is, that they taped committee meetings before, even if it was not officially permitted.

I sometimes found it interesting to hear on the radio testimony given to a parliamentary committee which had been recorded while the committee was in session. Obviously this reporter or whoever it was had taped it without first getting permission. It must be said that the rule was perhaps a little out of date. So I see it as updating our rules.

Now I come to the second recommendation: that the audio feed of all public committee meetings be made available to members of Parliament, their staffs and the Parliamentary Press Gallery. I must say that this system exists or at least existed at Queen's Park as early as 1981; that is, you could tune in and find out what was going on in the various committee rooms. It involved a device, a loud speaker really, that was installed in the MPPs' offices. You just had to turn the dial and you could hear what was going on in committee rooms 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5. When it was an important issue for the member in question, he could immediately go there and speak.

Some will say that this might lower attendance at committees, but I would say that the opposite will occur, because parliamentarians will be inclined to go to the committee room when important issues are being dealt with, which happens very often.

The committee also recommended that the House of Commons should initially equip one committee room for broadcasting. There is no need to repeat what I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, because I would not want to waste the House's time and bore you, so I will make my remarks very brief. I already gave my opinion on that.

Another point is that the recording of the committee proceedings will be undertaken by or on behalf of the House of Commons, and under the direct control and supervision of House personnel. I think that is also a good idea, but I would be inclined to go even further; that is, I would allow journalists to broadcast committee meetings in other rooms, provided that the cameras were set up in places prescribed in advance. I talked about that as well a little earlier. In any case, this is not dealt with in the report, but we might look into it in future.

The fifth recommendation is that the date of the committee meeting must appear on the screen at all times in legible print. The reason for that is important. Since the House of Commons channel will be used, it might be impossible to broadcast the committee live. So Canadians who are watching it on television will want to know whether it is a live broadcast or a tape from a day or two before. I think it is important to have that information on the screen.

Next, the sixth recommendation is that the decision as to which committees shall meet in this room will be made by the House leaders. That is a very good recommendation and I think an important point should be raised here. Despite what some people might think from time to time, parliamentarians are not always arguing strenuously. In general, there is good cooperation among the various parties in the House. For example, as you know, Mr. Speaker, most bills are passed in Parliament without a recorded division but by a simple oral vote. The opposition does not challenge everything, whatever people may think. When asking students in my riding whether they think the government introduces all the legislation and the opposition always votes against the government, the answer is always yes. Well that is not the case. In fact, the vast majority of bills are adopted by all sides of the House. Motions are adopted by unanimous consent practically every day by this Parliament, sometimes several times a day. This is something people are not generally aware of, and I think we should make this clear.

It will be up to the three House leaders to decide which committees will be broadcast from the new room specially equipped for this kind of activity. Incidentally, I do not know whether the room has already been chosen. I see the hon. member for Saint-Denis, who is an expert on the subject, and I hope it will be Room 237C, a very nice room on Parliament Hill which lends itself to this kind of thing and should be used more often.

I also wish to inform the hon. member for Saint-Denis, considering his expertise, that I think Room 237C could also be used by the media to broadcast their comments on the budget, for instance. I saw the scene in front of the House of Commons on budget day. There was an atrocious tangle of cables and wires of every description. People were crowded against each other. There were strangers all over the place, even in the entrance to the House of Commons. It was not a pretty sight. We should move whatever is done outside the House on budget day, or when we have other important speeches such as the Speech from the Throne, to Room 237C, which is a very nice room and will now be equipped for the TV cameras.

This was for the information of the hon. member for Saint-Denis. I know he is busy taking notes.

Finally, the committee's seventh recommendation is that all committees of the House of Commons, including standing, legislative and special committees, would be entitled to meet in the specially equipped room to have their meetings broadcast, provided that priority shall be given to those committees that do not have a special order from the House permitting any meeting or series of meetings to be broadcast, I think that is self-explanatory, because the room is used even when committee proceedings do not have to be broadcast on television.

This was a very brief explanation of the subject of today's debate, but I think it is important to know to what extent the motion is supported by members of this House. Today, several members spoke out in favour of this initiative, and I hope that other members, including my very distinguished colleague from York South—Weston, will find time to rise in the House before the end of the day and express their support for this motion.

I know that since this morning, the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas has been gearing up for a major speech on the subject. I hope there will be enough time to accommodate everyone who wishes to speak. If there is not enough time, perhaps we could continue this debate next week on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday. There are several days on which we could discuss these issues, and perhaps we could take a few more days and continue this important debate.

I am sure that many other members will also want to comment on this.

With this, I will conclude my brief comments on that subject. I will, of course, reiterate my support for this initiative and congratulate all the members of the Standing Committee on House Management for the excellent work they did in relation with report number 23.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell with great interest.

I was particularly interested in his comments about televising certain committees. I certainly agree with that. The Canadian public wants the government to be more open. A good way to do that is to broadcast or televise certain committee deliberations. I say certain because there is a class factor here. We do have to think of the cost because this is the taxpayer's money. It would be great if we could televise the deliberations of all committees. I do not feel that is a practical thing to do because of the money involved.

As we all know in this House, committees do important work. Over the past number of years we have seen that committee work has become more important. As members of Parliament, we spend a great deal of time in those committees. If Canadians could watch the deliberations of these committees, they would have a greater understanding and knowledge of the issues and legislation that is before the House of Commons.

One committee I have the privilege to serve on is the conflict of interest legislative committee, an all-party committee made up of senators and members from the House of Commons. We meet every Tuesday and Thursday morning while the House is in session. We hope to have a report to the House by the end of June.

That committee is time-consuming but it is important. This whole topic of conflict of interest is one that is extremely important to the Canadian public. As you know, presently we do not have any legislation. We operate under a code that was brought in by the present Prime Minister.

An hon. member: That is a joke.

Ms. Callbeck: Clearly, that code is inadequate. We need legislation. We need strict legislation but it has to be legislation that is workable and reasonable. As I said, I feel that the public would find the deliberations of that particular committee extremely interesting and important.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Ms. Callbeck: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is also a member of that committee. I would like to ask that member if he feels that the public would benefit a great deal by being able to watch the proceedings of the conflict of interest committee.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I want to congratulate her for the fine work she is doing on that committee. I am sure that her constituents would be very, very impressed were they given the opportunity to see the work that is being done by that member and others on that committee.

More important is the fact that we have listened to very interesting witnesses. For example, yesterday we had the Chief Electoral Officer for Canada before our committee. He answered questions for two hours in a very forthright manner. He was an excellent witness before our committee. We had the Assistant Deputy Registrar General for Canada. We had the Administrator of the Conflict of Interest Rules for the province of Ontario, le jurisconsulte du Québec and other witnesses like that.

• (1350)

An hon. member: Judge Parker.

Mr. Boudria: Justice Parker. You remember Justice Parker, Mr. Speaker, of the Parker commission of inquiry into the activities of Mr. Sinclair Stevens. I am sure everyone remembers that. Perhaps I can refresh the memory of members as to that issue. On second thought, maybe I should not. I will leave it at that. We had Mitchell Sharp and very, very many other such witnesses. They gave very good recommendations, not always identical but that is the job of our committee, to sift through all of that and arrive at legislation that will be workable yet tough.

My colleague brings a very good point. It has to be workable. There is no point in bringing a set of rules that is going to be breached by everyone. Of course you could argue it is not just the rules that have to be changed; it is the mindset of some people who are supposed to be living by rules and seemingly have some difficulty in doing so. That is a matter to be discussed some other time. The point my colleague was making is excellent. Canadians could see what we are doing in that committee. It is important work. They could view the witnesses, the advice they gave us. Of course they would feel, I am sure, that we are trying to repair some of that damage to our institution that has happened over recent years and trying to clean up what has happened. That is perhaps the very first committee that should be televised with the new rules we are discussing today and will be adopting very, very soon, as soon as all of our colleagues have finished making their excellent comments in regard to the motion that is at hand.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, first let me thank my friend and colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, for his very kind words. Needless to say, I ought to reciprocate and comment on his distinguished service over the last eight years, both in the House and at committee. The member speaks with considerable experience, having not only represented his constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell with such distinction for the last eight years, but also having represented them at Queen's Park. He knows of what he speaks. He has participated very actively behind the scenes in order to ensure that somehow we help regain some of the lost respect for this institution. No doubt the member agrees that this will assist in some small way.

I am concerned, however, that this committee report does not go far enough. I know the member commented about it. Certainly the government has to take responsibility for not going as far as we would like this report to go. It seems to me that even with the adoption of this particular report, much of the work done by hon. members at committee will go unreported and unnoticed because only one committee can be televised at a time. The House leaders, as I understand, will have to determine which of the committees is deserving of support in order to occupy the room where the television cameras will be.

Yesterday I was at a committee. It was an employment sub-committee meeting. One of my colleagues had presented a private member's motion to amend the Employment Act in order to create some fairness to the act. It seems to me that the House leaders would not agree that that particular committee ought to be televised because it is not an issue of so-called national importance. Yet it is an issue that will affect a great number of Canadians.

Can the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell respond to the fact that the government has not gone all the way in terms of the media. I know he responded in his submissions as to the reasons why the media should be allowed to go into any of the committee rooms, but would he not agree that there could be some ground rules established where the media would be restricted from going beyond a certain point in a committee room so that their cameras could enter a committee room but not go beyond say the last 10—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. I regret the hon. member will not have time.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to participate in this debate this afternoon. As has been indicated by many of the previous speakers, many of my colleagues, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, I was a member of the management committee that came up with this report.

I want to say that this report in my view represents a very significant compromise on the part of the members of the committee who were very concerned that the government live up to the undertakings and obligations that it assumed when it changed the rules of this House almost a year ago.

I was privy to the negotiations that led to those rule changes. I am sure Your Honour recalls very well that the government introduced a resolution to make significant changes to the Standing Orders of this House, which motion was debated and then forced through. I believe closure was applied to the motion.

My friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell perhaps remembers but I think closure was applied on that motion and the government had to use almost force of arms to get these changes through the House because it would not negotiate to a conclusion on the proposed changes.

An hon. member: Shame on the government.

Mr. Milliken: It was a shame. I think there were genuine efforts made at agreement but the government was so bent on certain changes and so unwilling to continue discussions for an extended period that it ultimately came up with its own resolution and rammed a bunch of forced changes through the House.

Of course, many of these changes are being undone. In fact, one of the other motions that the parliamentary secretary wanted to debate this afternoon, which he is going to have to postpone for a while, made changes to the legislative committees. I well recall the discussion in the negotiations when we told him that these were unworkable, but he insisted that the government wanted to proceed with that any way they would work. He was going to make them work. He was going to force the House to change and accommodate itself to the new rules that he was proposing.

Of course, we all know now it did not work. The members of his own party have rebelled against the changes and so we are now going back to the previous arrangements and that will probably get passed some other time.

In the meantime, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has called this particular motion for concurrence in this report dealing with television in committees. I want to say that in the course of the changes that he rammed through the House a year ago, there was a negotiated change made with respect to committees. In fact, there were a whole lot of changes with respect to committees.

One of the things that I insisted on in the negotiations as a price for agreement on some of the changes to the committees was the televising of committees. The television was to be allowed at the discretion of the committee itself. The agreement was embodied in a change to Standing Order 119(1). I would like to read to the House the terms of the Standing Order which we agreed to and which the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader specifically agreed to as part of those negotiations and which Standing Order change was incorporated in the government motion that proposed those changes to the House. Standing Order 119.1(2) states:

> The Standing Committee on House Management shall establish, by report to the House of Commons, experimental guidelines governing the broadcasting of committee meetings. After concurrence by the House in such a report, any committee may permit the presence of the electronic media at its meetings, subject to the said guidelines.

It is perfectly clear. The purpose of the new Standing Order was to allow the house management committee to draft a set of guidelines by committees which, on adoption by the House, allowed any committee to make a decision to allow the electronic media into its meetings subject to the guidelines.

• (1400)

This report falls far short of that undertaking given by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader on behalf of his boss, the government House leader. In fact, this report is a complete change from the provisions of that Standing Order. That Standing Order, in effect, is being left as a meaningless piece of English.

It was a firm commitment made by this government in the course of the negotiations as a price for our agreement to certain other changes to the Standing Orders and then rammed through this House and is now being reneged upon after the House has passed an order adopting the agreement. That is what this is. It is a breach of undertaking, it is a breach of obligation and it is a flagrant abuse of trust.

I say that the report that we are left to deal with today, while it has its strengths, is not what the Standing Orders called for. It is not what the government promised as a price for our concurrence to some of the more odious rule changes that it adopted.

Of course, we ended up having to fight the rule changes in their entirety because they were not in accordance with the agreement, but that particular one was. That agreement was obtained because of the request put forward by me, on behalf of our party. I believe it was fully concurred in by the hon. member for Kamloops who was involved in those negotiations on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

I regret that the government cannot live up to an undertaking. I think it is a shocking way to proceed and I am very sorry that has happened.

Having said that, what has the government proposed in exchange? I wish the chairman of the committee had come on these committee meetings to Toronto and to Quebec City, but the chairman saw fit to do neither. As a result, I suggest he has got himself into trouble with this report.

Had he come he might have seen how systems have worked in these other two legislatures. In Toronto they had a system similar to that described in this report. There is a single room established for committee hearings that are to be televised. Committees apply for leave to sit in that committee room where the proceedings will be televised. As long as there is no conflict they may go and use the room. If two or more committees apply to sit in the room at the same time there is a decision-making mechanism to decide which committee will go and sit in the room.

Essentially that is what we have here. The difference is that there are far more standing committees in this House than there are in the Ontario Legislature. There is a far greater regional diversity of interest in this House than there is in the Ontario Legislature and for that reason, there will be greater demands for the use of the single room.

In addition, adoption of this report does nothing to ensure that the room will in fact be made available. That requires the expenditure of public funds. The funds will have to be found by the Board of Internal Economy, set aside, made available, the work completed, the room established, the television costs, costs of preparing the televised proceedings will have to be borne by the House, and so on. It is a major financial commitment amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Unfortunately, it is by no means clear that this particular development will occur between now and the end of 1992 or indeed before the end of this Parliament.

In other words, adoption of this report may do nothing to further the televising of committees. It may be that it is simply an exercise in futility. I am optimistic it would not be, but I have no reason to believe that the government, complaining as it does about the high cost of Parliament, will loosen the purse strings for the purposes of this report.

I am wondering if we have some undertaking for what it may be worth, from the government House leader with respect to the funding of this proposal. We have heard nothing from him so far and certainly his parliamentary secretary is unable to give any undertaking. I suggest it would not be worth much either based on the previous undertakings we have had from him in respect of these rule changes.

The other aspect of this report that is of interest to the House and to members is the one that allows for radio broadcast of the committee proceedings.

It now appears that when a committee sits, its proceedings which are currently recorded and placed on tape will now be made available by a radio system throughout this building, in fact throughout all the parliamentary precincts.

In other words, a member who is unable to be present at a committee meeting would be able to tune into the proceedings of the committee on radio. That may not tell him exactly who it is that is speaking at all times, although I understand there is some kind of announcement that comes on that so-and-so has the floor. But at least the proceedings will be relatively intelligible to members of the House and their staffs who are able to listen, and of course to the media who through their various tapping sources in the building, legitimate tapping sources I want to say, will be able to record those proceedings and then use them for subsequent broadcast.

In other words, all committees will have radio coverage but none will have TV coverage, at least until such time as the special committee room is established.

Why we would favour one of the electronic media over the other is a mystery to me. I have had no explanation from the hon. member for York Simcoe in his speech as to why radio would be favoured over television. But that apparently is the aim of this report, to give the broadcast media different rights. Audio feed will be available, visual feed will not be available, except from the one room whenever it happens to be established.

I suppose we can be thankful for small mercies. I suspect that the opening up of the committees to radio is of some assistance and certainly will be helpful for news broadcasters and the radio media.

It is also possible that an imaginative television crew taking videos as they do of a committee about to start its meeting could play the sound of the committee over the photographs of the members sitting around the table, and thereby make at least some semblance of sense out of what it cannot otherwise do. But I fear that the approach is one that is sadly lacking.

I am sorry that we have only been able to go this far. But, as indicated by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, we in this party are prepared to support the changes as far as they go. But I think the chairman of our committee knows full well my profound regret at the failure to live up to the commitments made that I outlined earlier in my speech.

The arrangement that is here for meetings and which was referred to by my very learned colleague from York South—Weston whereby the House leaders may make a decision in respect of the committees that may meet, in the special room, I suggest is one that needs to be dealt with.

The arrangement intended by the committee is quite clear. If a committee of which he is a member applies to sit in the room and no other committee is sitting at that time, his committee will sit in the room and will be televised.

It is a decision of his own committee to decide to go there. If his committee applies to sit in the room at, say ten o'clock next Tuesday morning and no other committee is sitting at ten o'clock next Tuesday morning, then no doubt his committee will sit in the room at ten o'clock next Tuesday morning.

• (1410)

That is just the way it will operate. It is intended to go to the House leaders only when the committees do not agree. It is intended that way, but I agree the wording is not the way it should be and that is cause for concern. For instance, if two committees apply at ten o'clock, the chairmen would be expected to get together and resolve the matter.

They would have a discussion. One would say: "We can move our meeting to 11.30 a.m. to accommodate you. Let's do it that way. The slot is open at 11.30 a.m." That is what would happen. If the committee chairmen are unable to agree, they would apply to the House leaders, and if agreement could not be obtained there, then there would be a decision made in the management committee.

Clearly, with its majority on that committee, the government would control the management committee decision. That is the last resort. The idea is it would be settled elsewhere.

I agree that the wording of the committee recommendation leaves the decision in the hands of the House leaders. But it was not intended that the decision, as I understood it and as the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader can clarify in his remarks, as to which committees sit be made by them. It was only in the event of a dispute that the decision was to be made by them. Perhaps that was his intention all along.

It was clear that all committees could sit there, but in addition, any committee could apply to have all its proceedings or part of its proceedings televised. It could obtain that consent by order of the House.

For example, if he, as a member of the employment and immigration committee, and his committee were to undertake a study of the ruinous effects of Bill C–21 on unemployment insurance in Canada, which I suggest it do, it might apply to the House for an order seeking the televising of its proceedings in respect of that undertaking.

So all committee meetings dealing with the ruinous effects of Bill C–21 which the government introduced a couple of years ago and forced through this House, if the committee undertook that kind of hearing, then obviously he could apply through the committee structure to the House for an order for the televising of those proceedings.

I think that much is clear. That is still permitted both under the Standing Orders of the House, of course, and under the committee recommendations. There is no problem with that arrangement.

The special room deals only with those committees that seek to be televised for only one or two of their meetings because many committees, of course, will not want to be televised.

I should say in fairness that the experience in the Ontario Legislature is that the room is in fact not used all the time. After an initial flurry of interest, many committees have decided against proceeding with the televising of most of their proceedings. Accordingly, the room is not used 24 hours a day or anything like that. It is not used even 12 hours a day. The use has dwindled off. There is some interest, but it is not overwhelming on the part of all committees. I strongly suspect that the experience in this Chamber would be similar to that.

While we have profound regrets about what this report does not contain, we are prepared to support what is here. I am pleased to have had this opportunity to add a few words to the debate on this important subject.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the member can clarify in terms of whether the proceedings of committees that participate in what he refers to as the special room will go live to the nation.

We heard earlier, for example, that that is not exactly the case. If the House is sitting, the proceedings of this House will take precedence and the proceedings of a committee will, for the most part, take place later on when the House adjourns or when the House is not sitting.

Can he confirm that? Perhaps the member can also confirm what the cost will be to the taxpayers of Canada to implement this particular report of the House management committee. Earlier, the government member on the committee was unable to indicate the exact cost.

It seems that what the committee is asking for is approval in principle. The details of the implementation of this particular report really have not worked out. I am wondering whether this report might be somewhat premature in that the technical details have not been worked out.

While he is on his feet can the hon. member comment on the response of the parliamentary press gallery. Did it make submissions to the House management committee on this particular issue? If so, can he share with the House what those submissions were?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his series of questions. I hope I can answer them in the time I have available to me.

First, with respect to the time of broadcast which I think was his first question, it is anticipated that committee proceedings recorded while the House is sitting would not be broadcast at the same time.

I think he would agree that this House in its deliberations ought to be the primary focus of the parliamentary channel. It ought to be what is broadcast first and foremost. To the extent that committees sit while the House is sitting, which is the bulk of committee hearings, they could not be broadcast at the same time as the House is sitting. They would be recorded and played at a later time. The question is whether they would be played later in the evening or on weekends, or played in the weeks when Parliament is not sitting.

There is a series of options. The play back could obviously take place on more than one occasion. I suspect that it might be worthwhile from an editorial point of view to lump committee proceedings together so that on a particular day we would play a series of meetings of the finance committee or the employment and immigration committee, rather than one meeting of one committee, then one of another, and one of yet another. This would allow the public to see some line of questioning and work carried on in the committees over a period of time.

The proceedings of this House are rebroadcast after the day's proceedings have ended. That has been a very popular move with the people who watch the parliamentary channel, of which there are many in Canada, perhaps surprisingly. I hear constant comments in favour of the repeat performance. Members of the public who watch often do so in the evening, particularly in the western provinces where the broadcast occurs relatively early in the day. It provides an opportunity for people to see Parliament which they otherwise would not have without taping the proceedings.

Time of broadcast is going to be a tough question. In fact, in my view it underscores the need for a thorough review of the parliamentary channel to see if some arrangement cannot be made for wrap-around programming which would include those committee broadcasts which are recorded during the day.

The trick will be to find a time for broadcasting that accommodates all hon. members given the wide geographic range of the country and the various time zones, which will obviously impact on that decision.

Second, he asked about cost. Cost analysis was in fact available to the committee. He will have to pardon me because I do not have much of a head for figures. I know it is a significant cost. There is certain camera equipment that will have to be acquired. Certain rooms on the Hill are now wired for this purpose and the wiring costs will be fairly minimal. All the rooms are now wired for sound and the sound part of the recommendation, which is the installation of radios in members' offices, is a peanut item. It will cost about $100,000 in total for the acquisition of the radios and their installation.

Mr. Nunziata: So it is not on TV?

Mr. Milliken: Not on TV. That is just the radio part. Remember that committees will only be broadcast on the radio unless they are in the special room.

Mr. Nunziata: Isn't the sound going through TV?

Mr. Milliken: I believe the sound will go through TV but some kind of adapter has to be purchased which will sit on top of the television to make it possible for the member to move from one channel to another to pick up the sound from the different rooms.

That piece of equipment has to be purchased for all the offices on the Hill. It is a one-time cost once purchased and installed and it is all available. It is relatively inexpensive equipment but there are so many to purchase.

As I recall the cost of that is around $100,000, but my head for figures is not a good one. I urge the hon. member to check the committee proceedings if he has doubts about it.

The cost of setting up the room is another matter. The cameras have to be purchased for that room. There will have to be some structural adjustments made to the room so that we benefit from the fact that it is being televised. The current layout of committee seating in a square will probably have to be changed somewhat to make it easier to do television work in the room. It is thought that the cameras should be in fixed positions.

• (1420)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has another questioner.

Mr. Milliken: There are so many questioners left. I will do my best to answer them. I think I have the time. I will try to get to the hon. member in a minute.

An hon. member: There may not be time.

Mr. Milliken: Maybe not, but I am doing my best.

The third was the question of the press gallery and its views on this.

Mr. Nunziata: Did it appear before the committee?

Mr. Milliken: Yes, I can say to the hon. member for York South—Weston that the press gallery did appear before the committee. It did make submissions. It pressed for televising committees in an open way, as appeared to have been recommended and required by the Standing Order change forced through the House last May or June. It expected to have television access to committees. This does not meet the requests of that group. It does allow for televising of some committees. I am sure that will please the members who came, but it does not go as far as anticipated.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to put a question forward to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Maybe we could have unanimous consent instead of debate.

Mr. Mills: I put the question to my colleague from Montreal earlier. It concerns that portion of this recommendation that would suggest that we only televise some of these committee meetings. That continues the process which goes on around here under which there is almost a two-tier system. If you are part of the tactical operations team that prepares for Question Period every day then obviously you tend to get a regular slot on Question Period. If you are not part of that tactical team then—

Mr. Nunziata: The élite.

Mr. Mills: My colleague from York South—Weston calls it the élite.

Mr. Nunziata: The different ones.

Mr. Mills: Some people say "the ins and the outs". At any rate, you can go for as long as a year. I have had a grand total of two questions in Question Period during the last year in the House. As a result I receive many phone calls from my constituents asking: "Why do you never get to ask questions? You are never there. Do you not do any work in Ottawa? Where are you coming from?" I have to try to explain.

