House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION, FIFTH PARLIAMENT.

THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT of the Dominion, which had been prorogued from the 17th day of May, 1882, and thence from time to time, was dissolved by Proclamation on the 18th day of May, 1882; and, Writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the Despatch of Business, on Thursday, the 8th day of February, 1883, and did accordingly meet on that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 8th February, 1883.

On which day, being the first day of the meeting of the First Session of the Fifth Parliament, for the Despatch of Business,—John George Bourinot, Esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, Donald William Macdonell, Gustavus William Wicksteed, Henry Hartney, and François Fortunat Rouleau, Esquires, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the Oath to Members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty;—Richard Pope, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said John George Bourinot a book containing a list of the names of the Members returned to serve in his Parliament.

The aforesaid Commissioners did administer the Oath to the Members who were present, which being done and the Members having subscribed the Roll containing the Oath, they repaired to their seats.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

Gentlemen,

The Honorable Sir William Johnstone Ritchie, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honorable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Honorable Sir William Johnstone Ritchie, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the causes of calling this Parliament will be declared.

And the House being returned,

ELECTION OF A SPEAKER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, addressing himself to the Clerk, said: Mr. BOURINOT, I have the honor to propose that George Airey Kirkpatrick, Esq., the member representing the Electoral District of the County of Frontenac, do take the Chair as Speaker of this House. To those of this House who sat in former Parliaments I need say very little about the qualifications of the hon. member for Frontenac for this important position. He has been in Parliament since 1870. He succeeded my revered friend, his own father, who sat in Parliament until his death, and he has represented that county ever since. Four times he has received the confidence of the electors of Frontenac, and I believe, indeed I know and am well assured, that his conduct during the period he has been in Parliament has gained for him the esteem, I might almost say the affection, of his brother members. He has been an active member of Parliament since 1870; he has paid great attention to the business of the House, in the House and in Committee; he is, I believe, thoroughly versed in the practice of Parliament, and in every respect, Mr. Bourinot, I do not think I can present any name more acceptable to this House than that of George Airey Kirkpatrick, Esq., the hon. member for Frontenac.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). Mr. BOURINOT,—I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. Premier of the Government for the election of Mr. George Kirkpatrick as Speaker of this House. As my hon. colleague has just said, those who have sat with Mr. Kirkpatrick during the last ten or twelve years know how useful a member of this House he has been, and especially as member of the leading committees in which the affairs of the country are considered before being submitted to this House. I should say that after the hon. gentleman who has, during the last Parliament, presided over the proceedings of this House with so much dignity and honor for himself as well as for this House, which had elected him, we could scarcely have found a member who would have presided over this House with greater dignity than the hon. member whom we now propose. It is true that the hon. gentleman, Mr. Kirkpatrick, is not as conversant with the French as with the English language; nevertheless, I think I may state that the hon. gentleman understands French well enough to follow the debates, and, when occasion occurs, to decide questions of order which may present themselves. I am convinced that the hon. member, who received part of his education in the Province of Quebec, will be happy to avail himself of this opportunity of acquainting himself with the elegant French language, which we speak freely, and that before long he will be able to express himself in French as we, the French members of this House, express ourselves in English. I hope, Mr. Bourinot, that this motion, will receive the unanimous concurrence of this House.

Mr. BLAKE. Ten years ago it was the duty of the hon. gentleman who is the leader of the Government—filling the same situation which he now fills—to discharge the same duty, which he has just now discharged, in proposing the selection of a Speaker to preside over our deliberations. It was his duty to perform that office under circumstances very similar to those under which he has discharged it to-day. As First Minister of the preceding Parliament, he was called upon to ask the House to assent to the election of a Speaker. Having obtained the confidence of the country at the preceding election, he felt called upon to move that Parliament should elect the old Speaker, to advise the House as to the course it should pursue. His opening remarks to-day were so very similar to those with which he had opened his address on that former occasion that I supposed we were to have the same speech altogether; but the conclusion differs. Allow me to recall the attention of those few of us who sat here then to what the hon. gentleman said, and the rule of conduct which he proposed to lay down. He said:

“To those hon. gentlemen who had sat under his (Mr. Cockburn's) guidance, as Speaker of the House, during the last Parliament, he (Sir John) need not address any arguments to press his claims for that important office. Five years ago he was elected to fill it, and he (Sir John) believed that during that time he had performed his duties in a manner acceptable to the House and to the country. He might say to those hon. members who occupied seats on the floor of the House for the first time, that the hon. gentleman whose name he had mentioned, had had a long experience in Parliament and in official life; that in both positions he had performed his duties honorably and well, and that during his term of office as Speaker, none of his decisions had ever been reversed. Like all other Speakers, he might have given decisions that were not acceptable to individual members. Mr. Walford, speaking on this subject in the British Parliament, had said that during his long experience he had never known a Speaker whose decisions had not been objected to on both sides of the House: among his own party, from a feeling that perhaps from fear of seeming to lean towards his friends, he had given decisions adverse to them; and by his opponents, from a belief that he had been partial to his friends. On the whole, and after all, the general tenor of a Speaker's conduct should be the guide as to whether he was fit for re-election or not. He (Sir John) was now trying to introduce the system that had obtained in England and had worked well.—That after a Speaker had served well, he should not be changed capriciously at the beginning of each Parliament."

Well, sir, the hon. gentleman who spoke a moment ago, pointed out to us the difficulty of finding, after our experience of last Parliament, a gentleman who would preside over our deliberations with equal dignity, courtesy and impartiality as had presided the late Speaker of this House. This hon. gentleman has not had the misfortune to lose his election. He is present amongst us, and I am glad to see him present in health and vigor, in the full maturity of his powers, but yet he does not receive the honor of the application of the rule which the hon. gentleman, the First Minister, propounded for our guidance in 1872. The hon. gentleman has laid down a different rule. He now says that the rule which he laid down on the occasion to which I have referred—that the general tenor of a Speaker's conduct should be the guide as to whether he was fit for re-election—that a Speaker who had served well in that capacity should not be capriciously dismissed at the commencement of a new Parliament—shall not be observed on this occasion. What is the reason for the change? Is my hon. friend in ill health? Are the rumors true that we have sometimes heard, that after all the reverses and successes which have attended his Parliamentary career, he is about to leave us for a sphere in which he will at least enjoy a measure of ease and retirement, even if it does not possess all the attractions of a Parliamentary life? Why is it that the hon. gentleman does not apply the same rule with regard to the hon. member, whose laudations we have just heard, as he laid down ten years ago? It cannot be that the hon. Minister intends to imply that the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Blanchet) is not well suited for the office—that he does not in every respect meet the views of the hon. gentleman as to what a Speaker of the House should be. At all events, I suppose we may now understand that the principle of action which the hon. gentleman followed on a previous occasion is now abrogated for some cause or other, and that another principle of action which prevailed formerly in the old Provincial Parliament is to be the one in vogue. With reference to the choice which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House, I was glad to learn from the Minister that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) possesses one qualification of importance to his office, and that is, a sufficient conversance with the language which is spoken by a number of the members of this House; and I am glad to re-echo the observations of the First Minister as to the attention which my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has paid to his Parliamentary duties, the important part which, as a private member, he has taken in many important portions of our deliberations, and the unvarying courtesy and kindness with which he has conducted his share in our debates. I have no doubt that he will in all these respects adequately fulfil the great trust which it is proposed to repose in him. I hope, too, that in addition to the observance of perfect impartiality as presiding officer of this Chamber, he will endeavor to maintain the dignity of this House by some more active steps, on certain occasions, than former Speakers have taken, by the repression, at the earliest moment, of incidents, which, when prolonged only become more lamentable; and in doing so I can assure him that he will receive the most cordial support from this side of the House that we can give him. I may add my personal congratulation to the hon. member as an old friend—upon the honor which it is proposed to bestow upon him—our friendship having commenced before we entered the stormy scene and having continued unbroken ever since.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. BOURINOT, I am sorry to disturb in the least the amicable arrangements that appear to exist between the two sides of the House by saying a word which would jar upon the feelings of anyone. I cordially agree with what has been stated as to the excellent personal qualities of the proposed Speaker, and the pleasure I have enjoyed in my intercourse with him in the work of the House, and in the committees of the House. All that is perfectly true. But an occurrence took place on a former occasion which leads me to a different conclusion as to one point. If there is one thing more than another which it is the duty of the Speaker to do, it is to maintain the balance fairly between the two parties—irrespective of party proclivities or party leanings—to see that ample justice is done to every member, and that every member is sufficiently protected under all existing circumstances. On the 12th of May, 1879, a person, well known to hon. gentlemen in this House, wantonly insulted a prominent member of Parliament—though I attach no importance to his prominence, as the humblest member is equally entitled to protection with the most prominent. That case was brought before the House by myself, and I recollect, with some pain, that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and one or two other hon. gentlemen on that side, did everything but excuse the wanton insult committed against that member. I allude to the late member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). Now, sir, while I have no desire at all to say one word disparaging to the candidate for the Speakership, I am bound to say this: that it would have been far more acceptable to me—entirely acceptable indeed—but for the events of that unfortunate occasion. Having thus entered my protest against what I conceived to be a wanton violation of the duties of this House towards a brother member, I say no more on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BOURINOT. I declare Mr. Kirkpatrick duly chosen to occupy the Chair of this Honorable House as its Speaker.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK was conducted from his place to the Chair by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Hector Langevin.

Mr. SPEAKER, ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: I beg to tender my grateful acknowledgments to the House for the honor it has conferred upon me, in electing me to be its Speaker. It will be always my desire to deserve the confidence reposed in me. I am sensible of my unfitness for the position; but relying upon the kindness and co-operation of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, I shall endeavor to do my duty to the best of my ability, and to discharge the functions of the Chair with fairness and impartiality. I hope the House will sustain me in vindicating our rights and privileges, in maintaining our Rules and Orders, and in securing the freedom of debate, according to our established usages.

And the Mace, which before lay under the Table, was laid upon the Table.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 9th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER Elect having taken the Chair,

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

MR. SPEAKER,

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honorable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker Elect, with the House went up to the Senate Chamber ;

Then the HONORABLE GEORGE AIREY KIRKPATRICK, SPEAKER ELECT, said :

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and Country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of Speech in their Debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all reasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favorable consideration.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the Senate then said :

MR. SPEAKER,

I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's Person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow, their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all reasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favorable construction.

Then His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned,

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honor to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen on me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Weldon, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, Certificate and Report in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of King's, N.B., declaring the Election of G. E. Foster, Esq., null and void.

Also, Certificate and Report from the Hon. Mr. Justice Mathieu, in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of Joliette, declaring the Election of E. Guibault, Esq., null and void.

He also informed the House, that in conformity with the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 10, Sections 5 and 36, the Clerk of the House had issued his Warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out new Writs of Election for the said Electoral Districts, respectively.

MR. SPEAKER further informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Chagnon, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, Certificate and Report in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of Napierville, declaring M. Catudal, Esq., duly elected.

Also, Certificate and Report from the Hon. Mr. Justice Mathieu, in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of Terrobonne, declaring the Hon. J. Chapleau duly elected.

Also, Certificate and Report from the Hon. Mr. Justice Patterson, in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of the South Riding of Norfolk, declaring J. Jackson, Esq., duly elected.

Also, Copy of Certificate and Report in the matter of the Election for the Electoral District of Verchères, declaring the Hon. F. Geoffrion duly elected.

NEW MEMBERS.

MR. SPEAKER further informed the House, that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Certificates of the Election and Return of the following members, viz:—

Of the Hon. JOSEPH ADOLPHE CHAPLEAU, for the Electoral District of Terrebonne;
Of FLAVIEN DUPONT, Esq., for the Electoral District of Bagot ;
Of EDWARD GUILBAULT, Esq., for the Electoral District of Joliette ; Of GEORGE R. L. G. H. S. DE BEAUJEU, Esq., for the Electoral District of Soulanges ; and
Of GEORGE E. FOSTER, Esq., for the Electoral District of King's, New Brunswick.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

Bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day, in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is my pleasing duty, on the opening of a new Parliament, to congratulate you on the auspicious circumstances under which you will begin your labors.

Canada is in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity, and all her industries, agricultural, manufacturing and commercial, are in a healthy and improving condition.

Following the example of my distinguished predecessor, I paid a visit of some length to British Columbia last season. The great natural resources of that Province promise that as soon as the Pacific Railway is completed, an impulse to its prosperity, commensurate with the progress made elsewhere, will be assured. Meanwhile, the disposal of the lands set aside in aid of the Railway to actual settlers will add to the importance and wealth of the Province.

While passing through the United States I was rejoiced to observe many evidences of regard for the Empire of which this country forms so large a portion. May this friendship, which is so fully returned by us, be as enduring as it is natural and advantageous to the mutual interests of both great nations.

The steady flow of settlers into Manitoba and the North-West Territories last year, and the assurances received of an increased immigration during the coming season, promise well for the early development of those fertile and salubrious regions.

It is important that the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament should be amended, and the electoral franchises existing in the several Provinces assimilated. A measure for this purpose will be submitted for your consideration.

I am advised that the Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered last June on the appeal of Russell versus the Queen, goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary. Your earnest consideration of this important subject is desired.

Your attention is specially invited to a measure regulating Factory Labor and the protection of the workingman and his family.

Bills for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to the Customs, the Militia, and the Public Lands, will be laid before you.

Among other measures, Bills will be presented to you respecting the Civil Service, the Acts relating to Banking, and the examination of Masters and Mates of vessels navigating our inland waters.

I am glad to be able to inform you that the progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been quite unprecedented. Traffic can now be carried on the main line from Thunder Bay to within fifty miles of the crossing of the South Saskatchewan, a distance of over one thousand miles. It is confidently expected that the Rocky Mountains will be reached during the present year, and that within the same period substantial progress will be made on the Lake Superior Section of the Railway, and the track laid upon a large portion of the road now under contract in British Columbia.

I have also pleasure in stating that the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway is largely in excess of any former year, and that the balance in favor of the road shows a gratifying increase.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last fiscal year will be laid before you.

You will be pleased to learn that, notwithstanding the expenditure on Capital Account amounted to more than seven millions of dollars, the surplus of the Consolidated Revenue, together with the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the North-West during the year, were more than sufficient to cover that expenditure, and that the net debt at the close of the year and the amount of interest paid thereon were less than for the year previous.

The Estimates for the ensuing year will also be submitted. They have been prepared with all due economy consistent with the necessary development of the varied resources of the Dominion.

On the first January, 1885, the large 5 per cent. loan will mature. A Bill will be submitted authorizing the issue of Debentures bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. for the redemption of this loan.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The subjects I have mentioned to you are of much importance, and I commend them to your consideration, with full confidence in your discretion and patriotism.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Immigration and Colonization,—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Librarian on the state of the Library of Parliament.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which occurred yesterday. Of course the ceremony in which we took part yesterday, is one which many of us have witnessed on many previous occasions, but I think the time of members of this House is sufficiently valuable to enable us to dispense with very much of what we went through yesterday. It is true the custom is an old one, and at one time it had its raison d'être. Its origin was such that it is valuable for us to keep it in mind. At the same time I cannot see any reason why it should be perpetuated by this House, and I may say that I have consulted with some of my colleagues on the subject, and they agree with me as to the uselessness of many parts of the ceremony. In former times—seven hundred or eight hundred years ago—the Parliament of England, which we endeavor to copy in this Chamber sat in one building, and the permission of the Crown to elect a Speaker was necessary, because the House had to have a spokesman; but it seems to me that in these days of reform we might well dispense with a usage which has no meaning now. I consider that our time is too valuable for us to lose one day yesterday and I may say another to-day, so that we have to defer until Monday the consideration of His Excellency's speech. Certainly, the Crown might refuse to accept a particular person as Speaker, but the election of its Speaker is undoubtedly one of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. I do not wish to use too strong a term, and if I do, it will be owing to my unfamiliarity with the English language; but it did appear to me, that it was rather a ridiculous proceeding to invite us into the other Chamber, and to tell us to go back, choose our Speaker, and return to-morrow. I call attention to the matter, in the hope that some future Parliament may take steps to prevent such a needless waste of time.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 12th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Torrance, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, his final judgment in the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, declaring D. Girouard, Esq., duly elected.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. TUPPER. In rising to move that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the Speech delivered from the Throne, on Friday last, I rejoice greatly that I have the good fortune and the high privilege to do so at so important a period in the history of my country. I rejoice also that the time for me to move the answer to the Address has occurred when so successful a period in the history of the country has been reached. A little over fifteen years ago four British Provinces began a venture which over one hundred years ago thirteen British Colonies attempted, and those four Provinces formed a Union called Confederation. Since that time great as has been the advancement of the United States, extraordinary as has been the progress of that country, I do not hesitate to say that the progress and advancement of the British Confederation on this side of the Atlantic has been far greater in proportion than even the wonderful advancement of the country to the south of us. We can recognize with pride the fact that while during those hundred years the revenue of the American Union rose to $29,000,000 in the seventy-first year of its existence, the revenue of this country rose, in the fifteen years just closed, from $15,000,000 to $29,000,000. We have to recognize at the same time the fact that in the year 1800 the population of the American Union was as large as that of Canada to-day. Not only has our advancement been greater in regard to the revenue of the country, but I am happy to know that the increase of the population of this country has been far greater in proportion. When the Union of the Provinces was consummated, when Confederation became a settled fact, the strides that were made in the march of union and progress were such as to command the admiration of the world. But there came a pause, which we all remember, in the march of advancement. There came a time when depression seemed to linger in this country, and to predict a fate which no advocate of the Union had anticipated. At that time, it will be remembered, that one of the great parties of this country rose and said that it was confident it could restore the successful state of affairs that had been inaugurated at the date of the Union. That party then was in Opposition to the Government of the day, and while the Government had professed that it was unable, and that this party was unable to retrieve the glory and success which had been lost for a time, the Liberal-Conservative party claimed that, by a fiscal policy different from the policy which was then in force, prosperity could be restored to this country, and Canada enabled to go on advancing as before. Those were the promises made by that party, when in Opposition, and when the opportunity occurred in September, 1878, the people of this country, from one end to the other, by no uncertain verdict, declared in favor of the policy announced by the Liberal-Conservative party while in Opposition. That party acceded to office at a time when everything looked gloomy, in regard to the prospects of this country; but we all can rejoice on both sides of the House, that from the day they took office everything in the country appeared to improve. One party in this House contends, I believe at the present moment, that the prosperity which has returned since the advent of the Liberal-Conservative party to power is due not to the changed fiscal policy of the country—not to the changed railway policy of the country—but has occurred in spite of both those policies. On the present occasion I have not the desire, nor would it be a fitting opportunity, to discuss that question, but I can join with everyone in this House and in the country in expressing my gratification and delight that since the fiscal policy of the country was changed prosperity has returned to Canada to such an extent that no one can doubt the fact. We all remember that, after the changed policy had been on trial for four years, the Government went to the people of the country six months ago for an endorsement of that policy, and to ascertain whether they had faithfully kept their trust—whether they deserved a renewal of the confidence which had been reposed in them a few years ago. The result was one which is testified by the large majority which the Government has in this House. In the present Parliament we have the satisfaction of knowing that no matter what may be the different views of the two great parties of this country at the present day, the mass of the people of Canada attribute a great measure of the prosperity they are enjoying to the successful and vigorous administration of their affairs by the Government of the day. We had an expression of pleasure by the Governor General when he came down to this House that prosperity and peace exist in the land; but not only have we risen in the scale as regards our material progress, but we find that the press on the other side of the Atlantic is alive to-day to the marvellous growth and development of this part of the British Empire. We have passed from the colonial stage and have become an integral part of the British Empire; and not long ago the London Daily Telegraph alluded to this country as "the Greater Britain." Allusion has been made to the extended trip which was taken by the Governor General of the Dominion; and we all have lively and pleasant recollections of the tour made by his eminent predecessor. None of us, if we are at all Canadian in spirit, can ever forget the proclamation that his eminent predecessor made of the vast wealth and treasures of the North-West; and following up that happy example the present Governor General has also been anxious to testify, from personal knowledge, to the great resources which the Dominion of Canada to-day possesses. I believe, therefore, that that is no unimportant factor in the work of immigration to which this Government has paid so much and so successful attention. I believe the extended travels of the distinguished gentleman who presides over the counsels of this country, will do a great deal more in that direction than could be done by ordinary immigration agents in the service of the Government. The general question of immigration is one which has assumed, and is assuming, a position of great importance in the affairs of this country. A little over forty years ago the people of Great Britain were startled by the fact that, in the year 1841, no less than 106,000 subjects of Queen Victoria had left the British Isles, not only for the colonies but for the United States of America. This announcement caused, at that time, great comment in England. It was considered that never, from the time the Goths and Huns had overrun the Roman Empire, had such an emigration taken place from any country. To-day, Mr. Speaker, we are in the happy position of knowing that instead of 106,000 men leaving our shores for any such bellicose purpose, over 113,000 men, women and children have come into this Dominion in one year to swell its population and to aid it in the march of progress. The manner in which the Department of Agriculture has been administered must command the admiration of our people. All the immense resources that this country can boast of would be valueless without the men and without the money to make them marketable; and therefore in viewing the extraordinary immigration which has been brought about, we are not alone to thank Providence and the National Policy, but we must extend a meed of that praise to the successful administrator of the Department of Agriculture, which is charged with the regulation and control of immigration affairs. Not only has the largest number of immigrants ever known in a single year been brought in, but the Department has been so successfully managed that the per capita cost of producing that result is so small in comparison with previous years as to satisfy the strictest economist in this House. I hold in my hand some information furnished to me by the courtesy of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, which I shall give to the House, because no words of mine could so expressively of the immense progress which has been made in this respect as the figures themselves. In 1882, as I have stated, over 113,000 immigrants were brought to settle in this country, and the cost of bringing them was a little over $3 a head. In the year 1876, we find that 23,000 odd was the number brought in, and at a cost of $19.60 a head. That is a result which, I should say, ought to command the entire approbation and admiration of this House. In the year 1881, when everything was looking well in this country, and we were making rapid advances in the march of nations, the number of immigrants was only 47,961, who were brought in at a per capita cost of $6.32. Now, it must be pleasing—it must be, indeed, refreshing—to find that as the number of men coming into the country increases, the cost of bringing them here decreases in such a wonderful proportion as I have mentioned. Not only, however, have men been brought into the country, but capital has been brought here also. From an estimate made in Manitoba only a short time ago by a gentleman, most capable of judging, I find that over $10,000,000 of hard cash was brought into the North-West by immigrants during the year 1882. These are large figures which might be regarded with some doubt, but that they come from the highest authority on the subject in the Province of Manitoba. Now, I think that the fact that we are in respect of immigration rapidly treading on the heels of our neighbors; that the difference in the proportion of men who are directed to this country from the proportion who are directed to the American Union is decreasing every year, shows not merely that this country is becoming better known abroad, but that the success which has attended the administration of its affairs is equally well known. In reference to another part of the Department of Agriculture, I am very glad to see a sign of the material progress of the people of this Dominion; I refer to the Patent Office—an office which has had the special supervision of the Minister presiding over it. This House will remember that in the year 1872 the present hon. Minister of Agriculture succeeded, after many a difficult fight, in bringing in a Bill which contained a clause enabling individuals of all nationalities to enjoy the privilege which had previously been denied to them, upon the condition that the articles they patented should be manufactured in this country. What has been the result of that change? The statistics are eloquent regarding it. They show that in the year previous to the passage of that Act, the number of patents issued was 509, and the amount received in the office $14,000, while ten years after the introduction of the Act the number of patents issued had more than trebled, amounting to 1,732, and the amount received in the office was $52,000; and to-day—aided no doubt by the successful working of the fiscal policy and the railway policy of this country—the success is such, under Providence, that the number of patents issued has increased to 2,137, and the receipts to $60,000, a sum, I believe, amply sufficient not only to pay the expenses of that branch of the Government, but also to provide the interest on a sum large enough to complete an extension of apartments for the patents which are rapidly pouring in. I leave, therefore, that part of the subject with the feeling that a mere mention of these facts is sufficient to command the admiration of us all. The subject next alluded to in the Address is one that has always a peculiar interest to all people—that of the franchise. This is a question which, no doubt, will be fully discussed in the House, and will command the attention and interest of the country at large. For a long time it has seemed invidious to me that of all the Legislatures in this immense country, this Legislature alone occupied the anomalous position of not regulating the franchise by which the hon. members of this House were to be elected. It has seemed to me a curious feature in the history of a great country, occupying the position that Canada now occupies, that this House should suffer that loss of dignity, if I may use the expression, of having the qualifications for its membership regulated by other Parliaments. It has struck not me alone as curious and anomalous, for I notice that a leading paper of the Liberal Party in Nova Scotia, the Morning Chronicle, alluded, a short time ago, in the same spirit, to the necessity of legislation in regard to this important subject; and in concluding a very able article upon the question, said: "It will soon be necessary for the franchise to be made uniform by the Dominion Government." I am glad that the Government of the day have sprung to their work so quickly. I am glad that they are about to remove this curious state of affairs. As we are promised uniform legislation, and while, speaking for myself, I am not in favor of universal suffrage, I shall be glad, indeed, to see a measure brought down which will greatly extend the suffrage in the Province of Nova Scotia. I feel, as a Nova Scotian, that we can as well afford to have the suffrage extended as the larger and perhaps more prosperous Province of Ontario. I believe that while the franchise should be greatly extended, still the line must be drawn before we reach that stage arrived at in the neighboring Republic. There is a subject next touched upon in the Address, that is also one of very frequent discussion and equally one of great interest to the people of this country—a question daily growing in interest. I allude to the question of temperance. In one particular, I think there will be no discussion in this House regarding this important question. I am sure that every hon. member will agree with me in the opinion that the Parliaments of this country are bound to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors. I think the day has come when no desire to discuss that point will arise. Feeling thus, I think that since the decision in the case of the Queen vs. Russell—a decision of the highest judicial tribunal of this Empire—this House must undertake the responsibility of dealing with this important question in the way pointed out in the Speech. Not only has the Supreme Court of Canada decided that this House had jurisdiction in regulating that branch of trade, but in that decision of the Privy Council there is ample ground to show that the opinion of that high tribunal agrees with the remarks of its Chief Justice. I am, therefore, certain that the question will be approached by this House with a desire to regulate the liquor traffic in a manner conducive to the material interests of the people at large. In regard to factory labor, it is obvious that, as the country is progressing, as new industries spring up, we are being brought face to face with a large, and every day more important, class of laborers in these factories; and as the policy of the present Government is to protect the industries of the country, it must accomplish the task of affording necessary and ample protection to those engaged in building up our industries. The question of the Canadian Pacific Railway I approach with a great deal of pride and pleasure. I approach it with the pride and pleasure of a Canadian. In that pride and pleasure I recognize no party, because I feel that, as a Canadian I am bound; and I have a right to rejoice that the progress of this important work has been such as no man in this House or out of it anticipated, either last year or the year before. When a paper on the opposite side of politics to the party to which I have the honor to belong, had only the day before yesterday to meet this extraordinary advance in that work with the suggestion that it was going too fast, I have a right to feel not only a party pride, but that general pride to which I have alluded. I have no doubt that the announcement that the road had almost reached the Rocky Mountains, and would shortly reach there, came with such surprise upon the people of this country in general, that it was difficult for any person to meet the statement in a purely political manner, and therefore I was not surprised at the exclamation that the road was being built altogether too fast. I have alluded to the history of that important work, but I may recall the attention of the House to a comparison between the manner in which it was dealt with as a Government work, and that in which it was dealt with as a private enterprise. We all, indeed, are pained to look back upon those weary ten years, during which this important question hung like a pall over the face of this country. Both parties had great difficulty, it is useless to deny, in dealing with the work which now and then threatened to retard the material progress of the country; however, having entered upon the work, having induced British Columbia to join Confederation, each party recognized its bounden duty to carry that work through at all hazards. The question was how it could be done without becoming a burden on the resources of the country. That was the favorite phrase, I believe. Now, I say that with this two years of Government supervision, though the progress made was small—and I think that the paper to which I allude will agree with me that it was too small—we have the fact that during all that time, under both Governments, the sum total of mileage put under construction was something like 637 miles, while up to the time that the Liberal Government went out of power I believe not one mile was in operation. Notwithstanding that, when their successors came into power, they also found difficulties in the way in dealing with that matter as a public work. They took the responsibility, however, upon their shoulders; they saw that the work had to be completed, and they took the bold step of contracting with a company to build that work upon the terms agreed upon, and they came down and asked Parliament to ratify that contract. Parliament did ratify it; and in June last they went to the people for their approval, and the people ratified both it and the fiscal policy to which I have alluded. Now, Mr. Speaker, we were unable in June last, to predict all that has happened in the year which is past; we were unable to foresee the wonderful and extraordinary manner in which the Company has dealt with the road itself, owing to their great energy, and which has resulted in the filling up of the North-West in such a remarkable manner. At that time, sanguine as they were in regard to the prospects of this country and its resources—I may say that I have never heard any public man predict what happened during the past year in Manitoba and the North-West—not only has wonderful progress been made with the road itself, but immigration into that country, the successful inception of enterprises, the happy beginning of cities, rising, as it were, almost in a day—all this shows the successful manner in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have fought the difficulties in their way and proceeded with the construction of the road; so that instead of having only 637 miles under construction, as we had during the ten years preceding, we find that this Company, composed of private citizens and managed by private enterprise, is in the proud position of being able to show 646 miles additional of the main line under construction, and 113 miles of branch lines, making a total of 759 miles in two years. Not only that, but they can show that 561 miles are now in operation, and they are now managing and operating nearly as much as this country built during the ten years from 1871 to 1881. Now, it is not a question of mileage, it is not a question merely of so many days work, but we have the pleasant prospect before us of the work of the succeeding year, as the Company expect not only to reach the Rocky Mountains in 1883, travelling through the fertile plains, but to convey passengers and traffic over that road to the Rocky Mountains from the Atlantic Ocean, reaching the ultimate destination of the road, the Pacific itself, not later than in 1887. And can we doubt that they will succeed in overcoming all these difficulties? Why should we? They have accomplished just as much of the work during the last two years as now lies before them in the next four years, and we shall soon be able to reap the incalculable benefits to be derived from having a railway line across the continent, not the least of which will be those accruing to this country from the opening up of the immense wheat region of the North-West and the grazing lands at the base of the Rocky Mountains. The Company expect to do this in a year by using the lake from Algoma to Thunder Bay, and thus connecting the two portions of the road they will operate it until the link of the Lake Superior section is finished in 1887. Now, what does this represent to the country at large? First, we have the fact that in the present state of that road the trade between Manitoba and the North-West and Eastern Canada amounted, in the year 1881, to over $11,000,000, and in the year just past $12,000,000. We have the wonderful prospect before us of an enormous increase in traffic and immigration when that road is completed. At the same time, we observe that the world at large is now looking upon our Great North-West with surprise and admiration, a country that only a few years ago was regarded as ice bound for half the year. We find that in the neighboring Republic, where the people have a very good opinion of their own country, their Congress is now bestowing a great deal of attention upon our North-West, such as I am sure it never got before. Only a few days ago I noticed remarks on the Tariff discussion in Congress, which I think the House will pardon me for reading. A gentleman rose and said in reference to this country:

“There are five or six millions of people on the other side, and an area that is unlimited as to its future development, that may come in competition with the United States.”

He then goes on to refer to the enormous value of cattle and breadstuffs imported from this country, and, continuing, says:

“Anybody who will read the advertisement of the Canadian Pacific Railway through to the Pacific will perceive that they reach and spread out before the world a region that is amply sufficient as they claim to compete with all the world for wheat.”

Now, that shows the effect of the happy progress of that road, and it shows the important assistance that Company is giving to the Government of this country in proclaiming abroad the enormous resources of our North-West, at the same time that it shows that the energetic advertising the Company is doing is having its effect upon foreign nations. Not only that, but as we develop this country it attracts attention in no unmarked degree. In that same Congress, on another day, the resources of this country were held up to the astonishment and admiration of the world. An hon. member said:

“The gentleman from Kentucky stated that we had ample protection in the west by the increased charges of transportation on ores. This is a mistake, Mr. Chairman. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that just across the Canadian border there are vast fields of iron ore, and that it is as common in that country as in this? Does not he know that it can be mined in Canada and taken to Buffalo or Pittsburg cheaper than it can be taken to those cities from any other place except from the State of Pennsylvania alone? Does he not also know that there is no protection in that? Does he not know that on the borders of Minnesota, on the Canadian frontier, there has been discovered lately a vast deposit, the most extensive known in this country, of iron ore suitable for the very best quality of Bessemer steel, and that the cost of transportation on this ore will be but a trifle in excess of the same ore mined in Minnesota just this side of the line? This vast bed of ore of which I now speak is so great, as I have been informed, that it can supply all that is needed for the whole country for many years, and that it is also a good Bessemer ore.”

The reason I refer to those remarks is, because you will usually fail to find such advertisements of the resources of this country in the debates of the neighboring Republic. Fault is found with hon. members in this House, I believe, for having on one occasion advertised the resources of the neighboring Republic, but at that time we did not know we would have the happy answer that no less than two members of their Congress had held up to admiration the resources of the Dominion of Canada. I have shown, I think satisfactorily, that in the past the progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway has done much for this country. I leave it to the imaginations of hon. members, in view of what has taken place in the past, to predict what will happen in the future, and they know what is happening every day in fulfilment of the anxious expectations of the hon. gentlemen who had the boldness to initiate that policy only a few years ago. Coming to the railway which is still under the management and control of the Dominion Government—the Intercolonial Railway—we find that affords another index to the material progress of the Dominion. We find that, instead of a deficit of nearly $500,000, in 1878, that was incurred in the management of that road, and through the depression that prevailed in the country, the earnings have nearly doubled, and instead of a deficit the management of the road shows a surplus of $9,000. No matter how bad a thing it may be, as some hon. gentlemen hold, that the country should show a surplus, I think we will all agree that when the rates have been lowered on that road so as to be less than those on any other road in the country—when every effort has been made to satisfy the people who do their trade by it—we should all be glad that this railway, for which the Government are directly responsible, shows a balance on the right side of the ledger. Not only has the Intercolonial been maintained as a first-class road, not only has it shown an increase in regard to the amount of traffic which to a certain extent must necessarily pass over it, while the trade in the Maritime Provinces with older Canada increases, but the satisfactory manner in which it is managed is proved by the extraordinary increase in the number of passengers who travelled over the road, therefore, the road which is under the direct management of the Government shows not only an increase of traffic and an increase of passengers, but a management that redounds to the credit of those responsible for it. I now come to a subject closely allied with the matters necessarily discussed in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway—the country through which that railway runs; and I find, by figures placed in my hands, that the Department of the Interior had an equal claim with the Department of Agriculture to the gratitude of Canadians, because, owing to the successful and happy administration of the matters coming under the control of the Department, we have these extraordinary figures: that whereas the total receipts from the North-West and Manitoba, from the date of the transfer of the territory from the Hudson Bay Company up to December, 1881, amounted only to $820,000, the receipts for the year ending December, 1882, reached $2,250,000. Little need be said by myself to show the extraordinary rapidity with which the country is advancing and the satisfactory management of the Department to which I have alluded. But more than that, Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the sales negotiated during the past year, under the colonization terms, and the regulations regarding lands homesteaded and preempted, amount altogether to $10,000,000. Not only so, but $2,250,000 have already been received of that sum, the whole of which is to be paid within four years under the conditions of sale. That is the lowest calculation; but there is a probability of that sum being largely increased. If transactions to that extent have already taken place, what may we predict as to the results of subsequent years as the country is built up, becomes known abroad, and the tide of immigration continues to increase? One would hesitate to make any estimate. But we know this, that in the discussion which took place on the floor of this House in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, not a member on one side or the other dared to predict that at this time the hon. Minister of the Interior would have been able to come down to the House and show figures like these; and, therefore, if hon. members were all so ignorant as to the wonderful capabilities of the North-West and the progress it would make, then what can we not imagine to be the future of that country, and that in the near future? I have alluded to the growth of trade—the wonderful growth of trade indeed—between older Canada and the North-West; a trade which has no doubt been fostered and encouraged by the healthy working of the National Policy; and this trade, to which I have referred, under circumstances at present existing, is likely to increase, and, in fact, is sure to increase every day and from day to day; but we find in the history of Winnipeg itself—in the history of the capital of Manitoba, in the history of what, perhaps for all time, will be the important trade centre of the Great North-West—much to show that the progress of that country is certain—that it is not a fitful progress, and that it is not a progress which is likely to be stopped; but that it is the beginning of a steady and extraordinary growth. We find that, in the year 1879, the assessed value of property in the town of Winnipeg was only $3,000,000, while in the year 1882 the assessed value of property in that town amounted to no less than $30,000,000, and not only so but its population has been trebled since 1879. Now, I think that this augurs well for the growth of that town, which has stood the natural shock it has received from other and rival towns which are springing up on all sides throughout the great North-West, and therefore we have every reason to expect that we have only now seen, and do only now see, a very small portion of the wonderful prosperity and progress of that country to the west of us. I think, Mr. Speaker, that among all the tests which are often ventured by members of this House, and of other Houses of Parliament, in this relation, there are three tests which are at least satisfactory to an ordinary mind: the condition of the laboring classes, I believe, can most satisfactorily be known and ascertained by the condition of the savings banks of this country; the condition of traders by the number of failures in the country, and the condition of the country generally by the volume of trade, as shown by the exports and imports. Judged by these tests, no member of the Liberal-Conservative party has reason to be ashamed of the promises which were made by the leaders of that party a few years ago; no member of that party need hesitate to point to those figures and abide by the result. The increase in the sum of the deposits in the savings banks, during the past over the preceding year, amounts to no less than $6,000,000; the number of failures, which, I believe, can be ascertained by every hon. member of the House, I am confident will bear me out in the statement that their number is decreasing. Of course, failures will always occur, and necessarily must occur; but I am confident, and I believe that I am—and I leave myself in the judgment of the House, as I do not happen to have the figures with me—when I say that taken by that test the condition of this country is satisfactory, we have then the gratifying fact that the trade of Canada, as is shown by the imports and exports, shows an increase during the past year of $49,000,000; and I may say, in passing, that there is also this gratifying feature in regard to their view of this question—that while owing to the extraordinary manner in which this country is being filled up; owing to the extraordinary enterprise which has been shown by its people;—owing to the enormous amount of raw material which has been brought into the country, and while the imports are increasing over other years, still owing to the successful working of the National Policy, as I believe and feel confident, in proportion to the exports, the imports are decreasing, and I think that this is a most healthy and promising sign; and I also consider that it augurs well for the condition of the country. Reference has been made to other matters in connection with the financial questions which concern this country; but with these I shall not deal. Suffice it to say that the intimation which is made in the Speech from the Throne, in regard to the extraordinary surplus, in regard to the decrease in the debt and to the saving in interest on it, relates to facts which must bring pleasure to all minds alike. I feel confident, Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks, I would like, while we stand in admiration of the splendor and magnitude of all these industries which exist in the west; while we stand and are awe-struck by the successful working of every matter connected with the North-West, I would like this House to understand that we who come from the Provinces down by the sea, have no reason to feel ashamed, through our consciousness, that in this grand march we have not been laggard. We can show results which will compare favorably with all the figures which I have given to-day connected with older Canada and the North-West; and we can show that that large and important industry of the country which swells our mercantile marine, is ever growing, is ever improving; and we can show, that in regard to the fisheries, the most astounding and gratifying increase is exhibited in the value of the sales during the past year, this increase amounting to no less than $1,250,000 over the preceding year, viz.: the total value of the sales for the year 1882 exceeded the total value of the sales of fish for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—which are the provinces to which I am referring—exceeded the total value of the sales for the year 1881 by over $1,250,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, not only with regard to this industry of Canada can I turn with pride, but also to one which is looked upon perhaps with more interest in the country from which I have the honor to come—I am alluding, with a great deal of satisfaction, to the great benefits which the National Policy has conferred on the coal trade, which has exhibited a most extraordinary development. The out-put of coal is such as we never anticipated in so short a time; indeed, this was never anticipated by the men who were most interested in it. It was never anticipated by the men who were directly interested in this trade—because they find themselves at the present day unable to supply the tremendous increase in the demand for coal with the machinery which they have, and which they have provided since the National Policy conferred protection on that industry. Coming nearer to this part of the Dominion of Canada, in connection with this question, I may mention to the House a fact that was alluded to by the Chairman of the Harbor Commission of Montreal a few days ago—the increase in the amount of coal which has been brought from the Lower Provinces into and as far as Montreal in this Dominion during the last two years, has reached 100,000 tons. This is a fact which, I am sure, is very gratifying to the people of the Province, who recognize the fact that their success is linked with the success of this great industry. Moreover, while this was the case in regard to the out-put of coal, no less than $1,250,000, were paid out to the miners employed in that industry; and not only was this the case, but we find that the increase in the out-put of coal is one-half more than it was in the year 1879. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed gratifying, in connection with any part of the country, when dealing with figures, to speak of millions; but it is peculiarly gratifying to myself, when speaking of the success that enables me to use these large figures, that I can come to my own Province and do the same thing. Now, not only can I show those two tests of the success of the National Policy in the Maritime Provinces, but I am happy to see that through the statistics connected with the Intercolonial Railway itself, we are offered a new opportunity of judging of the progress which the people down by the sea are making; for we find that whereas in the year 1878, 2,000 odd tons of sugar passed over the Intercolonial, during the year 1882, 29,000 odd tons passed over that road. We find, also, that owing to the enterprise of the country and the fostering protection given to the article of iron, whereas 19,000 odd tons of iron and steel passed over the Intercolonial in 1878, 35,000 odd tons of them passed over it in 1882; and when we are doubling our trade in that way the whole country being alive not only with these but with other active enterprises, and when arrangements are being made to increase them all, surely we can join hands with our compatriots in the West and congratulate each other on the success which we know we have attained. I have alluded to the fact that the increased out-put of coal is such as could not have been anticipated by those most cognizant of the working of that industry. I do this for the reason that preparations are now being made in the Province of Nova Scotia by all these mining companies not only for putting down new shafts, but for putting in new and improved machinery and providing better shipping facilities in order to meet the anticipated increase in the demand next year; so that in every branch of trade it appears to me to be beyond question that a very great and very rapid improvement has taken place. In regard to the position which this country has commanded abroad we can turn with pleasure to events which are transpiring on the other side of the Atlantic. We have the pleasure of knowing that the people who are the most actively engaged in promoting emigration from Great Britain—and notably the Tuke Emigration Fund Committee—have not only sent out Commissioners to the United States to enquire into the condition and prospects of that country as a field of immigration, but they have sent them also to this country, and I find that the result of the comparison they made between the United States and Canada is one which need be in no wise disagreeable to the people of this country. We find that the Commissioners, the Rev. Father Nugent and Mr. Hodgkin, reported favorably upon Canada, and said that “there were great opportunities for emigration especially in Canada.” We find, also, that the English correspondent of the Globe refers with pleasure to, and indeed compliments the hon. Minister of Agriculture upon the system of immigration which he has perfected in the continental countries, “by which,” he says, “many special facilities and advantages will be afforded.” This is testimony which we accept with pleasure, and it corroborates the anticipations which have been formed that the results of the present immigration policy for the ensuing year will be such that we can form no adequate idea of them at the present time. When I contemplate the condition of the country at the present moment, when I see what has been accomplished within those fifteen years to which I have alluded, I feel no doubt in reference to the future of the Dominion of Canada. I believe that, along with this material progress, there is now being adopted from one end of Canada to the other an improvement in the tone of the men who are attempting to control the destinies of this country. I believe that the two great parties that represent the divisions of political thought in this country are now bound to recognize that they are not occupying the small sphere which they occupied a few years ago, and that as the country advances in material prosperity there should be a corresponding advancement and improvement in the tone of political discussion. I believe that the growth of the country will bring about such a change in the political tone of its public men as will be commensurate with the wonderful and giant strides it is making in the eyes of the world. We have been told that we must remember that the eyes of the world are upon us—not only upon the resources we possess, but upon the public men—upon our statesmen who, not merely for the time being but in a great measure for all time to come, will shape the material policy and the political thought of their country. In referring to the future of this country no happier phrase occurs to me than one that was used on a very interesting occasion a few days ago when Lord Derby said to the Agents General of the different colonies of the British Empire, in speaking of the possible future of such countries as Canada and Australia: "It is difficult to avoid the language of exaggeration." I have much pleasure in moving the following Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne:

That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the auspicious circumstances under which at the opening of a new Parliament we shall begin our labors.

That we are gratified by the expression of His Excellency's opinion, that Canada is in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity, and that all her industries, agricultural, manufacturing and commercial, are in a healthy and improving condition.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that, following the example of his distinguished predecessor, he paid a visit of some length to British Columbia last season; and for the expression of his conviction that the great natural resources of that Province promise, that as soon as the Pacific Railway is completed, an impulse to its prosperity, commensurate with the progress made elsewhere, will be assured, and that meanwhile, the disposal of the lands set aside in aid of the Railway to actual settlers will add to the importance and wealth of the Province.

That we learn with great satisfaction that while passing through the United States, His Excellency was rejoiced to observe many evidences of regard for the Empire of which this country forms so large a portion; and that we concur heartily in His Excellency's wish that this friendship, which is so fully returned by us, may be as enduring as it is natural and advantageous to the mutual interests of both great nations.

That we share His Excellency's belief that the steady flow of settlers into Manitoba and the North-West Territories last year, and the assurances received of an increased immigration during the coming season, promise well for the early development of those fertile and salubrious regions.

That we understand that His Excellency has been advised that it is important that the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament should be amended and the electoral franchises existing in the several Provinces assimilated; and that the measure to be submitted to us for this purpose will receive full consideration.

That we thank His Excellency for the intimation that he is advised that the Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council delivered last June on the appeal of Russel versus the Queen goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary; and that His Excellency may rest assured that our earnest consideration will be given to this important subject.

That our special attention shall be given to any measure submitted to us for regulating Factory Labor and the protection of the working-man and his family.

That the Bills for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to the Customs, the Militia, and the Public Lands, which His Excellency is pleased to say will be laid before us, shall receive our consideration; as shall also any measures presented to us respecting the Civil Service, the Acts relating to Banking, and the examination of Masters and Mates of vessels navigating our inland waters.

That it affords us much satisfaction to be informed by His Excellency that the progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been quite unprecedented, that traffic can now be carried on the main line from Thunder Bay to within fifty miles of the crossing of the South Saskatchewan a distance of over one thousand miles, that it is confidently expected that the Rocky Mountains will be reached during the present year, and that within the same period substantial progress will be made on the Lake Superior Section of the Railway, and the track laid upon a large portion of the road now under contract in British Columbia.

That we share the pleasure expressed by His Excellency in the statement that the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway is largely in excess of any former year, and that the balance in favor of the road shows a gratifying success.

That we thank His Excellency for informing us that the accounts of the last fiscal year will be laid before us; and that we are pleased to learn that, notwithstanding the expenditure on Capital account amounted to more than seven millions of dollars, the surplus of the Consolidated Revenue, together with the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the North-West during last year, were more than sufficient to cover that expenditure, and that the net debt at the close of the year and the amount of interest paid thereon were less than for the year previous.

That we shall respectfully consider the Estimates for the ensuing year to be submitted to us, and which will, we trust, be found to have been prepared with all due economy consistent with the necessary development of the varied resources of the Dominion.

That in view of the fact that on the first of January, 1885, the large 5 per cent. loan will mature, the Bill to be submitted to us authorizing the issue of Debentures bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. for the redemption of this loan, will receive our careful attention.

That we feel with His Excellency, that the subjects he has mentioned to us are of much importance, and that we shall endeavor by our earnest consideration of all of them to justify the full confidence which His Excellency has so kindly expressed in our discretion and patriotism.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolution which has been so ably moved by the hon. member for Pictou, and in doing so, will, with your permission, offer a few observations upon some of the subjects suggested for our consideration by the Speech from the Throne. The opening paragraphs refer to the peaceful times in which we live, and particularly to our amicable relations to the neighboring Republic, which I trust may long continue. Reference is also made to the general prosperity that prevails throughout the country. During the past few years prosperity has returned, harvests have been abundant, manufactures have found increased demand for their products; new industries have been developed; confidence exists in commercial circles, and activity in trade, in marked and happy contrasts with the depression and distrust of former years. These are facts which I feel will be universally and gratefully acknowledged. I assume it will not be deemed desirable to occupy the time of this House during the present Session at any length in discussing how far these results may be fairly attributed to the operation of that policy which gives increased protection to home industries, which the Liberal-Conservative party advocate, and which they have taken the responsibility of adopting in the government of the country; nor yet to establish the opposite view that nature and Providence have been so lavish in their gifts to this country that this prosperity has come unaided by and even in defiance of human legislation. These questions are of great interest and public importance; but I conceive their discussion at the present time would not be productive of great practical good, for the reason that the course which the present Administration thought proper to pursue in dissolving Parliament at the close of its last Session, and appealing to the people on this question with the verdict which they have given, renders it sufficiently clear that they regard it as one which meets their wants and wishes, one which they have resolved to maintain, and one therefore which it must for years to come continue to be the settled policy of this Dominion. Reference is also made by His Excellency to his visit to British Columbia, to the natural resources of the country, the development of which will be assured by the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway as well as to what has been accomplished during the past year towards the attainment of that end. I have listened with more than ordinary pleasure to the statements upon that subject made by the hon. gentleman who has preceded me. It is gratifying to myself and must be gratifying to every member of this House to learn that already the work of construction is completed for a distance of upwards of 600 miles west from Winnipeg, and that the road has been opened for traffic and is now in actual operation 1,000 miles west from Lake Superior, that satisfactory progress has been made by the Government in British Columbia and upon the eastern and more difficult section between Callendar Station and the line from Prince Arthur's Landing, that the work is being carried forward by this Company with so much vigor and success even during the present winter months; and further, that with the branch line now in course of construction to Algoma Mills and the steam communication to be established on Lake Superior, we may hope, by the close of another season, to have greatly improved facilities for transporting the produce of the West to our Atlantic seaports. And these statements will be received with the greater pleasure at the present time, for the evidence they furnish of the ability and determination of the Company, to whom the construction of this great work has been entrusted, to carry it forward successfully to its completion; and their effect must be to strengthen the convictions in this House and throughout this country that not only is it their intention honorably to adhere to and fulfil the obligations of their contract, but before the time stipulated for the completion of that work shall have expired, the work of construction will be finished, and they will have furnished us this great national highway across this continent through Canadian territory from ocean to ocean. I have also listened with pleasure to my hon. friend's allusions to the benefits that have resulted as seen in the improvement and settlement of the country. We must all contemplate with pleasure the extent and wonderful fertility of the territory that has by this means been rendered available for settlement, the influx of population, and the increase in value of land that has followed, the surprising rapidity with which villages and towns and cities have sprang into existence and grown in population and wealth and commercial importance. These facts must be gratifying to us all; but they may be used by those who are disposed to regard unfavorably this scheme to show that the profits of the Company upon the transaction will be excessive, and argue a lack of prudence in the Government in proposing or assenting to the terms of the present contract. I can only say that it is my hope and wish that any efforts made in that direction, in so far as they are based upon the facts to which I have alluded, may be successful. An examination of this contract shows that it is based upon a principle which I believe it will be universally admitted should form the basis of every business transaction, the principle that contracts should be mutually advantageous to both contracting parties. It will be remembered that at the time when this contract was entered into, the lands of the North-West had but a nominal value, and if the rise in value since has been more rapid than was then anticipated, it is principally due to the fact that by the terms of that contract it became the interest of those contractors to push forward that work with an energy unparalleled in the history of the world. If any hon. member of this House can show that in consequence of the enhanced value of lands in the North-West, or of the growth of railway traffic in the future, the Company will reap larger returns for the work they have performed and the capital they have invested than they expected, such information will be of the greatest value, for it will enable us to show that at the same time and in the same proportion, the same causes will add to the wealth and multiply the advantages that will result to the Government and people of this country. But, Mr. Speaker, whatever differences of opinion may still exist as to the wisdom of the policy pursued in the construction of that great national work, or for the improvement and settlement of the North-West, no reasonable doubt can at this time remain on any mind as to the ability of this country to provide for the expenditure involved, and meet the liabilities incurred in that great undertaking. The year that is past is one in which the events that have transpired, the progress that has been made, and the experience that has been gained, must tend to dissipate our fears, excite our hopes, and strengthen the faith of us all in the future. The past year, Sir, has brought us, as if by magic, close upon the time when the West will become a great and growing market for eastern manufactures, and when our eastern cities will consume in greatly increased quantities the products of the West. It leaves us in the dim early dawn preceding the bright morning of that day when our people will be able to send the products of both their fields and their factories across the far off Rocky Mountains and exchange them for the gold of the Pacific Coast, and when ocean steamships, in constantly increasing numbers, will come not only to our Atlantic but our Pacific seaports, and bring the tea and sugar, the costly silks, and all the luxuries of foreign lands, and take away the surplus of our products to the markets of the world. Mr. Speaker, reference was subsequently made to the present financial condition of the country. This subject will be dealt with fully and in detail by the hon. Minister of Finance in the Budget Speech. I beg to be indulged while I refer briefly to some points in connection with this subject of more than ordinary importance and significance. The revenue of the past year has been largely in excess of that of 1881, or any previous year, reaching, from all sources, the sum of upwards of $33,300,000. The expenditure for cost of government, maintenance of public works, subsidies to Provinces, interest on our debt and other ordinary charges, also shows an increase, though not in the same proportion, reaching, including payments on account of sinking fund, upwards of $27,000,000, leaving a surplus for the fiscal year of $6,300,000. The returns of the Department of the Interior show receipts from the sale of Dominion lands amounting to $1,700,000, which, with the sum already named, leaves a total surplus of $8,000,000 in the public Treasury. The expenditure on public works, including payments on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Dominion Lands, approximate $7,350,000. This amount, which you will note is properly chargeable to capital account, will be provided for by the surplus I have named, and if to the balance of the surplus then remaining we add the payments on sinking fund account, the result will show a reduction for the fiscal year of nearly $1,750,000 in the net debt of the Dominion. If we take the years 1881 and 1882 together, the expenditure on public works chargeable to capital account will be upwards of $15,500,000, and this sum will be so far provided for from surplus revenues that the addition to our debt during the two years will not reach $1,250,000. The opinion has in the past prevailed to some extent throughout this country that the public works which we had undertaken, were of such great magnitude, and their cost so enormous, that a debt would be created involving an annual interest charge, which, in addition to other necessary expenditures, would reach a sum in excess of any we could hope to receive from the ordinary sources of our revenue. The financial exhibit to which I have just alluded will correct that impression if it still exists in any quarter, and not only will its beneficial influence thus be felt at home, but we have evidence to show that the improved financial condition of this country has already exerted abroad a most important influence in our favor, especially on the minds of capitalists in other countries. This evidence we find in the increased value of Dominion bonds. I note that Canadian debentures bearing 4 per cent. interest and maturing in 1904 were quoted at 91 and 93 in January, 1879. The same debentures are quoted at 104 and 105 in January, 1883, an advance in four years of 12 per cent.; and it is also worthy of note that from the relatively low value they formerly possessed they have gradually risen until they occupy to-day the highest place among colonial securities upon the London market. This result is to us the more important at the present time, for the reason that $30,000,000 of our bonds will soon mature, and as you have already heard, a Bill will be introduced during the present Session to provide for their redemption. This loan upon which we have paid interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum can at present be replaced at 4 per cent., and the bonds sold at a premium, effecting an annual saving in interest of upwards of $300,000. Permit me also to direct attention to another point. The Trade Returns of 1881 show a large increase in the imports and consumption of silks, satins and fancy goods over the years immediately preceding, and it is generally understood that the value of these goods entered for consumption during 1882 will exhibit a still greater increase, and will exceed that of 1881 by upwards of $1,500,000, or nearly 50 per cent. It is also generally understood that the returns will show a large increase in the importation of cotton and woollen goods, notwithstanding the increased quantity manufactured in the country, proving a large increase in the consumption of these goods. The same will be found true of the importation as well as the manufacture of boots and shoes and many other articles, such for instance as Brussels, tapestry and common carpeting, chinaware, common pottery, earthenware, silver-plated ware, wines, liquors, tobacco, and many other of our imports which it is not necessary, for present purposes, I should now enumerate. My object is rather to direct attention generally to the increase of our imports; as showing first, that general prosperity prevails, and, secondly, that that prosperity is shared in by all classes of society. This cannot be better illustrated than by referring to the article of tea, in the consumption of which there has been an enormous increase within the past two years, something upwards of 60 per cent., indicating not that the richer classes drink more tea but that the consumption has become more general and extends to a class of people who, in times of greater scarcity and want, are compelled to deprive themselves of this the very commonest luxury of our lives. Fears have been entertained that the present Tariff would bear unfairly and oppressively upon the poor man. Its operation, thus far, tends to show that it does not discriminate against the poor man's interest, and in the burdens it imposes, it does not oppress the weak, but, on the contrary, that while the wealthy and independent classes have, since it came in operation, been indulging more freely in the luxuries of life, there are also more comforts in the poor man's home and fewer half-clad and poorly fed children in our streets. We have evidence from another source to confirm this view—the increase in the deposits in the chartered banks and Government savings banks during the last four years, which, exclusive of Government deposits in the chartered banks, during the time mentioned, are upwards of $43,000,000—the increase in the savings banks alone being upwards of $13,000,000. While the former denote that general prosperity prevails, the latter it is well known are principally made up of small sums from the earnings of the poorer classes of our people, and I know of no better evidence that can be furnished of the improved condition of the laboring classes, showing as it does, that they have not only been able to supply their immediate wants, but to provide also against future needs. No one who has listened to or read the public utterances of our public men, can entertain a reasonable doubt that the subject which most fully occupies the thoughts and lies nearest to the hearts of the people's representatives, is the comfort and welfare of the poor man, and I, therefore, feel warranted in saying that the information which the public records furnish, that among the working men income has exceeded expenditure and a surplus has been announced in the Budget Speech, in so many a poor man's home will cause throughout this House more universal and heartfelt pleasure, even though it may not awaken the same enthusiasm as the similar announcements when they are made in the Budget Speech of the hon. the Finance Minister of this Dominion. At the time the present Tariff was introduced, opposition was offered to its adoption, based upon the theory that so highly protective was its character, and so tempting the field it opened for manufacturing enterprise at home, that the result would be a decrease in our imports and a reduction in our revenue which even then was inadequate to meet the ordinary requirements of the country. It may now be anticipated that four years' practical experience of its operation may create an opposition of an entirely different character, and lead to demands upon the Government for modifications and reductions, upon the ground that our revenue is in excess of our requirements. I am not aware to what extent the Government may feel disposed to respond to this demand should it be made. No doubt the experience of the past has suggested changes which they will deem of advantage to the country to adopt, but at the present time, when there are so many evidences of prosperity around us, when the ability of our people, both rich and poor, to purchase and enjoy so many of the comforts and luxuries of life, is clearly demonstrated, and when it is well known large expenditure in the future must continue to be made upon public works, rendered necessary by the growth of the country and for the development of its resources, under these circumstances, although I recognize the necessity of lightening as far as practicable the burden of our taxation, I would still regret that any material change should be proposed, the effect of which would be not only to reduce our annual surplus, but to increase more rapidly our debt and imperil and weaken our credit abroad. My remarks thus far have had reference to the effects of the legislation of the past; I will say but little upon the prospective legislation of the present Session. Among the measures which will be submitted, that which proposes a franchise law for the Dominion will, I assume, excite most general interest. It is well known that at the present time the franchise is under the control of the Local Legislatures of the different Provinces; that the result is want of uniformity; a class of persons voting and having representation here in one Province that in another are denied that right, a state of things that should be no longer permitted to exist. I am not aware upon what basis the Government will propose to fix the franchise for the future, but I may venture to express the hope that in establishing uniformity the limitations which now exist in some of the Provinces may be so far removed that the result will be upon the whole an extension of the franchise. The importance of a measure to provide a valid license law for the regulation of the liquor traffic will be readily appreciated, as well as the necessity of one to restrict, within proper limits, the class of labor that shall find employment in our factories. The experience of other countries has shown that the constant and regular employment of children in factories, at an early age, injures their health, weakens their constitution, diminishes their mental vigor and prevents intellectual development, and stringent enactments to prevent this evil have in the older manufacturing countries been deemed necessary. At the present time the increase in the number of factories in this country suggests the importance at the outset of surrounding the operatives with every possible safeguard, to protect them from the dangers to which I have alluded. The advantages of consolidating portions of existing laws are too apparent to need any comment. And I need but remind you of the sad disasters that have recently occurred upon our lakes, involving loss of property and more serious loss of life, to show the need of any legislation which will tend to prevent the recurrence of such scenes. I have before me a statement of the casualties upon our lakes during the last two years, and find they have resulted in the loss of nearly 400 lives. It is impossible to say how far these may be rightly attributed to want of experience and efficiency on the part of the officers in command, nor can we presume to say that accidents will not occur despite our best efforts to prevent them; but the fact that the officers are not subjected to any examination, that they hold no certificates of competency or character, will create doubts and suspicions in the public mind. In justice to the masters and mates themselves, as well as for the protection of those who place their property and lives under their control, proper standards of competency and tests of efficiency should be established. I regret my inability to address this House even briefly in the French language, not only because it is the language spoken by so many who hear me, but because the county which I have the honor of representing contains nearly 12,000 French Acadians, and among them are numbered many of my best friends and warmest supporters. It has been intimated that to this fact is partly due my selection for the position, the duties of which I am now trying to discharge. However that may be, I can assure you that any honor conferred upon me as their representative I will always most highly appreciate, and any kindness shown me as a mark of courtesy to them will be most gratefully and cheerfully acknowledged. Had the county of Westmoreland two representatives in this Parliament—a right which with a population of nearly 38,000 she may fairly claim—I would have had one of their number as my colleague here to-day; but under existing circumstances I can only indulge the hope that when, before the next election, the hon. leader of the Government brings in a Gerrymandering Bill for the redivision of electoral districts in New Brunswick, will not be entirely omitted from the measure, and the rights of Westmoreland county will not be disregarded. In the meantime I am glad to know that a portion at least of the French people of New Brunswick, are so well represented by one who can claim with them a common language and nationality, as they are in the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Girouard). Mr. Speaker, permit me in closing to make one personal allusion. The duties which have been imposed upon me to-day are by Parliamentary usage ordinarily assigned to the younger members of this House. No one could have been chosen with more limited Parliamentary experience than myself, and no one could have risen to discharge this duty feeling more sensibly the embarrassing surroundings of my position; for I cannot forget that I am addressing many who have spent long years and won high honors in the public service—that I am for the first time surrounded by and associated with the men who in my earliest recollections were entrusted with the management of the public affairs of these Provinces, then divided and comparatively unimportant; who have since united them and formed this great Confederation; who helped to frame the very Constitution under which we now are sitting; and who since the Union have so successfully administered the affairs of this Dominion. I cannot divest myself of the consciousness that for the first time in my life I form one of this body and take though it be a very humble part in the deliberations of this Assembly, upon which rests the responsibility of legislating for the future of a country whose rapid growth and development is at the present time exciting universal surprise and wonder; that exhibits to-day a wealth and diversity of resources that is marvellous to ourselves and to the world; a country that has just outgrown the dependence of her childhood, and exults in the freedom and growing strength of youth; and, conscious that the full vigor and power of her maturer years are yet unimpaired and but partially developed, rejoices as she contemplates the grand possibility of her future destiny; a country which perhaps more than any other country in the world at the present time is demanding wise and prudent and progressive legislation in order that, to the fullest possible extent, her material resources and the happiness of her people may be insured. Mr. Speaker, I most sincerely thank you, Sir, and the hon. gentlemen around me for the very patient manner in which you have listened to my remarks, and I beg to second the resolution now before us.

Mr. BLAKE. I must congratulate the hon. gentlemen to whom we have just listened for the manner in which they have discharged the tasks assigned to them. I can assure the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) that he was the only person in this House who was sensible of that embarrassment and difficulty which he informed us he labored under in the delivery of the eloquent speech and measured periods to which we have just listened with such interest. And the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) will allow me to say that I rejoiced to welcome in his advent to this House a man young in years, but who gives promise of making his mark in the House and in the country at some future day. We may not agree, we do not agree, in his politics; we may not agree with the distinguished person whose name he bears, but it must, notwithstanding, be a matter of unfeigned interest to observe the conjunction of the two persons at one time in the same chamber. The hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, as he proceeded, reminded me a little of the climate that we hear of in some charming countries. It is a beautiful climate, and we are all recommended to go there; but after a while we on this side of the Atlantic, and we who belong to the old country on the other side of the Atlantic, weary of the perpetual sunshine and the perennial blueness of the skies. There was no shadow in the picture, there was no relief to the glare of brightness, of beauty, of glory, and of magnificence with which for the past few hours we have been enchanted. It is my duty to present some portions of the other side of the picture, to complete the sky in which the hon. gentleman seems to have left out the clouds, and to say something which may render the climate, if not quite so bright, a little more tolerable to frail humanity like ours. I join with the view which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) said was his view, as to the expediency of addressing ourselves more particularly to the topics which are brought under our attention in the Speech from the Throne; and amongst them I place, as the hon. gentlemen who have addressed us have placed, in the very front rank the consideration of the paragraph which tells us it is important that the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament should be amended. It is my good fortune cordially to agree in that paragraph so far; I believe that those laws are exceedingly defective, and that they require very serious amendment. I believe that, in this regard, the Government has done that which it should not have done, and left undone that which it should have done. I believe that amendments have been made in some of those laws, and at a recent date, which were amendments for the worse—if you will excuse that from an Irishman—that were deteriorations rather than improvements; and that amongst the subjects in this connection to which this Parliament should assuredly address itself is the question how far under the laws as they were brought down and altered for the purpose of the late election, there is in truth a proper representation of the people in Parliament. I was glad to hear you, Mr. Speaker, when you occupied a place on the floor of this House, during the last Session of Parliament, express your opinion, in language not novel but none the less true, that the Parliament of a country ought to be the mirror of the opinions of the people of the country. It ought in truth to be a reflection of their sentiments. Those sentiments in all free communities are divided, sometimes with the tolerable approximation to equality, sometimes, indeed, very unequally; but, so far as my experience goes, they are always divided in some proportions, and as it is the theory, so it ought to be the object of practical dealing with the question of the representation of the people, to accomplish as near as may be that which cannot be accomplished with absolute perfection, but to accomplish approximately the representation and reflection in this House of the various opinions which prevail in the country with some degree or proportion to the strength in which those opinions are held in the constituencies which are represented here. Now, Sir, this view we held always; this view we daily endeavored to enforce upon the late Parliament, when the proposal to amend the laws with respect to the representation of the people were brought before it; and I will venture to hope that it is in consequence of the experience which hon. gentlemen have had, in consequence of the obvious truth of the propositions we then advanced, as to the results of the so-called amendments of the law, which they then passed, that they have placed so prominently before us at the first Session after the application of the practical test of that law the proposition that the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament require amendment. I recollect that our position at that time—speaking for the moment with respect to the Province in which we stand and which was the Province mainly, I may say exclusively, affected by that particular amendment, was this: parties were represented here by a strength of, I think, 26 on the side of the Opposition and 62 on the side of the Administration, giving the Government a majority in that Province of about 36. It was alleged, indeed, by those who supported the Administration, that they were stronger in that Province in popular opinion than they had been at any previous time; but prudent men do not rely on their own conviction of their strength; they make things sure, and notwithstanding those vauntings of increased strength, precautions were taken to make that increased strength greater still. And so I contend that the results have shown the effect of that measure to be diametrically opposed to the true theory of popular representation. It was to produce the suppression of, instead of the extension of popular opinion. The change in public opinion was certainly very great. Amongst the constituencies which were changed in their bounds, with the view of making the Government very much stronger, so strong that it would be impossible to overwhelm them, were a great number in which, notwithstanding those changes in the bounds, public opinion pronounced itself, as evidenced by the returns to Parliament, adversely to the Administration. Those results are to be found in North York, North Ontario, North Wellington, South Wentworth, East Huron, East Bruce, South Brant, South Perth, East Elgin, East York, East Lambton, South Norfolk and other places. I say, in those constituencies which were altered in order to make that which was thought sure, surer still, the Act of Parliament to which I have referred, and which, I presume, it is intended to invite us to amend, so as to redress those wrongs, failed of its object, and members of the Liberal party were returned in spite of the amendment. The general return was 37 Opposition instead of 26, and the adverse majority was reduced from 36 to 18. But I admit that the hon. gentleman was not wholly unsuccessful in effecting the object of that Act—which was for the purpose of suppressing instead of expressing public opinion—for eight seats there were in the Province in which, judging by the returns, it was necessary to make alterations, and the alterations made were successful. Eight seats there were which, if any fair alterations had been made either to existing bounds or to considerations which ought to have had weight in the minds of the Legislature, would have returned Opposition members. Why, there is one of those cases in which the constituency has, within my Parliamentary experience, been changed twice in order to secure—as a gradual weakening took place in the strength of the hon. gentleman's principles in that constituency—the triumph of those principles at the polls, and for three Parliaments it has been represented by a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite by virtue not of popular election in the proper sense, but of an Act of Parliament which from time to time changed the bounds. Now, if the object be to obtain, even approximately, an accurate representation of popular opinion, I say those are traitors to the principle and object of representation who legislate so as to thwart this view; and I maintain here as I have maintained elsewhere—I take the first opportunity of stating it here—that the general results of the poll in the Province to which this legislation was applied are such as prove that the popular opinion was suppressed instead of being expressed. There were in that Province, I think, two acclamation elections—one of which you, Mr. Speaker, were the happy recipient, and the other, my hon. friend from the South Riding of Lanark, who made his constituency so safe that he was unopposed. I say that there were two acclamation elections, and there were also a few others in which the contests were of such a character that some allowances have to be made. These, however, do not materially affect the results; but making the most reasonable allowances that can be made I take the total poll as 29,500, of which, I believe, there belong to the Ministerial party 136,300, and to the Opposition 133,200, giving to the former a majority of the people at the polls of 3,100 only, or about 1 per cent. I believe that the true result, if the constituencies had expressed it here, would have been to give to the hon. gentlemen opposite from the Province to which I refer, one of a majority in this House; while, as a matter of fact, they have eighteen, or eighteen times more than that amount. I see the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) smiling at me; of course he knows that if this true result had been obtained he would not have been here to smile. If you turn to the district in which we are sitting here, in which this House is held, to the eastern district with its thirty seats, a true poll would have given about sixteen to hon. gentlemen opposite and fourteen to friends of mine; but the returns in Parliament give twenty-seven to hon. gentlemen opposite and three to friends of mine. These results to a certain extent were to be anticipated from the unfair character in the distribution as it stood, and which was accelerated, enlarged, enhanced by the changes which were made in this very district, and which as is proved by the return, resulted in the abstraction from us of the North Riding of Lanark, the old bounds of which returned a Reformer, and the Riding of Brockville, the old bounds of which returned a Reformer. Strength being taken away from us by the distribution of the district, in which we were to have too few seats on any fair competition as matters stood, and in which we were deprived even of two of those too few seats, therefore, that consideration to which I have referred was not bestowed on the task of amending the Act. But that is not all, Sir. There is another particular in which those Acts require amendment, in which the law as it was ought to be restored and the alterations which under the guise of amendments taking place ought to be replaced by another amendment. The Government proposed, and the late House adopted the view, that the power of nominating returning officers should be left in the hands of and at the discretion of the Administration. That had been the law; and the law had been changed, and certain public officers, having a stake in the county, and residing there, owing to themselves and to their situation feeling a certain degree of restraint in political matters, and most likely on the whole to be persons who would rise to the level of their situation, were those among whom alone the choice could be made. It was made unlimited, and being unlimited it was used in such a way; and in many instances the most partisan and improper conduct was pursued by officials who were appointed at the nomination of the Administration, not merely in their own conduct but also as to the class of persons whom they appointed as deputies in the election. Now, Sir, I maintain that with a complicated system of election such as ours is, in which so many questions arise and in which so much is dependent upon the intelligence, the integrity, the honor, the impartiality of the officials, though it is in the last degree deplorable, that there should be as there was in the last election a distinct and sensible deterioration of conduct on the part of the public officials, though there should be an almost unconcealed and unveiled spirit of partizanship, leading in many cases to most lamentable results. I do not impute this to all these officers, either to all returning officers or all deputies; but I do say it was lamentable generally throughout the whole of the country, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. Name, name.

Mr. McCALLUM. Name. Will the hon. gentleman give the name of those returning officers. When the hon. gentleman is slandering lots of people he should give the names.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, Sir, there was a case in which the returning officer was appointed, who was the editor and proprietor of a violent and virulent Tory sheet, in the locality, I believe, where the hon. gentleman belongs, and who felt the inconsistency of his own position so much that he published an announcement after his appointment that from that time until the close of the election, being returning officer, he had ceased to do anything in the editorial columns of his paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear,

Mr. McCALLUM. In this he showed his conscientiousness.

Mr. RYKERT. And his honesty.

Mr. BLAKE. It was somebody else who was going to sling ink in the interest of the paper which he controlled; and this, I believe, took place not far from the constituency of the hon. member for Monck. I am not sure that this person was not the Returning Officer for Monck. I thought so, and that is the reason I gave this instance at the hon. gentleman's demand. But it happened, Sir, in many cases the deputies were not supplied with the necessary papers in due time, and this is a most serious point which deserves the attention of the House. The instructions and the duties to be discharged are complicated, and it requires for the intelligent discharge of them, by those who discharge them for the first time, that these papers should be received in time for their perusal and mastery. These papers were, however, frequently received only the night before, and oftentimes at such periods that it was impossible that the deputies could really learn the discharge of their duties before the following day. In very numerous cases the ballot papers were printed on paper so thin that the ballot was a sham; that it was known to be perfectly easy to observe by the impression made in marking the ballot, without unfolding it, how the voter had voted; and I maintain that in numerous elections that the very class of the population for whom the ballot is established were thwarted in the exercise of their franchise by information and suggestions which were there given, and that the ballot did not really protect, because the returning officer could very easily tell, with the folded ballot before him, for whom they had polled their votes. In some cases voters not upon the list were permitted, upon some suggested right, to poll tendered votes; sometimes they were sworn, sometimes not, and their ballots actually counted, though they had no pretence or shadow of pretence for voting. In very many cases the power given to the returning officer to give agents a certificate, in order that they might vote at the poll at which they acted as scrutineers, was grossly abused. It was abused far beyond any legitimate demand; abused by giving certificates in blank, to be used by the agents of the party for whom they were given, and as might be most convenient; abused by giving certificates to persons who were not voters at all, not in order that they might bona fide act as agents or scrutineers, but in order that they might poll their votes at some polling place other than their own, where they would have been objected to, but not being known their votes were admitted. In many cases the deputies numbered the ballots; in others they omitted to initial the ballots. In many cases the statements required by law were not placed in the boxes, and in some cases unsigned statements were placed in them. Lawful oaths were refused to be administered; ballot boxes were opened and the statements in them were changed. Double returns were made; in one case a returning officer returned a man who was not returned by the people, and in another case when the returning officer returned a man who received a majority of votes, the County Judge returned the one who had not received a majority. In the recounts before the County Judges all sorts of decisions took place, and hundreds, nay thousands, of voters were disfranchised by the operation of the law in this particular. There was also a very extensive use of betting under various pretences, but really for corrupt purposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You bet.

Mr. BLAKE. I don't say one side only, but that does not make it the less obnoxious; and there was the use of betting for corrupt purposes and as a form of bribery and corruption, irrespective of the ordinary use of betting at elections, which, when carried on to the extent and in the manner it has been carried on at late elections, is in itself no unimportant engine of undue influence and should, in my opinion, receive the consideration of this House, with a view to its repression. Independently of all these points to which I have referred—and to which I have referred specifically, because the Address invites us to consider an amendment of the law relating to the representation of the people in Parliament—there was a very great deal of corruption which is covered by the existing law, nominally, however ineffectually that law may practically act in the repression of it. Many of those defects in the law had been already ascertained by experience during the late Parliament—by the experience of other Legislatures operating under similar laws, and by the experience of our own; and it seems to me it was incumbent upon the Government—for they were about to dissolve Parliament before the regular period and to precipitate an election—to have invited such legislation before the late election as would have been proper to redress these wrongs, to set aside these difficulties, and to arrange, as far as might be, for the avoidance of those imperfections. But instead of legislating they dissolved. Then as to the trial of controverted elections. In the exercise of its functions the Legislature of Ontario passed a law some time ago by which they altered the style of some of their courts. I apprehend it was the duty of the Administration before dissolving Parliament in advance of the time, to have proposed to us such legislation as would have made clear beyond a doubt the application to the new courts of the jurisdiction which had been given to the old ones, instead of which no such legislation was proposed; the difficulty subsisted, and numerous election petitions are now in suspense. The hon. Minister himself, whom I charge with dereliction of duty in not legislating to avoid this grievance, raises this very objection, and insists that the petition against his return in Lennox should be voided because, forsooth, it has been entered in the wrong court. The Speech says that besides amending the laws otherwise, as to the representation of the people, it is expedient that the franchises in the various Provinces should be assimilated, and both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have expressed their opinion in favor of that proposition. The proposition is not a new one. The hon. member who now leads the House brought it before us some twelve or thirteen years ago, and brought in a Bill to carry out his views. That Bill, after a tolerably full discussion, was dropped, and from that time to this the subject has never been brought before the people or before Parliament. On the contrary, in the year 1874, an Act was passed of a permanent character—not temporary as preceding Acts had been in form—recognizing the local franchises as the franchises for election to this Parliament. I quite admit that there is something to some minds extremely pleasing in the notion that there should be uniformity, but I do not concur with, or sympathize in the view that there is any loss of dignity to this Parliament, when it decides from time to time, deliberately, that it will adopt such franchises as the Local Legislatures themselves adopt, for the purposes of the election of members to this House. If at any time the franchises of any of the Provinces are, in the opinion of this Parliament, improper, it is quite competent to apply the remedy, and if it should adopt those franchises as its franchises, it seems to me it would not involve any loss of dignity. Uniformity is said to be the reason, but it is to be remembered that though for a great many years the franchises, as they assimilate, have been changing in the direction of uniformity. Even in the Legislative Union of the United Kingdom the franchises of Scotland, England and Ireland are quite different. The Parliament of Great Britain, not the Parliament of a Federal Union but the Parliament of a Legislative Union, has not found it unjust or improper that the people of the different Provinces or Kingdoms in the United Kingdom should elect their representatives under different franchises. That is the great example which hon. gentlemen are so fond of copying—the United Kingdom, the Mother Country; and if you take the greatest example of a Federal instead of a Legislative Union, you find that the very same principle that we have adopted has been adopted in that country, but in a still more formal way; for in the United States the franchise for the election of the common body—the Congress—is the franchise by which the more numerous of the two local bodies is elected—which franchise is provided by the State Legislatures. You have, then, two great examples in which uniformity is not considered essential. You have this latter example in which our very plan is adopted; and it is not to be forgotten, Sir, that uniformity in name may be diversity in substance; because if you are dealing with different conditions, with a different state of society, with different interests, with different occupations, with people—one of whom may have its property on the sea and another on the shore or on the land, one of whose property may be principally personal, another's principally real, a franchise based upon property must be either very comprehensive indeed, or different in form, in order that it may be substantially uniform—different in form in order that that great result which is the true end to be attained, may be achieved, the right to the franchise given to all worthy of it in every Province. We have hitherto conceived that the Local Legislatures, with their special knowledge of the peculiar conditions and circumstances of the people, were best fitted to declare who should have the franchise. But there are other difficulties. There are difficulties to which I shall call the attention of the House even at this early moment. It is to be remembered that a uniform franchise, propounded by the Dominion, means a voters' list, prepared by officials to be appointed by the Administration here—means a revision of that list by officials to be appointed from here—means centralization, patronage, and the control, by the Government of the day, over the whole system upon which our elections depend. It is to be remembered that it means enormous expenditures to the public in the preparation of those lists, and infinitely greater expenditure and trouble in the duties the people will be called upon to discharge in order to have these lists corrected from time to time. It is to be remembered that that trouble—which we all know who are engaged in the actual business of politics—it is proposed to double; because we are to have two sets of lists, one for the Province and one for the Dominion, and, therefore, two corrections of the lists. It is to be remembered that you propose, in effect, a double franchise, and, therefore, an additional element of confusion and uncertainty in the minds of the electorate. Therefore, Sir, for all these reasons I was unable, when the hon. gentleman formerly proposed this measure, to regard it as a step in advance. I believed that the best course was, unless and until some practical grievance or evil could be shown, to be satisfied with the continued adoption of the local franchises; I believed that analogy, precedent, the example of other countries, overbore the supposed advantage of so-called uniformity, and these, with the other difficulties to which I have referred, led to the conclusion that things were better as they were. But, Sir, if this were so, why is it that to-day, immediately after the election, the hon. gentleman proposes this measure, not merely to Parliament but to the country? I could have understood the hon. gentleman's course if it had been stated in the last Parliament that this was one of the reforms which the Administration proposed to introduce, and upon which they desired to take the sense of the people. But not a word was heard of it. We go to the country, and immediately after the election, conducted under what is called a defective franchise, the hon. gentleman proposes this change. The Speech glories, as the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded this Resolution, in the surplus and in the application of it. I remember very well when the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite was to prevent the Liberal Government which was in power from having a very modest surplus. I remember when the hon. Minister of Railways declared that the then Minister of Finance, who estimated a surplus of $500,000, was guilty of a constitutional crime almost, in proposing to have such a surplus as that, and declared that it was his duty if he had a surplus to propose measures for the relief of the people from taxation, and in that way to exhaust a portion of the surplus. But times have changed. It was the duty of the Administration, when they came into office, to establish—what? A surplus? No, but an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. In 1879 the First Minister himself, I believe, declared that to be his object—and a very good object it is, no doubt. But equilibrium is one thing, readjustment is another thing, and the surplus which is now estimated, is quite a different thing; and I say that those who, a while ago objected to a modest estimate of a surplus of $500,000, who proposed to Parliament on the ground that it would produce only an equilibrium the Tariff which now exists, and who to-day rejoice because there is a surplus of $6,300,000, have altered their views in a manner which demands an explanation from them as to the cause. Why is it that that which was blameable formerly is now admirable? Why is it that their object before—equilibrium—is now set aside for a surplus?

