The inhabitants of Dalhousie incommon with those of the County of Restigouche, have fauch pleasure in extending to Your Honor and your amiable lady and daughter, a sordial welcome, to this extreme Northern section of the Province.

We congratulate Your Honor on the success which has attended Your Honor's administration of a Prevince that is proud to own you as a son, and trust that although this is the first, it may not be the last official visit you may honor us with. We much regret that Your Honor could not be conveyed to this town by Railroad, still we confidently hope that our many natural advantages, prominent among which is our noble Harbour, second to none in the Dominion for capacity and safety, will at no distant day lead to our having direct communications by rail from our own port to that of others in the Dominion.

That Your Honor and family may salves, were not the prime movers in the fishery agitation which we believe is subsiding in the County, it also shows that they are rather too easily set in motion by persons who may have personal advantage of their own to promote thereby rather than the true interests of they are rather too easily solutions they are rather too easily solutions who may have personal advantage of their own to promote thereby rather than the true interests of those they profess to be desirous of service rendered in constant of the body.

At Chatham, 3rd July, of Diptheria, Samuel Upham, second son of Samuel Upham, second son of Samuel Upham, we believe will yet feel convinced that the Advance has, all along, been endeavoring them—must bear in mind that them—must bear in mind that be well to to the fact that some of them dealt with criminal and other matters which are entirely within the Province of the Dominion Statutes. He also spoke in favor of reducing the tax on public performances to serve them—must bear in mind that when we published the little paragraph in Chatham.

The Printing Committee reported that they had accepted Messrs. W. & J. Anslow's tender for printing the Bye was not the fishermen who were taking laws.

On motion of Coun. Park the appointment by the Lands Committee of Mesrs.

A. Stewart, J. R. Nicholson and Hiraun A. Fish, as a Committee to take charge of the Public Square at Newcastle, was confirmed.

Coun. Park also suggested that the Lands Committee be empowered to plank.

Was not the fishermen who were taking the initiatory interest in the representative case, but other persons. We intimated that the resolutions were sent down from Chatham and passed at the meeting, and while we accept Mr. Williston's explanation and correction as entirely true, so far as he is concerned, yet he, as well to three months imprisonment in gaol.

therefore, their chances for success are being weakened, we hold that the case a great deal of work having been disposed of at the two sessions already held this year.

Good for the typhoon from the south, since it will send us in the right direction," replied Mr. Fogg.

He had all the schooner's sails that the yards brought on deck. The pole-masts were dispensed with. All hands went forward. The hatches were carefully fastened. Not a drop of water could then enter the hull of the read. A single triangular sail, a foresail of strong canvas, was hoisted as a sterm-jib, so as to hold the schooner to the wind behind. And they waited.

John Buneby had begged his passengers to go down into the cabin; but in the sarrow space almost deprived of air, and knocked about by the waves, this imprisonment had in it nothing agreeable. Neither Mr. Fogg, nor Mrs. toods, nor even Fix was contented to leave the deck.

The pilot could not at first comprehend for a few moments what this answer meant; how much obstinacy and tenecity it comprised. Then he cried:

"Ah well, yes! your honor is right. The pilot could be proved to the north.

"And the direction of the Tankadero was unwaveringly kept to the north.

It was truly a terrible night! It was a miracle that the little craft did not capsize. Twice she was submerged, and everything would have been carried off the deck, if the fastening of the ropes had given way. Mrs. Aouda was worn out, but she did not utter a complaint. More than once Mr. Fogg had to rush toward her to protect her from the violence of the waves.

Daylight reappeared. The tempest was still raging with the graatest fury. However, the wind fell again into the southeast. It was a favorable change, and the Tankadere resumed her way on this high sea, whose waves then struck those produced by the new direction of the wind. Thence a shock of counterrolling waves, which would have crush-od a less solidly built bark.

From time to time through the broken mist the coast could be perceived, but not a ship in sight. The Tankadere was the only one keeping the sea.