I do not explain that there are the "ins and the outs" because they would never believe that. I do explain that there are other things going on here in Ottawa, such as committee work and other exercises, just as important to advancing the debate in general. Of course, there are these debates in the afternoons and evenings. In other words, there are a lot of activities going on in this parliamentary system that have nothing to do with Question Period.

My friend from Ottawa South and I were on Doug Fisher's Sunday afternoon show about two months ago and he asked us what things we would change. If there is one thing I could change around here I would eliminate the televising of Question Period. I think that Question Period gives the people of Canada the wrong impression about the kind of work that goes on in this Parliament of Canada.

Granted, today's debate is not an exciting one for the people of Canada. It is a process debate more than anything. When we are using the full Chamber I would much rather be talking about something related to the economy and getting people back to work. However every now and again we have a process debate about changing the structure of this place, so we ask Canadians to bear with us today. Obviously when there is such deep economic pain going on out there it is tough for people to understand why we are spending this much time on this bill.

If we are going to really reform this House of Commons we cannot just televise some of those committee meetings because once again we are going to have a two-tier system. It is sort of like the star system. My colleague from York South—Weston and I talk about this all the time. People organize events for the stars. The bottom line in this Chamber is that we are all equal. It does not matter whether you are on the finance committee, culture and communications, or environment, all that work is just as important as the next committee. To have a situation in which we are only going to have one committee being televised does not make sense to me.

The argument I heard earlier was that we only have one room around here to take television and we are going to have to make renovations. My goodness, each of us has a caucus room that is large enough for television. There is the railway committee room. There are more rooms around here that could hold television. This idea of not having the rooms is not accurate.

If we do advance with this motion—and I understand most parties are onside with it—I would ask for an amendment that we do not set up the two-tier or the three-tier system and that we cover all the committees. As I mentioned earlier today, tourism is the biggest job creator in this country. We had a committee meeting yesterday and we could barely get a quorum. We had eight tourism experts there from all over the country. This is another thing that Canadians do not realize. These committee meetings are not just MPs talking to each other and debating aspects of bills. Some of the best and brightest minds, not only in our country but in the world, come and give testimony at these committee meetings.

I do not know how the House would differentiate. Are we going to have the finance committee televised but decide that the environment is not important? Would you want to be the member of Parliament who voted against televising what we discuss in the environment committee? I would not. Would you want to be the member of Parliament who voted against televising something that happened in culture and communications?

We have the rooms. We have the talent here. There are a few TV cameras and we already have the sound systems set up. If we are going to do this, let us do it correctly. Somebody will say that we do not have the time on the parliamentary channel. Most Canadians would never accept that. We can easily get another channel, that is an easy thing to do.

However, there is another factor. Look at all the repeat time on the parliamentary channel. Half the time it is music and the agenda for the following week. On the weekend there are 48 hours of nice background music on a continuous loop.

There are a number of us in this House who have requested the use of the parliamentary channel during the repeat portion of the day for the week of the 5th to 12th to televise the young hockey tournament at Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto. We did get the consent of all members of the House, and we hope the CRTC will accommodate us. If Canadians could see something more productive happen on that parliamentary channel, rather than just watching the credits roll or the agenda of the following week, plus the nice music, I do not think Canadians would object to that. In fact, I think they would probably appreciate us using our brains and not being so apathetic about leaving that rotation of music and menu going.

I am all for this but I am not for the half measure. People today are really a lot smarter than we sometimes give them credit for. By putting those committees on television, not only are we going to show up on time, we are going to have our questions prepared and the committees are going to become more important than Question Period.

Right now Question Period is what drives the national journalists of this country. Now there will be real, honest thinking going on by the press gallery of this country. Right now, as most people know, the press gallery comes in and basically tries to get that 10-second clip, that 20-second clip from that little sparring match that goes on in Question Period which has absolutely nothing to do with the reality and the substance and the depth of the debate that goes on in all these various committees.

By putting television in all these committees, there probably will be a lot more work for the journalists. Then the people of Canada will be able to judge for themselves whether or not the journalistic interpretation is accurate. Right now it is all blind faith with the national media. Quite frankly, from where I sit, what I see in this House and what I see in committee very rarely represents what I read in the newspapers or the clip I will see on national television. So often they are taking things out of context.

It is going to make for a much better debate and be much more challenging. It is going to make our work a lot rougher and tougher because our preparation is going to have to be a lot better.

I do not support the half measure of this motion. I support the idea of opening up all these committees and televising them. I really think if it is going to set up a system where it is only select committees that are being televised, then I think it is going to hurt the cause more than help it.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood for making his submission. He has probably saved the House some time because I will not have to repeat all the things that he said. I find myself often agreeing with what he is saying.

It seems to me at times that we in this House live in the dark ages. It is time we started to conduct our business in a more open fashion.

Later today we will be considering another report of the committee that will allow television cameras to pan what is happening in the House. For example, if that report were to carry, we would be able to see representatives of the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party negotiating some type of deal here in terms of whether or not this report—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is such a thing as relevancy. If the hon. member wants to ask a question of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, I will allow it. Otherwise, I will go to debate. The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, let me put this question to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. In terms of opening up Parliament so that the public can know what is going on here, would the member not agree that we should leave it up to the parliamentary press gallery to determine what to broadcast from the happenings on the Hill, that all proceedings should be open both to radio and television, and we should let the profitable media outlets in this country determine which committees they want to cover?

It seems to me that they would, if allowed, pool their resources and have television cameras in each of the committee rooms. Then they would decide which proceedings they want to use in their nightly newscasts. As well, the parliamentary channel can use the single feed that goes into each of the committee rooms. Someone would have to make the decision on what feed to use whenever the House is not sitting and all the dead time is on the parliamentary channel to make sure that that information goes to the parliamentary channel. So would the member agree that that is what should happen?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I must say to my colleague, the member for York South—Weston, that I agree with him totally. That is a brilliant idea. I never thought of that. In other words, what he is saying is that we would not have to purchase the cameras and we would just let Global, CBC, CTV, MTV, whichever it is, set up its own camera system and just exchange, the same way it is done when sharing the Olympics.

My goodness, that is a brilliant idea and, quite frankly, there is absolutely no cost to the taxpayer. Why would we not do something like that? The physical space is here. If all of sudden we wanted to televise something in the railway committee room we could do it. I know that the cameras come into our caucus rooms from time to time so the physical plant is there and it is ready to go. I think the member for York South—Weston is right on. In that way we are actually not interfering in any way with free enterprise. They can cut their own deal among themselves. All we are saying is that they are free to cover the hearings, which they are able to do as print journalists anyway.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): You seem surprised, Mr. Speaker, that there might be some members of Parliament who might be interested in debating this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, I am not surprised, except the hon. member has been on questions and comments all the time and I figured he wanted another question or comment.

Mr. Nunziata: As you may know, Mr. Speaker, we are paid a handsome salary around here and I am simply earning my keep today by participating in the debate on this particular recommendation.

I am sure my constituents are not really familiar with the House management committee. What we are debating is report No. 23 of the House management committee. What is the House management committee, one might ask?

The House management committee—and it is becoming more open as time progresses—consists of certain members of Parliament from each of the political parties. It is the committee that, up until recently, was very secretive. The members of that committee decide how to run this place. They decide on such matters as the parliamentary restaurant, shoe shine facilities, framing, all the expenditures associated with the operation of the House of Commons.

An hon. member: Haircuts too.

Mr. Nunziata: Haircuts as well. As you know, Mr. Speaker, you and I do not often use the parliamentary barber. It is really not a necessity for us. But yes, the committee decides the price of haircuts, shaves and everything else in the rooms downstairs.

This committee is generally made up of senior members of each of the caucuses. For example, the member for Saint-Denis is a member of that committee. He is the dean of the House of Commons. The member for Kingston and the Islands is a member of the committee, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, and the assistant parliamentary whoever he is on the other side of the House. These are part of the A team in the House of Commons. The member for Broadview—Greenwood referred to them as the élite. They are a group of people who have some authority around here.

• (1440)

There are others in this House—the member for Broadview—Greenwood and myself—who are not part of that inner circle of individuals. Yes, we are part of the B team, and the member from Chambly is also part of the B team on the New Democratic Party side.

Now and again we have the opportunity to consider some of the decisions made by the House management committee. One of the decisions made by that committee is presented in report No. 23 entitled: Broadcasting of Committee Meetings.

As the day has progressed, we have been dealing only with report No. 23, but we also have a series of other reports, report No. 22, report No. 24 and report No. 27. The members' representatives from the House management committee have been meeting behind the curtain, at times on this side of the House and a few moments ago on the other side of the House. They are trying to work out some type of deal to ensure that some of these reports are carried and others are not. So there is some negotiating going on behind the scenes and of course the people who are watching are not aware of the negotiations that are going on.

They ought to know how Parliament operates because when negotiating goes on behind the scenes, it breeds—if I can say it, Mr. Speaker—contempt or suspicion about what is going on. In this House management committee the élite from each of the three major political parties—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member and I thought he might appreciate if I brought those negotiations on to the floor where people can see. We have offered on this side to give concurrence to all of these reports that are, in fact, an all-party unanimous agreement from that particular committee. Will he get together with his members and support it?

Mr. Boudria: That is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader to be negotiating in public is not a point of order. After all, I could describe the position of his own House leader on some of these motions, and so on but I will not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think that we should just carry on with debate. The hon. member for York South—Weston has the floor.

Mr. Nunziata: Perhaps the members on the House management committee can go have a cup of coffee and continue their negotiations.

An hon. member: We'll miss your speech.

Mr. Nunziata: You can listen to my speech on the TV behind the curtains.

But let us get serious for a moment. The whole purpose behind report No. 23 is to open up parliamentary committees in order to give the public greater access to committees. The way to do it, in my respectful submission, is to go all the way, open up committee proceedings both to radio and to television.

Right now any member of the public can come to Parliament Hill and take part in any of the committee meetings that take place. They can attend committee hearings, the committee hearings are open.

Unfortunately, the overwhelming majority of Canadians do not have access to Parliament Hill because they do not happen to live in the Ottawa area and they have to rely on television and the news media in order to obtain information about what goes on in Parliament.

If the goal is to open up Parliament, to show Canadians exactly what happens on Parliament Hill, we ought to give access to all committees. But the House management committee is saying that it is going to give access to those who can hear, we are going to give radio or audio access to all the committees, which is a good move, an excellent move and everyone can hear what is going on. But, for some reason, the House management committee does not want to allow Canadians to see what is going on at committees.

As I stand here, there is a rule of the House of Commons that says that the person who is operating that camera can only shoot me from the waist up. It is a very tight shot. You cannot see very much this way or very much that way. The public does not know what is going on in this House of Commons. The public does not know how many people are sitting here in the House of Commons. These are very restrictive rules in terms of what can happen and what type of image can be seen on television.

The person operating the camera cannot take a wide-angled shot of the House to see what is going on in the House because the House management committee has decided that is not appropriate. It only wants the public to see a certain amount of what goes on in the House of Commons. You have to ask yourself why. I suppose there are arguments on both sides. One thing I do not agree with is restricting people from seeing what goes on at committees. I do not understand why the House management committee is refusing to allow the media access to committees, allowing cameras. For example, they may make the argument that it might be chaotic, that if each of the television stations wants access to the committee rooms, you might have 10 to 15 cameras. That is nonsense because at the end of Question Period every day, out in the lobby of the House of Commons, there are two stationary cameras.

All the news media pool their resources. There is a stationary microphone, one camera, one on the opposition side, another on the government side. Individuals can be interviewed in front of those cameras and in front of those microphones. The video is available to all the television stations because there is a single feed. The member for Broadview—Greenwood referred to the Olympics where you do not have 50 million television cameras taking a video of each of the events. There is a pooling of resources and any television station that wants to use the images can use them.

The point I am making is let us leave it up to the members of the parliamentary press gallery so they can pool their resources. They are profit-making organizations. They would love nothing better than to be able to televise committees. Leave it up to them. In each of the committee rooms they would establish stationary cameras, two or three in each committee room, with a microphone. They could feed off the audio. In that way, any television station would have the opportunity to use the video from each of the committee hearings in order to facilitate the dissemination of what goes on here on Parliament Hill.

As the member for Broadview—Greenwood indicated in his submissions a few moments ago, members of the public have a distorted sense of what goes on here on Parliament Hill. The only thing they see when they are flipping through their channels is a single member of Parliament standing up. Sometimes if it is an important speech, the seats behind the member of Parliament will be occupied to give the impression that the House is full, when in effect the House is not full.

They see Question Period on the nightly news. They see people in a very partisan way. They see members of the opposition asking questions of the government, both sides being very partisan. What is absent from the information that goes out to the public is what goes on at committees, all the fine work that is being done on a daily basis at committee.

As the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and others have indicated, it is not only members of Parliament who participate at committees. We have very distinguished Canadians who appear before various committees. The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell pointed out that the Chief Electoral Officer, just to give an example, was present at the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons looking into the conflict of interest piece of legislation. The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I are members of that committee. Over the course of the last months, we have met every Tuesday and Thursday morning for two or three hours hearing witnesses. We have had a lot of excellent witnesses before committee. The news media has not had access to that committee. If the proceedings of that committee were televised and that information shared with Canadians, Canadians could listen to officers of Parliament and other Canadians who come to committee to give evidence.

I urge the House management committee to reconsider its position on report No. 23. Rather than restricting it to a single room, whether it be the railway committee room or the reading room, it ought to open up the entire committee process to the parliamentary press gallery. It ought to let it bear the cost and it will bear the cost because that is part of its responsibility. Its mandate is to disseminate information from Parliament Hill.

If you allow committees to be open, they will fill the void. They will be there. Taxpayers will be spared considerable expense because it will be the national news media that will pay the cost of installing the pool cameras in each of the committee rooms.

Then, the House of Commons can use that feed, the video, to fill in the gaps on the parliamentary channel which is on every television set in the country that has cable TV. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that when you return to your riding in Edmonton you may be watching TV on a weekend and you may be flicking through the channels. When you hit the parliamentary channel, you get this soft music and these words that continually appear on the channel.

Would you not rather see the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell questioning some important witness at an important committee than dead time? When you do not see anything on the parliamentary channel, Canadians are not benefiting. They are not being educated as to what goes on here on Parliament Hill.

The House could use the feed from committee to fill in that parliamentary channel continuously, 24 hours a day. People may not want to watch, they do not have to watch, but at least the opportunity would be there on a 24-hour basis for the information and activity that goes on in committee to be disseminated to Canadians.

Those are my submissions. I hope that the distinguished members of the House management committee, the chosen ones, the fortunate ones, those on the A team, the élite of the House of Commons, will reconsider the report, go back to the bargaining table and open up Parliament to the public.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, some of us are accused of being the chosen ones. So be it. Someone has to do the job. We were assigned to do a job.

I want to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for chairing the members and management committee. I want to pay homage to the hon. member for York—Simcoe who has been very patient, especially with this 23rd report.

I would like to have answered in detail the comments of my esteemed colleague from Toronto, but call on him to realize that the progress toward what he has mentioned with passion, and with knowledge most likely is an immense step. It is a good step in the right direction, this 23rd report.

I am committed publicly. I wish to pass this report today, this one and a couple of others if we can get enough agreement. I was under that impression and I would like to say it openly. We worked very long on this report that the House of Commons and our colleagues gave us the mandate for on April 1, 1991.

My colleague must realize that we spent a lot of money on this report. I have no anger toward his comments. I listened to his comments. We have had witnesses who came to the committee and made the points that my hon. colleague just did. Therefore, we offer the best now. I ask him to let this bill go. Why? Because he will be surprised at the immense difficulty that we will encounter just to start having a full room.

Yesterday we were talking about the budget of the House of Commons. You cannot have it both ways, spending on one side, saying we want everything to be done, and then at the same time being accused across the country of spending too much money.

It is the best report. My colleague would like that report because you cannot ask every committee first. The cost would be astronomical, as we say in the report. We are on our way to what the hon. member has said in his rather strong criticism of the report.

I wish he would believe me when I say this is honest work by a committee that went to Toronto and to Quebec City to see how it was done there. The immediate instantaneous radio that you will get in your office may not have been well expressed or well explained, but all press will know instantaneously what is going on in every committee. This is an immense step forward. Once the doors are opened to that step, all the other steps will follow. I know that.

If we delay, and we have been delaying too long, the television debate, we will not know how it works, but as soon as you get something there is no backing off. That is why I played a very conservative role on the committee. I wanted to make sure that what we do is right. Once we agree to do something because we are convinced it is right, I get up and defend what is right.

Therefore, the immediate total audio in every office in Parliament, every office of ministers, members, staff, and of the press, is an immense step forward at very little cost. We have to explain to Canadians that we are not going to go on a rampage of expenses.

Therefore, step number one is radio. My colleague from York—Simcoe worked very hard on that. He put the paper together, arranged for witnesses, and it is a success. I share in his success because I was part of it. I am proud to say yes, it is a great step.

We will have a committee room all set. The member would like to have had this room because the Al-Mashat affair would have been televised. You know that. It is a step forward for the most exciting committees that will be televised. Once we have one we will see what it costs. I call on his financial judgment. Let us see what it costs and how much more it will cost in the future.

We may disagree on the second, third, fourth and fifth reports, but we have to show progress. Your colleagues have worked for a year, hours on end. There has been discussion and witnesses. We must listen to everything that has been said because it was our mandate. We did it.

[Translation]

We did an honest job, some very good work, and we can tell the House that the time has come for that bill to be passed. I would respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you ask the House's consent to pass that bill.

[English]

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have a couple of minutes left.

I am wondering if members would be prepared to give consent to the 24th report which deals with Private Members' Business, the 27th report which deals also with Private Members' Business, the number of items increased, and the 28th report which would allow for legislative committees.

Otherwise I think it is really embarrassing to see what is happening in the House in terms of the management committee's work that has been done on this.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think we have made very good progress today. We have had a lively debate on this report and I suggest we call it three o'clock.

• (1500)

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I say I have tried since this morning. Shame on you, the hon. member. Who is it addressed to? Shame on us. It is not a point of order. It is certainly a question of privilege. Some members want to have everything the same day and others want nothing. To me, it is the most important step that has come forward.

I know the ability of the parliamentary secretary. He can put it back again with a little more negotiation. I know he has commitment. We are not here under any minister's rules.

If the member would have said what he has just said, I would have found it extremely difficult to resist the temptation of taking my full 20 minutes. He noticed that I did not take my 20 minutes.

Now that he has one bill, at least the most important one, he is trying to cast all kinds of shadows on my colleagues. I defend my colleagues. I say to him, Mr. Speaker, that if he would have said what he just said to us earlier, he would not have had any progress today. He should learn to be patient and with patience he would get everything he wants.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

TRANSPORTATION INDUSTRY

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT ABANDONMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

That this House condemns the government for abandoning Canada's transportation industry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow a very vibrant and dynamic debate led by members on this side of the House with respect to the total abdication of this government vis-à-vis transportation policy.

I had the occasion while I was my party's transport critic to put this motion before the House of Commons. Certainly the fact that the motion is on for debate today is very timely with respect to a number of decisions and events that have happened in the last number of weeks, and in fact the last number of days when we take a look at the very important inquiry into the crash of that Dryden Air Ontario flight.

I say abdication because the government has a great vacuum with respect to any policy program as it concerns the transportation industry. We have seen in recent times this government basically gut VIA Rail.

Ever since trucking was deregulated on January 1, 1988, we have seen Canadian truckers literally off the road with respect to trying to conduct a viable business and continue in the industry facing American competition. Some 1,400 Canadian trucking companies have gone bankrupt.

Yet on shipping, where we can compete the best, the Americans continue to have their Jones Act which protects the U.S. shipping industry.

When the government was talking about harmonizing transportation policies in the secret document that was released by the Toronto Star regarding the North American free trade talks with Mexico and the United States, it talked about harmonizing rail, it talked about harmonizing road transport as well as bus companies. But nowhere did it talk about taking down the barriers of shipping vis-à-vis the Americans where in fact we can compete quite nicely.

This government seems to be promoting all the wrong different types of interests as far as Canadian aspirations are concerned.

I would like to dedicate the better part of the few minutes I have to the whole question of air policy. It seems in terms of the timing of a number of events without being disrespectful to the other transport industries, certainly the air side has been increasingly in the public eye.

What do we have on the air side? We have a government that ideologically has been married for some years to this whole policy and regime of deregulation. It started talking about it in 1985. As a result, airlines began to prepare for a policy of deregulation that came in during the 1988-89 period.

This government looks to deregulation as the Messiah for all the ills of the airline industry. Yet, promise after promise after expectation after expectation with respect to purporting a number of commitments, we have seen those commitments melt like snowballs in the month of July.

One of the things this government talked about before introducing deregulation was the question that it would increase competition across the country with respect to some of the smaller more regional airlines.

What do we have as we debate this particular motion on this Friday afternoon? Essentially, we now have a duopoly when there were a number of regional air carriers that were starting to be viable, such as City Express. In the city of Toronto we have seen a virtual disappearance of many of those smaller regional air carriers gobbled up by Air Canada and Canadian.

Under a policy of deregulation that was sold to this Parliament and to Canadians as one way of increasing competition and making the industry more dynamic and offering a better price to the travelling public, it has gone in the opposite direction. Not only do we have a duopoly that has dictated in the last little while, but we are also now entering into a situation where even the duopoly is in very serious waters, if I may use a wrong word to describe the air side of things. It is a situation where there is increased speculation that perhaps there may be a merger, or if they are to survive we will have to have infusion of foreign capital to make both Air Canada and Canadian viable. If we measure the deregulation policy by competition, it is a large failure.

The government also promised with respect to the competition aspect, to increase jobs for Canadians in this very key and important sector of Canada's economy. Yet in the last two years alone there have been almost 5,000 job losses and layoffs in the air industry.

If we talk about amalgamation of Canadian and Air Canada, whichever way it is cut, we are looking at between 10,000 and 15,000 unavoidable job losses.

Air travel is on the increase and airplanes and airports are here to stay. The government also sold this policy of deregulation by promising cheaper air fares to the travelling public. Yet with the exception of advanced bookings, the cost of airline tickets has increased beyond the rate of inflation in the last number of years.

I fail to see where deregulation, as promised by this government on very specific planks has, in fact, paid the kind of dividends this government was committed to and Canadians were expecting.

Then we talk about open skies, that is to say a free trade regime in the air. The two countries, Canada and the United States, are currently engaged in negotiations on a bilateral trade agreement that have not been revisited for some time. I believe they ought to be.

I am not saying that agreements are made once and never looked at, never modified or never updated. Obviously, there are great advantages for Canadian communities and airports to also revisit that with a view to trying to have more direct links between some Canadian cities and American centres and hubs without going through major hurdles in different airports, both in our country and in the United States. Obviously that will impact in terms of who comes to your cities, what conventions can be organized and the attractiveness of one's accessibility in one's market. I am not saying we should put our heads in the sand and pretend we should not update or modernize that bilateral air agreement.

• (1510)

What causes great consternation to myself, my party and to a great number of Canadians is this government's inability to indicate that the bottom line for these negotiations is to say no categorically and clearly to that word cabotage.

Cabotage is essentially a fancy way of saying that American air carriers would be allowed to come freely into Canadian cities and airports and touch base along the Canadian route as they see fit.

Right now it is regulated. For example, American carriers do not have the free ability to bring passengers to Toronto, pick them up, drop them off in Montreal, pick up additional passengers in Montreal and go back to the United States. It is a strictly regulated regime.

One of the reasons it has been regulated has been in part to protect the viability of our Canadian airline industry. The economies of scale being what they are and looking at the giant American carriers, if we were to simply have unfettered access between our two countries, it would only be a matter of time before we would not have a Canadian industry as we know it.

Canadians do care about our air industry. I believe that yes, they are worried and interested and concerned about air fare costs and the whole question of safety and the matter of convenience. But they are also concerned about having a Canadian air carrier. Canadians do place some degree of difference on whether the emblem on that airplane tail is a Canadian flag or an American flag.

I happen to believe that Canadians still care enough to have Canadian air carriers transporting them from one place to another. I also believe that Canadians feel the service we have been getting on Canadian carriers is certainly no less than that offered on American carriers, if not better.

What we have attempted to do, both in the Liberal caucus and in the Standing Committee on Transport where I had the honour to serve and now I have been replaced, certainly quite ably, by my colleague from Ottawa South—

Mr. Angus: Nobody can replace you.

Mr. Marchi: Big shoes to replace, I agree, but nonetheless the member for Ottawa South has very big and able feet.

Mr. Manley: Give me a break.

Mr. Marchi: The fact of the matter is at the transport committee there was a unanimous report. Government members, Liberal members and New Democratic members signed a report that clearly called on the minister and the government in negotiations with the Americans not to give in to cabotage.