Mr. HESSON. Because we would not trust you with the expenditure.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I dare say the hon. member for North Perth is of that opinion, but I believe there are many members of the party to which he belongs who do not share that opinion with him. Now the hon. gentlemen opposite and the Speech give, as I say, the picture of a wholly unclouded sky, and attribute that condition of things, though without discussing it, to the fiscal policy. I maintain that a surplus of $6,300,000 extracted from the people of this country by a taxation so enormously increased as ours has been, is not an evidence of statesmanship, but an evidence of incapacity for statesmanship. I maintain with the hon. Minister of Railways, that a course should be pursued which would produce an equilibrium or something approaching an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. While the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) is glad to remember that while our revenue had increased within fifteen years after Confederation to a sum equal to that which the neighboring Republic possessed in its seventy-first year, I would ask my hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so, whether he had looked at the Tariff of the United States in its seventy-first year, and at the relation which existed between the taxation and expenditure borne by the people at that time. But I would give just this one comparison. The surplus which is boasted and which it is proposed to maintain, is a surplus, which, if you applied it to English finances, would be equivalent to at least a surplus of at least $80,000,000. If you applied to the finances of the Mother Country the scheme you apply to our finances, you would suppose a Finance Minister bringing down a Budget which would produce a surplus of $80,000,000. There has been—and no man more heartily rejoices in it than the humble individual who now addresses you—a period of three or four years in which there has been prosperity. We have had excellent crops, good prices, a revival of the lumber trade, and very great development in other ways. The hon. member for Pictou gratified us by the information that the fisheries had been very productive and the prices high, and so in almost every direction has been shown the evidence of a period of prosperity. But I believe that we would be acting an imprudent part if we were to so conduct the affairs of this country, if we were so to shape them during the Session as if our progress were, in these regards, assured at the same rate for the future. I believe that we have already reached the period of over-speculation, of over-trade, of over-importation. I believe that we have already experienced a very considerable amount of stringency arising from these causes, and from the further cause that the very large sum levied by the grant from the people, and devoted as it has been devoted, and the absence of the foreign borrowings which formerly tended to mitigate the adverse balances of trade, have pressed more than in former years upon the domestic resources of the country. I believe that those very exertions to which the hon. gentleman has referred, these very leaps and bounds by which we have been progressing, are exertions which bring with them, unless we are cautious and take heed in him, seeds of difficulty, aye, even of disaster. While I do not believe that irremediable mischief has yet been done, I do think it is extremely important that the hon. Minister, who is specially charged with the question of finances, should not, upon this occasion, repeat the advice which, as reported, he gave a couple of years ago to the public when he said that he was now comparatively advanced in years, but if he were a young man he would do what he advised all young men to do in trade: clap on full sail for a period of ten years of assured prosperity. I believe that by such advice as this the hon. gentleman is paving the way, not to a period of permanent prosperity, but a period of difficulty. If we look to our own past experience, to the past experience of the United States, of the United Kingdom, and all other commercial countries, we shall find that they do not verify the observation of the hon. gentleman; and that caution and care, rather than sanguine expectation—with all the favoring conditions which existed for the last three or four years—ought to be the watch-word which he, as the financial custodian of the country, ought to give to us for our guidance at this time. The announcement is made by the Administration that also is gloried in by their supporters, that the public expenditure on capital account, which is expenditure on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been paid for out of the taxes. Once again we have a strange contrast between promises and performance, between professions and results. I remember very well, when hon. gentlemen opposite asserted time and again that they did not intend to pay for the Canadian Pacific Railway out of increased public taxes. I remember when they passed formal resolutions to that effect. I remember when they declared that the arrangements would be such that taxes would not need to be increased. They now ask us to express our gratitude that we are paying for the railway out of the surplus taxes. I remember at a more recent period, when the hon. Minister proclaimed that it was the policy and ambition of the Government to reduce importations and redress the adverse balance of trade. I remember when they congratulated the country upon the reduced importations, the large extent of which, he said, had caused a great portion of our past difficulties, and upon what he thought was the improved balance of trade from time to time, until at last the acme of his delight was reached, when in one Budget Speech he was able to announce the balance of trade was on the right side, the exports exceeding the imports by a small sum; now we are asked to rejoice with him to-day—versatile man that he is—because our imports so largely exceed the exports. A list of the increased imports to which our increased receipts are due, was given by the hon. gentleman who seconded the resolutions, from which it appears there has been, even over the imports of last year, large as they were, in a great many staples of the country, a very large increased import. I was very glad to read that paragraph in the Speech which gave assurance of an increased immigration, and still more pleased to learn the statistical information which the hon. member for Pictou gave on the subject of the immigration of last year. I have not myself been able, of course, not having at my command the sources of information which the hon. gentleman had, to reach conclusions on that subject. I have only such as the newspapers have from time to time given us. They did not lead me to the conclusion that the number was so great, and I am rather inclined to think that the 113,000 must include the Chinese who came into British Columbia. Where is the late member for Vancouver? Where is the late member for Victoria? Why, I remember when the news was flashed across the wires last Session of the influx of Chinese into British Columbia, in what diplomatic language the hon. First Minister pointed out the difference between the Mongolian and Caucasian races, and said that although the time might come when it would be desirable to restrict Chinese immigration, such immigration was highly desirable while the railway was being built. Chinese immigration was not the permanent valuable immigration as that of European. When we are asked to-day to congratulate ourselves on this increase of 113,000, I ask are the Chinese included in it. Judging from the expression of the countenance of the hon. member for Pictou, I conclude that they are. I wonder what the real permanent valuable immigration has been. I do not know, I am sure. I am told in Ontario it was 34,000, an increase that is considerable and gratifying in itself, but if the estimates made in the newspapers a little while ago of the immigration into Manitoba and the North-West were correct the great proportion was from the other Provinces. It is extremely important to the Dominion as a whole, and the Province of Ontario in particular, that we should encourage immigration from abroad. Up to last year it has been almost entirely from the older Provinces; and even last year as far as public information leads us to conclude, it has been to a very large extent an emigration from the older Provinces, particularly from Ontario. I am not sorry for that. I am very glad that any large number of men, intelligent and enterprising, from the older Provinces should go out there and develop that country. I think it is ominous of good to that country that those who are by birth, by education, and by association, deeply attached to the older Provinces, should take the most prominent and first places in the settlement of the newer country, and their acquaintance with our modes of thought and action, with our modes of government, with our municipal institutions, as developed in the various Provinces, and with our school system, will be valuable to an extent not to be estimated in moulding upon what we believe to be the best and most progressive principles the institutions of the newer land of which they are the pioneers. But while I say so unreservedly as that that I do not merely consent to, but most heartily approve of and congratulate the country upon the fact that there has been a predominance up to this time of emigration from the older Provinces, I maintain that we cannot expect that that state of things shall continue, unless the void is in some way supplied from the older lands, and that either the void to be produced by the emigration from the older Provinces—if that is to continue—must be supplied by immigration from abroad, or we must expect the future supply which is to continue the peopling of the North-West and Manitoba to come direct from older countries. The condition of the Province with which I happen to be most familiar in this regard, is striking. It has hitherto received a very large supply, take it altogether, of immigration. It has hitherto progressed in population with very considerable rapidity, but as near as I can judge at this time, that progress is at a standstill, and for the last two or three years the state of things has been such, that unless there should be a change we would find a positive retrogression instead of advance in the population in the Province of Ontario. I have obtained access to the Municipal Census of that Province, which gives, not indeed the Census of all the inhabitants, but the Census of all the ratepayers and their families, and which, therefore, as to totals, is not to be compared with the Dominion Census, is yet for the purpose of comparison of different years a reasonable guide. I find that from the spring of 1872 to the spring of 1882, omitting Algoma, Parry Sound and Nipissing in which the returns were not complete, and it was impossible to obtain any proximate statement, there was an increase according to the Municipal Census, of 278,437, or a rate of about 20 per cent. upon the ratepaying census—a very satisfactory rate of increase compared with the Dominion Census, which I think, gives only about 17 per cent. The immigration for these ten years as given in the public papers is 254,479, or almost equal to the amount of increase ascertained as I have stated. But the significance of the reference to the Municipal Census consists in the fact that it is an annual Census, and that you are thus able approximately to apportion the rate of increase and progress of the Province between the different periods of the decade. Dividing it into periods, the first seven years give an increase of 260,000 odd, or a rate of over 37,000 a year, while the immigration is 175,000 odd, or a net increase of nearly 85,000. But the last three years of the same Census gives the increase—1880, as 10,577; 1881, 6,516; and for 1882, 676 only, or a total of 17,769; while the immigration for these three years is 78,753, or nearly 60,989 more than the increase by the Municipal Census. The Census of the school population leads to somewhat the same conclusions; that for 1871 being 489,615; 1874, 511,603; 1879, 494,404; for 1880, 489,924; 1881, 484,224. So that drawing from these two independent sources the information, it is extremely obvious that while these do not give you accurate figures, they lead to that which other sources of information also lead to, that there has been a serious drain upon the population of our Province for the last two or three years, that I attribute to the continued immigration to the States and the large immigration to the North-West Territories; and, as I have said, it is impossible that it can continue unless in some way the void is to be filled.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I had just pointed out that we possessed special means of information with respect to the population of one of the Provinces. I am not in a position to give the same specific information in respect to the other Provinces, and in regard to them I can only refer to the ordinary sources of information available to us, but which seem to indicate that in regard to them, as well as to the particular Province to which I have referred, the question of immigration, the question of retaining and increasing the population, is one of very serious consequence. The United States Census for 1880 indicates that 712,000 Canadian-born were in that year settled in the adjacent Republic, being a very large increase over the number found there by the previous decennial Census, even without making allowances for deaths in that number and deaths in the number of emigrants from Canada to the States, and therefore indicating a very considerable tendency of population in that direction. All of these circumstances combine to make this question to which allusion has been made in the Speech, and respecting which a gratifying announcement was made by one of the speakers, one of very pressing importance as well to the old as to the new Provinces, and I am sure hon. members generally will be disposed to sustain the Administration in any well considered motion which they may bring forward for the further promotion and encouragement of immigration. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) gave the House some calculations based on the per capita cost, but it seems to me, without entering into the details of those calculations, that the inferences which the hon. gentleman drew from them were based upon a fallacy. It is quite clear there are certain tolerably fixed charges which you must expend on such a service whether the results be great or small, and those fixed charges will, when divided over an increased immigration, of course largely reduce the per capita charge. It would however be fruitless at this stage to enter into any discussion of the hon. gentleman's figures. The Speech announces a further measure in the direction of centralization. The hon. leader of the Government some time ago stated in a public speech that he would, if returned to power, pass a law which would reinvest the municipalities with the power of regulating the liquor licenses, and I presume it is in pursuance of that statement so made that we find this announcement in the Speech. I have not had an opportunity of examining the judgment on which this conclusion is based; I presume the hon. gentleman will take care that it is distributed at an early day to all members of the House, because it seems to me to be a question of very serious consequence and upon which we should have the fullest opportunity of reaching a conclusion. I have not formed the impression from a perusal of the reports in the newspapers which I saw, that the decision on the question was one which determined this point, and I rather assume from the language which is used in the Speech that the advice which has been tendered to His Excellency, and to which he referred, is that that decision points to the inference that this power is vested, and vested solely, in the Parliament of the Dominion. For my own part I should exceedingly regret to see Parliament take any action on that matter whatever, unless and until it were finally decided by a judgment upon the precise point that the Acts of the Local Legislature in the various Provinces making the arrangements which are now in force, were beyond the power of those Legislatures and that those or similar enactments were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. In this respect I share the sentiments of the hon. gentleman's lieutenant in the Ontario Legislature, who, I see the other day in a speech delivered at Hamilton expressed his regret that there should be any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures in this matter and expressed his opinion that if it were finally decided that the Constitution as read did not cover that power, the mode in which the difficulty should be met was not by the Dominion Parliament acting or assuming jurisdiction, but by altering the Constitution and giving to Local Legislatures that power, which up to this time it has been supposed they had, and upon which basis for the fifteen years of Confederation the liquor traffic has been regulated by the various Governments and Legislatures of the different Provinces. I believe that it would be extremely unfortunate if we should, except under the pressure of absolute necessity, deal with this matter. I believe it is one which can be dealt with to infinitely greater advantage by the Legislature of each Province for the Province itself. I believe that the cause of temperance will be advanced in those Provinces, in which public opinion may be riper than it is in other Provinces, by the subject being retained within local jurisdiction; and while we know that the common sense of the people of the country, the common notion of the Legislatures of the various Provinces for the whole period of Confederation, has been the view that they had this particular power, I think it is to be regretted that occasion should be seized by reason of a suggestion that a judgment of the Privy Council contains language from which an inference may be drawn unfavorable to the existence of that power, to arrogate to ourselves exclusive jurisdiction. It is, as I have said, only another instance of the centralizing tendency of this Administration. The hon. gentleman has never concealed his preference for a Legislative over a Federal Union, and he is going as far and as fast as he can—and he is going very fast and very far—to make this, which is assumed to be a Federal, into a Legislative Union. There is another question which has agitated specially two Provinces which are deeply interested, namely, the question of disallowance. All the Provinces are equally interested in the principles which are to decide these questions, because the rules which we lay down for one must govern all. Nor should I pass from this topic without observing that it seems to me that the conclusion which determines that we are to arrogate to ourselves this particular jurisdiction with regard to liquor licenses is a conclusion much wider and much more far-reaching in its results than the particular subject in respect to which it is proposed now to legislate; and it is difficult perhaps to decide, or without full consideration to decide, how far we go in the direction of centralization, and the abrogation of Provincial rights, by the system that the hon. gentleman proposes to take. The Speech tells us in glowing terms, and the orators of the day have reiterated and bettered those terms, of the progress of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and the hon. member for Westmoreland anticipated what he thought might be the line of the argument on that side, informing us that he would be delighted to hear proven that the bargain was a very good one for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because as he stated, it was his view, that all bargains should be mutually advantageous.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. No doubt it is a very good principle, and the only principle on which trade and bargains can at all be profitably and permanently conducted; but, then, "mutual advantage" does not mean a bargain all on one side. It seems to me that the facts and the figures which have become public within the last few months indicate that this bargain is—as we contended it was when the subject was under the consideration of this House—all on one side. The progress, to which the hon. gentlemen both alluded, and which the hon. member for Pictou compared with the progress which had been made under the various Governments which had had charge of the work for some time, is progress with reference to a different class of work. He forgot for the moment that the work which those Governments had undertaken and were carrying on, was work of a very difficult character—work entirely different from a level road through a prairie country. As an example of what might have been done, and perhaps the most successful example in the world, I admit, with the hon. gentleman, an example comparatively of what might have been done in that regard, was given him by the hon. the Minister of Railways, with reference to a certain section which he constructed west, I think it was, of Winnipeg. There is, Sir, no comparison whatever between a stretch of railway across a relatively level prairie, and such works as have been undertaken and prosecuted between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, and on the other side of the mountains in British Columbia, all of which latter works take infinitely greater care and trouble than that which is required for the former. We, however, quite agreed with the view of the hon. gentlemen who say that under this contract great and rapid progress would be made in prairie work. We pointed out what the profits which the Company was to obtain on the prairie work were, and those profits have now been tolerably well ascertained; and upon 606 miles—606 miles, I think—of work, which I think they have done, the calculated cost of the road is somewhere under the original estimate; and all the subsequent information leads us only to conclude that this is right. And taking the value of the lands—at the value of the lands sold as reported by the Company—and putting the amount to which they would be entitled with reference to that section, I say that the ascertained proof of it in the prairie section as far as completed, is about $22,000 per mile, or $19,000,000. With such a result before us, with such a golden prospect in the very near distance, it is not at all surprising that they should have stretched the line very rapidly over the prairie. The hon. gentleman said—or one of the hon. gentlemen said that perhaps they might have heard it said—that the Company had gone too fast. Well, there are some respects in which a good many people believe that the Company may have gone a little too fast. It is after all possible, with respect to several of their propositions, and in respect to several of their engagements, they may have acted, as other people believe, somewhat imprudently with reference to their far eastern engagements, directly and indirectly, which we know they have made with reference to other matters—projected branches in the North-West, in respect to which, we find no notice now, and which, I presume, are either abandoned or indefinitely postponed, and in respect even of the pressure of construction that took place, it is possible that they may have gone, not merely in advance of the country, but also in advance of what prudence would have demanded; but that is after all their business. They were entitled to proceed within certain limits as far and as slow as they pleased; and they have proceeded rapidly with the work. We were promised that they would proceed with the work by means of foreign capital to be introduced in addition to the Government subsidy, but up to this time we do not find that this work has been accomplished by means of foreign capital. On the contrary, in so far as the Government has not supplied the means, these have substantially come from the people of this country; and, therefore, they have come up to this time almost entirely from our own resources, either from the banks or from the lands, which, in great measure—in the largest measure, indeed, and almost entirely—have been purchased by persons residing in this country. Now, with reference to one of the great questions upon which we differ from the Administration as to this contract, our forecasts have been all from the start verified. We declared the provisions as to monopoly were unnecessary, in order to procure the construction of the work, and were calculated to retard settlement and to impair the prospects of that country, and to create great dissatisfaction and discontent within its bounds. I shall not enter into the condition of things there to-day. No doubt this will be more fully discussed at later periods in the Session, but I maintain, from all the information I have been able to receive, that there does exist, on the part of the majority of the people of that country, a very great discontent and dissatisfaction, owing to the manner in which a clause appears to have been misconstrued by the Administration—and in a sense which I myself have never been able to understand—it being held that the Company was not merely entitled to, but could compel the Government of the day to exercise its powers of disallowance to veto charters for local railways within the limits of the Province of Manitoba as contrary to the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I say that this construction of the bargain is not merely contrary to what I understand its terms to be, but contrary certainly to what we were told its terms were when the bargain was laid before us by the Minister of Railways, and reiterated and reinforced at greater length by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). Now, with reference to the financial calculations, we contended that the amount which the Government was about to part with to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was worth more than what the Government alleged it was, and that the Company would, according to any reasonable calculation, according to the estimates which the Administration had itself laid before us, in some ten months have this road for less than nothing—have the road and a profit besides. The official memorandum to which I have referred, shows that 6,542,000 acres of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's grant were sold for sufficient to redeem $17,300,000 land grant bonds, at the rate of about $2.68 per acre. If the North-West is to improve; if the value of the land in that country is to increase; if it is to progress; if settlers are to crowd in upon it; if fresh cities are built there, and if fresh agricultural settlements are to be developed—and I suppose that no one will deny this—the lands to be sold there in the years to come will be more valuable than those which were sold in the last year; but for the purposes of calculation and for the purpose of ascertaining the present value of this land, I will adopt as the price of the remainder of the land grant with all the town sites to come, with the coal lands, with the timber lands, with the lands of special value, with the lands immediately alongside of the railway, as yet in great measure unsold—I say, assuming that having all this added to them, those speculations in town property, as in the case of Brandon, which the Company was able to make, and adding all these together, and assuming that for the remainder of the land, the present value is but what has been realized for other parts, it would amount to the sum of $49,467,000, or within a few thousand dollars of $49,500,000, making a total for the lands at the present values as ascertained by the sales of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of $67,000,000 nearly. Thus, the Company's receipts would be: their subsidy of $25,000,000; Government railways, $35,000,000, and the proceeds of lands already sold, $17,300,000, or a total of $77,300,000. The value of the unsold lands would be $49,500,000, making the total receipts $126,800,000. Now the Company estimates, by the statement to which I have referred, the road completed and equipped, and including besides the road which they contracted to build, and in respect of which the calculations were made, no less than 684 miles of their own road—the eastern part, the North Shore, the Canada Central and certain branches in the west and on the way west—the subsidy of $25,000,000, $20,000,000 land grant bonds and $90,000,000 of stock which they are putting on the market at 60 cts.—equal to $54,000,000—making a total of $99,000,000. Deduct the net value of the 684 miles—which is subject to liens, say, $5,500,000—I presume it cannot be less, having regard to the character of the road, and the character of the bulk of the country through which it passes—and it is worth a net sum of $9,000,000, making the cost of the road as contracted for, $90,000,000—the cost I mean to the Company. The Government works handed over, their subsidy, the land grant bonds already practically attended to, and the unsold lands together realizing $126,800,000, it is easy to see that according to present appearances they are to have the road—completed, equipped, with interest paid on the capital expended during construction—for nothing, and with a profit of about $37,000,000. This is the result which is indicated by the official memorandum of December. This is the result which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) justifies on the good, general business principle that all bargains should be mutually advantageous; and he says that an arrangement under which one party to the bargain is to build a road and equip a road which is to be its own property afterwards, and to receive the whole value of what it does, and some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 more, is a bargain which is mutually advantageous. Well, Mr. Speaker, I admit that it is advantageous, but I think the advantage was all on one side, and it is my opinion that if the course which was recommended and pressed on the House by this side of the Chamber, viz.: that we should give value to the lands of the North-West and develop the country by prosecuting with rapidity and vigor the prairie section, and postpone any arrangements for the construction of the ends until we had—as by these one and a half or two years operations, we would have—produced these results for ourselves instead of for the Company, we would have been able to make a bargain under which the Canadian Pacific Railway would have been completed just as soon as it may reasonably be expected to be completed now, but on terms infinitely more advantageous to the country—infinitely more advantageous, even if we only consider the financial question—infinitely more advantageous, if we consider also the question of the alienation of the land, the question of monopoly, and all the other questions of privilege and exception which are so glowingly set forth in the prospectus to which I have referred. The prospects also as to traffic are announced, and these, too, we might have realized for ourselves. These conditions, giving the value of the enterprise and to be considered accordingly in the price at which the road was to have been contracted for, could have been ascertained for us as for others. It turns out that even in its incomplete and disconnected position the eastern section has returned $3,200 per mile per annum; the western section has returned $3,600 per mile per annum, and the Company confidently predicts that within a short time its earnings will compare favorably with the earnings of American lines similarly situated, which are stated at somewhere about $7,500 per mile per annum. I maintain that at an earlier date than could have been supposed possible, by proof more cogent than we could have reasonably expected, the views which we pressed—unfortunately without success—upon this Chamber when this contract was before it, have been verified, and that whether you consider the financial aspect alone or the more important aspects to which I have referred, the policy which we propounded in opposition to the policy of the hon. gentleman has been already proved—and I believe that from day to day, and from year to year, will be more emphatically proved—the true policy for the country. I was glad to see from the Speech that the Public Lands Act is to be amended. On this point also—with reference to the management and administration of the public lands in the North-West—we have been at issue with the Administration, and we agree that the Public Lands Act requires amendment. I believe that the system which hon. gentlemen have inaugurated—that the various schemes which from time to time, they have devised and brought forward, have been, or the great majority of them, unfavorable; that they have produced ill results, and that a better and simpler system would have produced better results for the public of Canada, who are interested in this question financially, and to the whole people of Canada, old and new, who are interested in the early and satisfactory settlement of the country. I believe that the system which should have as little as possible introduced the middleman and allowed him to intervene between the public and the actual settler, would have been the true system, and that speculative sales, whether to colonization companies or to great farming companies, or to individuals, otherwise than on conditions of settlement, are injurious instead of advantageous. The hon. gentleman projected—I will not say in anticipation of, but I will say shortly and conveniently before the late elections—a great system of colonization companies—a system, which, acting on what he himself described, standing where he now sits, as the “land craze of the North-West,” extended the area of that land craze. Almost everybody thought they were going to get rich at no cost to themselves, at no risk to themselves, at little investment of their own, and at somebody else’s expense; and it is said that some 314 applications for colonization companies or parties, were favorably received by the Administration. How many of them have succeeded? How many came to a head? How many of them have paid the instalments which have been called for? How large a settlement have they actually accomplished or promoted? What sort of demands have been made upon the Administration with reference to these companies, and what is the present attitude, view and opinion of the Administration as to the colonization company scheme? Sir, I can give you upon this subject a little authentic information. I hold in my hand the report of the directors of one of the colonization companies made to their shareholders on the 10th of September, 1882, and it contains these words:

“On the 15th inst., an interview was had with Sir John A. Macdonald by the President and Secretary, and Messrs. Johnson, Kingsmill and McNee, on the question of when the survey of the tract would be prosecuted, so that the operations of the Company might be proceeded with. The Minister declared that no promise of survey could be made until the first instalment was paid, and a contract entered into by the Company; that even after the instalment was paid, the time at which a surveyor would be appointed was entirely uncertain—it might be a year, or it might be more; that there was an insufficient number of surveyors available for the requirements of the Government, and they preferred employing them along the lines of railway; that, in short, we must pay the money and take the chances of a survey, as Sir John expressed it, “within the next 25 years.” Being asked if the Company would be afforded an opportunity of enquiring further into the quality of the lands before paying for them, Sir John replied that the Government could make no concessions in that direction. On the question of an extension of time for the payment of the first instalment, the Minister declared that he could hold out no hope either to our Company or to others similarly situated, as he found that these enterprises had been entered into in a merely speculative spirit, and that their effect had been to retard rather than promote the settlement of the country. He stated that he could not, of course, say in advance what would be done at the meeting of Council, which was shortly to be held, but that he intended to oppose making concessions to any Colonization Company.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What company is that?

Mr. BLAKE. The Saskatchewan Forks Colonization Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Saskatchewan Forks!

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that was the company in which the hon. gentleman roped in the press; for he had companies for everybody, for every class, for every creed, I believe for every denomination. There was one company for the licensed victuallers, another for the temperance people, one company for one denomination, and another for another, and the hon. gentleman gave to the press this interesting statement that I have read—but that was not before the 20th of June; that was on the 15th of September, when it was all over. I observe that a gentleman whose voice we miss in this Chamber, but whose name we shall have the opportunity of greeting yearly in the Public Accounts—I mean the new Inspector of Colonization Companies—stated the other day at a meeting, I believe, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Directors, that the only company in the North-West which had performed its obligations, was the Qu’Appelle Farming Company; and I was a little surprised at this statement, because you will recollect that the principal operations of the Qu’Appelle Farming Company of which the public have been informed, have been not the settlement of immigrants in the North-West, but the expulsion of actual settlers from its lands; and, therefore, if this be the only company of the hon. gentleman’s lot which has performed its obligations, and if the company, which was performing its obligations, was expelling, I wonder what the settling companies were doing. The truth is, that that which alone could justify the formation—I do not say of all, for some may have been formed on business principles; but any large number of the colonization companies at all, viz.: that they were about to introduce into the country immigrants from across the water who otherwise would not be got here, was not asked of them; that it was not on that basis that the scheme was carried out, and that the men who went into them—I do not say all, but the great bulk of them—expected to take advantage of the wave of settlement over the country, produced by other causes, to become middlemen, not giving any valuable consideration, but reaping a profit between the settler and the Government. Now, Sir, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has held rigidly to his statement, which I have just read. I observe that there has been an extension of time. I observe an announcement in the papers that the last day of grace is to expire on the 28th of this month, and after that date there is to be a cancellation of those in default. But it would be interesting to know, after the roll is made up and arrangements are completed, what the actual results have been, not in the sale of lands to the speculators, but what the practical, tangible results have been in the way of placing permanent settlers on the lands of the North-West. The administration of the Land Department certainly does not possess the merit of constancy. There have been continual changes. Lands are offered for sale; the order is suspended; once again they are opened; and so forth. I have seen, and read, and heard constant complaints of the difficulty of knowing what the regulations are for the guidance of settlers at any particular time. Great difficulties have arisen—and I think it is important that later on these questions should be very fully discussed, because I presume we are only on the threshold of these difficulties—as between the Government, the companies and the settlers. You have the speculator and the homesteader; you have the bona fide squatter and the speculative squatter; you have those who jump claims, some for themselves, and some for speculators, companies and others; and circumstances have been stated to me of the very greatest injustice in this regard. On the whole I believe it will be found that the administration of the lands of the North-West does not redound to the credit of the Administration. These regulations and laws do require amendment, and I trust the amendments promised us in the Speech from the Throne will be improvements. I observe that the regulations regarding public lands have been changed—that a portion of the difficulties which I suggested are now recognized by the hon. gentleman, although I confess he does not seem to me by his change to remove those difficulties. I hope we shall know to what extent under the old regulations public land leases have been made and on what terms the hon. gentleman proposes to convert those leases of some of the most valuable portions of the North-West into freeholds. So with reference to timber limits, it was said that a very large proportion have up to this time been parted with, and on terms which have afforded a very fair profit to the fortunate individuals who have from time to time received the favor of grants from the Government. I will not trespass on the time of the House by touching upon the other topics of the Speech because I believe they can be more effectually dealt with when the measures come down, before passing to a point or two which I think deserve notice. I wish to say that I do not agree with the statement of the hon. member for Pictou as to the result of the application of one of his tests of prosperity. He said he believed that the failures had decreased during the current year. My recollection of the reports of the Dunn and Bradstreet agencies from which we derive our information in this regard, is that the failures have very greatly increased this year as compared with last year. I do not hold that these failures have increased to an alarming extent, yet I do hold that the indication of increasing prosperity to which the hon. gentleman directed us as a test, proves, if it proves anything, the reverse of that which he intended. Now, Sir, one other point with reference to the statement of the hon. member. He adverted to the high prices and the values of the fisheries this year. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman attributed that to the fiscal policy of the Administration, but I believe the Administration is no more responsible for that high price than it is responsible for the lower price of grain, though according to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, there is a credit to be attached to them for the high prices which obtained for grain in former years, and it would be only fair to charge them with the responsibility for that fall in grain which has struck so many faithful friends of theirs in the rural communities with dismay—who believed that so long as the Conservative party were in power under their present leader, he would make such arrangements in the markets of the world that wheat would always be high. Now the price of fish is high. It is due to what, I suppose, we must thank Providence for, the failure in the fisheries of other countries, the failures of the fisheries of Norway, and to a considerable extent, those of Newfoundland, which have diminished the supply of fish, and of course increased the value. I am glad to say there is a considerable prospect of the extension of our fishing industry under these circumstances, and more vessels are under construction with a view of taking advantage of the favorable tide. I suppose the hon. gentleman would attribute these results to the bounty of $2 per head, which was prescribed by the Act of last Session, but which has not yet been obtained. It seems to me the causes to which I have referred are more likely to have produced them than the hon. gentleman's bounty. There is an omission or two in the Speech which, I think, deserve attention. In the first place, the foreign trade negotiations. The Speech for 1879 announced a negotiation for the development of trade with France, Spain and the colonies. The Speech for 1880 declared that the increased foreign trade of Canada, and the proposed Imperial negotiations, demanded our closest attention and watchfulness and required a representative in London. But upon this subject the Speech is mute to-day. We have nothing conveyed to us in this authentic fashion, and the ordinary sources of information tell us that the negotiations which have been going on, more or less, almost ever since the Administration came in, have now been postponed until after the completion of the negotiations for a commercial treaty between France and the United Kingdom—another proof of the wisdom of the step which we proposed to Parliament last Session, that we still obtain a greater measure of freedom in the conduct and maturing of our own commercial relations. Once again a former Speech ushered in a subject with peans of joy, and upon that subject there is an ominous silence to-day—the poor Charybdis. I recollect when I heard read the Speech in 1881, which declared that, "Her Majesty's Government has generously presented to Canada, for training school purposes, the steam corvette Charybdis, lately returned from service in the Chinese seas," and promised us the papers on that important subject; and the orators of that day in performing the duty which my hon. friends have just so ably discharged, were enthusiastic over the presentation. The hon. member for West Toronto declared that it formed "a pleasing feature in the Speech. This generous act proves that the Imperial Government still retains its sympathies for us." The hon. member for Yamaska was still more gushing. "The Speech," he said, "refers to the generous gift that Her Majesty's Government has just made to Canada, by sending us the splendid steam corvette, Charybdis. This gift, that the country accepts with the greatest gratitude, was destined to supply a want long felt in the organization of the forces of the country. We are a maritime people. Perhaps no country in the world possesses a more extensive seaboard than ours, and the interior is covered with lakes and rivers that constitute, as it were, vast inland seas. Nevertheless we are wanting in marines. The training ship is calculated to create this new calling, and our young men will be able to defend the country on the high seas with as much skill and valor as on the land." But where is she now? Why, Sir, you cannot find her, even in the Speech from the Throne. After an expenditure of several tens of thousands of dollars we know nothing about her, except that the newspapers tell us that she has been returned and the gift that was ushered in with so much eclat, and the added strength and dignity which was gained by the Administration a couple of years ago having passed away, they have not a word to say about her. They leave her to one side. They pass in silence this subject. If no one else will, let me be permitted to pay my tribute to the departed Charybdis. Now, Sir, we are here as a new Parliament to discharge our functions under circumstances which have given to the hon. gentlemen opposite a very decided Parliamentary majority—a majority, as I have proved, far in excess of what the popular vote would have given them—assuring to them the opportunity of executing their own views with reference to the policy of this country, on all points during the natural term of that Parliament. Its political forces are pretty much as the forces of the old Parliament. To hon. gentlemen opposite is given the power to which I have referred, and to us is allotted the task of criticising their transactions, of watching the discharge of their functions, of propounding our views and of proving, as I believe we shall be able to prove, year after year, as experience gives us the opportunity, the soundness of those counter views which we have pressed upon the attention of the Parliament of this country from time to time. While, as I have said, the political constitution of this Parliament, in a Parliamentary sense, is the same as that of the Parliament which preceded it, we know that there are here many new faces, and that there are absent many faces with which we have been familiar, and this Parliament, like other new Parliaments, though similar, in a party sense, will yet form a character of its own, and create a fate—a reputation for itself. Much is in its hands. Upon its prudence, upon its patience, its deliberations, its candor, its moderation, the judgment which it exercises, much will depend. For my part, I will express the hope that, adverse though may be the political complexion of my own views, those deliberations may be of the character to which I have referred; that they may be moderate, careful, candid and patient, and that when its term shall have expired we may all be able to join in the statement that the things which it has done have redounded to the honor and advantage of the land we love and serve.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I certainly can find no fault with the spirit in which my hon. friend has addressed the House on this occasion; and I can cordially join with him, as all this House can do, in his concluding sentences. No matter what our political antecedents may have been, no matter what our political proclivities are, we are all, I believe, true Canadians, anxious to forward the best interests of this country, although our opinions may vary as to the best mode of fostering its prosperity. Although it is not likely that during the present Parliament, any more than the last, I shall be found to agree with my hon. friend in many things, I can cordially coincide with him in his opening remarks respecting the two gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address. His exceedingly appropriate and well deserved compliment to those two gentlemen must have met with the approbation and assent of every member of this House. It must be gratifying to both sides of the House to see such evidences of intellectual force brought so early into play at the beginning of this new Parliament; but while it must have been gratifying to hon. gentlemen in an intellectual sense, it must have been, as you can well understand, and as the House can well understand, especially gratifying to me, when I see the son of my old colleague and friend, who has fought the battle with me side by side for twenty years—for our alliance commenced long before Confederation—to see the son of a colleague take that distinguished step, take at once a position in this House. I say it is exceedingly gratifying to me, gratifying to my colleague, and gratifying to the whole Conservative party. The hon. gentleman also paid a just compliment to the seconder of the Address. His language, fluent, clear, explicit, eloquent, shows that he, too, is going to take a distinguished position in the Parliament of Canada. But my hon. friend, while he paid a high compliment to the manner of the speeches of my hon. friends, took objection to the substance. He had to object, he had to complain. As his able predecessor said: "What is the use of an Opposition if it does not oppose?" and he felt it was his role to commence by an immediate opposition, going back to the old obsolete system of making long speeches on the Address. He commenced at once to play the role of an oppositionist by attacking my hon. friends in almost every statement that they made. In the first place he said that the prospect held out by those gentlemen was too good, the sunshine was too strong. He was dazzled with excess of light; he could not stand the light of prosperity that was poured over this House through the lips of my two hon. friends. I do not say that the hon. gentleman loved darkness rather than light, because his political deeds were the reverse of good. I do not wish to say so, but he complained that there were no shadows. Well, Mr. Speaker, the shadows may come by-and-bye. The hon. gentleman says that there has been a repression, a suppression of public feeling at the last election; and if that suppression had reduced the Conservative majority from 36 to 18 in the present Parliament from Ontario, it might go on and still further reduce the majority and change them to a minority, and then, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we shall have shadows enough. We have brilliant sunshine now, the light of prosperity shines over us, but political and financial difficulties are sure to come. The hon. gentleman's æsthetic tastes will be satisfied to the utmost extent, for light and shadow will then be properly mingled, and Rembrandt will be infinitely more than Turner in the picture. My hon. friend put me much in mind of an old Newcastle collier who had been boxing the compass for many years, and in the exigencies of the last long voyage he had been in almost every foreign country. After a visit of seven years to the West Indies he came back to England, and when his ship was approaching the land, and when he felt the familiar sleet and storm and saw the familiar clouds, he put on his sou'-wester and his pea jacket and said: "This is something like weather; none of your infernal blue skies for me." This is the feeling of my hon. friend. We will be satisfied, however, to bask in the sunshine and leave the storm and the clouds and the tempest to my hon. friend. My hon. friend, after a few preliminary remarks, spoke of the clause in the Speech relative to representation in Parliament. He alluded in a very kind and good-natured way to the legislation of last Session, and he assumed that it had to be amended. Well, that cannot be amended for ten years, under the Constitution. Right or wrong, there it must remain until the next decennial Census. He took occasion to refer to the Gerrymandering Bill, as it has been called. Well, Mr. Speaker, when that Bill was brought in I took occasion to say that it had been my duty as Prime Minister, in 1872, to lay a new scheme for representation before the Parliament of Canada; and then in 1872 I was charged with wilfully rearranging, readjusting, disarranging—if you like—the representations of the country for political purposes, and last Session when that Bill was before Parliament the hon. gentleman on the other side rose and approved of the legislation of 1872, and desired that we should adhere to the principle of that Bill. I declared then that in 1892, when I intended to introduce another Bill, I should find, and the country would find, that those gentlemen would just as strongly advocate the Bill of 1882 as they did that of 1872, and I said we would have to wait for ten years to be able to show the correctness of the principle on which our Bill was founded. But I find that in one year it has had that effect. True, the hon. gentleman says there has been a suppression of public opinion, but he had to admit that certainly the rearrangement of the constituencies in the Province of Ontario, from which he and I both acquire our right to sit in this House, the representation as altered by the Bill of last Session, has caused an increase in the number of the followers of the hon. gentleman and a decrease in the number of my followers. Could there be a more convincing proof of the justice and the equity of that arrangement? But the hon. gentleman says it was a suppression of public opinion. If there had been a full expression of public opinion, taking the hon. gentleman's own language, perhaps our majority might have been 36 again. He remarked that the law respecting representation required several changes, several amendments, and that before coming to Parliament we ought to have secured those amendments. Sir, we went to Parliament on the laws passed by the hon. gentleman himself—the election laws and all that concerned representation were enacted by the hon. gentlemen opposite—and we went to the country upon those laws. The hon. gentleman spoke last Session of the manner in which that Bill altered the appointment of returning officers. The Government took the power into their hands, under their responsibility as a Government, of appointing the returning officers; but it will be found on looking over the list of those officers, that in the vast majority of cases we took the officers that previously had been acting, and it was only in cases where the Government knew, and were morally and legally convinced, that the persons who would officiate as returning officers would be unworthy of the trust, that the Government made any other selection. It is so, Mr. Speaker; and when the hon. leader of the Opposition says that those returning officers acted improperly and partially, I say there is no evidence whatever to sustain that charge. I believe the elections in June last were conducted on the whole as fairly and impartially, and that the people had as fair an opportunity of electing those whom they wished to represent them, as the people of any country ever had in the world. But the hon. gentleman said they were officials who had characters to maintain, and if they had been appointed they would have been restrained by their official position, and they would have acted impartially beyond a doubt. The hon. Finance Minister says that in New Brunswick no change was made in the returning officers, they being the sheriffs in all cases. In Ontario, in the majority of cases, the sheriffs or registrars were selected; but what if they had not been? Had this Government, had the Dominion, as a whole, any assurance of impartiality by persons holding office during the pleasure of the Ontario Government? Why every member of the Ontario Government went into the June contest; they abandoned their duties, they left the Government to sink or swim, they took the stump, to use the common expression, and they thought their existence depended on the defeat of the Dominion Government. They threw themselves into the contest, and while the hon. gentleman speaks of improper acts done during the elections, coming within his personal knowledge, it can be established that undue influence was used by the Ontario Government to defeat the well understood wishes of the people. Undue influence of every kind can be shown to have been used, with inspectors of tavern licenses, with bailiffs and clerks of courts—undue influence of every kind was used in order to defeat the free expression of the opinions and wishes of the people of Ontario, and were we going to submit to this, to be obliged to allow the most servile slaves of the Ontario Government to act when we believed there was no protection, when we knew from the character of the men and their positions that they could not be free from sinister, clandestine, and improper influences, and not take other and better men? It was an act of self-defence, and only as such was the power taken by the Act of last Session ever put in force. The hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks suggested several amendments to the law. They will come, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is a member of Parliament, he has been a member a good many years, he was in the late Parliament, he might, in the exercise of his large experience, his great ability, and his Parliamentary right, have introduced a measure or measures for the purpose of amending the law introduced and carried by the party to which he belongs. Why did he not do so? It is very easy to be wise after the fact; it is very easy to say that amendments are required in the law affecting the representation and controverted elections. But no suggestion of that kind was made during the last four years; he never gave a hint that the laws required amendment. They were laws enacted by his own party, and therefore he was bound to stand by them. We went to the people on those laws and obtained a verdict in our favor, and I believe it was a free and fair expression of the opinion and feeling of the people of Canada, and under that decision we are commanding a majority which the hon. gentleman does not gainsay. The hon. gentleman, in order to be true to his character as leader of the Opposition, actually brought up as a charge against this Government that they had not altered the law to meet recent legislation in Ontario as to Election Courts. If we had done so we would have been told we were centralizing power, that we were interfering with the legislation of the Province of Ontario. We would have had to prejudge the case; it is not yet decided whether there is any necessity for legislation, for the matter is now before the courts. It is to be remembered that if any trouble has arisen in consequence of legislation, even in the Ontario Legislature or here, it has been due to the Act of the hon. gentleman in 1874. In 1873 we passed an Act by which all controverted elections should be tried by an Election Court, which should be a Dominion Court, and which should be subject only to the legislation of this Parliament. When the hon. gentleman came into power the first thing he did was to alter the law, and instead of making the Election Court a Dominion Court he made it a Provincial Court. I warned him at the time of the consequence of that error, and I told him that the question would arise whether the Dominion Parliament had the right to force the trial of election cases upon Provincial Courts. That question was raised afterwards, and though one court decided we had no right to pass such a law it was subsequently decided otherwise; but if the original law of 1873 had been adhered to and the Election Court had been a Dominion Court, this trouble and difficulty would never have arisen. I did not quite understand from my hon. friend when he was speaking further with reference to representation, whether he objected to the assimilation of the laws of the different Provinces with respect to the electoral franchise. He reiterated certain objections which had previously been taken years ago, on the old Bill introduced by myself, I think, in 1870; but I am not sure that he went to the extent of stating that he still desired that the electoral franchise should be exercised in each Province according to the franchise there existing for electoral purposes. I did not so understand my hon. friend. I do not know that he went that far. He repeated the various objections which had been taken before to that bill, but I think that, on the whole, he felt that it would not meet either the approbation of this House or that of the country, to maintain the present system by which in one Province a man might vote, while in the next Province under the same conditions a man might have no vote, and in a third Province a woman might vote, and so on in every Province, there being a diversity of the franchise and a diversity in the electoral provisions. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that uniformity in this respect might not in all cases be attainable, but, at all events, one thing is clear: that—whether the franchise be uniform, whether the right to vote be uniform in all the Provinces or not, whether the same qualifications should exist—the right of settling what the qualification is should rest with the Dominion Parliament and not with the Provincial Parliaments. Sir, in one of the Provinces the franchise is universal suffrage. In some Provinces we have income qualification, and in others we have it not. In the Province of Ontario—the largest Province, having the largest electorate in the Dominion—we are told, and we see that the Government of the day have given a promise, not very specific, it is true—on the contrary, it is very vague, but still it is a promise made just before the elections—that they were going to enlarge the suffrage. To what extent, Mr. Speaker? We do not know. For all we know, for all my hon. friend and myself know, we may find ourselves deprived of our constituents. There may be such an alteration of the franchise that those who sent us here may disappear, and another and a different set of men may have the right to decide our future fate, and a different constituency and different body of electors may decide whether our course now, in the present Parliament, is right or wrong—a different body altogether, who have no sympathy, perhaps, with the old electorate way; and we, instead of going back to our old constituents—to those who sent us here—when we return to give an account of our stewardship, we may find another and different body of men to judge of our conduct. Sir, it is impossible that this can last. It might do—it was of necessity adopted in the commencement of our system. The moment that Confederation was framed we were obliged to have a Parliament, but we had no machinery for the purpose, and we accepted the Provincial machinery. We were obliged, ex necessitate, to adopt the system which existed at the time in the four Provinces, and they were not then so very far different. There was not then so very great a diversity of qualification as rendered it obnoxious and impossible on the face of it; but, Sir, since that time we have been adding Province after Province, and the test of Parliamentary qualification for representation and the electoral vote has been altered more and more every day. We are now promised, as I have already remarked, in the chief Province of the Dominion, that there shall be a material alteration in the franchise. The hon. gentleman has quoted several objections to the proposed central system. He says, in the first place, that it is centralization. Well, I do not think that the cry of centralization comes with good grace from an hon. gentleman a member of a party which sustains Mr. Mowat in his office. Why the whole system of the Liberal Administration in the Province of Ontario has been centralization. They have taken the right of deciding everything connected with taverns and with the licensed victuallers; they have taken the clerkships of courts, and the appointments of bailiffs of courts, and of the hang-men of the courts; they have taken the appointment of every official in the land to themselves; they have invaded the rights of our municipalities; they have invaded the rights of our corporations; they have tried to centralize every power and every authority in Toronto; and I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I am not speaking wrongly when I say that this centralization has been used and will be used for political purposes and for the purposes of sustaining the Liberal party of Ontario in power. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend chided the mover and seconder of the Address for speaking in terms of pleasure and of gratification in reference to the large surplus with which the Dominion is blessed, or as the hon. gentleman would say, is cursed; and he says that we have changed our principles, and especially so my hon. friend who sits near me—the Minister of Railways—who had stated that a small surplus of half a million of money was too large and ought to be distributed or ought to be used for the reduction of taxation. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, when he was discussing that matter, as a member of the Opposition, when Sir Richard Cartwright was the hon. Finance Minister, merely held the then hon. Minister of Finance to his own principles. The latter gentleman was opposed to the principles of protection; that gentleman was opposed to the carrying out of the National Policy; that gentleman was opposed to the adjustment of the Tariff for the purpose of protecting native industries; he held that the Tariff should be used for revenue purposes only; and the moment when an equilibrium was attained between expenditure and revenue, we then had acquired and arrived at a just measure of taxation; and that whenever there was a surplus over that equilibrium, an injustice was done to the people, necessitating a reduction, in order that the surplus might be removed and a mere equilibrium thus again restored. My hon. friend held Sir Richard Cartwright to his statement, and said to him: "Why, you have got half a million of a surplus, while you say that no Government should have a surplus;" and he pointed out how that surplus might be judiciously used according to the principles announced by that Finance Minister with respect to certain articles of consumption in Canada. But both the Minister of Railways and myself, and the party to which we belong, have always held to the principle of Canada for the Canadians. We have always held to the principle of encouraging native industries, and we have always held that the Tariff—while its first object was formed for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Government and carrying on the affairs and developing the resources of the country—had, and ought to have, a two-fold operation, especially in consideration of the circumstances under which Canada and the United States were placed side by side; and that while by means of the Tariff we should raise a revenue, by the same means we should so foster our infant industries that we might make this country like the country adjoining us—a manufacturing country; that our people should not be employed in the one industry of agriculture alone, but that by carrying out the National Policy we might introduce, foster and encourage the manufacturing and all the varied industries which this country was capable of initiating, fostering or maintaining. But the hon. gentleman says that the Minister of Finance made a great mistake in having such a large surplus. Why, Sir, it was a consequence of this sunshine, a consequence of this wonderful and unexpected prosperity. We believed that the result of carrying out our policy would be that the country would become prosperous, that our industries would be developed, that our people would be fully employed, and that wealth would pour into the country. But we did not expect—we could not expect, no man could expect who really kept his mind on an even balance—that such an influx of prosperity could be the result, though certainly combined with other causes, as the hon. gentleman behind me admitted. The consequence of this prosperity was a great importation of everything in the nature of taxable goods. The people were rich, they liked to spend their money, and it is most gratifying to me, and it must be most gratifying to this Government, to feel that perhaps in no other country in the world has it happened so completely as here—that with a system of taxation that has produced a surplus more than the ordinary administration of the Government requires, there is not one single cry from the country against the taxation. There is not a single grumble among the people that the taxation is heavy. I believe that if you wanted to arouse a feeling of discontent you could do it by reducing the Tariff, and thereby shaking the confidence of the manufacturers and the men employed by them, in the future manufacturing prosperity of the country. Sir, it is said there are few countries that will patiently bear taxation, but we are the exception. This country is quite satisfied with the Tariff which my hon. friend the Finance Minister initiated, and which is now the law of the land; and I take it that if you wish to produce dissatisfaction in the country, you will attempt to return to the low rate of taxation—to the taxation which existed before the spring of 1879. The hon. gentleman said but little respecting the paragraph in the Speech which refers to legislation with regard to liquor licenses. That subject was not willingly undertaken by the present Government. They were quite satisfied that the law as it obtains in the different Provinces should be continued. They were quite satisfied that each Province should, so far as the law would allow it to enact such statutes, deal with the subject of shop, tavern and saloon licenses. Neither the Government nor the Parliament of Canada, I take it, wished to interfere; and it was only when the decision which was given in June last on the Scott Act, a Dominion Act, and the subject was forced upon them that they thought it their duty to bring it before Parliament. I never had any doubt that when the question was brought before the courts, it would be decided that the different Provincial Legislatures had no right whatever to deal with that subject except for revenue purposes—for the purpose of imposing taxation for Provincial or municipal purposes. I expressed the opinion in Parliament years ago, and last year I expressed it at a public meeting in Toronto or its vicinity. But while that opinion was strongly impressed upon my mind I took no steps, nor did the Government of which I was a member take any steps, for the purpose of interfering with the legislation of the different Provinces, or forcing Dominion legislation on the country, or trying to centralize such powers in this Parliament. On the contrary, the only centralization on that subject—the only time in which that question was in any way dealt with by the Dominion Parliament—was when the late Government was in power, and when they introduced the Scott Act. They introduced that Act and thereby asserted the right and power of the Dominion Parliament. Now it is quite clear that if the Dominion Parliament had the right to pass the Scott Act it had the exclusive right, because there is no concurrent jurisdiction in the British North America Act on that subject; and when the constitutionality of that act was decided against, by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, the Dominion Government—I being a member of that Government—in order that the question might be settled, in order that we might get the highest final decision on that point, came to Parliament to get a vote of money for the purpose of paying counsel on both sides. I say that we did this in order to get a final decision on the question of whether the right to deal with that subject as a matter of good government or as a matter of trade and commerce, rested here or with the Provincial Legislatures. The court unanimously decided—their decisions are all unanimous—that the power rested here. The Privy Council had no doubt on the subject, and I am surprised that my hon. friend did not find leisure to read the judgment in the case of Russell vs. The Queen. A copy of that judgment was sent to him, as well as to every other member of this House, but since it did not happen to meet the eyes of my hon. friend, I shall be glad to send him as many copies as he likes. It is quite clear to every lawyer, and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, will see that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided that this Parliament had the right to deal with the Scott Act, are the reasons showing that the Provincial Legislature of Ontario had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks Act, except as a matter of revenue for municipal or Provincial purposes. The hon. gentleman says that we should have allowed the matter to stand over until it was finally decided. Sir, if there be any value in that decision, and there is every value in it, because it is the law of the land, there is no check at this moment in the Province of Ontario against the unlimited, unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors. This is not a matter we can play with. It is not a matter of policy; it is a matter of necessity. If we wish to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors we must legislate immediately; for I take it that any man in this city or in any other part of Ontario can open his saloon and sell liquors, and there is not a court in the world can prevent his doing so. All he has to do is to be ready to pay the license, if it is wanted for revenue purposes, to the Government of Ontario. This is not a state of things which should exist. It is not a state of things which should be allowed to be made a political plaything. It is not a subject which should be made a political cry, but it should be dealt with at once; and I am sure gentlemen on both sides of the House will, at the request and instance of the Government, address themselves calmly and considerately to the means of doing away with this condition of things. If it be proved that this Parliament or no Parliament can deal with it, I think that all will agree that we should address ourselves at once to the subject. If the Provincial Legislatures are insufficient, if the Provinces have not power enough to introduce wholesome regulations in restraint of the sale of intoxicating liquors, we will supplement any such power as they have by bringing the full power and the full authority conferred upon this Parliament, by the British North America Act, to the aid of the different Provinces in the cause of morality, to prevent the mischiefs that are caused by the unrestrained use and sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the different Provinces of Canada. I shall not say anything with respect to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman as to the Pacific Railway. It is very easy to say that the bargain was an improvident one. It is very easy to say now that the Canadian Pacific Railway shareholders are going to make enormous fortunes. I hope they will make large fortunes, for they have now enormous risks. Sir, if these men had not been found, if one or two men of a thousand had not been found, men of enthusiasm as well as of wealth, men who thought more of the glory of the high position they would be placed in in the eyes of their countrymen and in the eyes of posterity, by the construction of one of the greatest lines of railway in the world, if we had not been fortunate enough to get millionaires enthusiastic enough to risk their millions in this work, we might have dragged on for the next twenty years as we have been for the last twelve. But I believe and know that these men will succeed, and I hope they will receive a due reward for all their risks and anxieties, and for giving up twelve or fourteen of the best years of their lives, as they each must do, to carry out this great work; and we shall be repaid speedily, immediately, without any further delay, by having this great railway binding together all portions of our wide Dominion, and connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific. I would, if I were a member of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, tender my most cordial thanks to my hon. friend opposite for the speech he has made to-night. There are no shadows in his speech with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They are all in sunshine; they are making their millions and millions; and yet, Mr. Speaker, if we look at the money articles in the financial papers in England, we do not find any such glowing expectations. The Money Market Review, The Trade Circular, The News, The Times, and almost every other paper in London, have come out with articles stating that the railway was a ruinous enterprise, that it could not pay, and warning bondholders, warning capitalists, warning every person against touching this scheme as wild, improvident, extravagant and as involving certain ruin. The hon. gentleman well deserves the best thanks of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and as a great friend of that Company, and anxious that they should succeed to the utmost extent that the hon. gentleman can paint, I shall make it my special duty to send a large number of copies of my hon. friend's speech to England, in order to show that not only does the Government of Canada, headed unworthily by myself, believe that that railway is a profitable enterprise for those who have undertaken it, but that the leader of the Opposition, that gentleman who opposed the granting of their charter has in his place in Parliament chosen to state his belief that they are going to make untold millions out of it; and if I were a monied man after reading my hon. friend's speech, I would be apt to make an investment with Land Grant Bonds and in the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But, Mr. Speaker, I fear that I am tiring you—that I am falling into the error of my hon. friend opposite in prematurely discussing questions which ought properly to be discussed when the measures are before Parliament and all the information in the power of the Departments to give is in the hands of hon. gentlemen. Because there is a Bill promised in the Speech for the consolidation and amendment of the Public Lands Act, the hon. gentleman could not refrain from attacking the policy of the Government in reference to the management of the public lands. Sir, when that subject comes up and full information regarding it is laid before the House, I shall be only too glad, as the Minister primarily responsible for the management of the lands of the North-West, to meet the hon. gentleman and discuss the question fully and fairly and frankly. I do not admit that the establishment of colonization companies has been a failure. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I believe that those companies which have shown vitality have been of use, are of use, and will be of use to the North-West. The hon. gentleman said in one part of his speech very truly that a considerable portion of the immigration into the North-West went from the Province of Ontario. Those men who went from the Province of Ontario did not require any middlemen; they went up knowing well enough what they sought, and when they got there they got what they did seek. Under the law no man is obliged to have resort to a middleman. Every man can go up and choose his own homestead, and get his contiguous quarter section. Every man has the whole country to roam over; but the great difficulty is to get the emigration from the old country. Few emigrants are able to come to this country, pay for their preemption, build their house, and prepare for the cultivation of their soil. Though some of the colonization companies have failed, others have not failed. Some have been exceedingly active, and exceedingly successful. One or two of them have already fulfilled everything they promised, and have put in every settler they promised to put upon their lands. Others are now in the process of doing so. This is a matter which cannot be done in a day. There was, it is true, an anxiety among the people, especially of the Dominion, and some in England, to acquire lands, thinking they could keep them until, by the process of settlement, the land would rise in value without any action of theirs. But that has all disappeared now. We insisted that there should be a substantial payment, that they should put on annually so many immigrants on their grounds, and they have the greatest inducement to do so. They have paid their money. If they do not carry out the conditions of the colonization scheme, they will lose their money, and the consequence is that these colonization companies that had paid their money have their agents in Europe, and I believe that much of the immigration that will come to this country during the next year will be caused and assisted by those companies. They must do so in order to save their money, and that does not prevent the settler who chooses to look for himself from settling on any land that he fences. Under the only plan in force, Plan No. 1 as it is called, no man can be prevented from settling on an even numbered quarter section. The fact that a grant of land is made of 20,100, or 1,000 townships does not exclude the emigrant settler. He can settle on the even numbered lots in spite of the company that has the grant. If the company helped that man in any way, they will get due credit for him as an emigrant settler by the company, but not otherwise. The hon. gentleman chooses to sneer at the various denominations and classes of people who have formed themselves into colonization companies. I am glad to say we have had several denominations getting large tracts of land for the purpose of settlement. I suppose the hon. gentleman will admit that the Wesleyan body is an important body, in England as well as in Canada. They have applied for and have received a tract of land. They are now using all the organizations of that large and respectable body in England to bring out the very best classes of emigrants to the North-West. The Primitive Methodists and other religious denominations have done the same thing, and I believe have nearly settled all the lands given to them under the colonization system. While we desire to settle the country, it is to be remembered that Parliament has exacted a promise from us and our predecessors that, if the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be built, any money advanced in its construction was to be repaid out of the sale of lands in the North-West. The Mackenzie Government made an appropriation of millions of lands for the purpose of paying the expense of building that road. We carried out the same policy. We have been more successful in the application of it, but the Government before us, as well as the present Government, was committed to this policy, that the expense of building the road across the prairie should not fall upon the people of the older provinces. That rich country is able to build its own railways and the pledge was that the road should be built out of the sale of those lands. You heard the statement made by the hon. member for Pictou, that already, under their engagements which cannot be broken, because we have the pledges of the instalments paid in which these companies will not forfeit, of the $25,000,000 that the people of Canada are pledged to pay the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, valid contracts are now made for upwards of $10,000,000. Of this $2,000,000 have been paid in hard cash and the sales will go on for the next few years at an accelerated ratio much beyond the sales of the past two years. It ought to be gratifying to every member of this House, as it will be to the country, to know that already fully half of the whole expense of building that railway is already provided for and that, as I had occasion to say in 1873 and again in 1879, not one single farthing of the cost of building the railway should fall on the older Provinces. We will have that great country opened up, and every farthing will be paid out of its own resources for its own railway. I must apologize for having spoken so long. I do not understand from my hon. friend opposite that an amendment is going to be introduced. I can state again I have no complaint to make of the spirit of the criticisms of my hon. friend; they were made fully in a parliamentary way, and with that charm of manner and eloquence which is his peculiar property. I am very glad to join with him in the belief that although we may differ in our political views, as to the best means of promoting the interests of the country, we, being actuated by the common desire for the good of our country, may join together sometimes. If we do differ, it is because our judgment is not the same. We cannot look eye to eye and mind to mind, but while we will insist on our own opinion, we will give due credit to those opposed to us, being actuated by the same patriotic desire of promoting the interests of the country, as we feel we will by the measures we introduce.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not intend to take much of the time of the House in relation to the subject matter in the Speech, but merely arise to call attention to a matter that was passingly referred to by the hon. member for Westmoreland as an omission from the Speech. It is in reference to the clause referring to the re-arrangement of the franchise. I should have liked very much if the Ministry of the day in inserting this paragraph in the Speech: "It is important that the laws relating to the representation of the people in Parliament should be amended, and the electoral franchises existing in the several Provinces assimilated," should have added that they would at the same time re-distribute the representation in the Province to which I belong. I may say that there is a very gross outrage upon the people of that Province in the existing state of the representation of the different counties they are in. While I am not going to comment upon the Speech itself, I may simply, en passant, compliment, as other hon. gentlemen have done, the mover and seconder of the Address for the very handsome manner in which they have performed their duties; but I wish to call the attention of the House to this point, and I think it will be very much in the interests of the Province of New Brunswick for the Ministry to take into their consideration. I make the suggestion in a friendly spirit. The hon. member for Westmoreland hoped that the Government would deal with this matter before the end of the present Parliament, but, I hope they will deal with it this very Session, and in the very Bill that is now proposed. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that in the Province of New Brunswick the representation has remained unchanged so far back as the memory of living men extends, though the constituencies have increased or diminished in population. This representation should have been re-arranged at the time of Confederation, but there were difficulties in the way. Now that the question of the franchise is to be dealt with, I do hope that the Government will consider the incongruities of the representation in New Brunswick, and that when they bring in their Bill they will do that justice to New Brunswick to which I consider she is entitled. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, smiles at my proposal. He knows as well as I do that what I am stating is strictly correct. I will give a few instances of the disproportionate representation from that Province. The County of Westmoreland as appears by the last Census, has a population of 37,719 souls, and has only one member in this House. The County of Sunbury has a population of only 6,651, six times less than the County of Westmoreland, and yet it returns one member. The County of York, so ably represented by the hon. gentleman opposite, has a population of 30,397, while the County of Restigouche has only 7,058. Take the County of Northumberland, which I have the honor to represent with a great deal of satisfaction, I am sure, to many members of this House, it has a population of 25,109, as against the population of the County of Albert of 12,329, and I am very glad to see its representative on this side of the House. The County of Kings has a population of 25,617, while Queen's alongside of it has only 14,017. The County of Charlotte, so long ably represented by my hon.

friend and my able colleague, of twenty-eight or thirty years ago, has a population of 26,087, while the County of Victoria, has a population of only 15,686. There is the City of St. John, so ably represented by the hon. Finance Minister—although he has occasionally had a pretty hard time, like myself, to get in—it has a population of 26,127, while the County of St. John, which has two representatives, has only 26,839. Take the County of Kent with its 22,618 inhabitants, against the County of Victoria with its 15,686; or the County of Gloucester with its 21,614 inhabitants, and the County of Carleton with 23,365. The average population of each county in the Province is about 20,077, but there are nine counties largely over that average, and six counties a long way under it. Now this misrepresentation has continued long enough, and I for one shall not be satisfied to have the Government tell this House that before the end of this Parliament they will deal with this matter. Their tenure, like our own tenure, is very uncertain, and it is hard to say, strong and powerful as they are to-day, how long they may continue so, though I hope they may continue so for some time yet, for I want to see them do a great deal more in the way of protection, than they have yet done. At the same time in dealing with the question of the franchise, and when their attention has been called to the incongruities I have mentioned, I think they ought to deal with this matter; and they will be neglectful of their duty if they do not deal with it, especially as they are about legislating on a cognate subject. I do not intend to take up any time in discussing the affairs of the country, or in reviewing the Speech which has been submitted to this House—there will be ample opportunity for doing that before the Session is over; but merely make these few remarks with the hope that the Government will make no delay in remedying the evils I have complained of, and I hope when they bring in this Bill it will contain provisions regarding the representation of New Brunswick in this House that will prove satisfactory to the people of that Province.

Mr. TASSE (Translation). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prolong the debate nor to comment on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, now submitted to our consideration. First of all, I must say that I fully concur in the praise given to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), and to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). The hon. member for Pictou promises to worthily follow in the steps of a man who to-day occupies one of the highest positions among the political men of this country; and the hon. member for Westmoreland has proved himself a very valuable and useful acquisition to this House. I must thank him for his friendly expression towards the French element of New Brunswick, and do not wonder that, in return for his sympathy for that important part of the population of New Brunswick, he has obtained the confidence of a large majority of the electors of that county, who are of French descent. My satisfaction would be complete, Mr. Speaker, were it not that I see with regret that this year we have departed from an old and solemn usage, if I can thus express myself, which alone can give satisfaction to the majority as well as to the minority in this House. Until now, the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne has always been moved or seconded either in English or in French. Therefore I hope that what happened to-day is purely accidental, and that it is not the intention to use it as a precedent. At Quebec, where the majority is French, the Address at the opening of each Session is invariably proposed or seconded either in French or in English, a practice which alone can give satisfaction to the majority and the minority. We, the French of Canada, make no exceptions to this rule, and, for my part, I am the less disposed to forego anything affecting in any way our rights and privileges. For some time I have marked that a certain newspaper of Ontario, which exerts considerable influence amongst hon. members sitting on the opposite side of this House—the Globe of Toronto—has been waging war against the French language. I avail myself of this the first opportunity which has presented itself, to declare that I have no sympathy for those who would have us, the French of Canada, renounce the French language, which was the first spoken in this country; a language in which the first battles of speech, in our old legislative halls in favor of our political liberties, took place; a language which it is our intention to transmit to our descendants as intact as it was given to us by our ancestors. Well, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons I regret that we should, in this instance, have departed from the rule followed until now, and I hope it will not be used as a precedent in the future.

Resolution agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the said Resolution be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Hector Langevin, Mr. Tupper, Mr. Wood and the mover, to prepare and report a draft of an Address in answer to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to the Houses of Parliament, in conformity with the said Resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Committee, reported the draft of an Address, which was read the first and the second time and ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency by such Members of this House as are Members of the Privy Council.

SUPPLY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved:

That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved:

That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Special Committee of seven Members be appointed, to prepare and report with all convenient speed, Lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by this House on Friday the 9th instant, said Committee to be composed of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Hector Langevin, and Messrs. Blake, Mackenzie, and Laurier.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

That a Select Committee, comprising Messrs. Béchard, Bergin, Charlton, Colby, Desjardins, McDonald (Cape Breton), Ross (Middlesex), Scriver and White (Cardwell) be a Committee to supervise the official report of the Debates during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

Lorne.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, the accompanying Copy of a Despatch from the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reply to an Address to Her Majesty the Queen, from the Senate and the House of Commons, presented to His Excellency in May, 1882.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA,
- 12th February, 1883.

The Right Honorable The Earl of Kimberley to Governor General the Marquis of Lorne, K.T., G.C.M.G.

DOWNING STREET, June 12, 1882.

MY LORD,—I have received and laid before the Queen, the Address to Her Majesty from the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, which was transmitted in your Lordship's despatch of the 16th of May.

I am commanded by Her Majesty to request that you will convey to the Senate and House of Commons, Her appreciation of the renewed expression of their unswerving loyalty and devotion to Her Majesty's person and Government.

Her Majesty will always gladly receive the advice of the Parliament of Canada on all matters relating to the Dominion, and the administration of its affairs; but with respect to the questions referred to in the Address, Her Majesty will, in accordance with the constitution of this country, have regard to the advice of the Imperial Parliament and Ministers, to whom all matters relating to the affairs of the United Kingdom exclusively appertain.

I have, &c.,
(Signed)           KIMBERLEY.

The Marquis of LORNE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10.10 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 13th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. McCARTHY, in introducing Bill (No. 2) to amend an Act respecting procedure in Criminal Cases and other matters relating to Criminal Law, said: The Bill which I have the honor to introduce deals with three subjects: the first being the subject dealt with in a Bill which I introduced last year, that is the giving to every person accused the liberty to give evidence in his own behalf. I have limited this power to those who are charged with misdemeanors, and have not allowed it in all cases, and I have added a provision suggested by one of the learned judges last year. The Bill provides that if the criminal does not tender himself as a witness, that fact should not be the subject of comment by the counsel for the Crown, and the judge shall direct the jury that it should not weigh against the accused. The second part of the Bill is also proposed on the suggestion of one of the judges from the Province from which I have the honor to come. It is a matter of form simply, and provides that in the event of a judge appointed to hold assize not being able to keep his appointment, the court shall stand adjourned, ipso facto, until he arrives. It happened recently in one case that the judge was not able to attend the court, and the sheriff, whose duty it was to adjourn the assize, failed to do so. The result was that several criminals had to be tried twice, it being thought that all the trials which took place at that assize were illegal. The third provision of the Bill is for the purpose of doing away with the right of the Crown to a peremptory challenge. My attention was called to this subject by a discussion which took place in the courts of Ontario upon the question of where the power rests to deal with the matter of juries. By the Act of 1869, right is given to the Crown to challenge peremptorily, but I doubt whether that is in the power of the House to confer, and I think, therefore, it is better to remove the assumed power from the Statute-book until the question is determined. But beyond that, in my humble judgment, it is an unfair right for the Crown to have. The Crown now has the right, as it always has had, to direct every juror on the panel to stand aside until the panel be exhausted, and that seems to me to be quite sufficient protection to the Crown in the selection of a jury, without the additional right of challenging peremptorily and without assigning cause. These are the three matters dealt with by the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No 3) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879.—(Mr McCarthy.)

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA.

Mr. LANDRY (Translation). Is it the intention of the Government to bring forward and pass, during the present session, a measure depriving the Supreme Court of all jurisdiction over matters covered by the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD (Translation). This matter is under consideration.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER presented a statement of the receipts and disbursements of the Accountant of the House of Commons for the year ending 30th June, 1882, signed by the Auditor General.

INLAND SHIPPING DISASTERS.

Mr. DAWSON moved for a Return of all correspondence relating to the disasters which have occurred to Canadian vessels navigating the Great Lakes and the Georgian Bay, within the past three years; together with the reports of persons appointed to enquire into the causes of these disasters; the names of the vessels lost or stranded, and the ports from which they sailed. Also, a statement of the reported loss of life in each case. He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is incumbent upon me to draw the attention of this House and the country to the great loss of life and property which has occurred on the Great Lakes, and more especially on the Georgian Bay, within the past three years. It is something frightful; and from whatever cause it may have arisen, the unseaworthiness of the vessels, or the want of inspection, it is a matter which should certainly be enquired into. To enable the House to understand the position of the matter, I need only read a list of the losses which have occurred during that time. In 1879, the Waubuno foundered in the Georgian Bay, and all hands were lost. It is not known how many perished, but it is supposed twenty-five. In 1880, the Simcoe foundered off Providence Bay, Island of Manitoulin, and there were some twelve persons drowned. Some escaped to the shore, in quite a small boat, showing that it was not from stress of weather that the steamer went down, but from some other cause, and I believe the cause was overloading. The steamer was freighted with wheat, and the cargo shifted. In 1881, the Jane Miller foundered off Warton, and not a person escaped. The whole crew and passengers were lost. In this case, as in that of the Waubuno, it was not known how many went down. In these cases there is always an attempt to conceal the number. In the case of the Jane Miller, it was said that twenty-five were lost; but it is well known that in the fall of the year—this disaster took place in November—vessels running up Georgian Bay are always crowded, and it is highly probable that more than twenty-five perished on that occasion. In 1881, again, in the same month, one of the Collingwood line of boats running to Chicago, loaded with wheat, went down in Lake Michigan, after colliding with another vessel. Fortunately only one man was lost on this occasion. At the same time the Northern Queen, a very fine boat, running from Collingwood to Chicago, was stranded in Lake Michigan and became a total loss. In 1881, the same year, the Winnipeg, a very fine and large steamer, running from Collingwood to Duluth, was burnt at Duluth. Four lives were known to have been lost on this occasion, there may possibly have been more. There was no time for escape. It would be well to enquire into the causes of these accidents. In 1881, again, the Columbia, another vessel belonging to the Collingwood line, and plying between Chicago and Collingwood, foundered in Lake Michigan off a place called Frankfort. In this, as in the case of the Simcoe, the vessel was proved to have been overloaded. The cargo, composed of grain, shifted. A number of the passengers and crew escaped in a boat, which could not stand a very heavy sea. Still, they say the Columbia went down through stress of weather. Fifteen lives were lost on that occasion. All these losses form a terrible record, for one summer, of loss of property and life, and the question how those casualties arose should be enquired into. Where did the fault lie? Did the officers charged with inspecting steamers do their duty, or was the law defective? Coming to 1882, about the 16th May, last year, the Manitoulin, a very fine steamer, running between Collingwood and Sault Ste. Marie, was burnt in Manitowaning Bay. She took fire approaching Manitowaning; the captain headed her for the shore, but before she could reach it the passengers had to jump into the water and there was a great loss of life. But for the promptitude, decision and energy of the captain there would have been a much greater loss. Fortunately, many escaped, but still many perished. What remained of the hull was taken to Manitowaning, and it is reported that on being cleared a quantity of human bones was shoveled out, so that the actual loss was never ascertained. In September, 1882, the Asia foundered in Georgian Bay. Almost every one knows of that terrible disaster. The boat was crowded not only with people going up to Eastern Algoma but with many going to the lumber camps, and I have heard the loss estimated as high as 200, never less than 100, and probably it was 150. In June, 1882, in the north channel of Lake Huron, the Vanderbilt was burnt. In November of the same year, another steamer, the Josephine Kidd, was burned off Wiarton. Here is a terrible record of no less than twelve vessels in three years foundered or burned, and of a loss of life which was something dreadful. I believe there is a very perfect system of inspecting machinery. The inspector is, I understand, a competent man, and the machinery is always inspected; but it is also necessary to inspect the hull, for if the hull is bad the ship will go down in the first storm, though the machinery may be perfect. I am very glad to see, by the Speech from the Throne, that legislation will take place in respect to this. It is certainly very much needed, for the law, as it now stands, has not been enforced. There is a law now, but there are no inspectors, and no inspection of the hulls, that I am aware of, has taken place. The consequence is, a great loss of life and vessels. This question has been very much discussed in Algoma, and I have had a good many suggestions from captains of vessels and others, as to the best mode to be followed. It is evident that vessels navigating the lakes should have a line marked as in ocean vessels, beyond which line they should not be loaded. That depth line ought to be regulated by the inspector. There should be a line for the fall as well as for the summer season. I have some letters here from captains of vessels which, I think, it will be interesting to read. One of these is signed by two captains well known on the lakes, who navigated the Quebec and Manitoba of the Sarnia line for a long time, one of them being now in command of the fine steamer Compana, Capt. Anderson. They write me as follows:—

"SARNIA, January 31st, 1883.

"S. J. Dawson, Esq, M.P, Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR,—According to your request, we hereby submit a few of the reasons why we think our Parliament should pass a law compelling all masters and mates of passenger steamers to undergo an examination before a competent Board of lake sailor men, and obtain a certificate of competency before being allowed to fill either of these positions.

"1st. Every master to retain his position should have successfully commanded a boat say three or five years, and those not having done so, should undergo an examination proving themselves worthy of a trial, such examinations to consist of such questions as follows:—

"2nd. What would you do in case of an accident to the engine during a storm?

"3rd. In case you thought your boat was going to founder, how would you proceed to care for your people, in regard to lowering your yawl boats or otherwise?

"4th. What would you do in case of fire?

"5th. In regard to foggy weather what would you do, and in case your boat goes ashore, what, in your opinion, is the first thing to be done?

"6th. Do you understand handling sails, anchors and charts?

"These questions, Mr. Dawson, are very important, as we know we have a good many masters to-day that do not know any of those things; also a good many men now in charge, that, supposing their rudder should break, would be completely at a loss what to do. We have had several instances of this, and also of those who, if their boat got into the trough of the sea in bad weather, would not know how to get her out of it, and the result might be disastrous.

"Now as regards mates, we think they should prove, to the satisfaction of the 'Board of Examiners,' that they have served a reasonable time in that or other positions on the lakes, and that their qualifications are such as to enable them to fill the position.

"As to who is to compose the Board of Examiners, we think there ought to be three men who have commanded steamers on our lakes for say ten or fifteen years, and would recommend one for Lakes Ontario and Erie and the other two to take the Detroit and St. Clair River, Lake Huron, Georgian Bay and Lake Superior.

"Also we wish you to impress upon the Government the necessity of all passenger steamers on our lakes being supplied with life rafts capable of carrying at least fifty people.

"We consider something should be done respecting the buoys and beacons in the Sault Ste. Marie River and North Channel, as there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction since Captain Joseph Wilson gave up the charge of them. As they have been placed lately it has been extremely dangerous for strangers.

"Now, Mr. Dawson, these are a few of our ideas in the rough, please put them in proper shape and present them, and if you require our services any further command us.

"Yours truly,

"JAS. B. SYMES,

"E. B. ANDERSON.

"P. S.—The Board of Examiners, in our opinion, should be the Hull and Equipment Inspectors."

Now, I have another letter from a steamboat captain who has sailed on the lakes half his life, and who has had a great deal of experience—I mean Captain Dick, of Toronto. He says:

"Several steamers have been lost from overloading. For instance, the Waubuno was overloaded, and no doubt her false sides were rotten. The Columbia on Lake Michigan overloaded, and for the cause of the disaster see particulars in Scrap Book. The Jane Miller overloaded and was unfitted for the service she was engaged in. In the Asia case it is not probable that the exact number lost will be ever known; her loss cannot be attributed to unseaworthiness nor overloading, the vessel was not properly ballasted or trimmed. Had the Asia been drawing eight feet forward and nine feet aft, I feel safe in saying there would have been no loss unless she had struck a rock, and there was no evidence to the effect that she did. More care than formerly should be used regarding the strengthening of bulwarks and the supports of the upper cabins and engine room. It is not the fault of our models or build of our vessels alone that has caused so many losses, but overloading, imperfect loading, old age, and little or no repairs. The inspection never called for the steamers to be laden to any safe line, nor do I believe the last Steamboat Act demands it. It is very necessary, and I would suggest a summer load line and a spring and fall line. The loss of the steamer Manitoulin was supposed to be caused by the breaking of a lamp and spilling of the oil. All steamboat lamps should be made with brass bowls, such as Piper's Safety Marine Lamp, that cannot be broken or spill oil. No glass lamps should be used on a steamboat. Steamboat oil rooms and lamp rooms should be lined with zinc or tin, and also the floor. They should be kept scrupulously clean. This department should be strictly looked after. Passenger steamers ought not to carry any combustible material. Steamboats ought to be inspected early in order to give owners an opportunity to do the required repairs to make their vessels seaworthy and pass the required inspection. In many cases it might be found necessary to raise the boilers to ascertain the condition of both hull and boilers. This work should not be imposed on a steamboat owner at an unreasonable time. Steamboats are usually too heavy and not easily handled; lighter boats would be more useful and easier handled; a sufficiency of life rafts should be carried. There should be no difficulty in having a register of all passengers on steamers; the ticket agent could give his number sold and name of passengers. The purser could also ascertain all names of those coming on board, and leave the list with Customs officers, and any discrepancy might be reported at the next port of call. This applies to lake boats. Ferries would be an exception.

"The Simcoe, of the Georgian Bay Navigation Company's line rebuilt from the remains of an old burned barque, was not suitable for lake navigation, her loss occurred from not being seaworthy. A great deal has been said of the dangerous navigation of the Georgian Bay. I never saw it any worse or as bad as Lake Ontario. Our ordinary lake boats, in good repair and condition, are quite safe for the navigation managed by competent officers. A new survey should be made of the Georgian Bay. From the short time occupied by Capt. Bayfield in making his survey, and the inadequate means at his command, it is not to be wondered at that there are many omissions. In the interest of navigation, for the above reasons, the north shore of Lake Superior should also receive the attention of the Government. I would recommend close, careful inspection of all steamers at least once a year, and in the event of accident, a second examination. Masters and engineers should promptly report to the proper quarter any accident to hull or machinery."

Now, Sir, these opinions are very valuable, coming as they do from men of great experience, and I have no doubt that the Department of Marine and Fisheries will avail themselves of the information given. The fact of so many vessels having been lost from the carrying of wheat, shows the necessity of adopting some means of inspection on the Great Lakes, such as they have on the ocean, which obliges skippers to have the wheat put in sacks, or to have shifting boards in the vessel. I have myself been on board vessels where the wheat shifted from one side to the other to such an extent as almost to make them unmanageable. It is dangerous to carry wheat in the fall of the year, when it is put in bulk on the boat and with nothing to prevent its shifting and rolling. I know it is very difficult in a country like ours, where we have only six months of navigation, to get experienced sailors who for six months of the year must be out of employment. That must be admitted on all hands, but still somewhat more care might be exercised than at present in the choice of crews. I have been myself on these lakes in a storm, when the greater part of the crew, instead of being on hand to help the captain, ran down to the hold to say their prayers. Where you have men of that kind who are not accustomed to navigation, accidents must occur. I have heard a captain say that on one occasion when he intended to anchor in a storm there was not a man on board who was able to help him to put out the anchor, the pilot and engineers, of course, being occupied at their respective posts. While I am on this subject, I may say that it is necessary that a better hydrographic survey should be made of the Georgian Bay and the north coast of Lake Superior. There are shoals and sunken rocks on these lakes. Experienced captains know where they are, but many of these shoals and rocks are not laid down in the charts, or are but imperfectly laid down. I have seen maps on which the shoals were marked down by the captain, and these maps were sent to the Admiralty as reliable, without any hydrographic survey having been made at all. Now, that is worse than if they had not been marked at all. It would not cost a great deal, the shoals being now well known, to have a survey made that would indicate their exact position. This is a very serious matter indeed. I have just read a list to the House of a large number of vessels foundered and a large number burnt. People in my constituency have no way of reaching their homes except over the waters of Georgian Bay, and every time they go out they have to encounter these dangers. Of the vessels of the Georgian Bay line which navigated these lakes three years ago, not a single one, except one propeller, the Northern Belle, is now in existence. Not only does the country suffer in the loss of life, but there is a great loss of property as well. The people lost on those vessels were not those who were seeking homes, but comprised men who had established themselves in the country, and although we do not know how many are lost, let anyone pass through Eastern Algoma and he will find almost every other house in mourning and desolation for the loss of members of the family by shipwreck. Among the passengers lost by the burning of the Manitoulin were many of great value to a new country. Among these Mr. Robert Henry, who possessed considerable wealth, and around whom a settlement of a thousand souls had grown up on the Island of Manitoulin, was lost on the burning of the Manitoulin; and a brother, Mr. William Henry, of Toronto, who was also possessed of considerable wealth, and went up in the fall to look after his dead brother's affairs, was lost on the Asia. Here are two members of one family lost in different vessels, and these are no solitary instances. There are many families, as I have said, on the Island of Manitoulin and Eastern Algoma who have lost members of their families in vessels foundered or burned on those waters. Something should be done in order to procure a proper inspection of boats, both as regards hulls and boilers, so that property should not be sacrificed to the cupidity of vessel owners who might send rotten tubs and old craft to run on the Georgian Bay. There should be some system of registering vessels. It could be very easily done by the Custom House officers at the different ports, whose duty it should be to see that vessels are properly loaded, and they are quite capable of judging as to whether they were overloaded or not. This is not the first time the subject has been before the public. The newspapers have called attention to it frequently, and I will read a short extract, which is very much to the point, from a letter signed "Old Salt," published in the Toronto Globe, of November, 1831. The writer says:

"To show the importance of a better method for grain cargoes, I quote from the Globe of September 16th, 1831, the following from the statement made by one of the survivors of the Columbia, which left Chicago with 20,000 bushels of corn:—'A very heavy sea struck us, causing the shifting of the cargo, and making the vessel careen so much that she became unmanageable. Every possible effort was made to get her upright again, but without avail, the sea running so high that she would not answer her helm.' The Columbia went down in three-quarters of an hour; and five families were orphaned, while ten or twelve unmarried men lost their lives. A boat from the Columbia got through several miles to land, so that the sea, though very high, could not have been so high that the Columbia would not have lived. She would have lived had the cargo not shifted. Who is responsible for the loss of these men's lives? Can we escape responsibility in the matter, if vessels are allowed to go out without proper precaution and equipment?"

Again, the Mail, a journal supporting the Government, in an editorial article dated November 27th, 1879, said:

"Just how the ill-fated passengers and crew of the Waubuno met their death, whether they went down with the old tub or took to the boats only to be swallowed up, will probably never be known; nor can any chronicler tell what happened during the agony of the crisis. The master of the Waubuno is said to have been a man of courage, and no doubt he did his duty; but it is a fact that he was anything but an experienced navigator. Captain Burkitt was a storekeeper five years ago, and rose to the post of master with a rapidity paralleled only in Canadian lake navigation, where the purser of to-day is to-morrow the captain, with the responsibility of human life on his hands. The system, or perhaps it would be better to say the want of system, that permits this sort of promotion is a blot on our humane legislation. Ship owners seem to think that any man may command a vessel, and passenger steamers were plying their trade on the lakes during the season which has just closed under the command of wholly incompetent officers. No qualification is required by law. The owner may appoint whom he pleases, and there is nobody to object but the underwriter, who is more concerned about the hull and cargo than for the human freight. It is true that running a steamboat on the inland waters is not a difficult business in fine weather and within sight of the shore, but when a sudden storm arises or a collision threatens, it is a task demanding not only nerve and coolness, but trained seamanship, and of that three-fifths of the passenger steamer and propeller masters know little or nothing. The Dominion Government, with whom it rests, should take up this subject forthwith and adopt a modification of the English Shipping Act of 1854. A Board of Marine Examiners should be appointed to examine and grant certificates to masters and mates, and violations of the Act should be punished with the utmost severity. We are aware that a measure of this kind has been introduced before, and that the ship owners strangled it, their main contention being that it would involve a heavy outlay, as trained seamen would expect higher wages than amateurs or greenhorns. But are the pockets of ship owners to be considered before the safety of human life?"

I believe I have said enough to draw the attention of the Government to this very important question. People cannot travel over those waters without running the risk of being burned or drowned. Not a single vessel which was on the Georgian Bay line three years ago, except one, is now in existence, and that is a very sad state of matters. I beg to move the Resolution.