The short duration of the tempest was owing to its very violence. The passengers, completely worn out, could eat a little and take some rest.

The night was comparatively quiet. The pilot had the sails again hoisted at a low reef. The speed of the vessel was considerable. The next day, the lith, at daydawn, the coast being sighted, John Busby was able to assert that they were not one hundred miles from Shanghai.

But the vessel was so light, and her high sails, of a fine material, caught the capricious breeze so well that, with the current in their favor, at aix o'clock John Busby counted only ten miles to Shanghai river, for the city itself is situated at a distance of twelve miles at least above the mouth. At seven o'clock they were still three miles from Shanghai. A formidable oath escaped from the pilot's lips. It was evident

This passenger was Passepartout himagreeable. Neither Mr. Fogg, nor Mrs. though, nor even Fix was contented to leave the deck.

Towards eight o'clock the storm of rain and wind struck the deck. With mothing but her little bit of sail, the Tankadere was raised like a feather by the wind, the violence of which could not well be described in words. Compare her speed to quadruple that of a locomotive rushing along under full the sail of the training the whole day the vessel rain on thus towards the North, carried by the tremendous waves, preserving, fortunately, a rapidity, a rapidity and respective of the same was there as a seat on deck.

This passenger was Passepartout himself. This is what happened:

Some minutes after Fix left the smoking-house draw waters raised Passepartout, who was in a deep sleep, and laid him on the bed reserved for the smokers. But, three hours later, Passepartout, pursued even in his bad dreams to the narcotic. The thought of unaccomplished duty shook off his torpor. He porting himself by the wall, falling and on by a sort of instinct. He finally went out of the smoking-house, crying in a dream, "the Carnatic! the Carnatic!"

There were to be seen splendid avenues of firs and cedars; the sacred gates of a strange architecture; bridges half hid in the midst of bamboos and reeds; temples sheltered under the immense and melancholy shade of aged cedars, retreats in the depths of which vegetated the priests of Buddhism and the sectaries of the religion of Confucius; interminable streets in which could have been gathered a whole crop of children, rose-tinted and red-cheeked, good little people that might have been cut out of some native screen, and which were people that might have been cut out of some native screen, and which were playing in the midst of short-legged poodles, and yellowish, tailless cats, very indolent, and very affectionate.

In the streets there was a constant swarn, going and coming incessantly; priests passing in procession, beating their monotonous tambourines; patrolmen, Custom House or police officers, with pointed hats incrusted with lace, and arriving two sabres in their botts; men, Custom House or police officers, with pointed hats incrusted with lace, and carrying two sabres in their be'ts; addies dressed in blue cottonado, with white stripes, and armed with percussion muskets, guards of the Mikado, enveloped in their silken doublets, with hauberk and coat-of-mail, and a number of other military men of all ranks—for in Janan the profession of a soldier is as large and instruments, provisions, and has a kerosene stove to cook on, and fifteen gallons of kerosene oil for cooking and illuminating purp oscs.

The Storm in Sr. John on Saturday night last appears to have been very severe. The Telegraph's weather report for the 24 to oursending 10 p. m. Sunday night says:

So saying, Passepartout descended to the saloon. Mr. Fogg was not there. Passepartout had but one thing to do: to ask the purser which cabin Mr. Fogg occupied. The purser replied that he did not know any passenger of that name.

"Pardon me," said Passepartout,

Passepartout had for a moment feared that he had mistaken the vessel!

But though he was on the Carnatic, he was certain that his master was not there.

Passepartout dropped into an armchair. It was a thunder-stroke for him.

And suddenly there was a gleam of light. He recollected that the hour of departure for the Carnatic had been accommodated itself very well to quarters and of instance on the opposite, are carried up three storeys in the form of a tower, and finished with steep pitch roof, terminated with ornamental cast iron cresting.

The internal arrangements will be excellent. The first floor will be entered, from Queen street, by a hall 14 feet wide, connected with a cross hall 13 feet wide.