Thus far whether it is because of a negotiating tactic or whether it is because of ideology, that promise has not been given privately or publicly. We have talked about it in the House of Commons in debates and in Question Period. But the government categorically has still not given an assurance to Canadians that cabotage will neither be on nor under the table.

It comes at an interesting time as well, because if we are talking about negotiations with the Americans in respect to our bilateral air agreement, we also cannot divorce that from the feelings that Canadians bring to the table with respect to the last deal Canadians negotiated with their American friends namely, the free trade agreement.

We now live with a free trade agreement that has caused a great deal of unease, a great deal of frustration and a great deal of justified legitimate fear among Canadians who have experienced more rather than less aggravation as a result of that agreement. We also live in a time that the government of the day is contemplating a North American free trade alignment. Therefore, we cannot divorce these agreements and what they have brought with respect to our economic livelihood from the feelings that Canadians have about the negotiations on a very important part of our economy as we know it.

So I think caution is a key word for the government of the day. It would reassure Canadians if this government was prepared to admit that it was not going to sign on the dotted line if any form of cabotage was going to be part of that agreement. At the very least, Canadians deserve to know what the bottom line is before going into any negotiations.

Another point that is viewed with some degree of consternation by the air industry is the flagship airport of the country which is in my city: Pearson airport. On the local front, we in York West and the communities surrounding the airport have had to put up with a great degree of abuse. I also see the member of Parliament for Bramalea—Gore—Malton who has made repeated representations to his government and to the Minister of Transport on issue of noise control.

The southern part of York West, virtually half the riding, is very much in the path both for take-offs and landings. We have asked the government repeatedly for a system. While it is not going to solve the problem entirely, as I said previously, it would help alleviate it. These communities are not being irresponsible to the point where they wish to close the airport down. They do not live in a fantasy world that thinks that aeroplanes are going to be taken over by the horse and buggy again. What this community in the south end of my riding is asking is that there be an alternative to the current system.

One of those alternatives would be to have a better balance of alternative runway use. There seems to be a predominant use of one particular runway that is closer to the terminal, that is preferred by the airlines and by the air traffic controllers because it saves time, fuel, money and is very convenient for the passengers. Because of that one runway, the landings and the take-offs are all over one particular community and that is grossly unfair and unjustified.

This community has been asking the last number of years for a fairer balance of distribution, that is to say to share the pain, to share the noise pollution, to share the noise that one has to live with. It is no laughing matter. In certain parts of my riding during the summer when people like to enjoy their backyards or invite the neighbours over for a barbeque it is literally impossible to do over a peak period because of the aeroplanes coming and going. Window panes rattle. People are awakened in the middle of the night. There are no curfews to speak of. This is all in the name of emergency landings. Not for one moment do I want to suggest, and I do not believe any other member of Parliament wants to suggest, that emergency cases should not be allowed to land, but when it is always the rule rather than the exception then I think we are stretching the whole definition of emergency.

So there are large problems with respect to the local area. There is also the problem that when people complain their complaints go nowhere.

We have been advocating on this side of the House, as has the community, that a noise ombudsman of some sort be appointed. It would at least give the people in the riding or the communities surrounding Pearson the pleasure and the satisfaction that their message is getting through rather than talking to some tape machine which causes incredible amounts of frustration.

As well, I have asked the government and the minister to look at a special program, an insulation program that has been advocated by the Denver community surrounding the Denver airport that has worked very well. They have modern, up-to-date noise insulation which takes into account the type of noise pollution in communities surrounding airports. I am hopeful that the minister in due course will respond in a way that brings some degree of relief and satisfaction.

I was going to talk about the whole question of the investigation and the report on the Dryden crash, but I will leave that to my colleague, the transport critic. He will be touching on a number of variables therein.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to join my colleague in support of his motion, the motion condemning the government for abandoning Canada's transportation industry.

At the outset I want to suggest that we are really talking generically in terms of government, because the situation we find ourselves in today, quite frankly, was started before the current government took power. The Winnipeg member, still in this House, back in 1983-84, I believe it was, indicated that Air Canada, then a Crown corporation, and CN, still a Crown corporation, should act as if they were in the private sector and that certainly set the scene for an approach to transportation.

Leading up to the 1984 election, the member from Winnipeg also started the process of deregulation. In fact, in Justice Moshansky's report tabled yesterday, one of the first warnings that came forward in Transport Canada from the front line troops, as the Justice referred to them, was in the spring of 1984, well before this government was successful at the polls later that year. Those front line troops warned that we did not have the resources to deal properly with deregulation, in whatever form.

The last two days we have been seized in this House, and I suspect across the country, with Justice Moshansky's report. Those of us who have been involved in the deregulation fight since 1984, and in the case of my colleague from Regina—Lumsden well before that, see a lot in the report that we warned people about.

When you take away the economic stability that our carriers had—and when I say economic stability I mean that there was some certainty in the routes that they would serve, there was some certainty in the kind of revenue that they would get, and at the same time the consumer had some certainty that the airline could not arbitrarily raise the fees or the ticket prices.

Also the communities that were served knew that there was protection for them as well, that a carrier could not on its own decide what kind of equipment to use to service that community and what kind of frequency to provide flights to that community. In both cases, the consumer and the community through a public process could attempt to block any changes. Obviously the CTC at the time had the responsibility to adjudicate that.

By taking it out of the realm of stability, we did a number of things as a society. We created the climate for cut-throat competition, where the bottom line became the driving force behind the decision-making of the airlines, and the rail and the road.

As we said during the debates on the white paper Freedom to Move and during the debate on the National Transportation Act and the companion pieces of legislation, it was the banker who made those safety decisions. It was not the regulator, it was not the government, it was not necessarily the carrier, it was the banker. The banker would be the one who would really decide whether a new company could be formed, that as long as you were fit, willing and able you would get a licence.

You did not have to prove public convenience or necessity which was the old rule, as long as you could convince your banker. In theory if you could prove your worthiness, then you could operate a scheduled airline.

Justice Moshansky has told us that really was not the case. In terms of Air Ontario, a merger had just taken place. In effect two airlines became one and they brought in new equipment, in particular the Fokker. They did not have sufficient staff to maintain it and to operate it. They did not have sufficient spare parts.

For awhile they were being trained on simulators by U.S. Air and one other carrier, Pegasus. It was another American carrier. That contract was cancelled. So they were training them in the cockpits of the planes on the ground at night in Winnipeg.

Justice Moshansky points out how inadequate that kind of training was. He points out—these are my words and not his—that we had a company that was not in control of its own operations.

At the same time, we had a regulator that did not have enough resources to do the job. Some of us say it still does not have the resources needed. In fact, I have two press releases that came from the organization that represents the inspectors, the Aircraft Operations Group Association.

The release of today reads as follows:

> Civil Aviation Inspectors disappointed with Transport Minister's response to Moshansky Report on Air Ontario tragedy.
> "Instead of trying to deflect the blame, Transport Minister Jean Corbeil should take the Moshansky report seriously," says Wayne Foy, national chairman of the Aircraft Operations Group Association. "But we welcome the opportunity to work with the Department to implement recommendations of the report that will ensure the safety of civil aviation in Canada."
> "Justice Moshansky's report is the first unbiased examination of the effects of deregulation and the cutbacks made in Transport Canada aviation over the past 10 years. He is right on target with respect to the lack of support, training and resources required by aviation inspectors," Foy says.
> "Civil aviation inspectors are dedicated professionals, many of whom are essential to aviation safety. We are frustrated by Transport Canada's failure to provide sufficient staff, to train inspectors and to support our work," Foy says.
> "One of the worst problems our inspectors face is that management doesn't listen. They only hear what they want to hear," Foy says. "If the Minister's comments yesterday are indicative of his basic outlook, we could be in for more of the same."

This organization represents some 500 civil aviation inspectors working for both Transport Canada and the Transportation Safety Board.

These are the people on the ground. These are the front line troops. They know what is happening out there, and they tried to tell their masters that they did not have the resources, that there were not enough of them and that Canada was not able to properly police deregulation.

At the same time in this House and in committee, my colleague, the member for Regina—Lumsden and myself, along with a countless array of witnesses not just from the union side gave testimony. I can remember a witness in Vancouver, an expert brought up from the United States who was very, very familiar with the deregulation experience in the United States, given that happened 10 years before we started ours. Everything he warned us about has happened.

I regret to say that. I do not like coming into this House and saying: "I told you so," because I would rather that things worked well and that the goals that we were aiming for which were lower prices and better service happened. Maybe in a few cases there have been some better services. In some cases there have been lower prices, but overall, I think you will find that there is less service, the cost is greater and it is the Canadian public who is paying for it.

I know I do not have all that much time, but in the few minutes I have left, I want to touch briefly on the future of the Canadian airline industry. We all know that Air Canada, now a wholly-owned private sector company, and Canadian Airlines, which is owned by TWA, are in financial difficulty. One does not have to be an accountant or an economist to understand that. They both are losing money daily.

• (1530)

Canadian Airlines has decided that part of its solution is to link up with American Airlines, not just in terms of an operating agreement, nor just in terms of a reservation agreement, but in terms of an equity position. Air Canada has been working toward an operating agreement with U.S. Air.

In a speech before the Canadian Club of Winnipeg on March 11 of this year the executive vice-president and chief operating officer of Air Canada said as follows:

> The bottom line consequence of American Airlines acquiring a significant influence over Canadian Airlines International, would be the inevitable end of the Canadian airline industry as we know it.
> For our part, we would have little choice but to succumb to a parallel strategy.

In other words, Air Canada is warning us that if American Airlines buys a chunk of Canadian Airlines it will have no choice but to allow U.S. Air or a similar American company to buy a chunk of Air Canada. Once that happens we might as well kiss a national airline goodbye.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a timely and important debate, and I am pleased to take part in it.

I know members opposite have great concern about the report that came down yesterday. The commission of inquiry released a report yesterday into the tragedy at Dryden. It is one we are all concerned about.

I would like to step through some of the government's response to and position in that regard. First of all, it was an inquiry into a human tragedy. I do not think any of us dismissed that. It was very much a human tragedy.

I want to stress on behalf of the minister that Canada's aviation system is safe. Since 1981—and I think it is important that Canadian people know this—there has been a 35 per cent decrease in accidents. That is significant, because we have to assure Canadian people that the Canadian aviation industry is safe. That statistic in itself indicates that we do have a very high degree of safety in the industry.

Another point I think worth stressing is that the government did not wait for the commission to be created by somebody else. The government created it. It initiated that response. The inquiry is very much independent and is a very critical approach to air safety and the aviation industry.

The first set of recommendations go back to 1989. Knowing that, I think most of us would agree that the department has been responsive and has been responsible to the industry.

Let us go through what has been suggested in the findings. We will go through some of them point by point. It is referring to new audit procedures and is telling us that the department is now inspecting air carriers more often. It started auditing almost immediately after a merger of the start-up and Transport Canada inspectors are assigned to that operation right now. It has also stiffened regulations in many areas.

Again, it did not take long. In November 1990 Transport implemented what it called the clean wing concept in the form of new regulations prohibiting take-offs when there is any contamination whatsoever adhering to the lifting surfaces of an aircraft. It is important to consider that because we know what happened at Dryden and what happened last week in New York at La Guardia. Because of icing problems there was another tragedy in the U.S. That is the type of thing the department is very concerned with and has taken steps as early as 1990 to eliminate. The department has been working with industry on a number of regulations for that new type of safety which I think we all demand.

One point brought out was on the question of inspectors. The question was whether we had enough inspectors at the time and whether we have enough now. I think those are very legitimate questions because the underlying importance is safety. There is a very strong link between the number of inspectors and the safety of our airlines as a whole.

It is important to note that since 1985-86 there has been an increase of 100 inspectors. The most important thing to remember in this whole exercise is that more will be added as we go on. Most of us would like to see more of them on the job now, but it is important to recognize that we need more, that we should have more and that there will be more. However, that number has increased since 1985-86.

Procedures have been streamlined for getting safety audits done systematically and quickly. Even in the internal procedures within the department there has been some very significant changes in recent years. In addition, a new aeronautics code is being developed and will give more authority to aviation inspectors.

The question that comes to mind is: what is enough? Is enough ever enough when it comes to safety in the air? I do not know how much we can do or how far we can go to ensure the highest degree of safety. The answer to the question is probably that enough is never enough. It is constant. We continually have to put resources into the safety of the aviation industry. I do not think Canadian taxpayers are going to object to that.

The purpose of the debate today is to reinforce that point. At some point the Government of Canada has to step up to the line and say: "Yes, you are absolutely right. Maybe what we have to do is dedicate more financial resources to the problem". The problem is air safety and ensuring that our standards are the absolute highest in the world.

I want to emphasize this afternoon more than anything that the Canadian aviation industry has a high degree of safety. I do not want these figures to be obscured by other figures. There has been a 35 per cent decrease in aviation disasters since 1985–86. I think that is significant. I do not want that figure to be distorted for Canadian people. It is very important. It does not mean we cannot achieve a higher number. I think that is possible. Because of the way the government has been responding and will respond to Justice Moshansky's report, I think we will see that number increase significantly in the next few years.

Most of us can be assured that it is safe when we buy tickets and our families get on aircraft. Ours is the safest in the world. Our records clearly indicate that and I do not want them distorted here today.

The government has responded and is continuing to respond. Some of it has been initiated across the aisle. There have been some very strong words from opposition members. At times they have put the minister in the hot seat. I guess that is the role of a minister and the minister has to respond. I have to say that this minister has responded.

All Canadians can be proud of the industry. We can be very proud about how the ministry has responded to the disaster in Dryden two years ago.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my colleague, the member for York West, for moving this motion.

[English]

He was the former transport critic for our party. As his successor, might I say that despite my size 12s I am having difficulty filling his shoes. It is the first time I have ever had my foot size commented upon in the House of Commons.

Before I take a few moments to comment on the Dryden report which I want to do, I would like to respond very quickly to the comments of the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. On behalf of the New Democratic Party he tried to put the verdict of this report with respect to the combined policies of the Conservative government of deregulation and deficit reduction into the same category as the liberalization process that was introduced by the former Liberal Minister of Transport.

In trying to do so and talking about competition, we will notice that the NDP only uses the word competition in juxtaposition with the word cut-throat. To the NDP competition is always cut-throat. The NDP understands so little about doing business that, as my colleague for Kingston and the Islands pointed out earlier today, we are now referring to the premier of Ontario as Buffalo Bob because he has done more to renew the vital interest of the city of Buffalo, New York than has anyone else in many years. The fact that the NDP does not know the difference between liberalization of air transportation and the deregulation regime that was brought in in 1985 should not surprise any of us.

This leads me to say a few things about the Dryden inquiry and the report made available to us yesterday in the House of Commons by the Minister of Transport. I would like to pick up on some of the remarks of the member for Cumberland—Colchester. He stressed the safety of the Canadian aviation industry. With respect to the questions posed by our party, I think we have entirely endeavoured to deal with the government's response to the report and its performance with respect to these issues over the period of time studied by the commissioner.

I would like to point out that we began our questioning of the government minister on this report by drawing the attention of the House and the people of Canada to the fact that Mr. Justice Moshansky has said that many of the concerns which emerged during his inquiry and are reflected in his report have already started to be dealt with or had been dealt with. He has further said that it is safe to fly in Canada.

In raising these concerns I want to make it abundantly clear that we are not in any way suggesting it is unsafe at the present time to fly in Canada. That is not to say there are not a lot of things that can be done to improve the system and to ensure that further Drydens do not occur. That being said, I want to draw attention to the findings Mr. Justice Moshansky made, upon which he based his recommendations. These findings, if this were a court proceeding, would be the findings of fact from which he drew conclusions. They are very important in two ways.

First, he found with respect to the period of time in the mid-1980s when deregulation was coming into effect that, and I am reading from page 913 of his report: "Based on the information before this commission the Aviation Regulation Directorate was not adequately prepared to perform its functions in the latter 1980s. The warning flags raised early in the 1980s and repeatedly thereafter had seemingly negligible effect. The forecasts of safety assurance deficiencies were soundly based and progressively confirmed, yet there was no proper response by the senior management of Transport Canada in the form of urgent planning or action to meet the inevitable challenge".

Another finding: "It was known that significant increases in personnel would be required to meet demand, yet such increases were not authorized, let alone acquired". Finally: "Had the Transport Canada Aviation Regulation Directorate been in a position to discharge all of its responsibilities in an effective and timely manner some of the factors that contributed to the Dryden accident may not have arisen".

Even more devastatingly, in his press conference yesterday Mr. Justice Moshansky said that this disaster, which cost 24 lives, was allowed to happen. Allowed to happen by whom? In part, it was allowed to happen by the regulator, by Transport Canada, and by the Government of Canada.

Why the government? There has been a lot of discussion over the last couple of years about ministerial responsibility, about when ministers should be required to face the music for things that have happened in their departments. There has been an evolution in that doctrine in the time that this government has been in office. It has been repeatedly suggested that if something happens at a lower level then the minister should only take steps to take corrective action and should not be held responsible for it.

In this case, I suggest that the judge in the inquiry has found that the responsibility for the problems that contributed to the Dryden air disaster lies at the top level, at the cabinet level.

Let me read some further findings from Justice Moshansky's report. On page 939 he writes: "The need for increased resources within the Aviation Regulation Directorate to meet the growth and demands expected to be generated by the policy of economic regulatory reform"—that is deregulation—"was predicted and well documented in several reports and studies in the period prior to 1984 and following. The Deputy Minister's internal audit review group in June of 1987 issued a report that stated that the Aviation Regulation Directorate was at that time unable to provide senior Transport Canada management with sufficient assurance that the aviation industry was in compliance with existing safety legislation, regulations and standards".

A further finding is that: "The effect of economic regulatory reform, combined with deficit reduction, created a synergy that in my opinion, based on the evidence before this commission, had an adverse impact on the effective application of safety standards".

Finally, and I think this is the most devastating critique of all, he says that: "It is not my intent to criticize the right of a government to embark on a policy of economic deregulation of the air carrier industry. Nor would I suggest that it is improper to attempt to reduce the size of the national deficit. It is the combined effects of these policies, as they relate to the safety of the public, that causes concern. The policies are not faulted in any way but their application and over-all administration left much to be desired".

These are the measured and carefully phrased words of a justice of the Supreme Court of Alberta. This is not political rhetoric. When we take these out of that context and recognize what this judge is saying, he is saying that the two main major policies which were policies of the cabinet collided in mid-air, the policy of airline deregulation on the one hand and the policy of deficit reduction on the other hand. The casualty in that mid-air collision was Canadian passenger safety, and 24 people died in Dryden as a result of that collision.

If this is not a case of gross incompetence and negligence on the part of cabinet ministers, then I do not know what is.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the previous member's speech. I thought he started particularly well and in a particularly balanced way which we have come to expect over the years from him. I was surprised, therefore, when he concluded in a way I did not expect he would conclude.

Over my years here, I have seen an evolution of this argument that somehow ministers are responsible for every paper-clip, every flight switch, every wheel blow-out and every piece of everything that happens. If a tire blows on a national highway, the Minister of Transport or his brother is personally responsible, judging by the argument of the hon. member.

He started, I thought quite appropriately by quoting the context in which the Hon. Justice's comments were put by the Hon. Justice and then took them out of that context. The context, I repeat to the hon. member, in which the Justice put his own remarks is nobody belittles in any way the consequence of 24 people losing their lives and this was and is a real tragedy. The context in which he puts his own report, remarks and suggestions, I repeat to the hon. member, the vast majority of which are either already implemented or are being examined to see if they can be implemented as quickly as possible, is that we have one of the safest air systems in the world. We continue to do so and he recognizes the incidents of air accidents since 1981 or since the beginning of regulation has not increased significantly. You can argue whether you use the 1981 to 1991 statistics which show them declining or the 1984 to 1987 statistics which show them going up slightly or the 1988 to today's statistics from the Transport Commission which show them going down since 1988.

Within that context, was this a real tragedy? Yes, it was. It is beyond me and beyond this debate which I think is about a larger principle as well and I want to come back to that. That I think was the context of the hon. member's motion, to accuse the government not of having—as is his right if he chooses—made a mistake with regard to this report or this situation. His motion is about transportation policy in general, as I understand his motion to be, that the government has abrogated its responsibility. I will come back to that. But it is suggested somehow, as has become the Liberal Party's habit, that one should go beyond the tragedy that has happened and say it is the Minister of Transport's fault.

No, that is not what that report says. It does not say the Minister of Transport—generically the Minister of Transport—is responsible for those deaths as the member has implied. I regard that as regrettable the way in which argument has been put by members of the opposition for too many years. I do not always mean just Liberals. That is a decline in the sense of the use of this Chamber to get to better policy when we think we have to personalize everything around here. I hope the member did not mean it, but that is what he said.

I want to come back in the few minutes that are left to the motion of the member for York West. He has made quite a large allegation, that the government has somehow abandoned Canada's transportation industry. It is our view, as you would expect, and it is my view from having watched this, that the government has done a great deal to ensure not only a viable transportation system, but a safe transportation system. Safety has, as you would expect, been the top priority of the Department of Transport and it has taken a number of specific actions which reflect that commitment, not least of which is its ongoing response to the latest report.

In recent years, the government has undertaken the modernization of our air navigation system at an expense of hundreds of millions of dollars. We created the Canadian Transportation Safety Board whose job is to investigate accidents and provide recommendations to prevent future incidents in all modes, I am sure something the hon. member agrees with.

This government has passed the Railway Safety Act and amendments to the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. We have also taken steps to introduce legislation on substance abuse in safety sensitive positions in the transport sector. There is a longer list. That is a brief example of the many initiatives taken by this government to protect the safety of Canadians using the transportation system generally in this country.

Getting back to the general theme, the large charge that the member makes that this government has abandoned the industry, all Canadians recognize the importance of transportation to an economy like ours. It is the backbone of the way we have to make our living. Everything has to be moved huge distances in a place like Canada, with its large geography and small population.

Each day, 140,000 Canadians travel by one of the public intercity modes: air, bus or rail, and almost 2 million tonnes of freight are moved by rail, truck or water. Canadian producers and shippers operate in a global environment that is shaped by international competition. It is therefore essential for our economic well-being that we create and maintain an efficient, responsive, safe and productive transportation system and that the cost of transportation services are minimized for the users of that system.

Early in its mandate, this government did indeed recognize that a change in the economic regulatory framework in transportation was necessary if the transportation system was to be allowed to grow and to compete to meet the needs of shippers and the travelling public. Many of the regulations in place when we took office had become in fact obstacles to growth, innovation and competitiveness in Canadian transportation. Removing those obstacles while protecting and maintaining the safety for the public of Canada became a priority in our efforts to achieve economic renewal.

As part of this government's efforts to improve Canadian competitiveness, we undertook an extensive consultation process over a two-year period, which included parliamentary study and comment. The result was the introduction of a new economic regulatory regime for Canadian transportation on January 1, 1988.

The National Transportation Act, 1987 and the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, 1987 established a revised legislative framework for our transportation industry. This framework was based on the principle that competition and market forces are the best means for providing Canadians with efficient transportation at the lowest possible cost.

This legislation did not deregulate safety nor in any way diminish its importance. In fact, it emphasized the importance of safety by introducing it for the first time as a basic principle of our national transportation policy statement.

Economic regulation of the transportation industry was reduced to a minimum or modified in the case of the railways to stimulate competitive conditions to the greatest extent possible. Many of the shackles which prevented our carriers from operating in the most efficient manner have been removed. In this more competitive environment, carriers are able to provide the best possible service at the best price and support economic growth in all sectors of the economy.

These were fundamental changes in our regulatory system, but I categorically deny the charges of the opposition that they were introduced without consideration of the consequences for our transportation industries.

Our government provided for annual reviews by the National Transportation Agency for a four-year period to monitor the effects of these changes. We also provided for a comprehensive review to assess the impact of these changes in the fifth year of operation, this year, 1992.

The introduction of such a comprehensive review process in legislation is unusual. However, the government recognized from the start that the regulatory reforms that were introduced needed to be followed closely. If adjustments proved to be necessary to meet our reform objectives the government was ready to make them.

Despite the focus of the last two days of debate, again not to diminish in any way whatsoever the tragedy that has occurred, it is important to put on the record the kinds of improvements in our air services in Canada that have occurred, since this government took action. Before these regulatory changes were introduced there were controls over entry, exit—

Mr. Milliken: The airlines made money.

Mr. Bosley: Yes, all airlines in North America made money. It is typical of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that he somehow wants to argue that because Air Canada lost money last year when every U.S. carrier in the last three years has lost on an equity basis more money than both of the Canadian carriers combined that somehow that is a consequence of regulatory reform. It is typical of the intellectual debate of the other side at the moment. There were controls over entry, exit, levels of service routes, operating equipment, passenger fares and cargo tariffs. These controls were impediments to efficient operations by existing carriers and new entrants, and to more competitive prices and more varied services for passengers and shippers.