Mr. McLELAN. The papers in connection with this important subject will be brought down at an early a day as possible. I regret very much I was unable to hear all the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I know it is a question in which he has taken a very deep interest; it is a question, too, in which the people have a great interest, an interest that is increasing in proportion as the traffic on our western waters increase; and the attention of the Government, and more particularly to the Department over which I have the honor to preside, has been drawn to the importance of the subject, and to the disasters which have occurred on those waters and which have been attended with such serious loss of life. Our attention has been directed mainly to the point which the hon. member, so far as I could gather, has brought up: how far we can make the vessels more seaworthy, how far we can improve their management, and how far we can improve the loading of the vessels upon those waters. The attention of the Government and of my Department has been turned to those various points, and it is proposed that we should ask the House for some legislation which we think necessary in order, if possible, to make the vessels more seaworthy, that life may be more secure on board of them. The hon. gentleman has referred to the inspection of hulls, and I understood him to say that we had no inspectors. There were two engaged in Ontario during last summer, but one unfortunately was off duty for some weeks owing to severe illness. It is probable that the legislation which will be asked for will require some different qualifications on the part of the inspectors from what was required by the legislation of last Session, and therefore we do not provide the complement of inspectors for that district until we should see whether the House would grant such additional legislation as we believe is required. But two have been employed during the past season since the Act came into operation. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that several shoals have been discovered on Georgian Bay. The attention of the Department also has been called to this matter, and we have been in communication with the Admiralty, to learn on what terms we can have an officer, or if they can furnish an officer, to take charge of the survey of those western waters, and place on their charts all the shoals and rocks that may be found there not already laid down on the charts. As the hon. gentleman says, it is not advisable to have this done in a hap-hazard manner, but to set down clearly the particular shoals which may exist. We do not suppose that, on any information which we may be able to send them, they would lay down on their charts any rocks and shoals that are there to be found, and, therefore, we have asked them whether they can furnish us with a man properly qualified to take charge of such a survey, in order that any shoals, which may not be already down on the charts and which may be discovered to exist on a resurvey, may be placed on the Admiralty chart, thus obtaining the authority of the Admiralty. I may say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the papers in question will be brought down to the House at an early a day as possible.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that the House do now adjourn. I do not see the leader of the Opposition in the House just now, and I will consequently make the explanations with regard to Ministerial changes to-morrow.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:15 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 14th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in introducing Bill (No. 4) to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, said: The object of the Bill is to enable persons who profess doubts as to the existence of a Supreme Being, to give evidence. In Ontario the law has been amended so as to permit such persons to give evidence in civil cases, upon making a solemn affirmation as provided in the law. I think it is an anomalous state of affairs that we can accept such evidence in civil cases but not in criminal cases. The provision I propose is now contained in the law of England, and I do not see any reason why it should not be part of the law of Canada.

Bill read the first time.

FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN, in introducing Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, said: I shall say only one word in relation to this matter. The object of the Bill is to try to prevent bribery of contractors, or Government employes, in connection with public contracts. I brought this Bill before this House in the two previous Sessions, but I have not had the opportunity of having it carried through. I may say, for the information of the hon. Minister of Public Works, that I have been able to procure, this year, from the Parliament of Great Britain, a copy of the Bill which the hon. gentleman said he wanted to see before consenting to the passage of this measure, and I shall have much pleasure in placing it at his disposal. As this is a matter which ought not to be taken up by a private member, but is a matter of public importance, I hope the Government, this year, will regard it in a favorable light, and help me through with it instead of impeding it.

Bill read the first time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 6) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanors shall be competent as witnesses.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Bill (No. 7) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, on moving the adjournment, said: I have been asked for explanations of changes in the personnel of the Cabinet. It is not usual, in England, to give explanations, unless there has been a change in the whole Administration. The present Administration went to the country. We were here last Session and are here now.

There is an alteration in the personnel. Mr. Mousseau, Secretary of State, resigned and went to Quebec, where he held the position of Premier. Mr. O'Connor resigned on account of ill-health. Mr. J. C. Pope resigned also on the same account. Mr. Aikins resigned, and was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Manitoba. Mr. Chapleau has become a member of the Government. I am very sorry he is not here to-day at the beginning of the Session; but he has been stricken down by an acute attack of bronchitis, which compelled him to resort to a southern clime. Mr. Carling, the Member for London, has become Postmaster-General. Mr. Costigan, of New Brunswick, has been made Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Hon. Frank Smith, of the Senate, is a member of the Cabinet without a portfolio.

Mr. BLAKE. I learn from the hon. gentleman that he suggests we should adopt the English practice. That has not been the custom here. The hon. gentleman himself has demanded explanations of changes very much less important than those of to-day. He has given what he calls explanations, but which are very much more like a catalogue or calendar of changes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A catalogue raisonné.

Mr. BLAKE. No; a catalogue without reasons. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Pope, from Prince Edward Island, left the Cabinet on account of ill-health. That fact was made but too apparent to us all, as for a considerable time the hon. gentleman was unfortunately disabled from much of his ministerial duties. I remember very well, when a vacancy took place by reason of the appointment to office of an hon. Minister who represented the Island formerly, the cries of grief and indignation which proceeded from the supporters of the hon. gentleman because there was no representative of Prince Edward Island placed instead of that gentleman in the Cabinet. I am glad to observe that as times have changed: o have manners, and the absence of a representative from the Island has been received—I do not know whether there have been any muttered tones of grief poured into the private ear of the hon. gentleman, whether there have been any suggestions as to the injury done the Island in general, or Islanders in particular—at any rate the public does not hear any more the cries of injustice and wrong which vexed our ears on a former occasion. The hon. gentleman has stated that Mr. Costigan has accepted the office of Inland Revenue, and the Hon. Frank Smith has been called to a seat in the Cabinet without a portfolio. I suppose in that instance, at any rate, we should have had explanations, because I remember the language used by the hon. gentleman on the subject of seats in a Cabinet without a portfolio. In 1873, a Government was formed in which there were two seats filled by gentlemen without a portfolio. The hon. gentleman asking for and receiving explanations of the formation of that Cabinet, and learning that fact, used this language:

“There is another phase in the formation of this Government, and I protest against it. I protest against Mr. Blake being a member of the Government without a portfolio and I protest against Mr. Scott holding that same position. I say it is utterly unconstitutional. I say there has been only one example of it—that of Lord Lansdowne—to which everybody submitted, because he was a man ninety years of age, and it was thought to be a fitting compliment to him, though it was an infringement of the Constitution. This country, Sir, wants no unpaid services, it wants no unpaid officers, it wants and is able to pay every man for performing its services.”

I cannot render this protest, this denunciation of constitutional doctrine, with the force, energy, vigor and spirit of genuine indignation, at the violation of the Constitution, which animated my hon. friend on that memorable occasion when, seated under the gallery in the seat now occupied by the hon. member for Montmagny, I was unable to say a word for myself, stricken down by the hon. gentleman's eloquence. He has set me up again and relieved me from the incubus of a violation of the Constitution. He has announced, as the most natural thing in the world, that the Hon. Frank Smith is a member of the Cabinet without portfolio. Well, the Hon. Frank Smith is not Lord Lansdowne, and he is not ninety years old, and, therefore, the reason which the hon. gentleman gave, as not justifying, but palliating the infringement of the Constitution in the case of Lord Lansdowne, does not apply to the hon. Senator. Therefore, I think, I may call for further explanations. I may ask the hon. gentleman to say whether he was wrong then or now, because it seems to me quite impossible he could have been right on both occasions, unless there has been a revolution in the Constitution. I observe that the changes, the distribution of the great political prizes, which belong to an Administration, gave rise to the same results, differing a little from what the hon. gentleman propounded at the outset of Confederation. I never thought that the hon. gentleman was wise in laying down a cast-iron rule as he did, that there should be a certain number of members and a certain proportion assigned to certain Provinces. I always agreed that the interests of the country and the exigencies of carrying on a Government, so as to maintain the confidence of the people, would necessitate a representation of the Provinces in the Cabinet. I believe it is important that this object should be a prominent one in the formation of every Cabinet. But what the hon. gentleman did was to declare, as the cause for thirteen Ministers, the fact that there ought to be a certain proportion—five for Ontario, four for Quebec, two for Nova Scotia and two for New Brunswick—because, as he explained, one Minister from one of those smaller Provinces would feel lonely without a colleague from the same Province in the Council to assist him in reaching the conclusion and in strengthening the aggressiveness from that Province. These were the reasons the hon. gentleman assigned as the constitutional proportions of a Cabinet for our Confederation. But times in that respect also have changed, for I observe that we have no longer in the hon. gentleman's Cabinet five members from Ontario, but six members, and that to that Province, besides the six members, are also assigned the two great political prizes which come and go with Administrations, as we now learn from your precedent—the Speakership of this House and the Speakership of the other body. There are altogether sixteen, fourteen members of the Cabinet and two holders of these prizes, and of these Ontario receives eight, just one half. Well, the hon. gentleman boasts to this House of some fifty-five followers from Ontario, and he boasts nearly that many from the neighboring Province of Quebec. No doubt, as he has abandoned the principle of proportion, and has come to the principle of fitness, we must take this as a proof that his followers from Ontario are stronger proportionally—in their quality even more than they are in their quantity—than from the Province of Quebec. With such a great strength as I see in reserve upon the benches from Ontario, I can congratulate my friends from that Province upon the high appreciation, the deserved appreciation, that they receive, not merely absolutely but relatively, in this Administration; and I can condole with my hon. friends from the other Provinces upon the position they occupy in the same sense. Not merely are these proportions which the hon. gentleman himself set up, violated, but when it was necessary to make a change in the representation from Quebec, it was found that no one at that time belonging to Parliament from that Province was suitable, and my hon. friend was obliged to look outside for the gentleman whose regretted illness he has referred to, and introduce him into the Cabinet, at the special instance, I suppose, and for the special comfort of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Now, I am glad to know that this happy family is no longer constituted according to a cast-iron principle, and that the hon.

gentleman has found, by experience, that it is impossible to carry that out; but that he must have regard to the deserved eminence and pre-eminence of hon. gentlemen from different Provinces, and give to each in proportion to its capabilities of supplying strength to the Administration from those public men who are in his ranks at the time. The hon. gentleman did not tell us exactly when the Hon. Mr. Smith was called to the Cabinet without a portfolio, nor did he tell us exactly why; nor did he communicate to us—what I think upon this occasion, if he had been disposed to deal with us in a spirit of generosity and liberality and not confine himself as far as possible within the letter of the rule,—why Senator O'Donohue was not called to the Cabinet. I think his explanation might have been added, and the story without them is extremely incomplete; but I suppose, after what the hon. gentleman has said, we must be thankful for what we have got, and not expect anything more; and, as the hon. gentleman's constitutional principle as to the formation of Cabinets has been violated, as what my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec understood was the well settled and reasonable rule on this subject has also been violated, and as the hon. gentleman's constitutional principles as to Ministers in the Cabinets without portfolios have also been violated, and all by himself, I leave to you his explanations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to close the discussion with my hon. friend in the same kindly spirit with which he has opened it. However, he is mistaken in stating that on the formation of the first Administration in 1867 we laid down any cast-iron rules. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman will honor me so far as to go back to the Debates of that occasion. I said that that principle could not be carried out, that the object of uniting the Provinces was to have one great Dominion, and that the principle of having sectional representation could not be carried out, and could not be adopted as a final principle of the Constitution. I said, however, that as we were forming a new Confederation, as each Province was returning a certain number of members, and was naturally very anxious as to its position in the Confederation, and that as we had to take the initiation in the formation of the first Government, we thought proper, in order to prevent any injurious suspicions, and in order to bring in from every section full support in the principle of Confederation, so to distribute the offices in the Cabinet as to give each Province a representation; and we did so, giving the Province of Ontario five members, Quebec four, and the other two Provinces two each. I took also the precaution of stating at that time that this kind of thing could not be expected to go on forever, but that it was absolutely requisite in order to start fair—if I may use the expression—to commence auspiciously, that every Province should feel that it had a proportionate representation in the Cabinet; but that in the future that could not be the case. I pointed out that we hoped that Confederation would extend over the whole of this continent, and that there would be very many other Provinces entering Confederation in the future, and that therefore this arrangement was a temporary one and could not continue, and that with the addition of a large number of Provinces it would be impossible in the by-and-bye for every Province to be represented in the Cabinet, and that eventually we would be obliged to adopt the system in vogue in the United States, where they have only, I think, seven Cabinet Ministers; but they choose one from the New England States, one from the Southern States, one from the Western States, and so on, dividing the whole United States into groups, and having each group represented in the Cabinet. That must be the case in Canada where we shall have many more Provinces in the lifetime of my hon. friend who leads the Opposition. With the changing circumstances of the country, with the formation of new Provinces, and the pressure of new interests upon

Mr. BLAKE.

Parliament, there must be continual changes and adaptations of the working of our Parliamentary system to the varying developments of this country. That was the principle I laid down, and I have never abandoned it. My hon. friend says that Ontario is given an undue preponderance.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He throws it out. Well, so far as that is concerned, I take it that there are two members in the Government who are summoned as members of the Privy Council, who are summoned to attend meetings of the Cabinet—the Speaker of the Upper House and the Hon. Frank Smith. The Speaker of the Upper House receives no salary, in the first place, for acting as he does in the Ministry.

Mr. BLAKE. The country wants no gratuitous services.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But he has done this, and I personally am exceedingly grateful for it; he has taken from my shoulders an enormous amount of work connected with the North-West, arising from the unexpected development of that country, and I was only too glad to accept the assistance and service, the able assistance and service, of my hon. friend the Speaker of the Upper House to aid me as Minister of the Interior. He has come to my assistance as a personal friend, as a gentleman having full confidence in myself as I have in him; he has done yeoman service for me and for the country by bringing a practical and business mind, unwearied perseverance and great ability, to aid me in the enormous task of dealing with the various questions that have arisen with respect to the North-West. So that Mr. Macpherson has really come to my aid, and the country has received the benefit of his gratuitous services as a member of the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman also spoke about Mr. Smith coming into the Cabinet, and he said I was wrong either on a past occasion or now. I was not wrong either time. Mr. Frank Smith has been summoned to the Cabinet, and I am very glad to get his assistance and advice; but he stood in quite a different position from my hon. friend opposite. My hon. friend opposite was the power behind the Throne; he was the Government; he was like the centurion, a man in authority: he said to a man, go, and he goeth; and to another, come, and he cometh; and in the eyes of the country and of his own party, and in the eyes of every one who could see how things were going, he was really the Prime Minister, but without responsibility of any kind. And the hon. gentleman was not only Prime Minister of the Dominion, but Premier of Ontario as well, in both cases without portfolio, he having the power and ability to direct affairs, that great ability and intellectual superiority having been acknowledged by his party and the country by his selection for the high and important position which he now holds; and as he was pulling the strings and guiding the party of his own Province and of the Dominion, of which that Province is a part, he ought to have taken the position and assumed the responsibility, and not have been able to say "that was not my measure." The hon. gentleman has done that on many occasions. He has said: "I was not in the Ministry at that time." We all know that; but it is the old case of Stephano and Trinculo, "Thou shalt be king, and I will be viceroy over thee." He pulled the strings and governed the country, and he committed a great breach of the constitutional principle, that power and authority should go together. My hon. friend Mr. Frank Smith held no such position. He is a gentleman who has made a fortune in his own way, and is recognized in the country as a representative Irishman and Irish Roman Catholic. He also draws no salary; he is not feeding at the public crib any more than did my hon. friend opposite, who, whatever may be his political faults, is not a man who will throw himself into an assumed public office for the sake of any emolument that might arise from it. It is only justice I should say that to my hon. friend. But strange to say, the hon. gentleman has vindicated me already in the eyes of the people of Ontario, by the insinuation that Ontario has more than its fair share of members of the Cabinet. His first lieutenant, Mr. Mowat, his second lieutenant, Mr. Fraser, and his third lieutenant, Mr. Hardy, have been ringing through the country the charge that I was sold to the French, that I was under French domination; and at this moment I dare say his friends of the Ontario Administration, on as many stumps as they can cover with their feet, are warning the people of Ontario not to support Mr. Meredith or his friends, because he is sold to John A., and John A. is sold to the Frenchmen, and Ontario is sold to French domination. Mr. Speaker, I think I have made my explanation, and I think the country will admit that I have not sacrificed the Constitution, that I have not done any great injustice to Lower Canada by asking Mr. Macpherson to come and help me, and Mr. Smith to come and help him, both without salary. I do not think I have wounded the amour-propre of my friends of Lower Canada, and I state that, as I have always done, I will try to obtain as good a Government as I can. I admit, and everybody must admit, and when my hon. friend opposite, to the misfortune of this country, shall take my place, he will be obliged to admit, that we must follow the policy, not a cast-iron rule, of having every great interest represented in the Cabinet, whether the Maritime Provinces, the great West, or the Pacific coast, by-and-bye—indeed the Pacific coast was represented in the Cabinet in my person in the last Parliament. It is so in England. No Government could live unless the Irish and Scotch had a certain number of representatives in the Cabinet. There is no cast-iron rule there, but in order to obtain the support of the representatives of the people in all portions of the United Kingdom, each section must know it is in some degree, directly or indirectly, represented in the Cabinet. That is the principle I should like to see carried out; that is the principle that must be carried out, and that is the principle which my hon. friend will carry out by-and-bye, but I am in no hurry to see him carry his principles into practice.

Mr. BLAKE. I have been misunderstood in regard to a material part of my speech, that part which consisted of a quotation from the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. gentleman has made it appear as if he had protested only against my own appointment to office without portfolio as an infringement of the Constitution. I was a supporter and follower and member of the Cabinet of Mr. Mackenzie, nothing more, Mr. Mackenzie being Prime Minister; but the point to which I desire to refer and regarding which the hon. gentleman has misconceived me, is, that after going on to protest against my appointment, he said, in the speech from which I quoted: "I protest against Mr. Scott holding that same position. I say that it is utterly unconstitutional." If it was unconstitutional in Mr. Scott's case it is so in other cases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman was pulling the strings here in the Lower House, while Mr. Scott was leader and exponent of the principles of the Government in the Upper House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:10 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 15th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report Lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees, presented Lists of Members composing said Committees.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 8) to provide for the Discharge of past Insolvents.—(Mr. Beaty.)

EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF INSOLVENTS' ESTATES.

Mr. BEATY, in introducing Bill (No. 9) to provide for the equitable distribution of insolvents' estates, said: This Bill is of the same purport as that introduced last Session by myself, in relation to the distribution of the assets of insolvents, but does not include a discharge of the insolvent, as that is provided for in the other Bill just introduced. The object is that certain classes of persons, who have become unable to meet their obligations, should be put into insolvency, if desired by their creditors, on application to the Court; and the general purpose of the Bill is to provide for an equitable distribution of the assets of the estate relatively amongst the creditors who may have proved their claim, and it is not intended that the debtor, with a view to his discharge, should be included in the Bill. The usual clauses are put in providing for the distribution, the appointment of a guardian in the first instance, the appointment of trustees by the creditors for the liquidation of the estate, the prevention of fraudulent dealing and purposes of that character. But the general object and purpose of the Bill is simply to provide that persons shall not have a preferential assignment, or that by reason of obtaining execution first they shall not acquire the whole estate. All persons to whom the debtor may be indebted shall be entitled to come in, in cases of insolvency, and obtain such portions of the estate as they may show they are entitled to.

FERRY BOATS AT THE TERMINUS OF NORTH SHORE RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have come to any understanding with the present proprietors of that part of the "Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway," now more particularly known under the name of the "North Shore Railway," in relation to the construction of ferry boats to ply between the terminus of that railway and that of the Intercolonial Railway; and what that understanding is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say, in reply to the hon. member, that no understanding has yet been arrived at upon this subject with the parties connected with the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.

REPORTS.

The following Reports were laid upon the Table:—

Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year 1881-82; also, Report of the Auditor-General on Appropriation Accounts for the fiscal year 1881-82.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion for the fiscal year 1881-82.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3.35 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 16th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

The following Reports were laid upon the Table:—

Annual Report of the Minister of Public Works for the fiscal year 1881-82, on the works under his control.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Report of the Secretary of State of Canada, for the year ended 31st December, 1882.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Report of the State of the Militia of the Dominion of Canada, for the year 1882.—(Mr. Caron.)

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs, for the year ended 31st December, 1882.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1882.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Report on Adulteration of Food, being Supplement No. III. of the Department of Inland Revenue, 1882.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Ninth Report on Weights and Measures, being Supplement No. II. to the Report of the Department of Inland Revenue, 1882.—(Mr. Costigan.)

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for receiving Petitions for Private Bills be extended to Thursday, the 1st day of March next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. BLAKE. It has been urged, and one Session I thought we had almost prevailed in the suggestion, that there should not be a general extension of time for receiving Petitions, and that after the delay fixed by the Standing Orders, no Petition should be received except under special circumstances. We are now at the commencement of a new Parliament, and while I do not now make a motion, I do submit to the hon. gentlemen who have control of the procedure of the House, that if it is to be laid down as a rule, as our assenting to this extension every Session does lay it down as a rule, that the first delay is merely formal and not to be regarded, we had better extend to some moderate limit the period of delay prescribed by the Standing Order, and having so extended it, not to permit further extension unless for cause, because otherwise, of course, persons will not regard the first limit, and will look upon it as a mere brutum fulmen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend, that the rule laid down should be adhered to. Practically, I fear that the time is too short, it ought to be extended, and the Standing Order should be altered in that regard; and after that time has expired, I quite agree that no Petition should be received except on its own merits. The object of the rule is to prevent surprise on outside parties who do not know when they may be called upon to defend their rights which may be attacked by these bills. Perhaps the House had better consider whether, instead of extending the time for a fortnight, it would not be better to extend it three or four weeks, and then rigidly adhere to that rule, except under extraordinary circumstances.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Blake, Cameron (Huron), Colby, Daly, Davies, Desjardins, Fortin, Houde, Jenkins, Laurier, Ouimet, Scriver, Tassé, Weldon, Wells, and Wright, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report Lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House, in so far as relates to the following Committees, viz.:—On Privileges and Elections; on Expiring Laws; on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines; on Miscellaneous Private Bills; on Printing; on Public Accounts; on Banking and Commerce; and on Immigration and Colonization, be concurred in.

Mr. BLAKE. It has been proposed by some hon. gentleman opposite, to introduce a new system with regard to Committees, and largely to reduce the number of members of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I do not oppose the proposition as a general principle. On the contrary, my opinion is that we might very largely forward public business by the extension of that proposition with reference to all the Committees. While we adopt and continue the system of very large Committees, I look upon the reduction of the Public Accounts Committee as an experiment for this Session. I fear that a system which involves a great tax upon the more leading members of Committees who are called to serve, according to the present system, on three or four, will operate rather injuriously and unfairly to those who are in the minority on a small Committee, because it will be very difficult at times to find any degree of representation on that Committee of those who may be in the minority. I, however, submit cheerfully to the experiment for this Session, only reserving my right, if the practical results of the work done should indicate a change, to suggest one. It is of much more consequence that we should consider, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to take it into his consideration, whether he should not propose a small Committee to consider a plan for future Sessions of this Parliament, which would be more business-like, with the view of securing better results in that important portion of our business which is relegated to the Committees. With regard to the system in England, I will take one class of Committees as an example of their general principle—I refer to the Committees on what are called Railway Bills. There is a General Railway Committee which is not composed of 131 members like ours, but of some eight or nine members, who are called the General Railway Committee. Their function is to act as a Committee of selection, selecting from amongst the other members of the House some four members, I think, and appointing a chairman from amongst themselves. To those four members of the Committee are referred Railway Bills of a cognate character. For example, if there were a number of Bills for the construction of railways in the North-West, or a number of Bills for railways in a particular section of Ontario or Quebec, they would be referred to this Committee. The result of having a small Committee of this kind, especially adapted for dealing with the work and acting according to a general principle—because the chairman being chosen from the General Committee, there is intercommunion between the Committees on the general question of policy and one line is adopted—is to produce very much better fruits than can be obtained by our system. There is another change which I think would be a very great improvement. You know, Mr. Speaker, that in this House it is a reason for an hon. member to be placed on the Railway Committee because his constituency is interested in the Railway Bill. In England that is a disqualification for being on the Committee. The members who are chosen to be on the Committee to deal with any particular Bill, or group of Bills, has to sign a declaration that he has not a personal and his constituency has not a local interest in that particular Bill, such an interest being regarded, and I think very properly so, as a disqualification for the occupation of the judicial position, which is the position which the committee-man occupies. There is another declaration which is also required to be signed by members, and I think it would pretty much astonish a good many old members here. It is that no member of the Committee shall vote on a Bill unless he has heard or attended to all the evidence. I have noticed an uncommon swelling of the number of the Committee shortly before a vote was taken on an important question, and I am afraid a very large portion could not sign such a declaration in respect to the Bill on which they voted. Moreover, a member who assumes the responsibility of sitting on a Committee in England—and he is bound to accept it unless he can give a valid excuse, such as illness—is bound to attend all its sittings. Without suggesting that we should adopt in all particulars the English method, which I think in some respects is perhaps complicated, we must agree that a system by which the Committees would be very much reduced in numbers would be a system which would be one of great importance; and if hon. gentlemen would adopt the example of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who I observe has declined to sit on any other Committee than that of which he hopes to be Chairman, and give a thorough and exhaustive attention both before the Committee meets and during its sittings to the business of the Committee, we would be able to do much more thorough work. I may mention in this connection a matter which has often struck me as one in which we might effect a great improvement, and that is with regard to the promotion of Private Bills before Committees. We have adopted a system wholly vicious, a system by which members of the House are expected, not merely to introduce and take the first steps in connection with the passage of Private Bills, but also to become their advocates and active promoters, and the position which we see is assumed with regard to such Bills is one which is quite inconsistent with the true position of Members of Parliament called upon to pass judgment on them. The active promotion of Bills should be accomplished by someone not a member of the House, or at all events not a member of the Committee, who will sit in judgment on the Bill. I make these general observations at the commencement of a new Parliament with the object of asking if the Government will not take into consideration the desirability of striking a small Committee to consider the whole subject and see if we cannot mend our ways.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that we should consider the reduction in the Committee on Public Accounts as being an experiment. It is a working Committee and its numbers are too large. We have not had the same members in attendance de die in diem; and you know, Mr. Speaker, as the late Chairman of the Committee, that there was no certainty that members present one day would be present at the next sitting, or that members would keep up a continuous attention to the business before the Committee. So we quite understand that this is an experiment, and it will be quite open to the hon. gentleman to move for an increase in the number or some other change if the experiment should fail. The hon. gentleman says the system in England is just the opposite to the system existing here. Of the six hundred members of the British House of Commons very few sit on Committees at all. There is a selection made of experienced members acquainted with the specific subjects for which the Committees are struck; they are small in number and they work in the same way as sub-committees do to our large Committees on special subjects. I am not sure, however, that we ought hastily to adopt the English system, because they are now harking back to the old practice of Parliament, by the resolutions of the House of Commons last year. They are trying to introduce, indeed they have introduced, the system of Grand Committees which formerly constituted a most important branch of the House of Commons and did a great deal of the work. We, in a rather irregular mode, have had Grand Committees. Our Railway Committee is a Grand Committee, composed as it is of a large number of members of the House, and we have found it to be an advantage as regards that particular Committee to have that large number of members. Railway legislation has been fully discussed there with much more ease than could possibly have been the case with the Speaker in the Chair, and the consequence of having that large Committee, and having the different measures discussed there, has been that the House has been in a great degree relieved from the tedium and waste of time which would be involved in a re-discussion of the measure. And the Committee being a large one, there is not the same objection which would exist in England to hon. members sitting on the Committee, and discussing Railway Bills in which they, or their constituencies, are interested. The Committee being a large one it is right and convenient, I think, that all the railway interests should be represented, and have either, through a member, an agent, or counsel, an opportunity of being heard. In small Committees such as obtain in England, of course it would be exceedingly improper that six or seven of the seven, eight or nine members composing a Committee appointed to report to the House, should be interested in the individual railways. The report of such a committee under such circumstances could have no weight, and should have none. On the other hand, as all our railway interests are represented on our large Railway Committee, and as many of the interests are in rivalry, and thus operate as a check on each other, it is rather convenient as regards the Railway Committee that those interests should be represented. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the suggestion that a small Committee should be struck during the Session for the purpose of considering the question. We derive great advantage from the Committee which sat here some years ago and reconsidered the Standing Orders of the House. I will discuss the matter with my friends here, and I will give the hon. gentleman an answer as to whether we think it advisable to strike such a Committee now, or whether we should wait till next Session, when we will have the advantage of seeing how the new system in England will have worked.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has misconceived one point of my remarks. I did not say that the English system in its entirety would be desirable. I want the hon. gentleman to consider as a possible intermediate plan, that the members should be placed on only one important committee, that would considerably relieve the large committees and enable members to give closer attention to the subjects coming before them, instead of being obliged to run from one committee to another, and not being able to look at Bills until they were in the committee, and called upon to pass judgment on them.

Motion agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting their Honors to unite with this House in the formation of a Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Committee on Printing, namely:—Messrs. Baker (Missisquoi), Bergin, Bourassa, Bowell, Desjardins, Foster, Houde, Landry, McDonald (Cape Breton), Ross (Middlesex), Somerville (Brant), Tassé, Thompson, Trow, and White (Cardwell), will act as members on the part of this House on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 10) to provide for the amalgamation of the Bank of Nova Scotia, with the Union Bank of Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 12) to amend the law with reference to procedure in criminal cases before Justices of the Peace out of Session, with relation to persons charged with indictable offences.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

SPEEDY TRIALS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in introducing Bill (No. 11) to amend the law with reference to the trial of cases before the County Judges Criminal Court, said: The object of this Bill is to amend the law with reference to the speedy trials of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanors. At present, a person in order to be tried without a jury out of session must be committed to jail on some charge. In many cases persons are not committed to jail, but are bound over to appear to answer to the charge laid; and I submit that where parties are desirous of having speedy trials, they should not, under such circumstances, be compelled to go to prison; and therefore I propose to amend the law so as to enable any person who may be charged with any such offence, and who is bound over to appear before any court of competent jurisdiction, to give notice in writing to the Crown Attorney, that he consents to and is desirous of being tried without a jury before the Judge; that when this is done, it shall be the duty of the Crown Attorney to notify the Judge within the specified time mentioned in the Bill, of such consent and desire; and that the Judge shall then appoint a day for trial; but in other respects, the law with reference to the speedy trial of persons so charged shall have effect and be in force.

Bill read the first time.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY AND SEDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to amend the Criminal Law and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person, by providing for the punishment of adultery, seduction, &c.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Bill, which I introduce to-day is the same Bill that was reported on by a Select Committee last Session; but after the report was made, we were unable to reach it, and consequently no action of the House could be had on it. I introduce it in the same shape as reported, and when it is printed and distributed among the members, I think that then will be the proper time for the discussion of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY, in introducing Bill (No. 14) respecting Carriers by Land, said: The Bill is one by which I propose to deal with the subject of carriers by land. At present there is a law on the Statute-book enumerating and defining the duties and liabilities of carriers by water, but, strange to say, we have no similar law with regard to carriers by land. The Bill is substantially similar to the English law dealing with the same subject. By the first few paragraphs of the Bill it is proposed that the carrier shall not be responsible for the loss or injury of parcels beyond a value of $50 unless they are insured in the manner laid down in the Bill. It provides, also, that with regard to other articles the conditions imposed by carriers shall not govern the contract unless they are in writing and signed by the owner or shipper, and not then, unless, in case of any question arising in any court or tribunal, the demand is held to be just and reasonable. Since the year 1854, the latter provisions have been in force in England, and in that country at the present time these conditions have to be pronounced to be just and reasonable, else they are not held to be binding. In this country the railway and express companies, who are our principal carriers by land, impose no end of conditions; in fact it would take a man an hour, with the aid of a magnifying glass, to read the conditions on the back of his bill of lading. No person in transacting ordinary business can afford the time to read these numerous conditions. If he did read them he would require one or two lawyers at his elbow to help him to understand them, and even then it might be impossible. He does not generally find them out until after the loss has happened, in which case the company points out to him a series of conditions by which he finds he has agreed that notwithstanding any injury to the article he has shipped—notwithstanding, perhaps, their own gross carelessness—the risk all falls upon him and not upon them. I propose to deal with the subject in the way in which I have stated, and I can see no good reason why the carriers themselves should object to the provisions of the Bill. It makes provision with regard to carrying small parcels, and it proposes that the conditions shall be submitted and subject to the approval of the Court or Judge.

Mr. BLAKE. I think some twelve or fourteen years ago an amendment was made in our Railway Bill dealing with the reasonableness of the conditions to which the hon. gentleman has referred. We succeeded in carrying it through this House, but it disappeared in the other.

Mr. ABBOTT. I think my hon. friend should consider one point, and that is as to the competency of this Parliament to deal with contracts of that description. I think it is a grave question whether this House can interfere with conditions of contract which I think should be regulated, and I think are regulated, by the laws of the different Provinces.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not lost sight of that question. It seems to me that this is a matter coming under the description of trade and commerce, and with which therefore we can deal. We passed a law relating to carriers by water, and if we had power to pass such a law I think we have power to pass this one.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). A decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario seems to throw some doubt on our power to deal with such a matter. That Court has just decided that the Warehouse Receipt Act, under which banks can make advances on warehouse receipts, is beyond the competency of this Parliament, and an improper interference with the Chattel Mortgage Act and the Bill of Sales Act of Ontario.

Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman explain the purport of the Bill?

Mr. MULOCK. The object of the Bill is to somewhat secure the independent working of railway lines. The sixtieth section of the Consolidated Act permits railway companies of their own motion—that is on the consent of the companies themselves—to enter into certain working arrangements for a period not exceeding twenty-one years. During the existence of that arrangement those railways are, in fact, in partnership, and during that time there ceases to be that competition to secure which may have been the object of Parliament in incorporating one or more of them, or of the people in aiding them by bonus. The Bill is not aimed in any spirit of hostility at the railways, but is intended rather to provide an impartial tribunal, whereby the interests of the public may be considered before the railways can give effect to any such arrangement. The proposition of the Bill is that before any such arrangements shall have validity, it shall receive the sanction of the Governor in Council.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN CONSOLIDATED FIVE PER CENT. LOAN.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed Resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to raise by way of loan, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament, such sum or sums of money as may be required to pay and discharge the Canadian Consolidated five per cent. loan, raised under the fourteenth chapter of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada, after deducting therefrom the amount held as a sinking fund for paying off the same; the rate of interest on the sums so to be raised by loan not to exceed four per cent. per annum.

Motion agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH BERMUDA

Mr. DALY enquired, Whether any correspondence has taken place between the Government of Great Britain and that of the Dominion relating to the establishment of telegraphic communication between Canada and Bermuda; and, if not, whether the Government will take into consideration the promotion of so desirable and important an undertaking?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There has been no such correspondence. This is a work which belongs more to the Imperial Government than to this Government, and it is likely, if it is required, that we may call their attention to it.

LAND IMPROVEMENT FUND.

Mr. HESSON, in moving for copies of all letters and papers between this Government and the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, from June 1st, 1882, up to the present, relating to the Land Improvement Fund, and all the unsettled accounts with the said Provinces; also, a Statement showing the present balances, if any, due to the said Provinces, including interest thereon up to January 1st 1883, said: My object in moving for these papers is to urge again upon the Government and Parliament the desirability of settling these long standing accounts. The present unsatisfactory condition of the matter has caused very great annoyance to the municipalities interested in the funds—I refer more particularly to the Land Improvement Fund in which a portion of my own county is very deeply interested. I understand that some progress has been made towards a settlement during the past year, and I desire to be put in possession of all the information now obtainable regarding the matter. I observe that some unfair statements have been made charging the delay entirely to the Government of the Dominion. I am in possession of sufficient information to say that I believe there is no ground whatever for that charge. Unscrupulous politicians are at present making use of the statement that the delay has arisen because of the Dominion Government not paying to the Ontario Government the moneys held by them in trust for the benefit of these various funds. I may state, from information I have obtained, that the moneys that have been paid to the municipalities during the past year were paid by the Government of Ontario, although no funds of any kind are specially set apart for the payment of these accounts. And I gather from that fact that the Ontario Government was in a position, long prior to this year, to have made these payments from funds in their own possession. Advances and payments have been made by the Dominion Government generally on account, but not any special account; and, therefore, I fancy that I am correct in assuming that if the members in the Local House had been discharging their duty to their constituents, the moneys would have been paid before now. I am exceedingly anxious, however, that these accounts should be closed, and that this source of annoyance to the counties should be removed by their being paid the moneys they are entitled to. If this Government are in a position to pay any unsettled balance, I suppose they will do so, and I understand that statements are now being prepared which will show us distinctly what the fund is. I hope these papers will be brought down at an early day, because unfair representations are being made to damage the reputation of members of this House, and to shift the responsibility from the proper shoulders.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There can be no objection to the passing of the motion of my hon. friend. I think the delay he has referred to has been occasioned to a very considerable extent by the fact that the accounts between the Province and the Dominion have not been finally settled. So far as the Dominion Government are concerned, they have been exceedingly anxious during the past two years that these accounts should be closed; but circumstances have prevented a settlement. I think, last year, our friends in Quebec were not prepared to take the subject up. In the early part of last year, the Government of Ontario, for a variety of reasons, were not prepared to take it up; but, finally, in September or October, representatives of the two Provinces met in Ottawa, and arrangements were entered into for the Dominion Government to prepare a statement from their standpoint for the Commissioners who were appointed to arbitrate upon the matter. Of course, the Legislature of Ontario met shortly after that, and the Legislature of Quebec is now in Session; but I have no doubt that as soon as the Legislature of Quebec is prorogued—I believe both parties are exceeding anxious, and as far as the Dominion Government is concerned, the papers are prepared—the case will be proceeded with, and we will have a final settlement of all these accounts, which will relieve my hon. friend and those interested from the difficulties they have experienced in the past.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of the Order in Council dismissing Mr. Octave C. de la Chevretière from his position as keeper of a light-house situated in the parish of Lotbinière, in the county of Lotbinière, and of all complaints, petitions or reports, in relation to such dismissal.—(Mr. Rioufret.)

Statement of the number of veterans of 1812 now surviving; of the number of veterans who have died since 1875, and of the number of widows of deceased veterans who have applied for assistance.—(Mr. Massue.)

Copies of the account rendered by Doctor Lebel, of St. Gervais, for attendance on an employé of the Intercolonial named Dionne, during last autumn; of the account of Doctor Renouf in the same case, and a Statement of the sums to them paid.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 19th February, 1883.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid upon the Table:—

Statement of Expenditure of the Dominion Police, during the year 1882; in accordance with the Act 31 Victoria, chapter 73, section 6.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

KING'S COUNTY, P. E. I., ELECTION.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is known, Mr. Speaker, that by law the Electoral District of King's County, Prince Edward Island, is entitled to send two members to this Parliament. By the act of the returning officer it appears that three members have been sent to serve in the present Parliament. As to one of the seats I understand there is no question about it, the hon. gentleman who occupies it having had a majority of 184 votes. As to the second seat, the returning officer has sent two members to fill it. It is undesirable that such a state of things should continue; both the members have taken the oath prescribed by law and their seats. It is desirable that all the papers connected with the question in the possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery should be submitted to Parliament, in order that Parliament may take such action in the matter as it may see fit. I, therefore, move:

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery do attend this House, to-morrow, with the Returns of the last Election for the Electoral District of King's County, P. E. I., together with the statements of the several Deputy Returning Officers, for the said Electoral District; and any documents used or required at such election, or which may have been transmitted to said Returning Officer by such Deputies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not give notice that he intended to make this motion; but being a matter of privilege, I suppose the notice need not be given. I would, however, suggest that the motion be altered in such manner as to require the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to attend to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to the change, on the understanding, of course, that such papers as may require it are printed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Such papers as are necessary will appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received from His Honor Chief Justice Palmer, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Act of 1874, a judgment and report on the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of King's County, Prince Edward Island, by which Peter Adolphus McIntyre, Esq., is declared duly elected.

BANK SHAREHOLDERS' LISTS RETURNS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor formally to lay before the House the lists of the shareholders of the Eastern Townships' Bank, the Merchants' Bank of Canada, the Union Bank of Lower Canada, and the Bank of Jacques Cartier, in compliance with the Act 34 Victoria, chapter 5, section 12.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 16) for the incorporation of the Central Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES BILL.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to further amend the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 50, respecting Permanent Building Societies in Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as the law now stands, these Permanent Building Societies are only authorized to invest in debentures of municipal corporations and of school sections. My Bill is a very short one, and is simply intended to enable them to invest in the securities of other authorized corporations.

Mr. BLAKE. Of all corporations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All other corporations.

Mr. BLAKE. All corporations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All corporations. The Bill, I presume, will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where it can be thoroughly discussed.

Bill read the first time.

BILL STAMPS.

Mr. IVES enquired, Whether bill stamps can now be obtained for the purpose of stamping notes or bills made before the repeal of the law requiring them to be affixed; and if so, from whom?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, on enquiry I find that there are some few bill stamps remaining on hand, and the question whether the Government can now legally issue them is before the Minister of Justice.

DEPOT PROVISION.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a depot of some description at Elgin Station on the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is being considered.

CANADIAN TOBACCO REGULATIONS.

Mr. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to modify the Law and Regulations respecting the sale by retail of Canadian tobacco in the leaf?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the hon. member that the intentions of the Government on this subject will be communicated to the House when the proposals with reference to the Tariff are placed before the House; before that period this cannot be done.

IMPROVEMENTS ON YAMASKA RIVER.

Mr. DUPONT (Translation) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause the works of improvement on Yamaska River to be continued during next summer, so as to render that river navigable from its mouth to the City of St. Hyacinthe, and, if so, what sum the Government intend to spend on those works during next summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I beg to inform the hon. member that it is the intention of the Government to continue the works already commenced. As to the amount which Parliament will be asked to vote therefor, the Estimates which will be laid before the House during this Session will give the answer, which I cannot give at present.

TRIAL OF JULIE BOISVERT.

Mr. CURRAN enquired, Whether any action has been taken by the Government with reference to the petition of about fifteen thousand citizens of Montreal, praying for an investigation into the trial of Julie Boisvert, convicted of murder, or if the Government intends to take action thereon?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would answer my hon. friend, and also my hon. friend from East Montreal who made enquiry of me on the same subject, that the Government have taken action thereupon; they have held an investigation and have already received a report on the subject.

RAILWAY FROM EDMUNSTON TO RIVIÈRE DU LOUP.

Mr. GRANDBOIS enquired, Whether any railway company has taken advantage of the provisions of Chapter 14 of the Statutes of Canada, 45 Victoria, granting a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, for a proposed railway from Edmunston to Rivière du Loup or Rivière Ouelle?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No company has yet applied to take advantage of the provisions referred to in the question.

WHARF AT ST. JEAN PORT JOLI.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build, during next summer, the extension of the wharf at St. Jean Port Joli, according to the vote of last Session granting money for that purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I have the honor to inform the hon. member in reply, that this subject is now under the consideration of my department.

SALES OR LEASES OF COAL LANDS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all applications for sales or leases, and all correspondence or reports touching, and leases of coal lands in the North-West, not already brought down; and statement of the payments made under any leases of coal lands, said: I observe, by the papers, that hon. gentlemen have altered seriously as to some particulars the regulations touching coal lands, and I presume that the new regulations will be brought down in accordance with the Statute. I do not, therefore, move for them, but it will be material, in view of the proposed very serious modifications, to have in our hands, before we are called upon to judge of the propriety of permitting the new regulations to pass, all that has been done under the old ones, and particularly the existing leases of areas of coal lands.

Motion agreed to.

ALLOWANCES ON GOODS REQUIRED BY THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all correspondence, reports and Orders in Council, not already brought down, relating to the allowances proposed to be paid to the Canadian manufacturers of certain goods required by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; of all applications for such allowance and correspondence in connection therewith; a statement of the calculations on which the allowances have been based, and the estimate, in detail, of the probable sums payable out of the Treasury, in respect of each class of goods, assuming them to be made in Canada, to the extent of the Company's requirements, and of the ad valorem percentages of allowances on each such class. He said: This motion, with the exception of some additional papers asked for, is in the same words as one which I moved last Session. I need hardly say that if there is no alteration in the estimates made by the Government upon subsequent experience from that brought down last Session, I do not require them to be duplicated; but in case subsequent experience has indicated a change, it is that portion that I require.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS SEIZURES.

Mr. BLAKE. Judging by the number of seizures made at the different ports of entry, it appears that the number of practical free-traders in this country is very largely on the increase, and with the view of informing the country and the House on that subject, I move:

For a statement showing the number of seizures made at each port of entry in the Dominion during the last fiscal year, and also during the six months ending the 31st December last,—the amount of fines exacted at each port during each of the said periods, and the manner in which the said fines are disposed of, giving the names of the officers receiving any portion thereof, and the amount received by each of such officers from said fund.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down the return asked for. I merely desire to take exception to the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that free-traders are on the increase; the only difference being that the law is now enforced, which I regret to say was not the case when he was in power.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement, in detail, of all sums expended in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Commission, with dates and names of the persons paid, and particulars of the service in respect of which payment is made; copy of all correspondence, contracts, accounts or arrangements, not already brought down, as to the printing of the evidence or report, said: Last Session I moved for a return on this subject. Of course much has been paid and the business has been concluded since the date to which that return extended, and there is, therefore, more to be brought down. I observe, by the Public Accounts, that payments do not seem to have been concluded as late as the close of the last fiscal year. I am particularly anxious that hon. gentlemen opposite should look at the former return, which is very imperfect, in so far as it purports to be an answer to an Order of the House for copies of all papers and correspondence in connection with the evidence. There are numerous gaps in the correspondence, which it would be well to have supplied. It appears to have been arranged, that this business, at least a portion of it, such as the appointment of the Commissioners and the taking of the principal portion of the evidence, should have been done at Ottawa, and that the headquarters of the Commission should be here; but I see that the printing was arranged to be performed by the Messrs. Stephenson, at Chatham, a very considerable distance from this city. The correspondence indicates, as was obvious, that very great inconvenience resulted from this arrangement, that there were demands for greater accuracy and greater expedition, and that revises had to go by mail, sometimes three, sometimes four, and once, I believe, five times, before the correct result could be obtained. So great was the delay and inconvenience that in the end the Commission were forced to notify Messrs. Stephenson that unless they made arrangements with somebody at Ottawa, to complete the work, the Commission, themselves, would cancel the existing arrangements, and make such others as would enable them to have the work done at Ottawa. Then, at last, the Messrs. Stephenson appear to have made arrangements with persons at Ottawa to complete the work. And with whom? With the Queen's printers, who, by law and custom, ought to have been charged with this work in the first place, so that the practical result was that the bulk of the work was done by the Queen's printers, but that the Messrs. Stephenson were allowed to job or farm out this portion, obtaining the profits which ought to have gone to those who did the work. It was necessary, of course, under these circumstances, that special arrangements should be made as to the prices, and I observe that very large numbers of copies of the report are allowed to be printed at what are called confidential rates, which means that the printers get something like twice as much as the ordinary rates. The printing of the French copy was divided between one newspaper office at Montreal and one at Quebec. On both of these points the correspondence is incomplete; in neither case is the amount paid given. I, therefore, would ask the hon. gentleman to look at the former return and complete it in so far as it is defective, and supplement it up to date.

Motion agreed to.

FRAUDS UPON CUSTOMS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence, not already brought down, with reference to frauds upon the Customs in the export of Canadian wheat or flour in satisfaction of bonds given on the importation of United States wheat or flour; all reports, evidence, and Departmental evidence upon such frauds; statement of the extent thereof; names of the parties concerned, and a statement of the action of the Department thereon, said: Last Session I moved more than once for information with reference to the frauds practiced upon the Customs in connection with the system of grinding in bond, or the importing, for particular purposes, of wheat and flour from the United States, and pointed out, what indeed was obvious, that such a trade was being carried on in these products, and at such prices as rendered it plain there must be some fraudulent practice carried on. The hon. Minister, I believe, issued a Departmental instruction for an enquiry and a vast mass of papers were sent down to us; but while they found out a number of things, they did not find out the one thing of interest to the House and the country, namely, where the frauds were and who was committing them, and what their nature was: and it was said there was nothing wrong. Since that time, the newspapers tell us that certain discoveries have been made, that certain frauds have been committed on the Customs, and that these have been going on for a long time, I think they said three years, and that the hon. Minister, having inquired into the matter and taken into consideration the report of some officer on the subject, has dealt with some one or more of the firms concerned, in reference to such particular frauds as they were still amenable to the law for, viz.: those which have taken place during the preceding twelve months. I desire to have information on such subjects, not merely with reference to the period referred to, but with reference to all the discoveries of the Government as to frauds committed even at an earlier date.

Mr. BOWELL, The hon. gentleman would leave the impression on the House that no enquiry was made into what, he termed, the frauds or the revenue at all, until after his motion was made in this House. Such is not the fact. When the hon. gentleman made the motion, I informed the House that full enquiry had been made into what he termed frauds. I did not state at that time, as the hon. gentleman says, that no wrong had been committed. On the contrary, I said that irregularities had existed in different parts of the Dominion, both in the West and in the East, but that the importers of the wheat, whose attention had been called to these irregularities, at once paid the duties which they should have paid, and that it was settled. The papers to which the hon. gentleman refers will be laid before the House, and it will be seen that, in the cases discovered since, the Department have been just as vigilant as they were previously, and that the action taken by the Government established not only that the amount of duty which should be paid would be collected, but that the heaviest fine should be imposed in addition.

Mr. BLAKE, There is a difference between irregularities and frauds. It is quite true the hon. gentleman said something about irregularities. I enquired, however, not about irregularities which were acknowledged and the proper duties paid, and which were found to be of a very limited amount, but of frauds—designed and deliberate frauds. It was about such designed and deliberate frauds of which the hon. gentleman has since discovered a part, and perhaps a part only.

Mr. BOWELL. Very likely.

Mr. BLAKE. And very likely a part only of these frauds which really were designed to cheat the revenue, and to produce an unfair state of things as between the fair trader and those in use of these fraudulent means. This, it was, I was anxious to obtain last Session and I am desirous of obtaining now.

CANADIAN EXTRADITION ACT.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence not already brought down, touching the Canadian Extradition Act, and the Suspension of the Imperial Act within Canada, and of any Imperial or Canadian Orders in Council or Proclamation on the subject, said: It is now six years ago since this House and the Senate unanimously agreed in an address praying that the Imperial Act be suspended in the Dominion of Canada, in order that the Act passed in the Session to which I refer might have operation. Ever since we have been endeavoring to obtain action on that address, and the newspapers tell us there has been an Imperial Proclamation lately, but I have not noticed in the official papers of this country any reference to such proclamation. A considerable interest exists upon the subject of what the state of the law now is. Upon the proclamation issuing, of course the new Act will come into force. It is extremely important we should learn what is the condition of things on this question of our relations with the neighboring Republic.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN P.E.I. AND THE MAINLAND.

Mr. DAVIES moved for (1) copies of all contracts or agreements entered into by the Postmaster General, since the last Session of the late Parliament, for the conveyance of the mails to and from Prince Edward Island, and all correspondence relating to steam communication between the Island and the mainland while the navigation remains open. (2) Of all correspondence and papers relating to the winter crossing between Cape Traverse and Tormentine. (3) A Return of all trips made by the Northern Light during the winter of 1881-82, with her receipts for freights and passage moneys, and the expenses of her management and running. (4) Copies of all reports and correspondence relating to the survey or construction of the Railway authorized to be built between Cape Traverse and the mainland on Prince Edward Island. He said: The subject matter of my motion has been before The House on more than one occasion, and I dare say some hon. gentlemen may be tired of hearing it. But I make no apology for bringing it forward again, because of its immense importance to the interests of the people of the Island, and because the good faith of the Dominion Government is pledged to carry out the terms upon which Prince Edward Island entered the Confederation. That has not yet been done, though I am sure the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Government must be anxious that no charge of breach of faith can fairly be brought against the Dominion by even the smallest member of the Confederacy. Now, I may be pardoned if I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the history of this question. It is a painful history for us in Prince Edward Island. At the present time an agitation is going on throughout the Island, meetings are being held and the people are expressing themselves in decided language. They have come to the conclusion that they are being trifled with on this question, and though I should be sorry myself to adopt the extreme language of some of the resolutions, still there is no one, on whichever side of politics he may be, who is not in unison with the prevalent feeling of the people, that they have not been treated with fair play. When we entered Confederation in 1873—I think it was—one means of communication with the mainland consisted of the steamers which we now have, and a contract was made at that time with the Steam Navigation Company for a period of ten years. That is important in connection with the subsequent history of this question, because before the late Government came into power, that contract had been entered into, and there was some excuse for them in not providing better accommodation in view of the contract then running. My main reason for bringing this subject before the House at the present time is, that the contract for the conveyance of the mails, during the summer months, is now about expiring, and I believe the hon. the Postmaster-General has entered into negotiations, the nature of which I am not aware of, for the renewal of that contract. In the renewal of that contract provision should be made to improve the communication in the autumn months. The provision in the Terms of Union, which had reference to this subject, reads as follows:—

“Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the Railway system of the Dominion.”

Now, it is well known that Prince Edward Island was averse to casting in her lot with the Dominion, and that one of the chief arguments which were used to gain the people's consent was the promise made in that very clause. They felt that the communication previously existing between the Island and the mainland was not sufficient to take their products to market, and did not afford proper facilities for passenger traffic. They felt the resources of the Island, taxed as they were for the construction of a railway, were inadequate to cope with this question; and I believe—and I think my fellow members from that Province will bear out the statement—that the inducement which operated most strongly in gaining the consent of the people to enter into the Union was the solemn compact, offered by the Dominion and accepted by the Island, that efficient steam communication should be maintained. The Island may be small in point of population, but no one can conceive, unless he lives there, the difficulties we are under during several months of the year, in respect to our communication with the mainland. Not only is passenger traffic seriously interfered with, but our people are unable to carry their products to market or to purchase the goods they require. After we came into the Union an attempt was made—a very miserable attempt—by the late Government, but I suppose it was the best they could do under the circumstances, when they put the steamer Albert on the route. They employed, as I am given to understand, the best one they could get, and she performed the service two seasons. She did that in an unsatisfactory manner, but the people were not disposed to grumble. They were disposed to give fair play to the Government, and they had plenty of time to carry out the compact. There was some political grumbling, of course, but the mass of the people felt convinced that before many years this compact would be faithfully performed. Then the Northern Light was put on. A great deal of opprobrium has been cast upon that vessel, and upon her builders, but I think those who know anything about the question at all will admit that the Northern Light was a great success, in many respects a complete success, and experience has shown us wherein her defects lay and how they can be improved. She was a success, in that she solved the question of the feasibility of crossing the straits in winter by a steamer. It was contended by many that it was a mad scheme, that no steamer could be built capable of pushing through the ice in the winter months, and even some practical men shared in that opinion. But the Government of the day, led by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), put on this boat, and I believe those efforts of the Government received full credit from the people as showing an honest intention to grapple fairly with the question. At that time pressure was brought to bear upon the Government to induce them to improve the communication between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen are aware of it, but the service now carried out between these two capes, a distance of only nine miles, is no better than it was thirty or forty years ago. When the Northern Light was put upon the route between Georgetown and Pictou, the Government of the day asked, I believe, that they should not be pressed to make any large expenditure in connection with the Cape route until they saw whether the Northern Light answered the purpose required of her. That was some little excuse; the people of the Island were patient and they took the boat the Government gave them, although there was a very violent attack made upon her from time to time by some politicians. Nevertheless the Northern Light is a success, and has solved the problem in so far as she has proved that the compact the Dominion Government undertook is capable of being carried out. It is only a question of willingness on the part of the Government to do it; it is only a question of a small amount of money. When the hon. gentleman who held the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries three years ago was elected from the Island, he expressed a strong opinion that the Northern Light was not what she ought to be, and he made repeated promises to improve the means of communication. I may say that when that hon. gentleman took a seat in the Ministry there was a feeling of great disappointment in the Island, because, after the year 1878, when the present Government came into power, nothing was done in reference to that question, although the Island was represented in the Ministry. I think I am not going beyond the facts in stating that up to this time, since the advent of the present Government to power in 1878, not a single step has been taken in connection with this service, with the exception of the motion made by the hon. Minister of Railways last Session for the construction of the branch railway. Time and again we are promised that efforts would be made to fulfil the compact, but so far nothing has been done. We are willing to acknowledge, indeed subsequent events have shown that the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not, perhaps, altogether responsible for his neglect in that matter. I should be very sorry, in the present sad condition of his mind, to say a word which would reflect on him or hurt the feelings of his friends. We are disposed to acknowledge that it was owing to the fact that his health was breaking up that nothing was done, because if he had possessed the push that once characterized him in public life he would have taken steps to have had the agreement carried out. I will do him that justice; I believe he is excused on that ground by people generally, because subsequent events have shown that his mind was more or less giving way, and that he was not able to grapple with questions in the able way in which he had once dealt with them. In 1880 the people began to think that it was time for them to move, and through their representatives in the Local Parliament they presented a joint address to His Excellency the Governor General, which set forth the shortcomings of the Dominion Government in this respect. I have refreshed my mind by looking over that address, and I see the charges are very plain and specific; and I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the Minister of Railways, who, I believe, takes great interest in this question, to the fact that the address was voted unanimously, by both branches of the Legislature, and by both political parties. I am proud to say it has not been made a political question, at all events for the last year or two. It was made a political question, however, when the late Government were in power, and we deprecated that mode of treating the question; but since the present Government have been in power it has not been made a political issue, because we believe the best interests of the Island will be advanced by all parties joining hands to aid the Government to do what is reasonable and just. We do not demand anything unfair, or that which cannot be carried out. We submit that this compact, made with the Dominion, can be carried out without Prince Edward Island receiving anything unfair in the shape of a money grant, or asking the Government to do a thing which is impossible. I do not deny that some people ask impossible things. I received papers containing resolutions from Prince Edward Island to-day, asking for more than I can approve, resolutions not calculated to advance the question, because they ask for the impossible. But we do not ask anything of the kind; we ask simply what is reasonable and just. No notice was taken by the Dominion Government of the address passed in 1880, further than to acknowledge in a despatch to the Lieut.-Governor that such an address had been received. When the Local Legislature met last year, I looked through the Journals to see what had taken place. I found that the hon. the First Minister telegraphed to the Local Premier stating that he was fully alive to the importance of the question. I am not aware that any member of the Government has ever denied that we have a grievance which ought to be remedied; they all acknowledge the fact, but we get nothing more than a simple acknowledgment, and that does not give us continuous communication. The hon. the First Minister telegraphed, on the 21st March, as follows:—

Mr. DAVIES.

OTTAWA, March 21st, 1882.

HON. W. W. SULLIVAN.

The Government are giving their earnest consideration to the question of winter communication between your Island and the mainland. I will write in a day or two.

(Signed)

JOHN A. MACDONALD.

I am not aware whether the First Minister found time to write at greater length; no letter has ever been published in our Journals or in the records of this House. But the Government were giving their earnest attention to the question then, and I hope and trust that before very long we shall hear from the lips of some of the hon. gentlemen responsible for the carrying out of the compact the result of that earnest consideration, and what the Government has determined to do. That telegram was sent shortly before the local elections. I would not for a moment intimate that it was intended to have any effect on the elections. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not attempt anything of the kind, but it came down just before the local elections took place, and was circulated throughout the length and breadth of the Island. Mark you, it was promulgated through the Island for years, that the late Government were no friends to the people, but that the present Government were their friends and would do everything for them. The people waited. Nothing was received in answer to the joint address sent to the Governor General beyond a simple acknowledgment of its receipt, but a telegram was sent just before the local elections stating that the Dominion Government were earnestly considering the subject, and I hope the result of that consideration will be that the Government will come to the conclusion—it is the only conclusion that they ought to come to—that the matter should be practically dealt with, and that at once; that they will acknowledge the justice of our case and not keep it open any longer. After that telegram came down they went to the polls, and the Local Government were sustained by a very narrow majority—I do not know whether they would have been sustained at all except for that telegram. They were, however, sustained by a narrow majority, and are no doubt willing that the subject should receive the earnest consideration which the hon. gentleman is willing to give it. The Mackenzie Government, in addition to building the Northern Light and placing her on the route between Georgetown and Pictou, had a survey made for a railway between Cape Traverse and the Island railway; and if they had been returned to power in 1878, no doubt they would have completed the surveys and built the road. In introducing a Bill for the construction of a branch railway in Prince Edward Island, the Hon. the Minister of Railways last Session said the Dominion Government had entirely failed to carry out its obligations to Prince Edward Island. I quote from Hansard:

“To carry out the engagement of the Dominion Government with Prince Edward Island, the Dominion Government had the steamer Northern Light constructed, but that steamer, though effecting considerable improvement in the existing communications, entirely failed in maintaining continuous communication. The late Government directed a survey to be made between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine on the one side and Cape Traverse and the Island Railway on the other. This survey was completed and a Report made by the able engineer appointed by the late Government, recommending the best points for railway connection. And we are now carrying out the policy contemplated by the late Government in ordering this survey to be made.”

The hon. gentleman thus attempted by a Bill which he introduced subsequent to his speech on the construction of the railway, to carry out the policy of the late Government; but they have not made any further proposal with a view to remedy evils which admittedly exist. Just before the late elections you could not visit any district of the Island without meeting one or two officials connected with the survey. We do not complain of that for we were glad to see them; but what we do complain of is the delay which has taken place. I hope, Sir, that this matter will not be kept over until another general election for party purposes; and I protest against this being done. We have been trifled with already too long. An hon. gentleman smiles, and I do not wonder at it; but this is no smiling matter to us. It is, in fact, no smiling matter at all. Now, when the late elections were over, what became of the surveyors? We could not find one of them; a week afterwards not a surveyor was to be found; they packed up their tents, like the Arabs by night, and stole silently away. Not one of them was to be seen throughout the length and breadth of the Island. Some surveyors, it is true, were at East Point; but, I will not drag that question in here to day. What I want to press on the attention of the hon. gentleman to-day is, since he has acknowledged, and acknowledged frankly and fully, that we have a substantial grievance, and that the Dominion Government has failed to carry out their compact, Parliament having been induced to grant the money for the purposes, to see, that the Government carry out at any rate their part of the compact; and see that this is done at once. What earthly reason can there be for adopting any other course. I understand that the money will have to be re-voted this Session. The hon. gentleman, I believe, gave some private reason for the Government's delay; they were waiting for some private company in New Brunswick to build the Tormentine Branch Railway. But that is no reason in the world. It is no legitimate excuse. The hon. gentleman has acknowledged that the road ought to be built; Parliament has voted the money with which to build it, and I think it is not going too far when I insist that as far as he can the hon. gentleman will carry out the wishes of Parliament, and his own intentions, as he has here expressed them. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, one word before I close, as to what we really want—and I do not think that our demands are unreasonable. I will call the attention of the Postmaster General to this point: The contract for the conveyance of the mails during the summer is now, I believe, about at an end, and the Government either have renewed it for a limited time or are about doing so. I do not wish to make a charge against the company who have been doing this service. On the contrary, I believe they have carried it out—as far as their contract compelled them—very well. They have had excellent captains on the boats. Better men could not be found in any part of the world. What I complain of with reference to the summer communication is this: Paddle boats do very well during the summer months, but we must have daily communication with Pictou. I see the hon. member for Pictou opposite, and I hope that he will join with me in making this demand; and his constituents are as much interested in this matter as are mine. We must have daily communication with Pictou; but the boats only run there now three or four times a week, which is most inconvenient in connection with our business with Nova Scotia. Answers to letters cannot be got for two or three days; and in no respect are we on the same level in this relation with other parts of the Dominion, where a telegram can be sent for twenty five cents; while if we do not get our letters, we cannot send a telegram even of ten words from the Island under seventy-five cents; and, therefore, it is of treble importance to us to have mail communication well maintained. The demand which we make with reference to mail communication is—that there must be a daily boat between Charlottetown and Pictou, as well as between Charlottetown and Summerside, and I hope and trust that provision will be made in the new contract, to whomever the contract is given, whether to the present or a new company, by which the company will be sufficiently subsidized to enable them to put screw boats during the fall months on the route, in order to keep the harbors open for at least two or three weeks later than is now the case. In Prince Edward Island the shipping season is confined to very few weeks, and by the time that our farmers have their grain and other crops out of the ground and hauled to market, the season is almost at an end. There is consequently a very great rush; and this is the crucial point—keeping the harbors open for one or two weeks longer than is at present the case. Now, paddle boats are capital boats during summer and mild weather, but they will not do during the fall months and December, because the moment that two or three inches of ice forms in the harbors, these boats have to be laid up; therefore I submit that the hon. gentleman in his new contract with the Steam Navigation Company should adopt the course I have recommended. I believe, for my part, that the present company has conducted the service excellently well. They have done what their contract compels them to do, but the moment that ice forms, they are allowed by their contract to stop their boats. I hope that the hon. gentleman, when he makes a new contract, will see that the contractors are compelled to provide boats which can keep our harbors open at any rate for a fortnight longer in the fall of the year. Why, last autumn, the harbors froze up very early; and there is still an immense quantity of all kinds of produce lying in the warehouses of Summerside and Charlottetown, such as pork, lard, butter and hides, and everything else which the Island exports, and this produce must there remain until next spring. It occasions great loss to the commercial community, when they are not able to ship this produce in the fall, and also to the farmers, although the loss is not so heavy to the latter, owing to the fact that they have then disposed of most of their produce to the merchants, a large number of whom are thus almost ruined. Then there is the canned goods industry, which is a very large one. Large quantities of canned fish and other canned goods are sent from the Island; but the moment a little frost comes the paddle steamer stops, and these canned goods and all the other produce of the Island, awaiting shipment, have to be left in the warehouses all winter. Of course many hon. members may not think that this is a great grievance; but it is really a very serious matter. It affects Prince Edward Island almost more than anything else, and I hope and trust that when a new contract is entered into the hon. the Postmaster General will increase the subsidy, and, as a sine qua non, will insist that the company shall provide a proper boat, capable of keeping the harbors open a little longer in the autumn than is at present the case. That is all I have to say with reference to the summer service. I now come to the winter service. The Northern Light has solved a good many points for us. It has taught us this: while the navigation of the straits can be kept open for the greater part of the winter, for a period of four or five weeks they cannot be navigated by a steamer at all, and we are then driven to take the Capes route. I believe that every member of this House and of the Senate, from the Island, crossed at the Cape in a small open boat of fourteen or fifteen feet keel; but the House will hardly credit the statement, that on neither side is there a boat house or shed of any kind, with which to cover the boats. You come down on a cold morning with wife, or lady friends, and are compelled to pass to the boat amid slash and wet. I must say that the men do their best to keep the passengers dry and clean, but how can they do so completely? They have no boat house to cover their boats, which they have to tug at, and pull over the ice at the Capes at the risk of their lives. I hope, that the Government will remedy this state of affairs. It is the least that they can do; and I think that they will do it. I do not know who is to blame for the supineness shown in not providing a proper boat house. The blame rests somewhere; and not only is a boat house required and accommodation for the crews, but proper water boats to enable the passage to be made when there is a mile or two of open water and the wind is blowing hard. The passage has to be made in these little ice boats, and luggage is frequently damaged by the water and sometimes the lives of the passengers placed in jeopardy. I believe that the contractors offered to put on two better boats, and man them with a proper crew, in order that the passengers might not be detained, as they are, and have been during the past winter, as well as during the present winter. This detention has lasted sometimes for a week, or ten days at a time. The Government have acted foolishly in entrusting this matter to the Postmaster of Charlottetown. I do not want to make any positive charge against this person, for I am not aware what his instructions are, but somebody is very much to blame for haggling about a couple of hundred dollars which ought to be paid in order to secure these necessary water boats and sheds. When I came over with four or five others, we had to wait for four or five days at the Cape, simply because there was no water boat to take us across a mile of water. This ought not to be. From eighteen to twenty ladies and gentlemen, including commercial travellers, who were, for many reasons, very desirous of crossing, were delayed, when I was there, simply because the party who is authorized to deal with this matter, would not take the responsibility of spending a few hundred dollars to remedy the present state of affairs. I ask the hon. Minister who has this matter specially in charge that he will see that proper sheds are built on both sides for the purpose of protection, and that sleeping apartments are provided for the men. A hardier and better class of men cannot be found anywhere; they are trained to the service, and only trained men can perform the service. The work cannot be done by ordinary men, for it requires that they should be as agile as cats or chamois goats, so that they may be able to spring from one cake of ice to another. These men come from miles around and are are totally destitute of shelter, so far as the Government are concerned, and they have to sleep where they can in the farmers' houses. This protection should be afforded without delay, because whether the Government put on a new steamboat, or two new steamboats to take the place of the Northern Light, there always will be a period of four or five and sometimes six weeks during the winter months when people must cross by the Cape. In the year 1880 the Minister of Railways addressed this House at some length on the subject of the Northern Light. He acknowledged our grievance and promised to provide the remedy. He said:

"The subject has remained in abeyance until the further experiment be tried of how far steam communication between the capes can be established for mail service. The mails are now carried between the capes by ice boats; but I am in hopes it will be found that either the Northern Light or a boat more specially constructed for that service will be able to maintain regular communication, or decidedly improve it, by making it less trying to passengers than by the ice boat system. It is incumbent upon the Government to carry out, as far as possible, the obligation of steam communications between the Island and the rest of the Dominion; and, no doubt, although a very large expenditure is involved in the proposed wharves at the capes, I believe it can be greatly reduced by getting a boat of lighter draught."

The hon. gentleman made this statement frankly and fully, and I hope he will now carry out his promise. At other times the hon. Minister has acknowledged that this subject was one which required attention at the hands of the Government, but the matter has gone on from year to year without action being taken, until the patience of those who are interested is almost exhausted. The Northern Light has done good service in the past but she can be greatly improved upon, and besides the boat is almost worn out. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not say I am mistaken when I state that though she was repaired last summer she was not subjected to Lloyd's inspection. It was not expected when the boat was built that it would last more than eight years, and it has now performed the service for about that time. Under the fiscal policy of the present Government we are compelled to buy our goods from Canada instead of from England, where we could purchase them cheaper. At the present time the warehouses of Picton are filled with goods awaiting transportation to the Island, but the Northern Light is not adapted to the carriage of freight. I am informed, and it is currently reported in the Island, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or some one in his Department instructed his agent in Prince Edward Island, or the captain of the boat, not to allow her to run this winter unless he was perfectly certain that no possible danger could be incurred. I do not say this statement is true; in fact I hope it will be contradicted, but it is said that the captain was informed that if he went out he would go at his own personal risk. If these instructions were sent the whole service will become a farce, for the boat never could go into the ice without great risk. But though the boat is worn out and will not be able to last more than another season she has done good service in the past, and the experience of her officers has been such as will enable them to give useful hints to the Government for the construction of a new boat. Year by year the quantity of produce to be shipped, and the number of passengers to be carried, are increasing, and I do not think we are asking too much in demanding that the Government should put on two boats instead of the Northern Light, as they would be pretty well occupied with freight all through the winter months. It seems to me that this demand is a reasonable one, even if we had not a contract with the Dominion at all. But when they solemnly entered into this contract, we are entitled to ask that it shall be faithfully kept. I do not think there is one hon. member from the Island who will say that this matter is one that should be referred to a Commission. There is nothing to enquire about; the facts are all well known to the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—just as well known as they could be after months of enquiry. The captain and engineer of the boat can give the Government all the information they require as to improvements which might be made in the new vessels. No delay should be incurred in making that service—to use the words of the compact—efficient, and in giving us continuous communication with the mainland. The mass of the people are willing to be taxed for the construction of great public works in other parts of the Dominion, and all they ask in return is that the compact made with them, that they should have continuous steam communication connecting them with the railways of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, shall be carried out. I make this motion as no mere matter of form; I make it because the people from one end of the Island to the other are agitating this question with the greatest possible earnestness. I believe that the faith which a large number of the people of the Island have expressed in the present Government—a faith which I never profess to have had myself—that they could carry out the Terms of the Union, and their belief in the promises which leading members of the Administration have made from time to time will be seriously shaken, unless some active measures are at once taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out these terms and to fulfil these promises.

Mr. YEO. I am pleased that this question has again been brought up in this House. I had hoped from the action of the Government last summer, about the time of the elections, that the matter would have been attended to before now. It has been before the House for nearly eight years, but it seems as if it were no nearer settlement than ever. I hope the Government who have again been returned with a large majority—a fact which I, for one, greatly regret—will take up the question at once and deal fairly with the people of Prince Edward Island. I would just like to see some of the Ministers undergo the experience that we have undergone, who have had to cross the strait once or twice a year, for if they had that experience I believe they would lose no time in providing the proper means of crossing. I certainly would like to see one or two of the gentlemen make a trip down to the Island for the benefit of their health and the good of Prince Edward Island. The hon. member for Queen's has spoken of steam communication in summer, which is a matter of great importance to us. What we want is new boats. The boats now used have been there a long time, and are altogether unfit for the service. We want two new paddle-wheel boats of large capacity for freight and passengers for summer, and two strong screw boats for the fall and winter service. The screw boats to run between Summerside and Shediac as long as possible. This would lengthen the season of navigation at least three weeks, which would be of the greatest importance to the inhabitants of the west end of the Island. With all the great cry about the National Policy and the benefit it was to do this Dominion, we do not feel any good results from it there. In fact, we are very much against it; but, if we had boats which would run late in the fall, and enable us to transport our goods to and from the Islands, there would not be so much discontent. We need two new boats for summer and two for winter service, so that one might leave Pictou and one Georgetown at the same time. If there is nothing done now, I believe the people of the Island are getting so excited over the matter that they will either go in for a tunnel or appeal to the Imperial Parliament for separation, and I do not know but one of these courses is as good as the other. But something must be done. The Minister of Railways, when he sat on this side of the House, and the late Government was in power, was as active as any gentleman from Prince Edward Island in demanding that this grievance should be remedied, and I thought we only needed a change of Government to have that done. I do not know what the reason is, but the hon. gentleman has kept very quiet on the subject ever since he has been in a position to do anything for us. It is probable that the branch railway will be built, but in connection with it the winter cape service should be made more efficient. Sheds should be built for the boats and their crews, and larger ice boats and water boats provided. The men who perform that service should also be better paid, as hitherto they have been very inadequately remunerated for their difficult and dangerous work. I hope and trust, however, that the Government will take this matter into their consideration at once, and deal liberally with the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. JENKINS. The question brought before the notice of this House by my hon. colleague is one possessing the deepest interest for the people of Prince Edward Island, and I cordially endorse all that he has said as to its great importance to their trade and commerce. But, Sir, when my hon. colleague questions the sincerity of the present Government and their intention to improve the means of communication with the Island, I cannot agree with him. I have firm faith, not only in the sincerity of their intentions, but also in their ability to carry out any scheme for improving steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. My hon. colleague says he does not believe in a Committee; he says there is nothing to enquire about. On this point I differ entirely from him. I think there is everything to enquire about, and I think the fact that no Government has ever had any reliable information with regard to the difficulties of communication, is a very good reason why they may not have taken action in the matter. My hon. colleague thinks the late Government were entirely sincere in their efforts to give us steam communication. I will not differ from him on that point; I will not question their sincerity, but I do question their wisdom. They took the Northern Light off the hands of its builder. She was not built for crossing the straits, but for passing up and down the St. Lawrence—a very different service. She is built very light and narrow, in the shape of a ram, and when she tries to pass through the fields of ice in the straits, she sticks, and cannot stand the constant concussion to which she is subjected. If we want to overcome the difficulties of winter navigation, I believe we must take the Northern Light, not as a model, but as a model to avoid in every particular. She was not intended for the service and was utterly unfit for it. When she first came to Charlottetown I walked out on the ice, which was just sufficient to bear the weight of a man, and she was not able to go through more than one third of her length at each attempt. I told the captain: "If you turn her stern foremost she will go," and Admiral McClintock, who visited Prince Edward Island last summer, made the same remark. Although she is unfit for the service, I think a ship may be built which will overcome the difficulties of winter communication on almost all occasions. These difficulties are a given weight of ice, impelled by a given force of wind and tide. To overcome these obstacles, we must get a greater weight and greater force. I see no difficulty in this. I may say that I placed on the Table, a day ago, a notice to have a Committee formed to enquire into that point, on which we have at present no reliable information. No two men will agree as to the depths of ice a steamer will go through, or as to the amount of ice that comes in a conglomerated form, piled together. Nor do they agree as to the power of resistance required. I think a Committee may be very useful, not only in acquiring reliable information, but in sifting that information. We know that in Prince Edward Island there are sectional interests, and these interests are conflicting. Of the people who reside in different localities, each one thinks his is the proper locality for winter navigation. I was coming up in the train with a gentleman who lives in Georgetown, and he said: "There should be no sectional jealousy: Georgetown is the place." Every man thinks the same of his own locality. I believe if this Committee is formed and if it sifts the evidence properly, it will have this good effect: that the people belonging to the different sections will see that their interests have not been overlooked, as they would think they were if it were merely a scientific committee, without a representation for the different districts. My view of winter navigation is: that we should put a steamer where the men now cross and put ice boats on board the steamer. If the steamers were unable to pass through the ice, then the ice boat could easily get over it, because the heavy ice which would obstruct the steamer would make easy work for the boats. My hon. colleague has spoken to the effect that efficient steam navigation was a strong factor in inducing the people of the Island to overcome their reluctance to Confederation. I can endorse that statement. When Confederation was first propounded, only ninety-four of the whole inhabitants of the Island could be found to endorse it, and I may say I was one of the ninety-four. Again, when the subject was brought up in the Local Legislature, a resolution was passed, stating that no terms could be offered to Prince Edward Island which could be accepted. That resolution was passed by a majority, I think, of twenty-five to four, and I may add I was one of the four. Better terms were afterwards offered, but they also were rejected. Afterwards what are now known as the "better terms" were offered, and I am certain that the policy of continuous steam navigation between the Island and the mainland was a strong factor in inducing the people to overcome their reluctance to Confederation. It is impossible to over-rate the importance of steam navigation to the people of our Province. We are in an isolated position. We are unable to benefit directly by the National Policy, which has had so very beneficial effect on the other Provinces, because we are unable to enter into manufacturing. If we had continuous steam navigation, I believe manufactures, to a certain extent, would be carried on, and we would benefit, both directly and indirectly, by the National Policy. The people of the Island in 1878, when the National Policy was first proposed, saw that they, individually, could not benefit by that policy, but they loyally acceded to it and sent five out of six members to endorse it. I think that that fact should induce this House, if Prince Edward Island required more than justice, to give us a little more than justice; but we do not look for more than justice. We look simply for the carrying out of the Terms of the Union in regard to steam communication. My hon. colleague has spoken as to the branch line at Cape Traverse and seems rather to doubt the sincerity of the hon. Minister of Railways in having had an amount voted last Session for the construction of that railway. The people of the Island are not in unison as to the point at which that branch should tap the main line. The hon. member was in favor of the branch from the county line to Cape Traverse. A very important section of country along the line between Wiltshire and Cape Traverse are in favor of having a longer branch from Cape Traverse to North Wiltshire. This will have the advantage of passing through a very fertile country, four of the largest and most fertile settlements of the whole Island lying in that line, and the inhabitants of those points are very anxious the line should run in that direction. The hon. Minister of Railways gave me a promise, that before any action should be taken in regard to the building of the line, that route would be surveyed, and if practicable, adopted. That, I believe, is one of the reasons for the delay in building the branch. With regard to the boat houses, I may also say that in November I had an interview with the hon. Postmaster General, and he promised that the boat houses would be built and the water boats put on, if the contractors would place them in the contract at anything like a reasonable sum. When I returned to the Island I had an interview with Captain Irvine, and we agreed on what was a reasonable sum, to build the boat houses and put on the water boats, but when he conferred with his partner, they came to the conclusion the season was too far advanced, and they could not get lumber to build the boat houses. That is the reason the houses were not built. As to the water boats, the contractors did not seem prepared to put on the water boats this season, but I believe next season boat houses will be built and water boats put on. I am sure they will prove of great benefit to the passengers, because, as my hon. colleague has said, one of the greatest hardships in crossing is to get into an icy cold wretched boat. The people of the Island have for a long time been very patient, I think too patient. They have now awakened to the necessities of their position. This year they have been aroused, because it is a matter of fact that a very large proportion of the products of the season remain on the Island to the great loss of the farmers and shippers and the consumers on this side. The necessities of their trade are so great, owing to the increased acreage of cultivation, that the people of the Island are alive to the fact that they must do their best and put their shoulders to the wheel. A meeting was held lately at which strong resolutions were passed. I wish my hon. colleague had delayed his notice of motion until we would have had these resolutions, and the petitions being signed throughout the country, before this House. They, I think, would have strengthened our position. As to steam communication, I have an idea of my own. I believe that the Terms of Union will never be carried out until we have a steamer running between Capes Traverse and Tormentine, which will be able to carry cars from the Island line to the Intercolonial. Now, the advantages of that to Prince Edward Island would be incalculable. It would prove also a very large feeder to the Intercolonial Railway, and would draw a large traffic to the Prince Edward Island Railway. It would be of immense benefit to the farmers by enabling them to send their fresh meat, fish, and eggs to the large manufacturing towns in the United States, and I believe it would revolutionize the system of farming as well as the carrying trade of the Island. That is a question which I hope to see brought before the House in a more mature form at a future time. My hon. colleague has expressed doubts as to the sincerity of the present Government, but I am quite sure the present Government has the best feeling towards Prince Edward Island, and I am sure that under their rule Prince Edward Island, instead of being the step-child of the Dominion, as she was under the late Government, will become the pet child. I think we have every reason to hope so. The hon. the leader of the Opposition said a few days ago, in the debate on the Address, that he felt it his duty to throw a shadow over the bright picture of sunshine and prosperity that had been presented to the House. I think we ought to hope that it may long remain the province of the hon. member to cast only a metaphorical shade over the prosperity which now gladdens the hearts of the people of the Dominion.

Mr. McINTYRE (King's, P.E.I.) This question has been so thoroughly discussed by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, that I shall say but little more on this occasion. This is not a new subject on the floor of this House. In 1874, when I had the honor of a seat here before, it was a subject of discussion on several occasions. As a consequence of those discussions, the Northern Light was placed on the route between Pictou and Georgetown, and I think that all parties since that time have come to the conclusion that the boat has performed excellent service, both sides of politics in the Island to-day agreeing on that point. Of course she has not accomplished all that we desire, but she has done remarkably well so far as shortening our winter is concerned. She has cut off three or four weeks on each side of winter, both spring and fall. This year, unfortunately, navigation closed very early in the season; in fact, large masses of ice were drifting down from the north-east at the very time our lakes and rivers were being frozen. The Northern Light does very well in the fall and spring of the year, as long as the ice is loose. But an experience of six or seven years shows that we require a better service, and we shall expect to see all these improvements effected which hon. gentlemen have suggested. We shall expect that the hon. gentlemen who now govern the country will make such improvements in our communication as the people of the Island may justly ask for. I have long been of the opinion that Pictou is not the proper place for the boat to go. I think Cape George is a much better place, because there is open water between the Island side and that Cape; however, I understand that the breakwater there has been destroyed, so we must depend on Pictou, for a while at least, as the mainland port. What we require now is a large boat, in fact two of them, to make our winter communication what it ought to be. We also require more attention paid to our summer communication in the eastern and southern sections of King's County. One of the Fishwick boats now calls at Murray Harbor. I believe she should also call at the Port of Souris, from which, in summer, a large quantity of canned fish and other freight might be shipped. For several weeks of the year it is very difficult for any ship to get through the ice between Pictou and Georgetown. In the present year the 10th of January was the last occasion that the Northern Light made any attempt to cross. As far as the branch railway is concerned, I think, as the money has been appropriated for that purpose, the branch ought to be constructed, because in the dead of winter this will be our only means of communication to and from the New Brunswick shore. For that reason we have every right to expect that the Government will go on with the construction of that railway. In fact from what we saw last summer, when the elections were in progress, we expected the branch would be completed before the elections were over. I have always contended that we should have improved communication in that direction. It is impossible for the people much longer to suffer the present inconvenience; in fact, we are no better off now than when we entered Confederation. In connection with this, I must say that whatever favors the Island received from the Liberal Administration, for the last four years at least, no attempt whatever has been made to improve the service of the Northern Light. I am sure that the House must have been surprised to learn from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat that the Northern Light was built for the St. Lawrence River. This is the first time I have heard of it. There are one or two gentlemen from the Island in this House who were here in the spring of 1876, and they will remember that that boat was built expressly for the Island. The model was approved by the members who were then in this House. She was built expressly for the service in which she was then engaged. I quite agree with the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) who spoke first on the Opposition side of the House. I think it would be useless at this stage to ask for a committee of enquiry. A committee of enquiry can only result in further delay, and we do not want any further delay. What we want now is the immediate construction of the branches, and the immediate construction of two boats to take the place of the Northern Light, as she is getting old and worm-eaten, and will not be able to drag out more than a year or two more. I am surprised that any hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island can come to this House and approve of the National Policy with the present condition of the Island staring him in the face. We were never in a worse condition, within our recollection or within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant, than we are just now. A great deal of the misery and poverty we now suffer, and the exodus of our young men, are due to that policy. Emigration has never been so large as it has been this last fall and summer. There is nothing on the Island for the people to do. I think that the motion of the hon. member for Queen's (P. E. I.) is scarcely sufficient, and I therefore beg leave to move the following amendment:—

That the following words be added at the end of the said motion:—
"also copies of all instructions issued to the Agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department at Prince Edward Island, relating to the running of the Northern Light during the present season, and all correspondence on that subject."