This flat will contain four Model School rooms. Two of these will be 28x45 feet accommodated itself very well to quarters are dispanded as presents.

He had nothing better to do than to take chance for the vicinity, he started on his perilons. A small brass cannon stood on the forward deck of the Tankadere. It served to make signals in hazy weather. The cannon was loaded to the muzzle, but at the moment that the pilot was going to apply a red-hot coal to the touch-hole, Mr. Forg said:

"Hoist your flag."

The flag was hoisted half-mast. It was a signal of distress, and it was to be hoped that the American steamer, perceiving it, would change her course for a moment to assist the little canton sounded through the air.

There, as at Hong Kong, and as at Calcutta, there was a confused swarm of people of all races, Americans, English, Chinese, Dutch, merchants ready to sell everything and to buy everything, in the midst of whom the Frenchman found himself as if he had been cast into the Hottentot country.

The Carnatic, having left Hong Kong on the 6th of November, at half-past six P. M., turned under full head of steam towards the Japanese shores. She carried a full load of freight and passengers. Two cabins aft were uncocupied. They were the ones retained for Mr. Phileas Fogg.

The next morning the men in the forward part of the vessel saw, not without some surprise, a passenger, with half-stupefied eyes and disordered head, coming out of the second cabin, and with tottering steps taking a seat on deek.

this voyager, it is indeed a daring exploit -alone in a little boat sixteen feet in length, with a voyage of 3000 miles before him. Day and night for at least two months, and it may be three, he will be on the water, with no living soul near by, except that he may possibly speak some vessel. He must get his sleep as best he can; but in rough weather he will surely have as much as he wishes to attend to, to keep his craft affoat. If he does succeed, his experience will be well worth hearing, and we shall probably publish his narrative, and watch anx iously for any tidings from him, from vessels which may speak him, or from the bottles he will throw overboard containing an account of his whereabouts. He goes well provided with nautical instruments,

The passengers were concluded over by the showers of spray, which they received hill over by the showers of spray, which they received philosphically. Fix did not like it, doublets, but the intrepid douds, with lare syss fixed upon her companion, whose coolness she could only admire, thowed herself worthy of him, and braved the storm at his side. As for Philose Fogg, it seemed an if this typhoon formed a part of his programme.

The seed struck her with a violence well. What will Mir. Fogg any I nany event I have not missed the steamer, and this step principal thing. The steamer of the storm John Bunsbay approached Mr. Fog ed by Fix in this affair? Would it not be better to wait until his return to London, to tell him that an agent of the Metropolitan police had followed him, and then have a laugh with him? Yes doubtless. In any event, it was a matter to be looked into. The most pressing thing was to rejoin Mr. Fogg and beg him to pardon him for his inexcusable conduct.

Fusepartout waited tot solid stored to solid stored this checkered crowd, looking at the curious and rich shops; the bazaars where are heaped up all the dispaly of Japanese jewelry; the restaurants, adorned with streamers and banners, into which he was interdicted from entering; and those tea-houses in which are drank full cups of the warm, tagrant tea, with "saki"—a liquor extracted from fermented rice—and those comfortable smoking-house, where very fine tobacco is smoked, and not opium, whose use is almost unknown in Japan.

Then Passepartout found himself in the fields, in the midst of this checkered crowd, looking at the curious and rich shops; the bazaars where are heaped up all the dispaly of Japanese jewelry; the research was tree to be looked into. One hundred miles, and only this day eight to make the distance! That very evening Mr. Fogg ought to arrive at Shanghai, if he did not wish to miss the departure of the Yokohama steamer. Without this storm, during which he lost several hours, he would not, at this moment, have been thirty miles from port.

The breeze sensibly slackened, but fortunately the sea fell with it. The schooner was covered with canvas. Poles, stay-sails, counter-jibs, all were carried, and the sea foamed under her keel.

At noon, the Tankadere was not miss the word to the rice fields. But he had to put a make the distance of the receive in the midest of the many-colored lanterns, looking at the more than forty-five would be?