As a result of the changes that were introduced entry into the marketplace in southern Canada has indeed been eased, providing for a more competitive environment. Licences no longer restrict competition by imposing limitations on the type of service to be offered, the routes and points to be served, or the types of equipment to be used.

Regulatory approval is no longer required to establish or lower air fares, except in very specific circumstances. Carriers can now set their fares and utilize the aircraft best suited to the particular markets in which they are operating.

Mr. Speaker, I can see that you are looking at me. I do appreciate that the time has expired.

In closing, I would like to say that in my view it is somehow intellectually dishonest to suggest that introducing competition into the marketplace is not essentially good for the consumers and the industry. As long as we do that while maintaining a safety record as good or better than under the old regime then we can be proud of what we have achieved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

MOTION FOR CREATION OF SOCIÉTÉ IMMOBILIÈRE OKA-KANESATAKE

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of creating the Société Immobilière Oka-Kanesatake (SIOK) and to transfer to the Société the budget already allocated by Treasury Board for the purposes of negotiating the reunification of lands at Oka-Kanesatake.

She said: Mr. Speaker, when I tabled the motion to create the Société immobilière Oka-Kanesatake, there were and, in fact, still are many problems with the difficult negotiations on reunification of Indian lands at Kanesatake and also with the agenda now being discussed with federal negotiator Bernard Roy. Things have come a long way, but even today, the process that was designed to find a comprehensive solution to this very complex problem is terribly slow, which adds to the lack of understanding that prevails between both communities.

Perhaps I could put things into perspective and introduce the many parties that are concerned about the eventual outcome. First, the municipality of the parish of Oka, where about 50 or 60 non-aboriginal families live within the Mohawk lands of Kanesatake.

For the municipalities in the parish it is a very special problem because these families no longer wish to live on federal Indian land. These families are faced daily with the fact that, unlike other Canadians, they do not have peaceful enjoyment of their property, they constantly feel and are often told, unfortunately, that the place is not theirs, that they are living on Indian lands and that those lands are being claimed and belong to the aboriginal people.

So these white people, these non-aboriginals would like to see this rather unusual situation cleared up as soon as possible. For the municipality, it means losing 50 ratepayers, so it is a rather unusual and in fact unique problem, both for non-aboriginal and aboriginal people in the parish.

In the municipality of the village of Oka, aboriginal people, between 50 and 55 families, live in the village surrounded by non-aboriginal lands. It is more or less a checkerboard situation. We have aboriginals living within lands owned by white people and non-aboriginals living within aboriginal lands. So there is a very real problem.

What jurisdiction applies to an aboriginal person living on federal land in the municipality of the village? Do provincial and municipal laws apply? Does the municipal building code apply? According to a recent judgment in the Jean-Roch Simon case, which is being appealed, the judge said that in the municipality, provincial and municipal laws applied, and just because it was federal land did not mean that these people could build homes that did not conform to the municipal code.

We have the Kanesatake Band Council, whose members were elected by their peers for the first time. This provisional council is supposed to set up a more permanent election procedure, based on their own by-laws, by the end of June 1992. The Band Council is responsible for day to day administration, for all land claims negotiations, for the agenda now being negotiated with the federal negotiator, land reunification, and economic development. In other words, they have a lot on their plate.

There is the federal-provincial negotiating committee which includes the mayor of the parish, Mr. Patry, who was appointed, if you recall, during the crisis in 1990. Mr. Roy had been involved at the time, and was appointed federal negotiator in charge of negotiations with the aboriginal people. Subsequently, of course, there were a number of problems which held up the committee's work for quite some time, and a number of meetings could not be held. Obviously, without meetings the parties cannot discuss the concerns of both communities.

Furthermore, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development maintains its fiduciary role vis-à-vis the aboriginal people. The department is therefore very much in the picture, because to the aboriginals, the department is their federal counterpart, since they will only negotiate from government to government. This means the entire regional office of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is still very much involved in this matter.

A number of associations and groups were formed since the events in Oka in 1990. To name only the larger ones, there is the Association of Property Owners inside Kanesatake, also known as APIK. These people represent the interests of about 60 families which live in the aboriginal checkerboard.

They did a simply outstanding job and I must take the opportunity again to congratulate the leaders of this association who with their well-prepared and articulate presentations were able to convince the government that their problems were real. I can tell those who live in this area that I am particularly concerned about their daily problems and they know that I am looking after their situation regularly.

The Oka Chamber of Commerce, through its president, Michel Bond, is very concerned about economic development in the region. Everyone is wondering what parcels of land and houses might be bought for the reunification of the natives' land holdings. People wonder if it might be their own house. For the whole business community in the area, it is a big problem and they want it settled. They have continually shown leadership. The Chamber of Commerce recently formed a coalition of local non-profit organizations including the Oka farmers' wives, the united craftswomen and the owners' association, in short, any charitable or other group in Oka.

Mr. Speaker, I have left the most important for last. Mentioning it last in no way affects its importance. The citizens of this great region live in a unique territory which is unmatched. Quite legitimately, they want to know what will happen to them tomorrow. Will their house, street or neighborhood be considered for the land reunification? Can they enlarge their house? Can they demolish it? Can they build a swimming pool? Can they rent their house? Can they enjoy their property in peace? Those are legitimate questions that any home owner has. In that area, they raise them all the time. I say again that we must make a very big effort at communicating with those people, because the citizens of Oka want their community to be as it was before. They want to live in peace in that wonderful region, Mr. Speaker, which you should visit one day.

Now there is a last offer. The Kanesatake Mohawks always said that the Oka pine grove was sacred land and that any negotiation with the federal negotiator could succeed only if the Mohawks recovered that part of the territory adjoining the famous parcel of land bought from Mr. Rousseau, and the Jardins d'Oka. It is now a municipal park which is not used by non-natives, it must be said. I think that the Oka council is quite aware of it, and many people with whom I have spoken are well aware that the pine grove park is a wonderful spot, but is used by the natives for various ancestral reasons.

The home owners south of highway 344, who you recall were the first to be thrown out when the armed warriors took Oka on July 11, 1990, a date now famous in the minds of my constituents in that part of the riding, lived and still live in a rather unusual situation. You see, the pine grove is on the north and these home owners are on the south, so the government cannot create a reserve behind, which I think neither the native people of Oka nor the whites want to have. This is what the government has done. It asked whether the village of Oka would be interested in a transfer of property. To solve the problem of those living south of highway 344, the government would buy that land, between 12 and 15 properties, and in exchange, the village would turn over the pine grove to the negotiating committee so that the federal negotiator could see the light at the end of the tunnel and finally conclude what I would call a peace treaty, Mr. Speaker, which is what everyone wants.

What we did not know but have since learned is that the residents of Girouard Street, the owners that are neighbours at the back of the residences south of highway 344, are very concerned. They say this: "If the federal government transfers the properties south of highway 344 to the municipality, the latter could lay out a park or do anything it wants." The owners have told me: "Madam Bourgault, we do not want someday to find ourselves, through circumstances, with a park adjacent to our backyards, a park that could eventually belong to aboriginal people." This situation presents a particular problem for those residents, a problem that the government, as well as the municipality and the federal negotiator, must take into account.

Those are only a few of the problems. Of course, all those people and organizations have retained the services of lawyers. There are several lawyers from various firms involved in this issue who try, as best they can, to protect the interests of their clients. There is all kinds of speculation; there is a lot of hearsay, "I heard that", "maybe that", and "possibilities that". In fact, there are so many rumors that we must absolutely establish a communication process as soon as possible.

The Hon. Monique Landry has two big responsibilities since, on the one hand, as minister of state for Indian affairs, she is responsible for aboriginal rights and, on the other hand, as a minister for the region of Laval—Rive-Nord, she is the regional responsible minister. Therefore, she finds herself in a rather difficult position, but I must say that she works very hard. She has never stopped working on this issue, and she was always available when people wanted to meet with her. She has done all that she can and I must say that she does not always get the necessary support, including from myself as well as from aboriginal people that do not necessarily support her efforts. This issue is so unique and so complex that we must look at it in a unique fashion. It is not easy for a government to find a unique solution to a unique problem.

It is for all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I propose the creation of the Société Immobilière Oka–Kanesatake, of which I would like to enumerate some objectives: to transfer the reunification of lands process, as well as the budget allocated by Treasury Board for that purpose, to a local authority; to allow more open negotiations, by establishing a legitimate intermediary between the two communities; to reduce the over-all costs of the reunification of lands; to accelerate negotiations at every level by reducing to a minimum the present delays; to bring together the two communities; to ensure stability and continuity to the negotiation process; to create a favourable climate for the economic and social development of the communities, and so on.

The government has decided to open a local public works office to accelerate the process as regards anything that can be negotiated at the table. When negotiators come to the conclusion that a piece of land is necessary for unification purposes, rather than wait until the end, and in order to solve the problem of non–aboriginal people that are like hostages in those negotiations, Public Works Canada will act immediately. The office just opened and there have been problems because aboriginal people have demonstrated to keep that office from opening. Once again, this was because of a lack of communication and because the aboriginal people did not know the role of that office. This office is there to answer legitimate questions from the people, such as: "Is my house being considered? Is it going to be bought or not?"

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the coalition and the Chamber of Commerce are still holding meetings and I think that it is not only up to the federal government or the provincial government to settle the problems of these two communities. They will have to learn to compromise in order to live together. They have no choice. Nobody is about to be deported and the federal government will not expropriate. One Mirabel was enough. We do not want to create another similar situation.

Therefore, it is a matter of mutual agreement. But again, there must be consistency. We cannot buy up all of Oka. The federal government cannot acquire the ownership of the whole area and the Mohawks from Kanesatake must understand that white people are living there too and will continue to do so. That is the way it is and there is nothing we can do about it. The two communities must immediately start to look for local means to help one another understand their respective specific needs and interests.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the government made the right decision when it decided to open an office there, although I have to admit that, personally, I would have preferred all matters to go through a Société Immobilière Oka–Kanesatake. We did resolve the sensitive issue of Mirabel expropriations with the Société Immobilière du Canada in Mirabel, and things went just fine. The local people dealt with the government officials in charge of buying and selling the land. This leads me to believe that, had we put one single local unit in charge of the entire process, there would have been no problem. There would not have been such a big problem due to lack of communication, misgivings about what a mandate is, the perception some may have regarding the sale or transfer of the lands known as the pines for the property south of highway 344, all legitimate questions the people have after going though the dreadful crisis they experienced.

Let us not forget that the events of the summer of 1990 have left indelible scars on these people's minds. Of course, each time a problem arises in Oka, the people who have not yet recovered from that crisis will get very insecure. It is only normal that they ask questions and want their concerns answered.

In closing, I wish we had created that agency, but the government decided otherwise and I am prepared to work with Public Works, Indian and Northern Affairs and the negotiating committee. However, I would really like to know when the negotiations will be over. When are we going to see the light at the end of the tunnel at the negotiating table. It looks so complicated to many people, but it seems to me that, with a little good will, considering the serious unemployment situation in Kanesatake, considering that economic concerns must be resolved without delay, it would be time to set aside all those animosities and act to restore good relations and put an end to those negotiations which are dragging on and are not conducive to bringing the two communities closer together.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to speak on the private member's motion put forward by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau, my colleague from the area that is involved in this particular motion.

Her motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of creating the Société Immobilière Oka–Kanesatake and to transfer to the*Société* the budget already allocated by Treasury Board for the purpose of negotiating the reunification of lands at Oka–Kanesatake.

I would like to establish three important points that this House and the Canadian public need to be aware of. First, this motion is irrelevant since the member's own government has already objected to the idea in a letter which was sent to the chief of Kanesatake.

Second, the member is in conflict of a responsibility to all of her constituents and to the members of this House.

Third, the precedent set by establishing this process in Oka would be unwieldy and costly in all other regions of Canada where land claims processes are being negotiated.

This motion is an example of a waste of time and taxpayers' dollars. The government has already opposed the idea in a letter that the Minister of State for Indian Affairs wrote to Chief Jerry Peltier on March 11, 1992. In that letter the federal minister gives very clear assurance that there will be no acquisition of properties by the special office proposed by the member opposite before any issues are addressed at the negotiating table.

The minister also stated that she believes in the current negotiating process. The Mohawk Council of Kanesatake already has a negotiating process in place with the federal government for the transfer of land. The federal negotiator is Bernard Roy who has developed the process in conjunction with the Mohawk Council. The negotiators are progressing. If they are to succeed, it is essential that these parties are allowed to proceed.

This motion is an attempt to undermine and destroy the negotiating process between the federal government and the Mohawk Council. You cannot look to a business deal, a real estate office, for a very complicated political problem that needs a unique solution, as she puts it. You need to deal within the realm of politics because it is not a business deal that will deal with this particular issue or that will resolve it.

In my view, the member is in conflict. She is not only proposing a motion that her own government has already rejected, she is also working against her own constituents whom she was elected to represented in this House, not work against. They are the Mohawk residents of Kanesatake. Whether she agrees or disagrees, they are also her constituents. She has shown no respect for the Mohawk government of Kanesatake.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, which held months of hearings as a result of the Oka crisis. Both the member and I worked on that committee together, at odds at times but together nevertheless. In the end we came out with a report in the summer of 1990 which makes some very specific and constructive recommendations.

The member should bear in mind one recommendation. We produced a set of recommendations to the government. The member, by way of her motion, is also conflicting with the very report which she endorsed.

Let me read the recommendation which the members of that committee agreed to: "Recommendation No. 6: The land views conflict resolution at Kanesatake. The Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs recommends that the government approach the parties regarding the advisability of putting in place a process to deal with conflicts between municipalities and Mohawk authorities over land use issues affecting both communities without prejudice to the land claims. The committee recommends the appointment of a mediator, upon the joint approval of the parties concerned, to facilitate discussions over land use matters such as zoning and other municipal concerns. The committee also recommends that the appointment of an arbitrator jointly agreed upon to make binding decisions where negotiations and mediation do not resolve the conflict".

I also want to point out to the members of this House that by supporting this motion, a precedent would be established whereby such an office could be established in every municipality in Canada where land claims were being negotiated, where there are difficulties and complexities that do take time, that do take consideration and extra work, that do take the expertise that is being put forward by the mediator and the Mohawk Council at this time, and also by the federal government.

For instance, does this House believe that the town of Inuvik should receive funding from the federal government to establish an office because of the negotiations of the Gwichin regional claim? Will the government be establishing such an office in Iqaluit because of the TFN plan it proposed to create in Nunavut. How much would these offices cost and what would be their purpose other than to undermine the land claims process agreed upon by the federal government.

• (1140)

All Canadians remember the tragic summer of 1990. I agree with the member opposite that we have to come together and look for a resolution. This motion is clearly provocative in light of what has occurred over the last couple of years. The conflict between the government and the people of the pines provokes emotional and psychological trauma for all involved. It is beyond me why anyone in Canada, much less the member of Parliament for the region, would want to jeopardize the system which has been established by the people since that tragic event to deal with land transfer processes.

I beg members of this House not to put our country into this volatile situation again and to not support this motion.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on the motion that has been put by my colleague, the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau.

Members on all sides of the House know what a delicate issue land unification is for Kanesatake. Despite what the newspapers are reporting, negotiations are continuing among representatives from the province of Quebec, the federal government, municipalities in Oka and the band council. Indeed Grand Chief Peltier has already let it be known that he is unequivocally opposed to the proposal. He proposes instead a return to vigorous discussions at the negotiating table in order to make progress.

The efforts of the hon. member who put this motion to resolve the issue are well known and she deserves the support of all members of this House. However, certain important aspects of her proposal are unacceptable to the Government of Canada because unanimity has not been achieved among the principal parties involved.

The federal government and the residents of the two communities do not want a repeat of the events of 1990. We must enable the two communities to work together at re-establishing harmony.

I want to recap quickly a few facts to demonstrate for members on all sides of the House the progress that has been made since that time. Indeed during the summer of 1990 the government purchased, in two stages, the entire 106 acres of land necessary to launch the lands unification project at Kanesatake. The government acquired the land to put an end to the crisis and to demonstrate its good-will with respect to the principal claims of the Mohawks of Kanesatake.

In October 1990 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development held a series of talks with representatives from Kanesatake to discuss ways of settling the issues that remain unresolved in their community.

In November 1990 the minister announced the start of negotiations with the Kanesatake negotiating committee, negotiations that were aimed at establishing a unified territory for the community of Kanesatake, solving long-standing grievances concerning the seigneury of Lac de Deux Montagnes; ensuring housing, the necessary community infrastructures and economic development and formulating an agreement concerning self-government.

In February 1991 the Government of Canada and the Coalition of Mohawks of Kanesatake agreed to the schedule for land negotiations. The following April, in view of the growing dispute over whether the Mohawk Coalition of Kanesatake represented the community, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced that a plebiscite would be held to determine the type of government the community wanted. After the plebiscite an election was held and Jerry Peltier was declared the Grand Chief. Upon being elected, he was given the task of developing an elections code that would serve as the foundation for electing a permanent council for Kanesatake.

The Minister of State then asked the federal negotiator to meet with members of the new council as soon as possible to discuss the procedure for resolving grievances concerning land.

In October the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development tabled in the House the government's response to the report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs called The Summer of 1990.

In April 1991 the Prime Minister announced the establishment of a royal commission on aboriginal peoples. At the same time he announced new initiatives on specific land claims shortly before the publication of the report. With respect to the policy on land claims, significant changes have occurred aimed at accelerating the process of settling both specific and comprehensive claims.

The specific claims commission was established as part of the initiatives announced by the Prime Minister and will provide an independent mechanism for resolving conflicts. The commission was also given the mandate to handle arbitration at the request of the parties concerned.

Specific land claims whose origins predate Confederation have now been approved for review and a process for expediting the settlement of small claims has been set up. With regard to comprehensive claims, the government has lifted the limit of six for the number of claims that could be negotiated simultaneously.

These are some of the measures taken by the government to clearly demonstrate that aboriginal issues are at the forefront of governmental concerns.

Colleagues will also recall that the committee recommended that the Government of Canada ensure that the Six Nations Confederacy be involved and consulted in seeking a solution of the issue of administration at Kanesatake. The committee indicated, and rightly so, that it was primarily up to the citizens of Kanesatake to resolve this issue.

The Government of Canada is promoting mechanisms through which residents of the community can make their own choices concerning the type of political representation they want.

The committee also recommended that the government consult with the parties about the creation of a process for resolving conflicts between municipalities and Mohawk authorities over land use issues. It recommended the appointment of a mediator to facilitate discussions on land use, and among other things, zoning, and the appointment of an arbitrator to make binding decisions where mediation and negotiation have failed.

At the end of the 1990 conflict, the federal government appointed a negotiator to resume negotiations with the community on land issues. The negotiating table remains the forum where the Canadian government will negotiate with the band council in order to consider and resolve the community's other concerns.

Colleagues will recall that one of the main causes of the dispute in the summer of 1990 was the Mohawk claim to land known as the pines. The land was part of a municipal park and was adjacent to a municipal golf course which the municipality was planning to expand. This land was not for sale and up to that point the municipality had no intention of parting with it. In order to address the issue we have sought innovative solutions.

Last month the Minister of State announced details of the federal proposal aimed at resolving certain concerns of the residents of Oka and Kanesatake regarding lands. Under the proposal, the government is recommending the purchase of property south of highway 344 which will be exchanged with the municipality of the village of Oka for wooded land belonging to the municipality located west of the existing golf course and which was at the heart of the 1990 conflict.

This constitutes a fair and equitable solution likely to satisfy all parties involved. On the one hand, Mohawks will obtain land situated in the pines which are of great cultural importance; on the other hand, the municipality of the village of Oka will take possession of land which it could use to benefit the community. The initiative is one which is very likely to advance the issue of land unification at Kanesatake.

It is essential that the land at Kanesatake be continuous and not contain any enclaves. Only a few examples exist of aboriginal land that is so spread out. This type of land configuration makes both community living and economic development difficult. Joining the pines to the land already acquired by this federal government is in step with unification of this land.

Among the key elements of the proposal of the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau is the creation of a body that would be responsible for informing the entire population, native and non-native, of the federal government's plans on all issues of interest to the two communities, principally that of land acquisitions.

I would join colleagues on both sides of the House in applauding the recent announcement by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau concerning the establishment of the federal information office in Oka-Kanesatake. The presence of an office such as this in the community will contribute significantly to improving relations between the region's native and non-native communities.

The office will fulfil two objectives of the federal government. First, Public Works Canada officers need a location to conduct business when they are discussing purchases with land owners. Second, a liaison officer will be on site to inform all parties concerned of the advances being made by the government in the land unification project.

This information will be provided once a decision has been made at the negotiating table. Certain segments of the population of Kanesatake have called for the office to be closed. Following discussions the band council agrees that the government should act openly and promptly with the residents of both communities on the land issue. We believe that this office can play an important role in this regard. It must therefore remain open and proceed with its mandate.

• (1150)

In conclusion, after hearing this brief overview, I am sure colleagues will agree that significant progress has been made on the Oka-Kanesatake issue. But negotiations currently under way must continue. There must be no new delays; the entire population is calling for action. People in the area are anxious for the land unification project to be completed, as this will end the cloud of uncertainty hanging over the community.

The government has made a commitment to move ahead while taking into consideration the interests of aboriginal peoples and non-aboriginals in the region. We must continue in the direction in which we started. The future of an entire region of Quebec and Canada is at stake.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the proposal presented by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau, especially since I was astonished when I heard the hon. member for Western Arctic accuse my colleague of having a conflict of interest. That is the kind of comment which since 1990 and shortly before has led to the endless wrangling that has been going on in the area. I would have expected the hon. member for Western Arctic to be more diplomatic and more aware of what is going on in this part of Quebec.

The motion presented by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau reads as follows:

> —the government should consider the advisability of creating the Société immobilière Oka-Kanesatake (SIOK) and to transfer to the Société the budget already allocated by Treasury Board for the purposes of negotiating there unification of lands at Oka-Kanesatake.

As a member of this House, I feel I must congratulate the hon. member on her efforts since 1990 to find a solution to the problem of land reunification in Oka-Kanesatake. Her proposal includes a number of very interesting aspects which deserve further study. For instance, I welcome her suggestion to create a unit that will be responsible for informing the people of Oka-Kanesatake about the federal government's plans.

In fact, since the end of the crisis, the people in these two communities have had no mechanism for getting information on what is happening and how their interests are being defended. As a result, there is a lot of misunderstanding and disagreement which is certainly not conducive to restoring good relations between aboriginal and non-aboriginal communities in the region.

In fact, I was delighted when the hon. member announced a few weeks ago that an information office, staffed by Public Works Canada, would open its doors. I think this office will be extremely helpful in disseminating information to both communities. In this way, any false rumours that might upset the normal negotiating process for the reunification of Kanesatake lands could be defused immediately.

By opening this office, the government has made it clear it is concerned about the well-being of the aboriginal and non-aboriginal population. Last year the health minister announced several initiatives that would be helpful to the local economy. Funds were allocated to stimulate the region's tourism industry.

The proposal by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau to create a unit consisting of representatives of all parties concerned to manage the land acquisition process would nevertheless cause serious problems. It would also cause additional delay in settling the land claims issue.

The lands reunification and acquisition process is starting to show some interesting results. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has asked Public Works Canada to start negotiations with non-aboriginal property owners who want to sell their property. A number of purchase offers have already been made and others will be made very shortly.

Incidentally, the entire process is based on mutual agreement, and no property owner will be expropriated by the federal government.

Members on both sides of the House are aware that the piece of land referred to as the pines is very important to the Mohawks. It is important to them both culturally and as part of their heritage.

For the village of Oka, however, this happens to be a park next to the municipal golf club.

We know that ownership of this land was the focus of the various events of the 1990 crisis. The Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development recently made a very important and innovative announcement concerning these lands.

Under this proposal, the village of Oka will acquire certain properties south of highway 344 in exchange for the pine grove. This is a fair and reasonable solution that would enable the municipality to acquire land to use as it sees fit. At the same time, it will allow the Kanesatake Mohawks to obtain the pine grove that they say they want so much. That is another important step in resolving the grievances related to land unification in Kanesatake.

As I said before, more progress is being made at the negotiating table. It is up to the parties involved to inform the public about it. That is why I believe that the proposal from my colleague, the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau, is unacceptable in its present form. Furthermore, it implies that the municipality and village of Oka would have their say in managing the land that the Kanesatake Mohawks consider their own.

I am convinced that this proposal is completely unacceptable for the native people concerned. Everyone yearns for the land unification issue to be settled quickly. We must all ensure that this matter is resolved as soon as possible. We cannot afford more delay in unifying the land at Kanesatake, and the negotiating process begun by Public Works Canada must not be impeded. We must not encourage real estate speculation in Oka, nor can the negotiating process be dragged out because property values for the present owners would go down even more.