Mr. HACKETT. The question referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Queen's is one of very great importance to Prince Edward Island. It is not a new question; it has been discussed by Parliament, within my knowledge, every Session for the last four years, and the representatives of the Island have availed themselves of every opportunity to have it fully discussed. At the time of Confederation great inducements were held out to the Island to enter into the Union, tempting offers were made, but they were all rejected by the people for the simple fact that owing to our isolated position and our being shut off from the mainland during four months of the year, it would be quite impossible to consummate the Union. They said it was impossible to expect that we on the Island, having to contribute large sums for the construction of public works on the mainland, could enter the Canadian Confederation unless the Island was placed in continuous communication with the mainland. To meet their views on this question the following clause was inserted in the Terms of the Union. I will read it to show there is no reservation whatever in the clause:

"Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion."

I want to show how this has been carried out. The service may be divided into two branches, the summer and winter service. The same boats are running in summer as were running in 1873 at the time of the Union—there has been no improvement at all. I believe the subsidy has been increased, but there has been no improvement in the means of communication. The services are performed by an Island company, and I do not want to say a word in disparagement of the company; they have performed the work to the best of their ability, their boats are well manned and the officers are obliging and courteous; but the trade has overgrown the accommodation provided by the company during the last four years the National Policy has been in force. The result has been, as was predicted by hon. gentlemen at present occupying the Treasury benches, that there has been an increased volume of trade in the Province. I am very happy to state that such has been the result with respect to Prince Edward Island; the volume of trade has increased immensely during the time the National Policy has been in force, and in consequence of that increased trade the Government should be called upon to afford additional facilities for the purpose of carrying on that trade. We, in Prince Edward Island, are not in a position to embark to any great extent in manufactures; we are an agricultural people; but we are benefiting by the growth of manufactures in other Provinces—by the erection of sugar refineries at Moncton, Halifax, and other centres, and of cotton factories at Moncton, St. John and elsewhere—and it will doubtless be the policy of the Government, in carrying out the system of protection and fostering the manufactures of the country, to afford the agriculturists of Prince Edward Island facilities to develop in like manner and allow them the means of taking advantage of the markets created by the National Policy. The hon. member for King's (Mr. McIntyre) has spoken of great poverty existing on the Island at the present time. It has always been the case that Grits have proclaimed poverty, disaster and ruin, but I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend coming from Prince Edward Island should have proclaimed the opinion that the people of the Island are in want and misery. Such is not the fact. Let me show what has been the result of the National Policy in the county I represent. In 1878 the exports from the port of Summerside in Prince County to other ports of the Dominion, not foreign exports, amounted in value to $136,940. In 1882 the value had increased to the enormous sum of $466,415, or an advance of 300 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES. Of what did the exports consist?

Mr. HACKETT. I am very happy to inform the hon. gentleman that they consisted largely of the agricultural produce of Prince County. In 1878 when we were unable to sell those products in the neighboring Provinces we were obliged to seek a foreign market, but now we are able to sell them in Moncton, St. John, Halifax and other rising towns in the neighboring Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and are not obliged to seek a market abroad. Without dealing at greater length with this branch of the subject I may state, in relation to the Port of Summerside that being in Prince County and contiguous to the neighboring Province it will be the port from which this trade will be carried on, and I hope, from the fact that there is a good harbor at Summerside, and that the railway runs down to the water, and that there is a good harbor at Point Duchene in the other Province, and that the Intercolonial runs down there, the Government will place on that route better means of communication than at present exist. Those boats, while suitable for the service eight or ten years ago, are not adapted for the present trade. We want better boats. It has been stated that freight was lying on the wharf. The people have been unable to obtain facilities for transport, and the consequence has been great loss to them. Although I do not want to say anything disparaging to the Island Navigation Company, it must be remembered that the interests of the whole people are greater than those of a private company, and I hope before another year has passed, if the present company will not enter into a contract for carrying on the service more satisfactorily than for the last few years, the Government will call for tenders, and offer a sufficient subsidy to any company that will provide satisfactory boats to perform the service. I do not think that I need say a great deal more with regard to the summer route. I shall now come to the winter service, and I may say with reference to this question, that it has been discussed at some length in this House during the last four years and more. At the time when we entered the Confederation—as I have just read—it was stipulated, that continuous steam communication, winter and summer, should be maintained at the expense of the Government of the Dominion between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Well Sir, that clause in the contract was hailed with delight by the people of Prince Edward Island. They said: "Now, we will get into a new groove; we will take a new departure; "This will mark a new era in the history of Prince Edward Island." And they accepted with great readiness the Terms of Union; but what has been the fact—so far as the winter service is concerned? There has been no change with the exception of the Northern Light, to which I will refer a little further on; and as has been shown, there has been no change in the summer service; everything has remained in the same state. The crossing at the Capes is performed by little boats, which are hauled across the Straits of Northumberland, a distance of nine miles. This was the system which prevailed fifty or sixty years ago. There has been no improvement. I do not censure in this relation one Government more than another. With regard to the Cape crossing before we entered the Union, the men who lived at the Capes kept up the communication for mails and passengers, in mid-winter between the Island and the mainland; and were it not for these men—and such men are not found frequently—we would be shut out altogether, at times, from communication with the mainland. These men have spent their lives at this work; they have become worn out in the service, and still we find them doing this important work, and I think that the least the Government can do, is in some way to improve this communication. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Jenkins) has stated that he had an interview with the leader of the Government, with respect to this service. I may say that I accompanied him on that occasion, and owing to the very friendly and courteous manner in which we were received, and the inducements which were held out, I am very certain that before another year elapses—it is too late to do anything this season—the communication at that point will be improved. With regard to the Northern Light winter service, my hon. friend of the Opposition (Mr. McIntyre) stated that the Northern Light had fulfilled in great measure the Terms of the Union; but, I contend that she has not done so. No; there has been no fulfilment in this respect of the Terms of the Union. The hon. gentleman makes the statement that she was built expressly for this service. Nothing is farther from the truth. I have it from the gentleman who built her, the late Mr. Sewell, of Quebec, that she was intended for the navigation of the lower St. Lawrence, and not at all for the Gulf, when the late Government came and took her off his hands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT. That is the fact. Mr. Sewell stated to me—he has since said—"He advised the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Government at that time, to lengthen her twenty feet; she was too short, and not heavy enough to contend with the ice in the Gulf. She was too light and too short; she required lengthening for twenty feet; but they would not consent. They said that they were going to try her. It was a mere experiment, and in the meantime they would make a trial of the vessel." What?

Mr. HACKETT.

It was only an experiment? An experiment with the people of Prince Edward Island in the carrying out of the Terms of Union! Why, Sir, I say that no greater insult was ever offered to a free people. Why should they experiment with us? It was no experiment to cross such a body of water in mid-winter. It is well known that on the coast of Newfoundland, in their seal-fishing expeditions, they go through hundreds of miles of ice, heavier than is encountered in the Straits of Northumberland. Why, if they really wished to carry out the Terms of Union, did not the late Government bring one of the sealing vessels, which would have been suitable for the service, and put her on this route? They should not have trifled with the people of Prince Edward Island, by making any experiment at all. They should have taken the course I mention; and had they done so, we would now have some practicable service. But they did not do so. They sent down the Northern Light, which, as every person who knows the record of the vessel is aware, cost this country $60,000 or $70,000 before she reached the Island. Her first attempt was a failure—a most ignominious failure. It was supposed that she would pass through three feet of green ice; but, as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Jenkins) has stated, she would not go through six inches of soft and one foot of heavy ice. At that time she had actually to be cut out. She has done a little better since, I am willing to admit; but I contend that she has not fulfilled the Terms of the Union with respect to steam service. On the other hand, if the late Government had not placed this steamer on that route—had they been wiser, instead of buying such a vessel as the Northern Light, and putting the contract in the hands of a political friend, thereby being guilty of political corruption—but had invited tenders and said: "We will invite the world to come and build a boat for this service," then the people of Prince Edward Island would have thanked them and declared that the late Government were willing to carry out the Terms of Confederation. But instead of pursuing this reasonable policy, they took a cockle-shell off the hands of a friend of theirs and used it for this service. It has now cost this country $120,000, and it stands in the way of securing better winter communication with Prince Edward Island. Now my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Jenkins) has made some reference to the captain of this vessel, but her captain in 1878, as you will remember, Mr. Speaker, is the same captain who now commands her; there has been no change. I saw in the office of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries a telegram from her captain, in which he said that he had gone out from Georgetown to cross over the straits to Pictou, but after being two days out he encountered very heavy ice and was obliged to return to Georgetown. The Minister telegraphed in reply: "Use your own judgment, and cross the straits when you think you can do so." This was the order given. This captain has been in that vessel since she was placed on the route, and if he had a better ship, there is no doubt at all that he could make the crossing regularly. In the Northern Light, however, he has been in danger of his life, since he placed his foot in her; and he is often afraid now to cross the straits in her. We all know that, two years ago, in a letter published in the press it was stated that the Northern Light was the most dangerous ship afloat; and can it be fairly said that this vessel, which has been sent to the people of Prince Edward Island, is fairly carrying out the Terms of the Union. I regret very much that she was placed on the route at all, for if she had not been put there we would have had a better ship on the route before this. My hon. friend from Queen's County (Mr. Davies) is in very great dread lest the railway to Cape Traverse was not going to be completed, in connection with the Prince Edward Island Railway; and he wants to make it appear that it was merely a political dodge, on the eve of the September elections, that promises were made in this particular. He stated that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government telegraphed last year, previous to the local elections, that the subject of railway communication with the Island was under consideration, making the insinuation I have mentioned. Well, Sir, I am happy to state that I can corroborate the telegram which was sent down to us by my right hon. friend last year. The members who represent Prince Edward Island, the Senators and almost all the members from the Island sitting in this House, signed last fall a memorial and sent it to the Government, requesting them to take up this matter of steam communication; and it was at that time that my right hon. friend telegraphed with regard to this subject that it was under consideration. I am happy to find, as the result of its having then been under consideration, that $189,200 were placed last year in the Estimates for the building of a branch railway to Cape Traverse. This will show that the Government is sincere in the matter and intends to carry out the Terms of Union; but the great trouble was, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Prince Edward Island themselves could never agree on a route for the road. One party in Souris desired thus to connect Souris with Cape George; another party favored Charlottetown in this relation; another Cape Tormentine; another Cape Traverse; another Summerside; and in the district of my hon. friend from Northumberland it was desired that it should run to Point Escuminac. They could not agree upon a route, and it comes with a very bad grace from the hon. gentleman to charge the Government with dereliction of duty in the matter. Last year a meeting of the people of Queen's County was called at Charlottetown to discuss this question. It was presided over by the high sheriff, and was intended to afford an opportunity of laying before the Government the wants and requirements of Prince Edward Island. Several gentlemen attended that meeting and made good, sensible, and practical speeches. The hon. gentleman who sits beside me made a good speech, and the hon. Mr. Brecken also delivered a sound, practical address. Another gentleman was called upon to speak, by the name of Louis H. Davies. In a report of the meeting in an Island newspaper I find it stated that this gentleman was repeatedly called upon, but with becoming modesty he did not come forward for some time. The meeting took place on the first of February 1882—just one short year ago. What were the views of Mr. L. H. Davies at that time—a gentleman who has been Premier and Attorney General of Prince Edward Island, and one who has been in public life ever since Confederation. The report says:

"Mr. L. H. Davies after repeated calls came forward and said he was never backward in expressing his opinion upon a subject he understood; but with respect to the subject under discussion he would very much rather remain a listener."

This, Mr. Speaker, was just a year ago, and notwithstanding the important positions which the hon. gentleman had held in the Island, he did not sufficiently understand the question to express an opinion upon it, and he said, with becoming modesty and reserve, that he would prefer to be a listener. To-day he is the raging lion from Prince Edward Island on the floor of this House. He says the Government should have done this work long ago, though according to his own statement he did not sufficiently understand the question one year ago to express an opinion upon it. This is of itself sufficient to exonerate the Government from all blame.

Mr. DAVIES. Read the whole of it.

Mr. HACKETT. Yes, I will read the whole of it, for the hon. gentleman's speech on that occasion was a very short one, a fact which I regret in the interests of his Province. He said:

"It certainly seems very advisable to have railways to the Capes, and money is no object nowadays.

"A VOICE—If that is the case, we had better have the tunnel at once.

"Mr. L. H. DAVIES thought, however, that there were some considerations in connection with the proposed improvement. If the Capes railways are constructed, shall we also have daily communication in summer, between Charlottetown and Pictou. Shall we have, what we greatly need, viz., better boats than those at present in use. Suppose the routes by way of Cape Traverse be adopted, what is to become of the other route? Are the statements of a correspondent of the Examiner of this evening true? To lengthen the distance to travel by the narrow gauge railway would he thought be a mistake. He could not rid himself entirely of sectionalism, and he asked how will the proposed change affect the interests of Charlottetown?"

Here was the sectional feeling cropping up—how would it affect Georgetown or Charlottetown or Summerside?—and that feeling is one thing that has weakened and hampered the Prince Edward Island members in this Parliament. I am happy to say, however, that on the present occasion the people of the Island are united, and they say they want a strict fulfilment of the terms of Confederation. I have already said what I think the Government should do—that they should give the additional facilities for exporting the produce of the Island in the summer time. We should have a railway built to Cape Traverse. My hon. friend has advocated a point other than the county line as the place of junction, but for my part I think the county line would be the best in the interests of the Province. It is the shortest way between the two leading points of the Island; it shortens the mail route between them, and it is important to have the shortest possible route for the road. I wish to say that when we stand up in this House to look after the rights of our Province, we are not in the position of mendicants or supplicants looking for favors. I was astonished to read that in the Legislature of Quebec the other day, the leader of the Opposition speaking of the financial relations between the Island and the Dominion, said the Island had sought many favors from the Dominion, and was still clamoring for more. No statement could be further from the truth. We have not received any favors from the Dominion. We have confined ourselves strictly to the letter of the law; and this question of steam communication, winter and summer, has been neglected to the great injury of the Province. Our Province has a fertile soil, capable of yielding as much agricultural produce to the acre as any other in the Dominion; we have a good climate and an energetic, industrious and active people. All that we require in order to place these products in the markets of the neighboring Provinces, is this winter and summer communication; and I hope the Government, before any great length of time elapses, will place us in direct and continuous communication with the mainland and so render our people contented, prosperous and happy.

Mr. CASEY. I do not know that this question should invariably be treated as one of interest only to the people of Prince Edward Island, for I venture to say that it affects the people of the whole of Canada, though perhaps not to as large an extent as those of that particular Province. They have no market for their produce during the winter, but on the other hand we lose the benefit of selling to them, because an Island containing an industrious population of 120,000 must be of very great importance to us from a commercial point of view, and especially to the infant manufactures we are endeavoring to foster in every part of Canada. I have another reason for taking part in this debate besides the fact that the question concerns the whole of Canada as well as Prince Edward Island, and that is that a general political element has been imported into the discussion by some hon. members who have taken part in it. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has attempted to cast a great deal of blame on the late Government because of the manner in which they dealt with the question. He says that they were experimenting with the people of Prince Edward Island, because they tried to open up communication with the Island upon the present system. I would like to ask how, in the name of all that is peculiar, they could determine whether or not the plan was practicable, unless they tried an experiment? They were not experimenting with the people of Prince Edward Island but with a particular build of steamers. Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be experimenting with the people of the Island in trying to find out how long the Conservatives of the Island will remain content without winter communication, with a Conservative Government in power. Their experiment however may be terminated very soon, because I believe the people of that Province are not in the habit of suffering grievances without grumbling, and when they do grumble they are simply performing their duty not merely as citizens of the Island but as British subjects whose prerogative it is to grumble. The hon. member for Prince County says the Northern Light was not built for this service. Well, Sir, he admits that it was built for winter service in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and hence for similar conditions to those to be met in the straits, and it was finished with special reference to the needs of the straits. It was designed and built by experts in such matters. I ask what better experiment could be made for winter navigation what more likely to succeed, than to take a vessel so built and try to use her for several winters in the straits? The hon. gentleman said that if competition had been invited from the world, tenders obtained, and better steamers put on the route, communication might now be open. Well, Sir, his friends have been in power for four years—why have they not got better steamers? Why have they not carried out their pledges and kept the communication open? Simply because they are making an experiment with the people of Prince Edward Island. I think, however, that my hon. friend who opened this debate need not be so anxious about the carrying out of this pledge, because he has the former pledge of the hon. Minister of Railways—given, however, while in Opposition—to carry out these Terms. In a debate in 1876 on this matter, the hon. Mr. Tupper is reported to have said:—

“I do not say the service ever will or can be done by anybody, but I say that the Government of Canada are pledged to the people of Prince Edward Island, to use all the means in their power to establish this service, and until every means is exhausted, whether it succeeds or not, the Government will not have fulfilled that pledge. * * * I do not say it is possible for the Government, by any policy they can adopt or by any efforts they can make, to bridge the Straits of Northumberland in the winter season, but I do say, in the Terms of Union, the Government and Parliament of Canada have bound themselves solemnly to accomplish that object. * * * Then the hon. gentleman will see it is still more necessary to prove it is impossible to do it before we can be relieved in the slightest degree of the obligation we have undertaken, and show we have not been guilty of bad faith.”

Now, Sir, they have not shown that it was impossible. An experiment has been made, not by them, but by the Liberal Government. An effort has been made to bridge these straits, and it failed for the time being. Does that show that it was impossible? That was the attempt of a lot of “blundering incapable Grits” who were not supposed to know anything about such matters. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had four years in which to see whether it was possible or impossible, and they have not made any attempt to decide the matter. One would think, from the hon. the Minister of Railways portentous eloquence in 1876, that he would have made the thing possible, and then have done it; but up to the present time he has done nothing. Under these circumstances, it is not the people of Prince Edward Island alone who should grumble, but the people of Canada who are separated from them by the failure of the Government to carry out their pledges. There was another consideration which should lead us to think that they would do so. It was part of the Terms of Union with British Columbia that a railway should be built to connect that Province with the rest of the Dominion. We have seen how millions of dollars have been spent to carry out this agreement, and it is reasonable for the people of Prince Edward Island to demand that similar efforts should be made to secure connection with the far more important Province of Prince Edward Island.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, and other documents, respecting the appointment of a Postmaster at Scottsville, in St. John's County, Province of Quebec, from the date of the resignation of Daniel Salt, up to the present time.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

Copies of all Order in Council and the Commissions issued to certain persons, in connection with claims made on the Government, arising out of the construction of the Intercolonial Railway; of all instructions to and correspondence with the Commissioners, and Statements of the matters referred to them so far: and of the remuneration to be paid to them and the Secretary of the Commission; Statement of the number of days during which the Commission has sat so far.—(Mr. Blake.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 20th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the University of Saskatchewan, and to authorize the establishment of Colleges within the Diocese of Saskatchewan.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Révérends Pères Oblats de Marie Immaculée des Territoires du Nord-Ouest.—(Mr. Royal.)

Bill (No. 20) to empower the National Insurance Company to wind up its affairs, and relinquish its charter, and to provide for the dissolution of the said Company.—(Mr. Coursol.)

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that, in obedience to the Order of the House made yesterday, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is in attendance at the Table, with the Returns of the last Election for the Electoral District of King's County, P.E.I.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I suppose these documents, or at all events as many of them as are necessary to a clear understanding of the circumstances of the election in King's County, P. E. I., will be printed. I wish to state to the hon. the First Minister, that I purpose following up my motion of yesterday with such a resolution as, in my judgment, the facts, when we shall have mastered them, will warrant. I understand there are some complicated and difficult questions involved in the case, and it will be important, in the interests of the House, in order to understand the position, the duties, and responsibilities of returning officers, that the matter should be fully discussed. I purpose moving this other resolution at an early day—perhaps to-morrow if it suits the convenience of the hon. the First Minister, but if not to-morrow I shall be glad to move it any day he may see fit to appoint.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to communicate what his motion will be?

Mr. CAMERON I am not in a position to say what form the motion will assume because I have not read the papers. I suppose such of them as are necessary will be printed to-morrow, though it is certainly not necessary to print all the papers which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may as well tell the hon. gentleman, as he does not appear to have made up his mind as to what motion he will move, that I have made up my mind as to what the motion should be, and, unless he does so, I shall move that the question shall be submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CAMERON. When does the hon. gentleman purpose making that motion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The matter is in the hon. gentleman's hands as I understand.

Mr. CAMERON. So far, I may say it is, but I do not care to move the resolution in the present condition of the House as the discussion will probably be one in which almost every lawyer will desire to take part. At present nearly all the legal members of the House from Ontario are absent. Perhaps some day when these hon. gentlemen will be in their places would suit the convenience of the Government—say some day next week.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Any day the hon. gentleman fixes.

Mr. CAMERON. Supposing we say Wednesday or Thursday week?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Thursday week.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to this matter it certainly will not be necessary, so far as we can judge from what the public newspapers have informed us, that all the documents contained in these large bundles should be printed. I suppose they mostly contain the voters' lists, which are quite immaterial. Perhaps Mr. Speaker would have no great difficulty in directing that the relevant papers should be printed. I presume that the return made by the returning officer with the papers transmitted with it, and a portion of the voters' lists, are all that will be necessary for the purpose of a preliminary discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree that Mr. Speaker should look through the papers and select what really is relevant—what really would be the subject of discussion in the House or Committee.

Mr. DAVIES. As the return does not state the sum total of the votes polled, the respective papers with the totals might be printed along with the return.

Mr. SPEAKER. Some motion must be made that the papers be read, or taken as read, otherwise they will not appear on the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the papers submitted by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery be now read.

Motion agreed to.

COLLECTION OF SEAMEN'S WAGES.

Mr. O'BRIEN, in moving the discharge of the order for the introduction of the Bill respecting the collecting of seamen's wages, said: Permit me to say that the Bill to which the motion refers was drawn by an hon. gentleman fairly conversant with the subject, but on asking the opinion of those who were interested in the legislation of last Session, I find that, so far as I am able to judge, the legislation of last Session was quite sufficient for the purpose I had in view in introducing the present Bill. I ask, therefore, that I may be allowed to withdraw the Bill.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

CANADIAN CONSOLIDATED FIVE PER CENT. LOAN.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (February 16th) to provide, by raising a loan, for a sum or sums of money required to discharge the Canadian Consolidated Five per cent. Loan, &c.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The resolution which is now about to be considered by the Committee is one that requires very few remarks from me, further than a statement of the circumstances which I think render it desirable that the resolution should pass. In 1860, a loan was issued amounting to £6,446,636 2s. 9d. sterling, under the authority of the Parliament of Canada, for the purpose of consolidating a certain portion of the debt then existing. That loan was issued bearing five per cent. interest payable at the will of the Government in twenty-five years. The twenty-five years expire on the first of January, 1885, and it is considered desirable to ask Parliament at this Session to give authority for the issue of debentures for its redemption, not bearing interest above four per cent. per annum. It is true that some time has yet to elapse before the Government will be in a position to redeem them without the assent of the parties holding them; but a considerable portion of the five per cent. debentures which are redeemable in 1885, are held by Insurance Companies and others, who will very likely wish to re-invest in Canadian securities, though it may be at a lower rate of interest. Under these circumstances, it has been considered expedient to ask Parliament for the authority to issue debentures at any time that may be considered most in the interest of Canada, for the redemption of these consolidated five per cent. debentures, or at least to substitute for a portion of them debentures bearing interest not exceeding four per cent. An arrangement was made recently with our agents in London, by which they have undertaken to reduce the rate of commission and to make this exchange previous to January, 1885, and it is very probable that satisfactory arrangements may be made to redeem one half of this debt before that time. If so, we should have to place upon the market a smaller amount, which would probably bring a larger price than if we placed the whole sum proposed in this resolution, namely, $24,651,176.16. A portion of this loan has been to a considerable extent redeemed by a sinking fund which we have for this class of securities, which, on the first of January last, amounted to £1,381,325 15s. 3d., leaving the amount to be redeemed £5,065,310, against £6,446,636 in all. The resolution asks for authority to issue these debentures at a rate of interest not exceeding four per cent. It will become a question with the Government, when these are issued, whether it is desirable to continue the four per cents. at a lower rate of interest; but the provision is that it is not to exceed four per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state the rate of commission which has been agreed upon with the agents.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Upon whatever amount is exchanged between the present and the first of January, 1855, they will receive one-half per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it proposed to enter into private bargains with the holders of the five per cent. securities to exchange them for others at a lower rate?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not proposed to do that. I think that the course we may have to adopt is to give notice that the securities would be exchanged for others at not more than a certain rate; then we would have proposals from parties, who would name the rate they would accept, which might or might not be lower than our minimum.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman considered whether it would not be in the interest of the country to alter somewhat the arrangements as to the sinking fund? The late hon. member for Centre Huron once or twice called attention to that subject, and it does seem to me to be a suggestion worthy of consideration. Our sinking fund accumulates very rapidly, and it seems to me that the credit of the country is such that we might negotiate a loan with a smaller sinking fund, but at a longer period than we have been accustomed to do. I would also like to ask whether the hon. gentleman has thought of establishing permanent consols without any sinking fund at all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman will see that the authority asked in this resolution is the same as that asked in connection with previous loans, and enables the Government to issue consols, if they think proper, payable in the currency of the Dominion as well as in English currency. There is no doubt a great deal to be said in favor of that mode of dealing with the question. There is also much to be said in favor of dispensing with the sinking fund. But, on the other hand, our agents in London, when I discussed this question with them on the occasion of my last visit, were of opinion that, as almost every Colonial security was floated with provision for a sinking fund, our securities would not bring so high a price without a similar provision. In that way we might lose more in one direction than we would gain in another. Though it is a question worthy of consideration, up to the present time, I think the weight of argument is in favor of our having a sinking fund. The amount of the sinking fund is also worthy of consideration. Some of the Colonies have had large sinking funds. We have paid some loans of British Columbia, of which the sinking fund amounted to more before it was due than the loan itself. Under such circumstances a large sinking fund is decidedly objectionable, but it does give increased value to have a sinking fund of at least one-half per cent., payable yearly.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not suggest the entire extinction of sinking funds, but I think the experiment of reducing the sinking funds is one that might, perhaps, be tried, though considerable enquiry would have to be made before we proposed such a cardinal departure. It is one thing to dispense altogether with a sinking fund, and another thing to keep up such a large sinking fund as we have; and if we have got immediately afterwards to issue other securities in order to redeem it, it becomes still more onerous.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 21) to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money required for the Public Service.

Bill read the first time.

FRONTENAC TERRACE.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) said: Mr. Speaker, my object in moving for copies of all papers and documents relating to the cession of several lots of land, and especially of the one on which Frontenac Terrace, in the City of Quebec, is now erected, is this: It appears that several lots of land belonging to the Imperial Government had been promised to the Federal Government, and that, on the faith of these promises, the Federal Government had subsequently made over these lands to the Provincial Government. At Quebec, especially, there is the lot upon which Frontenac Terrace has been erected. Subsequent to the cession of this ground by the Imperial Parliament, the Federal Parliament divided them into first and second classes. The first class comprises the lands generally useful for the defence of the country, which may be called lands of the large domain, or that cannot be alienated. The lands of the second class can be alienated. Now, Frontenac Terrace in Quebec forms part of the first class, and cannot, therefore, be alienated; hence the Federal Government would have had no right to transfer to the Provincial Governments more than they themselves received from the Imperial Government. A company having recently been formed in Quebec, with a large capital, to build an hotel on the spot, and it being their intention to commence operations at an early date, it is important that such works be not commenced by the company upon land which may not belong to them, nor to construct a building which could be demolished by the military authorities as soon as built. It is in order to verify these facts that I ask that all papers and documents in this matter be laid before the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). The papers asked for by the hon. member will be supplied. Nevertheless, I think I should state that the Government have submitted the case to the Minister of Finance, to know whether a transfer of the land in question has been made by the Federal Government in favor of the Government of the Province of Quebec, and whether the latter Government have power to transfer the same to a company, as stated by the hon. member. This question is still under consideration; but the documents will, ere long, be laid before the House.

Motion agreed to.

ORDNANCE LANDS OR NAVAL RESERVES.

Mr. O'BRIEN, in moving for statement showing the gross amount of receipts arising from the sale or leasing of Ordnance Lands or Naval Reserves, in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, from the 1st day of July, 1856, to the 1st day of July, 1882, and the purpose to which the sums so received have been applied; also a statement showing the several properties of which portions have been sold or leased, and the number of acres in each case, said: In laying this motion before the House, I would like to call the attention of hon. members to the conditions upon which these lands were granted, with a view to enquiring whether or not those conditions have been fulfilled under the various Governments who held office since 1856, so that the information might be laid before the House before the Militia Estimates come down. The Estimates, I trust, will be framed on a scale commensurate, not only with the growing prosperity of the country, but also having a due regard to the wretched, inefficient condition of affairs as regards material and equipment. In 1856, an arrangement was entered into between the then Parliament of Canada and the Imperial Government with reference to certain lands which were held by the Imperial Government as reserves for various military purposes. Under that agreement the Government undertook to provide for our internal security. It is important to remember the extent and value of these lands, as well as the condition. I find, on looking into the schedule of the Act that there were no less than 60,000 acres of land, a great portion very fertile and valuable, conveyed to the Provincial Governments under the agreement I have mentioned. I cannot find that any information has been laid before the House-a similar nature to that for which I have asked, but in 1872 a similar motion was made. The returns were, however, not brought down, owing, I suppose, to the lateness of the Session. In 1857, a return was laid before the House of a sale made in Toronto of lands from which a sum was realized a little short of $100,000. The conditions I have mentioned certainly did give rise to the inference that the lands were acquired upon these terms, and I think there was an understanding at the time of Confederation by which those terms were not only ratified, but carried still farther. When these returns come down I think we shall be able to judge whether the Government of that day and the Governments that succeeded it have fulfilled the conditions upon which this valuable property came into their hands. In fact the history of these lands is almost the history of our transactions with the Imperial Government at the various stages by which we have risen to our present position. In 1856, a portion of these lands thus held were reserved for military purposes, because the Imperial Government then maintained garrisons at Quebec, Montreal and other places. Subsequent to Confederation these lands, which were then vested in the Imperial Government, were entirely made over to this country, because at that time we undertook our own defence. So that at every successive stage of these negotiations the responsibility has increased, and for that reason we are still more strongly bound to see that that understanding has been properly carried out.

Motion agreed to.

COLONIZATION LANDS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in the absence of Mr. CHARLTON, moved for a return showing the total number of applications for land for colonization under Plan Number One of the Land Regulations of December 23rd, 1881, up to January 1st, 1883, with the names of the applicants, the date of applications, and the quantity of land in each case applied for; also, for a return showing the total number of applications for land for colonization under Plan Number Two of the Land Regulations, of December 23rd, 1881, up to January 1st, 1883, with the names of the applicants, the date of application, and the quantity of land in each case applied for.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not object to this motion, nor do I object to the other motions of the same hon. gentleman which I see upon the paper. At the same time, I must say that the expense and labor involved in the preparation of these returns will be enormous, and I suppose the hon. member must take the responsibility of the expense in asking for them.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose they are worth the money or the hon. gentleman would not request the returns.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return showing the total number of applications for land for colonization under Plan Number One of the Land Regulations issued by the Department of the Interior, December 23rd, 1881, where conditions have been complied with, and grants made, or applications agreed to; together with the names of the parties to whom such grants have issued, or whose applications have been agreed to, the date of such application, the quantity of land granted to each applicant, and the location of the same, the amount of money received and the total amount of land granted, up to January 1st, 1883.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return showing the total number of applications for land for colonization under Plan Number One of the Land

Regulations of December 23rd, 1881, where conditions of payment have not been met, and where an extension of time has been granted, with name of applicant, date of application, date of extension, period of extension, location of land applied for, quantity of land in each case applied for, total quantities of land for which such extensions of time have been granted, total amount of money to be received upon the same and total amount of first instalment paid, or payable upon the same.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return giving copies of all regulations issued by the Department of the Interior concerning the management or sale of agricultural lands, mineral lands, timber lands, pasture lands, and town sites, since December 23rd, 1881.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return showing the total number of acres of public lands surveyed in Keewatin, Manitoba, and the North-West Territory, during the year 1882, and the cost per acre of such survey; also, a Return showing the total number of acres of public land previously surveyed and the cost per acre of such survey.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return showing the total number of acres of public land sold during the year 1882, the number of parties to whom such sales were made, the average price received and the total amount received from sales.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return giving every form of patent arrangement, or agreement between Companies and the Government in regard to Colonization grants, the date of issue in each case of such document, the name of the Company entering into the agreement, and the character of the agreement in each case entered into.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Correspondence in reference to the removal to Richmond, Halifax, of William D. McCallum, Chief Train Despatcher at Truro, covering a period extending from the 1st day of September, 1881, to 7th December, 1881. 2. All correspondence from 7th December, 1881, to 25th March, 1882, touching his removal to Truro, N. S., and being offered an inferior position, and the recommendations upon which the same was decided upon. 3. All correspondence from 25th March, 1882, to date of his final dismissal on 5th September, 1882, and subsequently, if any. 4. All correspondence from James Coleman, Superintendent at Truro, touching the promotion, dismissal, or degradation of the said W. D. McCallum, and also the correspondence of others to D. Pottinger, Esq., Chief Superintendent at Moncton, correspondence touching the same to Sir S. L. Tilley, correspondence from D. Pottinger, Esq., to C. Schreiber, correspondence from C. Schreiber and others to Sir Charles Tupper, all in reference to the same. All recommendations and reports from any persons touching the dismissal or degradation of the said W. D. McCallum to the various Heads of Departments. The reports of all investigations touching the same.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Statement containing the names and residence of all the Militiamen of 1812 who received their pensions during the last fiscal year—as well as the sum given to each of them.—(Mr. Bourassa.)

STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the motion is carried I wish to point out to my hon. friend that, although we allowed the Address to pass with great rapidity in order that public business might be expedited, none of the Government measures have been brought forward in this House, though I observe that in the other Chamber the Government, with commendable diligence, have submitted two or three measures. When may we expect the Franchise Bill and the License Bill to be brought down? The Standing Committees were struck some days ago, but we have not received any call for organization, and during this time of calm and peace, when there is very little to do, the Public Accounts Committee might perform some useful functions if the members were called together.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As regards the Public Accounts Committee, those hon. members who follow the standard of my hon. friend would not be present, and I am afraid justice could not be done to the investigation of the Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 21st February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 23) to further reduce the Capital Stock of the Quebec Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Manitoba and North-Western Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Sutherland, Selkirk.)

Bill (No. 25) to amend the Acts respecting Cruelty to Animals.—(Mr. Richey.)

NAVIGATION OF LITTLE BEAR CREEK.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B.C.), in the absence of Mr. SMYTH, enquired, What is the intention of the Government respecting certain improvements to the navigation of Little Bear Creek, in the county of Kent?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government is not in a position to answer the hon. member to-day.

TWO CREEKS HARBOR.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B.C.), in the absence of Mr. SMYTH, enquired, What is the intention of the Government respecting Two Creeks Harbor, in the county of Kent, and the work to be done there upon the report of the Engineer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have not the data in the Department, but an examination will be made during the recess in order to obtain the information required, to decide whether the work should go on or not.

VETERANS OF 1812 WOUNDED IN ACTIVE SERVICE.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant to the veterans of 1812, belonging to the Province of Quebec, and wounded on active service, a sum equal to that paid to the veterans in the same class belonging to the Province of Ontario?

Mr. CARON (Translation). In answer to the hon. member, I have the honor to say that this subject is now under the consideration of the Government.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT OF 1874.

Mr. DUGAS (Translation) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend, this Session, "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874?"

Mr. BLAKE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I have to say, in reply, that this subject is under the consideration of the Government.

MILLING WHEAT IN BOND.

Mr. WHEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, at an early date, to amend the Order in Council regulating the importation of United States wheat in bond for milling purposes, so as to allow the equivalent in Canadian wheat or flour to be exported to cancel such bonds?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not the intention of the Government to amend the regulations in the direction the hon. member proposes.

VITAL STATISTICS.

Mr. LESAGE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to render the vital statistics more effective, more regular, and more general; and if so, whether they intend to increase the grant over the amount voted last Session?

Mr. POPE. It is the intention of the Government to render vital statistics more effective, more regular and more general. The latter part of the hon. gentleman's question is under the consideration of the Government.

GRINDING IN BOND.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all Orders in Council and Departmental Orders, not already brought down, on the subject of grinding in bond, or of the regulations for grinding in bond, or for the import of wheat and flour of United States growth or manufacture; also, for all correspondence with the authorities of the United States, on the subject of the transport of Canadian wheat into or through the United States, and of all regulations of the United States Customs authorities affecting such transport. He said: I am not aware whether there are any Orders in Council, or Departmental Orders or regulations not already brought down. Some regulations were made at a remote period for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of Canadian wheat from one part of Canada to the other, and also with reference to Canadian wheat sent into the United States to be ground in mills at Minneapolis and elsewhere. I observe, also, that very lately some Orders have been issued changing the practice in two of the border towns in the North-West. It is important that we should know precisely what are the regulations affecting this question.

HON. JOHN O'CONNOR.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of any sums paid to the Hon. John O'Connor since his retirement from office, with dates and particulars; also, a copy of any paper showing the arrangement on which such sums were paid, said: It was stated in the newspapers that some arrangements had been made with Mr. O'Connor since his retirement—owing, I regret to learn, to serious illness—for his employment in the Government service in some capacity, and that he was in the receipt of a salary in that capacity. I am entitled to know how that is.

Motion agreed to.

RECORDS OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement, from the Records, of the Elections to the present House of Commons, showing the number of votes polled for the respective counties in the several Electoral Districts and in the various sub-divisions thereof, together with the number of ballots rejected and spoiled in each sub-division, at the last General Election, and also at each election held subsequently thereto up to date; also; the number of electors on the electors' lists, together with the population, as shown by the last Census, of every such sub-division; also, a statement in each case in which a recount or re-addition was made, showing the changes made in every sub-division and in the district on such recount, with the number of ballots rejected which had been formerly allowed, and allowed which had been formerly rejected in each such sub-division, with the reasons, so far as obtainable, for such rejection or allowance. He said: I presume, as usual, preparations have been made for meeting this motion, and as we are all anxious to get the authentic returns at the earliest moment possible, I would suggest that, should the statement enquired for in the latter part of the motion entail any delay in its preparation, it be made a supplementary statement and furnished separate from the other. I ventured to state, the other day, that very great difficulties had arisen which would demand our most serious attention in the working of the Ballot Act. Amongst them was to be found the disfranchisement of hundreds, even thousands, of electors, upon recounts. It is, therefore, important we should hear what the changes were that were made upon the recounts, and the reasons for those changes. Those reasons may be seen on the surface. For instance, that certain ballots were not initialed or were numbered, and it may be that a statement of the reason for rejection may accompany the ballot. In any such case we want the material as far as obtainable, so that we may understand how it happens so very large a portion of the electors failed to accomplish their object—the recording of their votes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As there may be some delay in the latter part, I would suggest that the motion be amended, making the latter return supplementary. I would also add to the motion a return of the number of voters in the constituency, and whether the election was by acclamation or whether a poll was asked.

The motion, as amended, agreed to.

CONSOLIDATION OF DOMINION STATUTES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement in detail, with dates of all expenditures made in connection with the commission or authorization to the Hon. James Cockburn, Q.C., to consolidate the Dominion Statutes, and copies of the commission or authorization and of any reports made by him on the subject, said: We all learned with much regret, by the announcement made by Mr. Cockburn, in November before last, that his health was such as to prevent him any longer discharging the arduous duties of a member of this House, and consequently resigned his seat in Parliament. Contemporaneously with that, it was announced he had been appointed to do the work of consolidating the Statutes; but I observe, by the Public Accounts now brought down, that that appointment, so far as emoluments are concerned, had preceded the resignation by a period of six months, payments having been made for the whole fiscal year from 1st July to 30th June. The Hon. James Cockburn, it appears, acted in that capacity for that period, though this office had been conferred upon him after he ceased to be a member of the House. It is important we should know what progress is being made in the work, what has actually been done. A commissioner and another officer have been appointed, and both have been paid, but as yet no other proofs of this arrangement have been made visible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There will be no objection to this return being sent down. Mr. Cockburn, as we all know, broke down in his health so much so that he could not remain in his seat. His disease was such, he could not attend here with any regularity, and he has been very much confined to the sofa. This has not prevented him, however, from working earnestly and assiduously in the consolidation of the Statutes, and those who know him will agree that he is a very fit person to be employed in that service. I am glad to say that his indisposition has not prevented his attending to this work. A report will be laid at an early day on the Table of the House showing the progress made in the consolidation of the Statutes.

Motion agreed to.

MANUFACTURE OF GREAT GUNS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copy of contract, correspondence, reports and statement of payments made in connection with the manufacture of great guns for the Government of Canada, said: Some time ago a vote was taken in the Estimates for the manufacture of great guns—I think they were called Pallisser guns, but the hon. Minister of Militia will correct me if wrong, as I am not very well versed in the names of munitions of war—at Montreal for the purposes of the Dominion. Our hon. friend, whom we much feared some time ago, might have been promoted to the realms above, but, we are glad to know, has been only promoted half-way—to that Chamber which occupies the other end of this building—has told us here that he had achieved a remarkable triumph—that he had arranged for the manufacture of great guns, superior in every quality to those manufactured at Woolwich and at a lower cost. Upon that, I suggested to him that it would be well, since he had accomplished these things, that he should propose to tender to the British Government to supply the British Army with those munitions of war which they require, and which, with their inferior powers and capacities, they have been able only to produce at a greater cost and of a lower quality. My hon. friend, however, thought that he would proceed slowly, and that he would conclude a successful arrangement for the making of these guns first, before he followed my advice. I do not know what has been done since about the great guns; I only know what has been said in the newspapers, which sometimes tell the truth, and they say, that there is a quarrel between the contractors and the Government, that the work has not been done, and that there is a law suit going on now upon the subject of great guns. I should like to know what the facts are, and with that view I make this motion.

Mr. CARON. I am very happy to see that my hon. friend takes such a deep interest in this matter, and it will afford me great pleasure indeed to give him all possible information. The papers will show him the names of the contractors, and will also establish, I believe, that my predecessor, the hon. Mr. Masson, is not to blame for anything which may occur. The contract so far has not been carried out, and the Government took measures to protect itself against any loss.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the hon. gentleman has not made those arrangements with the British Government that I suggested.

Mr. CARON. Not yet.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNING OFFICERS IN THE GENERAL ELECTION OF 1882.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a list of the returning officers appointed for the General Election 1882, other than registrars or sheriffs, and the occupations and residences of such officers, and a list of the sheriffs and registrars for the districts in which such other returning officers were appointed, said: It has been stated that "it was only in cases where the Government knew, and were morally or legally convinced, that the persons who would officiate as returning officers would be unworthy of the trust, that the Government made any other selection ;" and, once again, it has been stated that it was only when the Government "knew, from the character of the men and their positions, that they could not be free from sinister, clandestine and improper influences," that they took other and better men. These statements have been made with reference to the cases in which the Government departed from the rule which had been formerly established by law, as to the choice of returning officers in the late Election. I need hardly say that this is a serious aspersion upon the character of every one of those persons, because it is said of every one of them that no change was made except in cases where the Government had been convinced that they were unworthy of confidence, and would act in a manner inconsistent with their duty. I desired to say, with reference to one returning officer whom I have known for a number of years, and whom I think the hon. gentleman has known much better for a great many more years—I mean the Registrar for the West Riding of Durham, for which county I sit here—that that statement, so far as it is based upon any facts known to the public, and upon any facts known to the electors of both sides of politics in that constituency in which he had officiated as returning officer for all the elections with which I am conversant, is not correct as applied to him. His political proclivities are very well known, they are those of the hon. gentleman himself. He never was a friend of the Liberal party, but it was the good fortune of the constituency of both sides of politics, I believe—certainly of the Liberal party—to be always able to say at those elections, that he had acted with perfect fairness and impartiality; and I desire to say, that I have heard nothing which would justify those imputations on the character of Mr. Armour, or on those other persons to whom the hon. gentleman has referred in that condemnation, without exception or qualification, to which he subjected them all, upon the occasion I have mentioned. It is important that we should have a list of those unworthy sheriffs and registrars, because I think, if they are unfit to be returning officers, they are unfit to be either registrars or sheriffs, or to fill any other position of trust or confidence in any shape or sense, directly or indirectly, in the government of the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to granting this motion. With reference to the language which the hon. gentleman has quoted, I would wish it to be understood that I pass no general condemnation, or specific condemnation, upon every registrar or sheriff who was not appointed. I certainly did not desire to say so. I believe there is a good reason for every case in which that rule was varied from. With reference to Mr. Armour, the Registrar for the West Riding of Durham, certainly I had no intention of passing any condemnation upon him. Mr. Armour is a gentleman I have known for a great many years, and always esteemed; and I believe he is, so far as he has any political predilection, a Conservative—or used to be at all events before he held office, and I have no reason to suppose he is not so yet.

Mr. CASGRAIN. While we are upon this subject of returning officers, I would remark that I think the hon. leader of the Government, in making his choice of those officers, forgot the report made by a former House in 1867 as to the returns made by the then Registrar for the County of Kamouraska. He was declared, by the report of a Committee of this House, unfit to be a returning officer, and, so far as I recollect, nothing has occurred since that time which would lead us to believe that he is better fitted to fill that duty now than he was at the time he was censured by a former House.

Mr. SCRIVER.. It seems somewhat difficult to reconcile the words which have fallen to-day from the lips of the hon. leader of the Government, with those which he uttered on two previous occasions, and which have been quoted to-day by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I desire to say that a change has been made in the county I have the honor to represent, which I found it difficult to account for in anything that took place before the close of the last Parliament. The gentleman who occupies the position of Registrar in my county, and who has acted as returning officer for many years past, both in the Local and in the General Elections, was not appointed returning officer at this time, and no reason that I can imagine ought to have influenced the Government in making the change that was made. That gentleman has always acted with the most perfect impartiality. He has not been in any sense a partizan. Politically he has been in sympathy with the Administration of the present day; and I feel bound to say that the gentleman who was appointed in his place acted in quite another spirit to that which would have animated his predecessor in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. BLAKE. I was very glad to hear the hon. gentleman's disclaimer, since the case was brought to his attention, of any intention to make a complaint against the Registrar of the West Riding of Durham; but I find it, as the hon. member for Huntingdon has said, a little difficult to reconcile that statement with the observations which induced me, I frankly say, to make this motion to-day, because there was neither exception nor qualification in the use of the very strong and cogent language which the hon. gentleman used in criticizing the conduct, the trustworthiness, the fitness, of those whom he stigmatized, because he did stigmatize them by not appointing them on the ground he stated the other day. As we understand now from the hon. gentleman in this particular case, and as we will understand after a while from some other hon. gentleman, there was no impropriety of conduct, and no reason to cast any blame at all upon the officers. We had a pledge from the Administration, during the progress of that Bill through the House last Session, that unless there was a reason to cast blame on the officers, the Government would not depart from the rule, and would still—though not with that security of tenure, and security therefore of independence which the Statute gave—would still, of their own good will and pleasure, appoint the persons who formerly held an official title to this duty. As we find the hon. gentleman has no imputation to make, and says the registrar has acted as returning officer on many previous elections, and acquired a full knowledge of the duties which devolved upon him, and of the capacity of the sub-officers, and, therefore, was able to make a fit choice, and conduct the election regularly, I want to know why the change was made. As it was not that there was anything wrong with the registrar, as he was competent, impartial, and experienced, was it in order to get somebody who would be incompetent, partial, and inexperienced? If it was, I admit the hon. gentleman accomplished his purpose; I admit that was the result on this occasion of the change. Why, the person whom he appointed to be returning officer for the West Riding of Durham, knew so little—anxious, though I dare say he was, to discharge his duties—of what his duties were, that he was for half an hour in a state of painful suspense on nomination day as to whether his duty would not require him, and would not call upon him imperatively, to reject my nomination paper. Why? Because there was the word "honorable" at the beginning of my nomination paper, and "esquire" at the end of it; and it was not until a sort of legal pressure by the agent of my committee who presented the nomination paper, it was not until argument after argument had been advanced, that this exceedingly impartial, intelligent and capable gentleman, who was substituted for the Registrar of the West Riding, was prevailed upon to accept the nomination. He looked at the Statute. The Statute said nothing about "honorable." He looked at the Statute again. It said nothing about "esquire." He doubted whether that did not invalidate the nomination, but he was persuaded to the contrary, and I sit here because he was persuaded to the contrary. I advise the hon. gentleman another time when he is about to give a character under a little gentle phrase, to a registrar whom he knows, not to throw away dirty water before he gets clean, and to be satisfied that the change will be an improvement before he makes such an experiment as he has done on this occasion. I will not go into the other consequences. They might have been tolerably serious, and had my majority been a little less than it was, they might, with the change which the hon. gentleman was pleased to make, have relieved him from the pain of hearing me at this moment. I do think this is a serious question. As I say, we were told, when the Bill passed through the House, that except in case of necessity arising from their being incompetent and improper persons, the registrars would be retained. We are told, to-day there is no cause of complaint against the Registrar of West Durham; it is admitted that he belongs to the same political stripe as the hon. gentleman, and that he possessed experience, capacity, and impartiality. He was, however, changed, and another person appointed. It is, therefore, evident that the pledge which the Administration gave to the House last Session, was, on this occasion, violated, and I do not, and cannot, understand why the change was made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As to the pledge of which the hon. gentleman speaks, the pledge or statement was simply this: that, as a general rule, the officers usually employed as returning officers would be retained. That general rule was carried out, with particular exceptions, and the West Riding of Durham, which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, is one of them. At all events, it cannot be said that the change was made for the purpose of putting in a political friend. The hon. gentleman states that the registrar was a political friend of this Government, and his successor, I presume, was of the same politics; but I do not remember—I do not really remember, who he really was. It is quite clear that the returning officer decided that the hon. gentleman was eligible; in the next place, he decided that it was proper for him to return the hon. gentleman; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that, though he wishes to show the House that great was the desire of the Government to appoint new men, we would have been greatly disappointed if the hon. gentleman had not been returned—I will not say for West Durham, but as a Member of Parliament—to represent a constituency in this House. He has complained of the returning officer who took time to consider, although the result of his consideration was that he decided that the hon. gentleman, not only in name but in fact, had the right to claim the suffrages of the people, and he obtained the suffrages of the people. There could be no complaint, therefore, that any wrong had been done either to the electors or to the hon. member.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman seems to draw a wide distinction between a statement and a pledge. He made a certain statement to us, last year, as to what would be the course of the Government with respect to this matter, and he wishes us now to understand that his statement as to the intentions of the Government is by no means always intended to be a pledge, which is a point worth bearing in mind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Mr. CASEY. In regard to this particular case of West Durham, the hon. gentleman says the officer was not to blame for having followed the example of the Government by taking time to consider. It was no harm to take such questions as the use of "honorable" and "esquire" into serious consideration, but he might have kept them under consideration too long, after the time required either for declaring the nominations closed, or for returning a member by acclamation. But the hon. leader of the House goes further, and says it was not in order to put in a political friend, that some other person than the registrar was changed on this occasion, because Mr. Armour was also a political friend. It may not have been in order to put in a friend as returning officer, but it may possibly have been done—I do not insinuate that it was, but still it is open to that suspicion—to put in a political friend as member for that constituency. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman leaves us almost no room to doubt that the changes made generally in the returning officers, whatever may be the case in this particular instance, must have been done for the purpose of giving some advantage to Government candidates. He has stated that in the case of West Durham, at least, it was not due to any lack of competency on the part of the old returning officer that the change was made. The hon. gentleman had nothing against him. The same will be said in regard to other sheriffs and registrars, that they were not appointed returning officers, for the Government will not directly insult them by saying that they were not competent. The man chosen, instead of the sheriff or registrar in each case, must have been more desirable, for some reason or another, than the man whose experience in this sort of work had extended over many previous elections. He cannot have been more desirable on the ground of experience, because he had had no experience as a general thing. He cannot have been more desirable on the ground of impartiality in most cases, because very often those instead of whom he was chosen were Conservatives, and he was not, therefore, likely to be more impartial. Can it be possible that he was chosen, in many of these cases, instead of the sheriff or registrar, because he was more likely to be partial to the Government candidates? I think that this is quite possible; and I do not hesitate to say so. I think that this possibility, moreover, is borne out by the facts. These returning officers, chosen for this particular Election, have been most forward in assuming to themselves judicial functions which are not generally assumed by returning officers, or not generally supposed to belong to them; and not only did they assume judicial functions, in some instances, but what might almost be called legislative functions. They were a law to themselves in many cases with regard to the rejection of ballots and the total vote polled in certain places, when this happened to tell against some particular candidate by whom they were appointed. And this brings me to the worst point in the whole business: although appointed by the Government, as a matter of form, there is no doubt that in most cases—if not in all—they were really appointed on the nomination of the Government candidate, at whose election they were to act in the character of quasi-judges. They officiated altogether in the character of judges in some cases, because they assumed to act with judicial powers. I say it is a very serious, dangerous and improper thing, that a candidate soliciting the votes of the electors, should be allowed to select the man who is to act as a judge on the fairness of the election, on the qualifications of those who voted for or against him, and the regularity of the poll in every sub-division. It is an extremely serious thing that this should be done; it is an extremely serious precedent to be established; and it is a still more serious thing, Sir, that the Government have not seen fit yet to give any general reason for introducing this change, and for breaking on the established usage of many years, other than the general statement once made, and now being retracted piecemeal, that the sheriffs and registrars in these particular cases were not fit for the position.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman who has last spoken has talked about returning officers exercising legislative functions. Of course, I presume that he alludes to gentlemen who acted on the Conservative side. But I will call his attention to a case where returning officers, and even deputy returning officers, were appointed by gentlemen known to be Reformers, whom the Government did not think fit, as they held the official position of registrars, to replace by an officer recommended from their own party, and I will tell you what they did. The hon. gentleman talks about legislative functions, but in many constituencies these officers created two or three classes of voters, who, under the present law, were not entitled to vote at all. They gave votes to Indians residing hundreds of miles away from the constituency, and these votes were counted against me; they gave votes also to unenfranchised Indians in the constituency, who had never before cast a vote at all; to river-drivers and to raftsmen who did not own a foot of land. Talk about legislative functions. Why, the hon. gentleman who talks so much about this, who has brought up the question of the conduct of returning officers, and on whose remarks the inference of wrong-doing on the part of gentlemen, as having been appointed by the Government for partizan purposes, might be drawn, could in this particular case well enlarge the sphere of enquiry into the conduct of returning officers in whose integrity the Government had placed perfect confidence in Muskoka; and he might extend his remarks to the manner in which his own friends there conducted the election, where they had everything in their own hands, and the votes of Indians, living hundreds of miles from the constituency, were accepted and were recorded, and returned as legitimate; and the same thing was done at Carey Island, where some seventy-five unenfranchised Indians were accepted in spite of protests, while the special franchise, under the Free Grant Act, was allowed to their lumbering friends, who brought down their river-drivers and raftsmen, who did not have the least interest in the country, and recorded their votes: If the subject is to be enquired into, and if the charge of illegality is to be thrown into our teeth, it will be just as well that the House and the hon. gentleman himself should understand, that if such things were done they were not by any means confined to those against whom the charge is insinuated. In the case I have mentioned, illegal acts were committed, without even an attempt at concealment, by the hon. gentleman's own particular friends and partizans, in the part of the country which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. COCKBURN. I did not happen to be in Muskoka during the last election; but it is very true that the returning officer there was the Registrar of the District. I understand that so many Conservatives were applicants for the position, that the Government found it difficult to decide between them, and therefore they made that gentleman the returning officer. The election was very close, the majority consisting only of one or two votes. It was just a question whether certain ballots were good or not; and the returning officer, a Liberal, very properly returned the hon. gentleman who now represents the constituency, as he had the majority of votes, though his majority was small—only two or three. Now, with respect to the deputy returning officers there, I can say nothing; however, I think that, if improper votes were cast, the scrutineers of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) were at fault. They should have challenged these votes; and if these parties could not show that they were on the voters' lists and entitled to vote, they should have been sworn. It is true that there are two classes in the franchise for the Electoral District of Muskoka, relating to the unorganized townships, and the ordinary lists in the former, as in Algoma, are allowed to vote—householders twenty-one years of age. I think it is necessary that the question of the Indian vote ought to be settled, and the Government could easily arrange that matter. The Act says, that British subjects, twenty-one years of age and householders can vote. There are some Indian families, who, I suppose, are regular British subjects—Indians are generally looked upon as minors in this country—but it has so happened that some of them have been allowed to vote. I do not know that the Indian vote was all cast on one side. I think that my hon. friend, in 1878, solicited the Indian vote; but, in this case, the Liberal candidate was popular among the Indian population, and therefore it may have been divided to a certain extent. I think that the returning officer, who appointed the deputy returning officers, performed his duty; and if anything is wrong, I consider that it is the Election Law and the regulations relating to the franchise. I only make these few remarks in justice to the returning and deputy returning officers of that constituency mentioned.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has referred to me, I would remind him of what he perhaps has forgotten: The position in which his case is before the Election Courts. While he waves the flag here, and asks the House to make an enquiry into the conduct of the election in his constituency, there is a tribunal to which this Court has delegated such enquiry—in which tribunal, however, the hon. gentleman does not seem very anxious to bring the case to an issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I suppose that the hon. gentlemen opposite have no objection to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey)?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE. That the correspondence with reference to the parties nominated returning officers be sent down.

Motion agreed to.

THE CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF QUEEN'S BENCH, MANITOBA.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence with Mr. J. A. Miller, late Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, Manitoba, prior to his appointment relating to his becoming Chief Justice of that Court, and subsequently to his appointment, on the subject of the resignation of his office, said: It has been stated to me upon authority which I believe to be accurate, that correspondence took place with Mr. Justice Miller, which he has communicated to many persons, anterior to his appointment, by which an understanding was reached that he should become Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench as soon as that office should become vacant, which was expected at that time to be at an early date. I am sorry if any such arrangement was made, because it seems to me important, with reference to all offices, and important most of all with reference to offices of the character of these judicial offices, that those who are entrusted with the very grave responsibility and power of nominating to those offices should be perfectly free to nominate those persons who are best fitted for the positions at the time when the vacancies arrive, and that no engagement should be made in advance as to the promotion of any particular individual, upon an indefinite or uncertain contingency, to the highest place on the Bench. It has been stated, also, that Mr. Miller conceived himself aggrieved because he did not become Chief Justice, or obtain a higher salary, and that a considerable period before the acceptance of his resignation he tendered his resignation on the score that faith had not been kept with him; that he was not treated as he should have been treated, and that that resignation remained in the hands of the Government, or the hon. Minister of Justice, until the sudden death of the Chief Justice of the Province rendered that high office vacant. It is stated that upon the occurrence of that event the resignation of

Mr. Miller was attempted to be withdrawn by telegraph; that although it had not been previously accepted it was considered that this occasion should be taken for accepting it, and that it was accepted at a period which has been named as the first of January last—to take effect on that date; that subsequent remonstrances were made by Mr. Miller that the acceptance of his resignation under these circumstances—when that long-looked for and much desired event took place, when the dead man's shoes were ready—was not fair; that these remonstrances were received without the attention to which he thought they were entitled, and on the first of January he ceased to hold office. It seems to me that if this state of things prevails—if there were these antecedent negotiations or arrangements—if there were arrangements in respect of which Mr. Miller deemed himself to be unfairly treated by the Administration which appointed him, and if the resignation sent in on that score some months ago and not accepted, only after the event occurred which made it possible to fulfil the alleged engagement, it would be interesting to see how these things were brought about, and, therefore, I move for the correspondence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would answer no good purpose to discuss this question until the papers are brought down. I will only say that Mr. Miller resigned his office, but did not wish to vacate his seat at once, and a future day was appointed—a day named by himself. At the time he expressed his desire to retire, he stated that he had received an offer of a guaranteed salary much larger than would be governed by the salary of a Puisné Judge or that of a Chief Justice. Upon that the resignation was accepted, and I have no doubt that he was quite satisfied, because he has gone into politics since.

Mr. BLAKE. Only so far as to be defeated.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER LICENSES.

Mr. BLAKE, in the absence of Mr. CAMERON (Huron), moved for a return showing the total number of timber licenses applied for and granted or refused up to 1st February, 1882. 2. The estimated area covered by each license or applicant. 3. The amount of premium or bonus per square mile, and in the aggregate paid to and received by the Government on each such license. 4. The name and residence of each applicant for a license. 5. The date of such application of such license, and the number of years each license is granted for. 6. The Crown dues or stumpage charged or chargeable on each license. 7. The kind, quantity and quality of the timber in each area so licensed. 8. Copies of all claims made on the Government for any such area or timber by any persons, and of all petitions, remonstrances or communications sent or made to the Government respecting said areas, licenses or timber, and all correspondence had with the Government respecting such claims, or in any way respecting said areas, lands, licenses or timber and the action of the Government therein.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I took occasion, the other day, to call the attention of the House to the reckless manner in which returns were moved for. When a number of returns were moved for by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who is not now in his seat, I said that the responsibility must be thrown in a great measure on the mover for returns of this kind. It is difficult for Ministers to object to returns of this character, as it might be said that they were desirous of withholding information from the House; so, as I remarked before, it depends very much on the discretion of the hon. members to move for them whether he will take the responsibility of causing the expense to be incurred, which is involved in preparing these voluminous returns. In this case I got the usual memorandum from Mr. Burgess, the Secretary of my Department, as to this motion, and I shall just read his words. He says:

"There is no objection to furnish the information asked for by Mr. Cameron, but there is not the slightest probability that it can be brought down during the present Session. It means, in fact, that we should furnish a greater part of from 1,500 to 2,000 files in the timber branch."

The expense of this work would be enormous, and, unless the hon. gentleman has some specific object in incurring it, it shows a want of regard to economy to move for such extensive returns. However, as this information may be of importance, if the hon. gentleman takes the responsibility of moving for it, I shall not take the responsibility of refusing it.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, it is very difficult for us, who do not know the contents of these papers, to judge what is important and what is not. We have a system which we believe to be unsuited to the condition of affairs, and to be at any rate liable to very great abuse in its administration. I am not now saying that it has been abused, that is irrelevant; but, certainly, a system by which the timber limits of the North-West are to a large extent granted under the discretion of the Government, is, the hon. gentleman must admit, liable to abuse. The one security the public have—I am afraid not a very great security—is the full disclosure of what goes on, or as much as public records tell them. We know that the public records do not tell us all that goes on, do not tell us what we would like to know about these things, do not tell us what might affect the decision of the hon. Ministers on these matters, but they give us some information. As to the 1,500 or 2,000 files which the Secretary says are to be copied, it will be observed that all the first parts of this motion are for information which seems to be absolutely necessary, at any rate—for schedules, a list of names, a list of areas, a list of premiums, &c. There surely can be no objection to granting that information unless it be to save the expense of the clerks writing it. What involves the clerical labor the hon. gentleman speaks of, I suppose has reference to the latter part of the motion—for correspondence, &c.—and it may be that some arrangement can be made to mitigate the expense of that demand. But if it is going to take more than the whole Session to make the return, it is quite clear that it will be impossible for any hon. member to wade through it and ascertain what is in it. I would, therefore, suggest the adjournment of the debate until the return of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron), in whose name I made the motion, and who will consider, I have no doubt, whether it is possible for him to reduce the voluminousness of the return. I may add, what the hon. gentleman has already been reminded of this Session, that returns with reference to colonization companies, land sales, and other North-West matters, ordered at the commencement of last Session, have not yet been brought down. The whole of last Session and the whole of the recess has been available for the preparation of these returns, and I hope the time has been used, and that we may expect these papers at a very early period. It is true, some expense is involved in giving the House the various kinds of information asked for, but it involves matters of enormous magnitude pecuniarily, as well as important questions of policy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to this matter standing over. The hon. gentleman says truly that the policy of the Government respecting the sale of lands and the leasing of timber limits may be subject to abuse. It is just because it may be liable to abuse, and because I think no abuse has occurred, that I at once assented to the motion. The hon. gentleman having taken the responsibility of moving for all these returns, I thought it my duty to call the attention of the House to the great expense which their preparation would involve; but, under the circumstances, I said I would not take the responsibility of refusing the motion, feeling that the House should be fully informed with respect to the administration of territorial affairs in the North-West.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. gentleman is very strong on the subject of expense; but I am sure that the preparation of the return this resolution calls for would not incur any very serious expense. There are a large number of extra clerks employed during the Session for the very purpose of preparing these returns, and the bringing of them down just depends upon how hard these men are worked. It would not involve any considerable expense if the whole return were brought down; but even if it did, it would be very little compared with the importance of having the information. The right hon. leader of the Government says very truly that members are often very inconsiderate in moving for returns; but members have to work to a certain extent in the dark. They do not know what information is in the Department that they need, and they have not always an opportunity to get that information unless they have heard of somebody on the other side of the House. The whole of this trouble arises from the vicious system of not bringing down these returns as a matter of course. All such information should be laid before the House in the form of an annual report. In regard to ordinary expenditure, in regard to the business of this House and the different departments, we get returns in careful detail. We get the details of every messenger's salary and every small expenditure, but in regard to such transactions as those which involve much greater interests and larger sums we get no information unless we move for it, and in moving for it we are to a great extent in the dark. We ought to get information in detail with regard to the management of timber licenses, Crown Lands and colonization companies as well as in regard to trade and navigation.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. DAWSON moved for a return of all information obtained through reports from officers of the Government, correspondence with the Imperial authorities, or otherwise, in reference to the duration of the season of navigation at Hudson's Bay, showing, in so far as has been ascertained, the dates at which the Straits are sufficiently open to admit of the passage of steamers or sailing vessels, the soundings, so far as taken, and the extent to which the Bay freezes over, whether wholly or only to the distance of a few miles from the shores; also, of all reports and documents bearing on the probable resources of Hudson's Bay, showing approximately the numbers and value of whales, seals, walruses and porpoises annually captured in its waters, whether the rumors as to the abundance of codfish in various parts of the bay have been authenticated, and what rivers on its eastern coast are the best adapted for the industry of salmon fishing; also, of all reports on the mineral resources of the regions about Hudson's Bay and the islands therein, showing where coal has been found and in what sections the ores of iron, copper and lead, as well as of the precious metals, are known to occur; also, a map of Hudson's Bay and Straits with all the latest surveys set down thereon. He said: Though this appears to be a very formidable motion, calling for so many things, it will be observed that I call for information. I do not attribute much importance to bringing down lengthy documents and all that sort of thing; but, I think, a synopsis of the information contained in those documents would be quite sufficient, and among so many able young men as there are in the Department of the Interior, I have no doubt some one could compile all the information required in a very short time. About four years ago, the Department issued a very interesting pamphlet on Hudson's Bay, giving much valuable information. It would be well if something of the same kind were issued again. A great deal of interest is now being attached to that inland sea, from the fact that railways are projected in different parts to reach it. It would be important to know in what season vessels can enter the bay and how long the bay itself is navigable. The information we have goes to show that it is navigable for a very long period, fully six months at least, but that the straits are sometimes blocked. It is the straits that form the difficulty in going into the bay, but when railways reach the bay this will be done away with. Supposing that vessels were in the bay with people engaged in fishing or other industries, they might remain there to winter, and in spring the bay would be accessible, and the whale oil, seal oil, and the different articles of produce of the bay, could be sent out by rail. Professor Bell, who was employed by the Government to explore the bay, says:

"I have a record of the principal phenomena of the seasons at Martin Falls, on the Albany, extending through a period of fifty years. From it I find that the river is open there on an average for six months of the year. I have also a record of the date of the opening and closing of Hayes River at York Factory, extending over more than fifty years, from which it appears to enjoy an average of fully six months of open water. The Nelson River is open for a longer period. I think with these facts before us we need not despair of successfully navigating Hudson's Bay as far as the length of the season is concerned."

This is very important information. Further on he says:

"Both bay and strait are remarkably free from rocks and shoals, which might interfere with their free navigation. The groups of islands near the east side of the bay are surrounded by deep water and a wide channel leads up the centre of James' Bay. Fortunately the main body of the bay, which is the portion likely to be hereafter frequented by shipping, is entirely without shoals, reefs or islands. The depth is very uniform over most of the bay, and nowhere does it present any great irregularities. It averages about seventy fathoms of water throughout, deepening to 100 and upwards in approaching the outlet of Hudson's Strait, while in the strait itself the soundings along the centre vary from about 150 to upwards of 500 fathoms. The bottom appears to consist almost everywhere of boulder clay and mud. Near the shore a stiff clay affording good holding ground for anchors is almost invariably met with on both sides."

From all this it appears that the navigation of Hudson's Bay is quite practicable as regards the bay itself, and that it is open for no less than six months in the year. When these railways are completed the resources of the bay will be available to this country at large, and it is very important we should know what those resources are. We know that sometimes vessels winter there in open water. We know that whale fisheries are prosecuted there, that the porpoise fisheries have been worked there for many years by the Hudson's Bay Company, and that oil is exported in considerable quantities. Seals, and in the northern part walruses, are very abundant, and the seal oil and skins, and the ivory of the walruses are very important articles of commerce. It has also been pretty well ascertained that codfish are abundant in Hudson's Bay. Were the railways completed to the Bay a wide field would be opened to the enterprise of the people of this Dominion accustomed to fishing, of whom we have a large population in the eastern part of Quebec and in the Maritime Provinces. There can be no doubt now, from the reports of Professor Bell and others, that codfish abound in Hudson's Bay. Again, salmon are to be found in all the rivers, except those in the south of James' Bay, both on the east and west coasts of Hudson's Bay. At certain seasons of the year with the exception I have mentioned, the rivers are alive with salmon. It is said they are as abundant in many rivers as they are in the rivers of British Columbia. It is easy to understand what an opening this affords to establish a trade with the Hudson's Bay, a trade which would come across the land through Canada, and give employment to a great many of our people. It is not alone in fisheries that the resources of the bay are very considerable. I will read a short passage from the report of Professor Bell in regard to its minerals—a report taken from a work of his which was published in England. He says :

“Minerals may, however, become in the future the greatest of the resources of the Hudson's Bay. Little direct search has as yet been made for the valuable minerals of these regions. I have, however, found a large deposit of rich iron stone on the Mattagami River, inexhaustible supplies of good manganiferous iron are on the Islands near the east main coast, and promising quantities of galena around Richmond Gulf, and also near Little Whale River, where a small amount had previously been known to exist. I have likewise noted traces of gold, silver, molybdenum and copper. Lignite is met with on the Missinabe, gypsum on the Moose, and petroleum bearing limestone on the Abitibi River. Small quantities of anthracite, and various ornamental stones and rare minerals, have been met with in the course of my explorations. Soapstone is abundant not far from Mosquito Bay, on the east side, and iron pyrites between Churchill and Marble Island, on the west. Good building stones, clays and limestone exist on both sides of the bay. A cargo of mica is said to have been taken from Chesterfield Inlet to New York, and valuable deposits of plumbago are reported to occur on the north side of Hudson's Strait. Some capitalists have applied to the Canadian Government for mining rights in the latter region.”

Now, Sir, here is a detail of mineral wealth which offers a prospect of a vast trade arising with the Hudson's Bay country in the future. On the banks of the Moose there has been found lignite coal, and I believe coal of the carboniferous period exists in the islands toward the north end of the bay. It is, in fact, said to be found in unlimited quantities. Again the mica which is referred to here is said to be the very finest in the world. A specimen of it was taken to New York where it was cut into sheets as large as panes of glass, and as transparent. The plumbago, which is referred to, also seems to exist in very large quantities. Now, Sir, when we have a sea like this, with all these great resources, when we consider that these resources from all that can be learned, are not very accessible from the ocean, but which will be easy of access from this country when railroads reach the bay, when we consider the effect that this will have upon the Dominion and the vast field for enterprise which it will open up, I think that something should be done towards not only opening up and developing communication with the bay, but to ascertain definitely what the resources are. We should have further information on these subjects. I think a survey might be made at a very small cost. The resources of the bay are not confined to minerals and the fisheries, but there are good agricultural lands very near Hudson's Bay. The southern end of James' Bay is south of the latitude of London, England. Professor Bell has stated, in his report, that on the 23rd September, at Moose Factory, he found the tobacco plant quite green and untouched by frost. This is not a climate where nothing can grow; I believe there is a very good climate about James' Bay, and on the rivers leading down to it there is a considerable extent of good land, as well as a great deal of valuable pine timber. Now, all this pine will become available sooner or later. I may also say that there are immense grassy flats on the banks of some of the rivers flowing into James' Bay. On the Albany River for instance, there are marshes extending for considerable distances in which a great amount of hay can be cut. The Hudson's Bay Company have cut hay in these marshes for a number of years and has supported large herds of cattle with it. This feature of the country would evidently be of great advantage to agriculturists going there; and the climate, as I have said, is not unfavorable to farming operations. I think, altogether, we should know something more of this great inland sea, and that we should take means to have a good survey made of it. Why, Sir, two hundred years ago nearly as much was known of that sea as there is now. Both the French and the English sent their fleets there. The discussions on the boundary question have brought all that early and very interesting history to light. It is known that battles were fought there, that large vessels—seventy-four gun frigates, I believe—have navigated that sea, and it has a history which is very interesting to both the French and English population of this Dominion.

Mr. ROYAL. I rise with much pleasure to second the motion of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). We are not only neighbors in this House, but our constituencies adjoin; in fact, I believe the hon. member should be known as a member for one of the counties of Manitoba. The needs of this large district are of the same nature as those of the Province of Manitoba, and his interesting speech adds another chapter to the record of the unlimited resources of Manitoba and the Great North-West Territories. The importance of this question cannot be over-rated. It has attracted the attention of this Government for many years. In 1876, I believe, Mr. Selwyn brought the subject under the notice of members of the Dominion Government, and recommended that a survey be made of Hudson's Bay as well as of the straits. In 1878, the hon. leader of the Government included in his Report of the Department of the Interior, a report by Dr. Bell on the subject, and it is within the memory of a considerable number of hon. members of this House, that during the debate which took place when the Bill for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was under discussion, several hon. members maintained that the opening of communication between England and the North-West Territory, by Hudson's Bay, was one of the principal means of preventing a monopoly by that railway. Later, the hon. member for Algoma again drew the attention of the House to this important matter. This question has also awakened interest in England, and, with the permission of the House, I will read an extract from an address delivered by Sir J. H. Lefroy, President of the Geographical Section of the British Association, at the Swansea meeting in 1880. That gentleman said :

“Hudson's Bay itself cannot fail at no distant day to challenge more attention. Dr. Bell reports that the land is rising at the rate of five to ten feet in a century, that is, possibly, an inch a year. Not, however, on this account will the hydrographer notice it; but because the natural seaports of that vast interior, now thrown open to settlement, Keewatin, Manitoba, and other Provinces unborn, must be sought there. York Factory, which is nearer Liverpool than New York, has been happily called by Professor H. Y. Hind, the Archangel of the West. The mouth of the Churchill, however, although somewhat further north, offers far superior natural advantages, and may more fitly challenge this title. It will undoubtedly be the future shipping port for the agricultural products of the vast North-West Territory, and the route by which immigrants will enter the country.”

It will be useless for me to dwell at length upon the importance of the question. Not only will the North-West Territories attract the attention of the world by their unlimited agricultural resources, but at no distant period we may predict, a new Maritime Province will spring up in our system of Confederation. The opening up of a route from the North-West Territories to England via Hudson's Bay, will save all the distance between Montreal and Winnipeg, the distance between New York being, of course, still greater. This great saving in distance represents an important economy in time and money, that is to say in freight and passenger rates; and if the products of the North-West Territories could only be shipped to Europe via Ontario and Quebec, it is evident the greater portion of them would be consumed on that long land carriage; but by having this port on Hudson's Bay, the capability of which is now demonstrated, we will have a distance of about 1,200 or 1,300 miles as compared with the rate by Montreal, and about 1,700 as compared with that by New York; in fact, the farming lands of the North-West will be placed, so far as a seaport is concerned, in as advantageous a position as farming lands west of Toronto occupy at the present time. In view of the advantages to be derived from the establishment of that communication, the subject possesses importance from a national point of view. As regards immigration, this route will have the great advantage of avoiding the long land carriage, and more especially the transit through the United States. On the success of our immigration depends the future prosperity of the North-West. It is well known that emigrants coming from Europe are, to a certain extent, sifted while passing through the United States, and it is only those possessing great energy and capital who push through the States of the Union and reach the North-West and settle there. By having a direct sea communication with England emigrants would be able to reach our shores without passing through foreign territory, and being subjected to the temptations of agents. The people of Manitoba are fully alive to the importance of this matter. This Parliament has already chartered two railway companies to place the farming lands of the North-West and Hudson's Bay in direct communication. The chief engineer of one of the railway companies made a survey last year and reported that no considerable engineering difficulties existed in the way of constructing a line between Winnipeg and any point in Manitoba and the shores of Hudson's Bay. With the construction of these railways, with the surveys that the Dominion Government are asked to make, with the attention which this question is attracting in England, I believe the day is not far distant when, in speaking of the great North-West Territory, we will speak not only of its agricultural resources, but also of the unlimited wealth that abounds in its waters and especially in the inland seas that indent its shores; and I believe that, in the completion of the Pacific Railway and the establishment of the Hudson's Bay route, there is a brilliant prospect for the future destinies of Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. I may mention with respect to the resources of Hudson's Bay, that I have a return showing that the annual value of the catch of the American whaling fleet in Hudson's Bay, for some years, was as follows: In 1863, $177,000; in 1864, $427,000; in 1865, $238,000; and, in 1866, $200,000. Why, Sir, you have in these four years no less than nearly $1,000,000 as the value of the exports; and this only relates to a portion of the products of that region. This shows what we might look for in the future in the event of improved communication with that great sea being opened up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very glad that my hon. friend has moved in this matter, and I am sure that the House has listened with great interest to his speech on this subject. It has not escaped the attention of the Government that there is, in the future, a great prospect of wealth and prosperity being created in connection with the fisheries and mineral resources of Hudson's Bay. I do not know that there is any precise information to be found in our Archives as yet in this regard; but any and every information in this relation at the disposal of the Government, in any of the Departments, will be at the disposal of the hon. gentleman and of this House. There are three railways now procuring Acts of incorporation for the purpose of connecting older Canada with Hudson's Bay: two to Hudson's Bay proper, and one from a point on Lake Superior to Hudson's Bay. These projects are in the hands of gentlemen whose names are guarantees of respectability and wealth, and of enterprise; and the question—and of course the great question of all—at issue as to is the navigation of Hudson's Bay and Straits. I may say, that, at this moment, there are unofficial communications passing between Sir Alexander Galt and the Admiralty, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Admiralty will be willing to enter into some joint arrangement with Canada for the survey of Hudson's Bay and Straits, by putting on this work a vessel fitted out for navigation in the Arctic seas, and arranged to undergo all the casualties to which arctic voyagers and ships are liable; sending her to cruise about in Hudson's Bay and straits, and in the waters approaching the straits, for the purpose of ascertaining beyond doubt the length of time, during which there is a probability every season of these straits and Hudson's Bay being open to navigation. I think it is not at all improbable—in fact, I have some reason to believe that it is probable—that the Admiralty and Her Majesty Government will be prepared to aid in accomplishing this object, either by furnishing a vessel, or by contributing to the expense of such a survey. I suppose, at all events, that this will be the case. The information requested will be brought down. I would, however, ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to communicate with the Departments, both of Fisheries and the Interior, in order to point out the exact information which he would like to get, as he says, truly, it would be inexpedient to make mere copies of reports, some of which are important and some unimportant; but information which would be useful to the House should be extracted from them. I do not say that there is very much information on this subject in our possession—obtained since what we had was laid before the Committee which sat in 1878; but we have some fresh information pertinent to this matter, and this will be furnished.

Motion agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE WHARF AT ST. JEAN PORT JOLI.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) moved for copies of all correspondence relating to the construction of the extension of the wharf at St. Jean Port Joli, County of L'Islet, together with offers made for superintending the works; of appointments, if any; of plans and specifications; of tenders asked for and received, if any; for materials and construction, the whole from the date of the vote to that effect at the last Session of Parliament. He said: Mr. Speaker, my object in making this motion is to find out the reason why the Government have not thought proper to spend the sums voted at last Session for the extension of that wharf. I say that if the Government have thought fit to discontinue the works they had commenced, we are entitled to know the reason. It is very important for the people of the neighborhood to know why the Government have decided to give up the works, which the former were prepared to execute, for the most part, at their own expense. The present wharf is altogether inadequate to the requirements of the inhabitants of that place, and I am convinced that if the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) were to visit the spot, he would easily convince himself of the necessity of the works asked for. Although the Government have for the last two or three Sessions been asked to make those improvements, it was only on the eve of the last General Elections that the sum of $4,700 was placed in the Estimates and voted by the House for those works. It was but on the eve of the Elections, also, that the Government seemed disposed to ask for tenders for the stone and for the construction of the wharf. A large number of the inhabitants would then have been happy to supply the stone required for these works, which they could have taken off their farms, thereby giving them the opportunity of helping in the construction of the works and of improving their property. They have been kept in the hope that these works would be executed until the eve of the Elections; but since, nay, even from the day following the Elections, nothing more has been heard about these works, nor of the timber or cartage of the stone required. The electors wish to know the reason why the Government have discontinued works so urgently required. I do not see much difficulty in obtaining the papers asked for, as they are already before the House; but what I desire above all is that the Government shall declare why they have not employed the sum voted at last Session for those improvements. It may be impossible to improve that wharf; but in such a case the electors are interested in knowing why the Government have not done the work and satisfied the legitimate expectations of the people of that place.

Motion agreed to.

SUCCESSOR TO HIS EXCELLENCY.

MR. HESSON, in moving for copies of any correspondence that may have passed between His Excellency and the Home Government, in reference to the selection of a successor to His Excellency in the high position of Governor General which he now so worthily fills to the entire satisfaction and admiration of the people of Canada, said: It is not my good fortune to know personally the distinguished statesman who preceded His Excellency in the office of Governor General—I refer to Lord Dufferin; but I believe the hon. members of this House and the country will join with me in saying that Lord Lorne has discharged the high duties which devolved upon him, in administrating the affairs of this country, to the satisfaction and admiration of all Canadians. Parting, therefore, as we probably soon will be called upon to part from His Excellency and His Royal Bride the Princess Louise—whose absence from Canada we so much deplore, especially by reason of the circumstance that that absence is caused by ill-health—we may be pardoned if we express some little anxiety as to who the next Governor General of Canada will be. Hon. gentlemen will have seen no doubt that a section of the press of Canada has pointed to a distinguished gentleman in this House as the probable successor to His Excellency. The hon. gentleman to whom I refer, as no doubt every hon. member knows, is the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. But whilst it would give much pride and satisfaction to the members of this House, as well as to the Canadian people, to know that Her Majesty would again mark with Her Royal and distinguished favor this excellent gentleman, still it is too great a sacrifice for the Conservative party which he so ably leads—too great a sacrifice for the country which he has so ably and faithfully served for so long a period, to part with him from active political life at present. I hope, therefore, that these rumors are not true; I hope that there is really no such expectation, even on the part of our worthy friends on the other side of the House, who, I believe, would willingly relegate him to that or any other position that would get rid of him as leader of the great Conservative party. The Conservative party knows his services too well—they value them too highly—to feel very much gratified at even so distinguished a mark of Royal favor as would be conferred upon Canada by elevating him to such a high position. It is somewhat doubtful, Sir, whether the newspapers to which I refer—and I refer, of course, to that portion of the press of Canada which is under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite—would be willing to take back all they have said in the past of the hon. leader of the Government, as to his being untrue to the interests of Ontario, untrue to the interests of Canada, and accept him as our future Governor General without making some very wry faces, if I may be allowed to use the expression. I think that if they are willing to get rid of that hon. gentleman now it would be in the hope that he would not have a successor to lead the Conservative party so admirably as the hon. gentleman has led it. I move for the papers out of no idle curiosity, because it is a matter of great moment to the people of Canada to know who will be their next Governor General. I trust the papers will not be so voluminous as to entail any great expense or delay in preparation, and I trust they will be laid before us at an early day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no correspondence at the disposal of the Government on this subject, which can be brought down. If there be any correspondence between His Excellency and the Imperial Government it will be with him as an Imperial officer, and with that correspondence we have no concern and over it we have no control. I have no doubt that the country and this Parliament will accept any successor that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to send, when we are unfortunate enough to lose the presence among us of the illustrious nobleman who now represents the Queen in Canada. As to what my hon. friend has said about myself—well, I have no aspirations, and even if I had any aspirations, there is not the most remote chance of their being satisfied or fulfilled. I am condemned to the grateful and onerous duty of leading the Conservative party; and, I think, as long as I am in public life, I shall most likely hold that position, whether on this side of the House or on the other is as the people may determine. I think I have pledged myself to the House to move the readjustment, in 1892, of the constituencies in Ontario, and as my hon. friends opposite are very anxious always that I shall carry out my pledges, I shall carry out that pledge; and if I bring down a gerrymandering measure in 1892, of course that would prevent me being an aspirant for the position of Governor General of Canada. Speaking seriously, however, that subject has been discussed in the press, and my name has appeared in the newspapers—I believe, in the first place, instigated by the correspondent of one of the New York papers—and the press of Canada have taken up the discussion, during the summer season, when there was little else to discuss. That subject was fully aired before the time of Confederation; and one of the great advantages we have in Canada, is the advantage we get from the Mother Country, that as the Queen in England stands far above party, holds the balance between parties, and carries out the constitutional principle of choosing her advisers from the people through their representatives, so we have that same advantage in Canada of having a representative of the Sovereign here, standing above and aloof from all parties and holding the balance between them. I think it would be the greatest misfortune—as I expressed it in 1865, 1866 and 1867—should any alteration in that system take place. I should look upon it as proof, and no uncertain proof, that England was not very anxious to continue the connection between Canada and the Mother Country were she to give up the selection of the representative of the Sovereign to come here as our Governor General, who would be quite aloof from all parties and who would belong to neither party. It is in this respect that I think we have a great advantage over the constitution of the United States. The President is elected every four years, and he is the subject of some very energetic writing against him during the time he is a candidate. When he is elected, he is the head of a party, instead of being the head of a nation; and every act of his Government is always liable to censure, and he is, as a matter of course, censured by the Opposition of the day—by those who have not been successful in carrying their candidate. I say it would be a very great misfortune, in my opinion, should the present system be altered. I am glad to believe that there is not the slightest chance of any such change taking place; I am glad to believe that the sense of the importance of the connection between the Mother Country and the colonies is increasing every day and every year in England; and that with our growing importance, our growing wealth, our growing position in the world as an auxiliary nation, the desire to retain Canada as one of the brightest jewels in Her Majesty's Crown, will go on increasing as it has done in the last few years. I am exceedingly obliged to my hon. friend for his kindly remarks respecting myself; but, after this explanation, I hope my hon. friend will withdraw the motion, as there are really no papers or correspondence on the subject.