The federal government is committed to offering purchase prices that would reflect the circumstances that these property owners had to face. They will receive fair and reasonable offers.

Mr. Speaker, we owe it to our constituents to work to restore harmony between the two communities. Let us therefore give the present process time to take its course.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since no more members wish to speak, the time provided for Private Members' Business has now expired.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

BILL C-63

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have given verbal notice to my colleagues in the respective parties with regard to a point of order concerning Bill C-63.

It was given first reading on March 10, 1992. I believe that this bill is out of order, and as the Chair hears my submission I think it will become obvious why I am making this particular point.

I do so before the bill is introduced for second reading, Mr. Speaker. I will allude to remarks made by one of your predecessors who indicated quite clearly that perhaps when making an intervention of this nature it ought to be done shortly after the first reading but certainly before second reading of the substantive part of the bill.

Standing Order 68(3) states:

> No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

I suggest that Bill C-63 is in breach of that particular standing order.

Point of Order

In the budget the Government of Canada announced that for reasons of economy it planned to close a number of government agencies. A number of these are merely of an administrative nature and lend themselves to being folded into other agencies doing similar work. Others, however, are distinctive agencies performing distinctive public functions.

Bill C-63 is intended to give legislative authority to the government's announcement with regard to six agencies performing, in my view, distinctive functions.

• (1200)

Bill C-63's long title, an act to dissolve or to terminate certain corporations or other bodies, is intended to mask the real complexities of the bill. It puts forward the fiction that the bill is merely a cost cutting measure eliminating a bunch of redundant or archaic agencies while in fact, when one examines the bill, it reveals that while it does wind up some agencies thereby saving some money, it also makes major substantive changes to public policy with regard to the role of government.

Very briefly I think it should be noted that one of the agencies in Bill C-63 that I referred to is the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, and obviously the minister responsible therein would be the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It has consequential effects with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The statutes would be amended there.

The second agency which has been referred to is the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. The minister responsible would be the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Again that particular section would have consequential effects on the Access to Information Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Privacy Act, and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Another agency is the Economic Council of Canada. The minister responsible there would be the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It too has a number of acts which would be affected in consequence thereof: access to information, schedule II to the Financial Administration Act, schedule III of the Municipal Grants Act, and the schedule to the Privacy Act is amended.

Point of Order

The fourth agency is the International Centre for Ocean Development. Again the minister in this particular instance is the Minister for External Relations, which is different from the previous one.

The fifth agency is the Law Reform Commission of Canada. I might add that under the International Centre for Ocean Development, when one reads that statute, the consequential effects are to the Financial Administration Act, particularly part 1 of schedule III, as well as the International Centre for Ocean Development, the act itself.

Under the Law Reform Commission of Canada there are a number of statutes, some of which I have already referred to, that would be duly affected as a result. The minister in this particular instance would be the Minister of Justice.

The final one is the Science Council of Canada. The minister responsible would be the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Again a number of statutes would be affected, namely schedule I of the Access to Information Act, schedule II of the Financial Administration Act, schedule III of the Municipal Grants Act, the schedule of the Privacy Act, part 2 of schedule I of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and part 1 of schedule I of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

The bill amends or repeals statutes affecting six agencies. If properly drafted, the long title would indicate its purpose of terminating specific agencies by name. This would of course uncover the real purpose of the bill: in the guise of cutting costs and eliminating some redundant bodies, to eliminate a number of government agencies that in the course of effectively carrying out their responsibilities have become thorns in the government's side.

I refer to your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Lucien Lamoureux, who was reported at page 284 of the House Debates on January 26, 1971. We were talking about an omnibus bill, and this clearly is an omnibus bill affecting six different agencies. I quote:

> However, where do we stop? Where is the point of no return? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West, said that we might reach the point where we would have only one bill, a bill at the start of the session for the improvement of the quality of life in Canada which would include every single proposed piece of legislation for the session. That would be an omnibus bill with a capital "O" and a capital "B". But would it be acceptable legislation? There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

As I alluded to at the outset of my remarks, Mr. Lamoureux said that the most appropriate time in which to raise a point of order of this nature was after first reading but certainly before second reading. I believe in that same judgment you would hear him say the following words:

> —it is much easier for the government to go back to the legislative mill, to the judicial luminaries of the Department of Justice where the bills are prepared, for the consideration of Parliament. If I may say so, I think that even those very learned gentlemen should take into account the fact that this aspect of legislation is of interest to all hon. members, of interest I am sure to the government, and certainly of interest to the Chair, namely, that there must be a point where an omnibus bill becomes more than an omnibus bill and is not acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Superficially the principle of the bill, as the government purports, is to reduce the cost of government. In reality, however, it raises the principle—and I want to underline this—of maintaining the Economic Council as an independent advisory body on economy planning, the Science Council on scientific planning, the Law Reform Commission on the administration of justice, the Employment and Immigration Council, the Peace and Security Institute, and the International Centre for Ocean Development within their own areas of specialization.

It raises the question of the role of government in developing independent points of view to assist in long-term policy development. These are principles, I suggest, which are far different from that of the economic operation of the Government of Canada. Furthermore, each agency differs in its scope from the next, which means that the considerations involved are certainly far different.

Thus, in effect Bill C-63 raises not one but at least in my view six different principles. The umbrella of cost cutting may well apply to a number of agencies involved, but there are at least six agencies that raise such independent issues of public policy that they ought to be considered in separate bills.

The objection to the omnibus bills is based on the fact that it is repugnant, confusing and unparliamentary to ask the House to declare itself in one division on a motion that in effect embraces many principles.

Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 703, which is now citation 626 of the sixth edition, talks about the form of a bill. It reads:

> Although there is no specific set of rules or guidelines governing the content of a bill, there should be a theme of relevancy amongst the contents of the bill. They must be relevant to and subject to the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title of the bill.

I suggest that these are six separate, and I use the word with great respect, distinctive mandates. How anyone could think that there is a realm of relevancy when one reads the long title of the statute is beyond the comprehension of this particular reader.

On May 6, 1971, as reported in the Journals at page 532, the Chair went on to say: "It follows of course there should be a theme of relevancy between the contents of a bill. They must be relevant to the subject of the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title. It is of course a matter of judgment", and I underline that for the Chair, "in each case as to when a bill offends to the point that it should be ruled as unacceptable because it contains disparate matters in the same bill".

My colleague, the distinguished member from Calgary, the government House leader, on a previous occasion in March 1982 rose on a point of order on a similar matter. I wish to quote him from Hansard at page 15481 where he rose on a point of order with regard to the omnibus bill, Bill C-94, which was introduced by the government of the day. He objected to it and rose on a point of order. I wish to quote some of the things he said, as reported on that particular page at March 1, 1982:

> The government might argue, Madam Speaker, that this bill flows from the National Energy Program and that provides the necessary relevancy. To begin with, that would not strictly be true. While most of the items were mentioned in the National Energy Program, there are parts of this bill which do not flow from the National Energy Program. They are separate.
> Secondly, and more importantly, if that argument is to be given any weight then one clearly would have to accept the principle that a single bill could be brought in covering all intended legislation for a session, rationalized on the basis that all its component parts flow from the throne speech which commenced the session.

That was the government House leader on March 1, 1982. Then he goes on to say:

> Presumably the government will also argue that the component parts have to do with energy and thus that provides the theme of relevancy to the bill. Well, Madam Speaker, to begin with, all the component parts do not deal with energy. However, if that argument were put I would only say that to accept it would be to accept that would be satisfactory to bring in a single bill covering income tax, excise tax, appropriations, borrowing authority, and for that matter unemployment insurance, since all of these deal with money. If that is the theme, then we could have that kind of grouping.

So you see, the government House leader in a previous incarnation rose in this House and stated some very important aspects of the omnibus bill in terms of its being acceptable to the House.

Just because some of these agencies have been cut as the government says for monetary reasons—and I do not necessarily concur—you can clearly see that it certainly interferes greatly with the public policy process. It interferes with how government interfaces with different agencies and how government obtains its information in order to make the decisions which it believes to be important.

Another aspect that I want to raise with you is that if this Bill C-63 is going to be accepted at second reading, one has to remember that in paragraph 659 of the sixth edition of Beauchesne, it says:

> The second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass; for its whole principle is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House. It is not regular on this occasion, however, to discuss in detail the clauses of the bill.

So you see, we are going to be dealing with a bill covering six substantive agencies, all of which are very, very different. They are different in their mandate and different in terms of the ministers they report to. We will have a debate on second reading on six different principles. I suggest that amendments would be very difficult to put in place in terms of making them acceptable at the report stage thereafter. So I bring that to the attention of the Chair as well.

I want to conclude by quoting the government House leader again, this from page 15482 of Hansard on March 1, 1982. I might add this is the very distinguished member from Calgary. He is the government House leader and the individual who many of us, particularly on the government side, look to for leadership in terms of the legislative agenda. But this is what the hon. member said on that particular day:

> The fact that the principle of the bill is established and concurred in at second reading very seriously proscribes the types of amendments which might further be put to the House. Hence, we have the double dilemma of the impossibility of having a second reading vote on a bill which contains so many disparate principles, as well as the very serious difficulty in which the Chair would be placed in trying to ascertain what types of amendments are acceptable or not during further stages of a bill's consideration.

I think the hon. member opposite when he made that intervention in March of 1982 was not thinking of what would happen on March 30, 1992 in terms of this particular bill.

In summary, and I hope others will make interventions, I would argue that Bill C-63 has six different agencies, substantive agencies, all of which provide information to the government through different ministers, whose role and mandate is to interface with the Government of Canada, to provide it with information and, at times, opposing information to the views that the government may be pursuing. I suggest that it would be very difficult under the auspices of relevancy to be able to carry on a substantive debate at second reading. I suggest that it would be very difficult, if not next to impossible, to implement or put forward amendments which would be acceptable to the Chair.

Finally, I think it is time, if I may be permitted to use some personal language here, that the Chair recognize what is going on here. The government is holding Parliament, not up to ransom, but certainly holding us in somewhat of a disrepute in the sense that it just thinks it can come in any old time, slap a bill before the House for first reading, whether it covers four, five or six different agencies, and expect those of us in the opposition to merely nod our heads and proceed as usual. I do not think that is fair and I do not think that is appropriate. I would say to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, who has tried to carve out a reputation and, in some instances, he has been successful as a reformist within Parliament and as a procedural person, that it is not fair or appropriate for the government to proceed with Bill C-63.

I want to thank the Chair for giving me the opportunity to make this intervention. I hope the Chair will reflect upon what I have said and perhaps will give due consideration, as the Chair always does, to colleagues on the other side as well as my distinguished colleague from Kamloops who no doubt will be making a reasoned, thoughtful, persuasive argument as he normally does.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will listen to the hon. member for Kamloops on his persuasive argument.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say right from the outset that I think this is a most critical issue that my hon. colleague has raised this morning. For many of us it is a bit of déjà vu because, as my colleague has indicated, I remember back in 1982 when our friend from Calgary was in the opposition and led a very, very tough debate and discussion around this issue dealing with the National Energy Program. As a matter of fact, it was the infamous 16 days of bell ringing and so on. It was one one of those special debates on these special issues.

Here we are once again attempting to make the point with the Chair, which at that time was made in the end successfully, to suggest that Bill C-63 is a bill that is very difficult to deal with as we would normally deal with a bill today at second reading because, as my hon. friend has indicated, second reading is the time when we discuss the principle of the bill.

When I saw this, I asked myself what is the principle of this bill. Is it dealing with employment and immigration matters because when you abandon the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council of course that is a major policy shift on the government in terms of changing that. Or is it to deal with Science Council issues? Again, when you wind up the Science Council of Canada you are making a major policy decision in the science area. Is the principle of the bill dealing with international peace and security which of course it does deal with. Does it deal with a whole variety of economic issues that the Economic Council of Canada has dealt with over the years?

It is perplexing because, as a responsible member of Parliament, one wants to debate the bill at second reading. One wants to debate the principle of the bill. I cannot determine what the principle of this bill is because it deals with a whole pot-pourri of different areas.

• (1220)

This poses a dilemma. This, obviously, is an omnibus bill. It deals with employment and immigration, international peace and security, economic issues. It deals with ocean development. It refers to the Law Reform Commission and all of the work that that commission does, as well as the Science Council of Canada.

To proceed at this point, at second reading, obviously poses a serious dilemma. My hon. colleague has referred back. I will not refer to the references that he has quoted. I do not think it is necessary. I want to cast our minds back to that very critical debate in 1982 regarding energy policy.

There the position was made very clearly that unless we break up an omnibus bill of this nature and deal with the component parts independently and properly, this will set a very, very important precedent. If we are simply saying that in one bill you can deal with immigration issues, employment issues, ocean issues, science issues, economic issues and so on and so forth, are we not getting perilously close to the day when we simply say: "Here is the omnibus bill of the session of Parliament dealing with taxation, agriculture, forestry and a whole variety of areas. We will debate this one bill, and that will be it".

In other words, Parliament might last then for a whole session for a matter of hours or days, depending on the interest of the government in using closure.

I look across the aisle and I see the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader who I know, on balance, is a reasonable individual. I am sure he will participate in this debate. When the government introduced in the budget the fact that it was going to close these agencies—it is the right of the government to do that—we thought it was wrong-headed at the time and we still do. Again, this government has done a number of things. Most of the things it has done are wrong-headed in our estimation, but it has the right to do them. It indicated that it was going to close these government agencies.

Little did we ever anticipate that it would do this in one fell swoop. It minimized the debate. This is where I appeal to my hon. friend across the way, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader who knows how important it is that we debate issues thoroughly and properly in this House and that to do the job under the normal time allocations we have to debate issues. We know that his hon. friend, the House leader for the government, is going to suggest that we deal with this within a day or two.

We are winding up some very critical agencies. If we are going to do that, the government ought to at least have the courage to debate openly the wisdom of winding up the Science Council of Canada. Scientists and others who are knowledgeable about the way the economy is going in the 1990s and toward the year 2000 tell us that science and science policy will play a critical role.

Is this the time to wrap up the Science Council of Canada? Is it the time to close down the Economic Council of Canada? The government says "yes". I suspect that unanimously, the opposition will say "no". That then, should be the basis of a thorough, open and complete debate.

We all know that this will not take place. If this omnibus bill is allowed to proceed as it is presently composed, that debate will not be forthcoming. It will be muzzled. There will not be adequate opportunity for people to participate in sharing their views on these critical areas.

I join with my friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition in saying that we too would support the notion of dividing up Bill C-63 to allow open, proper and complete debate on the winding up of these critical government agencies which we think is a serious departure in terms of past government policy. We feel that it deserves that type of open debate.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to basically add a few remarks in support of the point of order by the previous speakers. The budget, by way of an example that is useful, proposes to amalgamate two agencies called the External Review Committee of the RCMP and the RCMP Public Complaints Commission. To do that by way of an omnibus bill would really be a detrimental situation. The RCMP Public Complaints Commissions is an agency that has just commenced. It is an extremely busy agency. In the area I represent, it has had a large number of complaints put forward against a very small number of individuals. Yet those complaints are occurring across Canada. We have the situations of David Marshall, Wilson Nepoose and David Milgaard. We have had numerous examples of where the public must have access to the complaint system. There must be a mechanism to debate any of those changes in the RCMP Act in the House of Commons.

Point of Order

The commission has asked for 41 changes to the legislation to strengthen and improve the national police force in Canada. It would be a serious error to jam this through without debate by way of an omnibus bill.

Hopefully the government will reconsider this position and allow these issues to be debated individually because of their importance to Canadians.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to respond to the interventions of my friends opposite. They have made some interesting, not particularly new arguments but arguments that I think are worth spending a little time on.

I am advised from across the aisle that these were arguments that were used by the government House leader on a previous occasion. I am sure he would be very much flattered by the fact that his arguments were once again presented in this House and people quoted them with great authority and great enthusiasm.

Mr. Dingwall: But in a much more coherent fashion.

Mr. Cooper: It is certainly arguable as to whether or not the original argument was better put than the references made to them today. I leave that in your hands, Mr. Speaker.

However, the intriguing thing is, no matter how good those arguments were that my colleague the government House leader made several years ago, they were not good enough. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that what happened was that the Speaker of the day ruled that in spite of the compelling arguments that he made, he did not win the day.

We are in a similar circumstance today. There is nothing precedent setting about the discussion here today. In fact, one of the Speakers said in the past, Madam Sauve, I believe it was, in a very brief one paragraph ruling: "There is no point in me going through all the precedents we have here. The bottom line is that the tradition on a bill if it is called an omnibus bill is that the House has been able to proceed with that particular piece of legislation".

Therefore, there is nothing new here today. There is nothing new at all. What I need to do, just to make sure the record is set straight, is to spend a few moments refuting some of those arguments.

First of all, this is the particular bill we are talking about, Bill C–63. My friends have described it as an omnibus bill. It is not a great big thick document. It is eight pages long.

An hon. member: Short and sweet.

Mr. Cooper: Short and sweet. It accomplishes a very simple task. If we look at Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 192, citation 626, and I quote:

> (1) Although there is no specific set of rules or guidelines governing the content of a bill, there should be a theme of relevancy amongst the contents of a bill. They must be relevant to and subject to the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title of the bill.

The umbrella of this particular legislation was made very clear in the budget. It indicated very clearly that the government planned to dissolve or terminate a number of corporations and other bodies for a central theme, being the ability to cut government expenditures and, therefore, as much as possible relieve the burden on the Canadian taxpayers and to reduce the stress and pressure of the very difficult debt situation we are facing in this country. That is the umbrella.

What is the title of the bill? What does the title say? It is very simple: an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies. Citation 627 of Beauchesne's sixth edition states:

• (1230)

> A bill may have two titles, one long and one short. Both the long title and the short title may be amended, if amendments to the bill make it necessary.
> (1) Long title—The long title sets out in general terms the purposes of the bill. It should cover everything in the bill.

I think it is very clear that the title of this particular bill does just that. It says very clearly, "an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies". The title is consistent with Beauchesne and with our practices in the past and I would argue so is the bill.

I want to refer again to Beauchesne's sixth edition, the most recent edition of our procedural bible, if I can call it that, citation 634, page 194:

> Nevertheless, the practice of using one bill to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related subjects, while a matter of concern—

As has been generated by arguments that we have heard today and other arguments in the past, and this is the operative part:

> —is an issue on which the Speaker will not intervene to divide the bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is a long tradition, there is a long history, and the Speaker's position has consistently been the same; the Speaker will not intervene.

I do not think we are dealing with an omnibus bill here. We are dealing with an eight-page document that is designed to terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

Even if it were an omnibus bill, Mr. Speaker, and as I say, I am not prepared to concede that it is, I want to refer you to the Lamoureux decisions, page 434. The question before Speaker Lamoureux that day was: can an omnibus bill be considered by the House or should the Speaker order that it be divided? The decision was very clear. The bill can receive second reading in its existing form. In other words, Mr. Speaker, even if it were an omnibus bill, it could proceed.

I want to refer to the reasons given by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux because I think they are very important. I quote:

> The government has followed a practice that has been accepted, rightly or wrongly, in the past.

This ruling was given on January 26, 1971, 21 years ago, Mr. Speaker. It is already saying very clearly the government has followed a practice that has been accepted from our past:

> The bill will be allowed to proceed despite the possible difficulties presented by omnibus legislation. Although a legitimate complaint or grievance can be raised with respect to omnibus bills, it is not clear that a legitimate procedural argument can be made.

It states:

> The House should note, however, that there is a third reading stage—

And it goes on and on. The bottom line is very clear. Speaker Lamoureux and other Speakers before and after him have made it very clear that they cannot or will not intervene to stop a bill or to divide a bill because there is in this House a long tradition of accepting those bills.

I want to read into the record a ruling by Speaker Fraser on June 8, 1988 on an omnibus question when he was faced with a similar argument and I quote:

> In conclusion, the Canadian practice regarding the authority of the Chair to divide questions has been reserved solely for substantive motions which contain more than one proposition, where members object to their being taken together, and the Chair has determined it is possible to divide the motion into more than one distinct proposition.

He then goes on to refer to Speaker Sauve's ruling. This is her ruling:

> For my part, in the present circumstances, there seems little point in offering yet another opinion on a question so well addressed by my distinguished predecessors. The matter is there for all to see. It may be that the House should accept rules or guidelines as to the form and content of omnibus bills but in that case the House, not the Speaker, must make those rules.

In other words, she gave a short, one paragraph argument saying no. There is ample precedent for omnibus bills in this House and the Speaker has never ever intervened to split them.

He then goes on to say:

> The Chair therefore must rule that Bill C-130 is an omnibus bill. It has the single purpose of enacting an international agreement amending several statutes. As such it conforms to our practice and should be allowed to proceed.
> Until the House adopts specific rules relating to omnibus bills, the Chair's role is very limited and the Speaker should remain on the sidelines as debate proceeds and the House resolves the issue.

We have taken a fair amount of time from the House today, not to hear a new argument but to hear an old one. Mr. Speaker, I argue before you that the conclusion should be the same as it has always been. First of all I do not accept that this is an omnibus bill, but that is almost irrelevant because in fact even if it were an omnibus bill, it is a bill that is totally within the guidelines of the House of Commons and we have every right as a House to deal with that issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would not have expected the government to use such clumsy arguments to defend a proposed bill, Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies, namely the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the International Centre for Ocean Development, and many agencies and commissions which we feel, Mr.

Speaker, all fill different needs. There is nothing in common between the work of the Employment and Immigration Advisory Council and that of the Economic Council or the Science Council.

But now the government is putting forward a bill to simply eliminate these institutions, which is a rather broad and indefinite principle. This initiative leaves a lot to be desired because, if we refer to the parliamentary rules of procedure, we can see that on second reading only the principle of the bill can be debated. In this case, the principle defined by speakers from the government side to date remains rather blurred and unclear.

I would like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to Speaker Lamoureux's rulings, on page 107.

[English]

I go to Mr. Lamoureux's statement in regard to the principle of a bill at second reading and I read "the issue at second reading can by particular provisions in a bill be debated and if a decision is no, the principle of a bill can be debated but not particular provisions".

The reasons given by the Speaker is that when a motion for second reading is before the House, the House may debate in a general way the principle of the bill but not the clauses in detail. They and the schedules should be debated at another stage.

Mr. Speaker, it is going to be quite difficult to debate the principle of this bill which is strictly to terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

In debate will we be able to give our viewpoint on the Economic Council of Canada and try to make the case that the principle of abolishing, disbanding that council is wrong? Mr. Speaker, you will have to make up an imaginative debate to try and prevent some of us on this side of the House at least from doing that. Otherwise it will for nought.

The parliamentary secretary said that this is not an omnibus bill. I do not know what the heck an omnibus bill is if this is not an omnibus bill. It covers a whole series of things. It has an approach which is common to a series of uncommon and unrelated agencies. The only common thread to the whole bill is that they are abolishing them, they are closing them down, they are, in their own words, terminating certain corporations. So the termination is the principle of the bill. The others, whether they are important or not, are not to be discussed.

• (1240)

When the parliamentary secretary for the government House leader spoke, he read from page 194 of Beauchesne, citation 634. He did not read the first phrase, he missed it. He read the last phrase. I want to put into the record all of the citation:

> Speakers have expressed deep concern about the use of omnibus bills, and have suggested that there must be "a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint". (Debates, January 26, 1971, p. 2768.)

There is a point beyond which this House must not be taken for granted in debating bills at second reading. I was here when the Tories objected to the energy bill. I was here when they rang the bell for two weeks in protest. I was here when they contested, opposed and protested the decision of the government and of the Speaker to deal with the bill in 1982. I did not think the opposition was making a very convincing argument at the time. They opposed at that time something which today they are doing. They are not being very consistent.

I do not want to prolong the debate, but let me say that there are certain things in our rules and procedures that need to be looked at. Whether this is called an omnibus bill or not I do not think is relevant. This is a bill touching on a variety of agencies and institutions of Parliament. The only purpose of the bill flows from a budget announcement some months ago where the government announced that it would abandon or close or terminate the existence of these corporations, these bodies.

I take exception to that. I do not think this bill is appropriate in its present form. I do think that every one of those agencies, whether it is Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, or the agency that collects facts and figures for the government so that it can negotiate decently with the other agencies, the Pay Research Bureau has merit. The Pay Research Bureau is something which, in my view, we need. How can I argue for the maintenance of the Pay Research Bureau—

An hon. member: How can you make amendments?

Mr. Gauthier: How can I make amendments to that, short of proposing that the Pay Research Bureau be deleted from the bill? That is the only thing I can do. I cannot talk about the merits of the Pay Research Bureau although I think the government needs a Pay Research Bureau to give it up-to-date negotiating information in terms of compensation packages that are paid in the private sector. So it is going to be very difficult. How do I amend, for example, the fact that I believe that the Economic Council of Canada was doing a good job? I cannot amend that because all it says in here is that we are passing a bill to terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the point to be made is that it restricts the opposition, it restricts parliamentarians' rights to really go into the substance, the principle at hand and to go into debating rationally and logically the principle before us.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will take this under advisement and come back to us with a ruling at some time and that you will rule in our favour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to rule now but I am afraid that I cannot. I think there is a lot to consider here. I first wish to take the opportunity to thank the hon. leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader for their arguments.

I think there is a lot to consider here and I would like to take it under advisement. If you will permit me I shall do that and we will carry on with debate today on C-21.

Before I call C-21, I would like to say to hon. members that motions Nos. 4 and 6 are grouped for debate and a vote on No. 4 applies to No. 6.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEBT SERVICING AND ACCOUNT REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, March 27, consideration of Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-21 be amended by adding immediately after line 17 at page 3 the following new clause:

"7. To the extent that there is a credit balance in the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account, there may be charged to the Account in a fiscal year an amount in respect of any budgetary expenditure that, if it were not charged to the Account, would increase the deficit of the government in that year."

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 7 by striking out line 18 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"8. Except as provided by section 5, 6 or 7, no".-

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to participate in this debate. I suppose anybody listening would wonder what on earth this was all about with cutting out lines x and y and so on. Let me simplify this and put it into normal language.

This bill is what we in the opposition have been calling a smoke and mirrors bill. This bill gives the illusion that the government is concerned about how this GST is being utilized and the selling off of Crown corporations. It is trying to create the image that this is being used to pay down the deficit and reduce the debt in order to regain some popular support.

We all know around here and anywhere else in the country that you do not need a special bill or special legislation if you want to pay down the deficit and the debt. It is simply a matter of having the political will to do that and taking the necessary steps. However, I understand my friends on the government side. If I was taking all that heat on the GST while knowing how Canadians feel about it, I suspect that I would be trying to pull some kind of smoke screen. Well, that is probably not true, but I can understand why government members would do that.

The government is saying that if there are net surpluses as a result of the GST at the end, which of course there will be, this will be automatically applied to deficit reduction and debt reduction. A surplus would be when all the money from the GST is collected and all the rebates are paid out and all the costs and so on are paid back.

If governments want to do that, are certainly capable and able to do that without special legislation, but let us pause for a moment to look at the role of government. The point of government is to collect revenues from a variety of sources through taxes, excise taxes and so on, and then invest them in ways to enhance the country and the lives of its citizens. We call things like that unemployment insurance. Traditionally, we call it unemployment insurance. We also call these things pensions, hospitals, medicare, education, highways and so on.

In other words the reason why we have millions of people wanting to become Canadian citizens is because of the kind of society and the kinds of agencies and organizations that have been created over the years. I cannot think of a single progressive economic or social policy that did not originate with either the CCF or the NDP. They have been introduced by other governments, to be fair, such as Liberal governments and Conservative governments. The ideas, however, came from the New Democrats and the CCF and it is what makes Canada a special place today.

We have seen the erosion of that over the last number of years. The point being debated by this motion was put by my hon. friend the member for Essex—Windsor. Unfortunately, because he was busy elsewhere on Friday, the amendment came in my name and was introduced. I must give him credit for having thought through this in significant detail to enable us to have this debate today.

What we are simply saying is this. If there are net revenues after the GST, should 100 per cent of these revenues be used to pay down the deficit or the debt?

We are simply saying that we should keep some options open. I could make a very strong case today, as others have, that some of that money could be used for retraining programs for those individuals in the country who, through no fault of their own, have lost their jobs because of the free trade agreement, because of the GST and other federal government policies. They have lost their employment and their source of income for their families and they ought to be retrained. We ought to be doing an awful lot more in this area.

Why not use some of this money to facilitate people taking courses and retraining programs? I do not hear any reasons why not. I say that might be a particular use of some of those GST funds.

We might consider the fact that there are 1.5 million people out of work today who could be using financing and funding for retraining and upgrading their particular skills. Also, what about giving some support to various enterprises and co-operatives, and so on, to create new enterprises and new employment. There is all sorts of material that we have elaborated on before: reforestation program, silviculture programs, bank stabilization programs to list only a handful. These are meaningful areas into which people could be put to work.

Perhaps the most obvious one that has been put forward by the Canadian Association of Municipalities and by the premiers now of most provinces is that we have deteriorating roads, bridges, water and sewage systems that need to be repaired or upgraded or created. My friend from Manitoba just returned from a major tour throughout northern Manitoba visiting Indian reserves. The appalling situation is that that virtually all of the native people living in that part of Canada have no water system or sewage treatment system. That is absolutely disgraceful in a country as rich and wealthy as Canada.

We are saying why not use some of that GST money to assist the provinces and the municipalities of Canada to develop that municipal infrastructure that has to be done. This is not a sort of make work project when you have to rebuild a bridge or a road or a water system. It is something that has to be done. Can you think of a better time to do it than right now?

It would put people to work, encourage manufacturing, and send a very clear signal that this government is concerned and prepared to take action on a fairly major scale.

Mr. McDermid: We are doing that.

Mr. Riis: My friend says the government is doing that. I see woefully little evidence of that. I am saying what the premiers said: "Let us fight this war on unemployment. Let us fight this war on poverty by taking some major action".

This is one use of this GST surplus fund that could be directed in that direction.

We could talk about child care and the fact that there are hundreds of thousands of children in this country who are in desperate need of decent child care. Single parents have to work. Both parents have to work. Parents have to work late in the day and commute long distances and so on. Children are at home on their own. We all know the scenarios. We need to have more emphasis put on child care to allow those families to move forward positively.

I could stand here and go on all day listing point after point of all of the things people feel we ought to be doing today. I could go on saying that the revenues from the GST could be earmarked for those kinds of programs. It is sort of evident and rather obvious for most Canadians. I think Canadians, on balance, would buy the fact if we said: "Listen, the government has decided in its wrong-headed way to collect this GST. At the moment we in the opposition cannot do anything about it other than point out the folly of that decision". But the government at least for the next few months while it is in power is going to go ahead with that. I might say that the minute the NDP gets into office we are going to stop that tax completely. At the moment, however, we are stuck with the situation.

Mr. McDermid: What will you replace it with?

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend asks a fair question: "Replace it with what?"

Why not start off with a minimum corporate tax? That is something that the United States has introduced and we could do that. Let us start off with a wealth inheritance tax for those families that inherit, let us say, $20 million. Let us have people pay a little bit of tax on that.

We could go on and on with a whole set of initiatives that have been made clear time and time again that we could use in lieu of the GST. But if we are going to have that, why not use some of the revenue generated by the GST to help Canadians, to help get the economy stimulated back into life, to bring some peace and security to Canadians and to Canadian families and to enable families to progress in a more positive way by having a decent child care system.

What about what is going on in our hospitals across this country? The federal government has decided to off-load its responsibility on to other levels of government. We are seeing hospitals closing down holus-bolus or closing wards and beds. This is a serious situation.

Finally, what about education? I think we are all in agreement and it is universal in the country that the best investment we can make is in retraining and education to ensure that our Canadian people have the best skills and expertise possible to face the demands of the knowledge-based economy of the 1990s.

All this amendment really says is that rather than locking us in so that all of that money has to be spent only on debt and deficit reduction, let us keep the option open so that some of that GST money can be put into worth-while projects, into investments into the future of Canada, and into investments into the future of Canadians.

I think people would support that notion and I would encourage my colleagues on both sides of the House to support this amendment.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased to get up and speak to this bill and to this amendment.

Before I get right into the amendment and exactly whether I believe that it is a necessary amendment or not, let me remind everyone that all moneys that come into the government go toward the deficit and then the debt. All programs go into creating the deficit. Because what it means is that we are spending more than we are taking in.

It makes no real difference what account you place the money in. If you are not bringing in enough then you are going to have a deficit no matter what kind of games the Conservatives want to play. That is what the deficit means. It just means there is not enough money coming in.

On the other hand, to relate to the amendment of my colleagues, I do not believe that this in any way prevents the government from spending moneys in other areas. All it says is that we will take the moneys, the net proceeds from the GST, the sale of Crown corporations and the fire sale of the Conservative government on Canadian properties and we will place them in this other account. We are going to call it a deficit reduction account.

The only real deficit reduction is going to be when we stop spending more than we take in. You might want to spend on other projects such as job training. Look at what is happening with this government that says to everybody: "We are the model of good management".

If it is such a good model of management then why it has to create this kind of account is beyond me. A good manager would know that money is fungible and it goes wherever it is needed. If it cannot control itself then that is why it has to create this kind of account.

It is saying it is managing so well and it is going to do all of these wonderful things with this deficit reduction account. But it is not preventing it from going on with its programs.

I believe just last week I heard of one. I think the Minister of National Defence announced a $100 million capital project for Montreal. It is building a new warehouse for military goods. That is not to say that I think Montreal does not need the jobs. I am sure Montreal needs the jobs.

What I am saying is that I wonder if this the right time to be building and spending money on capital projects such as this when the stated objective of this government is to downsize the military and cut back the budget.

It goes on its merry way pretending in its sanctimonious fashion that it is above and beyond all this.

• (1300)

It carries on with its own agenda. So I am convinced that this particular bill is a total loss of time and that we in this House of Commons have far more better things to do. In other words, we have to save our country. Let us stop this absolute nonsense.

I am not going to carry on any longer. I want to give the government a chance to bring forward some real bills to help this economy.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting opportunity this afternoon to speak on the goods and services tax once again by way of the amendment to the bill.

As has been stated previously, the amendment to the bill is simply smoke and mirrors. For Canadians, it has no relevance. What has relevance is the fact that our leader, the member for Yukon, has indicated that if the New Democratic Party is elected at the next federal election, the goods and services tax will be eliminated.

That is a commitment to the Canadian people; this party in government would eliminate that tax. It is interesting that the Conservative Party, which will not form the next government, would keep the tax. The Liberal Party has clearly indicated it will keep the tax as have the other fringe parties, the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois. There is a clear choice in the next federal election to end this odious tax by voting for the New Democratic Party or to keep this odious tax by voting for one of the other parties in Canada. It is a clear, unequivocal statement at this point. It is a clear and unequivocal choice at this point.

There is a political solution, not the smoke and mirrors solution before the House today. Nothing will make this bill more palatable in the eyes of people.

Through this past summer I managed to travel through most of the communities in the area I represent. One of the greatest surprises I had was the reaction of the small business community, the chambers of commerce and each of the small businesses. Make no mistake about it, the vast majority of the people in those small businesses in each one of those communities do not vote for the New Democratic Party. Most of them did not vote in the last election for the Liberal Party. They are the supporters, the backbone of the Conservative Party of Canada. They donate, they vote, they get out to the meetings and they do the job.

They have made it absolutely clear they will not be there this time. Their cheques will not arrive, their support will not arrive. The Conservative Party has killed its welcome within that constituency.

I met with the manager of a hotel who is a very strong and prominent Conservative member in one of the Island communities. The individual happened to say that he did not mind paying tax but that the goods and services tax had killed his business. It destroyed business opportunities.

We should not be discussing today what we to do with the proceeds of this odious tax. Clearly we should be talking about the destruction and removal of the goods and services tax. It is a business opportunity destruction tax and I am proposing an alternative. Let us vote against this bill. Let us once again vote against this tax and get it away from Canadians.

It destroys business opportunities. It destroys business incentive. It destroys initiative in the business community. It has had a general dampening effect on the local economies of the communities I represent and indeed communities across Canada. It has had a dampening effect politically on the fortunes of the Conservative Party of Canada.

We should not be dealing with amending this legislation as smoke and mirrors operations suggesting that the surpluses will be put into paying off the deficit. Recent articles in the newspaper indicated recovery, which is often predicted but certainly we have no substantial indication. If its arrival were to come, the Conservative Party of Canada and the Government of Canada would have an enormous war chest to attempt to buy back votes. This hoax of indicating that the money will be used to pay off the deficit is absolute nonsense.

The goods and services tax kills consumerism. There is a very definite cooling out of peoples' willingness to purchase goods, particularly in Canada. They are, in many cases, prepared to shop across the border. This tax is an incentive to do that. The goods and services tax cools out the consumer optimism and consumer confidence in small communities.

I feel that most Conservative members on the other side of the House, on walking into any small business in their communities, are told by the proprietor that if they had their first choice of things to do, it would be to get rid of the goods and services tax and possibly get rid of the proposed trade agreement with Mexico and the trade agreement with the United States. Certainly the goods and services tax is right up there on their minds. With the Conservative Party of Canada, the goods and services tax is going to be an anchor around its neck in the next federal election that will take it out of office.

My suggestion today would be that this government could do a great service to the men and women across Canada who operate small businesses by removing this tax. In fact, by removing this tax, it would enhance the business opportunities in those communities and it would see the growth of economic activity and economic well-being. It would also create employment and help confidence within the small business community. If it was to remove the goods and services tax it would be a healthier thing for all Canadians. It is ironic.

Mr. McDermid: And cut the credit to the low income people.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): It is interesting how the Conservative Party of Canada, in a very skilled manoeuvre, attempted to appeal to Canadians to take on the goods and services tax, to support it. What a hoax. What a sleight of hand and smoke and mirrors operation.

To the consumers of Canada, especially those consumers in the lower income level, this is one of the most regressive taxes that could be imagined. It is the worse place to put a tax, at the consumption end. Then the purveyors of the trickle down philosophies say: "Here we are. We will give you a goods and services tax rebate. We will take $100 of your money and give you back $10." This is nonsense.

This tax is harmful, not only to small businesses but to the economy of local communities and employment opportunities. It is a destructive, regressive tax against lower income Canadians. This tax should be placed at the income earning end.

As I mentioned at the opening of my remarks, the manager of an important hotel complex in the North Island—Powell River riding indicated: "Let me have an opportunity to make some money and then I will gladly pay tax. I will gladly pay more tax on an earned income rather than having the goods and services tax destroy the opportunity to make money. It cools out consumer confidence. People do not come to eat meals in this hotel". It is ironic. He says: "I believe in the trade union movement. My employees are organized. I run a restaurant with organized employees and the small snack shop down the street does not. They have an advantage over me, but I believe in that. But the minute you put the goods and services tax on meals then I have greater difficulty handling that".

I cannot respond in any positive way to the comments of the Conservative Party on this bill that is before us today on the proposal to spend some amount of surplus against the deficit. This is not a realistic approach to handling the deficit. It is an attempt to justify this tax. It is too late. Canadians know this cannot be justified. Conservatives have made a terrible mistake. It is time they pulled this tax and recognized the needs and wishes of Canadians.

• (1310)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate about a bad tax that was brought into effect at the worst possible time. It has seriously damaged the economy and has significantly worsened the recession in this country. It has put not only the small businesses my colleague was talking about a few minutes ago in trouble but has also put thousands of Canadians out of work across this country.

We have seen the economy driven downhill by the negative impact of this tax. We have seen the unemployment rate mount. We have seen this government, despite its constant preaching that prosperity is just down the road, unable to lead Canada out of recession. We have seen the government attack provincial governments to try to give them the blame for a recession in which a poll this morning showed over 70 per cent of Canadians clearly understand is the fault of the federal government and the fault of serious policy mistakes like the goods and services tax.

However, this bill is a shell game. It is a camouflage attempt to try to somehow desperately after the fact add a little bit of sugar, a little bit of honey to this GST that the government has rammed down the throats of Canadians. The government is saying to Canadians that this bill can perhaps be justified, this terrible tax and the unfair way in which it falls on people can somehow be justified by the fact that we are going to use it simply to pay the interest on the national debt and to pay off that national debt. It holds out the prospect to Canadians across this country that the GST is actually going to pay off the national debt.

For people who are terrified by the fact that this government and the Liberal government before it have brought our national debt to the level of $420 billion, the idea that the GST might somehow solve the increasing level of national debt is something which the government hopes people may respond to positively.

Let me be very clear. The interest payments on the national debt each year cost over $40 billion. The increase in those interest payments, as the debt continues to rise, will see to it that in the future interest payments alone will go to $45 billion, $50 billion and the GST brings in what? It is going to bring in a total of just over $16 billion in this present fiscal year. It is going to bring in a total in the next fiscal year of something over $20 billion.

In other words, the GST makes absolutely no contribution to reducing the national debt. Instead, according to this legislation, the GST is being used not to reduce the national debt, but to pay the interest costs on the national debt.

That is simply one part of the whole range of expenditures which the government makes. It spends money on interest payments for the national debt. It spends money on unemployment insurance. It spends less money than it promised but it still spends money on transfers to the provinces. It spends money to try to do something about help for science in this country.

Why should we take this one area of expenditure on the interest payments for the national debt? It is not the national debt itself but just the interest payments. Why should we take that area of expenditure and single it out for special treatment? There is no logical, rational or sensible explanation for that in terms of saying that spending money on the interest payments of the national debt is more important than spending money on help for science, training people or seeing to it that the provinces keep our health care and education systems going across this country.

Yet that is what this bill before this amendment seeks to do. That is why I urge government members to support it. This amendment seeks to make it possible for the proceeds from the GST to be spent not just to pay interest costs but also to pay for more beneficial and constructive activities like improving training for people in our country. This could be so until a new government is elected and we can get rid of the GST in this country.

It could improve the transfers to the provinces so that our health care system is not under threat. It could improve help to education so that our young people get the kind of educational support that they deserve and that they require.

This amendment simply says that this bad tax is nevertheless generating a good deal of revenue. Let us see to it that this revenue, until we can get rid of the tax, is used to help support things which will build our country for the future like training, education, health care and the improvement of municipal infrastructure.

It is a sensible amendment. It is an amendment which will make it possible for governments in the future in this country to see to it that they will start off with a better situation than the situation that the Conservatives are going to otherwise leave the next government in Canada.

Conservatives in this present government are creating incredible damage to our health care system, education system, training systems, regional development programs, resource strategies and farm communities across this country.

In area after area across this country this government is destroying the basis for future economic growth. What we are saying with this amendment is that until this government is replaced, and we hope we replace it so we can get rid of the GST, let us at least see that the revenues from this tax are used for something more creative than simply paying off interest costs.

Let us see that the revenues are used to help people. Let us see to it that people and the problems they face across Canada get the kind of attention which they should be receiving from this government. I cannot understand why the government would bring in a bill like this and waste the time of the House with respect to it. But if it at least accepts this amendment and permits the revenues from this bad tax to be used for something constructive, creative and useful until we can get rid of the tax then this would be something of a positive step on the part of a government which has taken far too many steps backward instead of forward.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we have been sitting here listening to a string of socialists speak this morning on the goods and services tax. I think the Canadian people know full well that the NDP members of Parliament and their party are opposed to the goods and services tax.

When we ask those in the NDP how they will replace the income from the goods and services tax, my hon. friend from Kamloops says: "We are going to increase taxes in other areas to replace it". They are probably going to tax the corporations out of existence because they will not be able to compete with other corporations and their tax bases around the world. Those in the NDP are going to tax inheritance and they are going to tax this, that and the other thing. If Canadians took the time to assess this, they would find very quickly that in no way, shape or form would those types of taxes make up the difference required for the goods and services tax. It would not even come close. They would just be passing the tax burden on to one very concentrated part of the economy. This is foolish.

We have three provincial governments now made up of New Democrats in this country. If those in the New Democratic Party are so dead set against sales taxes, why have they not rid themselves of provincial sales tax in their recent budgets?

Let us do a review for just a moment. The manufacturers' sales tax which we had in this country was a hidden tax placed at the manufacturing level which everybody in our society paid, without a doubt. This included businesses. They had to pay tax on their business income and in their business input costs. Four Crown corporations and two studies of Parliament recommended that we get rid of our manufacturers' sales tax and go to a consumption tax. That is exactly what the goods and services tax is. That was recommended for years.

Our government absolutely knew the political risk we were taking. We knew that it would not be popular. No tax is popular. But at the same time people said to us in no uncertain terms: "We want to see where that tax money is going. We want to be able to see on the ledger exactly where the GST is going". That is what they told us in no uncertain terms from coast to coast. In every community that I visited that was the message that was given loud and clear: "We want to see the money you receive and where it goes. It is fine to hide it in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. You put it away in there". I can tell you that that is what people have told us and that is why we have this bill.

I listened to the New Democratic Party this morning very quietly without interrupting them and I made a few notes on some of the comments that were passed. They said that maybe we should take some of that tax money and put it toward this or that. One item was retraining. The government in the last couple of years has put $800 million extra into training and retraining in this country. We have done that. We talked about sewers and water for Indian reserves. It is an absolute disgrace in this country. When it comes to drinking water and to sewage systems, we take them for granted in our municipalities. But on some of these reserves it is a disgrace. Our government has increased spending to bring those water and sewer systems up to an acceptable standard. We are spending $130 million a year over the next five years to try and bring that up to standard. We have augmented that through the green plan as well. We have added to that. We are taking care of that type of thing.

I sit here and listen to those in the New Democratic Party saying: "Don't worry about the deficit or the interest payments. Put the money somewhere else". I have news for you. When you borrow money from Canadians, as we have done, they expect the interest payments to be made. A lot of people in this country depend on those interest payments for a living. Those in the NDP here today are saying: "Don't worry about the interest payments". You have to worry about them. That is one of the responsibilities of a government. I know NDPers have not been in power at the federal level and maybe they don't understand these things but I can tell you—

An hon. member: Call an election.

Mr. McDermid: They say: "Call an election". They have been saying that for four years. They sound like a broken record over there. You will have your chance. You will have your opportunity in an election campaign and I look forward very much to campaigning in that campaign. I will assure you of one thing right now. The New Democratic Party of Canada will not form the next government. That is guaranteed. I will even bet on that. I am not a gambling man but I would bet on that.

In any event, I think it is very, very important that people understand why we are doing this in this bill. They asked for it. That is why we are doing it. They will be able to see very clearly where the money from the goods and services tax is going. There will be an audited statement that will be presented to the Canadian people each year. It is very, very important.

I challenge my friends in the New Democratic Party who this morning said that they would cancel our trade agreements and the GST. They would cancel all these things that the Conservative government brought in over the last seven and half years. You know what? They do not tell the Canadian people in any detail what they are going to replace it with. We are going to cancel the trade agreement with our largest trading partner. Even the Liberals came to their senses and said: "We may renegotiate it, but we are not going to tear it up like our former leader said we were". They have come to their senses. They realize that you cannot destroy a trade agreement that is doing good things for Canada. We never see them on the front pages of the papers. That is why they no longer are going to tear it up. They know it is doing good things for Canada.

Those in the New Democratic Party will tear everything up that they can get their hands on. We have seen what has happened in Ontario over the last year and a half with the New Democratic Party in power there. We know what is happening there.

The other point I want to make this morning is that 48 countries that we compete with have got a value-added tax. Many of them are socialist, democratic countries. They realize that it is a sensible and fair way to get a broad taxation base for their countries. They understand that and so do those in the New Democratic Party. For them to stand up here and say: "We are just going to cancel it" is nonsense. They know they would never do it. The only reason they say that today is that they know they will never be in power.

We are going to oppose this amendment. We think it is a foolish amendment and we will be voting against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed to the motion will please nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

The motion is negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore motion No. 6 is on division also.

• (1330)

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on Bill C-21. It is interesting to note that the government has decided that it is not going to get up and preach the gospel on Bill C-21. What is Bill C-21 doing? Bill C-21 is setting up—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I ask how this happened that the NDP was recognized before we were. Was there no speaker on the government side prepared to defend this bill? I am just shocked.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid he was the only member who was rising. Therefore, the hon. member for Nickel Belt has the floor.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, how can one defend the indefensible? It is pretty difficult to defend Bill C-21.

An hon. member: I just finished speaking.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, that was no defence. That was an apology for an appalling bill.

What does this bill do? It sets up a special account into which revenues from the GST and the net revenue from Crown corporations that are sold off are deposited. Why does the government want to set this up? Because it says that it wants to reduce the deficit.

I have a really difficult time understanding the rationale for establishing such a special account. Canadians understand that we have the Consolidated Revenue Fund. All the revenues of the government go into that fund and all the expenses are paid out. Then at the end we get a consolidated figure.

The fact of the matter is that on the operating account of the government it has been running surpluses of between $11 billion and $13 billion. That is, on moneys that have been taken in and moneys that have been spent, it has been running a surplus. When one applies the interest on the national debt it takes that surplus, that operating surplus and the government has to go out and borrow another $17 billion, $18 billion or $19 billion to pay the interest on the debt.

It seems to me the real problem is that we have to get those interest payments down. It seems to me the government is playing with smoke and mirrors and trying to assuage its own conscience because it brought in a very unpopular GST. It is trying to persuade and to lead Canadians into believing that somehow or other they are better off by setting up this account. It says: "Look folks, you are going to gain from this pain because we are taking this money and we are putting it into a special account. See, here we are doing it. You can see it and we are paying down the deficit and the debt."