Motion withdrawn.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of the returns, annual and monthly, made by the Banque de St. Jean, since 1875, to the Government; also for copies of the certificates granted by the Treasury Board to the said Bank on going into operation.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export since March 2nd, 1882, showing the name of all applicants, their places of business, the articles on which the drawback was claimed, and the amount of each claim, distinguishing between the claims which have been allowed and those which have been disallowed and those under consideration and not yet decided, and giving the reason for such disallowance; also, copies of all regulations made by the Department with reference to such claims, together with a copy of one allowed claim and the sworn declaration thereto of each exporter of boilers, machinery, sewing machines, or other manufactures of iron.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5:50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 22nd February, 1883.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented, pursuant to a Resolution of the House of the 20th February, 1882, a report giving full information on all subjects affecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, up to the latest date, and particularly all details as to:

1. The selection of the route; 2. The progress of the work; 3. The selection or reservation of land; 4. The payment of money; 5. The laying out of branches; 6. The progress thereon; 7. The rates of tolls for passengers and freight; 8. The particulars required by the Consolidated Railway Act and amendments thereto, up to the end of the previous fiscal year; 9. Like particulars up to the latest practicable date before the presentation of the return; 10. Copies of all Orders in Council and of all correspondence between the Government and the railway company, or any member or officer of either, relating to the affairs of the company.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY presented, pursuant to a Resolution of the House of the 20th February, 1882, a report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in account with the Government of Canada, viz.:—Rails Advance Account, Land Grant Bond Account, Current Account and Subsidy Account; also, a Memorandum as to substitution of Canadian Pacific Railway of Credit Valley Stock for $1,000,000 cash deposit, and a Schedule of Correspondence as to Canadian Pacific Land Grant Bonds.

BRANCH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. HACKETT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build this year the branch railway from Cape Traverse to the main line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, for which a sum of money was voted at the last Session of Parliament?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to proceed with the work in the spring.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

FRAUDS IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

On the order for the second reading of Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys (Mr. Casgrain), being read,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House is very thin, and I would ask my hon. friend to allow this Bill to stand over. We will give him plenty of opportunity to bring it forward.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I shall be very glad to accommodate my hon. friend, the more so because on one occasion he did not accommodate me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will turn over a new leaf.

Order allowed to stand.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

The following Motion for a Return was agreed to:—

Copies of the judgments in the case of Russell and the Queen in the Supreme Court of Canada and the Privy Council, and of the judgments in any Provincial Courts of inferior jurisdiction, or in the Supreme Court of Canada, in all cases raising the question of the right of a Provincial Legislature to pass laws affecting, regulating or restraining the number or character of persons licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, or the times of such sale.—(Mr. Blake.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:45 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 23rd February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S MEMORANDUM.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a memorandum of the progress of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said: I received this after the return which I laid on the Table of the House yesterday. It contains the report from the Secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway of the progress of the work, and I would like to have it printed with the papers laid on the Table yesterday. My attention has been called to the terms of the Resolution, and on Monday I expect to lay on the Table of the House a report containing full information on the subject.

Mr. BLAKE. I purposed calling attention to some of the facts in the existing returns, as far as they went, that any deficiencies not contemplated might be guarded against in the complete report.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, being for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1882.—(Mr. McLelan.)

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for presenting petitions for Private Bills be extended to Monday the 12th day of March next, in accordance with the recommendation from the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate a Company under the name of "H. R. Rathbun and Sons."—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 27) to amend an Act to incorporate the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Wells.)

Bill (No. 28) to continue an Act to incorporate sundry persons by the name of the President, Directors and Company, of the Farmers' Bank of Ontario.—(Mr. Davies.)

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the Bank of London, in Canada.—(Mr. Dawson.)

UNPROTECTED APERTURES IN THE ICE OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in introducing Bill (No. 30) to amend the Criminal Law so as to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unprotected holes, openings or apertures, made in the ice of any navigable water, said: The object of the law is to protect the public against the accidents that are continually occurring on the inland waters of the Dominion. There is no law now which gives any jurisdiction over the inland waters where ice is formed upon them. When parties are harvesting ice there is no law to prevent them leaving the holes open, and the consequence is that in the winter season there are many serious accidents, some of them attended with great loss of life.

Bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. CARON, in introducing Bill (No. 31) to consolidate and amend the laws affecting the Militia of Canada, said: I may state that the object of this Bill is the consolidation and amendment of the laws affecting the Militia of Canada, together with the addition of certain changes which have been rendered necessary from the altered condition of the country and of the force. On the second reading of the Bill, when it is printed, I shall have the honor of explaining fully the amendments, which I trust will meet the approbation of the House.

Bill read the first time.

RETURNS CONCERNING THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I desire the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to make an observation with reference to the papers which were brought down in answer to a Resolution of last Session. The hon. gentleman has already informed the House that it is proposed to supplement these returns of papers by a report, which, of course, is satisfactory so far as it goes, because the Resolution indicating that the report would give a statement of all the particulars and correspondence, was simply an indication of the maker upon which the report was based. Then, with reference to the report, as to the correspondence concerning the selection of the route, I observe that, on the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, the letters which were sent in contain a reference to plans and profiles, but they have not been brought down. It is impossible to understand their correctness without that plan and profile. I observe also that the letter states the intention to place a large amount of material on the contract west of Algoma Mills, and east of Prince Arthur's Landing in the fall, and that there is nothing more in the shape of correspondence brought down. That indicates that the Company have contracted the entire portion of the road from the eastern section to Algoma Mills, with the exception of a small piece which I understand properly belongs to that section, the two miles from Prince Arthur's Landing to Current River. The newspapers say a good deal of work has been done, and that contracts have been let for other portions of the road. There is a statement in that branch of the return of correspondence with reference to the fixing of Callander Station at a certain point 120 miles west of Pembroke, but there is nothing to indicate it on the map as compared with the place where Callander Station was supposed to be before this time. An application is made to approve of the line from Swift Current to the South Saskatchewan, on November 26th, 1882, and the approval is made by the Engineer of the line that it can be located through Kicking Horse Pass. There is an application on the 15th September, for the approval of a line through Kicking Horse Pass, but there does not appear, by the correspondence, to have been any action taken on that application. I presume some action has been taken on that application between that time and now. As to the progress of the work: on 26th August there is a letter from the Secretary of the Company promising that on the return of the consulting Engineer, who is at present on the eastern section, a full report will be given as to the progress of the work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is contained in the report now on the Table. It was received only yesterday.

Mr. BLAKE. That answers, although perhaps a little late, that demand. Will the hon. gentleman say whether that includes the figures over the whole road?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The entire year's operation; everything up to the present time.

Mr. BLAKE. The Resolution also called for a report with respect to the selection or reservation of land.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That memorandum will come through the Department of the Interior, and will be embodied in the report.

Mr. BLAKE. That covers the great land grant question. So that is to come in yet?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no correspondence with respect to the laying out of branches, with the exception of a very brief correspondence as to the arrangement to be made with the town of Emerson. There was brought down, last Session, a letter from the Company, in which they intimated their willingness to build a very extensive mileage of branches in the North-West, and gave the general direction of the branch lines, although they did not absolutely locate them on the ground. I assume there has been further correspondence indicating whether they will be prosecuted or abandoned; but such does not appear in these papers. The Resolution called for a statement of the rates of tolls for passengers and freight, but nothing as to that is brought down yet. The Resolution called for the particulars required by the Consolidated Railway Act, and amendments thereto, up to the end of the previous fiscal year; but there is nothing of that in the papers brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to give me a memorandum of the points respecting which information is desired, I will endeavor to obtain it.

Mr. BLAKE. I will send it across the floor.

RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. HOMER enquired, Whether any action has been taken for the purpose of negotiating a Reciprocity Treaty between the Dominion of Canada and the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. LANGEVIN. There has been no action taken on this matter.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH SABLE ISLAND.

Mr. PAINT enquired, When telegraphic communication will be established between Nova Scotia and Sable Island?

Mr. LANGEVIN. This matter is now under the consideration of my Department.

GULF TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. PAINT enquired, Whether the great benefits conferred on the fishermen and shipping interest in the Gulf of St. Lawrence by the daily reports furnished by the Government coast line telegraph, shall be in like manner extended to the shores of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Cape Breton as first contemplated, and when?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When the Estimates are brought down, we will be able to state to the hon. gentleman whether the Government can make provision for that expenditure this year or not. The matter is now under consideration.

BREAKWATER AT BLANDFORD, N. S.

Mr. KEEFLER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision in the Estimates during this Session for the extension of the breakwater at Blandford, in the county of Lunenburg?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have the honor to inform the hon. gentleman that there is no information about this work in the Department.

STEAM COMMUNICATION BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND THE MAIN LAND.

Mr. JENKINS moved the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the main land in winter and summer, with power to send for persons, papers and records; said Committee to consist of Messrs. Hackett, McIntyre, Wood (Westmoreland), McIsaac and the mover. He said: I would not have considered it necessary to occupy the attention of the House on this subject, except for the fact that when it was up for discussion on Monday night some hon. member expressed opinions adverse to the appointment of a Committee. They seemed to think that there was nothing to enquire about, and that the appointment of a Committee would lead to delay. I may say I have given the subject a great deal of consideration. So long ago as 1867 I made it a subject of a motion in the Local Legislature of the Island, and since that time I have paid a good deal of attention to it; but I must confess that I feel that I am not in possession of sufficient information to give a positive opinion on it, and I find, in conversation with others, that those who know the least about the matter are most inclined to give a positive and dogmatic opinion as to the impossibility of winter communication. I consider the question is one surrounded with difficulties. Not only are the Government not in possession of sufficient information to warrant them in making a large expenditure of public money on this service, but there are also other difficulties. The different sections and different districts of the Island all seem to think they have a right to have the steamer ply between their point of communication and the main land. Those sectional jealousies and conflicting interests have to be dealt with, and the jealousies will be allayed, and the conflicting interests reconciled by the appointment of this Committee, because it is essentially representative, each county in the Island having a member on it, and the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia having also a member each. I think, therefore, that the labors of this Committee are likely, not only to acquire information which will be valuable to the Government, and enable them to take action in this matter, but that they will also allay sectional jealousies and remove difficulties of this kind. Now, Sir, it is very easy to say that no vessel can be built to cross the Straits of Prince Edward Island and the main land in winter. I allow that no such vessel has ever been built, but I consider that this is an age of progress, and I consider it quite possible that it can be built. It will be in the memory, I dare say, of some hon. members of the House, that when the question of ocean steam navigation was discussed some years ago, a former Lord Derby—the grandfather, I believe, of the present Minister for the Colonies—said that no steamer would ever cross the Atlantic. I believe that persons who have just as firm faith in the impossibility of the winter navigation of the straits, have as little basis for their opinions; and I am quite sure that this question will be satisfactorily solved, and I think that the appointment of this Committee will prove to be the first step towards its solution. With regard to the delay, it must be remembered that the Steam Navigation Company of Prince Edward Island had their contract extended for two years, and until that period expires there can be no change made, as far as steam communication is concerned; but on the first opportunity that presents itself an improvement should be made. I think that the Steam Navigation Company of Prince Edward Island have done very good service. It is the fashion rather to grumble about and to abuse that company, but I think that when we look back and remember that this company has carried mails and passengers for nearly twenty years, with very few casualties, it will be admitted that they deserve some credit instead of abuse. During the last few years there has been a great expansion in our trade with the neighboring Provinces, owing, as I believe, and as I think most hon. members believe, to the National Policy; the mining and manufacturing interests of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have increased to such an extent, that they have taken a very large portion of our produce, and on that account the resources of the Steam Navigation Company have not been sufficient, during this last year, to carry all our produce to those Provinces; so much has trade in that direction, owing to the increased necessities of those Provinces, due to the growth of their mining and manufacturing interests, extended. Now, Sir, I believe that this company ought to put a third good boat on that route during next season, in order that they may be able to keep trade clear. I think, Sir, that this House will agree that the selection of this Committee is the first step towards the solution of this question, which is of such very great importance to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, for several reasons, that my hon. colleague has thought it consistent with his duty to make this motion on this occasion, and because I know and believe—or would rather believe—that he is thoroughly sincere in his advocacy of this question. I am further sorry, because I think that it will merely lead to delay, and can do no possible good. I know that my hon. colleague has a strong desire to make motions referring all sorts of matters to Committees, for that was his course when I occupied a seat with him in the Local Legislature; whenever any question then came up, my hon. friend would move its reference to a Committee, and I never saw any good come out of it. I am perfectly sure that no good will come of this reference, and for this reason: because the Government have already taken steps in this matter. In the year 1878 they appointed a competent man, Mr. McLeod, a Civil Engineer, to go to the Island, and to the neighboring shore of New Brunswick, and to examine witnesses who had any special knowledge with reference to this subject. Mr. McLeod went there and made a thorough survey of the Prince Edward Island coast for some sixteen miles. He also made similar surveys on the coast of New Brunswick, and examined a large number of witnesses, residents of New Brunswick, and also of Prince Edward Island. Those witnesses who had had very long experience in winter navigation were competent to give opinions which would lead to the solution of this difficult question. Mr. McLeod embodied the result of this evidence in a report which he sent to the Government of the day, and which my hon. friend will find in the Sessional Papers of 1879. In that report he sums up the difficulties attending the settlement of this question, and states the manner in which it may be solved very well. That report is before the Government, and I am quite sure that the recommendations are of such a character that no reasonable and sensible man can easily object to them. There are two sides to the understanding of all the questions relating to the provision of continuous steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the main land, and it is manifest that many difficulties exist. There was a time, I acknowledge, when it was believed practicable to have steam navigation all through the winter between the Capes on the Island and the main land, but owing to the experience which we have obtained on this subject, I venture to say that this opinion can no longer be reasonably entertained. What is the Committee going to do? Whom are they going to examine? What new information can they obtain? I can see no benefit to be secured from their labors. Persons who have had an experience of twenty-three years in this matter have already placed their opinions on record, in the report above referred to, and what other views of value can be obtained in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Of course, I am aware that it is of no use to do more than protest against this proceeding. What better information can be given in this regard than can be got from the captain of the Northern Light and her officers, who, I believe, have remained in charge of the vessel since she was first placed on the route some eight years ago? I cannot see what my hon. friend expects to do by means of a Committee. He should point out the line of action which he proposes to take, and state what witnesses he is going to examine, and the object he intends to effect. The steam communication between the Island and the main land, as it at present exists, is kept up by means of boats. We all know that we must have continuous steam communication, if this can possibly be secured; and I judge that it would be more satisfactory if my friend would ask the Government whether they propose, in the future, to take steps towards the construction of another vessel, which would act in conjunction with, or take the place of the Northern Light—a larger vessel, free from the defects, if possible, which have been ascertained to exist in the Northern Light, during the experience of the last eight years. We know that a ship can be built suitable for that service if tenders were called for; and I would strongly urge upon my hon. colleague that, instead of wasting the time of the House and the money of the country on this Committee, which can result in nothing but delay, he should exert his influence with the influence of the other gentlemen from the Island on the same side of politics as himself to induce the Government to take immediate steps in this connection. I beg to say that I fully endorse every word that the hon. gentleman has said with reference to the manner in which the Steam Navigation Company of Prince Edward Island has carried out its contract. It is a capital company, it does its work well; and what I said the other day was not intended in any way as a complaint of the manner in which it has carried out the contract. What I do say is that in extending the contract, if the hon. Minister has done so, provision should be made, by the granting of an additional subsidy, to compel the company to put on a boat in the autumn months of the year, so that the harbors of Charlottetown and Summerside might be kept open a few weeks later than at present. The hon. Minister could confer no greater boon on those two cities and the counties in which they are situated, than by providing a boat which will keep up the navigation three or four weeks later in the fall. As to building another boat, in addition to the Northern Light, that must be done unless the Ministry determine that the Terms of the Union shall not be carried out at all. It is well known that the Northern Light cannot perform her work the whole of this winter, and unless a new boat be provided, there will be none at all next winter. I should have contented myself with these remarks had not the hon. gentleman gone on to attribute the increase in the exports and the general volume of trade on the Island to the National Policy. This is not the occasion, or the time, to discuss the effects of the National Policy upon the Province of Prince Edward Island, but lamentable as the effects of that Policy have been on that unfortunate Province, it is still more lamentable to find an hon. gentleman standing up in this House and endeavoring to mislead Parliament and the country as to those effects. It is a matter of notoriety that whatever may have been the effects of the National Policy in other parts of the Dominion, it has produced nothing but ruin there. It is well known to the hon. gentleman that ever since the National Policy was introduced a result directly traceable to its operations is that the value of real estate has fallen in the towns of the Island over 50 per cent., and in the rural districts over 25 per cent. It is a matter of public notoriety that the young men of the Island have been leaving it in swarms—not in scores, but in hundreds—that the country is being deprived of its bone and sinew because its young men cannot find a livelihood there. But we have in this House, in the presence of the hon. member for Prince County (Mr. Hackett), a living example of the exodus that is taking place from the Island. Even that hon. gentleman has left his Province, where he has lived so long, in the hope of bettering himself elsewhere. I do not blame him for going abroad to improve his position, but I do blame him, after turning his back on his country, for endeavoring to mislead the House by saying that prosperity reigns in Prince Edward Island, when he must know that the very opposite is the case. As to our export trade, to which he has referred, I shall be very glad if our exports to the neighboring Provinces have increased; but I wish to point out that the reasons we have exported more to New Brunswick last year than formerly, were two or three in number. In the first place, we were formerly the owners of a large amount of shipping, and that shipping used to be profitably employed in the carrying trade between Great Britain and the Island. The quantity of goods we imported offered a fair freight to the Island, and the oats and barley which we exported gave profitable return freights. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what has become of that shipping. We had an iron steamer which traded from the Island, but although it enjoyed a subsidy of some $15,000 from the Government—and I have the misfortune to be one of the company myself—this policy, by compelling us to purchase our goods where we could not purchase them so cheaply or so profitably, has obliged us to sell the steamer at half its cost, because it had nothing to do. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the statistics which were laid on the Table of this House the other day, he will find that, in 1873, we built nearly 17,000 tons of shipping. How many tons have we in 1882? Three thousand. In 1878, the tonnage registered in the Island was over 18,000 tons; to-day it is only 4,300; in 1878, our exports from the Island were $1,700,000; in 1877, they were $1,931,000, while, in 1883, they were $1,887,000. The hon. gentleman speaks of the prices having been enhanced by the manufactures which have sprung up in the country; but if he looks into the facts he will find that those prices have been enhanced by the increase in the lumbering business—a statement which I am sure will be borne out by hon. members from the Province of New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman will find that while, in 1874, the percentage of duties which the poor people of the Island had to pay was 11.47, they are now paying 25 per cent. The National Policy may have had, and doubtless has had, beneficial effects on certain towns or certain parts of the Dominion, but it is well known that upon a purely agricultural community it can work, it has worked, and is working, nothing but ruin. Let the hon. gentleman go to the chief city of the Island and offer any property in it for sale and see if he will get a purchaser. He will find that the places formerly owned and occupied by workmen are vacant, and are offered to let everywhere. In the country parts whole settlements have left the place, and though I am glad that some of them have gone to our own territories in Manitoba and the North-West, the larger portion have gone to build up and increase the neighboring Republic. This, however, is apart from the question before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but I should not have referred to the question at all had not the hon. member for Prince County introduced the subject by making a statement with reference to the prosperity of Prince Edward Island, which it would not have been fair to have let pass in silence. While I believe that the company have efficiently carried out their contract, I trust that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Department will, either by means of an increased subsidy or in some other way, put on a boat which will carry on the work earlier in the spring and later in the fall than at present, and that he will give his assurance that some measures will be taken to supplement the work of the Northern Light by putting on another boat.

Mr. HACKETT. I do not think it is right that the hon. members from Prince Edward Island should monopolize the whole time of the House; but as there is not much business now before us, I trust it will not be considered out of place for me to offer a few remarks. When I first heard of the motion for the appointment of a Committee I had some slight objections to it, thinking perhaps it might retard the progress of this work of opening communication with the Island. The people of the Island desire the Government to carry out the work they have initiated. The Government have begun that work, for the money was voted for the branch railway from Cape Traverse to the main line, and I was glad to have the assurance of the hon. Minister that it would be built this year; and that point being settled I could see no objection to the motion. Information is required on the question. Every man living on the Island has an opinion of his own on the subject, and what we should get is the best evidence possible to be obtained, so that when the money comes to be expended it will be expended intelligently, and in the way best adapted to secure the opening up of this communication. Now, I want to say a word or two in reply to the hon. member from Queen's County (Mr. Davies). That hon. gentleman has thought proper to make a long speech on the subject of the National Policy—and I may say he comes from Prince Edward Island for the purpose of repealing that policy. That is his object in coming here. He is not content with the policy of the people of Canada; he must have a policy for Prince Edward Island. But I am prepared to show, from figures, that the hon. gentleman is quite incorrect with regard to the effects of that policy on Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES.

The hon. gentleman says the people of the Island are leaving it in swarms. The truth is that in the fall of the year a great many young men who are engaged in the fishing industry during the summer, are thrown out of employment, and it becomes necessary for them to seek employment in the lumber districts of the neighboring Provinces; but they return in the spring. There has not been that exodus from the Island which the hon. gentleman represents. Not very long ago the Summerside Journal, the organ of the hon. gentleman and his party in Prince County, had the honesty to admit that the young men who had gone abroad were returning, having found that the little Island in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence provided them with a better home than they could get abroad; and I believe they will continue to return, notwithstanding the efforts of the hon. gentleman and his party to drive them from the Province. There is at present 40,000 or 50,000 acres of wilderness land as good in Prince Edward Island as can be found in any other part of the Dominion. Instead of publishing to the world that the Province is in ruin and misery, we should stand up here and say that it is prosperous; we should endeavor to secure for the Island a portion of the large immigration which has come into the country in consequence of the National Policy. What are the facts? We can have no better indication of the prosperity of a country than the amount of the people's deposits in the savings banks. Last year we find that the farmers of Prince Edward Island deposited in the savings banks some $300,000 more than they did the year previous. Is that an indication of ruin and want? On the contrary, I take it as being indicative of the progress and prosperity of the country. Now, I just want to cite to the hon. gentleman a few statistics with regard to shipping. He has endeavored to make it appear that our ships are being swept off the water, and that no shipping of any account is now registered at the port of Charlottetown. Such is not the case. If we have not the shipping in Prince Edward Island, it is because our ships get better freights in the lumber trade of New Brunswick. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the figures, he will find that there has been no such decrease in the tonnage of Prince Edward Island as he represents; but that our ship owners stand in a better position than they did in 1873, when we entered the Confederation. In 1873, the number of tons of shipping registered at the port of Charlottetown was 38,913, while, in 1882, the year when the hon. gentleman says there was no shipping in Prince Edward Island, the tonnage amounted to 41,684 tons, an increase of nearly 3,000 tons. These are facts, and it would be better for the hon. gentleman, before he rises in this House to proclaim that every industry on the Island is being ruined, to consult the figures and gain some information on the subject. Then with regard to prices, which the hon. gentleman says are so low as to produce great want and misery among the farmers, I will show you that they are getting better prices than they did in 1878, in the days of darkness and disaster, when the hon. gentleman's friends ruled this country. In 1878, the price, at Charlottetown, of oats, one of the staple products of the Island, was 32 cents a bushel, while, in 1882, it had increased to 36 cents, or an addition of 4 cents a bushel. That does not look much like ruin for the farmers. Then, with regard to pork—in 1878, the price was 4½ cents a pound in Charlottetown, while, last year, it was 9 cents a pound, or an increase of 100 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES. Did the National Policy do that?

Mr. HACKETT. Certainly it did. The National Policy did it by bringing prosperity to the miners of Nova Scotia, by building up industries in the Province of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and by bringing prosperity to the whole Dominion, by means of which the farmers of Prince Edward Island have been enabled to sell their products in the home market, instead of being obliged to seek a market abroad. The hon. gentleman is not satisfied, but I will try to satisfy him. With regard to the prices of butter, we have the means in Prince Edward Island of raising large quantities of butter, and the farmers—I speak it from a knowledge of the facts—were unable, in 1878, to sell their butter. It was lying in the dairies. They were unable to get cash for it at any price they would ask, and were obliged to take it to the markets and trade it away. The price that year was 16 cents per pound, by the tub, in the Charlottetown market. In 1882, the price was 22 cents, an advance of six cents. Are the farmers being ruined when they can get those prices for their products? I have a number of figures more, but I will reserve them until the hon. gentleman produces his motion. The hon. gentleman made a personal allusion with regard to myself, to the effect that I am a living example that the National Policy has not redeemed its promises. He need not have gone as far as that. If I think that by coming to Ottawa with my family during the Session, I can live as cheaply as on the Island, I have a right to do so, and if the hon. gentleman thinks it proper to bring his wife with him, no person can object to it. It is beneath any hon. gentleman to make a personal allusion of that kind. The hon. gentleman thinks he has got rid of me out of the Island. The hon. gentleman is not rid of me. He will find me at the next general campaign, working in the interests of the Conservative party, and I hope to prevent him from coming to this Parliament to run down the Province that did him the honor of electing him.

Mr. JENKINS. I merely rise to say that my hon. colleague (Mr. Davies) has either totally misconstrued what I said, or has misrepresented me. I am sorry to say he is quite capable of misrepresenting me.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not say it was intentional. I do not say he would do it intentionally; but I will say he is afflicted with a certain obliquity of vision—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw these expressions. We must endeavor now, in the beginning of this Session, to keep the rules of debate very strictly, and there should be no personal allusions of this kind allowed.

Mr. JENKINS. I withdraw the expressions at your request. I said nothing whatever that could be construed as my hon. colleague has construed my remarks. I did not say that Prince Edward Island was thriving, or her trade increasing, through the National Policy. I said that the trade between the Island and the neighboring Provinces had increased, and the manufacturing interests of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had largely increased through the influence of the National Policy. Perhaps I should not have mentioned the term National Policy. It seems as irritating to my hon. colleague and the hon. member of the Opposition as a red rag to a bull. Perhaps I should have said: that happy coincidence of prosperity which followed the change in the fiscal policy of this country. Perhaps that would not have irritated my hon. friend and have caused him to give us the dregs of his campaign speeches at the last Elections. I think that the question of the National Policy is not under discussion now, and I would not have mentioned it, only that I felt satisfied the increased trade between the Island and the neighboring Provinces was due to the National Policy.

Sir CHARLES FUPPER. It is not necessary that I should enter into the discussion between the hon. gentlemen who represent Prince Edward Island; but I may say that I do not agree with the views taken by the senior member for Queen's County, that any possible harm could come from the adoption of this Resolution. The House is perfectly well aware that from the time the Island was brought into the Union, efforts have been made by both Governments to carry out as far as it was found possible and practicable, the Terms of the Union. Efforts have been made to produce as regular intercommunication as possible between the Island and the main land. The Government, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, had a steamer constructed for the purpose of maintaining winter communication with the Island, as it had not been found practicable to do so by any steamers in use for the summer season. Although very considerable success attended those efforts, it was found impracticable to maintain regular communication for mails and passengers throughout the entire season. Despite all that the Northern Light—a vessel specially constructed for that purpose—could do, there were several weeks in the season in which mail and passenger communication could not be carried on in that way. I may say if the hon. gentleman has satisfied himself that nothing remains to be learned in that connection, he has arrived at a different conclusion to that at which I have arrived. We waited until the efforts to maintain communication were tried, and saw how far that intercommunication could be made successful, before resorting to the further means of constructing railway communication to Cape Traverse, for the purpose of ensuring more rapid and perfect communication by way of the Capes. The Government was prepared last Session to submit appropriations for the construction of a railway from the Intercolonial to Cape Tormentine, as well as a railway on Prince Edward Island to Cape Traverse, with a view of having constant communication through the entire winter season. No delay was caused by any want of action on the part of the Government. From the moment that the representatives of the Island in both branches of the Legislature had arrived, themselves, at a common accord of opinion, no time was lost. That was not arrived at until the previous season, a year ago last summer. That having been arrived at, the representatives of the Island being agreed that, after all the experiments and experiences of the past, that was the best mode to adopt, the Government adopted that policy and asked from Parliament the necessary appropriation to carry it out. The Government did not ask for an appropriation to connect the Intercolonial Railway with Cape Tormentine, as they were prepared to do, because the Government of New Brunswick subsidized a private company to take that work up, and it was stated to the Government that that portion of the work could be accomplished without any application being made to Parliament. Parliament having provided the means of establishing connection between the railway on Prince Edward Island and Cape Traverse to facilitate this intercommunication, that work could have been proceeded with during the past season, only we felt it would have been quite practicable for us to take up that work in the coming season and have all the work on Prince Edward Island for the purpose of having this intercommunication completed at as early a period as it was possible for the company engaged in the work on this side to meet it. Until that time it seemed unnecessary to make that expenditure. The hon. gentleman, on a previous occasion, said he understood a contract had been entered into with the Steam Navigation Company of Prince Edward Island for that service. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in that respect. Application was made to extend that service. It was represented to us by the Steam Navigation Company, who have performed the services in which they have been engaged with considerable ability and success, that the demands for communication between the Island and the mainland had become so great owing to the growth of traffic as to make it essential, in the interests of the Island, that a very great extension of that service should take place. What had been in past years sufficient was, in the present condition of the Island, totally inadequate. But we declined to make any contract or to take that question up, because we considered that until this railway communication was established from the Intercolonial to Cape Tormentine on the one side, and from the Island Railway to Cape Traverse on the other, it would be unwise to enter into a new contract until we had seen, by further experience and further investigation, the very best means that could be used, not only as regards winter, but also in relation to summer communication, to bring the Island into as perfect intercommunication with the main land as possible. I can only say that if we had possessed the information which the hon. gentleman seems to possess we would not have been obliged to defer this arrangement. I think this committee ought to be granted if for no other purpose than to give the Government the benefit of the information and the opinions that the hon. gentleman possesses, for if he has studied the subject so thoroughly as to have more information than the Government have been able to obtain, it is desirable that it should be placed at our service. I shall be glad to have this Committee appointed, because I think there is a good deal to be learned; and I am quite satisfied, although I have given this question a great deal of personal attention from the time of the Union of Prince Edward Island with the Dominion—and the previous Government gave the subject I am sure a great deal of consideration, as well as the present Government—that there is a good deal to be learned, and I shall be only too glad to hear any person who is in a position to assure us that it would be no doubtful experiment to adopt a line of action that will render that communication as perfect as possible. There is no delay involved in it at all, because, as I have said, the railway works are going on on the main land and will be vigorously prosecuted on the Island to make communication. In the meantime the Northern Light will keep up the service as heretofore between Pictou and Georgetown, and measures will be devised and a scheme adopted by the time that the railway is in operation to make the communication as perfect as possible, both in summer and in winter.

SUPERNUMERARY CLERKS IN THE MONTREAL CUSTOM HOUSE.

Mr. CURRAN, in moving for a return containing names of persons in the employ of the Customs Department in the City of Montreal as supernumerary clerks who have been constantly employed for not less than six months previous to the first day of July, 1883, said: My object in making this motion is to draw the attention of the House to a state of things which I think is an injustice to a very considerable number of persons who have been up to the present time discharging their duties as employés in the Customs House—or as supernumerary clerks if you will—some of them for a considerable number of years without having their appointments confirmed. As the House is aware, during last Session a Civil Service Bill was passed, and to some extent it was experimental legislation; but I believe, on the whole, the people of the country are satisfied, and the members of this House are satisfied, that the law has been an exceedingly good one. But there is one which I think deserves attention, and in which that law, like all other human laws, is defective. There are not only in the Montreal Custom House, but in the various other Departments, a number of persons who have been appointed merely as supernumeraries, some of them having filled the office not merely for six months previous to the 1st July, 1882, when the Civil Service Act came into force, but some of them for even five or six years, and whose appointments have never been ratified. Now a number of these persons are men who have been absent from the school room for perhaps twenty or twenty-five years, and who are rather rusty upon some of the subjects which have been put into the curriculum of examination, and therefore they are placed at a great disadvantage with young boys, perhaps who have just left school and who are better capable of undergoing examination, while those men who have been employed as supernumeraries, discharging their duties well and efficiently, are placed at a disadvantage besides these new comers. Under the law as it now exists those gentlemen cannot be appointed permanently to their present positions without having to undergo this examination. I am of the impression, and it is the opinion of hon. gentlemen to whom I have spoken, that in any amendments which may be made in the Civil Service Act, the position of these men should be taken into consideration, as they have served the Government faithfully and efficiently, and that they should be entitled, upon procuring a certificate from the Chief of their Departments, that they are fully competent to discharge their duties, to be appointed permanently without having to undergo the examination which is now prescribed for them as for all others, and which I think is only right in the case of new applicants. I am satisfied that the return I now ask for will show that a state of things exists which is an injustice, not perhaps to very many persons in the City of Montreal alone, but to perhaps some hundreds of persons throughout the Dominion. I am satisfied the Government and the House are only anxious that all cause of complaint should be removed and that justice should be done to this class of supernumerary officers the same as to all other classes in this country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Civil Service Act past last year provides for a certain examination for this class of officers—I think a preliminary examination—and which is a very simple one. So far as I can recollect, it embraces reading, writing and the four first rules in arithmetic, and should the Department judge that these officers should be made permanent it would be easy for them to pass that examination. My hon. friend is mistaken if he thinks that a qualifying examination is required, because merely a preliminary examination is required for these officers of a lower grade—if I may so call them. I would also remind the hon. gentleman that a Bill may be introduced this Session in which some modifications may be made in that direction. Whilst I am on my feet I desire to congratulate my hon. friend as a speaker, and I am certain that he will prove a great accession to this House.

IMMIGRATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE moved for all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia and the Dominion Government, respecting immigration to British Columbia, also, all correspondence on the question of Chinese immigration. He said: I have been informed that correspondence has taken place between the two Governments on this very important subject. Looking at the Public Accounts of last year, and of the previous years, I find that a very large sum of money has been voted by this House for immigration purposes. I believe that every Province in the Dominion, except British Columbia, received a portion of that appropriation. I think it is a little unfair that British Columbia should be left entirely out in the cold in this matter, for, as she contributed her share to the revenue of the Dominion, she is entitled to a share of that appropriation. It cannot be said that British Columbia is not in want of immigrants; that is the great want of that Province to-day. It is a matter respecting which we have been crying out for years. We are in want of immigrants; we are in want of men for our farm work, for our industries and canneries, and our railroad, and I am able to state here, to-day, that 2,000 men will find employment on the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia this year. I am sure I can state in all fairness, that there is no portion of the Dominion of Canada which affords greater inducements to immigrants than the Province of British Columbia does to-day. We have extensive lands, millions of acres of which have never been settled by white men, and though it has been stated by hon. gentlemen in this House that we have seas of mountains, I am happy to say that some of those mountains are mountains of wealth, mountains of iron, copper, silver and gold, and I sincerely trust that the day is not far distant when those mountains shall be brought low and the valleys shall be exalted, and the wealth contained in those mountains shall be poured into the Treasury of the Dominion. I am satisfied that the more British Columbia becomes known, the greater will be the astonishment of the people at the laxity of the Government in not making known the varied and extensive resources of that Province sooner. Our American friends in Washington Territory have their agents in San Francisco and various parts of the United States with pamphlets, magazines and maps full of information descriptive of the resources of their country, the result of which is that nearly every steamer leaving the port of San Francisco for Victoria is crowded with immigrants for Washington Territory. We seldom hear of emigrants going to British Columbia, and yet that Province to-day offers greater inducements, and has a finer climate than any portion of the Dominion. What I want to call the attention of the Government to-day to—and I am sure that having done so, they will very readily comply with the request—is, that British Columbia should have a portion of the appropriation which is voted every year for immigration purposes. It is astonishing the ignorance which prevails with respect to that Province. Since I have been in Ottawa I have been crowded with letters asking information with respect to that Province. Sometimes I receive letters asking how far it is from British Columbia to China. I presume the reason why they ask that question is because we have there so many inhabitants of the Flowery kingdom. Then, again, I am told that on applying for information to the Dominion Government, all they could obtain was a pamphlet about Manitoba. I think it is nothing but fair that British Columbia should share in the immigration appropriation, and that information should be given to the public so that we may obtain a share of the immigrants who are travelling west year by year. With respect to the question of Chinese immigration, of course we have an immigration there of Chinese, and, I am very sorry to say it, a class of people who are not at all desirable, but are detrimental to the best interests of any civilized community. However, that is not the part of the question which I wish to take up to-day; on some future occasion I hope to return to that subject.

Mr. BAKER. I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion made by my hon. colleague from Victoria, British Columbia. He happens to have the advantage of being not only a worker, but a speaker, and I can hardly hope to come under the latter category; at the same time I have very much pleasure in seconding the resolution which he has presented to the House. The House has lately heard a good deal about Prince Edward Island, in fact the hon. members from that Island have occupied its time for a considerable period—I will not, therefore, detain the House very long. I have heard it said that Prince Edward Island is the pet child of the Dominion. If so I envy their position; all I can hope is, that you will not say that Vancouver Island is the spoilt child of the Dominion. We are desirous of obtaining in British Columbia a class of people not, as my hon. friend has mentioned, from the Flowery kingdom, but from any kingdom or nationality which will add to our population and remain in the country. He has observed, and rightly too, that a very fair amount of money is placed in the Estimates every year for purposes of immigration and agriculture. I can only endorse what he has said, and that is that we in British Columbia, in the far West, should participate to some extent in the disbursing of that amount of money which may be voted by Parliament. We are also informed that the Local Government of British Columbia are taking action in this matter, and if the Dominion will give us a few crumbs which may fall from the rich man's table we will be thankful. We do not ask very much; in fact this being our first appearance in public life—at all events so far as I am concerned—I have very great diffidence in asking anything at all, yet that will not satisfy the people of British Columbia who sent me here to represent them. I have very great pleasure in asking the Government to grant, out of the vote passed by this House, a small share for the promotion of immigration to the Province from which I come.

Mr. HOMER. Mr. Speaker, the reference made in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament, with relation to the railway lands of British Columbia, shows, as I believe, the intention of the Government to throw those lands open for settlement at an early date; therefore, it is highly necessary that some immigration scheme should be immediately arranged, in order that these lands may be occupied by actual settlers. I believe that arrangements may be made between the Dominion Government and the Local Government and the railway contractors in British Columbia, by which a large number of persons, suitable for railway and general labor, can be taken into that section of the country, thus assisting in the stoppage of the further influx of the Chinese and the replacement of a great number of those people who are now in the colony. Immigration from the Old Country and the Eastern Colonies would not only be very beneficial to British Columbia, but would add very materially to the revenue of the Dominion. By this means indirectly, the expenditure laid out in this manner would be repaid to the Government. It is well, Mr. Speaker, to remember the fact that one white person contributes as much to the revenue of the country as ten Chinese; and while the white person makes the country his permanent home, the Chinaman contributes comparatively nothing to the revenue, but takes his earnings to a foreign land where he spends them.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put to the House, I desire to make a few remarks as to the necessity of British Columbia participating in the advantages of the expenditure made by this Parliament in order to promote immigration to the Dominion. British Columbia does not by any means desire to participate merely in the financial advantages. She wishes this money to be directed to the proper channels, in order that her industries and various resources may be developed, in which development the Dominion of Canada, as well as the Province, are sure to be participants. There is a certain class of immigrants which we desire to obtain—I cannot say that British Columbia is prepared to receive an unlimited number—I think that this would be a mistake; but a large number of people can now find there ready employment. We have openings for three or four classes: for instance, agricultural laborers would be absorbed to a considerable extent; a limited number of lumbermen would find ready employment; the fisheries would offer occupation to quite a number; the gold or other mines would employ others, and the different manufacturing industries in the Province would absorb a considerable number. Now, Mr. Speaker, those are the classes of immigrants which we desire to obtain from Europe and from the other sections of the Dominion. We have already immigrants from Europe, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I am glad to say they are the best we have. It is generally considered that one immigrant from any of these Provinces is worth a thousand of the sweepings of Asia now brought in to work on the railway. The people who live in this part of the Dominion do not see the moral blight which the presence of the Chinese is inflicting on our Province. They cannot contemplate it, and I doubt whether the hon. gentlemen from the other Provinces will view this subject in the right light, until 16,000 of those people come to Montreal and 10,000 to Quebec, and an equal number is distributed throughout the manufacturing districts of the other portions of the Dominion, then these hon. gentlemen will, I am sure, feel compelled to take this matter up seriously and deal with it, as affecting themselves, as we ought to treat it in British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at the present time to say much on the subject before the House. We all know that the question of immigration is important to every one of our Provinces, and we in British Columbia feel somewhat curious to know why the Government has refused to allow our Province to participate in the benefits accruing from the scheme of immigration. But British Columbia is not alone in this respect. I see that Prince Edward Island occupies the same position. I find that agencies exist for nearly every Province excepting Prince Edward Island and British Columbia; perhaps that is the reason why we receive immigration from Prince Edward Island, as they may have an overplus of population. I learn, however, from an hon. gentleman coming from that Province, that they also have opportunities for supplying immigrants with homes and for developing further their resources. Mr. Speaker, I will not trouble the House with any extensive remarks; but I may say I hope that the Government will see their way clear during this Session, not only to deal with the question of immigration to our Province, but also with our land question. You are aware, Sir, that a belt of land twenty miles on each side of the Pacific Railway, extending from the Pacific Ocean to the eastern boundaries of British Columbia, was set apart for the Dominion Government in order to aid in the construction of the road. Now, Sir, that land is at present locked up from settlement, and has been so reserved since the surveys were first commenced—or, at least, ever since the Order in Council was passed making Port Moody the terminus of the railway. It is impossible to expect that a great number of immigrants will come in and settle in the valleys beyond this twenty mile limit, for they would be obliged to wait until the intervening territory was settled up, and public roads were made extending to the outside of this limit. It may be urged, Mr. Speaker, that a great part of this land is rather too elevated for agricultural products, but I am satisfied, from a geological point of view, that the railway belt will prove equally as valuable to the Dominion of Canada as if it were all agricultural land. One point to which sufficient prominence is not given in regard to British Columbia, as an integral portion of the Dominion, is that she is not dependent entirely on one resource. She has mines, she has fisheries, she has lumbering interests and commercial interests, and she has every facility for availing herself of the National Policy in the highest degree. She has an unlimited extent of territory, she has a climate well adapted to manufactures, and she has in addition a great motive power possessed only by Nova Scotia on the Atlantic, for moving machinery and commerce. With these few remarks, I am happy to support the motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I had no intention of speaking on this subject upon a motion referring more especially to the Province of British Columbia; but it is not perhaps an inopportune moment to say a word in support of what has been said by the hon. members from British Columbia—for we are all Provinces of the same Dominion; and also to say one word for my own Province and some of the other Provinces as well. I should not have spoken at all had I not been somewhat seized with the poetic afflatus—an afflatus which appears on the poetic names of the British Columbia members of the House, and seeing that it was an hour devoted almost entirely to new members I thought I could not break the ice at a better time. I went to the Department of Agriculture the other day and asked for their pamphlets. I received about nine different pamphlets. I took them to my room and diligently went over them. One was printed in French, one in German, and several in English; but if I had been an immigrant asking for information in regard to Canada—a country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific and having in it more square miles than the United States—I should have received from reading those pamphlets the idea that there were only two places which were specially cared for, and those were Manitoba and the North-West, and the Eastern Townships. For all the pamphlets which I read contained not a word of information for immigrants except with regard to those two great places. I beg, as a humble and a new representative from the Province of New Brunswick, to give as much emphasis as I possibly can to the idea mooted by the hon. members from British Columbia, that is, that immigrants enquiring about the Dominion of Canada should have information placed at their disposal concerning the whole of the Dominion of Canada. The Eastern Provinces, the Provinces down by the sea, the Provinces of old Canada, were the kernel and are yet the back-bone of the whole Dominion; they were the stock-in-trade from which we have marched out to the purchase, and are now marching out to the settlement and the conquest in economic and civilizing ways of the vast territory then unknown to us. I think we should not in the general spirit of delight with which we boast of those vast territories and the general feeling of hope which is in our bosoms with respect to the great future which is in store for them, forget the older Provinces which have great things to contend against. You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I, that the history of the United States has been that the Eastern States advanced to a certain state, and when the newer lands throughout the West became known, not owing to the National Policy or the want of a National Policy, but owing simply to that general drifting out into the new and the untried, there commenced an exodus—a natural and proper exodus of the people of the east towards the new lands of the west. The same thing has occurred in our Provinces down by the sea as well as in the Province of Ontario, and, as has been so graphically stated by an hon. member who spoke a short time ago, they are leaving Prince Edward Island in large numbers—leaving because of the general tendency of large portions of the population to seek wider areas in the countries which have been opened up in later years. Now, if nothing is done by the old Provinces adequate to meet that movement, we shall be threatened with a depletion of the older Provinces—for the building up of the new, it is true; but, a depletion which will be felt like the draining of the blood from the body of a man. So I repeat, with all the emphasis I can command, that the Dominion Government should take into consideration how information can be given of the best kind, which will enable immigrants to know the climate and the resources, not only of the North-West, but of British Columbia and New Brunswick and every one of our Provinces, so that the stream of immigration, whilst it will always and certainly flow to a greater extent out to the North-West where there are greater attractions, may flow to some extent to our older Provinces, in order to fill up the depletion of the population which has now taken place. I thank the House for listening to these remarks. I have merely made them because I think it a proper opportunity to impress on the Government and the House, the fact that whilst we are all glad of the abundance and bountiful prospects of the new lands which are being opened up, we must at the same time look out that the older lands are not depleted of their population.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture, who has charge of immigration matters, is not in his place just now, as he would most likely have entered somewhat fully into the discussion which has been carried on so ably by the various gentlemen who have spoken on the motion. There can be no objection in the world to the motion; any correspondence in existence on the subject will be at once brought down. The whole subject of immigration will, I have no doubt, be fully and profitably discussed during the present Session—especially when the Estimates are before the House—when it will be the duty of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to ask for a vote; and then, I have no doubt, there will be judicious pressure and all kinds of moral suasion from hon. members from the different Provinces that they should have a fair share of the grant for immigration. But, as a general rule, I believe, the Department of Agriculture has principally confined its efforts to assisting immigrants from the older countries to visit our shores. The immigrants coming from Europe generally make up their minds to what Province they are coming before leaving their native country. There are such things as assisted passages; information is given by the different agencies in England and one or two on the continent; and when immigrants arrive on our shores they generally shift for themselves. As regards information respecting the capabilities of the older Provinces the prime duty in that regard rests upon the Provincial Governments. They have the lands in the different Provinces. The lands of the older Provinces belong to the Provincial Governments and they can dispose of their lands as they please, under the authority received from their several Legislatures. They alone can know where population is required; they alone can offer inducements and show the inducements that the Provinces offer to settlers. The primary steps must be taken in all those Provinces by the Provinces themselves, and the resources of the Dominion Government and Dominion Treasury can only be called upon to aid the exertions made in the first place by those Provinces and their Governments. It is true there has been no specific vote—speaking generally from my recollection—to aid immigration to British Columbia. There have been, I know, a good many settlers who have gone to British Columbia within the last four years from Ontario and the other older Provinces. There has been a considerable immigration from the older Provinces to British Columbia, caused principally, I suppose, by the demand for labor on the Pacific Railway. I am not aware that the Government or the Legislature of British Columbia have taken any steps to promote immigration. I do not know whether they have ever voted any money or appointed any agents in Europe or in the United States for that purpose. The Government here, if it gets the sanction of Parliament, will aid any such efforts on the part of the Province. My hon. friend who sits behind me says the Dominion of Canada has voted a very considerable sum for the promotion of immigration into the Province of British Columbia. Something like 25,000,000 acres of land and $25,000,000 have been appropriated for the purpose of constructing a railway direct to British Columbia. Until that road is built, we cannot hope, from its position, that there will be any very large immigration into that Province. The railway is being pushed with all zeal and earnestness, and I hope that in a few years the movement westward which has been spoken of will extend to British Columbia. Westward the star of empire holds its sway, and I have no doubt that that star will, in a few years, guide a large population to add to the present enterprising population of the Pacific Province. With regard to the Chinese question, that is a separate one, and I have no doubt my hon. friend from Victoria will press that question upon the consideration of Parliament before it is prorogued. It is a very serious question, one whose importance cannot be over-rated, one that cannot be slurred over, but must be breasted. It is of great consequence to British Columbia, and is of subsequent consequence to the Eastern Provinces, and must be fairly considered, so that some principle may be laid down regarding it, and that principle carried out in practice.

Mr. KINNEY. The eloquent, patriotic and well-timed observations of the hon. member for King's induces me to add another to the maiden efforts of the day. I do not intend to say anything with reference to the Chinese or the question of immigration to British Columbia. I merely wish to say that while we must recognize the fact that the march of empire is westward, we should deplore the large exodus from the Provinces by the sea. I do not attach any blame to the Government, present or past, for that exodus; but I think we should do whatever can be done to prevent it. In one county of Nova Scotia there are 150 fine farms for sale. I am not going to assign a cause for this. One of the hon. members from Prince Edward Island has tried to convince this House that the National Policy has something to do with the price of oats and potatoes. I may say that the county I represent has increased its exports very largely during the past year. That was not due to the National Policy, but because we got more for our fish. It is a fact that a large number of persons are leaving the Province of Nova Scotia, and while many come back, many stay away. I am pleased to state that the bounty to fishermen has given to the fishery industry a healthy impetus, resulting in a large addition to our fishery fleet. This alone will keep at home four or five hundred workmen who heretofore were forced to seek a livelihood abroad. A society has recently been started for the purpose of bringing to the notice of persons coming into the country, the inducements to settle in Nova Scotia. The Provincial Government is rendering some assistance to that society, and I understand from the Secretary that it is intended to ask the Dominion Government also for aid. My purpose in rising at present is to express the hope that when the matter is brought to the attention of the Government, they will give it their full consideration, and help us in the Lower Provinces to keep our people at home, and to show to immigrants the facilities that exist for making money in the east. If the Government can see their way to granting this society some assistance, I for one will feel grateful to them.

Motion agreed to.

LOCATION OF THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a map or maps showing (1) the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway so far as approved or constructed; (2) its location so far as proposed to Government, but not yet approved; (3) the location of any branches constructed and of any now contemplated by the Company, so far as the Government is advised; (4) the lands set apart for the Company but not yet granted; (5) the lands granted; (6) the lands applied for but not yet set apart. He said: Up to this time we have had no official plan or map of the route of the railway. Last Session, amongst some papers brought down, were proposals from the Company, which gave some fragmentary information as to where the line lay; but nothing more. There are many maps which indicate the lay of the country through which construction is proceeding, upon which it would be very easy to lay down the correct location of the railway, so far as that is possible. Again, up to this time, although we know that many millions of acres have been awarded to the Company in respect of land subsidy, we have had nothing in the shape of a map to show where this land lies. One of the maps laid before the House last Session indicated certain sections as Pacific Railway sections, but the contract calling for lands which are fairly fit for settlement, it is clear that a very large portion of these sections will not be available. It is also stated authentically, though not officially by the Government, that the very large blocks of land at the southern part of Manitoba have been awarded to the Company as part of its land subsidy. The time has then arrived, when several million acres of land have been earned, and, as far as we know, allocated to the Company, for the House to see what the general position of the land grant is, and the railway route.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Anticipating the motion of the hon. gentleman, I have had prepared a map, which shows all the information that this motion asks for, so far as the location of the railway is concerned. It will show from Montreal to Port Moodie the exact present position of the work, it shows the portion of the line in operation, the portion on which the track is laid, but which is not in operation, the portion under construction, the portion located, and applies both to the main line and to the branches. I think, therefore, it will be found to convey very fully what the hon. gentleman's motion asks for, except the allocations of the land, and that is being prepared in the Department of the hon. Minister of the Interior, and will be laid on the Table supplementary to this. It is more convenient to separate the two, because we require a larger scale for the allocations of the land.

Mr. BLAKE. In the map which shows the allocations of the land, there should be laid down also the route of the railway and its branches.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all despatches, telegrams and correspondence between the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada; and between the Government of Canada and the High Commissioner, touching negotiations for commercial arrangements with France, Spain, or other countries; and of all reports of the High Commissioner on the subject, said: I moved last Session, very early, an address similar to this, and I was informed that the papers would be laid on the Table, but so far as I have been able to ascertain they have not been laid on the Table. I do not know if there were any papers to lay, but no response was made last Session to the address. I have moved once again, in order, if possible, to obtain such information as we can with reference to negotiations which have occurred, not merely since last Parliament was prorogued, but also before that time. The question of trade negotiations, both with reference to France and Spain, has decorated the Speech from the Throne once or twice, and ornamental paragraphs on it were proposed, duly delivered and received, as they ought to be, with great courtesy and acquiescence by this House, but as for fruits we have not yet had any. I have seen in the papers that application has since been made by the Government of the French Republic for the postponement of these negotiations, as far as France is concerned, until the happy day arrives when a commercial treaty shall have been made with her by the United Kingdom. I do not know whether that statement was authentic or not, but it was stated with some degree of positiveness, and it is important we should have all the information possible on the subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The correspondence asked for is in the hands of the printers, and I hope to be able to bring it down at an early day. I do not recollect at this moment the circumstances that prevented its being submitted last Session, but I am under the impression that some important correspondence was not complete at the time.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved for a return showing the imports and exports from the 1st of July, 1882, to January 1st, 1883, giving quantities and descriptions similar to that usually published in the Gazette (monthly imports), and the countries from which imported and to which exported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to this motion except the last part of it, which would involve enormous labor of giving the details of all the sales of the calendar year. The gross amount of money received, the gross amount of sales, perhaps, in each township or each agency could be given; but the return of each sale and each individual of the 50,000 or 60,000 people who have gone in there would involve enormous expense and labor, and we have no value for it then.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I have no objection to amending it in that way so as to give the gross amount.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be well and would add much to the value of the return, to have a statement of the sales to corporations with the names of the corporations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will get at once the returns of sales from each agency, and if I can get from each township I will do so.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return of the Receipts and Expenditures in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund from July 1st, 1882, to February 1st, 1883.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Return showing the quantity in tons of coal exported from each port in Nova Scotia for the year ending June 30th, 1882; also, for the six months ending December 31st, 1882, and the countries to which exported; also, quantities sent by railway and by water (separately) to any ports of Quebec and Ontario, naming places sent to.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Return of all claims presented for drawback on materials used for shipbuilding for the year ending June 30th, 1882; also, for the six months ending December 31st, 1882; giving the name of the applicant, the name and tonnage of the vessel, the amount claimed, and the amount paid.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Statement of the Revenue and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway, accrued for the six months of each year ended December 31st, 1880, 1881 and 1882, under the several divisions; similar to Annual Statement B, Intercolonial Railway in the Public Accounts.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Return showing the total amount of money received by the Government from the sales of Dominion Lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories during the calendar year 1882; the number of sales, amount received in each Agency and each Township, the names of the Companies to whom sales have been made, the area sold to, and amount received from each.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Return showing the quantity of Rolling Stock purchased for the Intercolonial Railway, during the year ending December 31st, 1882; giving each kind of Rolling Stock, and whether purchased under contract or otherwise. The parties from whom bought and the cost of each kind: Also, a Statement showing what has been built during the year in the Government workshops, giving each kind.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Copies of all Correspondence relating to the dismissal of J. D. McMillan from his office as Fishery Overseer and the appointment in his place of David Baker; Also, copies of all Departmental or other Orders respecting such dismissal and appointment, together with the cause therefor.—(Mr. Sriver.)

Copies of all papers, resolutions, petitions, telegrams, reports and correspondence relating to the change of Mail route between Antigonish and Guysborough, Nova Scotia. Also, agreement entered into between the Postmaster General and the Contractor for the conveyance of the Mails between Heatherton and Guysborough.—(Mr. Kirk.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 10) to provide for the amalgamation of the Bank of Nova Scotia with the Union Bank of Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 16) for the incorporation of the Central Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the University of Saskatchewan and to authorize the establishment of Colleges within the limits of the Diocese of Saskatchewan.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 20) to empower the National Insurance Company to wind up its affairs and to relinquish its charter, and to provide for the dissolution of the said Company.—(Mr. Coursol.)

Bill (No. 23) further to reduce the Capital Stock of the Quebec Fire Assurance Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Manitoba and North-Western Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Sutherland, Selkirk.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5.50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 26th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BANK SHAREHOLDERS' LISTS RETURNS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor formally to lay before the House the lists of the Shareholders of the Bank of Nova Scotia, as on the 17th February, 1883; of the Bank of Windsor, N.S.; of the Bank of Yarmouth, N.S., as on the 8th February, 1883; of the Federal Bank of Canada, as on the 20th February, 1883; of La Banque de St. Hyacinthe, as on the 16th February, 1883; of La Banque du Peuple, as on the 15th February, 1883; of the People's Bank of Halifax, as on the 14th February, 1883, and of the Standard Bank of Canada, as on the 1st January, 1883.

REPORTS.

The following Reports were laid on the Table:—

Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

Report of the Civil Service Examiners.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY REPORT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER laid on the Table a report respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, relating to the selection of the route, progress of the work, selection and reservation of the land, payments of money, branches, rates and tolls for passengers and freights, and all particulars required according to the Railway Act. He said: I think it will be found that the report I have just laid on the Table will cover, substantially, all the points referred to in the memorandum that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was kind enough to give me, touching the returns. With reference to one part of the requirements of the Consolidated Railway Act—the profiles—I may say that it would be a very expensive and tedious process to copy them, and the Chief Engineer of my Department will give to any hon. member of the House the fullest information, which will be more satisfactory than for me to attempt to give it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 32) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879.—(Mr. Riopel.)

Bill (No. 33) to provide for the admission to the profession of Dominion Land Surveyors of Graduates of the Royal Military College.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LORNE.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Accept my thanks for the loyal Address you have voted in answer to the Speech with which I opened this Session. I receive, with satisfaction, your assurance that your earnest and careful attention will be given to the measures which are to be submitted for your consideration.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 22nd February, 1883.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate Les Révérends Pères Oblats de Marie Immaculée des Territoires du Nord-Ouest.—(Mr. Royal.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 28) to continue an Act to incorporate sundry persons by the name of the President, Directors, and Company of the Farmers Bank of Rustico.—(Mr. Davies.)

H. B. RATHBUN & SONS' INCORPORATION BILL.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 26) to incorporate a Company under the name of H. B. Rathbun & Sons.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We ought to know what the company is engaged in. We cannot tell what—there is no information.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Bill was introduced as a manufacturing Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. It is for the purpose of doing a general manufacturing business—almost everything.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it is an omnibus Bill. It is for miscellaneous objects.

Bill read the second time.

THE CASE OF HUBERT HÉBERT:

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government have been informed that one Hubert Hébert, their employé as Agent and Station-master at Montmagny, has been lately reported by the Election Judges for corrupt practices at a late election; and, if so, has the Government taken any action in the matter, or is it the intention of the Government to do so?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I have received from the hon. gentleman and others, a statement that Mr. Hébert, an employé in the service of the Intercolonial Railway, has been reported guilty of bribery, and I have referred the communications to the hon. Minister of Justice for report.

SEMAPHORE COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN GROSSE-ISLE, CRANE ISLAND AND THE MAINLAND.

Mr. LANDRY (translation) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish, this year, communication by semaphore between Grosse-Isle, Crane Island and the mainland?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (translation). The Government have not yet come to a decision on that point.

UNITED STATES DUTIES ON HEMLOCK BARK.

Mr. BERGERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring forward, during the present Session, any legislative measure, in view of the fact that the House of Representatives of the United States has recently adopted a Bill imposing an import duty of 20 per cent. on hemlock bark?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I beg to say, in answer to the enquiry, as well as to that which follows it—[Whether the Government intend during the present Session to impose an export duty on hemlock bark? ]—that the subject is now engaging the attention of the Government.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES AFFECTING CRIMINAL LAW.

Mr. RICHEY enquired, Whether the consolidation of the Statutes affecting Criminal Law is sufficiently far advanced to be reported for the consideration of Parliament during its present Session; and whether it is proposed in such consolidation to incorporate the main provisions of a Bill, introduced in a former Session, to prevent and punish wrongs to children?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg leave to state that a report of progress made was laid on the Table of the Senate by the hon. Minister of Justice at the opening of Parliament. The work is not sufficiently advanced to enable us to recommend the consolidation of the Criminal Law to the consideration of Parliament this Session. I beg leave to lay that progress report on the Table.

AIDING AND ABETTING THE ESCAPE OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. RICHEY enquired, Whether it is proposed, in the revision and consolidation of the Statutes now in progress, to extend the provisions of 32-33 Victoria, Chapter 34, Section 8, to other Provinces than the Province of Quebec, so as to make the aiding and abetting the escape of juvenile offenders detained in Reformatory or Industrial Schools under sanction of law, a punishable offence throughout the Dominion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The two provisions referred to in this question and the last have been submitted to the Commissioners, and are receiving attention.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Whether those provisions will ultimately be embodied in the Criminal Law is a question which we cannot positively pronounce upon yet.

NEW HARBOR BREAKWATER, GUYSBOROUGH
COUNTY, N. S.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed, this year, with the building of a breakwater at New Harbor, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, for which $2,000 were provided in the Estimates last Session; and whether it is the intention to provide an additional sum for this important work in the Estimates this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that when the time came to use the vote of $2,000 appropriated by Parliament, enquiries were instituted as to the total amount required to make it a really useful work. It was found that the amount was so large the Government were not prepared at that time to proceed with the work. I may say that a similar answer applies to the second question to be asked by the hon. gentleman: [Whether it is the intention of the Government to commence, this year, the building of a breakwater at Indian Harbour, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, for which $1,000 were provided in the Estimates last year; and whether an additional sum will be provided in the Estimates this year for continuing the work?]

EMPLOYÉS IN CUSTOMS, POST AND INLAND REVENUE OFFICES AT MONTREAL.

Mr. COURSOL moved for a return showing the names, ages, and origins of all persons appointed permanently or employed temporarily in the Customs, Post and Inland Revenue offices at Montreal, since the 1st May last, and up to the 20th February, instant, and the salary allowed to each of the said employés; also the names of the employés in the offices of Customs and Excise, who are placed on the Civil Service List, as being entitled to a pension.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will kindly inform the House what is the object he has in view in submitting the motion.

Mr. COURSOL. When the return is brought down I may have occasion to say a few words.

Motion agreed to.

CONSUMPTION OF DISTILLED AND FERMENTED LIQUORS IN CANADA.

Mr. FOSTER moved (1) for a statement showing the quantities of distilled and fermented liquors under the different names as given in the Trade Returns, imported into and taken for consumption in Canada from 1868 to 1882, both years included, computed in Imperial gallons, each Province separately, the value of the same and the duty paid thereon; (2) the quantity of distilled and fermented liquors under the different names given in the Inland Revenue Returns, manufactured in Canada and taken for consumption therein, by Provinces, the value of the same and the duty paid thereon for the same years; (3) the amount of materials used in brewing and distilling alcoholic liquors in the several Provinces of Canada during the same years. He said: It is not my intention to take up the time of the House in giving reasons for moving for this return, further than to say that I think there is a goodly number of persons in this House, and a large number of persons outside of this House, who will be very much gratified by having, in tabulated form, the information which I have moved for, inasmuch as that information put in tabulated form may have a great deal to do with determining the attitude which persons, both in this House and outside of it, may take with respect to this question. We have been promised legislation to be brought down by this Government with reference to alcoholic liquors or the traffic therein, and my object in moving for this return is to have data which will be unquestionable. There can be no doubt but that the discussion on that question will be thorough, and the state of the traffic in the different Provinces as well as for years in the Dominion, will be under consideration, and an accurate table, such as that asked for, will be, coming before the House in an unquestioned way, very valuable in helping us to make up our minds with respect to the whole question. With these few remarks, hoping there will be no opposition to the motion, and believing the information asked for will be of great value, I beg leave to move the motion.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST LANDS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for communication or representation to the Government on the subject of the simplification of the system of transfer of lands of the North-West. He said: Mr. Speaker, for some years I have had occasion to call the attention of the Government to the importance of the question which is raised by this motion. It is of great importance in the North-West, where the lands are unsettled and the titles are in first hands, and also in those portions of that country which are settled to a very large extent, that there should be some means for the transfer of real estate, simpler than that which now obtains there. During the time of the late Government, a Bill was introduced by the hon. member of the Government, who was specially charged with the administration of North-West affairs, for that purpose; but it was not pressed through Parliament during the Session in question. Since that time, several years have elapsed, and I need hardly say that each year has aggravated the difficulties that exist, and rendered the necessity of intervention in this particular more urgent. I recently noticed that application had been made from a quarter where it might have been least expected, for some change in the laws affecting real estate in this direction, the representation being founded on the system which prevails in Australia. But steps should be taken, not merely in the interests of borrowers, but of those who hold these lands; and I trust that the Government will take such steps as will effectually reduce the financial tax which the present system brings to bear on the transfer of real estate, and introduce such a measure as will greatly simplify the steps attending the transfer of real estate in the North-West Territories.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware that any communications have been received from any company on this subject, but if so, they will be brought down. But owing to representations which have been made, two gentlemen belonging to the legal profession have taken the trouble to prepare a Bill founded on the Australian system, and this Bill is now before the hon. Minister of Justice. Of course, the features of the Bill apply to the North-West, outside of the Province of Manitoba, which will legislate—if it deals with the matter at all—respecting this subject under its own system of conveyance, and after its own fashion. I am not at all sure, however, that the system which has been found to work well in Australia, where they have a peculiar population, and certain peculiarities due to the character of the country, and which do not exist here, can be well adopted here. However, Sir, that is a subject which is worthy of consideration, and it is now receiving the consideration of the hon. Minister of Justice and of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

BUOYS AND BEACONS.

Mr. DAWSON moved for a return of all correspondence which has taken place with any Department of the Government within the past four years, in reference to buoys and beacons in the north channel of Lake Huron, with copies of any contracts entered into for placing the same in the spring and removing them in the fall, and a statement showing in detail the annual cost of the same service for a period of four years immediately antecedent to these contracts having been entered into, distinguishing the amount laid out in soundings, from that chargeable to the mere placing of buoys and beacons. He said: Mr. Speaker, the other day, I felt it to be my duty to call attention to the unfortunate losses, both of life and property, which had taken place on the Great Lakes on the shores of my constituency. These matters are pressed on me by my constituents, and I must now call the attention of the House to a matter which has led to a great deal of difficulty, and which may lead to still more in the future. Some years ago, it was the custom to place the buoys and beacons in the north channel of Lake Huron in charge of an officer employed by the Department of Marine. He was a very careful officer, and he placed them in position with a great deal of judgment. He had been for a number of years—some thirty—in the country, and his experience was of great value. He laid out new channels; and, in fact, it may be said that this gentleman sounded all the channels along the north coast of Lake Huron. There are a great many channels which are exceedingly intricate, and Captain Wilson, the officer in charge, to whom I refer, had always a hobby for finding the best channel through which a steamer could pass. He laid out buoys and beacons every spring, assisted by voyageurs, and in the fall removed them. He placed these buoys and beacons with a great deal of care, and gave satisfaction to those navigating these waters. Suddenly it was thought that this system was too expensive, and a contract was given out for the placing of these buoys and beacons. Now, the contractor to whom this work was given, turned out to be a man of no experience. He did not even employ men who knew the channels, because his contract would not afford it, and they are known to very few persons. In fact, I know of no person there who knew them so well as Captain Wilson, the person to whom their care was so long entrusted. The fact is, however, that they were misplaced by the contractor, and the first year that he had the contract vessels ran aground or were delayed because their officers were afraid to venture these channels if it were at all dark, so that, in addition to the loss of vessels by stranding, there was great loss of time. This state of things has continued for some years, and it is not at all improving—in fact it is just as bad as it was the first day the contract was let. The matter stands in this way: supposing tenders were to be advertised for and a contract let for placing of buoys and lightships in the St. Lawrence River; supposing some shopkeeper were to get the contract, if the law required it to be given by contract, the result would be that many of those buoys and lightships would most certainly be out of place. That sort of thing has occurred in the north channel of Lake Huron; no experienced person has been there to overlook the work; the contractor himself did not know where to place these guides to navigation, and the consequence has been, as I said before, that they have in certain sections been misplaced, vessels have been grounded or have been obliged to move their loads at great expense. The Quebec for example. Experienced captains do not mind this state of things very much in daylight, because they know the channels, but strangers going there cannot follow them as experienced mariners do. This, I have no doubt, occurred before the present order of things was established in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and I feel certain that when the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine is drawn to the matter, he will be ready to bring about a change in the system, so that all these matters may be properly attended to. In the past, the Department of Marine and Fisheries cannot altogether escape the responsibility for those terrible losses which have taken place in the great lakes—losses by which no less than 350 of the inhabitants of Algoma have either been roasted to death in burning vessels, or found watery graves, and by which, as I explained the other day, a whole fleet of vessels has been lost. I know the attention of the Department has been directed to ocean navigation—to the Maritime Provinces, where larger interests are at stake; but it must be borne in mind that the shipping interest is increasing very largely on these lakes. New steamers are constantly being put on, and at Thunder Bay, last summer, no less than two hundred thousand tons of shipping called, either going or coming. This interest is becoming too important to be neglected, and I call the attention of the hon. Minister to it, and to one fact in particular: that no matter what the requirements of the law may be, no matter if it is required that contracts should be given out for this service, the spirit of the law certainly requires that the work should be done, while, as a matter of fact, the work has not been done. The buoys have not been put in the proper places, and in view of the loss which has occurred on these lakes, and of the great dissatisfaction existing—and I am sure that the correspondence will show that it does exist—there has been no economy in the present system. The public have been involved in a far greater loss by the misplacement of these buoys and beacons than all the expense required to put them in their proper places would have amounted to.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION TO CANADA IN 1882.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved for a statement showing the number of immigrants that have arrived in the Dominion during the calendar year ending December 31st, 1882, to settle in Canada, and their nationality; also, showing the number that have settled in each Province respectively, and also in the Territories of the Dominion as far as can be ascertained.

Mr. POPE. I beg to say to the hon. gentleman that all the information for which he asks will be found in the report of my Department.

Motion withdrawn.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return giving a full statement of all coal entered ex-warehouse free or for exportation, during the years ending June 30th, 1881 and 1882, showing the quantity so entered at each port, the names of persons having entered, the quantities ex-warehoused by each person, and if exported the name of the vessel or railroad by which exported, the place to which exported, and copies of the cancelling certificates showing that such coal had been landed in the ports to which exported.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Copies of all correspondence between any hon. member of the Government and any licensed victuallers, or any one on behalf of any organization of licensed victuallers; and of all petitions, memorials or resolutions presented by any such person on the subject of legislation affecting the sale of liquors.—(Mr. Blake.)

Mr. DAWSON.

Return of all memorials, petitions and correspondence of any kind, asking for a drawback on sugar refined in Canada when exported to any foreign country, the parties applying, their statement of drawback proposed, and any answers of the Government thereto, also copy of any regulations made for such drawback.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Copies of all memorials, petitions and correspondence relating to the abolition of duty on grain, flour and coal during the calendar year 1882, and subsequently.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

Copies of all correspondence with the Government or any hon. member thereof, during the calendar year 1882, referring to the construction of a railway bridge over the River St. John at St. John.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

PACIFIC RAILWAY RETURN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I have just looked cursorily at the return brought down relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I observe that that portion of it required by the Consolidated Railway Act contains a great many more blanks than items. Our Resolution required that we should have, within fifteen days of the opening of the Session, a return giving this information up to the end of the fiscal year previous, and also, to as late a day as practicable thereafter, because it was felt to be very important that in the case of the Pacific Railway we should have this information. There is no information given after the 30th of June, and even up to that date the hon. gentleman will find that the return is almost entirely blank paper. It seems to me that some effort should be made to procure this information which the Company is required, under Statute, to give us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I understand, the return the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is required by law to make, is up to a certain date, the 30th of June. The Company has been called upon to make that return, and, as far as my recollection goes, the return brought down embraces everything except contracts.

Mr. BLAKE. No; that is what I complain of. The form is the form required by the hon. Minister—it consists of sheets with printed headings, but the information required by the Statute is wanting.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There has always been the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining from the railway companies these statistical returns as required by law. My hon. predecessor had occasion to refer once or twice to the great difficulty there was in procuring this information. However, I will turn my attention to the matter and endeavor to obtain all the information I possibly can.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Has the hon. gentleman got the usual statistical account of railways prepared for this Session?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:25 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 27th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RETURN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a return from the Department of the Interior, of the correspondence in relation to the allotment of lands for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also of the reservation of lands for that purpose, together with a map showing the lands allotted and the lands reserved.

MONEY REQUIRED FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 21) to authorize the raising by way of loan of certain sums of money required for the public service.

Mr. BLAKE. On the motion of an hon. friend, an order was granted for the production of correspondence with agents on the subject of commission. There is no objection to the second reading of the Bill, but I would prefer that it be not taken another stage until the return is brought down.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have no recollection of such a return being ordered this Session. The whole correspondence was before the House last Session.

Mr. BLAKE. Is there no subsequent correspondence?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No subsequent correspondence, except respecting the arrangement made at that time.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported.

TELEGRAPH COMMUNICATION WITH BERMUDA.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish to state to the hon. member for Halifax, by way of explanation, that the other day, when I answered the question put by him with respect to correspondence between the Imperial and this Government, as to the establishment of a telegraph line with Bermuda, I was mistaken—I had forgotten that there existed some correspondence on this subject; and, therefore, I have thought it best to correct the matter by laying this correspondence on the Table.

PACIFIC RAILWAY RATES.

Mr. BLAKE. I mentioned some points, yesterday, which I suppose require investigation as to returns required under the Consolidated Act. I notice that one return on the subject of rates and tolls is antedated, and has reference to some other parts of returns that relate to action taken on the 9th of April, 1881. It gives certain special rates and through rates, and local rates, but the through rates concern only a very small portion of the line, as it now exists, and which has been open for traffic, as the newspapers inform us, for some months. Reference is made to an application on the subject of a further tariff, but I would suppose that no arrangement had been reached for a tariff of through rates for those portions of the railway which have been opened since the 9th of April, 1881—this seems to affect the return vitally; but I assume, that no tariff has been fixed at all for through rates beyond the small extent of it, which could be arranged under the Act of 1881. Besides the absence of any correspondence on the subject of the tariff, I notice that the report of the engineer states that a further tariff is under consideration; if so, it must have been sent in by the Company in draft and submitted to the Government; and if this is the case, correspondence must exist respecting it, and the Company's proposal with reference to this tariff ought to be laid on the Table in pursuance of the Resolution passed by this House, though a decision on it by the Government had not been reached.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the fact; a decision by the Government on this subject has not been reached—the Railway Company has made application for a tariff; but it is not finally determined. When a tariff, however, is adopted, all the necessary information will be laid before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will see, that if that is the state of things there is no authority for a through rate on the part of the Railway Company in the North-West; and if the hon. gentleman proposes so far to vary from the Resolution, as to submit the correspondence which has passed on the subject of the proposed tariff, because a decision by the Government has not yet been reached, I think it reasonable to enquire whether he intends that this decision shall be reached in such time that the necessary papers can be submitted to the House during the present Session; else, obviously, if the decision be reserved until it will be too late for consideration during the present Session that will be highly objectionable to the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will answer the hon. gentleman, when I make a more specific statement on the subject than I can at this moment.

SHIPPING TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct a telegraph line, in the interest of shipping, from Chatham to Escuminac Light-house?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to state, in answer to my hon. friend, that this matter is now receiving the best consideration of the Government.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish communication by schooner or steam between the Intercolonial Railway at Newcastle and Chatham, and the villages of Burnt Church, Neguac, Tabusintac, Black Brook, Baie de Vent and the Islands at the mouth of the Miramichi, for the purpose of promoting the extension of the fresh fish exportation, and thus increasing the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, that an application has been received by the Government on this subject, and referred to the Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway for his report. When we have received that report, we will be able to state to the hon. gentleman what the Government proposes to do respecting this matter.

THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether any correspondence has passed, of which the Government have any intimation, between the Government of the United States and the British Minister at Washington, or between the Government of the United States and the British Government, in relation to a notice of termination of the Fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, or having any bearing thereon?

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the British Minister at Washington has from time to time forwarded to this Government copies of all the resolutions and of all the proceedings in Congress, respecting the Fishery Treaty.

INLAND WATERS' FISHERIES.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether the Government have taken any steps, by correspondence or otherwise, for the purpose of arranging for or regulating the fisheries on the inland waters of the Dominion, in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court, which has altered the relation to and the powers exercised by the Dominion Government over those fisheries; and if so, whether any arrangements and what have been come to on the subject?

Mr. McLELAN. I may, say for the information of the hon. gentleman, that no correspondence has passed between us and the Local Governments on this matter. At least there has been no official correspondence on the subject with me, as the head of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; but several interviews have taken place with the members of the Governments of Quebec and New Brunswick; but there has been no official correspondence, and no arrangements have been made between the two Governments—between the General and those Local Governments,—respecting this matter.

HYDROGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. FORTIN moved for copies of all correspondence between any members of this House or other persons and the Government, in relation to the hydrographical survey of the Great Lakes, the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence and the other maritime coasts of Canada. He said: Before the motion is put to a vote, I would like to address some remarks to the House. The idea of having a hydrographical survey of the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the other maritime coasts of Canada, is not new to me. I spent many years on the Gulf of St. Lawrence, but it was not long until I discovered that, in one respect at least, we were behind our neighbors. Whilst in the United States there is the coast survey under the department of the navy—which survey has been engaged for many years in perfecting the hydrography of the sea coasts of that country, in sounding their harbors and rivers, and describing the changes which take place in them from year to year—whilst the lakes are surveyed by the topographical survey which is attached to the American army, and whilst they issue those excellent charts that are not surpassed in the world, we, on the other hand, have had very little of such surveying done. The surveys of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence were made by hydrographical officers of the British navy many years ago. The work was an excellent one, and I wish especially to mention here, in the most honorable terms, the name of Captain Bayfield, who, for many years, surveyed the coasts of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. But it must be remembered that this work was done thirty years ago, and since that time we have only had hydrographers engaged at the work during a couple of seasons. I remember that one of the large vessels belonging to the fleet of the Allan's, when they were in the habit of passing between the Island of Anticosti and the north shore, passed close to the said north shore, and became stranded on a large ledge opposite the mouth of the River Coacochoo, which is not marked on the chart. The weather happened to be fine, else the vessel would have been lost; but as it was, she was extricated. About that time, when I was cruising on board of La Canadienne—the vessel employed for the protection of the fisheries—we were stranded on a rock opposite Wash-shee-cotoi River, over which there was only nine feet of water, and it was not indicated on the chart. I find no fault with hydrographers like Bayfield, who toiled for so many years in performing that service, but it is well known that the hydrography of a coast is never complete. A rocky coast may not change, but along sand and mud banks and at the mouths of rivers constant changes are taking place; and this must especially be the case at the mouth of that mighty river the St. Lawrence which drains so immense an area of country. The circumstances are not the same now as they were fifty years ago. At that time Upper Canada, drained by the great lakes and their connecting rivers, was only partially settled, while in Lower Canada the back country was hardly settled at all; but to-day the most of the valley of the St. Lawrence, and the country along the great lakes and rivers, is settled, and as a consequence it is drained almost to perfection; and in the spring time, when the snow thaws, and in the fall, during a continuation of heavy rains, there is an immense body of water running down into the St. Lawrence, and this water rushes down at an immense speed—a fact which is noticed not only by the fishermen but by the mariners as well. The changes in the currents which are made by this drainage, are of course not indicated by the charts. I find that on many points along the St. Lawrence, such as the Traverse, the harbor of Quebec, as well as in Lake St. Peter and other places, great changes have taken place during the last thirty years. Yet we have to use the charts that were made by Captain Bayfield, which have not been altered for the last twenty or thirty years, and upon which, therefore, these changes are not indicated. I am glad that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr Dawson), has brought before the House the necessity of making a re-sounding of the lakes—a necessity which has been made apparent by the terrible accidents of the last few years, by which so many lives have been sacrificed. As I said before, the necessity of such a survey of the lower waters of Canada was known to me long ago, but I was afraid to bring the matter before the House or the public, because I feared the people would not be convinced by my simple words, so I waited for an opportune time, and that time has come. I attach great importance to this matter, because, as I have pointed out before, I regard the St. Lawrence as a great element in the future of Canada; and if the House is not tired I will read a few words of what I said on the subject some years ago:

"This country, that is Canada proper, without the North-West and the Lower Provinces, had been described as a narrow strip of land traversed by a large body of water. We might reverse that proposition, and say that Canada consists of an immense and magnificent water-course, with a strip of land on either side. This magnificent sheet of water, composed of the lakes of the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, is the pride and hope of Canada. By it the early pioneers of Canada were enabled to penetrate in the very heart of the country and discover the great North-West Territories, and through it civilization spread from the East to the West, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and up the valley of the Ottawa. The motto of this city and seaport is 'Natura fortis, industria crescit.' We should be able to say of the magnificent St. Lawrence water-course: 'Natura potens, industria crescit.' What has been the hope of this country from the beginning? It is that by means of this water-course we may become the carriers of the trade of the Far West. That has been the hope of Canada, and if we acquire that, we acquire wealth and power."