It seems to me that if the government really wanted to do something about the deficit it would have to do something about the interest rates charged in the country.

The real rates of interest in this country as compared to the United States are still running 3 to 4 percentage points higher than our major competitor, the United States. The real interest rates in this country are a little over 4 percentage points and real interest rates in the United States are under 1 per cent.

In fact, the difference between the rates in Canada and the rates in the United States has been a traditional 2 percentage points. So we have room to lower the interest rates in this country. If we lower the interest rates it will have a direct effect on the deficit and on the debt.

In fact, we are told that for every 1 percentage point we reduce interest rates it will mean a little over $2 billion less in interest payments in the first year alone. That would increase in subsequent years.

It seems to me that if we really want to deal with this question of deficit reduction we have to deal with interest rate reduction. It is not the NDP alone that has been telling the government that interest rates have to come down further. Doug Peters from the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the chief economist, has said to the government that it must get the rates down. Business people have been saying to the government that it must get the rates down.

It is quite an irony when you think about the utilities of this country, the utilities in the provinces, going into the United States and borrowing money, using Canadian banks as a conduit because they pay less in interest rates. All that does is exacerbate the balance of payments of this country and further contributes to this national casino-type mentality.

This is a problem and the government can play all the shell games it wants letting Canadians think about how serious it is in setting this up. "See? See now? You see how much we are putting in the special account? Do you see it?"

I want to say that a government has to look at the national interests of the people of this country. For example, we are told—and this is not the NDP alone—that we have a very serious problem with respect to unemployment.

We have 1.5 million people officially unemployed. There is a drain on the economy because in fact these people draw down from the life support systems of the nation and of course there is no contribution in terms of productivity.

The government has not made that a concern. All of the premiers were consulted before the budget. I saw a graph of the suggestions they had made and they all identified the need to kick-start the economy with a municipal infrastructure fund. Spending a little over $1 billion in the first year on municipal infrastructures would directly create 63,000 jobs in the first year.

I want to suggest that this government spends all the time of Parliament playing games with people's emotions out there, having children go on paper routes to collect money, having a time clock for the deficit, and putting their little pennies they earn on their paper routes in there. At the same time, the Reichmanns and everybody else get away with paying little or no tax at all, instead of closing the loopholes.

• (1340)

The minister in his budget had the effrontery and the gall to suggest that since 1969 some of the insurance companies, large and profitable ones, have paid little or no tax at all in this country.

Confederation Life in 1990 made $106 million net profit and paid not one penny of income tax in this country. That was 1990. That was a poor year. That was a recession year, and it paid not one penny.

What does the minister in his budget say? He says: "We have to plug that loophole now". Instead of playing these shell games like you see at the fair, identify under which shell is the pea. I want to say: shell on those games.

What we want is something really meaningful with respect to reducing the deficit. The place to begin is number one: get the interest rates down.

Number two: imagine if you can put 500,000 unemployed Canadians back to work. I have not figured it out, but I am sure somebody listening will figure it out. They will be paying income tax directly, paying indirect taxes on the things they purchase. They will be productive. Imagine how much the deficit could be reduced. Imagine if that unemployment rate could be reduced to 4 per cent, would it not be wonderful? We would have no deficit at all. It would wipe it out.

This is a shell game, and I believe that this government has not made one attempt to deal with the real problems. It can deal with those without even abandoning its own Conservative ideology. All of us can agree that the whole idea is to get Canadians back to work.

The municipalities across this country are not NDPers. They represent people at the grassroots level of this country and they have said to the government: "Look, there is a need for revitalization of our infrastructure". In fact, you could see that not only in terms of kick-starting the economy and putting people back to work, but you could also see it in terms of making us more competitive down the road.

That should appeal to the mentality on the other side because those members now have a new altar at which they worship: competitivity. They even bring in guys from Harvard. They are paying them $1 million to put in print all the things that we have been saying over the years.

Now all of these prosperity committees have been set up. They have them running around the country at a cost $15 million. They have little coffee klatches to hear the same. They are washing their laundry, drinking coffee, washing it and drinking it and washing it. Do not ask me how to get in the cup after.

Instead of doing these kinds of constructive things, what we are spending time debating is Bill C-21 which says: "See, we are going to stick our finger in. We are going to pull out a plum and what good boys and girls we are over here in the government".

This is nothing but smoke and mirrors. We ought not to be spending our time dealing with this kind of nonsense.

What are some of the other things that our country really needs to put us in a position when the recovery comes, when the bugle call is out and when the cavalry comes over the hill to rescue the economy, what do we need to emphasize, apart from ensuring that our infrastructure at the municipal level is there? We need a trained work force. All the Tories ever do is talk about training.

They eliminated the Science Council of Canada. That was a body that could take the pulse of where we are in terms of scientific training and technological training. That is gone. They have eliminated that, they do not want to hear bad news. They should be taking a good hard look and putting some money into training Canadians so that they can be better equipped to deal with the changing economy. They have not done that. They do not want to talk about that and we are going to talk about it over and over again interminably.

There is also the question of the social programs of this country. Unlike the Tories and their mind-set on this matter, I believe that the social programs of this country make the workers and the people of this country more competitive. It is certainly a competitive advantage.

I will tell members of an experience I had. I was with the consumer and corporate affairs committee in Washington to look at credit card interest rates. While there, I got talking to a worker who was serving a luncheon. I asked the worker: "Tell me, do you have medicare coverage?". He said: "No, sir, I do not have medicare coverage. I cannot afford it.". It costs them something like $350 a month to be covered. He said: "I cannot afford $350 a month to be covered.". I said to him, because now I want to prove the psychological effect of this: "Do you worry about this?". He said: "Sir, I worry about it all the time because if I get injured, if I get hurt, if I get sick, it would wipe me out completely.".

An hon. member: What about his children?

Mr. Rodriguez: This was a single person. How can any person, working on a job that requires attention, requires commitment, be worrying about his health coverage and his health care and be able to be productive in the accomplishment of the tasks that he has to do?

That is one of the advantages our system has and every one of these programs, whether it is old age pensions, whether it is family allowances, whether it is unemployment insurance, are all designed to be a safety net for people.

These things have to be seen for what they are. They are competitive advantages. Not only are they protection for Canadians, they also provide an advantage. Instead of bolstering and strengthening these programs, this government is out to destroy them. This election cannot come too soon because they are on the road to destroy medicare. I want to tell Canadians that.

You just have to watch Don Getty in Alberta and what is happening to the medicare program in Alberta. The Tories are going to extrapolate that from the provincial level right across the country.

We have the spectre of the Liberals. We saw a Liberal in New Brunswick suggesting that maybe universality and medicare are something we can no longer afford. We have a Liberal government in the province of Quebec that is attempting to bring in user fees. The Liberals have no more commitment to the universality of social programs than the Tories have. Let us not kid ourselves.

My fear is well grounded because we have seen them doing it. We seen them do it with family allowances. They attempted it when they first got into office by trying to deindex old age pensions. We saw that with the clawback of the old age pensions and we see that all the way. They are eroding the design to make us more like our cousins to the south. We must have their consumer patterns. We must have their music and their cultural patterns. Their big Hollywood movies are going to be our big Hollywood movies.

• (1350)

They will not even protect our cultural heritage in this country. Try to get a Canadian movie shown in our theatres. Hollywood made sure of that. Jack Valenti made sure that the government got lobbied. Flora MacDonald promised that she would bring in legislation that would ensure that Canadian-made movies about Canadian life would be shown in Canadian theatres. In fact, we have no more Canadian movies than we had before she made the promise.

They are selling out all the time. Why? Because they worship at an altar that is different. It is an altar that is not rooted in the people of Canada. It is foreign to the people of Canada. It has its roots in the boardrooms of the nation, not in the bedrooms of the nation.

That is where that whole neo-Conservative agenda this government has been taking the Canadian people. They want us to be more like our cousins to the south where the only thing that matters is the buck you can make. They do not give a damn about the person who lives beside them or the person who sits beside them. They will look after themselves and the devil can take the rest of them.

That is the attitude, a selfish atavistic attitude. That is returning to the past. The movement that I am part of, the New Democratic Party, recognizes that we are our brothers' keepers and therefore we have a responsibility to our brothers and sisters. We are the keepers of each other's concerns.

That is what we have built in Canada. We have built a society. Look at all of the things we have built; the social programs, the credit unions, the co-op movement, co-op housing, the way fishermen work in co-ops, the farmers, this is the kind of society we have built.

This government is chipping away at it, gradually destroying it, day by day. It has brought in Bill C-21 that says we will put all the money we make on the GST into servicing the debt. Of course, the next line it will sell to Canadians is: "You can reduce the deficit even further if you let us increase the GST". That is the next step.

We have argued against the GST. We have always said that these consumer taxes should be left to the provinces since the federal government has a greater ability to tax and the provinces are restricted. After all, the provinces gave up income tax to the federal government. If you recall it was only on a temporary basis during the second world war. What was temporary then became permanent.

We recognized that the provinces' way of raising money would be through consumer taxes. We call them provincial sales taxes. There was an understanding that that area would be left to the provinces. What happened? The federal government moved right into that area and has its own sales tax. What has it been doing to the provinces? It has been blackmailing them, threatening them that if they do not integrate the provincial sales tax with the federal sales tax, it will not collect the sales tax on consumer goods brought across the border.

Ontario loses anywhere from $300 to $400 million because the federal government will not collect the provincial sales tax at the border. This government says to the province: "If you want us to collect it you have to integrate the rest of it."

What a way to run a Confederation. What happened to the co-operative spirit of Confederation? Is this the kind of spirit that breeds harmony when you sit around the table to discuss the Constitution? Is this the spirit that motivates give and take at the constitutional negotiating table? Is that the spirit?

An hon. member: Do as I say, not as I do.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is the old Trudeau approach. The confrontation of federal-provincial relations is being continued. It is not an amelioration of differences. It is not give and take. That was Trudeau's approach and here it is being continued by these neo-Conservatives. It is a sad commentary.

Here is the province of Ontario and all the other provinces in very rough economic times. I do not buy this garbage when they now run around and say: "This is an international recession". When we had Dr. Crow and Dr. Wilson before us, the Conference Board of Canada said that this was a made-in-Canada recession.

An hon. member: It is the only thing they have made since they have been in power.

Mr. Rodriguez: Look what the government did. It squeezed, taxed, purged, bled and gouged until now we have an inflation rate of less than 2 per cent. It is a very successful operation but the patient is dying.

We have wrestled inflation to the ground and it is less than 2 per cent, which means there is no growth going on. Yet we are playing these little games with Bill C-21, telling Canadians: "See, look, we are responding to what you said." We know that 11 per cent of you said: "Well at least if you are going to put a GST on, it should be used to reduce the deficit". That is the 11 per cent you know.

I am hearing the Ayn Rand from the Conservative Party saying something. She should get up and make a speech. The "Dorothy Rand" of the Conservative Party should get up and make a speech. I have never known her to be speechless.

An hon. member: Very right wing.

Mr. Rodriguez: There they are, playing with Bill C-21 because their 11 per cent says to them: "We will accept the GST if you put it into deficit reduction." Remember, the operating accounts of this government run a surplus and that means every year this government takes in $11 to $14 billion more than it spends.

Mrs. Dobbie: Good for us.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is the interest.

Mr. Barrett: The interest?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, that is right. But in fact, because the interest rates are kept high, and I said at the start that we can drop those interest rates another 1 to 2 percentage points, and it would reduce the deficit, but I do not see how this is doing anything at all to alleviate people's problems.

In fact interest rates have to come down. You cannot escape it by saying: "Well we do not interfere with John Crow. He is independent."

It is an interesting fact that John Crow is more popular in economic circles in Europe than Brian Mulroney. Did you not know that? They love him. He walks on water. They hold him up. They love him. Why? Because they can trust that he will stay the course, keep those interest rates high, keep the Canadian dollar high, so all of the international casino gamblers can come here and play the "Rantier" economy in Canada. We do not need to legalize casinos in any province, they can play them right here on the money markets.

Mr. Barrett: Pay for their villas in Switzerland.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. That is the farce of it all. They love this guy Crow in Europe. They think he is the best thing since sliced bread.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): They crow about him.

• (1400)

Mr. Rodriguez: Finance ministers can come and go. Prime Ministers can come and go, but keep Dr. John. Okay? Keep him there. Keep the crow flying. That is right. This is the result of it, so this government ends up just fiddling around the edges. It is playing shell games, smoke and mirrors, now you see it now you don't.

In conclusion, I want to say that this government cannot escape its responsibility. You can try to fool some of the people some of the time but that other 89 per cent you cannot fool. They are going to come back to haunt this Tory government.

I appeal to all the Tories in the back benches, at least in their self-interest to get back here. You cannot get back here if you keep supporting these cockamamie ideas that come out of your front benches. I am saying to all of you, and I know you are not here but you are watching me, all those Tories who are good friends of mine in the back benches: Come down to the House.

An hon. member: Explain yourself.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am going to explain myself.

An hon. member: You are a real Christian.

Mr. Rodriguez: I try to do missionary work among the unconverted.

An hon. member: I know that.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know that I have good friends in the back benches of the Tory caucus and I want to say to them it is time they started exerting some influence on what the front bench is doing to them.

It is bills like these that keep you mired at 11 per cent. It is the lack of any kind of affirmative action with respect to the economy of this country, bringing interest rates down, kick-starting the economy with the municipal infrastructure, refurbishing the municipal infrastructure. That seems to me where we have to go.

Remember, as Michael McCracken says, the cost of doing nothing is not zero.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Has the hon. member finished his debate?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CANADIAN DIETETIC ASSOCIATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, March is the month of the Canadian Dietetic Association's national nutrition campaign. Its 1992 theme is "Challenge the Nutrition Myths".

The goal of this year's campaign is to help consumers sort out facts from the fictions behind common nutrition myths. During the campaign consumers will be given reliable information to assist them in making positive choices for healthy eating.

I am delighted that the healthy eating messages of the campaign are based on collaborative work initiated by the Department of National Health and Welfare to develop and implement guidelines for healthy eating.

I congratulate the Canadian Dietetic Association and its provincial and territorial associates for their work on behalf of national nutrition month.

Mr. Speaker, let us all junk junk foods.

FISHERIES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, today Canadian fishermen are making an important declaration on the nose of the Grand Banks. They are saying that Canada should manage all fish on the Grand Banks, no matter where they swim.

This is a courageous act, born of desperation. The fishermen know that the promise by the Government of Canada to put fish on the table at the UN Conference on Environment and Development in Rio de Janeiro next June will do little to protect the northern cod.

Global resources can no longer be managed according to artificial political boundaries.

If future generations of fishermen of all interested nations are to have a chance at earning a living off the Grand Banks, Ottawa must move swiftly to convince the international community that the fishery must be protected.

We can do it alone or we can do it jointly. This is an emergency. It calls for emergency measures. The survival of the northern cod stock and the economic survival of Atlantic Canada is at stake.

Is the Government of Canada prepared to fish or just to cut bait?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, within nine weeks the largest ever summit will take place, bringing together more than 100 world leaders in Brazil in June to look at the planet's future, the future for the 5.4 billion inhabitants who are already here and almost double that number that will be here when my 12-year old son reaches my age.

Last Friday the Prime Minister announced that he would attend that summit and lead the Canadian delegation in dealing with a number of issues, including the one just raised by my colleague, the member for Davenport.

We should remember that as Canadians we are trustees for the largest land mass in the world, the largest coastline, the largest supply of fresh water and 10 per cent of the world's forests. We have a great deal at stake in the Earth Summit to be held shortly.

Right now, in New York, we are in the final days of negotiating a new global bargain and partnership. It will require vision, it will require courage and it will require dedication.

We trust that Canadians will support the Prime Minister and the other members of the delegation in achieving this new global pact.

EXPO '98

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the world has come to recognize Canada as being a generous host of world expositions.

Last Friday I met with a group dedicated to bringing Expo '98 to the city of Toronto. The project already has the backing of four levels of government, the support of labour, private enterprise and approval by the local community.

The Expo '98 Bid Corporation is proposing to host the event on a spectacular waterfront location in the Parkdale region, just a hop, skip and jump from the amenities offered by downtown Toronto.

Toronto offers hotel accommodation for 68,000 visitors per night; a safe and comfortable public transit and subway system; a highway network which provides road access to 140 million people within a one-day drive of the city.

I call on the members of the international community to strongly consider the beauty and the benefits of Toronto and support Canada's bid for Expo '98.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, today I am leading a delegation of New Democrat MPs to Washington, D.C. to tell the Bush administration that the U.S. tariff on Canadian softwood lumber is unfair, unjustified and hypocritical.

We are meeting with the leaders of the campaign to keep our Canadian lumber out of the U.S. market. We are going to tell them that their campaign does not help their industry, hurts American consumers and threatens to deepen a recession affecting all of North America.

We are meeting with people south of the border who are being directly hurt by the tariff to enlist them in our fight against this vexatious harassment. We are taking the message that this attack on Canada is unacceptable because the Tory government has not been able to get that message through.

When you want something done, call the New Democrats.

BILL C-13

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in an article under the heading "The So-Called Strike Against Provincial Jurisdictions by Ottawa", published in La Presse on March 28, 1992, reads in part: "As regards bill C-13 on the environment, the federal government has as much right as the provinces to legislate in that area of shared jurisdiction."

Then further on: "Moreover, I think that this bill is not so much the result of an irrepressible urge on the part of Ottawa to interfere in that area (it is no more dedicated to that issue than other levels of government) as of a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada recognizing its right to get involved in that area and pressure from environmental groups. It must also be mentioned that federal environmental assessments can only be carried out when a project involves one of these two jurisdictions or when the federal government provides financial assistance for a provincial project. Why would Ottawa try to stop a project it is prepared to support with money provided there is no evidence of the provincial government being too lax with environmental issues? Would the fact that Quebec's record is far from ideal in this respect have anything to do with it opposing that bill?

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in September 1991 I tabled a private member's motion urging the government to recognize the efforts of past Prime Ministers by placing a marker at their place of burial. Since that time I have received numerous letters of support from members from all sides of the House and many Canadians.

Today I am pleased to advise the House that the first step has been taken by the government to advance this proposal. In recognizing the valuable contribution that this project would make to public education, the Historic Sites and Monuments Board has recommended that the proposal proceed.

I would like to thank the Hon. Jean Charest, Minister of the Environment, whose personal intervention and commitment made this decision possible. The commitment to Canada by members from all three parties has been demonstrated in the generous and non-partisan support obtained for this proposal.

I believe it is important to recognize those whose leadership has made this country one of the most desirable places in the world in which to live.

SPORTS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in this Chamber to ask our colleagues to join us in congratulating Canada. Canada was represented by the men's fastball team which won the world championship on the weekend, winning all 10 games played in Manila, Philippines. This repeats Canada's world title of 1972 which was also won in Manila. Canada, as represented by figure skaters Kurt Browning, Elvis Stojko, Lloyd Eisler and Isabelle Brasseur, also won world championship medals in Oakland, California. We are proud of all these athletes, their coaches, managers and officials. Like the Alberta Ladies Hockey Team that won the Canadian championship in Edmonton, they are all truly outstanding Canadians.

LANGUAGE MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is to eliminate barriers to minority language education. It puts all language minorities in Canada on an equal footing, safe from the abusive action of provincial legislatures, and gives all language minorities access to education, so as to resist assimilation. Nevertheless, right here in Ontario, not far from the national capital, some children aged five to nine must travel four hours by bus a day, Mr. Speaker, because the Lanark-Leeds-Grenville school board refuses their right to attend school in French where they live. This kind of treatment is unjust, unacceptable and outrageous.

The Conservative federal government, this false protector of language minorities, abolished the Court Challenges Program, which would have given these children's parents a chance to exercise their legal and educational rights. As Canada is preparing to renew its Constitution, here are two shabby and painful examples of the place that the provinces and the federal government reserve for minority language rights. Corrective action must be taken right away, Mr. Speaker.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a federally funded apprenticeship course is starting today at the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology, but women need not apply. Apparently, Premier Getty's Tory government decided to target men between 20 and 24 as one of the fastest growing groups of welfare recipients. So 30 men will receive 18 weeks of training in cabinet making, welding, appliance repair, cooking, baking and auto mechanics.

Ironically, federal employment equity legislation requires employers to hire women in some of these kinds of jobs. Some would say it is hypocritical of the government not to be leading the way by training women for non-traditional occupations.

Perhaps it is realistic. Some would say it is pointless for the minister of employment to train women on welfare for jobs they will never be able to take because the minister of health and welfare has ensured that there will be no child care spaces.

Maybe someone should explain to the champion of Triple-E, who is trying to make Alberta equal to Prince Edward Island, what equality really means.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I recently asked my constituents for their ideas on how Canada's future could be made brighter. Chris and Louise Sharpe of Acton wrote:

> Devise a method to make the system more accessible to the truly needy, and filter out the people taking advantage of the system. We don't mind paying so many taxes, as long as the money is being used to good ends. Show that the government is willing to build a strong Canada and increase loyalty.

Mr. S. C. English of Bolton wrote:

> Settle the Quebec and aboriginal questions and get on with running the country. Rule out-of-order any MP making ludicrous, irrelevant statements instead of asking legitimate questions in Question Period.

Finally, Hugh Fraser of Georgetown writes:

> In general I think the future is bright and exciting for our country. The opportunities are great—it's just up to each one of us to take advantage of them. You can make the future brighter by making sure we stay united.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of bringing my constituents's voices to Parliament.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the front line safety personnel in the aviation industry. The flight attendants, the men and women who provide the services on the aircraft, are there not to bring us coffee and tea but to make sure that we are safe all the time we are in that aircraft.

Justice Moshansky recognized that in his report released last week. That is why he called upon the government to bring forward legislation or regulations to protect their hours of work so that during the whole course of their time on the job they are alert and able to serve us in the safety aspects.

Unfortunately, instead of enacting regulations which it now has the power to do, the government chose to shift responsibility to the Dryden Commission Implementation Project, a good way of burying the problem in bureaucracy.

I call on the government to change its mind, to put together a ministry-union group right now to draft those regulations so that those flight attendants have some protection.

TELE-CANADA NEWS INC.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, a young Canadian company, Tele-Canada News Inc., has launched a daily news service for Canadians. The company is based in Montreal and produces a half hour TV program that is beamed to Florida by satellite seven days a week. This program entitled The News from Canada opens with the first four bars of O Canada and gives our Florida snowbirds the day's general business, sports and weather news from Canada.

It is good to see Canadian initiatives responding to and succeeding in the international marketplace.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last month the unemployment rate in Canada was 10.6 per cent, up 3.1 per cent from two years ago.

The Department of Finance says that a 1 per cent increase in the rate of unemployment increases the federal deficit by .6 per cent of the value of our Gross Domestic Product because fewer Canadians are paying taxes and more are receiving unemployment benefits and welfare payments.

Since our Gross Domestic Product is $700 billion, a 3.1 per cent increase in unemployment increases the deficit by more than $13 billion.

By instituting a $13 billion municipal works program for much needed infrastructure such as transit, roads and sewers, we can cut unemployment by 3 per cent without increasing the deficit. This is another way, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, we can create jobs in a fiscally responsible manner while at the same time recognize the important contribution that adequate infrastructure makes to our competitive position.

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON CORPORATION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance announced in his last budget that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation would be eliminated. This has left employees and all Cape Bretoners wondering what will be left once this corporation is eliminated.

The demonstration farm owned by Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and located at Point Edward has proven to be extremely valuable to Cape Breton farmers. With minimal cost to the taxpayers of Canada, studies done at the farm focus on crops, equipment and animals and their suitability to the Cape Breton climate. Let me assure the House that the experience gained at this farm cannot be duplicated on a mainland farm of the same type.

Cape Bretoners have borne the brunt of the cutbacks and lay-offs implemented by this government. Surely they cannot expect us to accept that the closure of this demonstration farm will have a positive impact on Canada's fiscal situation.

I would urge the government to examine the social and economic benefits of this project and assure Cape Breton farmers that this farm will remain as an integral part of the economy of Cape Breton Island.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 28, the premier of Alberta, Don Getty, outlined his government's position on constitutional reform.

I would like to quote from that address: "I will not endorse any concept where everyone else's interests are looked after and the west gets shafted. I won't agree. I just won't sign. People had better understand that when they threaten Alberta, when they insult us because we are sticking up for a Triple-E Senate, those people had better understand that Alberta will have the nation at heart but Alberta will also stand up for itself".

Mr. Getty referred to a constitutional elite that wants a pre-ordered package of reforms entrenched in Canadian law. He continues: "I fear that at times the national debate in Canada has been taken over by people who think they know best and don't trust the real people of Canada to participate".