These are words which I uttered in Quebec some years ago in a lecture I delivered on the signal system. Now, we must do something for the St. Lawrence because the shipping trade of the river is not increasing so fast as many people believe. I have taken the trouble to enquire as to the amount of tonnage that came to the ports of Montreal and Quebec in 1872, 1877 and 1882, and I find that, in 1872, it was 1,094,883, in 1877, 1,133,893, and, in 1882, 1,030,736. Thus we find that instead of the tonnage increasing it has actually receded from 1872 to 1882 about 60,000 tons. These figures show the urgency of this matter, and should stimulate us to try to decrease the dangers of navigation of the St. Lawrence. In order to do that you must show the mariner not only the right way to go, but where the dangerous currents are; and that is the reason I recommend that the Government should not only endeavor to obtain from the Imperial Government a hydrographical officer to survey the lakes, but one or more, if necessary, to perfect the survey of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence and its coasts, so that there may be some assurance that the directions laid down in the pilot books may be authentic, not with reference to thirty years ago but with reference to today. Now, I know, from the experience of old fishermen and old coasters, that the currents are not the same as they were some years ago; they are stronger in the spring and weaker in the summer, because in the summer we have a drouth and in the spring a great flow of water, neither of which we had to an equal extent in former years, and both of these have an effect upon the currents in the gulf and the river as well as upon the tides. I do not think the Government will be opposed to this application made by the people of the Lakes and of the River St. Lawrence, because this is a matter of necessity. Some people may say that we have our surveyors and civil engineers in this country, whom we send to make plans of any changes on our coasts. That is true; but these plans are useless for the hydrography of this country, and if they were sent to England they would not be accepted by hydrographers, because hydrographical surveying is done on an entirely different principle from common surveying. In order to show the extent of the dangers on the St. Lawrence in the fall, owing principally to the currents, I will cite the rates of insurance charged on ships and cargoes from Quebec to ports in Great Britain: June, July and August,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; August 31st to September 15th,  $1\frac{3}{4}$  to  $2\frac{1}{4}$  per cent.; September 15th to September 30th,  $2\frac{1}{4}$  to  $3\frac{1}{4}$  per cent.; October 1st to October 15th,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; October 15th to October 31st,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; November 1st to November 19th,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  to  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; after November 19th the rates change daily, according to the appearance of the weather. I could bring many competent witnesses to show that the dangers of navigation in the lower parts of the St. Lawrence and of the maritime coasts would be greatly lessened if the waters were surveyed again by hydrographical surveyors, and the currents laid down on the charts as they really exist. I do not wish to detain the House; I think the importance of this matter will be appreciated by the Government, and I hope and believe they will induce the British Government to take action in the matter, because most of the vessels coming here are British vessels, manned by English sailors. We have young men studying in the Military College at Kingston, and it is said that many of them, when they get out, go to the United States or elsewhere. Some of these young men might be employed in this country. We might have our own hydrographical department, and when England will be convinced that our own people will be able to make the hydrography of this country, she will allow us our own hydrographical department, and she will accept our work as she did in the case of the Board of Examiners for sailing masters and mates. I hope the Government will do their best to bring about this very desirable object.

Mr. DAWSON. I am very glad indeed to see that the hon. member for Gaspé, in bringing this very important matter before the House, has not forgotten the great lakes. It is certainly very necessary that a hydrographical survey should now be made of these lakes, and, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, it should be made in connection with the Admiralty in England. It is now a long time since the first survey was made of these inland waters by Captain, afterwards Admiral, Bayfield, and he certainly did wonders at the time, considering the means at his disposal, and that the country around was then an unknown region. It is not to be wondered at that a good many shoals have since been discovered that were not known in his day. He had chiefly to rely for information on the Indians who coast along near the shores, very seldom venturing far out with their little canoes into these great inland seas. Latterly, and for some years past, there have been discoveries of shoals in the Georgian Bay and also in Lake Superior. It is very desirable these shoals should be laid down on the charts. The American Government, within the past few years, have made a most careful hydrographical survey of the United States side of these lakes. Every shoal is marked as well as the sounding. The shipping on the great lakes is increasing. As I said the other day, no less than 200,000 tons of shipping were entered at the port of Prince Arthur's Landing in Thunder Bay during the past summer. New steamers are being built constantly. I may mention that the Messrs. Beatty, of Sarnia, who have taken a great interest in the great lakes, and laid out their capital in building ships, have now the largest and finest steamer ever used in these lakes, nearly completed at Sarnia. In view of the immense amount of money being invested in shipping, and the great interests at stake, I certainly join with my hon. friend from Gaspé in recommending to the Government that a survey should be made.

Mr. McLELAN. The papers in connection with this matter will be brought down as speedily as possible. I will say to the hon. gentleman who called for them that I am not aware, since I took the Department of Marine and Fisheries, that any communications have been forwarded to that Department respecting the navigation of the St. Lawrence, except those forwarded by the hon. gentleman himself a few days ago. When the information was given to the Department that in the lakes there were certain shoals, not laid down in Bayfield's chart, I at once took the necessary steps to have a hydrographic officer to take charge of a survey on the inland waters, for the purpose of having anything he might discover laid down on the charts already existing, so that they might be rendered as valuable as possible. Both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have not over-stated the importance to the country of having the charts by which the gulf and lakes are navigated made as perfect as possible; and I think the hon. gentleman who moved for the papers, and who has made many valuable suggestions respecting the navigation of the St. Lawrence—in fact all the hon. gentleman's suggestions have been of great value to the country—will admit the Government has always shown its willingness to put in practice the suggestions he has made. Many lights have been added, fog alarms and whistles have been placed at different points, and telegraphic communication furnished, nearly throughout the length of the gulf. If anything be wanting to make the navigation of the St. Lawrence more safe than it is, the Government will not be slow to do all that is necessary. We have had an answer to our enquiry, and have been informed that an officer of the Hydrographic Society has been ordered to place himself in communication with us to perfect plans for a survey of the inland lakes.

Motion agreed to.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4:15 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 23th February, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUEEN'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House, that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, a certified copy of the Judgment of the said Court, in the Election Appeal relating to the Electoral District of Queen's County District, in the Province of Prince Edward Island, in which John Theophilus Jenkins was appellant, and Frederick de St. Croix Brecken was respondent, together with a copy of the evidence brought before that Court, said judgment declaring the respondent duly elected.

PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. FORBES enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to expend the money voted in the Estimates of 1882, for the building of a breakwater on the west side of Liverpool Bay, Queen's County, Nova Scotia, during the coming summer; and if so, will it be done by tender, contract, or by commission?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I beg to inform the hon. gentleman, that, after looking into the matter, I am informed, by my Chief Engineer, that this will be a very costly work, and that it will consequently require more examination before we can proceed with the work.

SUMMERSIDE RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. YEO enquired, Whether the hon. Minister of Railways has had his attention called to the dangerous situation of the railway station in Summerside, Prince Edward Island; and whether it is his intention, this summer, to have the necessary alteration made to relieve the travelling public from the dangers they are daily subject to arising from the situation of this station house?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I may say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that my attention has been called to the subject, and I have learned that the matter has been carefully examined into. The land which was at one time expropriated by the Local Government for the building of an over-head bridge, was, however, surrendered by that Government and is now sold to private parties to be built upon. Had this not been done, we should have proposed the erection of an over-head bridge, as was originally intended.

APPOINTMENT OF HONORABLE HECTOR FABRE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). In moving for copies of the correspondence relating to the appointment of Hon. Hector Fabre to the position he now occupies in France, with copies of all communications and instructions issued to him by order of the Government, also statement showing the duties required of him and the salary and commission paid or to be paid for such services, as well as a statement of all other expenses, and a statement of salary received from the Province of Quebec and contingencies; also copies of all reports made by the hon. Hector Fabre, with any official papers showing the result of the mission, said: Mr. Speaker, my object in making this motion is to make known what the duties of the hon. Mr. Fabre in Paris are. This proposition I also make in consequence of the intimation given to this House by the hon. the Finance Minister, last year, that he intended to utilize Mr. Fabre's services while in Paris. It would be very important for us to know what these services have been, and whether they are really worth the money paid out of the public exchequer to remunerate him. On the other hand, the public are interested in knowing whether or not Mr. Fabre has rendered such services as he had promised, and if any report has been received from him; finally, what is the nature and character of his occupation? We are so far completely in the dark on the subject. It does not appear from any of the public records, that Mr. Fabre has sent in any report regarding the aid given by him to emigration, or concerning any literary or political service that he may have rendered Canada. When the papers asked for are laid before the House, some light will probably be thrown on the subject, but so far we are in utter darkness. Hence I make this motion, and I hope the papers asked for will be laid before the House at an early day. Some evil disposed persons say that the occupation of Mr. Fabre in Paris does not amount to much, and they add, by means of mockery, that he was sent there to observe the transit of Venus. He may have business more important than that to transact; in any case, the House would be happy to know what are his duties and the amount of his salary as the representative of this country at the Paris Observatory.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). The hon. member has included in his motion "a statement of the salary received from the Province of Quebec and contingencies." The hon. gentleman ought to know that we cannot supply this information, and he should not ask for it. It is impossible for us to supply this information. Then, as a matter of form, the hon. member should, by his motion, ask the Government and not the House for these papers, as it is a question of money.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). I believe the intimation given this House by the hon. the Finance Minister, last year, was that the Dominion Government intended to avail themselves of the services of Mr. Fabre while in Paris, conjointly with the Quebec Government, and that he had been sent on a special mission by the Federal Government. As a matter of course the two Governments must have come to certain conclusions regarding the remuneration to be allowed Mr. Fabre, and if documents exist relating to this salary we should have them. Surely Mr. Fabre does not receive a double salary; in any case, if he is paid a double salary, it is still further reason for us to know what is paid by the Ottawa Government and what by the Government of the Province of Quebec?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). The hon. member would do well to leave out that part of his motion, and, if the Government do not furnish all the information he requests, he may move for additional papers; but I think he will find all he wants in the papers which will be laid before the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation). Then I withdraw that part of my motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EXPENDITURE ON TELEGRAMS IN PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of the expenditure for each month elapsed for the current fiscal year, on telegrams charged to various works in the Department of Public Works, showing the amount charged to each work, respectively, and for a like statement from November, 1881, to June, 1882, inclusive. He said: I notice by a letter from the Secretary of the Public Works Department, which appears in the report of the Auditor-General, that a change was made in the course of the last fiscal year in the mode of charging the particular contingencies to which the motion refers. An explanation having been asked of the discrepancy between the amount expended for contingencies and the amount voted therefor, the letter states that had the cost of telegrams for certain months, instead of being defrayed from contingencies, been charged, as is now done, to the various works, the expenditure would have been some $1,600 less than the amount shown, and that consequently the vote would not have been over expended. For the purpose of comparison, it is necessary that we should have the contingencies stated in the same way from year to year, and it is with that view, and also for the purpose of enabling us to understand how much of this amount has been charged in works of a description over which the House has no effective scrutiny, that I make the motion, because the small details of these works do not come before us except on special application.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman is in error with regard to these telegrams. So far as I am aware the telegrams in connection with the different works have always been charged to those works; but at a period last year—I do not remember at what period—the Auditor-General, wishing to have all the accounts for telegrams put under one head, endeavored to have the separate accounts for the different works brought together, in order that they might be added to the accounts for the other Departments. I objected to that proposition, on the ground that such a method was not foreseen when the money was voted for the contingencies of the Department, and that the amount voted would therefore be insufficient. I would have had no objection to its being done in some way; but it was a question of money, and therefore I said, no, it must be charged as before. Of course, I have no objection to the motion.

THE QU'APPELLE VALLEY FARMING COMPANY.

Mr. WATSON moved for copies of the Order in Council setting apart lands to be granted to the Qu'Appelle Valley Farming Company, and containing the conditions of such grant; also, copies of all correspondence with said company in reference to the fulfilment of the terms of said Order, and to the removal of settlers found on said lands; also, statement of all payments made by said company and work done by them in pursuance of the terms of said Order; also, copies of all orders issued from the Dominion Lands Department at Ottawa or from the Dominion Land Office at Winnipeg or elsewhere, in regard to the removal of such settlers; also, copies of all correspondence, petitions or statements forwarded by them, and all reports made by any officer of the said Government, in connection with the company or its lands, statement of the date of such grant and when occupied by said company. He said: I may state my reasons for asking for this correspondence. In view of the great amount of attention paid to advertising our North-West, it is not only a great benefit to the country to induce settlers to go there, but after we get them there we must protect them. A great deal of inconvenience has arisen from the granting of large tracts of land to large farming and colonization companies. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that all even-numbered sections, even in colonization companies' tracts, are open for settlement, and that settlers are not obliged to apply to the colonization companies. If that is the case, it is not the prevailing opinion in the North-West, and I make this motion, not out of mere curiosity, but with the view of getting at the bottom of some of the grievances of North-West settlers. We have a great many grievances; but we feel that the just claims of the settlers on those large colonization tracts ought to be respected in advance of the claims of the companies. We believe that most of these squatters who are now unprotected by the Government, went on the lands previous to their being set apart by the Government for colonization companies or large farms. I think it would be in the best interest of the country to have these papers brought down.

Mr. CASEY. I should not say anything in regard to this motion were it not that I have some personal knowledge of the claims of the settlers in question, from having visited the tract of the Qu'Appelle Valley Farming Company last summer, and I feel it due to those settlers to assist my hon. friend who has made the motion, in laying their case before the House and the Government. In the first place, it is claimed by these settlers, and I think justly, that it was very bad policy on the part of the Government to set apart a large block of land on the line of railway for a farming company. This is all the more objectionable because at that particular point there is an important station on the railway—a station where a large and prosperous farming community ought to spring up, and where it is prevented from springing up by the fact of these lands having been granted en bloc to this farming company—not merely the odd sections, but the even sections as well, making a solid block from which all individual settlers are excluded. The managers of this company claim that they have a special reason for obtaining such a grant, namely: that they have established a model farm for the purpose of showing the people of the North-West how they ought to farm. If that were the object of the grant this model farm would have been quite as useful if it had been established at some little distance from the railway, where it would not have interfered to such an extent with individual settlement. But their claim of setting up a model farm is absurd. They are simply a company of speculators, who intend to hold the land as long as convenient, and after they have broken a portion, to sell it at a very greatly advanced price. As for its being a model farm in any sense, that is absurd—they are simply doing the ordinary sort of breaking and cultivation that any settler does; and while I was there, they were doing it in a much more careless and haphazard way than is usually the case, for they were breaking the land at a time of the year when it was really of no use to do it. With regard to the claims of the settlers, I can only give their own case, which, they being honest and industrious men, is correct so far as I know. They claim that they went there early in April or May—at all events before any notice was given by anybody that these lands were reserved for the Qu'Appelle Farming Company. They found that the townships in which they settled were not yet sub-divided, and as they did not intend to be speculators, but bona fide settlers, they employed a surveyor to find out which were the even-numbered sections; having found the even-numbered sections, they settled upon them, and waited for the advent of the Government agent, when they could enter for their homesteads in the regular form. Some time after their settlement on these lands, notices were put up by the agents of the Qu'Appelle Farming Company, stating that the lands were reserved for them by the Government. The settlers claimed that at the time these notices were put up, the company had no right to the lands, not having fulfilled the conditions upon which the Government were to grant them, and therefore had no right to put them up. These were not authoritative notices from the Land Office but mere statements of the company. The settlers refused to move. Others came in and the company shortly afterwards took possession and attempted to cultivate the land of some of these settlers. This was resisted in a peaceable way, I believe, and the attempt was given up. In the meantime, I am led to understand petitions have been sent in to the Government—perhaps only to the agency at Winnipeg—setting forth their claims. It would be interesting to see what these claims are, and how they agree with the facts of the case as established by the official documents. The Government should give special attention to the claims of these so-called squatters, recognizing them when they do not absolutely interfere with definite agreements and contracts between the Government and other parties. These men are generally called squatters as if the name were one of reproach, but the squatter is the bona fide settler in our North-West. The Government have not seen fit to keep up with the march of railway construction in the sub-division of townships. Even where they have the townships sub-divided they have not seen fit to send agents out, and there is no means left to one who wants to become a bona fide settler except to squat on the land. As a matter of policy, the rights of these men who have gone in there with the intention of becoming actual farmers and improvers of the soil, should be respected even at the expense of speculators, whenever the interests of the two should happen to clash. Of course, if a definite contract has been made with a certain company and full notice given by the Government that these lands are not open, the Government has no option; but where the settler has not had full notice, his claim, as a matter of public right and justice, should be respected in preference to those of any company. In regard to these people, they were not of the class who squat on sections around where it is expected a railway station will be built, with the view of making a speculation by selling their rights afterwards. They settled the whole township for six or eight miles back from the railway on nearly all even sections, though some, of course, happened to be near the railway. The bulk went in as bona fide settlers, not for speculation at all. I hope these returns will be brought down in time for us to see the real facts, and that the Government have shown more consideration for the rights of the settlers than the latter believe has been the case.

DURHAM AND WALKERTON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LANDERKIN, in moving for all papers and correspondence relating to the change of mail service between Durham and Walkerton; also a statement showing the cost of the old and the new service, and the comparative efficiency of each, said: I may say that until last Session a stage ran between Durham and Walkerton. It served several offices between those points—Allan Park, Hanover, and Maple Hill. A change was then made, owing to the completion of railways there. A railway was projected from Stratford to Warton, another from Palmerston to Durham, which interfered with the old system. The office at Hanover was served by the railway, and also the office at Durham, and the intervening offices were served from those points. Allan Park was served from Hanover, and Maple Hill from Walkerton. The present service is very inefficient, and the cost is almost equivalent to that of the daily stage which formerly ran between those points. If a letter is mailed at Durham for Walkerton to-day, it will not reach its destination, a distance of seventeen miles, until to-morrow afternoon. If a letter be mailed from Hanover to Walkerton, six miles, it will not reach there before the following afternoon. When it is understood that Durham is the register office for the County of Grey, and Walkerton for the County of Bruce, and that in each much banking and business is done, you will see the importance of making a change and coming back to the old system of having a stage run from Durham in the morning to Walkerton, and returning in the evening, serving the way offices as it formerly did. This would be a great convenience to the people of that part of the country. I hope the Government will take the matter into consideration, as the amount asked for is not great by the contractor who has been in the service of the Government for many years, and who always discharged the duties of his position with great efficiency. The change to the old system would give great satisfaction and save the community a vast amount of expense, because, under the present system, those who have a considerable amount of business to do are obliged to have a private courier to carry their mails to points where their business leads them. I hope the Government will look into this matter, and see that the system which gave such satisfaction to the people be restored. The cost of the old service I do not think amounted to as much as that of the present service. The present service to those way offices is in one instance on horseback, and in another in single conveyance. I understand petitions have been sent in praying for a return to the old service, and I hope the Government will consider those petitions, and see that the public interest is no longer neglected by the present inefficient service.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return showing: 1st. The number of licensed tobacco manufactories on the first day of February, 1883, in which Canadian leaf is exclusively used; 2nd. The quantity of Canadian leaf used in tobacco manufactories since the passing of the Inland Revenue Act of 1880, to 1st February, 1883; 3rd. The quantity of cigars and cavendish produced, respectively, since the 1st May, 1880, to 1st February, 1883, in manufactories in which Canadian leaf is exclusively used.—(Mr. Gigault.)

Statement for the fiscal years 1880-81 and 1881-82, and for the current year to date, as to persons employed in any of the Departments whose remuneration is charged to Public Works in connection with which they are employed, giving:—1. The name. 2. The date of first employment. 3. The remuneration. 4. The nature of the service. 5. The works to which the remuneration is charged, with the amount charged to each work.—(Mr. Blake.)

Return giving the number of immigrant agents or persons employed (other than those on the regular and published lists) by the Government or Department of Agriculture, and sent from Canada to Europe, who received pay from the Government during the calendar years of 1881 and 1882; the names of persons so employed; the instructions given to them; the terms of engagement; the time each has been so employed, and the remuneration paid to each person so employed.—(Mr. Burpee, Sunbury.)

Copies of all contracts entered into by the Post Office Department with any person whomsoever for the carrying of the mails by steamer during the winter season, between the wharf at St. Denis, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and Murray Bay on the north shore; with a statement showing the name and tonnage of the steamer employed in that service, and a statement of all the trips made by such steamer in fulfilling the said contract.—(Mr. Laurier.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I desire the attention of the hon. the First Minister to some omissions which appeared in the returns presented on his behalf in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway. For convenience I have made a memorandum which I will send to the hon. gentleman. The papers themselves indicate that certain letters passed, which, by some miscarriage, have not been appended; and they also show certain plans and maps, which form the most important point of the return, and which have not been brought down. We have not yet received either the map or plan which was ordered the other day, so far as the hon. gentleman's Department is concerned, and which specifically was to indicate the lands which had actually been granted to the Company, and those which they had applied for and had not been granted, &c. All that has come down in this case is a map which the Company sends to the Government indicating their view of the case, but there is no plan from the Government at all, nothing indicating that this was accepted by the Government. Then there is nothing in the return at all as to the actual grants or patents of any of the lands. We have the twenty-four mile belt, and there is nothing to show that one acre of that has been granted, or what acres have been granted. There are the arrangements by which a large quantity south of the belt, en bloc, has been allotted, in so far as the odd sections are concerned, but there is nothing indicating whether the grant has been made, whether the title has parted from the Crown to the Company, of any of the lands whatever. Nor is there any correspondence at all indicating an objection on the part of the Company to any of the sections along the main line, or indicating even how far they have rejected, or propose to reject, any sections as not fairly fit for settlement. There is nothing to show that; so that for all that appears in this correspondence, the Company has not received a conveyance, or the Crown been enabled to part with one single acre in the North-West yet. I think there must be something indicating these particulars, and I have made a brief note of them for the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The map the hon. gentleman speaks of is prepared, I believe, if it has not been brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was laid on the Table yesterday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I knew it was prepared. I will have it attended to at once. I believe, as a matter of fact, that no patents have been issued at all, and I believe also that the Company has not, as yet, made objections to any of the land on the railway belt.

Mr. BLAKE. As to the question of patents, I observe, in one of the letters, that the Company make an allusion to some land company—not the large land company, but I think the Ontario and Qu'Appelle Land Company—saying they find some difficulty in completing their operations to consequence of claims made by the Indian Department in some particular lots, and I presume that grant has been made with that knowledge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not quite sure that that grant has been issued. I think the Company treats the odd-numbered sections of the belt as if they had a statutory title.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanor shall be competent as witnesses, said: I may say that this is the Bill I submitted to the House last Session. It received the approval of the hon. the First Minister, and it was submitted, I think at his suggestion, to a Select Committee. That Committee reported the Bill with some trifling amendments, but it was so late in the Session that it did not pass through the subsequent stages. The Bill now is precisely the same as was reported by the Committee. The object is to enable defendants and their wives to be witnesses in their own behalf in cases of misdemeanor only. They are not compelled to give evidence, but they may give evidence under certain restrictions. They may be cross-examined, but if the cross-examination goes to the discredit of the witnesses the Judge has the power to restrict it with respect to that point. There is another clause which provides that if a person is charged with any other offence than a misdemeanor, and the Judge is of the opinion, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, that the only case made out is one of misdemeanor, then the defendant can be a witness in his own behalf. I move the second reading with a view of referring it again to a Select Committee, and as there are several Bills of a similar nature I would suggest to the hon. the First Minister the propriety of referring all these Bills to a Select Committee, with a view of consolidating them into one. The Committee I propose are: Mr. McCarthy, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Davies, Mr. Robertson (Hamilton), Mr. Weldon, Mr. Wood (Brockville) and the mover.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the second reading of the Bill under the condition stated by the hon. gentleman—that this and cognate Bills, of which there are several on the paper, should be sent to a Select Committee.

Bill read the second time, and referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Messrs. McCarthy, Davies, Robertson (Hamilton), Wood, Weldon, Cameron (Victoria), Cameron (Huron), Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Amyot, Casgrain, and Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under the circumstances, and with the leave of the House, I beg to move, in the absence of Mr. McCARTHY, the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend an Act respecting Procedure in Criminal Cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law.

Mr. BLAKE. There are several clauses in this Bill which are open to consideration and discussion, one of them being that as to jurisdiction. As the hon. gentleman proposes to refer it to a Committee composed of persons learned in the law, perhaps it would be better to reserve discussion until we see in what shape they send back the Bill.

Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Committee on Bill (No. 6).

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 7), to amend the Criminal Law and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting Offences against the Person. He said: I desire to draw the hon. the First Minister's attention to this Bill. I introduced it last Session, and it received the assent of the hon. the First Minister, who declared that he believed it was a Bill which ought to pass; but with a view to making some amendments and perfecting the Bill, it was referred to a Select Committee. The Committee reported, and on the motion of an hon. gentleman opposite, the Committee of the whole House rose without reporting the Bill, and the result was that the Bill was lost. I again move the second reading of the Bill. I think the more the hon. gentleman considers the question the more he will see the absolute necessity of such a Bill passing. The only ground alleged for the motion by which the Bill was defeated, was that it was an insult to the people to pass such a measure, as such crimes could not possibly be committed in any Canadian community, and with the support of hon. gentlemen opposite who sustained the mover, and on whom I make no reflections, the motion prevailed, and the Bill was accordingly defeated. Since that time four cases have occurred, one of them I think very near the door of the hon. gentleman who made the motion, and two or three others in Ontario, where this very crime intended to be punished by the Bill was committed. I have the cases before me now, but I do not care to read them to the House, as it is not a subject one cares to discuss very fully. Believing the hon. the First Minister entertains the same opinion now as he entertained twelve months ago, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman propose to send this Bill to the same Committee?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) I have no objection, but the Bill was considered by a Select Committee last Session and reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the principle of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I was not on the Select Committee which considered the Bill last Session, but I understand it was very carefully considered, and it would seem unreasonable to send it again to a Select Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All right.

Bill read the second time.

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 27) to amend an Act to incorporate the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Wells.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:30 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 1st March, 1873.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Friday, the 9th day of March, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state the circumstances which induced the Committee to make the recommendation. This is the second extension, and by it the preliminary proceedings on Private Bills may be commenced one month after the opening of the Session.

Mr. BEATY. The reason the Committee recommended the extension of time is that there were eighty-seven Bills of which the Clerk has received notice and only twenty-nine, including those reported to-day, have been passed by the Committee. In view of that fact, it was thought improper, or at least inadvisable, to shut out all remaining Bills of which notice has been given. It was understood, however, that there is to be no more extension, so far as the Committee is concerned. Such further extension, if there is to be any, will have to be made by the House independently of the Committee, as they very reluctantly made the present recommendation under the circumstances I have stated.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not intend to oppose the motion, but it seems to me to furnish additional evidence of the utter break down of the system which we adopted for the proper conduct of Private Bills business. It is necessary that we should take some step, before the Session closes, which will be, by the public and those interested in Private Bills, a sufficient groundwork for our rigidly insisting on the observance of our rules as to Private Bills. It turns out now that, something like two weeks or more after the time stipulated by our rules, there are about fifty Bills of which notice has been given, and for which the petitions have not yet been presented. For that there is no excuse except the old excuse—that Parliament has always broken its regulations in the past, and the petitioners expected that Parliament would do so again. Not only do the opponents of Bills not receive due notice when they are presented late, but there is the more important reason that it is only in the earlier period of the Session that Private Bills receive due attention at the hands of the members; and those Bills which do not come before the Private Bills Committee within the next three or four weeks will not, and cannot, receive that attention which is necessary in order that the Private Bills legislation of the House may be perfected.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I desire to call attention to the fact that two months notice is required for the presentation of a Private Bill, while the proclamation calling Parliament together is required to be published only thirty days before the opening of Parliament. For this reason some of those who came here with petitions for Private Bills are late. I think there ought to be some change; either the proclamation calling Parliament together should be published sooner, or we should require less time for the notices of Private Bills.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham, and while I admit the great force contained in them, and the desirability of adhering to the rules, we must not forget that the rule to which he refers was passed by a defunct House. There are in this House ninety odd new members, of whom I have the honor to be one, and we are of course unacquainted with the rules of the House; we look more at what the practice has been than at the rules or regulations, and we know that in times past that, although rules have been laid down, they have almost invariably been departed from. While I am ready to lay down and adhere to a strict rule, I think it would be rather hard on the young members like myself, who may have supposed that there would be the some relaxation of the rules and regulations as before, to tie us down on this occasion. I would, therefore, ask the Government to relax the rules for a limited time, with the understanding that they will thereafter be enforced.

Mr. BLAKE. I stated that I did not propose to object on this occasion, but I was desirous that before the close of the Session some arrangements should be made by which the rules should be observed. I admit that the hon. gentleman is young in years, but he is old in—

Mr. MITCHELL. Like yourself. It is a pity the hon. gentleman did not finish his sentence. Perhaps the same remark will apply to himself. All I can say is, that I do not propose to be made the butt of the hon. gentleman's criticism, and if he has commenced that game let him go on. If he throws down the gauntlet, he will find me ready to pick it up on any occasion.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think it would be well if all Private Bills were placed in the hands of the Government at the very beginning of the Session, so that the hon. Minister of Justice might at once form his opinion upon the legality of such Bills. In 1874, a Committee of the House was appointed for the purpose of facilitating the business of the House, and I would suggest that a similar Committee should be appointed by this House. Up to this time we have been three weeks in Session, and we have hardly done more than if we had been here three or four days. Perhaps I will be in a position to move in this matter hereafter.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Federal Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 36) to amend the Act incorporating the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company, and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. Gunn.)

Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.—(Mr. Tassé.)

Bill (No. 38) to incorporate the Rainy River Improvement Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 39) to amend the Act 45 Victoria, Chapter 124, respecting the Board for the management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Acadia Powder Company.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Dominion Railway Trust and Construction Company of Canada (Limited).—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 42) to empower the President, Directors and Company of the Grafton Harbor to change the name of the said Company to that of the Grafton Harbor Company, to legalize certain proceedings of said Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No. 43) to change the name of the Missionary Society of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Canada to that of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada, to extend their corporate powers, and for further amendments to their Act of Incorporation.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether the Government have had printed and translated in the French and English language, the appendix annexed to the report of the Select Committee appointed, last Session, to enquire into the operation of the National Policy in relation to the agricultural interests of the Dominion; if not, whether they propose to have it so translated shortly?

Mr. POPE. The Printing Committee alone will have to deal with this. The report is already printed. The Government have no control whatever over the matter.

DISTRIBUTION OF CENSUS RETURNS.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to distribute to the parish priests, ministers, and other pastors of the various parishes of the Dominion, copies of the last Census returns?

Mr. POPE. The distribution, so far as the first volume is concerned, has already been made. Each member of the House has received four copies. A large distribution takes place to foreign corporations, scientific institutions and to libraries. We could not possibly, by any number we print, supply the clergy. That is a matter that can only be dealt with by the House. I would not undertake to deal with it.

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). In pursuance of a notice I gave to the hon. the First Minister a week ago, I propose submitting to the House a motion with reference to the election in the electoral district of King's County, P.E.I. The facts connected with the case are very plain, and I think when the House will have heard them it will have little difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon the subject. It is known, as I mentioned a week ago, that two members are entitled to seats for that electoral district in this Parliament. In the election of June last, four candidates sought the suffrages of the people for that constituency—Mr. McIntyre, who now occupies a seat in this House, Mr. MacDonald, Dr. Robertson and Mr. Muttart. A poll took place, upon which occasion Mr. McIntyre polled 2,124 votes; Dr. Robertson,

2,002; A. C. MacDonald, 1,940, and Mr. Muttart, 1,854 votes. It will thus be seen that Mr. McIntyre had a majority of 184 votes over the third candidate, the person who was third highest on the list, and that Dr. Robertson polled 62 votes over this third highest candidate; in other words, Mr. McIntyre and Dr. Robertson were the two candidates who polled the highest number of votes. Mr. McIntyre was declared elected by the returning officer, but Dr. Robertson, who had the second highest number of votes, was not declared elected. The returning officer, instead of doing what I think by law he was bound to do, and return to this Parliament the two candidates who had the highest number of votes, made what may be called a special return with respect to the second seat. Now, the facts contained in the special return have been submitted to Parliament, brought down by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and published in the Votes and Proceedings; and from that special return one can see the ground upon which the returning officer failed to declare elected the person having the second highest number of votes. The alleged ground is that some seven days after the election a statement was made to the returning officer by certain electors that Mr. Robertson, at the time of his election, was a member of the Legislative Assembly for the Island. Now, Sir, in the view I take of this question, it is wholly unnecessary to consider that point—and, indeed, the returning officer had no right to consider it—and I respectfully submit that this Parliament has no right to consider it. The only question the returning officer had to consider by law was, who had the highest number of votes, and the returning officer erred in considering any other question, and in making a special return to Parliament; and it is the duty of Parliament to correct that error, leaving, of course, all the parties interested such remedy as the law gives them. I therefore, do not propose discussing at all the question of Mr. Robertson's qualification. As a justification for the motion I propose making, I may say that it is of the very first consequence to us here to know, now that a new Parliament is assembled, exactly what the duties and the responsibilities of returning officers are. Especially it is important for us to know that, in view of the fact that last Session the Government of this Dominion saw fit, for reasons best known to themselves, to change the law that had existed on that subject for some time—a law that, in my judgment, always worked well. If returning officers have the power of doing what appears to have been done in this case, gathering facts outside the returns submitted to him, if the returning officer has the right so to deal with candidates and with electors, then no candidate who seeks the suffrages of the people for a seat in Parliament is ever safe. If the functions of a returning officer are otherwise than as I contend they are—of a purely ministerial character—then I say the quicker we know that the better. If returning officers are allowed to exercise their judgment and discretion, and to say who is qualified and who is not, then the sooner we know that the better. In my judgment, that is entirely outside the duties of a returning officer. Now the duties of a returning officer are plain, and are so clearly laid down by law, that I do not see how there can be any doubt on the subject. These duties are laid down by the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 9, Section 59. In so far as the duty of the returning officer is concerned after the votes have been polled, that duty is all practically embraced in this section, and reading it by the light we now have, reading it according to its clear grammatical construction, there cannot be any doubt as to the duties and powers of a returning officer. That section says:

“The returning officer, at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them in the presence of the election clerk, the candidate<sup>s</sup> or their representatives if present, and of at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes, returned by the deputy returning officers."

Now, the duty of the returning officer is clearly to gather from the statements contained in the ballot boxes transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers, the votes polled for each candidate. The law is quite clear:

"The candidate who shall, on the summing up of the votes, be found to have a majority of the votes, be declared elected."

Now, it appears to me that this section is so clear that I cannot understand how it can be argued that the returning officer's duty is other than purely ministerial, it being to sum up the votes cast for each candidate, and, upon the summing up, to give to the candidate who has the largest number of votes the seat. That does not appear to have been done in this case. There is no dispute about the facts. So far, the facts are manifest from the returns submitted to Parliament, and from these facts it appears that Dr. Robertson had a larger number of votes than Mr. A. C. MacDonald. If that is so, then I submit with all deference that it was the duty of the returning officer to have declared Dr. Robertson entitled to the second seat. There are other papers before Parliament now—I think improperly before Parliament—and, of course, one cannot close one's eyes to the fact that they are there. The returning officer has returned certain other documents—I say improperly returned certain other documents—but they are there, and what do they show? They show he did not return Dr. Robertson because it was alleged by some one that, at the time of the nomination, Dr. Robertson was a member of the Local Legislature. I say a returning officer has no power and no right to transmit any such documents as those to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The Statute states what he shall do in summing up the votes, and what he shall do in declaring the persons having the highest number of votes to be elected. It goes further and specifies the documents which he is bound to send with his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and amongst those documents there is no such paper as that which he has seen fit to send here. The law says:

"The returning officer shall also transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, with this return, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers, referred to in section fifty-eight of this Act, together with the voters' lists used in the several polling districts, and any other lists and documents used or required at such election, or which may have been transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers."

You will see that the papers which this functionary, who is responsible to Parliament for the proper discharge of the duty imposed on him by law, ought to return, and was bound to return here—and he should return nothing else, except what by law he was called on to return—do not embrace certain documents sent in by him. They do not embrace a protest signed by some electors seven days after the election when the people at the polls had exercised their franchise. But the returning officer has seen fit so to do. I submit, however, that in dealing with this case we are bound to deal with it as if those particular papers had not been here at all. That is the law, and that is the interpretation given to it, though not quite under the same law but under a kindred Statute, when the subject was discussed in Parliament in 1873. On that occasion the late hon. member for Cardwell—whose opinions on all questions of this kind were equal, if not superior to those of any other person—took the ground that the returning officer should not transmit any papers except those provided by law to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. It was then contended that a copy of the voters' list was properly so transmitted, and could be used in discussing the question then before the House. Mr. John Hilyard Cameron said: "The House has no right to consider the list of voters, as the Statute in no way allowed it as evidence. In this respect it was altogether different from a poll book and could not be accepted by the House as a fact, without proof thereof. I say that the Statute in no way justifies, warrants, or entitles the returning officer in receiving any such protest seven days after the election was over; that it in no way entitles, justifies or warrants the transmission of it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and although it happens to be here, having been so transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, we must deal with the case as if the documents in question were not here. Dealing with it in that light and aspect, what have we got? The simple statement of the returning officer of the electoral district that Mr. McIntyre and Dr. Robertson were the two candidates having the highest number of votes, and that being so it was the plain duty of the returning officer to have declared those gentlemen elected, reserving, of course, as he was bound to do, the right on the part of the minority candidate to contest the return if he thought fit. If he did not see fit to adopt that course, any hon. member has the right to bring the matter before Parliament for consideration. At all events, the duty of the returning officer, in my opinion, was plain and simple. It may be said that is all correct, but this is not a question the House should deal with, and it should be disposed of by some other court or tribunal. I say this is peculiarly a case for the House to deal with. The returning officer has not discharged his duty, as I contend, according to law, and Parliament should, at the first opportunity, rectify the wrong done by the returning officer. The course which I propose to invite the House to adopt is that which has been pursued in this Parliament for a long series of years, both before and after Confederation, namely, that when a returning officer failed to discharge his duty, or did not do his duty properly, the House should seize the earliest opportunity to rectify the wrong done, and give to the candidate entitled to the seat, the seat. One could go back over the whole history of Parliaments in Canada—for the last fifty years at all events—and point to a number of cases bearing upon the subject, both before the law was changed with respect to the trial of controverted elections, and after the law was changed. At all events, long after the House saw fit to appoint Select or Special Committees to try controverted elections, the House, over and over again, rectified the wrongs perpetrated by returning officers. If there ever was a period in the history of this country when it was necessary that that should be done, now is the time. We know a good many wrongs are alleged to have been committed by returning officers during the last Dominion Elections. We know, from the facts submitted, that a wrong has been done in this case, and Parliament should not hesitate a moment to rectify that wrong. I will now refer the House to some cases bearing on the question, in order to show that I am not asking the House to take a course in this case which has not been followed on any previous occasion. I desire to refer to a case which took place about forty years ago in the Parliament of old Canada, and which was referred to about ten years ago, in discussing a similar proposition to the one I propose submitting to the House, but it will bear referring to again. It is the Beauharnois election case. Mr. Jacob DeWitt and Mr. Duncombe were the candidates. It was alleged in that case that some of the poll books had been stolen and some burnt. A special return of the facts was made in that case. The majority candidate was not declared elected by the returning officer; but when the matter was submitted to Parliament, it at once, without any reference to a Committee, resolved that the return should be amended. And motion was made that, as it appeared by reference to the poll books, that Mr. DeWitt had a majority of the votes, the House rectified the mistake committed and amended the return. There are many other cases perhaps much more on a parallel with this one; but I have referred to this case because it happened to catch my eye when I was examining the precedents in the library. I will refer to a case which occurred some years afterwards in the Parliament of old Canada, and which is strictly analogous to the one now before the House. Bear in mind, in considering this case, that the reason alleged why a certain candidate was not returned was that he was not qualified to sit in this Parliament. In the Kent case it was a question of qualification. Under the old law as it then stood a property qualification was necessary for every candidate, and every candidate was liable to be called upon on nomination day for a statement of the property upon which he qualified. In the Kent case one of the candidates was so called upon, a demand being made by two of the electors for the property qualification of the candidate. A declaration of that property qualification was not, as under the law it should have been, put in during the election—it was fyled or left with the returning officer three days after the election. Those facts were within the cognizance of the returning officer, with whom the qualification should have been fyled. So, instead of returning the majority candidate, who had a majority of 400 votes, he made a special return of the facts. The matter came before the House, the polling books were brought down, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery appeared and produced the returns; and it was then moved that the returns be amended. And if any person has the curiosity to examine into the subject—for I am not disposed to take up the time of the House by going back over these old records—and takes the trouble to examine the Journals of the House for 1848, he will find there that a motion was made on this subject to the same effect as the motion I am about to make. The result of the motion was, that the majority candidate was put in the position in which he ought to have been placed by the returning officer. A series of motions were moved to bring the matter down to the real point; and then it was moved by Mr. Richards, and seconded by Mr. Notman, that the said Mr. Cameron (the majority candidate) has the right to take his seat in this House, as the representative for the County of Kent, save that all candidates and electors had still the right to contest the said election if they thought proper so to do, in such manner as appertained to law and justice, and according to the usages of Parliament; and that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery attend the House forthwith, and amend the return for the said County of Kent, by stating that at the said election the said Mr. Cameron was duly elected to represent the said County. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery attended accordingly; the return was amended accordingly, and the majority candidate was placed in the position in Parliament to which he was entitled by the voice of the people. Here, then, was a case in which the qualification of the candidate was concerned; and yet Parliament at once, though not without some objection being made—because there were even then in those days objections offered to that course, and I dare say the same thing will occur now—by an overwhelming majority gave the seat to the successful candidate. In the Oxford case precisely the same thing took place. There, also, the question of qualification came up, and a special return was made, although one candidate had obtained a majority of two to one nearly; but after the matter came before the House, Parliament at once followed the same course, and declared entitled to the seat the person who had received the highest number of votes. Now, Sir, that was so—and if it was done in the two cases to which I have referred—why should it not be done in this case. It is true that an amendment was moved in the Oxford case. It was said that it was a complicated case, and ought to be referred to a Special Committee—the Committee on Privileges and Elections—and a motion was made in amendment to the main motion, that the matter should be tried under the Controverted Election Act, and not be disposed of by the House at all. This was voted down by a large majority, and the result was that the case was disposed of in the manner which I have just indicated. Let me draw your attention, Sir, to another case that took place afterwards, in the year 1852—the case of Gaspé. There the ground on which the returning officer made a special return was, that the polling books for the Magdalen Islands had not been received by him up to the time within which the writ was returnable. A special return of these facts was made to the proper quarter. Some months afterwards, the polling books were transmitted by the deputy returning officers from the Magdalen Islands, to the returning officer, and by him they were forwarded to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and then when these facts came before Parliament, the House, by Resolution, declared that the person who had received the highest number of votes was entitled to the seat, and he took the seat accordingly, I refer also to the case that took place two or three years subsequently to the case of Gaspé—the Bagot case. This was a peculiar case—as you, Sir, will well recollect, thoroughly posted as you are in the Parliamentary history of this country. It was alleged that the candidate who had obtained the seat in Parliament was the returning officer himself; in other words, that the returning officer, T. Brodiër, had returned T. Brodiër to Parliament. The matter came before the House, and it was of course contended that there was no evidence before Parliament to show that these were the same persons. But, notwithstanding that fact, the House dealt with the matter, and dealt with it in the sense and mode in which I propose that the House shall deal with this case. I refer now to a case which took place some years afterwards. I wish fairly, as far as I am able, to present to this House all cases which have been dealt with by this House and by the old Parliament of Canada. The case to which I now refer is the County of Essex case, and here the contention was that the poll-books for some of the polling sub-divisions were not returned to the returning officer; and that there were irregularities connected with them, which made all the votes cast for the candidates at the above polling sub-divisions void. The matter came before the House in the way in which I propose to bring this matter before the House; and after discussion, and after several objections were raised, it was moved: “That it appears by the polling books transmitted to the returning officer, that Mr. Rankin had the highest number of votes.” It was moved, in amendment: “That the return being a special one, required investigation, and was properly investigable by a Committee under the Controverted Election Act.” The amendment was not carried and the main motion was carried. The return was amended, and the person who had the highest number of votes was declared entitled to the seat; and he took the seat accordingly. There is another case which took place during the same year and the same Session of Parliament—the Lennox and Addington case. There the ground on which the special return was made, was that there had been some irregularities in the voting lists for some of the polling sub-divisions; the returning officer there assumed the duty and responsibility of practically dealing with the question himself, and he made, as was done in this instance, a special return. However, when the matter was before the House, the House at once resolved that the candidate who had the highest number of votes, A. J. Hooper, ought to have been returned, and the return was amended accordingly, the House alone dealing with the question, and not a Committee. Another case in the Parliament of Canada occurred some ten years afterwards—the Peterborough election case. A motion was then made that the candidate having the highest number of votes was duly elected, and ought to get the seat. I believe it was moved in amendment that it be referred to the Committee on Elections and Privileges. In this case, there was not only the question of property qualification, but the fact that one of the candidates was returned and had taken his seat; and we must also bear in mind, in addition, that the decision took place under a law different to the law which now exists. The law under which I now move was not in force when the Government of the day saw fit to take a different course in that case. There were under the old law certain duties imposed on the returning officer of a quasi judicial character, which the returning officer had to discharge; but this is no longer the case their duties are now purely ministerial. I am told—I do not know how correctly, but I think I saw it in one of the newspapers—that the Supreme Court held, two or three days ago, that, under the law as it now stands, returning officers' functions are confined exclusively to the summing up of the votes, and declaring that the person who has the highest number of votes is entitled to the seat—that, in fact, his duties are purely ministerial. Be that as it may, I believe that no court would now come to any other conclusion from the construction of the Statute to which I have referred. In the Muskoka case, which took place in the same Session as the Peterborough case, the question that came up was, that a deputy returning officer at one of the polling sub-divisions made no return, and at another sub-division the conduct of the election was wholly irregular; and possibly had it been disposed of by the courts the election would have been declared void. Yet it was contended, notwithstanding the want of a return from one of the polling sub-divisions, and the irregularity of the proceedings at another, that the candidate having the highest number of votes was entitled to the seat. The hon. leader of the Government assented to the argument of the hon. member for West Bruce, stating that he had made out so strong a case that he could not resist it, that the candidate receiving the largest number of votes was entitled to the seat. The hon. member for Cardwell took the same ground, and I believe advised the hon. leader of the House that that was the proper course to pursue—at all events he took that course, and Mr. Cockburn took his seat, the return being amended without reference to a Committee. I have thus shown you that in all these cases, with the one exception of the Peterborough case, Parliament disposed of the matter without any reference to the Election Committee; that as it appeared on the face of the returns that one of the candidates was entitled to the seat, Parliament at once rectified the wrong perpetrated upon that candidate, and gave him the seat, of course reserving to the opposing candidate, or the public at large, any rights they might have by the law of the land or the practice of Parliament. Not only has this been the practice in the Canadian Parliament, but the same course has been pursued by the Imperial Parliament as well. I find that in one case at least—the Montgomery case—a double return was made, but Parliament rectified the return without referring it to a Committee for enquiry into the facts. It may be said that now when we have courts to dispose of these cases, they should be relegated to the courts. That argument, however, cannot hold good, because one can easily conceive of some collusion or fraud taking place even between the candidate entitled to the seat and the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes, by which the rights of the people would be interfered with; and although Parliament has, by the Controverted Elections Act, placed the trial of such elections in the hands of the courts, still Parliament has not in any sense divested itself of the power of dealing with these questions when they come properly before it. It is laid down by May, in the last edition of his valuable work, that Parliament should deal with cases of this kind in the manner I have just pointed out. May says:

"It was contended, in 1870, in the case of O'Donovan Rossa, that the House had become entirely divested of the right of determining upon Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

the legal disqualifications affecting its own members. This argument, however, found no favor, it being justly said that it amounted to this: that even a Peer chosen to sit could not be excluded, and that a lunatic was to be suffered to continue a member."

This shows clearly that Parliament has the right and power of dealing with these questions, that Parliament has not divested itself of its authority in that regard; and I submit that if ever there was a case with which Parliament ought to deal, it is the one which is now before the House. I have shown that in the Kent election case, which was one very nearly the same as the present case, Parliament dealt with it even in the face of a motion to refer it to a Committee; I have shown that the same course was pursued in the Bagot case, as well as in the Muskoka case—in fact in most of the cases to which I have referred, that course was taken—not without argument, not without opposition, but in most cases by a large majority. I have shown you that, as May points out, that has also been the practice of the Imperial Parliament; I have shown you the facts of the present case, and I submit to the House if on the facts before us, this is not a case of all others in which Parliament should rectify the wrong which has been committed upon Mr. Robertson. Of course the decision of the House in this matter will not be final or conclusive, for if the other candidate, or any other person, deems himself to be wronged he has still got redress, and recourse to the courts or Parliament. The point I wish to impress upon hon. members is, that injustice to ourselves, as members of Parliament, in justice to the people who sent us here, we ought to declare that the man to whom the people have given the highest number of votes should be returned and should occupy his seat in Parliament, and that no returning officer should have the power of excluding from Parliament the man who has received the majority of votes. I beg, therefore, to move the following:—

"That it appears by the returns transmitted by Michael McCormack, Esq., the Returning Officer for the Electoral District of King's County, in the Island of Prince Edward, at the last election for the said Electoral District, that P. A. McIntyre, J. E. Robertson, A. C. MacDonald, and E. B. Muttart were the candidates at the said election—that at the said election the said P. A. McIntyre polled 2,124 votes—that the said J. E. Robertson polled 2,002 votes—that the said A. C. MacDonald polled 1,941 votes—and the said E. B. Muttart polled 1,814 votes—that the said Returning Officer made a return of the said election, in the words following:—

" KING'S COUNTY DISTRICT, )
" PROVINCE OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND. }

"I hereby certify that one of the members elected for the Electoral District of King's County, in pursuance of the within written writ, as having received the majority of votes lawfully given, is Peter Adolphus McIntyre, of Souris, in King's County, medical doctor, and I further certify that James Edwin Robertson, of Montague, in King's County, medical doctor, a candidate at the election held by virtue of the within written writ—appears by the returns from the several Deputy Returning Officers, to have the next highest number of votes given at such election, and it having been represented to me at the summing up of the votes by certain of the electors of the said electoral district having a right to vote at such election, as appears by the several papers returned herewith, and marked respectively with the letters E. F. G. H., and initialed by me, that the said James Edwin Robertson, at the time of his nomination as a candidate at such, and at the time of the holding such election, was a member duly elected and returned for the House of Assembly of the Province of Prince Edward Island for the fourth Electoral District of King's County, and, by reason thereof, disqualified to be elected or returned as a member of the House of Commons of Canada at the said election.

"I do hereby further certify that Augustine Colin MacDonald, of Montague Bridge, in King's County, merchant, a candidate at such election duly qualified has the next highest number of votes lawfully given at such election, and I do further make this return of, and respecting, the said James Edwin Robertson and Augustine Colin MacDonald for the information of all whom it may concern.

"Certified, (Signed), MICHAEL McCORMACK,
"Returning Officer.

"(Signed) R. Pope,
"Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

"That the said J. E. Robertson, having the second highest number of votes polled at the said election, ought to have been returned as one of the members for the said electoral district in this Parliament, and that he has a right to take his seat in this House as such member, saving, however, to all candidates and others their rights of contesting the said election, if they think proper in such manner as may appertain to law and justice."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it rather unfortunate that the hon. gentleman who makes this motion did not give notice of it. I think he has not treated the House fairly in not doing so, especially as a week or ten days ago I invited him to give notice. The House would then have been in a position to discuss it. The hon. gentleman chose to keep it in his pocket, and, although he says it is so clear a case, he found it necessary to strengthen his position in an able, a learned and an exhaustive argument, in which he quoted many precedents, and which he alone had the advantage of seeing. I cannot understand why he did not give notice. I may say that my present opinion is that the matter should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. However, after having listened to the argument of the hon. gentleman, I would suggest that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. BLAKE. To the hon. gentleman's suggestion that the debate be adjourned, if it is to enable him to consider these precedents, there can be no objection at all. But as to the House not having been treated fairly, I may say that the universal mode in which these questions have been treated has been as questions of privilege without notice having been previously given to the House. On two previous occasions, to which reference has been made, in 1873, I moved the motions myself. One of them the hon. gentleman proposed to refer to the Committee; he yielded to the second; and they were moved without notice. I indicated my intention to move a motion, but its precise form, or what its object was, I did not indicate. On that occasion the hon. gentleman did not make the objection which he has made to-day. Ten long years have taught him that such a motion requires more notice than he thought it did then, and all these precedents were then discussed before we reached a conclusion. Although he was then familiar with them all, I dare say he is not now; some of them may have escaped him at the moment. We must all be willing that the debate be adjourned on the subject, on which he has not come to a conclusion, and to which he wishes to give further research. At the same time, I do not think it is a subject on which there ought to be delay. I would, therefore, ask the hon. gentleman to mention the date to which he wishes the debate to be adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would say to-morrow. There can be no objection to to-morrow. I quite admit that on a question of privilege no notice is required; but as this matter was postponed for a week at the suggestion of the mover, and I invited him to give us notice of what his motion was to be, I think he ought to have given us notice. We should have known whether the hon. gentleman intended to press his motion on the spot. Having asked for a delay, I think the House had a right to know what the motion was. The hon. gentleman said he was prepared to make a motion but whether it was to send the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or bring the returning officer to the bar of the House, or what it was, he gave not the slightest intimation. It will be as well to dispose of it to-morrow. I, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, to adjourn debate, agreed to.

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 4) to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

FRAUD IN CONTRACTS INVOLVING EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. CASGRAIN, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public monies, said:

I desire, if possible, to remedy certain abuses which have crept into the politics of our country. There is, as I said before, a necessity for this measure or legislation of a similar character. The Government look with great hostility upon it, I fear. Instead of trying to help this measure which I think they should have taken into their own hands, they impeded it when brought up last Session, so that it could not reach the stage to which it has now come. I renew the application I then made to put this matter into the hands of the Government, as it is one of public interest, not only with regard to the different officials dependent on the Government, but also in view of the fact that it is a safeguard to the Ministers themselves. I do not expect, however, that the hon. First Minister will have changed his mind on this matter, though, during the last Session, he intimated that some measure of this kind ought to be brought forward. He then expected, he said, to see a Bill presented in the English House of Commons and would await that measure in order to find in it some guide or principle to embody in our own law. In proposing this measure I can only repeat what I said on a similar occasion before, and I think that I may be allowed to quote from our debate on this subject what I said in moving for the second reading of this Bill. I then said:

"I do not know to what extent the legislation I propose will be able to put a stop to frauds of this kind. These frauds are of a kind that poison, that creep into the social body; it is very difficult to reach them and more difficult to eradicate. Nevertheless, I deemed it my duty to introduce a Bill which, I think, will not only meet with the approbation of this House, but also the approval of the country. I would have wished to see the present Government take up this measure; I think they would be rendering a great service to the country by bringing down such a Bill. On the other hand, as on the first reading, I made the same proposal which was not accepted, I think I am fulfilling my duty as a member in introducing the Bill, which has three principal objects. Among others, in the first place, to prevent what are called middlemen or brokers from interfering with public contracts. We all know and unhappily it is only too true, that these brokers in order to lend their influence in favor of individuals exact what we call in French petites souveurs. I am of opinion that such a business is direct corruption. That is why, by the first clause of the Bill, I propose making these different acts a misdemeanor, punishable as such upon conviction, before the ordinary Courts. The second object I have in view is to prevent tenderers in public contracts from withdrawing their tenders for certain considerations in order to help other tenderers, thus depriving the country of a profit, or unduly obliging it to pay considerable sums that might otherwise be saved. This kind of fraud is not provided against by our legislation. It is nevertheless provided against by the legislation of the Province of Quebec. I would mention in support of this statement, the case of public sales by the Sheriff. All the bidders are held to be independent one from another; to be bound each by his respective bid. When they form a ring to acquire a property at a low price, the sale is fraudulent and voided by the Courts of Justice. This legislation is based upon sound morality and upon true reason; it is made in order to prevent what might be called indirect stealing. All public contracts tainted with such fraud, should be declared void, all such tenderers should be deprived of the right of obtaining or carrying on any contract with the Government. I will endeavor to introduce a clause in that direction, if, as I hope, the Bill comes before the Committee of Whole. I moreover wish to protect public officers against attempts that might be made to captivate their kindness as to corrupt them in the execution of their duty, to punish those who make them either offers, gifts or promises of any kind, so as to induce them to declare the secrets of the public Departments. As these different acts are tainted with fraud it is necessary to suppress as far as possible such abuses. I therefore make a misdemeanor of such cases, and there is not only a pecuniary penalty attached to these acts, on conviction, but moreover there is a brand of infamy, that is to say, an imprisonment, so that this infamous stain may deter all those who might be tempted to corrupt a public officer, or commit any of these offences. Another clause contemplates preventing all public contractors, or those wishing to become such, or those who are entrusted with the execution of a public contract, from contributing either directly, or indirectly, to general election funds or for political objects, from heavily subscribing, as examples have been seen, and guarding against a repetition of what has unhappily already occurred in the country."

Now that the Ontario and the General Elections are over, I hope my hon. friend opposite will not see much difficulty in agreeing to this clause of the Bill. I then continued:

"I do not think that too severe restrictions can be established, nor too exemplary punishment be inflicted upon those who should attempt by this means to corrupt the electorate, so I call such acts misdemeanors and I want them to be punished as such, and also punished by a fine or an imprisonment, at the discretion of the Court. I do not wish to dwell at any length upon the facts that have induced me to introduce this measure."

I do not desire at the present moment to give the names of the persons or the circumstances upon which I base this Bill. I know the position I occupy, with respect to a particular individual, is somewhat disparaging to myself, if I may use that expression. At any rate in bringing in this Bill I am aware that I am offending the feelings of some contractors, and some private individuals against whose acts the Bill is directed; but I have a public duty to perform which private feelings cannot be permitted to interfere with.

"I think that it has become absolutely necessary, and that in these, our times, this kind of corruption is extending all over America. Not only do we need such legislation in this country, but I also observe that even in the United States, since the introduction of my Bill, a like measure has been introduced in Congress, in order to protect public officers, and to prevent public contractors from unduly influencing these officers. With these remarks Mr. Speaker I make my motion."

Now, Sir, I hold in my hands a Bill presented to Congress to prohibit Federal officers and contractors from making and receiving assessments for contributions for political purposes. That legislation was needed in the United States as much as it is needed here; and I think that this Bill, imperfect though it may be, and though it cannot reach, in many instances, the guilty individual, is still urgently needed, in order that, if possible, such fraud, when discovered, may be punished. I would feel very much obliged to hon. members of this House, on both sides, if they would help me in carrying this Bill to its final stage, and in making it as perfect as possible. With these remarks, I move the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has made such an appeal for his Bill that I do not know but, as he says, now that the Elections are over, that we can consider the matter, and I am not going to fight him.

Mr. BLAKE. After the stud is stolen you shut the stable door.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course I made the remark in the same jocular spirit that the hon. gentleman did. My hon. friend opposite takes everything au sérieux; he is behind the scenes, he knows the stable, and he knows who stole the stud. I am afraid my hon. friend will be found guilty in many a case of more than petty larceny in that regard. When this matter was before Parliament the last time, I stated that there was then a Bill before the British Parliament dealing with the whole of this subject—a very stringent Bill as it proved to be. I had a copy of it at the time—the Attorney General's Bill—and it was thought it would become law in England last Session, but in consequence of the obstruction that arose in the British Parliament it was choked off; but I believe that the measure will become law in some form during the present Session. I believe Mr. Gladstone's Government is pledged to carry it the present Session, and I have no doubt it will be carried unless something unexpected prevents it. However, I object to some portion of this Bill. The fourth clause is too stringent, and, I think, interferes with the liberty of the subject. I do not see why a contractor, because he happens to be a contractor, should not have the same rights as other people. I have no objection to the second reading of this Bill on account of the merits of some portions of it, but on the understanding that it goes to a Select Committee afterwards, and I should be very glad to settle the Committee with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Of course, I must be ready to submit to what I cannot help, because the hon. gentleman's majority in this House will enable him to deal with the Bill as he sees fit. I may say, however, that the Bill, at the suggestion of my hon. friend, has already been submitted to a Committee, and the hon. Minister of Justice, who is now the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, worked at it very hard along with seven members. I think Mr. Speaker was on the Committee, and after having the benefit of his intellect, I do not think it can be improved by passing into other hands. The Bill was thoroughly discussed by this Committee, and I think was made as good as it is likely to be made by another Committee. However, I would ask, if the Bill is to go to another Committee, that I shall have an opportunity of carrying it before the end of the Session. If my hon. friend will say that we can pass the Bill the present Session, of course, I am willing to accept with bonne grâce, the statement he makes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot well promise my hon. friend that the Bill will pass this Session—that is beyond my power to promise. I do not know what the Bill may turn out to be—I may have to vote against it—but I will give the hon. gentleman the assurance that after the Committee's report has been received—and there is plenty of time I fancy to get the report—the hon. gentleman will have every opportunity of pressing on his Bill. We will name the Committee to-morrow and I will consult my hon. friend on its composition.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think perhaps it would be more regular to refer the Bill at present to Committee of the Whole House, and when that order is called it can be discharged and the reference made to a Select Committee.

Bill read the second time.

IMPORTATION OF LUMBER INTO MANITOBA.

Mr. ROYAL, in moving for copies of all documents and correspondence in relation to the abolition of the duties on lumber imported into the Province of Manitoba, said: My object in placing this motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is to call the attention of the Government to the very high prices we have to pay for lumber imported into the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, as well as to the urgent desirability of having those duties either wiped out, or at least very materially reduced. It is a well known fact in our part of the country that Manitoba depends almost entirely on foreign supplies for lumber, and that large quantities are daily imported into Manitoba from the United States. The demand is increasing very rapidly, so much so that it is very difficult to supply the market even at the extravagant figures obtained for lumber in our Province. Lumber must be had by immigrants scattered over the Province and Territories, in order to build shanties for themselves as soon as they come into the country. The large profits of dealers, the very heavy freight charges we have to pay, and the duty that is imposed upon lumber, combine to swell to an almost extravagant figure the price of this necessity. The import duty on rough lumber is 20 per cent, and 25 per cent. on dressed lumber, and if you add to that the very heavy freight charges you will not be surprised to find that lumber, which could be obtained at from $7 to $35 in Ontario, will realize, in Manitoba, from $17 to $35 and $40 per thousand feet. Going west we find those prices increase all the time. In the United States there is a duty of only $2 per thousand feet. The duty imposed in this country amounts to nearly $7.50 per thousand feet on lumber imported from the United States. We have some pineries, but they are not yet fully developed, and it will take some time and very large capital to have them developed so as to supply our demands. Protection is a very good thing, but there is no ground for protection there, because we have at present nothing to protect. If we had forests of large extent, of course we could protect their development by a protective duty on lumber; but I believe that for some time, until the Pacific Railway is built from the western Province to the eastern Provinces—I think for some years, five, six or seven years—it would be a judicious policy, if not to wipe out altogether the duty on lumber imported into Manitoba, at all events, to materially reduce it, probably to the same amount as the American duty. As it is, it strikes directly at the immigrant—it is a direct charge which the immigrant has to pay. I believe it would be in the interest, not only of the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, but also of the Dominion at large, to make such a change; and the Government with the large surplus at its disposal could reduce that duty very well. Last year the duty on cordwood was abolished. Now settlers on the boundary can get their supply of wood wherever they can find it, and import it into Manitoba without paying duty. I believe the action which I have suggested would follow logically that dealing with cordwood, and I beg to call the attention of the Government to this very important matter. With the permission of the Government I desire to submit the motion in the following form:—

That an Order of the House be issued to the proper officers for copies of all documents and correspondence in relation to the abolition of the duties on lumber imported into the Province of Manitoba; together with a statement of the quantity of lumber, rough-dressed, imported in the Province of Manitoba, and the duty paid thereon, for the years 1880, 1881 and 1882.

Mr. BOWELL. Any correspondence in the possession of the Government and the Department will be brought down in answer to the address. When all the papers are before it, the House will probably be in a better position to discuss the question than it is at the present moment. I might mention, however, that logs out of which lumber is manufactured, as the hon. gentleman is aware, are admitted free, and lumber in certain different states in which it is imported, is also admitted free—that is lumber as it comes from the woods when it is not manufactured. It is also well known that large quantities of logs have been purchased during the past year in the Western States, in some portions of Dakota and Minnesota, and floated down the Red River for the purpose of manufacturing them in the City of Winnipeg. It will be a question for the House and my hon. friend to consider well, when that question comes up for further consideration, how far that will interfere with what ought to have been done. I am not aware, however, that the price of lumber—or I am rather not prepared to say at present—is such, when imported into the North-West, as will justify the imposition of a duty of $8 per thousand feet, this would imply that the lumber purchased in Minnesota—Minneapolis, I believe, is the great lumber mart in the American West—would be at least $40 or $50 a thousand. However, I do not know at present, and not speaking from personal knowledge, whether those are the prices, which are paid in Minneapolis. I am quite satisfied nevertheless, that next year, my hon. friend will find that there will be a large quantity of lumber imported from Thunder Bay and along that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway into Manitoba, and I hope—and we have every reason to believe—that ere long the rapidity with which the Pacific Railway is being constructed to the north of Lake Superior, will enable that country to furnish a large quantity of lumber to the North-West. This will come from the west and east of Thunder Bay, and I think there is no doubt that the price will be largely reduced in a very short time. However, the papers will be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman mentions a circumstance which, perhaps, renders it important that the further proposal of the hon. gentleman who moves this motion ought to be amended, or at any rate that we should reach an understanding about it. The hon. gentleman mentions the fact that logs, and also, as I understand, raw material, lumber in various shapes, enters the North-West free. We also know that a very large quantity of lumber enters free for the purpose of the Canadian Pacific Railway, for bridge material. It would not do to state the gross quantity of lumber which comes into the country and the duty, because that would not represent the accurate state of things, as to the burden imposed on the people there, inasmuch as a very considerable portion of the lumber enters at the present time free for the purposes of the railway. It would be, therefore, well to divide the return, so as to show what portion of the lumber imports was free, and what portion dutiable, with the duty on that which is dutiable.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not understand, Mr. Speaker, that the motion referred to the lumber which has been imported by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say imported by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; but I say that the lumber which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself imports—lumber, timber, and stuff for bridge material—free, ought not to be included in the gross imports of lumber into Manitoba and the North-West; for, if so, the amount of duty given will not represent what is the burden on the people of the North-West in this particular—the duty which, I am sorry to hear, Sir, the consumer sometimes pays.

Mr. CHARLTON. In relation to the lumber question, and the duty on lumber imported into the North-West, I would suggest to the Government the propriety of making the duty specific, rather than ad valorem. The prices paid for lumber in Manitoba and the North-West are excessively high, and the duty of 20 per cent. adds very greatly to the burden of the settler in that country. Now, the American Government some years ago changed their policy with reference to the duty on this article, and made it specific, $2 per thousand feet, without reference to the cost or the value of the lumber, and this would be the course which I would think it well for our own Government to adopt in relation to the imposition of a duty on lumber. The duty of 20 per cent. would amount to $8 per thousand feet, in many cases, and that is certainly an enormous tax on those who consume lumber in the North-West. I submit that the Government should make the duty specific, and a moderate one at that.

Mr. WATSON. As this matter has been brought up, I would like to make a few remarks on it. It is certainly a great hardship to the residents of the North-West, and of the prairie country, to be compelled to pay such high prices when they want lumber; and I am glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Royal) has brought the question before the House. Some change should be made, for certainly the price of lumber out there is something enormous. As to a duty of $8 a thousand, I think that this figure is a little extreme; but, at the same time, the freight and duty often amount to more than the original cost of the lumber at Minneapolis, where we get most of our lumber in the North-West. There are certainly large tracts of timber limits and timber lands in the North-West, which are being developed very rapidly; but they do not as yet half supply the demand. Building was kept back last spring, probably for two months, owing to the want of building material; the result is that the material manufactured in the North-West is all used at present in the green state. It is almost impossible to get a thousand feet of dry lumber, the products of the mills in the North-West. The demand being so great the lumber is all used in the green state. I do not think that the manufacturers of the North-West ought to have any great protection on lumber, for the simple reason that their timber limits have cost them little or nothing—$5 a mile. I consider that they have protection enough. The people have to pay too much for their lumber, freights being very high. Nearly all our lumber has to be imported from the other side; it is carried for 600 or 700 miles over railways, and it would be no hardship to the Province of Ontario if our lumber came in free of duty, while it would be a great benefit to our North-West. There are several other things which I do not suppose can be just now discussed, but I might say that, as far as our Province of Manitoba is concerned, we have no need at all of protection. I might say, while I am on my feet, that all the machinery which we use in that country comes from Ontario at present, and we have to pay in Manitoba about $60 more for a self-binder and reaper than is the case across the line in Minnesota, and about $5 or $6 more for a breaking plough, the demand being so great for these articles in the North-West that the Canadian manufacturers were not able last season to supply the demand. The consumer of course has to pay this duty, and we feel the burden considerably. I think it would be a move in the right direction to take the duty off lumber, and I do not consider that this would impose any great hardship on the manufacturers in the North-West, because at present they cannot supply the demand, while it would confer a great benefit on the consumers of lumber. It has been stated that logs are allowed to enter Manitoba free of duty, but this does not lessen the price to the consumer in the least, simply because the demand is greater than the supply. If we could get lumber from the States on paying, like the Americans, $2 a thousand, it would be much better. This would be a move in the right direction as far as the interests of the North-West Territories are concerned.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not know that this is the proper time to discuss the question, whether a duty should be placed on lumber or not; but my hon. friend from North Norfolk has painted in such dismal terms the injurious effect of the National Policy on the lumber interest of this country, that I think he will not be disposed to adopt views laid down by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Watson). I may say that the statement made by the hon. Minister of Customs, that within a very short time a very large portion of the lumber used in the North-West will be exported from the Georgian Bay and that section of the country, so far as the information which I have been able to obtain correctly, will be borne out by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), who is, as I understand, preparing to export, or has already exported a considerable quantity of lumber from Georgian Bay and that section of the country to the North-West, and I believe is prepared to make other exports to it during the next summer. A very short time must elapse before all the lumber required in the North-West Territory will be exported from the Province of Ontario, and if the National Policy is to be of any benefit to the people of the Province of Ontario, it will be thus obtained. I am quite sure that my hon. friend from North Norfolk, who depicted in such dismal terms the injurious effect of the National Policy on the lumber interest, will not be disposed to say that the duty ought to be abrogated on that particular article.

Motion agreed to.

DIRECT STEAMSHIP COMMUNICATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND GERMAN PORTS.

Mr. KRANZ, in moving for copies of all correspondence between any member of this House or other persons and the Government, in relation to the establishment of direct steamship communication between Montreal, Quebec, St. John, New Brunswick, Halifax, and German seaports, said: I wish to call the attention of the Government, and of the hon. members of this House, to the necessity of procuring direct steamboat communication between the various Canadian ports and Germany. The trade of the United States with Germany has assumed enormous proportions, while that between Canada and Germany is quite undeveloped; and one of the principal reasons is, I believe, the fact that no direct communication is at present established between Canada and Germany. The present mode of shipping between the countries, via England and the United States, is very costly, tedious, and annoying. I have no doubt that as soon as we have established direct communication, the enterprising merchants of both countries will find articles which they can exchange at a profit. In the interest of immigration, it is most necessary that direct communication between Germany and Canada should be procured. At present immigrants coming from Germany to Canada either go by way of the United States or by way of England. In order to go by England they are sent from Bremen or Hamburg in small steamers to Hull, thence by rail to Liverpool, where they get on board the fine steamers which ply between England and Canada. Those going by way of New York are placed on board the German steamers at Bremen or Hamburg, and go direct to New York without transshipment, and on arrival in New York they are taken in hand by active agents of the various States, or of the railway and land companies. German immigrants are appreciated in the United States, and very few are allowed to come to Canada. In the interests of immigration I believe the Government could do nothing better than procure the services of one of the German steamship companies. If they would run a line of steamers fortnightly or even monthly direct between Bremen or Hamburg and the various Canadian ports, I think it would result most advantageously, and would be the best and most expedient act that could be done to secure German immigration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is, of course, no objection to the motion so far as the correspondence has been finished or is now in progress. I quite agree with all the hon. gentleman has said, in the first place, of the great value to Canada of German immigration, and also in the regret that so few settlers of that nationality find their way to this country. The Government have not lost sight of this question. They have been anxiously endeavoring to establish steam communication with Antwerp, Hamburg, and Bremen. I am glad to say that at this moment there are before the Government several communications from companies desirous of establishing lines—one to Antwerp, one to Bremen, and, I think, one to Hamburg, though I am not quite sure, but certainly to Antwerp and Bremen. The Government will do everything they can to encourage the establishment of such lines—fortnightly, if possible, and, at all events, monthly; and they are quite prepared, when they can get a solvent company giving reasonable assurance of establishing efficient lines, to come to Parliament and ask a liberal subsidy for that very important enterprise.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION OF GERMANS.

Mr. KRANZ, in moving for copies of all correspondence between any member of this House or other persons and the Government, in relation to the naturalization of Germans; also, in relation to German immigration, the appointment of Emigrant Agents in Germany, and the affording of reliable information about Canada to intending emigrants; also, a copy of the Report and all correspondence with the German Delegates who visited the North-West Territories in 1881, said: At no period has it been more advisable and expedient to attract German immigration to Canada than the present. The wise fiscal policy of the present Government has furnished employment to the mechanic and the artizan, and the wise railway policy of the Government and the energetic manner in which the Pacific Railway Company are pushing forward and finishing their contract, are opening up millions of acres of land which only await the hands and arms of the settlers to be broken up and turned to good account in increasing the prosperity of the country. The German emigrant, before he leaves his fatherland, generally reflects upon the political status which he will occupy in the country to which he comes, and I am very glad that His Excellency and his Government have taken steps to afford to the naturalized subjects of Canada the same privileges, rights and advantages as those enjoyed by natural born subjects. In reference to the appointment of immigration agents in Germany, I believe it would be a good plan, in case direct steamship communication is established, to have one or more good reliable agents in the various seaports of Germany. The German people, who are used to the paternal care of their Government, put more trust in an official agent than they do in an agent of a shipping company, whose interest it naturally is to find freight and passengers for his line. It also affords me great pleasure to state, from correspondence which I have had with the German delegates who visited Canada in 1881, that their work has produced good fruit. By their means, Canada, especially the North-West, has been brought under the notice of the more wealthy class of German agriculturists, who had not been reached to such an extent before, and who could not have been reached in any better manner than through these delegates, in whom the German public had confidence, who, on account of their social standing and their intelligence, were capable of giving reliable information regarding this country.

Mr. VALIN (Translation). I am glad that the hon. gentleman has made the motion, asking for communications between Germany and Canadian ports, which may be the means of bringing here a large immigration. I know we want a large number of immigrants, especially to settle our North-Western Territory. We all know that a large immigration will make Canada prosper, that we cannot and ought not to object to the naturalization of German subjects. The Germans in the United States are in great numbers and very good citizens. They contribute largely to the prosperity of that country by their knowledge in agriculture and their industry. The Germans are very good subjects, and well versed in the agricultural arts. We have everything to gain in attracting a large immigration to this country; but, Mr. Speaker, we should not forget that in Lower Canada there are numbers of Canadians who would like to settle in Manitoba. Still, I am yet to hear that measures have been taken to afford aid to those people to enable them to settle in that Province. When immigrants arrive at Quebec, the agents of the Immigration Office make enquiries as to whether they have the means to pay their passage to Manitoba. Whenever the answer is in the affirmative, they pay for their tickets; but, if otherwise, free tickets are given to them. Well, Mr. Speaker, a large number of our fellow countrymen would be prepared to settle on lands in Manitoba and cultivate them, thus enhancing the prosperity of that vast territory; but many have not the means to pay their fare, and if they apply to the Immigration Office for a free ticket to that Province, the answer is this: "You live in this country, and hence you are not entitled to this privilege." I believe it is unjust to deny to our own people the means of establishing themselves in Manitoba; for they would not only find therein profitable settlement for themselves, but would also have a share in the prosperity of the country. I consider that all Canadians asking for a free ticket to Manitoba by railway, are entitled to the same privileges as foreign immigrants. Why not send to Manitoba honest French-Canadians, Scotchmen or Irishmen who have not the means to pay their fare thither? I hope that with these few remarks, the Government, whose coffers are overflowing, will help these poor people to settle in Manitoba, where, through their industry, they will draw from the land products which will increase the wealth of this country. We are not opposed to the naturalization of the Germans; it is a thing which is done in all countries. What would be the consequence if they were denied the right to be naturalized? A country might thus be deprived of the precious services of men of eminence. We have recently seen a man of Irish extraction at the head of the State in France, and in England the late Prime Minister was of foreign origin. It is such men who will help us to build a great country and increase our resources. However I may be in favor of foreign immigration, still I claim a fair share of assistance for Canadians who may be unable to pay their fare to Manitoba. It is but fair that the Government should help them, since they contribute, and have for ever so long contributed, to the resources of this country.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made this motion, and glad also to learn that some progress has been made after the long number of years during which we have been attempting to perfect our system of naturalization. The condition of our naturalization laws has no doubt been one of the obstacles in the way of our getting German immigration. An hon. gentleman who formerly represented in this House the county from which the hon. member comes, brought that question before the House some years ago. There is one thing entirely within our own power to which I wish to draw attention. My belief is, that our domestic plan for accomplishing naturalization is too vexatious—that it involves too much trouble. We know that there are a great many persons in this country, who have been here a good many years, who are just as good and loyal subjects as any we have, who have no intention of leaving the country, and whose votes at election after election are rejected because they are not naturalized. An easy solution of this difficulty is this. I would pass a law to make it the duty of any deputy returning officer, when objection is made of that kind, to administer the naturalization oath, to accept the vote and to return a certificate to the Clerk of the Peace, within ten days after the election, that he had done so. As to what the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin) says, there is a good deal of force in it, but I have understood the hon. Minister of Agriculture to say that his settled policy is not to promote, by free passes, the migration of people from one Province to another. For us Canadians he does not believe in free passes, and the hon. gentleman knows that the Government would not even give a man a free pass to the Senate.

Mr. HESSON. I have special pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend from Waterloo. This question has been brought before the House repeatedly, and I had hoped that some greater progress would have been made by this Government than has been made in the direction of having it settled. I have no doubt there are very great obstacles in the way of promoting what my hon. friend, and I believe every man of this House, wishes to see accomplished, that is, the affording of greater facilities to Germans who desire to leave their fatherland for Canada. Unless we take some such steps as he proposes, the bulk of the German emigration will continue to go to the United States. German immigrants usually fall into the hands of the agents of American shipping or railway companies, and they seldom reach Canada, unless they have made up their minds to settle here. This is a serious matter for our consideration. We have great tracts of valuable prairie lands waiting for cultivators, and the experience of every gentleman who has had the pleasure of knowing what German immigrants and settlers are, is that you cannot find a better class of citizens. I say this from my own knowledge, having lived for the last thirteen or fourteen years among the German element. There are no paupers among the German immigrants. They are all able to take care of themselves until they reach this country. I do not think they will ask for free passes from one Province to another, nor do they want cheaper rates than other people; but what they require is, that a little paternal attention be paid to them in the Old Country before starting. Some one should be on hand to direct them where to go, and some one should be here to receive them on their arrival. We might well afford to have more than one agent in Germany, whose population is of so migratory a character, and to pay better than we do. Our agent there is so indifferently paid that he cannot afford to give more than a third of his time for the small remuneration he receives. His allowance is the small one of $1,000, which certainly does not show any desire on the part of this Government to promote emigration from that country. It gives me much pleasure to see that some progress is being made in the question of naturalization, which is one of great interest to the Germans. On arriving here they find themselves unable to take their position as citizens, and unable to revisit their fatherland, if they had not previously received permission to leave its shores. I am glad now they cannot only come out to Canada, but also revisit the fatherland; and one of those going home again will be of more use as an immigration agent than the expenditure of perhaps thousands of dollars for the purpose of having shipping agents. I am pleased to endorse Mr. Kranz's remarks. He and I live in counties largely peopled by Germans, and know from experience their value as citizens, and how desirable it is that we should obtain as large as possible an influx of that element into our unoccupied territory. It is the duty of this Government to see that everything is done to facilitate immigration from Germany into Canada.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am very glad this question has been brought up. I know of a case of great hardship that occurred last summer in a township where the magistrate, a continuous resident for some fifteen years, and others who had lived there fifteen or twenty years, were prevented from voting, although they had voted at previous elections. The scrutineer read the Statute, and the consequence was these men, being very conscientious, were afraid to take the oath and vote. I hope the Government will see that some provision is made whereby bond fide residents can be naturalized, and not allow cases of this kind to occur.

Mr. VALIN said that the hon. leader of the Opposition had not understood what he had said, and had entirely reversed the meaning of his remarks.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 2nd March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message, as follows:—

LORNE.

The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute in Council, appointing the Right Honorable Sir John A. Macdonald, Minister of the Interior; the Honorable Sir Leonard Mr. HESSON.

Tilley, Minister of Finance; the Honorable Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Honorable Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 37, intitled: An Act respecting the Internal Economy of the House of Commons, and for other purposes.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 1st March, 1883.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) presented the first report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows:—

The attention of the Committee having been called to the fact that the contractor for the translation of the Debates, and some of his assistants, are employes of the House, and receiving remuneration as such, they recommend that no contractor for the Debates, or any portion thereof, or any of his employes, shall be permitted to continue, or be on the Staff of the House.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Grange Trust, Limited.—
(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

PUBLIC LANDS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD in introducing Bill (No. 45) further to amend and consolidate the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion therein mentioned, said: This Bill is substantially the Bill that was introduced last Session, but which, in consequence of the pressure of other business, did not go through. It contains some amendments and additions to the Bill of last year, and as they are scattered over the whole Bill, I will not endeavor to explain them now. The Bill is ready for distribution, and every opportunity will be given hon. members to examine it.

Mr. BLAKE asked that the amendments be noted on the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would give special instructions to the Law Clerk to see this done.

Bill read the first time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend the Bank Act (34 Victoria, Chapter 5)—by providing for the more regular and earlier transmission of the certified list of shareholders to Government, and imposing a penalty for contravention of such provision; and by imposing penalties—on banks allowing the amount of their notes in circulation to be in excess of that limited by law—or holding a less amount of their cash reserves in Dominion notes, than is required by law; on banks neglecting to make up their monthly returns within the time prescribed by law, or contravening any provision of Sections 40 or 43 or of the Sections 46 or 51 of the Bank Act; and by amending the form of the monthly returns and the provisions respecting parties unlawfully styling themselves banks, or assuming any designation implying that they are acting as a chartered bank.

He said: In moving this resolution it may be as well to state the provisions in the Bill that I propose submitting on the passage of this resolution. Under the law as it stands, the list of shareholders must be submitted to Parliament. There have been several Sessions in which some of the banks failed to comply with the provisions of the Act. The attention of the banks was called to the fact that the returns were not all made sufficiently full, and last Session the returns were more general than they had been previously. At the same time it has been considered advisable that the returns should be forwarded to the Finance Minister and submitted to Parliament within a reasonable time and printed. At present the latter course is in the hands of the Printing Committee, and the returns received are printed about once in three years. There are many reasons why it is thought desirable by the Government that the returns should be submitted every year and printed. Great changes often take place in some of the banks in reference to the stockholders, and it is desirable the public should be in possession of these changes every year. It is provided by law that the circulation be limited, but it is found the circulation of banks, at times, exceeds the amount limited by their charters. There are no conditions or provisions in the Act, at present, by which a penalty is imposed for the violation of such provisions, and it only remains for Parliament to deal with the violation by a repeal of the charter, if Parliament thought it of sufficient importance. In Great Britain, the law is that in the case of any circulation in excess of what is authorized by Parliament, the penalty imposed is equal to the excess of circulation. It is not proposed in this case that the penalty shall be as severe as that, because there are cases in which banks having numerous branches, and anxious, for various reasons, to have their full circulation out, it sometimes occurs that although the managers and presidents do not desire it, the circulation exceeds what is allowed by law. In cases of that kind it is proposed to provide that where the circulation does not exceed a certain sum, which sum would not be exceeded where it is a matter that they had not entire control of—or at least they had control of it in their anxiety to have the circulation out to the fullest extent—the penalty should be limited, and then the penalty should be increased according to the excess of the circulation beyond the smaller sums named. At any rate that should be of a sufficient character to prevent its being an object for the bank to increase the circulation, and at the same time be enabled to pay the penalty and make money out of the operation. The third is imposition of a penalty where the banks have less than forty per cent. of Dominion notes in reserve as required by law. It is proposed to make the penalty light, but sufficient to be effectual. In the Act as it stands at present, banks are compelled to pay to any person who makes application $50 in one or two dollar notes. This was thought desirable because great difficulty occurred in various parts of the Dominion in obtaining small notes, and the banks frequently refused to give them. They were not bound to do it and it was not their interest to do it, but in order to provide for this it was made a condition in the renewal of the charter that they should furnish $50 of Dominion notes in one or two dollar bills, and it is proposed to make that $60, including $4 bills, as we have now a circulation of that kind. Then it is proposed to add to the monthly returns the amount of the reserve fund and the rate per cent. of the last dividend. The Banking Act requires that no bank shall pay a dividend in excess of 8 per cent. until they have a reserve of 20 per cent. There is no provision in the law at present requiring returns showing what their last dividend was or what their reserves are. Therefore, it is not in the power of the Government to know whether they are acting in accordance with that condition of the Act. Then a small sum shall be imposed for neglect in sending in the returns as required by law. At present the Act requires that the returns shall be forwarded to the hon. Minister of Finance ten days after the close of the monthly returns. Some banks having extended their operations to Manitoba and the North-West, it is found difficult to obtain these returns in time to send them in within ten days, and it is proposed to extend the time to twenty days, and to impose a small penalty if they are not made within that time. Then there is a provision in the law which was intended to prevent private individuals from adopting the name of a bank, as has been done in various parts of the Dominion. There is, for instance, "Clarke's Banking House," "The Farmers' Banking House," "Johnstone's Bank," "Hay's Banking House," "The Orono Banking House," "Scott's Banking House," "The Mahon Banking Company," "The Mitchell Banking Company," "The N. Hayes Loan and Exchange Bank," and several others which have used terms that are calculated to mislead the public. The object is to prevent any persons from assuming the name of a bank unless they had a charter from the Parliament of Canada. Many persons have thus been misled, and it is now pretty well understood that, in some cases, these companies have been taking large deposits made by persons who supposed they were regularly constituted banks, under the authority of Parliament, and with the security that is given by the Banking Act. There can be no objections to John Jones or William Smith calling themselves bankers, that would be perfectly understood; but the object is to prevent them using such terms as will lead the public to believe that they are a chartered banking company, or using the name of a chartered bank. For instance, in some cases, like the Molson's Bank—of course that bank took the name, I believe, of the originator, and one of the founders of the institution. In one case a person has taken his own name—I do not name it at present, but I will suppose it is the Jones' Bank. Well, these are all calculated to mislead parties who may be induced to make deposits there, from the fact that a higher rate of interest is offered, the depositors supposing that they have all the protection given in the case of a chartered bank. Then there is a provision in the general Act that banks are not permitted to make advances on bank stocks, ships, lands, &c., and a penalty is imposed in such cases. Next, a new section is introduced by which banks in Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Manitoba will be brought under that provision of the Banking Act which establishes certain public holidays in the other Provinces, providing that when a note falls due on that day, it is to be paid on a certain day, and it is proposed to repeal that section and make it applicable to all the Provinces except the Province of Quebec, which was omitted. These are the provisions contained in the Bill based upon this resolution. As I stated, it was not contemplated, when this was framed, to prevent any parties from acting as agents of a bank, and, therefore, the last six words in this resolution I propose to strike out. I move the House into Committee on the resolution.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask the hon. gentleman to read briefly the enactment he proposes to make with reference to private bankers.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The section referring to that is as follows:—

Section 10 of the Act 43 Victoria, Chapter 22 is hereby amended by inserting between the word "bank" and the word "without" on the third line thereof the words "banking companies shall not use the term banking company, banking house, banking association, banking institution, or banking agency or any word or designation which would cause it to seem as if such persons were a company carrying on business as a chartered bank."

Mr. BLAKE. I remember when this clause was introduced into the Act. It was in the course of the progress of the Bill through Committee, and on the motion, I think, of the hon. member now presiding over our deliberations, and we had some little discussion on it. While there was a disposition to agree to the prohibition of the use of the term "banking," which we have generally understood to mean a chartered bank, there was at that time a disposition, certainly on the part of the Committee, to go further in the way of restriction; and the proposition of the hon. gentleman which did go further was altered and limited, as well as I can remember, to this single word "bank." Whatever is commonly understood by universal usage to signify an incorporated institution under the general law, it may be of course improper to allow private individuals to use; but the hon. Minister's proposal goes a very long way. Banking company, banking institution, and banking house, are not terms which are generally supposed to be the proper mode of describing incorporated banks. A banking house as a commercial house is indicative rather of a private corporation and private actions than of an incorporated company and corporative action. While I agree that the public ought to be protected, to a certain extent, against a state of things under which a man may appear to be carrying on business as a corporation when he is only doing so as an individual or as member of a firm: on the other hand, I am aware that those private institutions which discharge a portion of the banking business are of very great use to the country. There are a great many of them, and they supply the needs of very many localities where it would be quite impossible that agencies of incorporated banks could be established; and anything which would tend unnecessarily to cripple their operations, and interfere with the facilities of the public to obtain the accommodation which they wish, should not prevail.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no desire on the part of the Government to cripple any such firm or organization or banking operation. It has been urged by some of those engaged in such banking business that there should be no change made. When asked why, the answer given was because the present condition of things gave them a status. There is no desire to improperly interfere with them in any manner, but to provide that the public who deal with those establishments should know they are not banks, or banking companies, or associations chartered under Act of Parliament. When the Bill is introduced there will be time to consider the various details of it, and if it is thought desirable to amend it, we will be glad to consider any proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. While I do not doubt the power of the House to prevent any corporation or individual performing the ordinary functions of a bank, assuming deposits and issuing bills, and doing such business as banks chartered by Parliament, I doubt exceedingly whether we have the power to prevent an individual assuming any designation or name he may think proper. I do not know whether the hon. Minister has considered that point or not.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have supposed we had the power, but I will consider the point as the hon. gentleman has called my attention to it.

Resolution reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 46) further to amend the Act entitled an Act relating to Banks and Banking and the several Acts amending the same.

Bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACTS CONSOLIDATION.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to consolidate the various Acts respecting the Customs, and to amend the same, so as to make the various provisions consistent, and to remove doubts as to the construction of certain other provisions, and others necessary for better carrying out the principles embodied in the said Acts; and among other things:—

1. To give additional facilities and remedies for the collection of Customs duties, and penalties and forfeitures, and for the prevention of smuggling and other frauds on the revenue, and for the punishment of contraventions of the Customs Law.

2. To provide for the granting of a rebate of duty upon damaged goods paying specific duties.

Mr. BLAKE.

3. To specify the terms upon which bonds given for the due exportation of goods may be cancelled.

4. To make provision for the delivery of warehouse goods as ships' stores to vessels bound for and engaged in the deep-sea fisheries.

5. To provide for the punishment of persons unlawfully gaining access to or removing bonded goods in railway cars.

6. To make better provision for arriving at decisions with respect to seizures or detentions of goods, and with respect to penalties and forfeitures, and to the terms for release of such goods or remission of such penalties or forfeitures.

He said: I do not think it is necessary to enter into a discussion at the present moment of the various amendments which are suggested in this Bill. As the resolution indicates, it is proposed to consolidate the Customs laws as they now appear on the Statute-book in the variety of amendments which have been passed during the past four or five years. It is also to give additional facilities for the collection of revenue, and to place within the power of the Government the enforcing of the penalties for contravention of the law, and also to provide for the granting of a rebate of duty upon damaged goods paying specific duties. Under the present law provision is made for paying duties upon the actual value of the goods, paying ad valorem duty when damaged, either coming into the country or in transitu to the port to which they are sent. There has been no provision made for making a rebate on the value of goods paying a specific duty, excepting, however, the amendment of last year, with reference to the duties paid on grain when damaged make its provisions apply to all classes of goods paying by water. The proposition of the amendment is to specific as well as ad valorem duty, which may have been damaged, either on voyage or on railways, after they have arrived in the country. I think that the House will at once see that this is an equitable provision, and should be applied to all classes of goods imported into Canada. The 3rd clause specifies the terms on which bonds given for exported goods may be cancelled. At present goods which are ex-warehoused—say, for instance, Newfoundland or St. Pierre—have the bonds cancelled on the production of a certificate, as the law says, of any respectable person living on these Islands, or in the country to which the goods may be sent. There is no doubt that frauds to a very great extent have been perpetrated under this provision. We provide for the making of the certificate upon which the cancellation of these bonds shall be made by an officer of Customs, or by some other official in the place to which the goods were exported. This is also in the interest of legitimate trade, and will prevent, to a very great extent, the frauds which in the past have been perpetrated under the law. The 4th clause makes provision for the ex-warehousing of goods and ships' stores for vessels engaged in the deep-sea fisheries. Under the 69th clause of the Customs Act as it now stands on the Statute-book, these rebates can only be made for vessels of a certain size. That clause was relaxed by my predecessor in order to meet some cases which came under his notice; and we have also found it necessary, in the interest of those engaged in this great industry of the Maritime Provinces, to make still further concessions, so we thought it better, that the clause should be amended so as to make it applicable to all vessels, no matter of what size or of what tonnage, provided that they were engaged legitimately in the business of fishing; and also, to provide that in case of any violation of this extension of the law by re-landed goods, the parties offending shall be punished severely. I am under the impression the House will recognize the correctness of this principle; for there is no reason why smaller vessels should not have the same privileges, provided that the regulations be so carried out as to prevent the re-landed goods, and their entry into consumption. Under the present law there is no provision made for punishing persons unlawfully engaged in getting access to bonded railway cars. As to the provisions for bonding goods in warehouse, the law is quite ample; but there is great doubt whether it applies, as it now stands, to bonded railway cars passing through the country. We have had no little difficulty in this respect, and it was thought better, in order that there might be no misunderstanding of the law on this point, to make this change. The 6th provision makes better provision for arriving at a decision with respect to the seizures of smuggled goods, and of enforcing any decision which may be given. I am not a lawyer, but I know that in many cases some legal gentlemen have advised persons, whose goods were seized and penalties imposed, that while under the law the goods could be retained, and forfeited, and sold, there was no provision in the law for the collection of any penalty which might be imposed either by a court or by the Department; provision is made, in cases of this kind, not only for the imposition, but for the collection of fines by legal process. There are a number of other amendments by which, I think, when the Bill is before the House, the members will see that the law is, to a very great extent, simplified, and a large quantity—if I may use that expression—of words to express one idea in the old law, which appears to have been copied from laws previously in existence, for, perhaps, half a century, are struck out, making the meaning as plain as possible so as to protect the revenue, and to enable the Department to administer the law easier and better than has been the case in the past, and in the general interest of the trade. I shall ask the House, when this question is before them—as it affects the whole trade of the country—to consider it very carefully; and when we arrive at the different clauses, I trust, I shall be enabled to give such explanations as the House may require or desire.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I would like to ask the Minister of Customs whether when the Bill is introduced the old sections of the law will be placed in the margin for the purposes of comparison.

Mr. BOWELL. All the amendments proposed are contained in this Bill.

Mr. BURPEE. If I understood right, this is a consolidation of the Customs law, and the changes made might be noted in the margin. The hon. gentleman speaks of requiring certificates of officers of Customs, what will be done where there are no Customs officers, which is the case in many inland places.

Mr. BOWELL. I intended, and think I did say, that a certificate must be given either by some Customs official, or by some other official. The House will see, that to base the cancellation of a bond upon a certificate purporting to be signed by some respectable person, is no protection to the revenue whatever. My hon. friend's experience in the management of the Customs Department proved this at least, that it was impossible for him or any of his officers to tell whether these certificates were bond fide or not, particularly when coming from St. Pierre or from the different out-ports of Newfoundland. It is impossible for anyone to say, whether these certificates were bond fide or not, and in order to protect the revenue, it is absolutely necessary to make some provision, so as to have certificates from some person in an official position. I admit that, to a certain extent, it is a restriction upon that particular class of trade; but when the privilege is given to a merchant to ex-warehouse his goods free of duty after they have been in bond perhaps for months, and sometimes for years, he should be asked at least to produce such a certificate of their landing in a foreign port as would be acceptable to the Customs. With reference to placing the amended sections in the margin, the changes are so voluminous in their character,—the Bill containing some 248 clauses—that the hon. gentleman will see that this is almost impossible; and as we have changed at least the larger number of the clauses, it will be almost impossible to act on the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I know we had great difficulty in that respect, and I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Customs when he says it is necessary, as far as possible, to have a certificate given by an officer of the Customs. At that time I remember we had correspondence with the Customs officers of Newfoundland and with the officer at Halifax, and we had recommendations from the officers there to such persons as were thought capable of signing a certificate, and these came in turn to the officer at Halifax. I quite agree that if the hon. Minister can get an official of the Government it is better to do so than to have anyone else perform the service.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I see the hon. Minister of Customs provides in the second clause for the granting of a rebate upon damaged goods paying specific duties. Will he be kind enough to tell us how he is to determine the question of damage—how it is to be ascertained, and with whom the final determination of the rebate rests? Is it with the hon. Minister himself or with the Department of Customs, or how?

Mr. BOWELL. The law, as it stands, makes provision for arriving at the amount of the damage done to any goods paying an ad valorem duty. We propose to word the clause so as to make the same principle applicable to goods paying specific duties; that is, if the goods are appraised for a certain amount, and it is found that they were damaged say to the extent of 50 per cent., then the specific duty would be reduced in proportion. Provision is also made that the appraisal of the goods shall be made either by the appraisers at the port, or by merchants appointed especially for the purpose. For the information of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee), I may say that it has been under contemplation—and we propose to enter into negotiation with the British Government with that object—to appoint, at our recommendation, what might be termed a Consul at St. Pierre. We know that great frauds have been perpetrated by goods being ex-warehoused and then brought back on certificates which may or may not have been manufactured, so far as I know. If we have an officer of our own we would insist on the certificates of that officer in all cases before allowing the bonds to be cancelled. I think the hon. gentleman had the same question under consideration when he was in the Department, but it was not successfully decided at that time; but I hope we will soon be able to settle it satisfactorily.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope that when the Bill is printed the hon. gentleman will take care that there is an indication on the margin of such clauses as remain unaltered, and that on the margin of those clauses which are altered, reference will be made to the clauses of the Acts which are amended. We would then be able to understand when we were dealing with an unamended clause of the original Act.

Mr. BOWELL. I will ascertain how far the marginal notes have been printed, and if not too late will act upon the suggestion.

Mr. BLAKE. The same arrangement was made with the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. BOWELL. I think, however, the notes would require to be more numerous in this case.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I think not. The hon. gentleman has said, and said rightly, this Bill is one of great interest to the whole commercial community, and that being the case I hope it will be got through the printing department as fast as possible, so as to have it generally circulated before it is passed.

Mr. BOWELL. I have been promised it on Tuesday for circulation, but of course if the hon. gentleman's suggestion about the marginal notes is carried out, it will require some days more to have the Bill printed.

Resolution reported.

Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Customs.

Bill read the first time.

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day being called,

Mr. BLAKE. I observe that the Order for resuming the debate on the motion of the hon. member for West Huron, does not appear on the papers.

Mr. SPEAKER. It has always been the practice that when a debate takes place on a motion which does not appear on the paper, and the debate is adjourned, the order for the resumption of the debate does not appear on the paper as it still remains a question of privilege. If the debate had been ordered to be resumed at a particular time, then it would have appeared on the Order paper, but not otherwise. That was the practice followed in 1880, on motion regarding the Lennox election; the debate was adjourned, but the Order did not appear on the paper.

Mr. BLAKE. In consequence of its being a question of privilege?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then it has precedence.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe an arrangement was made that the debate should not be resumed till Tuesday, to which, of course, my hon. friend the member for West Huron willingly assented.

Mr. SPEAKER. It can either be made an Order for Tuesday, or still remain a matter of privilege.

Mr. BLAKE. Better have it remain a matter of privilege on the understanding that it comes on Tuesday.

MONEY REQUIRED FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY, in moving the third reading of Bill (No. 21) to authorize the raising by way of loan of certain sums of money required for the Public Service, said: A question was asked by the hon. leader of the Opposition the other day, with reference to the agreement made, but I find it was laid before the House last Session,

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, I saw it. I would like the hon. gentleman to state what is the total amount of sinking fund applicable to this particular loan which is proposed to be redeemed. In his former statement he gave us only, as I understood, the figures of the amount of this particular loan which had been purchased out of the sinking fund and the loan; but of course it was not necessary that the whole sinking fund should be applied in these particular securities, and it may be that a portion of the sinking fund is in other securities. I would like to know how much we are going to issue afresh and how much in consequence of the reservation in the Bill, which authorizes only the difference between the sinking fund and the whole amount of the 5 per cent. loan. I have another suggestion which seems to me to deserve some consideration. The Bill says, "such additional sum or sums of money to be raised by way of loan," and reference is made to 35 Victoria and to 38 Victoria. Upon referring to 38 Victoria, which, among other things, authorizes the issue of stock, instead of debentures, I find what appears to me to be an error—perhaps a clerical error but still an important one. The Act says:

"The Governor in Council may authorize the creation, issue and sale of Dominion stock, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annum, under the same provisions under which he may authorize the creation, issue and sale of such stock bearing interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum; and wherever in the Act, 35 Vic., Chap. 6, cited in the title of this Act, the words 'Five per cent. Dominion stock,' or the words 'Five per cent. stock' occur, the words 'Four per cent. Dominion stock, or' or 'Four per cent. stock, or' shall be understood as inserted before them respectively, and the provisions of the said Act shall apply equally to Dominion stock bearing either rate of interest."

But when I turn to 35 Victoria, I find that 6 per cent., and not 5 per cent., stock is mentioned, and consequently there does not seem to be any authority to issue 4 per cent. stock at all, because that authority depends on an Act authorizing what was supposed to be the issue of 5 per cent. stock, but which is in reality, as the Act is printed, 6 per cent. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, that in the other Chamber he should take the necessary steps—if my interpretation of the Act be correct—to insert an amending clause making it clear that he has power to issue 4 per cent. stock, which I do not think he has now.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am not aware; I did not examine the Act carefully. I think the only difference was that the subsequent Act had reference to 5 per cents instead of 6 per cents. It just became a question whether it was necessary to have legislation in order to exchange these particular loans. It was thought possible that we might have power under the Act; but on the whole we thought it better to come and ask for the authority without reference to the Act. I think there are about £400,000 of 5 per cent. securities held as security for other loans, in addition to the sinking fund of this particular loan. However, I will look into the matter, and, if there is anything in the hon. gentleman's suggestion we will have the Bill amended in the other House.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will take a future opportunity to inform the House how much of the sinking fund belongs to this particular loan.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will do so.

Bill read the third time.

PREVENTION OF FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

On the Order for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, being read,

Mr. CASGRAIN. According to the agreement we came to yesterday, I move that this order be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, composed of the following gentlemen, whose names have been given to me by the leader of the Government: Messrs. Amyot, Cameron, (Huron), Casgrain, Costigan, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Kilvert, Rykert, Tupper (Pictou), and Weldon. Of course since I had to agree to send the Bill to a Select Committee, I cannot help accepting the names given to me, but I must remark that there is too great a preponderance of the supporters of the Government upon it. I thought that a Committee, consisting of four Government supporters and three members of the Opposition, might have been satisfactory. However, I will accept the Committee, as the hon. gentleman is all powerful at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will not quarrel about the numbers. It is not a political question. The House has adopted the principle, and a Committee will report upon it.

Order discharged, and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

TRIALS BEFORE COUNTY JUDGES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 11) to amend the law in reference to trial of cases before the County Judges' Criminal Court.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the hon. gentleman ought to give some explanation of the principle of the Bill, and the necessity of introducing it into Parliament. If, however, he proposes to refer it to a Select Committee, where it can be carefully considered, I for one will not object to the second reading. I think changes of this kind should not be made hastily, and I trust the hon. First Minister will see that it is referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I have no objection to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee, but I do not think that is necessary. The object of the Bill is to extend the law in the direction indicated by the Act. At present, a person in Ontario or Quebec, charged with a crime triable before the Sessions, may, if he is committed to gaol, choose to be tried summarily, before the County Judges Criminal Court in Ontario or before a Judge of the Province of Quebec. There are many cases, in which persons are not committed to gaol for trial, but are bound over, and I submit that they also should have the right to be tried summarily if they choose. If the evidence against an accused person is very strong, the chances are in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, that he will be committed to gaol; but if the evidence against him is slight the magistrate binds him over to answer the charge before the next court of competent jurisdiction, in which case he cannot have a speedy trial unless he chooses to surrender himself in discharge of his bail and go into close custody. Now I submit that that is a case in which a person should have the right to say: I will waive the right to be tried by jury, and would prefer being brought before a County Judge out of Session without a jury. That is the object of this Bill. It merely extends the law as it now is to cases where persons are bound over, and not committed for trial. I do not see, myself, there can be any objection at all to it. I have had numerous communications from not only County Judges, but from Crown Attorneys in Ontario, and they all approve of this proposed amendment. I have no objections whatever to refer the Bill to a Special Committee, but really it appears to me the principle is so well understood from our experience in the working of the law, as it now stands, that there is no reason why it should not be extended.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend will send his Bill to a Special Committee, I have no objection to the second reading; otherwise I have. I have rather a strong opinion against the extension of the principle of allowing persons to choose their own courts, and get rid of the publicity which ought to follow crime, and publicity is one of the preventatives of crime. I am strongly against the extension of the principle which would enable the party who has committed a crime, to avoid public shame, and cover up his crime as much as possible by getting a summary judgment against him in a private way. I will not oppose the second reading if my hon. friend will send the Bill to a Special Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no doubt whatever that what the hon. gentleman has said is true, that a public trial is a deterrent. There is no doubt also that publicity in the trial itself is an important element in the thoroughness of the trial and the justice of the result. Things are done in a more solemn manner under the public gaze than in many of these County Court trials, where a man is brought up early in the morning and tried, perhaps in the Justice's room, accompanied by a policeman and with a counsel on each side. Everything is slurred over, and the expedition with which the trial takes place, favors especially the old criminal. He goes in under an alias, and it is very much better for him to get a speedy trial and plead guilty, rather than wait for the Assizes, because he gets only the mitigated penalty that applies to the first offence, when, if there were delay and further efforts made to ascertain his identity, he would get a much severer penalty. This has been the case very frequently. We have seen men convicted on the first offence, who, had their record been known, would have been convicted upon the second or third offence and sent for a long term of years to a penitentiary, both in the interests of society and in their own interests, as a last hope for themselves for reform. I throw out the same suggestion to the hon. gentleman opposite, as important for the consideration of those entrusted with the criminal law, that something should be done to give a greater measure of publicity and solemnity to trials, as was embraced in the measure I took the liberty of moving, with but scant success, two or three years ago in this House, with the view of giving facilities for the identification of men once convicted, so that they might in future receive the increased penalty that the interests of society and themselves demanded.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). It appears to me evident, while I agree to a very great extent with the arguments made use of by the right hon. leader of the House and the hon. member for West Durham, that their remarks are more applicable to the man who is charged with a crime and is committed for trial, than to the individual I seek to reach by my Bill. As I said before, the presumption in the first place is that a man is innocent until proven guilty, and in the second place when the magistrate, after having heard the case in the preliminary examination, finds that the evidence is so weak, that he does not feel justified in committing the prisoner to jail and refusing bail, there is no reason for refusing the speedy trial, provided for in my Bill. I agree with almost every word that has been said with reference to the desirability of giving those trials more publicity. I believe it is very desirable that something should be done in the direction of making these speedy trials as public as possible. I know from experience scores of people who were hardened criminals, generally speaking, who would choose to be tried in the quiet way in which they are tried before the Judges of the Criminal Courts, rather than be tried before a jury, on account of publicity. It appears to me that is a reason why the law, as it now stands, should be amended in the direction suggested, by making these trials more public or else abolishing them altogether. The motive I have is that we may reach the parties who are not so likely to be guilty, as the parties who are committed. However, if the Bill is referred to a Special Committee, I hope to show to that Committee, and through it to the House, that, in consequence of the law standing as it is, there is good reason for this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are pretty well agreed as to the necessity of having more publicity to these trials, and that summary trials of this kind are not to be encouraged. The more we consider the question, the more we see the importance of publicity as a deterrent to crime. I would suggest, therefore, that the hon. gentleman should read his Bill a second time, and allow it to stand for a Committee of the Whole on Monday; and that between now and then a carefully selected Special Committee should be named, to which would be referred not only this Bill, but the consideration of the whole question of summary trials.

Bill read the second time.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT, 1879.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 15) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: The object of the Bill is to prevent, what is now going on in Ontario to a large extent, the practical amalgamation of railways. Whilst we know that railways, without special power, are not entitled to lease other roads or to be leased, or amalgamate with other railways, still by the Consolidated Railway Act they can, at least, for twenty-one years, part completely with their independent character. In the Province of Ontario we have seen this power exercised in a way which was certainly not in the interest of the country nor in good faith with the people, who were served by the railways. We have seen railways incorporated and aided by the public on the supposition and on the distinct representation to the people, that they were to be competing lines, and to have an independent existence. With that understanding large sums of money have at various times been voted by the people as bonuses to such railways. In illustration of this statement, I may refer to at least one railway. The Hamilton and North-Western Railway was brought into practical existence on the representation to the people that they would have for all time a competing line. No sooner, however, was it nearly constructed than it entered into a pooling arrangement under the provisions of the Consolidated Railway Act, whereby it has pooled with the Northern Railway for a period of twenty-one years, thereby defeating the very object which the people had in view in voting a large sum of money to its aid. Now, I do not propose to prevent pooling if such pooling is clearly in the interest of the public, but there are two parties to be considered, the proprietors of the railways and the public. The franchise coming as it does from the people through Parliament, they have a right to be heard before such franchise is destroyed. Much more have they this right in cases where public monies have been given in aid of railways. Therefore, I suggest that the consent of the Government of the day shall be necessary, and without it no amalgamating arrangement shall be valid. At present in amalgamations that take place only the proprietors' consent is required and the public have no voice in it. My proposition is that the Government shall consider all such schemes before they take place, and only sanction them when they are not opposed to the public interest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose the hon. gentleman proposes to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Railways.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose that would be the proper course to adopt.

Bill read the second time.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION OF GERMANS.

The Order being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. KRANZ, for copies of all correspondence between any member of this House or other persons and the Government, in relation to the naturalization of Germans; also, in relation to German immigration, the appointment of Emigrant Agents in Germany, and the affording of reliable information about Canada to intending emigrants; also, a copy of the Report and all correspondence with the German delegates who visited the North-West Territories in 1881; and the question being put,

Motion agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT OF CANADA, 1881.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to issue a proclamation putting in force the Naturalization Act of Canada, 1881, and when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that the proclamation has not yet been issued, because correspondence has been going on with the Imperial Government, and we expect shortly an answer to the last communication long since sent to the Imperial Government on the subject.

ELECTORS RETURNED BY THE CENSUS OF 1881.

Mr. FISHER, in moving for a statement from the records of the Census of 1881, showing the number of males over twenty-one years of age, in each Electoral Division returning a Member to this House, as constituted at the time of the General Election of June last, said: In making this motion it may be proper for me to explain why I ask that the time at which these figures would be placed in our hands by the ordinary issue of the volumes of the Census should be anticipated. By referring to the Census of 1871, I find that the figures corresponding to those I now ask for are in the second volume of the Census of that year, and I suppose they will appear in the second volume of the present Census. I also observe a statement in the newspapers, which I believe to be correct, that the issue of the second volume will be postponed till after the completion of the third, and, therefore, I suppose that we can hardly get the figures before the end of this Session of Parliament. The Government has proposed to introduce legislation in regard to the franchise at this Session of Parliament, and I believe that these figures are essentially important for the due consideration of that question. My object in asking for these figures now is in order to establish a comparison with returns asked for a few days ago, and ordered by this House, at the request of the hon. member for West Durham. I think it is of interest to this House and the country at large that the proportion of adult males in each constituency of the Dominion to those of the voters in each constituency, should be known before discussing any question in regard to the franchise; and it is especially desirable to know what proportions exist between the urban and rural constituencies. I do not ask for any detailed statement, but simply one figure for each constituency in the Dominion, and I trust that the Government will be able to afford the desired information.

Mr. POPE. I would say to my hon. friend that what he asks for is utterly impossible this Session. He is quite right in his reference to the newspapers. The first volume contained the population by religion, origin and birth-place of all the electoral districts, cities and towns, and that the hon. gentleman has already before him. It was thought by the Department that it would be more satisfactory to the country and to the House that the third volume should be next issued, that volume containing property, shipping, lands, animals and their products, and products of the field, the farm, the forest, fisheries, mineral products and industries. That volume will be out during the present Session; but I may say to the hon. gentleman that it will be utterly impossible to get out the second volume for the next three or four months. The second volume will be issued probably by October next, which will complete the Census. We could not facilitate its issue very much, or get it out very much earlier than that. I hope, therefore, the hon. gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Minister has totally misunderstood the object of the motion. The motion was not that the hon. gentleman should bring down the second volume of the Census. The motion is simply for a statement of one set of figures for each constituency, which figures are to appear in the third volume.

Mr. POPE. I did not misunderstand it.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, I cannot say what the hon. gentleman did; but he did not accurately state what the motion was. It was not to bring down the second volume of the Census, but only to bring down one set of figures. It may be, of course, that the tabulation of those portions of the Census are in such a condition that the hon. gentleman cannot bring down the figures asked for. If so, the hon. gentleman's answer is so far complete; but I want it to be distinctly understood that the request is simply to ascertain what is the number of adult males in each constituency, and that simple piece of information cannot be obtained during the Session. If it cannot be obtained, it is much to be regretted that, without informing the House, as to the intention of the Department, its course should have been altered. The hon. gentleman may be quite right in his opinion that the subjects contained in the third volume are more interesting than those in the second, but it is a pity that when he was about to alter the regular course, he did not take the House into his confidence last Session, and announce that he was about to place the cart before the horse, and issue the third volume before the second.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no question of placing the cart before the horse. All the hon. gentleman proposes to do is to issue the third volume before the second, and it is quite clear that the information to be given in the third volume is more important than that in the other volume. I do not really see that a return of the number of males over twenty-one years in each electoral district, or the casual proportion between adult males and infant males in any given electoral district can in any way effect the general principle which must govern any Franchise Bill for the whole Dominion.

Mr. POPE. The hon. member has placed in my mouth words which I did not utter. I did not say that the motion was for the second volume of the Census; but what I did say was, that the information asked for cannot be brought down during this Session, and that it is useless to ask for it, because it cannot be brought down sooner than such time as the second volume is issued.

Motion withdrawn.

THE MARITIME COURT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for a return of all correspondence between the Judge or any of the Judges of the Maritime Court of the Province of Ontario and the Government, respecting the rules, practice and procedure of said Court, and the simplification thereof; and the fees and charges now taxable in said Court; also, copies of any amended rules, or proposed amended rules, to the 1st of January, 1882, said: I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of the Marine Department to the fact that in May, 1879, a return was brought down in answer to an address from this House, showing the number of cases disposed of by the Maritime Courts of the Province of Ontario, the expenses connected with the trial of those cases. This return, however, was very imperfect, and a good deal of the information sought for was not submitted to Parliament at all. During the last Session of last Parliament, I moved—on the 20th February—for full information on this subject; but, no return has been brought down, of which I am aware, in answer to that address. I thought it desirable, and I think others who take some interest in this Court, which was established a few years ago, were anxious to get information which I sought to get by that return. I should like to know the reason, why it has not been brought down. It is not a voluminous return. It cannot take much time. The information is important to get, in view of the fact that some members of the House propose some amendments to the Bill or Statute creating the Maritime Court for our Province. Now, it is well known that the law, when it was first passed, was an experiment. How far that experiment has worked satisfactorily, is a problem that can only be solved by getting this information. I pointed out, when I made that motion, that the object of the law was to give sailors a speedy and inexpensive remedy for the collection of their wages. I pointed out that instead of it being a simple and inexpensive mode, it was, on the contrary, a very expensive mode. It was a tedious mode. The rules by which the rights of sailors and other litigants are protected, are exceedingly cumbersome. I pointed out that these rules were something like 300 in number; that the Statute itself was not a very short one; that each of these rules had the force of a statutory enactment, and that altogether it was a very expensive and a very tedious process by which parties, who sought to acquire their rights through the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court, were put to. I pointed out this, that in one case where the amount involved was some $350, the expenses were over $1,000. I pointed out that in another case where the amount involved was $200, the expenses taxed to the plaintiff were $354 and odd, and the expenses of the defendant were somewhere about the same sum, in all, some $700, to recover a claim of about $200. I pointed out in another case, which involved some $110, that the costs were some $300, and that the counsel fees, allowed by the Judge to the solicitor for the plaintiff, were $110, in a short, simple little case involving altogether the amount of $110. I pointed out that this state of things should not exist, and so far as I understood from the short discussion which then took place on the subject, it was admitted on all hands that the law required simplification; that the rules ought to be simplified; and that the costs ought to be reduced to a very considerable extent. Now, what I wish to know, by the present motion, is whether or not the Government have taken any step in that direction; whether the rules have been simplified; whether the costs have been reduced, and whether a new tariff of fees has been established; or whether the Government have taken any steps whatever with the view of remedying what I believe to be a gross outrage, to use no milder term. It was, I think, Sir, understood last Session, that some attempt would be made to simplify these rules, with the view at all events of enabling sailors to recover claims, where their claims were for small sums, in a cheap and inexpensive way, and in some short and summary way as well. Now, I may mention to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that, in our Courts in the Province of Ontario, claims up to $200 can be recovered in a very expeditious mode, and at very little expense, by Division Court process. There is no reason in the world why some process of the same kind should not be applied to the Maritime Court, where the amount concerned is a small sum. Now, there is another point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Government. There is no appeal now from the judgment of one of the Judges of the Maritime Court, except to the Supreme Court. Now, I say that is a grievous wrong too. I have no ground of complaint against the Judges of the Maritime Court, as a general rule; but we know that some cases come before the Judges of this Court, with respect to vessels, in which there are complicated points of law and of fact—questions with which they have not been accustomed to deal in the Division Court, and in the County Court; and it does appear to me that where a man thinks he is aggrieved by the adjudication of the County Court, he should have redress, by an appeal to the Court of Appeal, in our own Province, without being driven to the necessity of appealing to the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada. Now, I trust, that these points have been engaging the attention of the Government, or will speedily engage the attention of the Government, that they will direct their attention to remedying as far as possible the wrongs we complain of in this respect.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return of the advertisement for construction of the breakwater at Port Lorne, N.S., and the several tenders therefor; the party to whom the contract was awarded, and the amount of such contract.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the number of causes tried at each of the County Courts of the Counties of King's and Albert, since the first of June, A.D. 1882; with the amount of verdicts and judgments entered thereon.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of all tenders submitted for the construction of the freight sheds and warehouses at the Intercolonial Railway Depot, St. John, N.B., for the foundations, brickwork, masonry, and other work connected therewith; the names of the several contractors, and the amount of each contract; the number and names of the Superintendents and Overseers of the work, and the amount paid for their services.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the several amounts paid for damages for lands taken on Mill and Pond streets, in St. John, New Brunswick, for the Intercolonial Railway; the names of the Arbitrators appointed to appraise the land and the compensation paid to them; the several awards made by them and the evidence upon which the same were founded, and the several parties to whom the amount of such awards was paid.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the advertisement for the contract of the building of a steamer to replace the Glendon, the several tenders therefor, to whom the contract was awarded, and the amount of such contract.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the tenders for the re-building of the lighthouse at Quaco, New Brunswick, and to whom the contract was awarded, and the amount of such contract.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council, and other documents respecting a grant for the winter service performed on the St. Lawrence, between Murray Bay and Rivière Ouelle, by the steamer Fulger; also, a statement of the sums paid, or to be paid, by the Dominion Government for that purpose.—(Mr. Blondeau.)

STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the House adjourns I would like to ask the hon. gentleman at what period it is proposed to bring down the more important measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and particularly the Franchise Bill and the License Bill; also at what time we may expect the financial statement. I am quite aware that hon. gentlemen have been very much engaged in the affairs of Ontario and New Brunswick for some time back, and I am also aware that the affairs of Manitoba and Prince Edward Island are also engaging their attention; but I hope that, before very long, we may expect them to devote some attention to the affairs of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Unlike the hon. gentleman, if we do pay attention to these other affairs, we do not do so to the exclusion of everything else. I may say, however, that we will bring down these measures very soon.

Mr. BLAKE. How soon?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very soon indeed.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 5th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 47) to revise and amend certain Acts respecting The Union Assurance Company of Canada, and to change the name of the Company to the Crown Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Wood Mountain, Qu'Appelle and Prince Albert Railway Company.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Dominion Phosphate and Mining Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 50) to amend an Act respecting the Credit Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 51) to amend the Act to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Brant County Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 16) to incorporate the Central Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Small.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read a second time:—

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the Bank of London in Canada.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 36) to amend the Act incorporating the Kingston and Pembroke Railway, and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. Gunn.)

Bill (No. 42) to amend and continue in force the Act incorporating the Grafton Harbor Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Guillet.)

REPORT.

The following Report was laid on the Table:—

Report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1882.

MONEY ORDER ARRANGEMENTS WITH EUROPE.

Mr. COURSOL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to effect any arrangement with the various nations forming the Postal Union, with the object of placing at the disposal of the public, post office money orders on France, Belgium, Italy and Germany, with the view of promoting trade, and assisting those immigrants who are desirous of sending money to those countries, and receiving it from them?

Mr. CARLING. I beg to say that correspondence is now going on with the different countries mentioned with the object of carrying out the view put forward by the hon. gentleman.

LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. AUGER enquired Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure reducing the postage on letters to two cents, in view of the adoption of a like measure in the United States?

Mr. CARLING. It is not the intention of the Government to bring down, during the present Session, a measure to reduce postage rates.

CABLE FROM BARRINGTON TO CAPE SABLE ISLAND.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Do the Government propose to extend the telegraph line from Barrington to Cape Sable Island Lighthouse this year, and have any arrangements been made for the manufacture of the necessary cable?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Arrangements had been made to obtain a cable, but on the way to Canada the cable was lost. A new cable has therefore been ordered.

FOG-WHISTLE AT SHELBURNE HARBOR, N.S.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed during the present year, with the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance of Shelburne Harbor, Nova Scotia, for which provision was made in the Estimates during the last Session; and if so, is it to be one similar to those erected at Sambro and Yarmouth?

Mr. McLELAN. A fog-whistle will be placed there as soon as the spring opens. It will not be the same as that erected at Sambro. A delay occurred last year on account of the maker not being able to get it placed in position during the season of navigation.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. KILVERT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to cause an examination, under the Civil Service Act, to be held in the Province of Ontario at an early day; and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The present intention of the Government is to have an examination in June; but an amendment Bill will come down soon and perhaps some change will be made in the time of holding the examination.

RAILWAY CROSSING AT ST. PETER'S ROAD, P.E.I.

Mr. DAVIES enquired, Whether the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways has been called to the dangerous state of the railway crossing on the St. Peter's Road, Prince Edward Island, and to the serious accident which occurred there last winter, and whether he intends having a bridge built over that crossing, or having other means adopted for the protection of the travelling public at that place.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This question, I think, is not in conformity with the rules of the House. I object to the statements of opinion here made.

Mr. SPEAKER. In questions to be put no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any fact stated except so far as may be necessary to explain the same. As perhaps there may be two opinions as to whether the crossing is "dangerous" and the accident was "serious," I think those two words should be omitted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentlemen will renew his question in that shape, I will answer it to-morrow.

THE CASE OF JULIE BOISVERT.

Mr. COURSOL enquired, Has the Government definitely considered and decided on the petition of the citizens of Montreal for the release of Julie Boisvert, now confined in the penitentiary?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may mention, for the information of my hon. friend, that enquiries have been made and reports obtained from the medical officer of the penitentiary, from the warden, and from the Chief Justice who tried the case; and, after considering all the reports, the hon. Minister of Justice has not thought fit, within the limits of his duty, to recommend the release.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for—

(1.) Copies of the official memorandum of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, dated December 12th, 1882, describing its position and prospects.

(2.) Of the advertisement published thereafter by the Company asking for subscriptions for its increased Capital Stock.

(3.) Of all memoranda issued in connection therewith.

(4.) Statement showing the amount of the subscribed stock of the Company prior to the authorization for the increase of its Capital Stock from $25,000,000 to $100,000,000, and of the amounts paid up on such subscribed stock with the date of each payment in cash, and also the amounts (in any), satisfied by the acquisition of property or otherwise, specifying in such case, the consideration therefor and the amount of stock given and the date.

(5.) Statements of the amounts paid out of the capital for interest on such Capital Stock, and the rate of such payment.

(6.) Statements of the facts as to the acquisition by the Company of the Canada-Central Railway, and of the Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway with dates.

(7.) Statements of the facts as to the acquisition by the Company of any interest in the Credit Valley Railway and the Ontario and Quebec Railway.

(8.) Statement of the various matters required to be returned under the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, and amendments thereto, separately as to

1. The line of Railway provided for by the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and

2. The branches and extensions built or acquired by the Company.

(9.) Statement of the total sum expended up to the 1st of February, 1883, by the Company under their contract,—

1. For works of construction on the line contracted to be built by the Company as specified in the contract.

2. For rolling stock for the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway as specified in the said contract.

3. For works of construction on extensions and branches not embraced in the Railway specified by the contract.

4. For rolling stock for all extensions and branches not embraced in the Railway specified by the contract. And of the receipts of the Company up to the same date, on account of—

1. Cash subsidy.

2. Land grant bonds.

3. Bonuses.

4. Land sales or transactions not embraced in the operations connected with land grant bonds.

5. Number of acres of land subsidy.

6. Amounts of bonuses agreed for though not paid.

He said: The motion of which I have given notice and in which I propose that the House should ask for several items of information, with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, is directed to the investigation of one of the questions which we regarded as a very serious one at the period when the contract was entered into, and which I think subsequent events have indicated to be quite as serious as was then apprehended. I refer to that measure of control over the monopoly that was given, and which, it was asserted, would be obtained by the Government reserving the power to regulate the tolls, provided they return a profit to the Company of not less than 10 per cent.; and the information asked for—I say directly that the investigation into the practical working, as far as our experience up to this time—shows what will be the effect of this clause, not so much at all with reference to the rates which have been authorized; not so much at all with reference to the earnings that have been obtained; not so much at all with reference to the profits on the working of the line, which have been realized by the Company; but the question is based on the capital, upon which the calculations have to be made, in order to regulate the tolls to be charged, and to ascertain the powers which are given with reference to the 10 per cent. that can be collected under the Act. The general law, Sir, very wisely provides certain powers to be exercised between the Government and these corporations, with reference to the tolls, that can be levied by railway companies; and there are for this two reasons, I presume: 1st, because these companies have received valuable public franchises, and it is consequently fitting that they should be, in a certain measure, under public control, owing to their responsibility to the public due to the granting of such franchises; and 2nd, because all railways are, to a certain extent, monopolies. Between way stations—non-competitive points—they are practically monopolies, being free from the restraints caused by competition. These two objections I presume, induced Parliament to confer on the Government the power to retain certain powers necessary to secure the due regulation of the profits by these companies from the prosecution of their enterprises. These objections, of course, apply with infinitely greater force to the great railway with which this motion deals: 1st, because that railway was to be constructed largely—it was admitted and as many contended—at the public cost, not at the private cost of those who were about to receive the charter; and 2nd, because many special privileges and advantages were sought for; and, while it was actually a statutory monopoly, the nature of the line rendered it for a long period of time an actual monopoly over a considerable part of the country through which it ran. Obviously something more—and it was reasonable that something more should be demanded than was insisted upon in ordinary cases. Well, a safeguard was suggested to prevent the dangers apprehended from the exercise of a monopoly, and the only safeguard which was suggested was the power taken by the Government for the regulation of the tolls. When the original contract was presented it was contended that this power was entirely illusory; but under the circumstances it is well to refer to the record, and see exactly what it was that we contended, while the debate was going on, was the effect of the proposition which the Government laid before the House. I said on the 15th of December:

“So that while the Governor in Council has, as applied to other railways, an absolute power to reduce the tariff of tolls at any time, the Governor in Council, as to this railway, cannot reduce any tariff of tolls unless to a point at which they will produce not less than ten per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway. And is it because it is not the Syndicate's money—is it because it is our money—on which the ten per cent. is to be paid, that they are to be secured, while private capital is exposed to a lower dividend? Why is it that they are not to be subject to the Order in Council to as full an extent as all other railway companies are subject? Why is it that the power of the Governor in Council is limited to this ten per cent.? Now, let us discuss this ten per cent. a little. The hon. gentleman ventured the suggestion the other day that this was on the Company's own private capital, but he will not find that suggestion borne out. I shall be very much pleased if the hon. gentleman is able to obtain a declaration from the members of the Syndicate, that what is intended is, that they are to get not less than ten per cent. of the money they themselves put into the railway. That nothing that comes from the country—that the Thunder Bay branch, for instance, is not included—that the railway in British Columbia or the Pembina branch is not included—that the proceeds from the sale of lands is not included—that only that, which, after the public resources are exhausted, they take out of their own pockets, is to bear this ten per cent. If the hon. gentleman will say so, he will remove a large part of my objections to this contract. But he cannot say so; it is not the agreement; it is not the contract; it is not the law. If this contract passes in this shape, the capital, no matter from what source—though it represents the money we have put in, and the money we are going to put in, and the proceeds of the land we give—is the capital spent on the whole of that undertaking, called, by the Act the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is entitled to bear ten per cent. And if you say that I under-estimate the cost of the road; if you tell me, so as to make out that they have got a worse bargain, that the road is going to cost them $120,000,000, then they can take $12,000,000 a year in tolls, and that without expending even for a brief space more than $5,000,000 of their own capital. They are first of all to take enough of the profit out of the middle and paying part to work that part, and then they are to take profit enough to work the British Columbia end and the Lake Superior end, and after they have taken enough to pay the working expenses of the whole line, after having taxed the farmers of the North-West with enough money to pay the working expenses of the whole, they are then, after all, to set the profit at what rate they please to put it. Call the cost of the road $90,000,000, that is $9,000,000 direct profit. Call it $120,000,000, that is $12,000,000 a year before you can reduce tolls once established. It is contemplated they shall get ten per cent. interest. You make a provision that their rate of profit shall not be less than ten per cent. in effect so far as you can make that provision. Besides, you will fix these tolls, in the first instance, with reference to the larger running expenditure that will exist and smaller returns that may at first exist. The Syndicate will reasonably say, fix a toll at a rate which will make the railroad pay or help to pay under existing conditions. You fix it, and once fixed you can never alter it until the day arrives at which the Company is getting $9,000,000, or $12,000,000 a year profit, after paying all the expenses of the road. Nor is that all. The hon. gentleman has taken the Union Pacific as his standard, and there may be a construction company, there may be a Canada Credit Mobilier, there may be arrangements which would easily swell the nominal capital account to the $150,000,000, so that it may appear that the $150,000,000 had been expended on the construction of this railway, though it may have cost only $90,000,000 to construct it. The hon. gentleman has himself told us how men are deceived. He, the man who is chiefly responsible for the making of this contract, who submitted it to Parliament, who inserted this clause that the Union Pacific should be the standard, actually did believe that the Union Pacific did cost the $130,000,000 he mentioned. I have shown you it cost nothing like that sum, that the amount was a nominal one made up by fraud, by all the devices that can be resorted to in such cases. If the hon. gentleman did not know that the cost of the Union Pacific built as it was, as I have said, was much less than the nominal cost, how will his friendly eyes ever open to the conception that it is possible a similar result may be reached in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway.”

Once again, Sir, at a much later stage in the debate—on the 18th of January—referring to a very recent report of the New York Board of Trade and Commerce, and reading an extract from that report, which is as follows:—

“An illustration of the workings of this policy is found in the present situation of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway. The earnings for the past year were nearly 12 per cent. net upon its grossly inflated capital, besides adding largely to equipment, which was charged to operating expenses. It is now reported in Wall street that a further inflation of its capital is to be made under the guise of a consolidation with the Lake Shore road. In 1867 and 1868, $47,000,000 of watered stock were added to the capital of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway, upon which regular 8 per cent. dividends have since been paid, and these dividends upon that water, with the interest thereon, compounded annually for 13 years, now amount to over $75,000,000, while the stock itself is quoted in the market at $150 per share. In other words, if instead of watering the stock of these roads in 1867 and 1868, Mr. Vanderbilt had reduced the rates for transportation to a point which would have yielded 8 per cent. net upon the then outstanding capital, the public would at the present time have been $75,000,000 better off, and $47,000,000 of stock, which cost only the paper and ink with which it was printed, and which is now quoted at $150 per share, would not now be in existence and form a pretext for further taxing the industry and commerce of this State and country for all time to come.”

Well, at a later stage in the debate, Mr. McDougall, then member for Halton, reiterated these difficulties which had occurred to many minds, as to the true construction of the contract, and stated his own opinion to be that which had before been expressed in various quarters of this House: that as the contract stood it was the whole capital which was spent in the construction of the railway—namely, from whatever source it came—that was to bear the dividend; but on that occasion, the hon. First Minister, much later on, announced to the House formally, that the Government and the Syndicate adopted a different view, and that the business was to be rectified; and declared that the Consolidated Railway Act was to be amended in the course of the then Session, in such a manner as to secure the country against such a construction, and to provide for this construction, namely, that the 10 per cent. profit was to be only paid upon the amount actually invested by the Syndicate in the building of the road. That, I understand to be the substance of the hon. gentleman's declaration. Now, of course, we met that question, so far as it was possible to meet it by declarations, and at a subsequent stage, however, before we reached the Consolidated Railway Amendments Act, I took leave to point out, on the 31st of January, when the hon. the Minister of Railways was carrying the Bill based on the contract, through the House, that:

“There was a very important omission in the Bill which he thought could be remedied consistent with its provisions, viz.: that specific and detailed accounts of the operations connected with the various departments of the Pacific Railway should be submitted to Parliament. No doubt Parliament possessed the power, with respect to this corporation, as to any competition at this time or at any time, to demand various accounts and statements. Experience on the other side of the line had shown that this was exceedingly important with reference to the question of calculating what was the capital of the Company and what were the tolls. The utmost difficulty was experienced in obtaining a statement as to what was the actual cost of the Union Pacific, particularly with respect to this question of tolls, and three or four commissions were appointed to ascertain the facts. A clause should be inserted in the present Bill compelling the Pacific Railway Company to bring down, within fifteen days of the opening of each Session, a detailed account, showing what the receipts were from the Government subsidy; 2nd, profits from land sales; 3rd, from other sales; what the expenditure was on capital account, on construction, and also on administration of the land."

The hon. Minister met that suggestion by saying that he would not amend the Bill for that purpose, but would introduce into the amendment of the Consolidated Railway Bill clauses of a general character, and perhaps some containing a specific reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway which would meet the object; and so it was that the contract was finally passed upon by this House. Well, Sir, at a later date, of course, the Consolidated Railway Amendment Act came in, and it was to me very disappointing. I made some observations upon it, which, in view of what has since taken place, show, I think, that the objections which we took to the course and policy of the Government in that regard were entirely well founded. That debate took place on the 10th of March, 1881, when I said this:

"The hon. gentleman whom I asked to explain the clause dealing with this subject contented himself with simply reading it again. I could have read for myself, and did so. I think the hon. gentleman might have pointed out what the operation of the clause would be with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. According to my own understanding of the powers given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it seems to me this clause would not operate satisfactorily, or accomplish what was suggested during the debate on this subject, about really to be accomplished. It will be remembered it was generally avowed that the resources which the Company was about to obtain from the public, including its borrowing powers upon the lands, would be adequate—its borrowing powers and cash subsidies which, by a slight actual payment on the capital stock and work, were estimated at a certain value. It will be remembered that calculations were gone into, indeed not disputed by the other side, seriously, which indicated that somewhere about $5,000,000 was, perhaps, the outside of the actual cash in the way of share capital which would be acquired by this railway company. The statement made from the Ministerial benches was that this power to levy tolls or rates, or rather the limitation of this power of the Governor in Council and Parliament to reduce the tolls, in the case in which those tolls should be exceeding ten per cent. of the capital, was to apply to the actual paid up capital of the Company. Nothing was said at that time of the interest for the period during which dividends should not be paid. Not a word was said to Parliament of that important addition to the mass on which interest profits are to be paid at the rate of ten per cent. It is a new introduction altogether. But more than that, the discussion being based upon the view that but a small amount of share capital would be really required, we are now face to face with a plain scheme which makes it the direct interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to adopt those modes of action which it was suggested during the course of the debate might be adopted in order to render nugatory any restrictions as to its profits based upon the amount of its capital account. We all know that the greater part of the interest rate of railways in the United States, of the capital account, is very much larger than the real, genuine expenditure upon those railways represents, that the capital account has been swollen by stocks issued, not at par, but by bonds sold at great discounts in many instances, by watered stocks and fraudulent bond issues. We all know that the capital account, as it stands, is something wholly different from what the real cost of the railway was. Take the statements which are made by hon. gentlemen here and in England, very much to the detriment of railway enterprise in Canada, with reference to the capital account of our great railway—to the several construction accounts—to the subsequent swelling of the capital account, or to all those things which indicate an original swelling of the capital account, to a point far beyond the genuine cost of the work—take off this fund created not many years ago, when there was an issue of ordinary stock to something like £10,000,000 sterling, at 20 per cent. on which but £2,000,000 was realized by the company; and, for this, the £10,000,000 sterling emitted, besides has been added to the capital stock of the Grand Trunk Railway. That debt was created—not for the purpose of renewing construction, but for steel-railing the road. But, at any rate if that were to be added to the capital account, although the renewal of its rails ought to have been provided for out of ordinary revenue—the only thing properly, on the most liberal construction, that ought to have been added to the capital account was the difference between the cost of the steel and iron. But the whole £10,000,000 were added to that account for only £2,000,000 cash, which makes of the clause a totally illusory showing as to what the real capital account of the Grand Trunk Railway is; and the same results to a very notable extent have been seen with reference to some other railroads in the United States. Another important illustration in the same sense is given us in the capital account of the Central and Union Pacific Railways; for a recent report of the authorities of the United States indicates that while the apparent cost of those roads was something over $300,000,000, the actual cost at present prices would be about $75,000,000. The practical result of all this is, that it is easy to swell the capital account; and when you reflect that in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway the provisions are such that there is no security for the capital stock representing money actually paid to the apparent value of that stock, it will be observed that every facility is afforded for the undue increase of the capital account. In virtue of the provisions of the charter it is competent for the Company to dispose of the capital stock at such prices as the directors may choose to affix to it, and for a consideration such as they may choose to take for it. It is therefore competent to them, for example, to arrange a construction company which may be paid partly in securities of the railway company, partly in cash, and partly in its capital stock—this construction company being composed practically of the corporators of the Company. That is what took place as we know, with regard to the Union Pacific when the crédit mobilier was constructed, and large blocks of the stock of the Union Pacific were handed over to those contractors—who were really the Company itself—at nominal rates. Well, you give an inducement to the railway company to enter upon this plan, while under other circumstances there would have been no inducement to the swelling of the capital stock beyond reasonable limits. Your present proposal is a direct inducement to them to enter into these courses, because you tell them that they may make returns free from the power of the Government, and they will offer rates up to ten per cent. on the capital stock and the interest thereon, and therefore you tell them that the larger they swell the capital stock so much the greater will be their power to obtain dividends on the enterprise uncontrolled by the Government. The natural result will be that they will make such financial arrangements in such a way as will give them that freedom, such as shall insure the emission—I do not say for money, but for a small consideration—to themselves probably of the whole block of this capital stock. And we do not provide that, unless for the years in which they receive a dividend upon it, interest shall be added to the amount so created for ten years during the construction, and on this aggregate they may have ten per cent. profit uncontrolled. Of course, it is easily managed. It may be said they will not abstain from dividing profits in order to secure this result: but during these ten years there will be a very easy application of all the profits they will make from the running of the completed portions of the road. They will be engaged in construction during the whole of that time, and instead of dividing the profits, they may use the profits on the completed portions in their hands, and facilitate the work of construction of the remainder. Again, they may make a division as soon as they acquire, from time to time, large portions of the lands, and that would not be a dividend on capital stock. On the whole, it is tolerably clear that they may, without any practical inconvenience, make arrangements by which, without their being really represented by money, or at all events money to the extent of more than four or five millions, the whole shares of the $25,000,000 capital stock may be omitted, and a charge made of the interest of the capital stock so omitted, amounting altogether to about $40,000,000, on which they might obtain dividends, uncontrolled by the Government, up to the extent of 10 per cent. That is practically the result which may be achieved under this clause. I quite agree that that is a better result than what was to be looked for under the Bill lately before Parliament. But it is not the result which we were told would be secured. I believe, if the expectations of the Syndicate are largely carried out; if the calculations of the Government are largely verified, it would be unnecessary to expend more than $5,000,000 of money in the shape of capital stock, and they will have a nominal capital by the time the road is completed of $25,000,000, with $15,000,000 interest, or in all $40,000,000, bearing dividends within the meaning of this clause, and there will be no efficient control over the rates in future."

Now to that position the hon. First Minister made an answer, and this is his answer:

"We have been treated by the hon. gentleman to a very elaborate argument upon what appears to be really a small matter. The definition of the word capital in the first section of the Bill is not the general interpretation of the word capital in Acts of Parliament generally, but is simply the meaning of the word capital in the Railway Act of 1879, so far as regards the collection of the tolls. It may be remembered that when we were discussing the Canadian Pacific Railway, the argument was used that they might raise large sums of money on the lands they were to receive, they might steal that money, issue bonds to any extent, throw the road on the public or on the bondholders, and that the 15 per cent was too large and they would have a monopoly of rates. There was no use arguing that the Government had a check, because no tolls or rates could be imposed except under approval of an Order in Council. There was no confidence in the Syndicate, because it was a monopoly, and no confidence in the Government because it was the Government. The Act of 1879, to which this clause relates, provides that the Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, reduce the tolls on railways, but not without the consent of the Company unless their profits were over 15 per cent of the capital actually expended. No matter how the road had been built, whether by bonds or paid up shares, 15 per cent must be the profits on the capital expended before the tolls could be reduced. That rate was now diminished to 10 per cent., and it was proposed that subsidies should not be counted. It seems to me that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have gone up a great deal more than was ever asked or expected from any other railway company; yet hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied. If it is watered or bogus stock, it is not capital expended on the road. There is nothing in the objection taken by the hon. member for West Durham, and the hon. gentleman appears to have raised it just for the purpose of making it."

And so the matter ended; and now we are able to ascertain to some extent what the probable results of that ending are. We pointed out at that time that by the calculations laid before us, the Company, probably, would not only have the road for nothing, but at a large profit; and, as I stated in the debate on the Address, their official memorandum of the 12th of December last, and the subsequent documents which have been issued to the public, establish that proposition conclusively. I have given these figures already, but hon. gentlemen opposite declined to enter into any discussion of them. I shall briefly repeat them, because I do not think they can be too thoroughly impressed upon the minds of hon. members. The Company's calculation is that they will do all the work bargained for and fully equip the road, and besides buy or build 684 miles of branch lines and equip the same, and besides, pay interest on their capital at a real average rate of  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.—really on the following sums: \$25,000,000 of cash subsidy; the proceeds of \$20,000,000 of land grant bonds already emitted and almost wholly provided for; \$90,000,000 of stock at sixty, producing \$54,000,000; making a total of \$99,000,000. I estimate that the branches and extensions, amounting to 684 miles, will cost about \$9,000,000, subject to liens for \$5,500,000, stated to exist in the prospectus. This of course is an estimate of my own merely. It is not confirmed by any statement emitted by the Company, but is based on such information as I have been able to obtain as to the cost of the work. That would reduce the cost of the whole work stipulated for to some \$90,000,000. The assets which the Company are to receive from the public are as follows: Cash subsidy \$25,000,000; proceeds from the sale of 6,254,000 acres, already sold, about \$17,500,000; and the balance of the land grant, assuming it to realize the same average rate as the land already sold, \$49,500,000; making a total of \$92,000,000, apart from town sites, municipal bonuses, lots in the mile belt, and any special available lands, such as timber and coal lands, which would produce say \$8,000,000 more; and apart also from the value of the Government works, which are stated by the Company in this document of the 12th of December to be worth \$35,000,000; bringing their total assets received from the public up to \$135,000,000, and giving them a profit—as between their expenditure and the value they are to receive in cash, lands and works—of from \$37,000,000 to \$42,000,000, say \$40,000,000. So that, after all the information they have obtained as to the cost of works and their practical experience as to the value of the lands, their own statement now is that the railway is to cost them nothing, but that they are to have it with practically a margin of Government works. It is also important to observe in this connection, that the effect of our contentions was that it was very wrong to distribute the subsidy in the mode in which it was distributed. We declared that an inordinate proportion was assigned to the prairie section, and that that section ought to have been reserved and allocated to the more difficult portions of the work; and then again some proof of the truth of our proposition is afforded by the prospectus of the 12th of December. The ascertained profits from the work on the prairie section, as far as one can gather them, are these: A cash subsidy of \$10,000 a mile, for about 600 miles, \$6,000,000; and 7,500,000 acres of land, which sold at an average of \$2.63 an acre, \$20,000,000, aggregating \$26,100,000; while so far as we have been able to gather, the cost of the prairie section is \$7,000,000 leaving a profit of say \$19,000,000, apart from certain specialties, to which I have already referred, and which would add considerably to that profit. But, you may say, that profit is not yet realized. It is true, it is not realized in cash, yet sales have already been made, and the value of the land has been ascertained, and it is upon the ascertained profit derived from the sale of the lands along the 600 miles of railway already built, that I have been calculating these results. Yet, what have been the actual receipts of the Company in cash upon construction thus far? It is true, the arrangements under which they have issued their land grant bonds are such, that until the Treasury receives enough from the Company in respect of land sales to meet the whole \$20,000,000 of bonds, a certain smaller proportion is payable out, and therefore the Company may have received only a proportion of what they will ultimately receive; but what have they actually received? So far as I can make out, it is as follows: subsidy payments, \$6,425,000; the proceeds of land grant bonds, \$5,628,000; interest on the deposit of land grant bonds, about \$80,000; advances on rails not yet upon the track, \$1,145,000; and rails and fastenings received from the Government, \$280,000; making an aggregate in money and rails of \$13,558,000, which has been received from the Government of this country since the contract went into operation, and which added to the original capital of the Company—amounting to \$5,000,000, which is said to have been all paid up—makes \$18,500,000 available for the work which they have done. And yet the papers brought down to the House show conclusively that the Company have been very anxious to get more; that from day to day, the very instant anything was due the request was made by them for the amount; that the amount they owed to the Government on account of the construction of the first 100 miles was in part refunded to them in order to enable them to carry on their work—though the advance has been since repaid; that the \$1,000,000 they deposited as security has been handed back to them, and the bonds or debentures of another railway taken in exchange, in order to give them more cash; so that all the indications are, notwithstanding the very large receipt of over \$13,500,000 from the public, and \$5,000,000 of their own capital, that they wanted money. Now, we contended that the unlimited power of building branches and extensions was inconvenient and might prove dangerous. What I have already said shows to you that such was the case, because it is quite out of the question that the funds—the \$18,500,000 I have mentioned—have been watered for the contracted line. The prairie railway has cost, perhaps, about \$7,000,000, the other expenditure on the main line and equipment about \$3,000,000, and a very large margin remains entirely unaccounted for as far as the stipulated line is concerned. But we can easily account for the expenditure of that money, because the Company has been going very extensively, apparently, into other works, and those resources which we gave to the Company in order that the railway might be built, have been, as I suppose, very largely applied to these extensions and branches and other operations to which I am about to refer. There are 135 miles built of branches in the prairie; there is a very considerable amount of work done on a branch to Algoma Mills; there is the Canada Central Railway which has been acquired; there is a portion of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental which has been acquired; there are, as appears from the papers brought down, interests in connection with the Credit Valley Railway Company and the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company—because we find the Canadian Pacific Railway is the holder of some \$1,615,000 of the stock debentures of the Credit Valley Company, which it hands over to the Government as security in lieu of the \$1,000,000, and we find, among the papers brought down, a proposal of guarantee by the Canadian Pacific Railway, upon the completion of the Ontario and Quebec works, for the Credit Valley debentures—thus indicating there is a connection, of some description, between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the two corporations to which I have referred. There is the Hamilton and North-Western and there is also the St. Lawrence and Ottawa road in which they have obtained an interest, though now, it is said, not a controlling interest. They have engaged in this way the credit and resources of the corporation to a considerable extent under the large and dangerous powers given to them by the Government of engaging in outside operations not necessarily connected with the great undertaking they stipulated to perform for what we agreed to give them. There are other dangers involved, of course, in that class of operations. The hon. First Minister said the other day, when I pointed out the result which had flowed from the contract, as proved by the prospectus, and showed the Company made out they would obtain the railway without any expenditure ultimately in their own account, that I gave a very flourishing account and that he would give my speech to the Company to be circulated widely, because on the London stock market, the Canada Pacific Railway securities were not considered so highly as I rated them. The hon. gentleman was quite right in his observation in reference to the London stock market. The reason is to be found in the diverting by the Company of the resources given them for a particular purpose to other, if not alien, purposes. The public accounts and the result of the recent proposal to place \$10,000,000 upon the stock market proved the truth of the hon. gentleman's observation. Of that \$10,000,000, \$3,600,000 was taken in Amsterdam; \$4,000,000 in New York, and \$800,000 in London, leaving a balance not taken of about \$1,200,000. Why was \$800,000 only taken in London? Why was it in New York and Amsterdam the loan was taken? It was because the course pursued is one which has aroused the hostility of the other great railway corporation which this country possesses—the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Of course, competitive operations through the eastern part of Ontario—even between this city and the boundary—inevitably produces that hostility, and we all know what power a hostile railway company has. Of course, competition may be very good, but not that which is acquired at the expense of the public, with the funds of the public that should be devoted to the construction of the Pacific Railway itself. Then there is the direct and important bearing which the free construction or acquisition of branches and extensions has upon the question of tolls. Can it be supposed that all these branches and extensions are in themselves to be vastly profitable? Can it be supposed for instance, that it is an extremely profitable operation to take freight from Montreal away up to Ottawa, thence to Brockville and lay it down at Chicago in competition with other roads? It is not. These lines will not give enormous dividends. You may say we have no interests in the dividends. We have the deepest interest in them, according to the construction of these papers indicating the interpretation the Canadian Pacific Railway places on its contracting rights. Why? Because according to the reading of the contract indicated by these returns, they bulk the whole enterprise, extensions, branches and all. They give us but one return of expenses and receipts. They take the Eastern and Western divisions—separated though they are by 1,000 miles of territory and bulk them together. If that is the course to be taken, if branches and all are to be mixed up in the question whether the railway is earning a profit, and whether the 10 per cent. clause is applicable, we have the deepest interest in the question; because if these branches earn but 5 per cent., the Company will have the right to raise the rates so as to make the earning up to 10 per cent. As to this capital stock, the original amount was \$5,000,000, and is said to have been paid up in cash. But the statements that are made, perhaps not correctly, are that that stock was, by some means or other, swollen to \$15,000,000 upon the occasion of the recent determination to increase the capital stock of the whole Company to \$100,000,000. We have no information as to how that increase took place. Some part of it, no doubt, is applicable to the purchase or acquisition of branches or extensions to which I have referred; but a very large proportion is probably for what the committee of the New York Exchange called "Water." It is quite clear that if the proprietors were determined to issue some \$70,000,000 or \$80,000,000 of stock at 60 per cent., the first step they would take would be to issue enough stock for themselves to put themselves on an equal footing with the new takers at a discount. Therefore, if \$9,000,000 were paid up in cash, it would require an addition of \$6,000,000 to put them on a par with the new takers at 60 per cent. The \$90,000,000 they now announce they require to finish the road, taken at 60 per cent., makes a real capital of \$54,000,000. But as I have pointed out, to meet that \$54,000,000 there are about 18,000,000 acres of land, a great part of which may perhaps not be sold at the early time which is now laid for the completion of the railway, but which will, at the price indicated, be sufficient to meet that capital stock altogether. But by these papers it appears to be intended that dividends shall be paid on the whole \$90,000,000 of stock. Once again, with reference to the interest on the capital, the Consolidated Railway Act provides that a railway company may pay interest at any rate not exceeding 6 per cent. upon the paid up calls of its stock during construction. This Company announces that it is about to pay 5 per cent. only, and 5 per cent. only on what? 5 per cent. on the paid up stock, that is, the stock issued at 60, which is equal to  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the actual money paid on that stock; so that, contrary to the provisions of the Consolidated Railway Act, as I understand it, an arrangement is being made under the powers of issuing paid up stock for less than par by which a larger sum than the Railway Act contemplated is for payment of dividends or interest during the construction of the road. Now, I maintain that it was not intended, that it was not represented to the country nor to Parliament, that those results would flow, and although many of us feared them, none of us thought that they would be so extensive as they now appear to be. The capital was \$25,000,000 and I pointed out that it might not represent a real \$25,000,000, but a very much smaller sum, and that to that smaller sum might be added a larger sum for interest, and so a capital of \$40,000,000 might be aggregated. But the Company assumes it has power under the general Act to increase its capital stock indefinitely; more, it assumes what I think is of doubtful legality, that it has power with reference to that increase of stock to treat it as it may treat its original stock, as paid up stock, and thus to create stock for any amount which may represent as little as it pleases of actual value; and the result is that instead of a possible maximum of \$40,000,000 there is now a maximum of \$100,000,000 or a minimum of \$90,000,000 of capital to be issued upon the dividends and paid up stock. Now then with reference to the branches and extensions, suppose one of these were to be valued to the Company at what they actually paid for it in money, 5 per cent., but suppose it is paid for by the issues of this watered stock at 60, it would produce upon the capital so fictitiously created only 3 per cent., and the difference, as the case might be of 5 or 7 per cent., would fail to be made out of that portion of the road which can practicably be controlled by virtue of the monopoly, and thus make the burden upon the North-West trade very much heavier than it was contemplated it should be, even at the time the contract was made. I say then, that we have a direct interest in the settlement of these questions—in the ascertainment first of all of this question, has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when it comes to deal with the question of tolls and profits, the right to build what branches it pleases, the right to acquire what extensions it pleases, the right to add the capital which it devotes to those branches and extensions to the original capital, and the right to demand 10 per cent. on all before the toll shall be regulated? Second, has it the right in reference to its original capital, or with reference to its increased capital, the capital which is now authorized to raise it up to \$100,000,000, the right to issue stock at 60 and receive from the public only 60 per cent., and to demand dividends upon the par value of that stock? Third, has it a right, by the contrivance to which I have referred to, to obtain  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. instead of 6, the maximum stipulated for by the General Railway Act, in the way of interest on capital during the period of construction? On all these points, the indications are from the action of the Company, from the mode in which it has kept its accounts, from the mode in which it emitted its capital and made its returns—the indications are, I say, that it asserts these rights; and if it can lawfully assert these rights, and if there is no remedy or redress, it is quite clear that, that which the late hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) pointed out when he discussed this subject at the stage of the debate to which I refer, that not in our time, nor in our children's time, would it be likely that that local effect would come into operation at all—would be but too true. Because it is clear that dividends upon a vast mass of capital in excess of what was required, or in excess of what was really used, dividends upon a vast mass of capital not at all required for the purposes of the road, and some large portion of which is devoted to extrinsic and other objects, will be required to be paid, and paid out of the fertile lands of the North-West by virtue of the monopoly. These are considerations, as it seems to me, of the utmost gravity. I have thought fit to state them thus early in the Session, in order that they might have that attention which, perhaps, at a later period they would not attract. It seems to me we are entitled, under these circumstances, to get further information, to get all that information which may enable us fully to consider and form a calm and careful judgment of what the interests of the country require upon this most important topic.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I do not rise for the purpose of making an answer to the elaborate speech which the hon. mover of this motion has just made to the House, it is not from any want of respect to the hon. gentleman, nor for the arguments he has used. But as I passed over a somewhat similar statement on the discussion on the Address, so I propose to pass over this now. The course I have pursued in relation to the discussion of this question, as the House knows, is one that I think commended itself to the judgment of both sides of the House as saving a great deal of time, and that was to avoid having a great number of discussions on the same subject, and I propose to follow that practically on the present occasion; and when I make the annual statement, which I will take the opportunity of doing when the Estimates come up, as to the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and when we have the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved before us, it will give me great pleasure to enter as fully, as may be found necessary, into the question in such a manner as to state fully and fairly the whole of this question to the House. But there is another reason which impels me to allow the hon. gentleman's statements to go to the country unimpaired by any criticism that I might feel it my duty to offer, when it became necessary to deal with this question. I regard the progress and prosperity of the Canadian Pacific Railway as vital to the progress and prosperity of Canada, and I believe anything that conduces to increase the success of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will conduce to increase the prosperity of the country itself. I listened with a good deal of pleasure to the statements made by the hon. gentleman, which are calculated to be of great value to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman has directed your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that those hostile to that great work, have succeeded in shutting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, down to the present hour, practically out of the great money market of the world. If there is one place in the wide world where projects of this character are weighed and estimated, if there is one place where capitalists are found prepared to venture their money upon all projects and enterprises, that give a fair and reasonable prospect of return, it is to be found in London, the centre of the money market of the world; and yet the hon. gentleman, notwithstanding the statement he has made of the enormous profits this Company are to derive, is obliged to admit that the enemies of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and of the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway, have been able, down to the present hour, to exclude that great Company from the great money centre of the world. That fact itself would incline me to allow all the remarks the hon. gentleman has made to go without any criticism or remark calculated to impair, in the slightest degree, their effect or operation. The hon. gentleman knows that those who have succeeded in shutting that great enterprise, so vital to the progress and prosperity of our country, out of the money market of London, have not only acted in a hostile manner to the Company, but they have also taken hostile action against Canada itself; and there was nothing that could interfere with the progress of this country, nothing that could impair public confidence, the confidence of the world, in the position of Canada, than the enemies of that Company and of that great enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, have hesitated to resort to in endeavoring to accomplish their object. I am, therefore, glad that at last the hon. gentleman is prepared to make those speeches to the House, because they carry great weight here, and they will carry great weight outside, and everybody who attaches importance to his utterances will use those statements for the purpose of meeting and combating the efforts made to discredit the Company and its position. I shall have great pleasure in bringing down the papers so far as they are in the possession of the Government; and as regards those not in the possession of the Government, but in the possession of the Canadian Pacific Railway, application will be made to the Company to furnish them. I may say that a day or two ago I received a communication from the Secretary of the Company to the effect that they would be very glad to furnish all information in their power in regard to the progress of the work, not simply down to the period which the law requires, but down to the latest period in their possession, down to the end of the year. As I have already said, we will bring down all the papers in our possession, and will endeavor to obtain all those not in our possession, in so far as possible.

Mr. BLAKE. I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman that we are to obtain the information, and that the Company does not object to give the fullest information, because we ought to have had it before now. The House last Session passed a resolution in regard to this subject, and I mentioned to the hon. gentleman privately that the obtaining of information resembled the operation of drawing teeth, in which it was distinctly set forth that the information required by the Consolidated Railway Act should not be submitted merely down to the end of the year, 30th June, but should be brought down to the latest practicable date. The return which has been brought down is, therefore, very seriously defective. Now that we have learned that the Company does not object to give that later information, I hope we will get it, because it is clear that in the case of a Company which has done so much between 30th June and the close of the year, the state of things is very much altered; and the latest information is of the greatest value. With regard to the statement respecting further information, the hon. gentleman took the precaution, at my suggestion, to add to the Consolidated Railway Amendment Act a clause specially requiring all railway companies to furnish any further information the Governor General in Council might at any time require; and so it is perfectly easy for the hon. gentleman, in the exercise of his duty as a responsible adviser of His Excellency, to obtain from the Company, by the passing of an Order in Council, any further information that might be required. Nobody regrets more than myself, in the interest of the public, the hostility shown to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to which the hon. gentleman has referred. It is deeply to be deplored that it exists, for no doubt it has an injurious effect, and if any words of mine would tend to mitigate the hostility and place the two great corporations in a somewhat different relation to that which they occupy at this time, I would be delighted, and would feel I had done a very good day's work for my country. But what I have pointed out to the House, and what I desire to point out particularly to the hon. gentleman is, that we objected seriously to the Canadian Pacific Railway as contracted for, being complicated by unlimited power being given to it to build branches, extensions, etc.; that the possession of such power was likely to produce dangerous and inconvenient results, and it has produced those dangerous and inconvenient results. I do not care how good a thing the contract may be, it is possible to spoil its goodness. If the policy does not concentrate the energies of those concerned in the enterprise upon the enterprise itself, if its means and resources, those obtained from the public as well as private resources, are to be expended, as they have been very largely expended, on other and outside operations, then you will find difficulties arise. If you add to that the fact that such operations, from the point of view of other corporations, tend to produce hostility, because those corporations claim that what they call their territory is being interfered with, the same sort of feeling which existed between the Northern Pacific and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railways in the States of Minnesota and Dakota, may tend to impair the conditions of the contract in another important respect. It has, indeed, done so, because the companies have, by the hostility shown, excluded the Canadian Pacific Railway from the London money market. These are very important considerations, and their importance is largely due to the fact that the contract was so framed as to permit the Company to branch out into extension lines, and thus produce these results.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must remind the hon. gentleman that the process of tooth extraction is quite as painful to the party operated upon as to the dentist. The hon. gentleman, however, thinks he is very much to be commiserated with because he has made these representations. My attention was drawn by him a few days ago to a number of blanks that occurred in the return which was brought down by the Government. I have since gone over the paper, and I certainly do not agree with the hon. gentleman; I think the information was almost entirely supplied. The hon. gentleman referred especially to the questions of bonuses. No bonuses have been paid, but all bonuses by any parties are embraced, so that that must have been quite overlooked. The information, as I have already said, is only required by the amended Act to be furnished down to a certain date. That has been furnished down to the date required, but the Company have, in response to my application intimating the desire of the Government to give the fullest information, stated that they will bring that information down to the latest practical period. My hon. friend ought not to have omitted noticing the fact, that in the report submitted by the Secretary of the Company, a very full statement, covering the entire operations of the year down to the present time, has been already laid upon the Table of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INTER-PROVINCIAL TRADE.

Mr. PAINT moved that a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration, and report how inter-provincial trade may be best promoted, the earnings and enlarged traffic of the Intercolonial Railway be further increased by products from Ontario to Quebec, east to the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland, and by returning freight. He said: Mr. Speaker, a Committee for the consideration of inter-provincial trade I consider of great importance to the people of this Dominion. Our railway system, the Intercolonial, and the system of canals, along with our lakes and rivers, where it is possible, should be utilized in this respect to their utmost extent. The great impetus given to the industries of the Dominion, through the effects of the National Policy, forces us to look out for and to seek enlarged channels for our trade to flow in. This great Dominion, this heritage of ours, should be cultivated and made productive to its utmost extent. It is true, Sir, we are more united and friendly—and I now refer to our several Provinces—than we were in 1867, when we were confederated; our boundaries since that time have been greatly enlarged and our stakes more firmly driven. But if ever we are to become one in trade and commerce, and united in those respects, it will be necessary, where it is possible, that our several Provinces should use the commodities and productions which they furnish among themselves. I trust, Sir, that this Committee will be enabled to develop a favorable scheme, which will tend to the development of the benefits already conferred by the National Policy still farther, and set trade free, which is at present bound and fettered. The flour and other products of the industries of Ontario must find an outlet to the Provinces by the sea, by the most direct and cheapest route, and likewise the coal, the fish, and the oil of the Lower Provinces, should, in like manner, be returned by the most direct possible course to the Upper Provinces. I may say, Sir, that in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island, we have a tonnage of the value of $25,000,000. We have some thirty coal mines costing $15,000,000 to put into successful operation. The products of the fisheries in the whole of the Dominion last year, amounted to $14,000,000, of which $7,000,000 were the result of the fisheries of Nova Scotia, which have increased $900,000 during the past year over 1881. This, Sir, I beg to submit to the business men of Ontario as part of our stock-in-trade in the Lower Provinces; and I trust that they will not regard with indifference—at all events they should not do so—any effort that is being made for the development and enlargement of this trade; and that we may rely on their advice and their assistance. I rely upon the Committee, eliciting much valuable information, that will assume practical results at the opening of navigation. I feel certain, Sir, that our able and energetic hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will regard this attempt with favor, and will lend it all the aid in his power. I may say, Sir, that the volume of inter-provincial trade last year was equal to the bulk of 3,000,000 barrels, or amounted to that capacity; that means, in other words, that it would furnish full cargoes for seventy-five of the Allan steamships. This I believe, Sir, is capable of being further enlarged. Referring to our coal and shipping interests which were, only a few years ago, in a languishing and dying condition, but which through the wise policy of our able and hon. Finance Minister, who discriminated in the Tariff in favor of ship-building material, and also by the imposition of 50 cents per ton on foreign coal, I may say that these industries, along with many others, very numerous, owing to the National Policy, in this extended Dominion, were invigorated and brought to life. Sir, I may here refer to the bounty, which was wisely given for the encouragement of the fisheries generally, but more especially of the deep-sea fisheries; and the result of which will be a large addition to the fishing fleet of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, possibly 5,000 tons. The Nova Scotia fleet numbered 640 vessels, averaging from 40 to 50 tons, and some of those which are now being built this winter, shortly to be launched, will be as large as 120 tons, and these vessels go to the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, where they remain for three or four months during the fishing season. I may say, Sir, that Nova Scotia having fisheries to the value of $7,000,000 will be more largely benefitted than any of the other Provinces, that Province alone having no less than 30,000 fishermen. I look with pride and admiration upon the men, who, in 1878, told the country that if reinstated in power they would inaugurate the National Policy. The people believed them; they were returned to power, and they had the fortitude, the tact, and the force to put that Policy into operation. From 1878 to 1882, the Opposition had been telling the electors of the Dominion, at every point, that if the country had an opportunity of pronouncing upon the Government they would be hurled from their places and the Opposition reinstated. The Ministry of the day, led by the right hon. Premier, accepted the challenge and went to the polls, and the result was that the Government were returned to power with between seventy and eighty of a majority. The Ministry received instructions from the electors of this country to continue to build up the surplus which they had accumulated, to maintain the credit of this great Dominion, to raise it, if possible, to a higher pitch than ever before, and to maintain British connection unimpaired, by discriminating in favor of British goods as against foreign. The electors felt assured that if this were done they might rely upon the protection of the old flag, and the support of the invincible army and navy of Great Britain. It gave me satisfaction, when I sat in the gallery of this House twelve or thirteen months ago, to hear the remarks of the Minister of Public Works, which would have been an effective answer to fifty pamphlets such as a writer by the name of Edgar has issued. He said there was some restlessness, some disturbance respecting independence and nationality, but when the hon. gentleman rose in his place he said that he had better be quiet for a while; that he had been born under the British flag, and that he expected to die under it, and that we should hesitate before taking such a step as was proposed, until we had at least 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 people. Such a remark spoke volumes, coming as it did from a gentleman representing a certain nationality. It went to prove that they were loyal to the British flag and would support the present Ministry. I am happy to say that the National Policy, however it may be sneered at, has conferred benefit on the county which I have the honor to represent. It is true, Sir, that we cannot reap the full benefit of that policy, as we have no manufactures there, but we have the shipping and the carrying trade, and we have improved freights. We have experienced benefits in that direction since the coal mines were put in a state of activity; and the best indication of these benefits is the state of the county bank. There were usually deposits in this bank to the extent of $120,000, but in 1831, the additional deposits amounted to $23,000, and in 1882 to $43,000, not a very large sum, but still a balance on the right side of the ledger. There are, however, some small grievances which I think I should bring to the notice of this House, with a view of improving, if possible, inter-provincial feeling and inter-provincial trade. One matter to which I wish to refer, is the coast-line telegraph. This means of communication is lacking along the southern coast of Cape Breton west to Louisburg, Forchu, St. Esprit, Larcheveque, Grand River, L'Ardoise, and St. Peter's, where vessels pass every day during the twelve months, and where a sum of $10,000 would supply the defect. No less than $700,000 has been spent in the telegraph communication of the North-West; $300,000 along the coast of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, and $100,000 in the Province of British Columbia. Yet I heard the hon. member from British Columbia say the other day that he would be very thankful to receive some of the crumbs which fell from the master's table. I would not wish to lessen the amount which that Province receives, but I think they have received some cuts from the very best joints on the table. I have heard some sneers from the Opposition side of the House, and it may not be improper for me to trace a certain missionary tour taken through the lower Provinces some months after I was in the field. That tour extended to my own county. It was taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and the accomplished gentleman who occupies a seat at his side—the hon. member for East Quebec—and we can trace their journey with great interest. It commenced in Restigouche, a county which was represented by a Reformer; they passed through, and that county was lost.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Won.