I fully support Mr. Getty's position that the principle of equality be reflected in Senate reform as well as in the constitutional amending formula.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today seven trawlers with 150 fishermen are sailing to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks to tell the fishermen from the European countries, the 95 ships that are taking cod there, that they should not do that. The fishermen will do to them what the government could not do internationally: to say that it is in the best interests of everybody to preserve the cod stocks in that area.

Is it the intention of the government to introduce a piece of legislation soon to extend the custodial management responsibility of Canadians to the nose and the tail of the banks as we are the custodians of the stock within the Canadian waters?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister of fisheries will be in the House at a little later time.

All I can say at this particular time is that the position of the government remains the same. Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition may want to defer his questions until a little later on in Question Period. I am sure he will be here.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was ready to answer the question and we are willing to take her answer. If she wants to say yes, there will be no problem, we will move on to something else. But I can see that she is afraid because the minister of fisheries is in the House. I will repeat my question to that minister.

I just want to know from the minister of fisheries if he is embarrassed a bit to see the fishermen having to go to the Grand Banks to do what the minister has not been able to do: to tell the Europeans that it is the responsibility of everybody to protect the cod stocks there, and if this government has the intention of introducing a piece of legislation that will extend the custodial management responsibility of the Canadian government to the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks so that we will have fish for our Canadian fishermen in the future.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman certainly finds solutions to be much simpler when he is in the opposition, because when he was in government it took that government about 12 years to achieve the Law of the Sea Convention. During that whole period it never unilaterally extended the economic zone out to 200 miles, but now that they are in opposition the solutions are very simple.

Since January 1989 I have been and the government has been bringing this matter to the attention of the governments of the European Community, Spain, Portugal and around the world. We are continuing our efforts.

We congratulate those who are making this demonstration. I have written them of my support and have given them some tangible support as well, something to help the crews along when they get back to shore. I suggest the hon. gentleman do the same.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the minister that it is very easy for him to do something very simple: to sign this international agreement, which is something the government has refused, to make sure we have jurisdiction there.

Ms. Copps: The Law of the Sea, which you still haven't signed.

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to tell the minister that the government should do that. I want to ask him if he is aware that in 1971 we were the only ones to recognize that there was a danger with pollution in the Arctic and unilaterally we passed a law in this Parliament extending our jurisdiction over Arctic waters. Since that day the international community has recognized that we were right.

If we were to do the same thing today with the cod problem at the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks, the international community would recognize that we are doing what is needed to protect the stocks not only for Canadian fishermen but for the fishermen of the world.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that in 1971 the government took an initiative to extend jurisdiction with respect to pollution in Arctic waters. There were no other ships of any country in those Arctic waters at the time that was done. The only country that could possibly be affected was the United States. They were spoken to first and arrangements were entered into with them so that they would not object too vigorously.

The situation is not comparable to an international area where many nations are now fishing on the high seas in that zone there already. It is not comparable, but I remind the hon. gentleman that in 1972 his government signed a treaty with France which gave it fishing rights forever, without any time limit, within Canadian waters. We are still suffering the results today of that treaty signed in 1972. In 1977 the hon. gentleman's government signed an arrangement with the European Community and gave it the right to fish thousands of tonnes of cod in our waters until we let that die, until we finally got rid of it in 1987.

I would not refer to his record, if I were him, without checking the record first.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's ignorance is showing. The fact is, whether he likes it or not, the French have territorial rights in the gulf, and the Portuguese and the Spaniards do not. I would ask the minister to act responsibly in order to preserve the resource within Canadian waters. At this very moment, Canadian fishermen cannot fish for cod, while 95 foreigh ships are taking the stocks Canadians will be unable to catch this summer.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we have to keep this in perspective. There are foreign vessels fishing cod and other species outside the 200-mile limit, and no country that I am aware of recognizes as yet the rights of a coastal state to exercise any jurisdiction over fishing beyond the 200-mile economic zone.

We now have a resolution before the United Nations environmental conference to that effect backed by 40 other nations. We are pushing that vigorously, which is the proper way to go. If all these efforts do not result in meaningful progress then we will examine what other options there are.

In the meantime I remind the hon. gentleman that in 1982 his government allocated to the European Community 8,000 tonnes of non-surplus 2J,3K-L cod; 6,500 tonnes of 2G-H cod; and 7,000 tonnes of squid. We were lucky there was anything left out there by the time his government was pushed out of office in 1984, and he gets up in the House and question our policy.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, why is the minister so tender on this issue? Why is he dragging in all those red herrings? He is the one who has those fishermen out there twisting in the wind. What has he done? For example, has he today seen to it that the ambassadors in Brussels, Lisbon and Madrid are meeting with their opposite numbers to reinforce the urgency of this situation? Instead of bafflegab, why does he not tell us what he is doing for those fishermen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the renewed interest in this question by the hon. gentleman. I appeared before the standing committee on fisheries a week ago last Thursday. There was not a Liberal member for Newfoundland who turned up, so I am delighted.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister knows that it is improper to announce that to the House.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister is improper. He says he has been on to this issue since January 1989. The foreign fishing had been going on for four years before he opened his mouth on the issue. Where was he during all those committee meetings for those four years?

He talks about a resolution in June down in Rio somewhere. What will this resolution do? If the resolution does not succeed in getting the international community to come to its senses on this one, would the minister now give notice that he intends as a government to take unilateral action to save those stocks while there is some left to save: take the action, go out there and take over management of the nose and tail of the Banks? Will he answer that question?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this government has taken unilateral action after unilateral action in this matter and will continue to take unilateral action.

Here is a unilateral action: this is the resolution we have before the United Nations. It was conceived at St. John's, Newfoundland two years ago when the hon. gentleman was not thinking much about this issue. It was not popularized so much. This gives the principles that we say should apply to straddling stocks so that the coastal state has management rights over the straddling stocks.

If this is accepted by the international community, and any action can only be effective if it is accepted by the international community, this problem will be resolved. We cannot answer whether or not it will be accepted, but the Prime Minister himself is leading our delegation to Rio to make sure that it gets full attention at Rio.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. gentlemen have been pleading that the Prime Minister get personally involved, and I can assure them he is personally involved.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

During the Canada–U.S. free trade talks, Canadians were very concerned about a plan to send great quantities of fresh water to the United States.

The current draft agreement, however, includes pipelines which could carry water to the United States and Mexico. Obviously, Canadians do not want to pump great quantities of fresh water from Canada.

Is it the government's policy to make it easier to send great quantities of fresh water from Canada to the United States and Mexico?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend is very much aware of the water policy of the Government of Canada which does not allow that. It does allow for the export of water in containers, water in bottles and that sort of thing, but not diversions of water or the sale of water in great quantities, to use her words.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if this is the case, it is going to be hard getting all those little bottles of water into those pipelines which are non-energy pipelines which are proposed in the draft text we have seen of the NAFTA trade deal.

When it came to culture the government also said that culture was not on the table. When it did not give away culture through the front door, it seems clear from recent reports that this government facilitated getting it through the back door.

I want to ask the minister, in the case of water exports is the government's policy to facilitate water exports? If it is not, what is the government's response to the section of the draft proposal that proposes non-energy pipelines? Are these pipelines for bottled water? Are these pipelines for orange juice or in fact, is this government looking at pipelines through the back door to transport Canadian water in large quantities to the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me caution my hon. friend about pulling things out of a text that is two months old.

What I said in my first answer is the position of the Government of Canada and the policy of the Government of Canada that governs the export of water. Water in bottles is allowed to be exported. Water in large amounts and particularly diversions, is not allowed to be exported.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, to the Deputy Prime Minister, while the government has said during previous trade talks that it would protect auto workers through trade deals, it did not; it would protect forestry workers, it did not; it would protect Canada's culture, it was not protected.

Therefore, I want to say it is clear on every account and evidenced by the fact that the government has not put forward any impact studies on either of the trade deals, that these trade deals have failed.

Will his government stand up for Canadians for once, act in the interests of Canadians and stop the talks on the Mexican trade deal? If not, stand aside and call an election on the issue.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is talking about industries that have not been protected. She knows that what she has said is not true.

She spoke about the automotive industry. The auto pact is still in place. She knows perfectly well that culture is protected under the free trade agreement. In forestry she is worried about the softwood lumber issue. She knows perfectly well that is subject to the memorandum of understanding which was not part of the free trade agreement.

I listened to my hon. friend from British Columbia, the trade critic for the New Democratic Party. He said he asked the previous minister on many occasions whether there was any company that had invested in Canada as a result of the free trade agreement. This was on television last night. He knows. He has heard my predecessor as well as me, read off the names of companies that have been investing in Canada as a result of the free trade agreement, companies that have benefited. Let me read them—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Willowdale.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, printing is Canada's fourth largest industrial employer. Since free trade, U.S. customs harassment based on country of origin markings has cost our printers $160 million in lost exports and 1,700 jobs. Canada's printers cannot wait for a North American free trade deal, they need action now.

I ask this minister, will this government act immediately to toughen Canada's customs enforcement regime against American printers? Will it act now to give Canadian printers a level playing field?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to take that matter up with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

My hon. friend is aware that this is an issue that we have been looking at and there may well be ways that we can enforce our customs requirements in a more aggressive fashion. But one of the things that we have to be conscious of here is that customs requirements work both ways. There are a number of our printing companies that are endeavouring to get into the United States as well.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister says he has been considering this issue. This government was first informed of this problem four years ago. Furthermore, in the government's industry study signed by this minister it was admitted that the free trade agreement has caused problems for Canadian printers.

So I put it to the minister: just how much longer are Canadian printers going to have to be beaten up by the Americans before this government acts?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): As I said, Mr. Speaker, I propose to raise that with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, who, as he knows, is out of the House today on government business.

In answer to his question, my first answer still stands.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, with the United States clearly controlling the timetable of the trade negotiations with Mexico and Canada, the ratification this year of an agreement now seems increasingly unlikely.

Is the government prepared to leave the negotiations in limbo until the issue is decided by some future U.S. administration? Or given the work already completed, would the government participate in a separate Canadian–Mexican deal as a senior Canadian trade official said last May?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, our objective and the objective of all three countries is to proceed quickly with negotiations.

We are going to be having a meeting of the trade ministers from the three countries next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. At that time, we will be reviewing the status of the main outstanding issues. This will not be the final meeting of the negotiations by any means. That will give us an up–to–date status of the negotiations. At that stage, we hope to give direction to the negotiators.

The timing of this as it relates to the disposition of the U.S. Congress to deal with the matter is still very much up in the air as my hon. friend probably saw in The Globe and Mail article this morning. It is something that we are following very closely.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the question of timing raises a further question, as the minister knows full well, of what happens if the trilateral negotiation remains in limbo.

Last year the Mexican Ambassador to Canada raised the possibility of a separate Mexican–Canadian agreement in the event that the trilateral deal is stalled in Washington. A Canadian trade official endorsed that proposal and noted that in Canada it would be received with interest.

Is the minister saying today that he regards that as an option if the trilateral agreement becomes caught up in the U.S. presidential election?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. presidential election is in early November. The conclusion of the fast–track authority that the U.S. Congress is operating under is February 28, 1993. So my hon. friend has asked a somewhat hypothetical question. I just draw to his attention that there are a few months within that period where the matter could be dealt with if there is an initial agreement.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it does very little to help the fishermen who are going out beyond the 200–mile limit to try to impress upon the world the ecological disaster that results from this foreign overfishing. The Liberals blame the Tories and vice versa. The Liberals know about the Economic Council of Canada report in 1980 and the Kirby report in 1982 with which they did the same as the Tories have done, nothing.

The question is where do we go from here? Has the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans considered going to the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization meeting and proposing some measures that would strengthen that organization and give it the teeth that it needs to police its own members?

• (1440)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see this interest from the land-based New Democratic Party on this issue.

An hon. member: What about B.C.?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not like being interrupted; I know the House wants to listen to me.

In the past, we have already put suggestions before NAFO that the objection procedure which allows the member to object to a decision which does not apply to him be changed.

We have before NAFO now many suggestions including suggestions to improve surveillance and enforcement and the placing of observers in every vessel that fishes the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We have proposed an international observer force. We have proposed a hail system under which all catches would be reported when the vessel left from one zone to go to another zone, aerial surveillance, and a whole host of other measures.

We already have before NAFO many suggestions that would put in place an effective surveillance enforcement system which is badly needed because the EC does not know what its own member nations are doing. They do not properly report to the EC as it revealed in a report on its own internal waters just a week or two ago. It simply does not know what its member states are doing.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister answering the question, when he did get to it.

With respect to the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development, I understand the Prime Minister intends to appear at that conference. In the event that the resolution the minister talked about earlier this afternoon is not accepted at that meeting, is the Government of Canada prepared to ask for international co-operation for a unilateral campaign by Canada to save those stocks beyond the 200-mile limit?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we proposed. We think that the only effective way to achieve results is to get at least a good majority of the world's nations on our side with respect to the need for straddling stocks to be managed by the coastal states. That is the way we are proceeding, by persuasion, which is the diplomatic way of proceeding.

If all our efforts bilaterally and multilaterally, which have been under way for two or three years, do not result in effective progress in that manner, then we will have to consider what other options we have.

Quite obviously, no one country can force all of the other countries of the world to change their position with respect to the right of navigation in the high seas and the present international regime took many years for us to reach that point. We are trying to proceed by persuasion. If we are able to show the rest of the world in a few months time that we made every effort to do it this way and still nothing happens, then we may have to have recourse to other methods.

AVIATION SAFETY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Is it the view of the government that concerns within the Department of Transport about its ability to ensure compliance with safety legislation, regulations and standards should be brought to the Minister of Transport for review and action or is the government prepared to leave safety to lower levels of concern?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and I welcome the hon. member's question and his continued concern for and commitment to safety in transportation in Canada.

For the record, the minister publicly acknowledged the Moshansky report last week in several answers to the member and others. There were 191 recommendations in that report. The minister set in place an implementation team, which includes industry, to ensure prompt and decisive action with regard to that report.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, Justice Moshansky in his report identifies a series of reports, memorandums and so on that identified concerns about the ability of the department to ensure the safety of the travelling public. My question for the government is very specific. At what date were these concerns brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the minister is continuing to receive reports and recommendations to enhance transportation safety in Canada.

In addition to the report and as Mr. Justice Moshansky has said: "I think it is safe to fly in Canada. I think we have one of the safest transportation systems in the world".

TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In an article which appeared in The Toronto Star on March 28 the minister clearly concedes that his government has not worked hard enough in the area of training. I agree with the minister's admission of his government's failure.

He stated that Canada should be training one million workers a year. Last year it only trained 350,000. The minister clearly accepts that the onus for restructuring the job market is the responsibility of the government. I congratulate the minister for accepting the blame. What is he going to do about?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what an entrée by the hon. member. I guess if he cannot find arguments against the strategy of the government on adjustment and restructuring he might find solace in that article. But perhaps he should go on reading it.

I know that the Liberal Party opposed this vehemently, both here and in the Senate, but when we tried to activate these passive funds under UI to enable unemployed Canadians to get better skills they were opposed to it. This is Bill C-21. This is the Labour Force Development Strategy.

Last year we trained 350,000 people. This year $1.8 billion will be spent on training unemployed Canadians and close to 650,000 Canadians will benefit from training.

Part of the article also tells about partnerships. That is why we are working with the private sector, labour and business, and provincial governments so that every one in Canada will put more resources toward training people which is the key to success in a competitive world.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The minister with his answer has admitted that his government has failed Canadians in the area of training. Unfortunately his response is inadequate.

First the government is going to study Canada's 28 economic sectors to identify gaps in training. Then it is going to bring together experts to develop a national training program, but so far only two sectors have been studied.

I ask the minister why it has taken him so long to realize that training is so vital to the future prosperity of this nation.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is ridiculous. The hon. member should look around and see what is happening in Canada.

When he claims that only two industrial sectors have gotten together, he should maybe talk to the Minister for International Trade.

Stop reading articles in the paper and go to the book and look at the government boards, the Labour Force Development Board. Talk to the private sector. He will find that not only two sectors have gathered together and are looking at how they can be more competitive in Canada, there are tens of sectors that are doing that.

Obviously the hon. member needs briefing. I would welcome him and we will take him through everything that is done under the Labour Force Development Strategy and then he will stand up in the House and thank and congratulate the Conservative government.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

With the deepening debate about Senate reform and a Triple-E Senate, many of my constituents, and I am sure many Canadians everywhere, are wondering if there is not a better or different way.

We have had and been well served by a process called the first ministers' conference process in this country. When the Prime Minister and the premiers get together they truly are elected, equal and effective.

• (1450)

My question is this. If the subject of Senate reform develops to be an obstruction to constitutional renewal in Canada, is the minister and the government prepared to consider the alternative of abolishing the Senate and pursuing the Council of the Federation concept as was contained in their original proposals?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly abolition is one option if other things do not work. Our strong preference is for a profound change in the other place that would involve election, effectiveness and as close to equality as we can find.

I think we all know, sir, that this Canada round requires flexibility. We have seen flexibility from Quebec, we have seen flexibility from aboriginal leaders, we have seen flexibility from the proponents of the social charter. We are going to need that throughout the piece if we are going to make progress.

If any Canadians stick with extreme positions, we run the risk not only of losing the cause they are interested in, but we run the risk of losing this country. No responsible elected leader anywhere in Canada would want to accept the responsibility for that.

We had proposed, as the member says, the use of a federal-provincial device, the Council of the Federation. That was discussed at a Calgary conference, the same conference that found that the Triple-E Senate did not enjoy broad support. That was put aside.

Beaudoin-Dobbie has come in with another proposal that would make use of federal-provincial relations. We certainly would look very seriously at that.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The government's green plan extols the virtue of a well-informed public in environmental decision-making. Yet in spite of government statements to the contrary, a loud public outcry and vigorous internal scientific opposition, the International Joint Commission has announced the closure and dispersal of the largest, most valuable environmental library in the country. This is supposedly for budgetary reasons in spite of repeated surpluses in that budget.

What action does the government plan to take in response to this arrogant disregard for the public interest or is what the IJC is doing consistent with government policy? Is it government policy to see a diminished IJC, a discredited IJC?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the decision taken by the IJC was taken in fulfilment of its mandate, which is to provide public information, but not necessarily to provide access to a library. It has kept the useful parts of its library for its own purposes. It will continue to respond to public inquiries that have to do with its mandate, but its mandate does not include running a library.

Indeed it is a strong IJC that we are looking for, particularly in connection with pollution in the Great Lakes and other files that they are working on. I believe we are going to have that. It has nothing to do with whether it has a library or not.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. In fact, the very respected environmental group, Great Lakes United, which fights very hard against pollution across the Great Lakes basin, has said that the library is crucial, public access to the library is crucial and if the IJC does not reverse its decision, there is going to be serious consequences for scientific advance in the fight against pollution.

I want to ask the minister if this government will listen to these environmental groups that are fighting for the Great Lakes and will tell the IJC to reverse a decision which so dangerously threatens the Great Lakes security of thousands and thousands of Canadians.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no I am not going to ask the IJC to reverse its decision. Certainly there are many groups that are interested in information on the environment and both the Department of the Environment and the IJC will be happy to provide information that falls within its mandate.

I would suggest that if there is a need for a library and some other organizations want one, they should start one.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. We now know that the male-female wage gap is at an unacceptable 32 cent differential. Moreover, the government's proposal to eliminate the Pay Research Bureau, a branch that collects information to set pay and benefits within the Public Service, will further widen that gap.

In light of these statistics, will the minister immediately reinstate funding for the Pay Research Bureau, thus guaranteeing retroactive pay equity settlements within the Public Service?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that this government is committed to pay equity and it has shown it by making the largest settlement ever in the history of any government in the world.

Mr. Valcourt: How much?

Mr. Loiselle: It is $370 million plus $80 million a year.

I agree that we need to keep careful watch over this and make sure that over the coming years, the situation is improved where warranted. We are very proud of our record on pay equity.

As far as the management of pay within the Public Service is concerned, there are many ways of having access to information about pay in all sectors. We do not need to establish a pay research bureau.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from a public servant who is not too proud of the government's record on pay equity. She has a masters of library science, the lowest paid of all scientific and professional job classifications in the Public Service. This woman loves her work but is forced into taking a masters in public administration in order to break out of the pink collar ghetto.

The future of millions of Canadian working women rests in the hands of this minister. I ask that given that equal pay for work of equal value came into law in 1977, that this minister and this government agree to meet its own pay equity obligations.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have said we are committed to pay equity. We are acting in the most responsible manner and I do not accept the view expressed by the hon. member.

I would add further that through PS 2000 we are making changes which will be very favourable. Classification removal, for example, will give access to women to a greater number of jobs, better training and very full access to equity.

This government has a very good record. We are going to continue to be attentive to this, but we feel that we have respected the law fully.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Last week the government announced a 37-cent increase in old age pensions. This is on top of a whopping 75-cent increase in January. Thirty-seven cents will not buy a glass of milk or a postage stamp.

When is this government going to give seniors the proper funding they need in order to have a decent standard of living?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I never believed that the Liberals would like to have more inflation, but that is exactly what will happen. The member should know that the formula we use is based on protecting the capacity of senior citizens to spend at the same level at which they spent the year before. That formula is calculated every three months.

The question is not the 37-cents on the cheque. This year, with the low rate of inflation, we have protected seniors' capacity to spend money as they did one year ago. I am surprised because I expected that for once the Liberals would congratulate me, but it will be for the next time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): My supplementary question is for the same minister.

No progress has been made for seniors in the fight against poverty since this government came into power. There are more single women over 65 living in poverty today than there was 10 years ago. The last time pensions were raised above inflation was by the Liberal government in 1984. When is this government going to take serious action against poverty among seniors?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be honest with my friend. I will always stand up for seniors. But as long as in this country people have to fight to protect their jobs, as long as working people have to accept the lowering of their salaries to save their jobs, as long as children as you ask me every week need to be helped, I will stand by the policy I have for seniors, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence who last week announced the fact that the Toronto military supply depot was being moved to Montreal.

Metropolitan Toronto, the traditional cash cow of Confederation, is already reeling under an unemployment rate that is above the national average. Will the minister, as was done in the case of Summerside, Prince Edward Island, set up a committee to find compensation for the closing of this base?

Will the minister also advise the House whether the decision to move to Montreal is contingent upon Quebec remaining in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, during the last fiscal year, the Minister of Finance announced a $2 billion reduction in defence expenditures over the next five years, in addition to the $4 billion reduction announced in 1989. With such a contribution to deficit reduction, the Department of National Defence obviously had to take steps. For instance, the Canadian forces establishment will be reduced by 11 per cent. Our depots—one in Edmonton and one in Montreal—will be unified, which means savings of $35 million a year. I think that was a logical and fiscally responsible decision. I think under the circumstances it was the right decision to make, Mr. Speaker.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The softwood lumber market in the United States is so brisk that the 14.48 per cent interim countervailing duty on Canadian imports has been almost completely absorbed by American consumers. In Colombus, the aggregate price of lumber increased from $290.20 U.S. per 1,000 board feet, on March 6, to $325.74 U.S. now.

In view of these latest developments, can the minister confirm today that the stream of sawmill closures in Canada now seems to have been contained? What does he intend to do next on that issue?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend is right. The price of lumber has indeed risen by almost $100 as a result of the U.S. government decision. I think that he is right when he says that the better part of the increase in countervailing duties was passed on to the American consumers. Our position, at the present time, is to present a very strong position to the American administration, with the support of the provinces as well as that of the industry in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. I think that once the process regarding the countervailing duty is completed, we will have a finding in favour of the Canadian industry.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Today we read about another tragic event with regard to child poverty and the death in 1987 of a child from God's Lake Narrows in northern Manitoba. I just toured those communities and of the 11 communities I toured last week not one of them has water and sewer systems. These are areas with total population in excess of 10,000 people.

Why is it that the federal government's plan is to bring water and sewage into those communities; not to pay for the hook-ups into the houses, not to pay for toilets, not to pay for sinks but to insist that bands which just do not have the money use their very limited capital funds?

Does the minister not realize that with that approach native people will not have water and sewer systems in their homes?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I certainly know that there are a small number of aboriginal communities remaining in Canada with water and sewer systems that are not yet up to the national standard.

That is why the government approved new funding of $250 million. It was announced a year ago. Upgrades in those affected communities, which are a small number of all native communities in Canada, are under way.

The question of the hook-ups has to do with distinguishing between the band support financing and their capital planning for which most bands receive budgets well in excess of $1 million, up to $5 million or more per year in many cases, on the basis of a long-range formula financing arrangement and the bringing of the main infrastructure services into those communities.

If the hon. member has a specific aspect of this problem he would like me to look into further, I would be most pleased to do so.

TRADE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, we are in the fourth year of the free trade agreement and yet there is no definition of a subsidy.