Mr. PAINT. They came to Gloucester, and that county was lost. They passed through Chatham, and the able hon. first Minister of Marine was returned by acclamation. They then proceeded to St. John, where the Minister of Finance had a majority of nine in 1878, but in 1882 his majority was 139. They passed through Moncton, in the County of Westmoreland, and the result was that a chieftain fell at that place and the county is represented by a supporter of the Government. They then went to Yarmouth, and a gentleman who sits close beside me represents the county in place of the Reformer who formerly represented it. They proceeded to King's County, the garden of Nova Scotia, and in it, too, a supporter of the Opposition was displaced by a valiant supporter of the National Policy. They then came to Hauts, of which Windsor is the principal town, and that county was lost. I may relate rather an interesting circumstance that occurred there. There had been a cotton company in Windsor, which, for months, was unable to raise the amount of its capital stock; it was about half subscribed when these gentlemen held their meeting, and when, for the purpose of decrying the National Policy, they represented to the electors the enormous profits that were being realized by the cotton manufacturers of the West, the stock was subscribed at once. At present the company is in full operation, and has sold its products for a long time ahead at profitable prices. They then visited Halifax, and the result was the election of the two respected and hon. representatives who sit near the centre of this Chamber. They visited Pictou, and the result is that two supporters of the Government have come from there. They then visited Cape Breton, eighty miles east, and held a meeting in Inverness. Well, Sir, in that county 20,000 descendants of the sons of the heather reside, with a smaller number of French settlers, and they returned the hon. member for Inverness, in place of a Reformer who held the seat for some time previous, with 800 majority. Then they came to St. Peter's, the centre of the county I represent. The electors came from the country round in large numbers. There are 7,000 French speaking people in that county, and the hon. member from Quebec was able to discuss political questions to their satisfaction. Well, Sir, I never flinched from the position I took that the National Policy was my platform out and out, that I would sink or swim, win or lose on that, and I succeeded in being returned, notwithstanding the manner in which these hon. gentlemen held up the benefits of Free Trade. I have also much pleasure in tendering to hon. members my best wishes for their happiness. They may rest assured that on all occasions I will make it a duty to act towards them with the consideration and respect which good breeding requires.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that notice has not been given of the names of this Committee, and they can only be agreed to now by the consent of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection, I think, to this motion. The Committee will be a very valuable one, and if they address themselves to the subject with the same earnestness that my hon. friend does, will make a most valuable report. I do not suppose that my hon. friend opposite will object to the names.

Mr. BLAKE. I consider it very objectionable that notice should not be given of the names of this Committee. Sometimes the engagements of hon. gentlemen, who would otherwise be very valuable members of a Committee, are such that they cannot take part in it. It is impossible to judge at the moment who are the fittest persons; therefore, I think, we ought to adhere to the reasonable rule that notice shall be given.

Mr. PAINT. I may state that I have seen personally all the gentlemen nominated, and they have consented to serve on the Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. That answers any question as to these hon. members, but not as to others. Some hon. members may wish to serve upon, and may be very desirable members of that Committee, whose names are not there. I see no reason for departing from the rule, especially so early in the Session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion may stand as a notice.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I cannot understand the necessity of this Committee. If, as the hon. mover of the motion has told us, the National Policy has done so much to develop the trade of this Province, what is the necessity of a Committee to enquire for means of developing it? It appears that the National Policy has been a failure, and that this is a vote of non-confidence in the Administration and their policy.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I am glad the Government have consented to the appointment of this Committee as it is of vast importance to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and I hope it will endeavor to lay before the Government a plan by which our inter-provincial trade may be more greatly developed. There are some points, however, in the speech of the hon. member for Richmond which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. He has seen fit to take up some subjects foreign to the question of inter-provincial trade, and he makes some statements with regard to the National Policy which are not borne out by the facts. He says the effect of the Tariff, in imposing a duty on goods used in the manufacture of ships, has been to cause a development of that important industry. It is simply nonsense for any hon. gentleman to make any such statement as that. Our ships are principally engaged in foreign trade, over which this Tariff has no effect whatever. The truth is, the ship-building industry is not in as prosperous a condition as it was eight or ten years ago, for the simple reason that wooden ships are going out of date and steamers are taking their place. The hon. gentleman also says that the granting of the bounty of $150,000 to the fishermen has resulted in a large development of that important industry. Why, Mr. Speaker, the $150,000 voted last year has not yet been paid to the fishermen, and if it had been paid it would have been too small a pittance to have caused the prosperity of the fishing industry. The success of that industry during the past year was due, as it will be this year, to other causes entirely. Never before in the history of Nova Scotia were such prices obtained in the United States and the West Indies for the products of our fisheries. That condition of things was entirely due to the failure of the Norwegian fisheries and the partial failure of the Newfoundland fisheries. The hon. gentleman also pointed out that a very large amount of money is now finding its way into the savings banks of the county he represents. I am surprised that so much money should go there to draw 4 per cent., if it could be more profitably invested in the shipping and fishing industries. He has furthermore commented on the result of the elections in the Province of Nova Scotia. I may remind him that several counties formerly represented by Conservatives were carried by Liberals. I may tell him that the hon. gentlemen who represent Halifax were barely elected, although four years ago they had a majority of several hundreds. He will also find, if he looks at the returns, that a larger proportion of the people of Nova Scotia are opposed to the National Policy than before. I am glad the Government have decided to appoint this Committee, and I hope it will do some good in promoting trade between the Provinces.

Motion, with names of Committee omitted, agreed to.

SURVEY OF RAILWAY BETWEEN HARMONY STATION AND ELMIRA.

Mr. McINTYRE, in moving for a return of all reports, papers and documents bearing upon the survey made in May and June last, of a proposed branch line of railway between Harmony Station on the Prince Edward Island Railway to Elmira, East Point of Prince Edward Island, together with a statement of the cost of said survey, said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a few words in explanation of the motion which I have just made. In 1879 a large petition was sent to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, from that section of Prince Edward Island to which this motion refers, asking for the survey and construction of a short branch line of railway, leading from Harmony on the Prince Edward Island Railway, to a place called Elmira, a very short distance from the East Point of the Island. I may remark that the cause which gave rise to the petition is the fact that the main post road leading from the East Point to Souris, the nearest and ordinary place of market for this section of the country, is so very hilly that in the fall of the year the farmers find it next to impossible to have their produce marketed in time to command the highest prices. They are, therefore, compelled to wait for sleigh roads, but by this time navigation is fast closing and the markets are down flat as to prices. These people, therefore, labor under very great disadvantages. Well, for the next three seasons after the presentation of the petition, nothing was heard from the members at that time representing the county, in regard to it. At last, towards the end of the Session of 1882, just on the eve of a Dominion Election, these gentlemen were struck with a sudden inspiration, and it was communicated to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, in the shape of a letter written by the mortal hands of our two representatives. The Minister was doubtless urged that a survey should now be had, as the Elections were coming on, and it would, no doubt, have the effect of assisting the Government candidates. The following is the reply of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals:—

“OTTAWA, 9th May, 1882.

“MY DEAR SIRS,—In reply to your letter, asking that a Railway be constructed from Harmony to East Point, I have to say that during Recess I will have a careful survey made, and the result reported, with a view to arriving at a decision upon the matter.

“Yours faithfully,

(Signed)

“CHARLES TUPPER.

“C. B. Muttart, M.P.,

“A. C. McDonald, M.P.,

“House of Commons, Ottawa.”

Well, Sir, the survey was made during the heat of the Dominion campaign. For three or four weeks previous to Election day surveyors, chainmen, &c., could be found in all this section of the country. Their arduous labors were betimes intermitted by a little fishing and other equally amusing pastimes, such pastimes in fact as are usually required by those who are overworked. Sometimes the pleasant hours were whiled away by a little canvassing, and wherever friends of the party and others were found to be inclined to kick over the political traces, they were brought in again by the most lavish promises of position on the line even in advance of its survey or construction. As soon as the Elections were over the surveyors disappeared as if by magic, and it is even unknown to this day what has become of them. This was the last heard of the celebrated survey. However I have been reminded by my friends in that section of the country to make enquiry about the matter and hence my excuse for bringing it to the attention of the House. The people gave their votes to the Government candidates and have consequently performed their share of the bargain, and now they ask the Government to perform their share of the agreement; and I think it is a very reasonable request. I have little doubt that when the report comes down, it will be found to be favorable in every particular, as there are no engineering difficulties whatever to be met with in the centre of the country, the land being as level as a prairie. I have every hope, therefore, that when the Estimates are brought on to the Table of the House, they will contain a sum sufficient to construct this much needed work.

Motion agreed to.

FRAUD IN AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS.

Mr. MASSUE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on a resolution declaring it expedient to pass a Bill to prevent fraud in the manufacture and sale of agricultural fertilizers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that the House is in possession of the facts to enable them to discuss this Bill intelligently. They do not know to what extent fraud has been practised in the manufacture and sale of agricultural fertilizers, and they have no means of knowing. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend had better consent to refer this important matter to a Committee.

Motion withdrawn.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Papers, reports of engineers, petitions and correspondence relating to the building of a breakwater at New Harbor, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Kirk.)

Papers, reports of engineers, petitions and correspondence relating to the building of a breakwater at Indian Harbor, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Kirk.)

Copies of the Appendix to Report of Select Committee appointed last Session to enquire into the effects of the National Policy upon the agricultural interests of the Dominion.—(Mr. Vanasse.) Referred to Printing Committee.

Statement for the fiscal years 1873-4, 1874-5, 1877-8, and 1878-9, as to persons employed in any of the Departments whose remuneration was charged to Public Works in connection with which they were employed; giving, 1st, the name; 2nd, the date of first employment; 3rd, the remuneration; 4th, the nature of the service; 5th, the works to which the remuneration was charged, with the amount charged to each work.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Mr. McINTYRE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 6th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER laid before the House—copies of contracts for the Canadian Pacific Railway, in terms of Section 19 of the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 14, as follows:—

Articles of Agreement entered into between John McDonald and Her Majesty the Queen, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals of the Dominion of Canada,—to construct six combined Passenger and Freight buildings on 42nd contract, Canadian Pacific Railway. (Contract No. 97.)

Also,—Between Colin Nichol Black and the Minister of Railways and Canals, &c., &c.,—for the supply of 30,000 tamarac ties, 8'-0" x 7" x 6" at 25 cents each, for the Canadian Pacific Railway. (Contract No. 98.)

Also,—Between Guest & Co. and Her Majesty the Queen, &c., &c.,—for the supply of steel rails, and steel fish plates for the Canadian Pacific Railway. (Contract No. 96.)

Also,—Between Horton & Son and Her Majesty the Queen, &c., &c.,—for the supply of 72 tons of iron bolts and nuts for the Canadian Pacific Railway. (Contract No. 94.)

And also,—Between Bayliss, Jones & Bayliss and Her Majesty the Queen, &c., &c.,—to supply bolts, nuts and spikes for the Canadian Pacific Railway. (Contract No. 95.)

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 53) to declare the meaning and effect of certain provisions of the Act incorporating the London and Ontario Investment Company, Limited.—(Mr. Hay.)

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to enquire of the Government whether they propose proceeding with the motion that I made some days ago, and which was allowed to stand over till to-day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have been requested to ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to allow the motion to stand for a few minutes, until the hon. the First Minister shall be here.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 7) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting Offences against the person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CAMERON. The Committee will observe that the Bill, as introduced, contains four clauses: the first, to provide for cases of parent and child; second, of brother and sister; third, of grand-parent and grand-child; and fourth, of uncle and niece.

On the fourth clause,

Mr. DESJARDINS. I desire to invite the attention of the Committee to the point as to whether such a Bill is necessary. I have not heard that the morality of the community since last year has been of such a nature as to justify the enactment of such a law. Our duty here is to provide for the protection of public morality when it is attacked; but I do not know that we should, by such a piece of legislation, cast a blot on the reputation and character of the population, if we have not facts to justify the adoption of such a law. I do not know, but perhaps in the vicinity of the constituency which has elected my hon. friend, facts may have come to light which would justify him in coming before the House and asking for such legislation. For my own part, I do not know, nor have I gathered from newspapers or public evidence, that the character or morality of the people is such as to justify the addition of this Bill to our laws. It seems to me that we should first enquire as to the necessity of the Bill, and afterwards consider whether, in the event of the Bill becoming law, it should not prove a dead letter, as is the case with many of the criminal laws of England. Unless I am shown that I am laboring under a false impression, I beg to move that the Committee now rise.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) I think the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) is too late in raising his objection. The principle of the Bill has been approved by the hon. leader of the Government, and by the House. It has received a second reading; it has been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and three clauses have already been assented to. If any argument, however, were wanting for supporting the Bill, I have only to go to the Province of Quebec, near the hon. gentleman's own doors, to obtain it. I find that since last Session, when the hon. gentleman and his friends voted down the Bill, a gross outrage has taken place in the adjoining county to that in which the hon. gentleman lives, and the law could not touch the parties because there was no Act covering the case either in the Dominion or Province. Perhaps if I hand the hon. gentleman a copy of a Montreal newspaper containing the report of the case he will change his mind as to the necessity of the present Bill. I do not care to read that particular article to the House, as it would not prove edifying; but I hand it to the hon. gentleman, and he will be convinced as to the necessity of the Bill. I have cut out from newspapers since last Session four cases which have taken place, some in Quebec and some in Ontario—not one of them in my own county, I am glad to say, but elsewhere in the Province, and if elsewhere, the law should reach them. My hon. friend should not oppose the Bill on the ground that we should not legislate in advance of the commission of such crimes, because such crimes have been committed in the Province of Quebec, and because, if that argument were to hold good, we should never legislate in criminal matters unless some violent and scandalous case had occurred; but we should legislate to prevent the commission of those crimes. The hon. gentleman says we should legislate in respect to known wrongs. He is a newspaper publisher and proprietor, and he should know, if he reads the public prints, that those crimes are not unknown, but that many have taken place in his own Province and in Ontario. Does he not recollect that within a decade a man was executed in Montreal for murdering the fruits of illicit connection? And he will see by the paper I have placed in his hands that, since last Session, cases of the character dealt with in the Bill have taken place within his own Province.

Mr. AMYOT. I think if nature and religion cannot provide against those offences, legislation will not prevent them, but only bring about new scandals. I object to the placing on the Statute-book of Acts dealing with those descriptions of crime, which simply excite the curiosity of young people, do not prevent the crime itself, but are rather suggestive of crime; and we should protest against enacting such legislation which is a dishonor to the Dominion at large.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a pity that this Bill should be thrown out for a cause of the kind given by the hon. gentleman. Cases of this nature occur in all the Provinces; and these criminals have not been punished because we have no such law as this on the Statute-book, and it seems unreasonable to throw it out on the ground stated by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. There have been cases which have happened during the last year or two, known to several hon. gentlemen in this House, where the criminals have escaped because such a law as this to punish them did not exist. It is no reflection on any class in the community or on any individual. It is merely like every other law which is passed; there happens to be a lacune on the Statute-book in this particular relation, and this Bill is intended to fill it up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I gave my general assent, as far as my assent is worth anything, to the principle of the Bill on its second reading. Now we are in Committee on it, and I still am strongly of opinion that the first three clauses should be adopted, but the fourth not; and for a very good reason: for we all know that within the limits of the British Empire, many marriages, such as there mentioned, have been recognised by law, and are not considered incestuous in any way. I think that the hon. gentleman should assent to the elision of this clause.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Mr. Chairman, I think that the third clause ought to be struck out. Though I made provision that it should not apply to such cases as had occurred in the past, we know that such marriages have taken place in our own Provinces and elsewhere; and I will allow that clause to be struck out, first, second and third to be passed.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear the observation of the hon. the First Minister; and I hope that it will receive the favorable consideration of the House. We all agree, Sir, that we occupy a disgraceful position with reference to this question just now; but I do not agree at all with the hon. gentleman who spoke, when he says that the reason for this disgrace is, that such a law should be proposed. The present disgraceful condition of things lies in the fact that such criminals go unpunished, and that there is no law to punish them. We know that in England there is a law on this subject; but the system there is different. These are offences against the law of God, and they are offences which shock our consciences, and they should be offences against the law of man in this country; and that is what this Bill proposes to make them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. CAMERON. Let us understand the effect of this motion; if the motion is carried the Bill is killed.

The CHAIRMAN. I decide that the motion is lost.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I demand a division to which I am entitled.

Motion (Mr. Desjardins) that Committee do now rise, negatived on a division.

Mr. IVES. I rise to a point of order. You are proposing, Mr. Chairman, a Bill of five or six clauses; but there is no such Bill before the House at all. The Bill must be printed as reported by the Select Committee, before this House can consider it.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman will see that this is precisely the same Bill, only it has been divided into clauses.

Mr. IVES. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon. gentleman does not know anything about it, he should not say anything about it. If the hon. gentleman reads the Bill, which is in your hands, he will see it is the same Bill that the Committee reported, only it is divided into clauses.

Mr. IVES. It is easy to be witty; but it is better to be in order. The Bill, as amended, before it is passed through Committee, according to the Rules of the House, ought to be reprinted as altered by the Select Committee to which it was referred.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not understand that it referred to any Select Committee whatever.

Mr. IVES. There is only one clause in the Bill before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill, when it came before the Committee, proposed that, instead of one clause, it should be divided into five clauses, each clause dealing with a special offence, and the amendment was carried. But the hon. gentleman says it is out of order because we have amended it. What then do we go into Committee for?

Mr. IVES. I would like to enquire, Mr. Chairman, what Bill is passed? What is the number of the Bill?

The CHAIRMAN. No. 7.

Mr. IVES. There is only one clause in that Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been amended in Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not like one of the laws of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.

Bill reported, Committee to sit again.

COUNTY JUDGES CRIMINAL COURT CASES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) in moving that the Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 11) to amend the law in reference to trial of cases before the County Judges Criminal Court, be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Special Committee, composed of Messrs. Robertson (Hamilton), Brecken, McCarthy, Rykert, Fleming, Amyot, Hall, Baker (Missisquoi), Ives, Ouimet, Coursol, and Wood (Brockville), with power to consider and report to the House upon the present system of speedy and summary trials in certain cases of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanors, said: In moving this motion, I shall do no more than draw attention to the fact that the suggestion has been thrown out that the Bill should be referred to a Special Committee. I think it is proper that the Committee should consider and report as to the system now in force with reference to summary or speedy trial. I certainly cannot say more than has been said by the hon. the leader of the House, and the hon. leader of the Opposition, with reference to the desirability of making the trial of criminals more public than they have heretofore been. There is no doubt that criminals—hardened criminals particularly—will seek to take advantage of the law as it stands with reference to speedy trials, knowing, as they do, that the public generally are better engaged than in attending these trials. The consequence is that when a trial of that kind takes place there are only present those who are personally interested in the trial, and perhaps a friend or two of the prisoner. This is a state of things which really should not exist. One of the great deterrents from crime is the publicity that is given by exposing the misdoings of those who are charged with crime. After the present law was passed with reference to speedy trials, I remember of hearing an eminent counsel in the city of Hamilton remarking on the fact during the trial of a hardened prisoner, that in all probability the prisoner would be sentenced to three months imprisonment for the crime for which he was charged, and that in three or four or five months he would be back again, and again be sent to prison. The hon. gentleman spoke of the matter in a jocular way, but his remarks showed that his idea was that these criminals were returned over and over again for trial; they were sent to prison but came back hardened as ever, and were again brought before the court of justice. I hope the Committee will consider the whole matter, and will be able to report a scheme by which we can cure what I consider a very great evil.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred to a Special Committee.

DISCHARGE OF PAST INSOLVENTS.

Mr. BEATY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 8) for the discharge of past Insolvents, said: I may mention the features of the Bill more fully than they were indicated to the House by my former observations. The general feature of the Bill is that it shall apply to past insolvents only, and that it shall not operate concurrently with any Bill relating to the distribution of insolvent estates. At whatever time the Act comes in force, whether immediately upon its passing or within a limited time thereafter, all who are insolvents at that time will be the only persons who shall be entitled to the benefits of the Act, and in that respect the first clause is made as general as possible. The Act is not limited to traders, but applies to every trader or person who is insolvent or unable to pay his liabilities in full, and who has made or shall make a voluntary assignment, or is subject to a compulsory assignment of all his estate for the benefit of his creditors. The same clause also states that the Act shall not apply to any case of insolvency occurring after the passing thereof. The Bill is intended to meet the difficulties which merchants complain of, that so many persons recklessly enter into trade, and after a year or two become insolvent, when they immediately seek a discharge upon their giving over what remains of their estate. There are, of course, certain persons who will not be admitted to the benefits of the Act, such as trustees, administrators, executors, and other persons occupying fiduciary positions. There are two modes provided for obtaining a discharge. In the first, the debtor will have to obtain a majority of his creditors, representing three-fourths in value, to consent; and in such cases, application may be made to the Court, and if the debtor is not guilty of fraud or fraudulent dealing, he will obtain his discharge. Then, again, if a debtor cannot obtain a majority in number, or three-fourths in value of his creditors, he may, after the expiration of one year from the date of a voluntary assignment, or an assignment made under any Act respecting insolvency, apply by petition to the Court or Judge, and if, as in the other case, no fraud or fraudulent action appears, he may obtain his discharge by order of the Court. These are the two modes indicated in the Act by which a debtor can obtain his discharge. The Act is, I may say, primarily intended for insolvent debtors, and only so far as they may have assets is it intended for creditors. The other Act, relating to the equitable distribution of insolvent estates, has relation primarily to creditors, and not to debtors. I desire to keep the two clauses distinct as far as practicable, and this Bill is for the purpose of enabling unfortunate debtors, who may have become such by reason of the emergencies of trade, to obtain a discharge for past liability at the expiration of a reasonable time, and giving them the opportunity of again engaging in trade, instead of becoming deadheads upon the community, as they must be with large liabilities hanging over them.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like to know what the views of the Government are upon this rather important measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that this Bill will go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I was going to say that the hon. gentleman has, I presume, considered fully the question whether we have the power to legislate respecting the estates of past insolvents. Past insolvents, I suppose, are men who might come under the operation of an Insolvency Law, and who are unable to pay their debts. Is this an Insolvency Law—a Bankruptcy Law? Is it not an interference with property and civil rights? It occurs to me very strongly—I speak without, perhaps, having given the matter the consideration which it deserves—that it is going very far to say that we can deal with the discharge of liability for debts when the party does not come within a general Insolvency Law. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider that well before he presses this measure. It is a very important matter, and it is intended to relieve a great many men, some of whom are very deserving men; and I have not the slightest objection, with this caution, to the Bill going to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where the question can be considered.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a proposal, as I understand the Bill, for the relief of those who have become insolvent anterior to its passage, and not at all for the benefit of any persons who may become insolvent after its passage. We have an Insolvent Act which was in force up to the close of the Session of 1880, and therefore the persons who are to be relieved are those who have become insolvent between the Session of 1880 and the close of this Session of 1883. I have heard such accounts, from the hon. gentleman and others, of the prosperous condition of the country during these three years, that I am surprised to learn that there exist a very large number of persons who have during that time become insolvent, and who are now a burden on the community.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are all free-traders, however.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the hon. Minister of Customs takes charge of the free traders, and we have not got the return about them just yet.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The sheriff has charge of them.

Mr. BLAKE. And I am told he is putting some of them into insolvency by some process of his own. But this is a relief which the hon. gentleman proposes to accord to the people who, during the gloriously prosperous times of the past three years, have gone under. Well, Sir, I think when a temporary law is proposed—a law to deal with particular individuals in the community for a space of time—a fixed and very short space of time—that there ought to be special reasons given to the House for such temporary, special, partial legislation—partial in reference to the classes of persons who are affected by it, and partial as to the date. A man who becomes insolvent between the two dates is entitled to the benefit of it, but no one who may become insolvent afterwards. Why should the line be drawn there? If it is right and proper that there should be a capacity for obtaining a discharge up to the close of this Session, why is it not equally reasonable that it might be attained at a later date? This is another recurring instance of that peculiar tone and temper of which we had an instance some time ago. When the Insolvent Act became onerous to the community, a kind of facility to obtain discharges under it was granted. Although repeated efforts were made to make the provisions of the Act more and more stringent, yet the community rebelled against the large number of cases in which discharges were granted—and I admit there were a great many which should not have been granted; and now for the second time legislation is proposed to reenact those which were the objectionable features of the old law, without, at the same time, providing for that administration of the estate, and those other ingredients of such a law in favor of the creditor, which ought to accompany—which ought, indeed, to be the presiding principle of such legislation with reference to the discharge of debtors. I do not offer at this moment any opinion upon the statement of the hon. leader of the Government. It is clear that we must make this out to be, properly speaking, an Insolvent Law, to bring it within our jurisdiction. A decision in a recent case indicates that the Local Legislature may go a long way in the direction of an Insolvent Law, and that we may go a considerable distance in the direction of property and civil rights without passing an Insolvent Law. But there is no doubt that that must be the turning point of our jurisdiction. We have no right to adopt any provisions in that direction except as incidental to an Insolvency Law, the principle of which, I apprehend, is to provide for the distribution of the assets of a debtor; and it may or may not, though it generally does, provide for the discharge of his liabilities. I do not propose to enter into the statement of the hon. gentleman, to-day; nor do I propose to enter into a discussion of the details which he proposes to submit to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. There are, no doubt, a great portion of those details which might be more aptly discussed by a Select Committee composed of the legal profession, while its general principle and the safeguards to be secured may more fitly be discussed in a large Committee composed of gentlemen of all classes and trades concerned in it.

Mr. IVES. It seems to me that there is a very important question of principle to be decided on the motion for the second reading of this Bill. The present Bill goes very much further than any other Insolvent Law which has ever been in force in Canada, or I think in any other country. The first section of this Bill, as I understand its scope, purports to be a means of paying the debts of everybody who may be in the unfortunate position of being unable to meet them by paying twenty shillings in the pound. Our late Insolvent Act only applied to persons who were in business, and who were supposed especially to be in danger of getting into financial difficulties. But this Act applies not only to traders but to non-traders—to all classes of the community—and proposes to be a means of obtaining a discharge from liability by everybody. It seems to me it is, at least, a strong proposition to ask this House to consent to a second reading of this Bill with very little discussion, and send it to one of the important Committees to be amended. Surely, that Committee would attack the first section to begin with which furnishes the means to everybody who owes a debt to come before a court with the signature of the majority of his creditors and apply for a discharge from liability. That seems to me to be a very disturbing piece of legislation, and I think it is not in the interests of the country that the provisions for the discharge of debtors should be extended so far beyond those of the old Insolvent Act.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think it is to be regretted that this Bill should be read a second time at all. It is quite true that in the Committee on Banking and Commerce there would be abundant opportunity for discussing the details, but I object altogether to the principle involved. The Bill is to relieve all persons, who are unable to pay their debts, from liability, up to the time of its passing. We know that, whatever may be the general condition of the country, there will always be certain persons anxious to escape payment of their debts, and others who, from want of business capacity or capital, are unable to pay their debts. The effect of this Bill will be to convince these people that the best thing they can do, in the meantime, is practically to become insolvent, because they will have the opportunity, as they believe, under this Bill, of getting their discharge as soon as it will have passed, from a judge. I venture to say there is no insolvent in Canada to-day who has not his discharge, or cannot get it from a merchant, unless it be that class of persons who have permitted their property to go into the hands of special creditors to the prejudice of all others. The complaint made with a great deal of force is that, under the law as it exists, a merchant can allow a judgment to go against him by a favored creditor, and in that way cut off all the others from any recourse against him. Under this Bill, the creditor in the past will be deprived of any recourse, and this debtor will, after having given his property to one creditor, be relieved from all obligation, discharged from all indebtedness, and be enabled to go into business and repeat the operation. That would be most unfortunate. All experience proves that when a man fails in business or finds himself in difficulties, and frankly meets his creditors and endeavors to arrange a settlement with all on an equal basis, he has no difficulty in getting an extension of time or a release from part of his indebtedness—practically his discharge. It is only in cases where the debtor prefers one or two creditors over the others that he finds it difficult—very properly so—to make an arrangement. Under these circumstances, I sincerely trust the Bill will not go to the Committee, but be discussed now fully in this House. In that view I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened to the arguments put forward by the mover of this Bill and those used against it. I differ entirely with the views of the hon. gentleman who last spoke. He has stated as facts that there is no debtor who, if he has not made an undue preference to particular creditors, will not get a discharge on a proper clear exposition of his affairs. I have had experience as a business and as a professional man, and have seen hundreds of instances of a contrary character. There are more cases of persecution of unfortunate debtors throughout the country, than of men, who, on coming squarely up exposing their condition of their affairs, and showing willingness to do what is right, get their discharge. The arguments used by the hon. gentleman might apply forcibly to great centres where men are engaged in vast operations, and have broad views of the difficulties and uncertainties of trade. When a man comes before men of this class and makes a proper statement of his affairs at a meeting of twenty or twenty-five creditors, the man among those creditors who, in a country community would be disposed to persecute the debtor and insist on the last pound of flesh, would be ashamed in the larger community to adopt such a course. The public opinion to be found among business men in large centres would force him to consent to a discharge. But I repeat, having had a great deal of experience in county constituencies, that I have known of hundreds of instances of unfortunate men to whom the exaction of the full pound of flesh or slavery for a lifetime was the result of there being no Insolvency Law on the Statute. You must not conclude from this that I am an advocate of an Insolvency Law such as we have had. I am not. It was a law passed for the purpose of official assignees, and did not give due protection to the creditor or debtor. During my five years of public life in the New Brunswick Legislature, I recollect when we could not agree on a Bankruptcy Law, and the disasters of trade placed one-fourth of the whole community in a state of partial insolvency, the Legislature came to their relief and passed an Act to accomplish what, I presume, my hon. friend claims this Bill will accomplish—wipe out the past, and let men start again and not remain slaves for ever at the mercy of a tyrannical creditor. I have not studied the full details of this Bill, but have only glanced over some of the clauses. I think it should go to the Committee for the purpose of having it carefully considered, with the object of giving relief to unfortunate debtors who have been unfortunate in the past, and have not the opportunity of getting relief in any other way.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

What is the object of keeping men in slavery for a lifetime—men who have been so unfortunate as to have failed in business? They may not have been dishonest and are fairly entitled to get the benefit of an Insolvency Act. While we may not be able to get that legislation which some men desire, which the great commercial community desire, still we can have that which will at all events wipe off that stigma of slavery upon those poor men who are so unfortunate as to be unable to pay their debts. I shall support the motion to send this Bill to a Committee, and should be glad, in the Committee, if I have to be there, to give what aid I can; and when it comes back to this House, to stand up and endeavor to get the Bill through, which, without doing any injustice to the creditor, will relieve the unfortunate debtors, thousands of whom are in this country to-day.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew). There might be considerable force in the argument of the hon. gentleman if the limit of misfortunes were fixed at the present date, if for the future we had an assurance that no further misfortunes in trade would occur. But it seems to me a monstrous proposition that an Act should be passed that declares that all those who have become insolvent during the last three years should obtain discharge from their liabilities to their creditors; but that for the future all persons who may be subjected to the same misfortunes as those during the last three years have met with, should be prohibited from receiving relief from their creditors. I say this Bill is one that ought not to pass this House, and if any legislation on the question of insolvency is to be proposed to this House, it ought to be a Bill having a scope as great at all events as the Insolvency Laws which were repealed in 1850. I do not think from the complexion of this House—which is such as that of the last House—that an Insolvency Bill could be passed. But if any insolvent legislation is to be proposed to this House, I think it ought not to assume the form of this Bill, a form which would relieve debtors who have become insolvent during the last three years, and prohibit all unfortunates from obtaining that relief in futuro.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria). If we have a second reading of this Bill, it seems to me we can only do so upon the ground that a general whitewashing Act, such as that which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has described, is a necessity, and is proper legislation at the present time. I confess that my knowledge of affairs, at any rate in Ontario, does not lead me to any such conclusion. I do not think there is any general demand for an Act of this kind. I do not think there are many cases in which people are situated in that unfortunate position which my hon. friend has described—ground down by hard-hearted creditors. My experience rather accords with that of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, which is, that wherever a debtor was fairly and honestly entitled to his discharge he has not had any difficulty in obtaining it, and that those cases in which debtors have not obtained a discharge are, so far as my observation extends, cases in which they did not deserve to obtain it. Before we pass legislation of this kind, in which, as the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) pointed out, we would declare to a certain class that all they had to do was to come forward and obtain their discharge, utterly irrespective of how their estates had been administered; whether their creditors have had a fair distribution of assets, whether they have acted honestly or dishonestly, we ought to be satisfied that there is a large class in the community who are fairly and legitimately entitled to the relief which it is proposed to give them. I do not think that necessity exists, I do not think there is that class, and I think we would be holding out a pernicious temptation and opportunity to dishonest men to get their discharges, wholesale, under legislation of this kind. I think also that, as a matter of proper legislation, a discharge should only be given by Act of Parliament, in connection with the due administration of the assets. For my part, in the former Parliament I opposed the repeal of the Insolvent Law, because I thought that the evils that existed with reference to it were evils of administration which might be cured. I thought a general Insolvency Law was a necessity for carrying on the commercial operations of the country, and that those merchants who made an outcry against it, and at whose instigation it was repealed, had themselves to blame for their failure to see it properly administered; and that instead of raising a cry to have it repealed, if they had exerted themselves to have it administered properly, there would have been no need to repeal that law. But inasmuch as Parliament saw fit three years ago to repeal the Insolvency Law in toto, it seems to me that what has occurred since, the great diminution in failures—not as my hon. friend from West Durham said, such an apparent increase in the number of failures—that this legislation was a necessity. I say there is no such increase, but that, on the contrary, there has been a large diminution in the number of failures under the improved prosperity which has resulted from the fiscal administration of the affairs of the country. I say that there is no widespread necessity for it. I say that failures have vastly fallen off, and that in those cases which have unfortunately occurred, as they always will occur in every commercial community, wherever the Act was fairly administered the creditors have shown a readiness to discharge debtors, and I have no doubt that every honest debtor can get his discharge from his creditors without the necessity of a sweeping, whitewashing Act like this. I hope, therefore, that the motion to send this Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce will not be pressed at the present time, because doing so would be the adoption of a principle which I think is a vicious one.

Mr. CASEY. I think the two hon. gentlemen who have last spoken have put the issue correctly in regard to this Bill. Of course, the question of a second reading is only one of principle, and we need not, therefore, go into the details of it. But I think the principle we are asked to pronounce upon is not whether we should have an Insolvency Law, but whether we should have a whitewashing Bill to cover a certain period in the past, and either a total lack of provisions for going into insolvency in the future, or some other different set of provisions for the future. I agree with those hon. gentlemen that a Bill which proposes to whitewash all who have become insolvent in the past without making any provision for the proper distribution of assets in the future, would be a great mistake. The question is whether we should adopt patchwork legislation in regard to insolvency matters. I notice that the hon. member who brings in this Bill, has another Bill on the paper providing for the equitable distribution of Insolvent Estates in the future. Although we are not discussing that Bill now, I suppose the hon. member thinks that by the second Bill he will make provision for a similar execution of justice in the future, to that which he proposes by this Bill to execute in regard to past insolvents. But we must take this Bill by itself, since we do not know whether the other will become law, and we are not sure but that in giving it its second reading, we may adopt the principle of whitewashing as regards past insolvents, without making any provision afterwards for whitewashing future insolvents, or even for the equitable distribution of their assets. If the hon. gentleman wishes to deal with the question of insolvency I think he should have put in this Bill a provision covering future insolvents as well, and then the general principle would have come before us of whether any Insolvency Law was necessary, or whether the particular Bill before us was a just and fair Insolvent Act. At present we have not such an issue before us, but we have the question whether it is proper to deal in this piecemeal manner with the whole subject, or whether we should reenact the law that was repealed three years ago, and extend its provision to every person in the community—for that is the effect of this Bill. It reenacts that law and extends it to the several classes of persons contained therein, and applies to the time covered by that Act as well as to the time since that Act was repealed. I think it would be establishing a bad precedent to pass this Bill to a second reading, and so adopt the principle that it is right to deal in this patchwork manner with such an important question as that of insolvency. I think, too, it is about time the Government of the day took some share in the management of this extremely important trade question. They have every facility for being informed of the wishes and will of traders, bankers, and all classes of commercial men in the country. They are supposed to have the highest financial talent among themselves in the special departments in which financial talent is needed. They are, therefore, without excuse in not trying to direct the deliberations of this House on this important matter. They allowed the old law to be repealed three years ago without taking sides upon it; they now permit any member who pleases to bring in Bills and pass them to the second reading without affording an indication of their views upon the principle at stake. I think they should not keep themselves in this non-committal position, and they owe it to the commercial community to take a line and carry it, as they certainly could carry it through the House. I must refer to one remark made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), in regard to the number of insolvencies that had taken place since 1880. I did not understand the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to say that insolvencies had so increased since 1880 as to make the Bill necessary. I understood him to express surprise that there had been sufficient insolvencies since that time to make it necessary; but the hon. member for Victoria stated that the number of insolvencies had decreased. Now, if the reports of the Wiman Trade Agency are worth anything at all, the number of insolvencies in Canada considerably increased during the past year; I have not the figures at hand, but we all saw the figures published in the newspapers of New York and Canada, showing that the number of insolvencies during the past year had increased. Of course, I do not vouch for the correctness of those reports, but they are as likely to be correct as the opinion of any member of the House, who has no special means of ascertaining how many insolvencies have taken place.

Mr. BEATY. I have not heard yet any good reason why the principle of the Bill should not be adopted. Many hon. members seem to misapprehend the purport of the Bill. It is not a general whitewashing Bill, but it is to allow debtors who may have one, two, or three creditors who will not consent to a discharge, being granted, to come before a court and demand a discharge when a majority of the creditors in number and three-fourths in value consent. It must, however, be on just grounds and according to the legal principles applicable to cases of this character. There can be no doubt that many of those persons who were in trade before 1830 still have hanging over them their liabilities, and cannot obtain a discharge, by reason of the obstinacy of two or three creditors; and it is for the purpose of meeting a difficulty of that character in relation to unfortunate debtors that this Bill is proposed. It is not designed by an Act of Parliament simply, without reference to the creditors, or without reference to their interest, to wind up debtors' estates; but it is only in cases where persons have already made assignments, and whose assets have already been distributed, or where they may make assignments of all their estate for the benefit of their creditors, that if the creditors will not consent to a discharge, one or two creditors holding out, the debtor can ask the court to grant a discharge, and he ought to get it. The principle of the Bill is simply whether it is proper under any circumstances to allow a debtor who has not paid his debts in full to obtain a discharge. That is the principle of the Bill; we do not ask hon. members to adopt the details. If any hon. gentleman has a better proposition to make, if he wants the terms enlarged so as to cover three-fourths, two-thirds, or nine-tenths of the creditors, and if that is the judgment of Parliament, I have no objection; but the Bill is founded on the principle that only a proportion of the creditors must agree to the debtor obtaining his discharge. What that proportion should be, it is for the House to consider; I have placed it at one-half in number and three-fourths in value, and I think that is enough, because if a majority of the creditors agree it would seem reasonable that all the rest should agree, especially if three-fourths of the amount of the indebtedness of the debtor is represented also. As to the suggestion of the hon. the First Minister in respect to this Parliament having jurisdiction in the matter, it seems to me that this is an Insolvency Bill. It comes within the clause in the British North America Act relating to insolvency; it has its basis on the fact that persons are insolvent and are asking relief in consequence of their insolvency; and it is in that view I have prepared and introduced this Bill, which I trust will go to the second reading and be referred either to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, or, if deemed necessary, to a Special Committee for consideration, beyond that which the House has just given it.

Mr. BOURBEAU (Translation). After having listened attentively to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I feel bound to declare that I am not at all convinced of the necessity for the second reading of this Bill. It is still remembered that when the Insolvent Law was yet in existence, that law did not suit all debtors; for amendments were made to it year after year, without, however, giving satisfaction to either debtors or creditors. Yet, that law was such as to enable debtors to make a settlement of their affairs, owing to the existence of official assignees; and those official assignees were intended to be equally advantageous both to debtors and creditors. It has been stated that in several cases those official assignees—at least it was so reported, even in this House—had induced tradesmen to make assignments in their own hands; and when they did not personally advise them to that effect, they did so through other parties. What was their object in inducing debtors to make assignments? It was, Mr. Speaker, to make fees for the official assignees. In such cases, is it at all likely that a creditor who is aware of such shameful manoeuvres will ever consent to grant his debtor a discharge? No. If it were in the interest of such debtors that the hon. member has presented this Bill, I believe we would not be justified in voting in favor of his motion. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I would oppose with all my strength the revival of a law, the abrogation of which gave satisfaction to the public, a law which no longer exists on our Statute-books, and the repeal of which has been generally approved by the electors of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not propose now to discuss the question as to whether we should have an Insolvent Law at all, or not; but it does seem to me that this Bill must be very objectionable, and that if we adopt it in principle, by letting it pass the second stage, consequences rather grave in their nature may arise out of it. I do not, myself, consider that there is any considerable class of persons in the country who are suffering from want of an Act of this kind; and if there were any such considerable class, it would be doubtful to my mind whether this would be taking the right course to meet the difficulty. My experience as a business man, and all my knowledge in this respect, points out this one fact to me; that all this tyranny and extraordinary oppression, of which we hear so much in the House occasionally, as exercised on the poor debtor are something which exists in the imagination, more than in reality, was to the credit of the business men of this country, and the change sheets of Dun, Wiman & Co., of Bradstreet, and of any other mercantile agency, reveal the fact—that over and over again, men, who has been unfortunate in business, have compromised with their creditors; have had clemency shown them by their creditors; have fallen into an unfortunate position again in two or three years; have again been permitted to go on; and for the third time, have received the same amount of clemency. I do not believe, that there is any considerable amount of truth in the statements made on this subject, or that the fact mentioned by some members exists to any extent as to the grinding oppression of the creditor on the debtor. The first strong point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this—and I think that it is one which the members of this House ought to weigh carefully at the present time—I am happy to say, I do not believe that what the hon. members for West Durham and West Elgin have said is correct; it is the fact, however, from the information I have gathered from the reports of the mercantile agencies, that there has been an increase in the number of failures in the country at the present time compared with the past year, which was a year of great prosperity. I am willing to admit, at the same time, that there has been no such amount of failures in this country as there was a few years ago, during the period of great depression; but if to-day we pass this Bill to a second reading, we give a peculiar notice to the public. There are now a great many traders who may be somewhat embarrassed. We do not know their circumstances and they may be induced by the fact that there would be no relief for them, unless they made ends meet and were more economical in the management of their business, to fail rather than wait and attempt to weather the storm which is perhaps looming in a time not far distant; and if we pass an Act such as this, containing such a principle, you are saying to these people: "Whosoever does not choose to take advantage of this Act, and go into insolvency during the next two or three weeks, before this Act can go into operation, will be unable to take shelter under its provisions." My own opinion, as to the passing of this Bill to a second reading, is, that the result would be a very fruitful crop of insolvency cases at once; and taking that view of the case, I ask the House to consider, and consider well, before it permits the second reading of this Bill to be taken.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Brant. I think he is in the right with regard to the Bill. I feel that the very first clause of it is objectionable, and of such a nature as to cause me to vote against it at this or at any other stage. I have already objected to an Insolvent Law on principle, and I shall vote against this Bill on principle, and not only here, but also in Committee if it should reach that stage. The remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin, pointed out to this House: that there was some necessity for this Bill from the very fact, that it is presented by the hon. member for West Toronto for the discharge of insolvents, owing to the circumstance that there has been an increased number of insolvents in Canada this, as compared with last year. If the hon. member had chosen to be exactly correct in giving this statement to the House, he might have said that the number has been of late greater than it was last year—1882—but not greater than in 1879, or in 1880. The facts are these: I believe that in 1879 the failures in Canada amounted to $25,000,000; but, last year, according to Dun, Wiman & Co., they were something under

$9,000,000, being a fraction over $8,000,000. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman might have been honest enough to have stated to the House precisely how the matter stood. It is true that 1882 was a year of great prosperity, as the hon. member for Brant has pointed out—the amount of failures being something like $5,000,000. I do not consider that any necessity exists for such a Bill at all. I do not consider that the number of traders affected in the way my hon. friend from Toronto has spoken is large. I fancy that it exists merely in the imagination of some hon. gentleman. I have no knowledge of any in my own county who are asking for such legislation, I think that the people of Canada have had a sufficiency of the Insolvent Act; that their experience was that the country, under its influence, was becoming demoralized in all its trade relations; and that any legislation of this kind, which is, after all, only intended for a few individuals who have been, as my hon. friend says, unfortunate in business—is of a dangerous character. I was not pleased with the reading of the first clause of the Bill; and consequently I did not take the trouble to read the rest of it, for that very simple reason. It may be said that my view is not correct. Probably not—I did not read the Bill through; but the first clause is as follows:—

“This Act shall apply to every trader or person who is insolvent or unable to pay his liabilities in full, and who has made or shall make a voluntary assignment, or is subject to a compulsory assignment of all his estate for the benefit of his creditors, and whether made under any Insolvent Act heretofore in force, or now in force or not, and who has become insolvent or unable to pay his liabilities in full, previous to the passing of this Act. This Act shall not apply to any case of insolvency occurring after the passing thereof.”

Now, I do not like the wording of this clause at all events. It not only appears to me to apply to those who have been unfortunate, but also to all those who may be or may consider themselves unfortunate as capable of taking advantage of the Act. I will oppose the Bill at this and every stage in this House.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY AND SEDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of adultery, seduction and like offences, said: I shall not enter into a discussion of the features of this Bill with any degree of fullness, as my right hon. friend the First Minister has indicated to me his desire to have the Bill referred to a Special Committee, and, of course, that is law with me and with the House. I may, however, Sir, be permitted to refer very briefly to the character of the Bill. I believe that the interests of public morality would be promoted by the passage of a measure of this kind. I think, Sir, that the offences dealt with in this Bill are of a very grave character. We provide for the punishment of petty larceny and theft; but for the very serious crimes of the character mentioned in this Bill there is no remedy in law as it at present exists. Certainly, a blighted home and a ruined life are matters that require on the part of the law some remedy against the person who perpetrates this wrong. The Bill I introduced last Session on this subject was referred to a Special Committee. That Committee, Mr. Speaker, gave very serious consideration to the provisions of the Bill which by it were very much changed. The Bill as reported last Session and agreed to unanimously by the Committee, was brought down too late to be acted upon by the House during that Session. I had hoped Sir, that the Bill as reported by that Committee would have been allowed to have been placed on its merits now before the House. Such, however, Sir, is not the case. I may state in a few remarks—which I will make very brief—that the necessity for a Bill of this kind is not now felt for the first time; and I believe that the public sentiment of the country, as far as I can judge, is very strongly in favor of the enactment of a measure such as I now submit to the House. I hold in my hands an abstract of laws on this matter, in twenty-four States of the American Union; the list is incomplete, however; but in these laws the provisions against seduction under promise of marriage, and the other offences mentioned in this Bill, are, in the majority of cases, much more severe, than are those contained in the Bill which I have now the honor to present to the House. In many of these States such laws have been on the Statute-book for a good many years. Such a law was passed by the State of New York in 1848, and the experience of that State has never pointed to the necessity of repealing or modifying the law. The Statute of that State provides for a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment, and $5,000 fine. The States in which such a law is in force are: Massachusetts, Ohio, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Arkansas, Nebraska, Michigan, Minnesota, Maine, Indiana, Connecticut, Iowa, Kansas, South Carolina, Alabama, Wisconsin, Oregon, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Illinois, Tennessee and Virginia; and the United States, wherever it has jurisdiction, in the District of Columbia, in the Territories and the High Seas, also has a law punishing this crime. We find communities containing more than forty millions of people living under laws of this character, and we find, too, that in almost every instance where new States have to frame their constitutions, they place such a law on their Statute-book.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is perhaps advisable to refer the Bill to a Committee rather than discuss it in the House, as for obvious reasons there is a measure of restraint upon members in discussing the several clauses in the House. As the hon. gentleman stated this Bill was referred to a Committee last Session, but they were unable to report, and I think the whole subject might very well be sent to a Special Committee, where I hope very material amendments will be made in the Bill and certain provisions introduced to prevent it being made a measure of blackmailing. That is, I think, the great danger in measures of this kind; and there is also the fact that we must draw a line between what is a sin and what is a crime. Still we have the example of many States of the Union which have adopted measures similar to this, in their general principles, though I have no doubt they vary in the different States, some being more stringent than others. There are portions of the Bill which I think merit consideration, and which it would be in the interests of morality to adopt, but I think it would be very unsafe to pass the Bill in its entirety. I think if the Bill were not seriously amended I would be obliged to vote against it, but at the same time I think there is a sufficient savor of good in the Bill to allow it to go to a Committee where it may be calmly considered. The evils against which the Bill is directed strike, as we all know, at the very root of society—at the conjugal relation—and if it were possible by any means to restrain this class of immorality, it would be very desirable to do so. At the same time I feel very strongly that there are vices which cannot be reached by legislation, but that can be reached by education, and especially religious education, and by the maintenance of a high standard of morality among the people. There are two clauses of the Bill which I think are worthy of consideration, and, therefore, I ask the House to allow the Bill to go to Committee, and though I cannot sit on the Committee myself, I shall put myself in communication with the chairman and with members on this side who may be upon the Committee, and see if we cannot get such a Bill as will advance the cause of morality, without entailing those consequences which I fear would follow the adoption of the Bill in its present shape. The hon. gentleman has stated that there are many States of the Union which have adopted laws of this kind; but I am afraid if we read the newspapers of the United States, and especially those published where these laws are predominant, we will see unmistakable evidence of the failure of these laws. In New York, which is one of these States, if we may judge from the reports which we read in the daily press, there prevails a very grave state of immorality—greater indeed, I believe, than before the Bill passed. Still, there may be some means of prevention, some means of punishment, without offending the common sense of the people, and without running counter to the general principle that there are some offences which must be left to education and instruction and the self respect of the man and the woman. I trust the Bill will be allowed to go to the Special Committee.

Bill read the second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 14) respecting carriers by land, said: In 1874 this House passed a law respecting carriers by water, but I find no legislation on the subject with which this Bill deals. The Bill proposes to enforce here in substance the Carriers' Act of 1830 passed in England, and amended in 1865. That Bill provides that carriers shall be exempt from all responsibility for articles beyond a certain value, which I have fixed in the Bill at $50, unless a certain amount be paid to the carrier as compensation for the additional risk incurred by him. Upon this additional liability being paid he is to be liable at common law. The other portion of the Bill introduces the provisions of the English Act of 1845 which is intended to extend the limits of the liabilities of carriers. This provided, in the first place, that carriers shall not be exempted from responsibility unless the contract shall be signed by the consignor or his agent. And even a contract signed by the consignor shall not limit the liability of the carrier if loss afterwards happens by neglect or the want of due care on the part of the carrier. Most of us are aware that under the present practice, carriers, either by special contract with shippers, or by notices which are held to be binding, have practically introduced a method by which they are wholly irresponsible for the safety of the goods which they are paid to carry. At common law they are held liable for all losses, except those caused by the Queen's enemies or the act of God; but they have, in the manner I have indicated, limited their responsibility to so great an extent that I think legislation on this subject is of the greatest importance. I have considered a suggestion thrown out by an hon. gentleman as to the competency of this House to deal with this subject, and I may say that I think it is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and not of any of the Local Legislatures. The question came up the other day in one of our courts. The Legislature of Ontario has introduced the English law with regard to bills of lading; and the judges, although it was not necessary to the deciding of the case, were unanimously of opinion that the law of the Province of Ontario on that subject was ultra vires. I trust that this measure will become law. I believe it is one not unfair to carriers, and certainly one in the public interest, and I trust the hon. First Minister will allow it to go to Committee of the Whole; or, if he thinks proper, to a Special Committee, although for my part I think this is not necessary.

Mr. AMYOT. It is most important that we should exactly understand and agree upon the limits of the jurisdiction of the Provincial and Federal Governments respectively. Without saying one word against or in favor of the principle of the Bill, I think we might take this opportunity to decide that question. I think, therefore, that instead of referring the Bill to the Committee of the Whole House, there should be no objection to referring it to a Special Committee composed of all the practising lawyers in the House, who would consider that question and report upon it to the House. We have, in the Province of Quebec, a complete set of laws relating to carriers by land or water, and the authorities cited on that point by the codifiers are from the French law, which shows that the regulation of public carriers has always been considered as forming part of the civil law; and if so, it undoubtedly belongs to the Local Legislatures. Under the circumstances, when the time comes for the Bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, I shall have the honor of moving that it be referred to a Committee composed of all the practising lawyers that sit in this House.

Mr. BLAKE. They will be quite sure to agree.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This measure is a very important one, and as my hon. friend who spoke last, truly says, it raises the question, whether it is within the competence of this Parliament to deal with this subject. I hope the Bill will be allowed to go to the second reading, and that a future day may be fixed for a Committee of the Whole House upon it. When that day comes, if the House thinks well, after due consideration, to send it to a Special Committee; that may be done, and the Order discharged.

Bill read the second time.

PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 17) to further amend the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 50, respecting Permanent Building Societies in Ontario, said: The object of this Bill is to give building societies a wider field for investment than is now permitted by the law. They are now restricted to investing in municipal debentures or school debentures, and I am sure every hon. member of this House will admit that there are securities in the country quite as safe as those to which the law restricts them. The Bill is a very short one, although, perhaps, in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, it goes a little too far. I, myself, think that it goes, perhaps, too far, and I intend, if the Bill is read a second time, to move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce when all parties interested in it can have an opportunity of expressing their views.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether this Bill is brought forward at the instance of any large number of societies or whether it represents the opinion of some small proportion of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Bill was placed in my hands at the suggestion of some parties connected with a building society, but I think it will be put in such a shape that it will be satisfactory to all the building societies throughout the country.

Mr. BLAKE. I merely wish to say that while greater elasticity may be proper, I hope the House will be very cautious about adopting this Bill in its present shape. I think it is of the utmost consequence to the country that we should not relax the provisions of the law as to the securities in which building societies may invest. There is a very large amount of our domestic capital invested in these societies, and the safe and prudent investment of that capital is of the utmost possible moment. The failure of one of these societies would be, I believe, felt by them all, and would affect the safety of the community very much like the failure of a bank; and, therefore, while the hon. gentleman may, perhaps, show the Banking Committee that there are securities in which these societies may properly invest, it should be very reluctant to enlarge the range to such an extent as to admit any class of speculative securities whatever.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I wish to call attention to the very objectionable manner in which this Bill is drawn. The attention of the House has already been directed to this point. The Bill simply says:

Section four of the said Act is hereby amended by adding, after the word "corporations," in the sixth line of said section, the words following, "and other Corporations constituted under or in pursuance of any statutory authority or"

That is the whole Bill. In order to understand that, it is absolutely necessary to refer to the Act itself. It has been repeatedly laid down here that if an amendment of that kind is proposed, the original clause repealed and the clause re-enacted with the proposed alterations printed in italics should be shown in the Bill so that every hon. member will know the effect of these proposed words. I have not been able to catch the observations of the hon. member for Durham. I have not the slightest idea of what this proposed alteration will result in. The principle on which this Bill should be drawn, as I have said, is to re-enact the whole clause printed at length with amendments in italics and this principle has been repeatedly insisted on by Committees of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It strikes me that these corporations are private corporations, and the Bill should come under the head of Private Bills. I call the attention of the hon. leader of the Government to the fact that this is a private rather than a general Bill.

Bill read the second time.

UNPROTECTED APERTURES IN THE ICE OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 30) to amend the Criminal Law and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed, holes, openings, &c., in the ice on any navigable water, said: I ask to have this Bill referred to the Select Committee to which Bill (No. 6) was referred. Its object is to prevent people making holes in the ice on navigable waters—inland waters is the intention of the Act and it may be amended in that respect. Its purport is to cause fences to be erected so as to prevent accidents through walking or driving into those holes in the ice. There is hardly a constituency in the country that does not suffer at times from the negligence of persons cutting holes in the ice. Every year, in the constituency I have the honor to represent, there are serious accidents resulting sometimes in loss of life. This Bill proposes that persons who make those holes shall protect them by means of some sufficient guard or other. I think the Bill is very plain but if it can be amended in any way so as to be made plainer I shall be very glad and will ask that it be referred to the Special Committee I have named.

Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Committee to which Bill (No. 6) was referred.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT OF 1879.

Mr. RIOPEL, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 32) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: The object is to facilitate railway companies by making traffic arrangements under the authority of section 60, of the Consolidated Railway Act. As all our railway lines have been constructed by private enterprise they originally assume mostly an independent character; but as they multiply and extend to all parts of the country, it becomes more advantageous for certain companies to combine the administration of their roads in order to increase the volume of their traffic and to economize on their working expenses. I am of opinion those arrangements are favorable to the public as well as to the companies, because the cheaper the administration is the more the rates will tend to be reduced. The second and third paragraphs of clause 60, afford ample protection to other companies and the general public against the dangers of monopoly. Moreover, we must encourage investment in our national undertakings, and the greater the facilities afforded railway companies in their operations, the more competition there will be in the pursuit of those great improvements which contribute so mightily to develop the vast resources of the country. It is therefore desirable, in order to meet those views, that we should extend to fifty years the period of twenty-one years granted railway companies for the purposes above cited.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the question raised by the Bill, moved by my hon. friend who presented his views in so able a manner, it is one of very great importance. Any hon. member who regards the scope this would give to the railroad companies intended to be affected by its operations, will see it is a Bill of very wide scope indeed, and I think we must be understood as giving a second reading of the Bill for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where it will be fully considered and weighed; but we will not be understood as committing ourselves to the principle.

Mr. BLAKE. I will first say that so far as I am concerned, I have made up my mind about the principle of the Bill, and I am entirely opposed to it. I believe it would be a most unfortunate thing if we were to sanction the proposition that these working arrangements could be made by the volition of the two railway companies concerned, without any intervention on the part of the public, or any power of any kind to control them for a longer period than that which the law has now allotted, which is twenty-one years. I think the question is, whether that period should not be shortened. I think there is no question at all that it should not be lengthened. Therefore, I desire to be understood, not as not committing myself, but as committing myself absolutely against what is proposed to be done, now by giving this Bill a second reading.

Mr. RIOPEL. I may be permitted to remark that the principle is not only admitted in the General Railway Act, but almost every private company which has applied for absolute powers of amalgamation has been granted such powers both by the Federal and Local Legislatures. Therefore, this principle being so generally admitted, the only question now is whether it is proper to extend to fifty years the period of twenty-one which is already granted.

Bill read the second time.

MAIL CARRIAGE BY THE ST. LAWRENCE AND LAKE CHAMPLAIN JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. DUPONT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have Her Majesty's Mails carried, during the current year, between the Village of Farnham in the Electoral District of Missisquoi, and the Village of St. Guillaume in the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska, by way of the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain Junction Railway?

Mr. CARLING. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

RAILWAY CROSSINGS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIES enquired, Whether the attention of the Minister of Railways has been called to the state of the railway crossing on the St. Peter's Road, Prince Edward Island, and to the accident which occurred there last winter, and whether he intends having a bridge built over that crossing, or having other means adopted for the protection of the travelling public at that place?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would say in answer to the hon. gentleman that the attention of the Department has been called to the state of this crossing, which I may say is not more dangerous than crossings usually are across rail ways, and I objected to that definition being specially given to this passage. I took exception to the term "serious accident," because in this case it occurred through the reckless driving of a pair of horses, as it was shown that the party had driven in front of the engine against all the notice that could be given by the railway to prevent such an accident. It was thoroughly investigated, and it was found that it was owing entirely to the reckless course pursued by the driver. It is quite impossible to take any measure to prevent accidents of that kind, but directions have been given in all cases to see that the bell is sounded and the whistle blown at every crossing, so that due warning may be given not to go on the road in front of the locomotive.

THE ACCIDENT AT THE MONTREAL CUSTOM HOUSE.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell), in the absence of Mr. CURRAN, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any provision for the widows of the late Meharg, engineer, and Cooney, fireman, at the Custom House in the City of Montreal, who were killed by the accidental explosion of the boiler in that institution?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter has been brought to my notice by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, and the case will be considered when the Estimates are submitted to the Government.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. PLATT, in moving for copies of correspondence, petitions, reports of surveys, and reports and recommendations of Inspectors, and others, relative to the establishment, location, character of apparatus to be used, and mode of management of Life-Saving Stations at dangerous points on coast of Lake Ontario or other waters, together with such other reports upon the construction and operation of Life-Saving Stations in other countries, as may be in the possession of the Government, said: In drawing the attention of the House to a subject, which, in my humble opinion, is of the greatest importance, it is but fair to state that the motion I have the honor to make is not for the purpose of eliciting information upon which to base any hostile criticism of the administration of the Department of Marine, for I have just reasons to fear the operations of the Department, in the direction indicated, have not been extended to any appreciable extent; and the sin of omission, if such there be, is probably no more chargeable to the Government than to Parliament, and, perhaps, no more chargeable to Parliament than to the country at large. In looking at the wonderful dimensions to which the life-saving service of other countries, notably that of Great Britain and the United States, has grown, it seems passing strange to me that Canada, with its extensive range of dangerous coast line, has not to-day a single thoroughly equipped life-saving station, not a single wreck-gun or mortar, not a surf-boat, and not a single life-boat worthy of the name. We suffer in common with other countries from shipwrecks upon our coasts, and we know too well that every season adds hundreds to the list of those who have perished upon our apparently unfriendly shores. We spend thousands of dollars of public money annually to induce immigrants to come here, but we spent very little to save the lives of those who have taken up their abode amongst us. I think I am fully justified in calling the attention of the House to this important question, and I cannot better do so than in making some reference to the history of those institutions which have been organized and carried on in other countries. We know that like every other institution they have been of slow growth. England boasts, perhaps, of one of the finest life-saving institutions in the world dependent, not upon Government aid, but entirely upon donations and benevolent assistance. It had its origin, I believe, in 1824, when Sir William Hillary, influenced by the difficulties he had experienced, and the defeats he had met with in attempting to save life on the coasts of the Isle of Man, determined to arouse the nation on the subject, if it were in his power. He secured the assistance of the member for London, and a meeting was called, which met in the London Tavern, and after a few words from Sir William Hillary, a resolution was passed expressing regret at the condition of affairs, but also expressing the belief that much might be done in saving the lives of fishermen and shipwrecked sailors. The meeting then adjourned for a month, and during that time King George the Fourth had become the patron of the institution, Sir William Wilberforce took up the advocacy of the cause, and many others of the English nobility consented to become vice-patrons. The result was that at the next meeting a society was organized under the name of "The Royal National Institution for the Preservation of Life from Shipwreck." The first year their receipts amounted to £10,000 sterling, and at the end of the year they had twelve properly equipped life-boats under their control. The institution went on very successfully for the next quarter of a century, but it was not until 1850 that the nation became thoroughly aroused on the subject, after which the progress became more rapid. At that time the late Prince Consort, with his highly cultivated mind and his intuitive appreciation of all that was great and good, lent himself to the cause, and Her Most Gracious Majesty, who had been patroness of the institution from the date of her coronation, gave that year 100 guineas and fifty pounds a year to the society. Since that time the Prince of Wales, the heir apparent to the Throne, and the Duke of Edinburgh, have presided at the annual meetings of the association. In 1853 a change of name was adopted, in consequence of amalgamation with another society which had been formed some years previous, and was known as the Royal Institution for the Saving of Shipwrecked Mariners and Fishermen. The newly combined association then assumed the name of the Royal Lifeboat Institution, and since that time it has been known by that name. In 1856 Captain Fitzgibbon, of the Royal Navy, gave £10,000 towards its funds. In the same year the Merchants Shipping Act was passed, and the Board of Trade undertook the management of the mortar service on the coast of England. Progress since that day has been rapid. England with a sea coast of 2,000 miles possessed, in 1873, 183 thoroughly equipped life-boats; Scotland, with 1,500 miles of sea coast, thirty life-boats; and Ireland, with 1,400 miles of sea coast, thirty-one boats; that is to say, that on a coast line of 4,900 miles there were 242 life boats under the control of the Royal Lifeboat Institution, together with numerous wrecking mortars under the control of the Board of Trade. There is one very pleasing feature in connection with this, and that is that the 242 life-boats were presented to that institution, most of them by relatives and friends of the poor sailors whose lives had been saved through the efforts of that society. If we look at what has been done by that institution we shall see how rapidly it has grown and won its way into the hearts of the people. In 1850 with an income of £354 sterling it possessed nineteen boats and was the means of saving 209 lives. In 1853 its income was £703, boats thirty-four; number of lives saved, 1,773. In 1869, income £40,000; boats 220; number of lives saved, 1,231. In 1873, income £31,000, boats 242; number of lives saved 668. Up to the end of 1873 this magnificent institution had equipped 242 boats, and distributed £42,000 in awards and 920 medals. Up to that time what was the aggregate of success due to the efforts of that organization? It had saved no less than 22,153 lives, and an amount of property valued at £5,000,000 sterling. From that day to the present, the managers of that institution have not relaxed their efforts, but have gone on increasing in strength and usefulness; and during the last decade they have progressed until they have an army of over 30,000 men, who with their wives and children stand up as witnesses on behalf of that association, which only a quarter of a century ago had its birth. Besides we have the influence which it has had on the conduct of other nations, and I can only regret it has not had the same influence on Canada. Russia, Turkey, Italy, Germany, France and other countries have life-saving associations, organized under the fostering care of the Royal Institution of England, all benefitting by the advice and counsel, and by the pattern life boats and apparatus; and Canada could very easily have received the same assistance if she had only asked for it. Let us now look nearer home and glance at the magnificent proportions of the life-boat institution of the United States. There of course the institution differs entirely in its character from that which exists in the Old Country. The United States with a coast line of 10,000 miles has not failed to grapple with the question, and although her wealth is mainly in the interior the Government have taken hold of the service and life-saving stations are supported by Government grants. In that country, as in this, the progress has been somewhat slow. The system in the United States had its origin, to be sure, in a benevolent institution. As far back as 1799 the Massachusetts Humane Society was formed, an institution which did nothing more than place a few huts on the coast of the State. In 1807 the first life-boat was built. In 1847 the first Government grant was made, the amount being $5,000. The reports of the success of this small institution were so forcible that they pushed public opinion, and public opinion pushed the Government to still greater efforts. We find that in 1854 $42,500 were granted. In 1855 there were 55 life-saving stations with 83 life-boats elsewhere. In 1871 a grant was made of $200,000, owing to the loss of the Pouchotan, which occurred just outside the limits of one of the stations, and to the opinion being held by the nation that if there had been a life-saving station at the spot every life might have been saved. At that time the gentleman who is now the general superintendent of the life-saving service, Mr. Sumner I. Kimball, became inspector. He threw his whole soul into the great work, and it has flourished remarkably since that time. The effect was marvellous. Unworthy officers were dismissed and efficient men obtained, and in 1872 there was not a life lost on the Atlantic coast of the United States within range of those stations. In 1873 the stations saved 1,165 lives, only two being lost within range of their operations. In 1874 they saved 855 lives, only sixteen being lost; in 1875, 729 saved, twenty-two lost; 1876, 1,500 saved, eleven lost. At that time the self-righting boats and Lyle guns came into use; and since then the service has been still more remarkably successful, as, in 1877, the stations saved 1,331 lives, only twenty-nine being lost. The country was more than usually aroused by the success of the institution at that time. The loss too, of the Metropolis and Huron by which 183 lives were lost, one of which occurred during the season when operations had ceased, and the other outside of the range of the station's operations, led the Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce to send in countless petitions, the result of which was the unanimous passing of the Bill of 1878. The whole life-saving service of the United States at the present time is divided into twelve districts, all under one general superintendent, each district having sub-inspectors and a number of surf-men, of whom it is unnecessary to speak. It is systematically arranged and cared for by the Government. It is a branch of the Treasury Department at Washington, and the sole control of it is placed in the hands of the general superintendent and of persons appointed to act as inspectors under his supervision. The keepers of these stations are not changed with the change of Administration; they are not placed there for political purposes, but solely on the ground of their efficiency, and many of these keepers have been there for ten or fifteen years back. We find, Sir, that we have on the southern coasts of the great lakes, three of these districts:—District No. 9, comprises Lakes Erie and Ontario, with nine complete life-saving stations; District No. 10, Lakes Huron and Superior, with thirteen stations; District, No. 11, Lake Michigan, with seventeen stations—no less in all than forty stations which affect the interests of our own marine. The total number of these stations in the United States at present is 203 complete, besides many life-boat stations, which are not called life-saving stations there, as well as many other posts. Now, Sir, I cannot more thoroughly, perhaps, impress this House with the grandeur of this work to-day in that country than by giving a few statistics, culled from the report of 1881. During that year, no less than 215 disasters to vessels occurred within the range of the operations of this service; on board these vessels the lives of 1,878 persons were imperilled, of whom this institution succeeded in saving a no less number than 1854, succoring 1,407 wounded seamen, and 1,060 days relief and treatment being given them; the value of the vessels involved in these disasters was no less than $2,741,000; the cargoes amounted in value to the sum of $1,310,000, a total of $4,054,000; of this amount this institution succeeded in saving $2,828,000 worth of property. If we take the list affecting ten years of the operations of this institution, we find that the total number of disasters was 1,317; the value of the vessels amounted to $16,083,000; and cargoes to $8,500,000; of which were saved no less than $14,958,000 worth of property. The number of persons imperilled by these wrecks was 12,259, of which this institution saved no less a number than 11,864. The loss of persons, during these ten years, numbered 395, of which 183 were on the Huron and the Metropolis; and of these two wrecks, one was outside of the season's operations, and another outside of the scope of those operations. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me ask this House, what are we doing? With a coast line longer than that of Great Britain and Ireland, exposed to all the inclemencies of the season, with the knowledge constantly present to our minds, that every year hundreds of our fellow men are driven to destruction on our coasts and that with very little effort on our part to relieve them; we, I say, who boast already of our maritime power, and scorn to take second place in the scale of progress and of Christian philanthropy, are we abreast with the times in these respects? I fear that the response to the motion I have made to-day will show that we are not; and whatever may be the cause of what I am almost obliged to term culpable negligence on our part, I trust that it may be speedily removed, and that some action may be taken in order to save our reputation amongst the Christian nations of the earth. Yet all our coasts, Sir, are just of the character which imperatively demands that something should be done in this respect; rugged coasts, with numerous narrow harbors, an abundance of piers exposed to the raging of gales and tempestuous seas, all these, I say, combine to make very dangerous coasts, whereas, by the very nature of these coasts, they are rendered more simple and easy for the landing of life-boats, not making necessary the construction of surf-boats, as are used in the English service, on their sandy shores. It is not a very difficult matter to enter on this project; we will not have to undertake all the labors, as others have labored in this field long and well; we can profit by their experience; they have solved the problem as to the best boats to be used, and the best means of carrying on the service; and no doubt, they will gladly place all their knowledge in this respect, and all their assistance, at our disposal. I suppose that there are many gentlemen within the sound of my voice, who can call to mind instances of vessels wrecked within their own knowledge, on which lives were lost; when, had life-saving apparatus been at command many lives would have been saved. Within my own recollection, on the coasts of the county which I have the honor to represent, two of those cases occurred. Some ten years ago, the schooner Jessie took shelter behind Salmon Point, during a southern gale, one Sunday afternoon; they thought that all was right; but on Monday morning they found that the wind had suddenly veered to the westward, and they were completely trapped between the points. It was impossible to escape; the wind blew up to a gale. In the morning the whole neighborhood was aroused. The vessel had dragged anchor and stranded within 200 yards from the shore. Hundreds of people soon collected along the coast; fishing boats were sought; the largest were brought which were to be found in that section of the country; heroic men manned them, and tried their very utmost to reach the vessel, but all that faced the storm were tossed back like cockle-shells, and thrown contemptuously on the sands. Well, Sir, that was a day never to be forgotten. There, almost within a stone's throw of the land, men were clinging to the wreck and uttering heartrending cries for help; but no man could reach them. Had a mortar been there a small line could have been thrown across the wreck, and we could have saved every man on board, but no mortar was there. The whole lifelong day the spectators remained on the beach and wondered what could be done. It was a sight not to be forgotten by those who witnessed it. Men and women fell on their knees on the sand and prayed, and strong men with tearful eyes, wrung their hands and cried: "What can be done to save these men," but all in vain, and one by one succumbing to exposure, the poor victims dropped from the wreck and sank into a watery grave. The story is soon told, and will be soon forgotten by most but not by those who witnessed it, and never by the wives and families of those poor fellows who perished by this wreck. Only last November, the schooner Henry Folger, was discovered one stormy morning stranded on a reef off Salmon Point. It was thought when she was first discovered, that men were seen moving on her decks, whether so, or not, we know that the story was soon told. In a few hours she became a complete wreck; and in a few days the mangled bodies of the helpless crew were found on the shore. It may be said by some, that in most of these circumstances, the tempest and the waves would be so great that it would be impossible to reach and succor them, but, such is not the case. I believe that the history of the life-saving service of all countries will give that supposition a most triumphant denial. We know, that from the Atlantic coast of the United States, as well as from the storm-beaten shores of the seagirt isle, the same heroic exclamation is heard: "To discover a wreck means to reach it and rescue the imperilled ones thereon!" We know, Sir, that there is nothing that man cannot do, if he is supplied with the proper means against the elements, and when we read the history of the life-saving service, both of England and the United States, we become convinced that there are very few wrecks on our coasts at which lives could not be saved. I know, Sir, that I am running the risk of wearying the House; I have spoken, perhaps, longer and more earnestly on this question than becomes so young a member of this House.

Mr. PLATT.

My only excuse is the importance of the question which imperatively demands that some action should be taken, and if I have spoken longer than may be seeming in a new member of the House, the charge may, perhaps, be laid at the door of the hon. the First Minister, who, by a motion for adjournment yesterday, gave me opportunity for extending my research over a longer period of time than would otherwise have been done. Before leaving home I asked the captain of a vessel, who is well known, what he knew about life-saving stations, and what had better be done. "Well," replied he, "tell the Government that if they do not care to save the lives of their own sailors, they should save the lives of the American boys who have saved my own life and the lives of many of our sailors on the southern coasts of our great lakes." Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I take it for granted that no defence will be necessary for energetic action on the part of the Government, either on the floor of this House or in the country, for "The voices of the rescued,

Whose numbers will be read;
The tears of speechless meaning
Their wives and children shed;
The memory of mercies
In man's extremest need;
All for the dear old life-boat,
In unison will plead."

Mr. McLELAN. The description which the hon. gentleman has given us of the condition of the life saving service in other countries has been very interesting indeed. The hon. gentleman asks what we have been doing in this country. In answer I might say that the attention of the country and the Government has been given to the lighting of the coasts, the building of lighthouses, the erection of fog alarms; and we have the inland coasts of the Dominion and the sea coasts as well lighted, and almost as perfectly, as any other coast in the world. I have no doubt that 500 lighthouses are to be found on the sea coast and inland waters of Canada; but now that the trade of the inland waters has increased so rapidly the attention of the Government will have to be turned more largely than ever to the erection of additional lighthouses on these inland waters. Now that these lighthouses, fog alarms, and bell buoys are in operation for the purpose of saving life and warning our mariners of hidden dangers, the attention of the Government in the future will be more largely devoted to the life boat service in particular, and the various organizations which life saving stations have perfected. The hon. member who preceded the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in the representation of Prince Edward County brought my attention to this matter, not by detailing what was done in other countries, but by bringing to my notice the necessity of having, in connection with his own county, some life saving stations—that county being by its peculiar formation especially liable to ship-wrecks and other marine disasters on its coasts. Life boats have been provided in many places, but there being no one in charge of them it was found that when the necessity for using them arose, they were apt to be unserviceable; but after consulting day after day with a former member for Prince Edward County and receiving from him voluminous communications on the subject—and I take occasion to say that Mr. McCuaig gave very earnest consideration to this question and was indefatigable in pressing it upon my attention—I decided that that county should have new life saving stations. I gave directions that a contract should be entered into for the construction of the best life boat that could be procured, and this boat was to be located at such a point as might be determined upon. Under the contract the boat was to have been delivered on the 9th of December, but, as frequently happens in contracts, the contractor failed to have it ready at the specified time. The boat, however, is completed now, and will be forwarded before navigation opens to a point selected for her location.

We have also decided that this boat shall be placed in charge of a crew and captain, who shall be paid a certain sum for the time they spend in practice. They will have stated periods for practice, and I propose that in other sections the same system shall be adopted—that is, that the boats shall be put in charge of captains and crews, who shall be paid something for practising and taking charge of the boats when the necessity arises.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to :—

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Nova Scotia and the Departments of Railways and Public Works respecting the transfer of the Branch line of Railway between Truro and Pictou, and all correspondence with the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company respecting Eastern Extension Railway matters in Nova Scotia.—(Mr. McDonald, Cape Breton.)

Return of casualties, where no loss of life occurred, to trains on the Intercolonial Railway, arising from collision, broken rails or otherwise, from March 1st, 1882, to July 1st, 1882; also, from July 1st, 1882, to March 1st, 1883; with the respective causes and dates, and the amount of damage (if any) in each case, to property, and amount of compensation paid to owners of property destroyed or damaged, as well as amount of claims for loss or damage to property, (if any) unsettled.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return of the instructions issued to the inspectors and other officers of the Fisheries, as to the enforcement of the Order in Council of June 11th, 1879, whereby fishing for salmon in the Dominion of Canada, except under the authority of lease or license from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, was prohibited, the number of seizures and informations laid before Justices of the Peace against parties fishing without such lease or license; the number of convictions obtained; also, a statement of suits brought against Fishery Officers for trespass and assault in endeavoring to enforce the said Order in Council, and the amount of damages (if any) recovered in each case.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return showing the amount paid out of the appropriation of $150,000 made last Session of Parliament "to aid in the development of the Sea Fisheries;" the amounts paid to each person or vessel, and their names; the name or names of the persons appointed to distribute the same, and their compensation; copies of all instructions given to such persons as to the distribution of the Fund, and all correspondence connected therewith.—(Mr. Robertson, Shelburne.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6.15 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 7th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Quebec and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Canadian Passenger Steamship Company.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Edmonton and Peace River Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 57) to further amend the Acts relating to the New Brunswick Railway Company.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Bill (No. 58) to amend the several Acts incorporating the Portage, Westbourne and North-West Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Great Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 59) to amend the Acts incorporating the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

EMPLOYMENT OF SHORTHAND WRITERS.

Mr. HACKETT. I beg to move that the Select Committee appointed to enquire into means for the facilitation of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland be authorized to employ a shorthand writer.

Mr. BLAKE. It is becoming the practice of all Select Committees having a subject for enquiry to employ shorthand writers. We had a discussion on this subject some years ago. It was found that the expenses of the Session were very largely increased by that course, and a much more rigid rule, by general consent, was adopted—that a case should be made out by the mover of the motion indicating that a very large volume of evidence was to be taken, and that the labors of the Committee could not be otherwise performed. Under these circumstances an order for the employment of a shorthand writer was to be made. I have no information myself as to whether this is a proper or an improper case, but I should not suppose that a vast amount of evidence would be required to be taken, and I think that at any rate it would be important to observe the rule: that a statement is to be made indicating to the House the special grounds which justify the incurring of this special expenditure.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that there is a good deal of force in the hon. member's suggestion; but I would suggest that this motion should be allowed to pass, while the remarks made should be held to be a notice to parties making similar motions in future, to furnish the grounds on which they are made.

Motion agreed to.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. WELLS, in introducing Bill (No. 60) to facilitate the Naturalization of Aliens, 1883, said: This Bill, Mr. Speaker, is designed to remedy an evil which many members of this House have experienced—especially those who represent counties such as Bruce, Grey, Huron, Perth and Waterloo. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of the Naturalization Laws of this country, but if the design was to facilitate and encourage the naturalization of aliens, they have certainly been failures; but if, on the other hand, the design was to prevent such naturalization, they have been a remarkable success. At every election a great number of the very best citizens in the country—men of the greatest intelligence, worth and enterprise—are turned back from the polls and told that they have nothing to say in the election of their representatives. Many others decline to go to the poll rather than submit themselves to the humiliation of being turned back, and so lose their votes. The object of the Bill is to enable, and to require, deputy returning officers to administer oaths of allegiance and of residence; and so allow these men to vote. There are other provisions in the Bill relating to the sending of certificates to certain officials of the various Provincial courts, and to be followed by the usual proceedings for naturalization. I trust that the Bill will become law.

Bill read the first time.

LIVERPOOL HARBOR.

Mr. FORBES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place an automatic buoy, or erect a fog-whistle, at the entrance of Liverpool Harbor during the coming season ?

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will see, by reference to page twenty-four of the Report of the Marine Department, that we have two of these automatic buoys in preparation, one of which is to be moored off the harbor of Liverpool, and the other is to be placed in the most favorable spot for marking the north-west ledge of Brier Island.

WORKS AT PUDDING PAN, N.S.

Mr. FORBES enquired, Whether the Government intend to complete the works commenced at Pudding Pan, Queen's County, N.S., during the coming season ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that the works undertaken in 1868, which are the only works undertaken there, were 875 feet of wharf, at a cost of $5,714, and that that work was completed. There is no intention of continuing the work.

LANDS IN PRINCE ALBERT, N.W.T., AND NEIGHBORING DISTRICTS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence and memorials relating to the claims of the inhabitants of Prince Albert and the neighboring districts in the North-West Territories, in respect to the lands they occupy, and to other matters affecting their condition, said: I have seen, as I dare say other hon. gentlemen have seen, a petition to this House by the inhabitants of Prince Albert and vicinity, from which it appears that many of these settlers went to the North-West prior to the transfer thereof to the Dominion, and that there has been very great delay and indifference shown with reference to their obtaining titles to their lands. It is represented, in a communication which I have received, that there has been much correspondence with the Government, and that representations have been made as well by personal interview as by letters, with regard to these and some other grievances; but that up to this time, at any rate, no effectual remedy has been applied. The statement is, as to some of the inhabitants, that they went there prior to 1870 and took up lands; that they have ever since resided upon, cultivated and improved them; that their claims have been recognized by the proper department at Ottawa; that they have from time to time been promised that their titles to these lands would be confirmed by the issue of patents, but that nothing has been actually done. It is suggested—I do not express an opinion on the subject, but the position taken by some of the inhabitants is—that their position is similar to the position of those who were residents within Manitoba at the same time; but what is important is, that some just and liberal decision should be reached as to the terms upon which the patents to these lands can be obtained and the titles to them settled. By the regulations of the registry offices of the North-West, no instrument affecting particular lands can be registered until after the patent has been first registered, so that thousands of transfers have taken place in the territory, and not one of them has been properly registered. A registrar was appointed two years ago, but the office is not open yet—I suppose, because patents not having been issued, there has been nothing for him to do. It is also said that many of the settlers settled subsequently to the year 1870 but prior to 1879, on lands which were then unclaimed, with the intention of homesteading, and though they have since complied with the regulations of the Act of 1879, they have been unable to obtain the necessary grants from the Crown. Prior to 1879 all the lands in the district, whether odd or even numbered sections, were open for purchase or homestead, and many of the settlers took up lands, cultivated and improved them, with the intention of purchasing; but by an Order in Council which has since been passed, they are prohibited from purchasing these lands. As the local land office was only opened last year, many of the settlers were prevented from making their entries at the proper time, and many of them are thus debarred from having their titles recognized by the Department, and will be compelled to remain three years before a recognized entry can be made. It appears that the agent was appointed as long ago as 1878, and has been there ever since, but the office was not open for homestead entries until August, 1881; and by the land regulations which intervened, settlers were prevented from exercising that freedom with regard to purchase and settlement which had existed prior to that date. Another complaint is made in the communication which I have received, and that is, that parties who have improved odd or even sections since an early period, intending to purchase them, have not been allowed to buy them at the one dollar rate; and as they were refused the right of homesteading, many persons having residences and large improvements on these lands, have been informed by persons at the land office, that their lands were bought by others, and there has thus been encouraged, by the action of the Government, a great deal of the worst sort of land grabbing, or land robbery. Then the great distance of these settlers from the railways and from the general current of settlement, has, of course, imposed special disabilities and expense upon these settlers, which, they contend, and rightly, I think, should entitle them to a prompt and liberal decision with reference to their rights to their lands. It is complained also that the Government has insisted that the settlement duties must be proved to have begun before October 9th, 1879, and that the Government have since instructed the agent to decline to recommend for patents any claims in which entry had been obtained, unless it was obtained within three months after the land office opened. There are about 3,000 farmers in this settlement, and there is said—although the district contains a good deal of good land—to be considerable poor land; and there being only a small amount of land surveyed, and properly certified at the Department, it was found impossible to locate upon lands with any certain knowledge of whether they were within odd or even numbered sections. It is also suggested that colonization companies surround the district, and the agents of these companies have taken care to forbid all immigrants from going on their lands; and the result has been that many intending settlers have departed and gone across the line. There are certain other complaints made which are not so directly connected with the land, but which have reference to very material impediments to the progress of the settlement. It is said that it takes less than a week for the mail to go from the Canadian Pacific Railway to Prince Albert, but six weeks to get an answer from Winnipeg, and that sixteen mails in the year are the whole amount of mail accommodation obtained up to this time. Several other complaints are made, but I will trouble the House with reference to only two of them—a complaint as to the slowness exhibited in improving the Saskatchewan River, although a vote of the House was taken for $20,000 for that purpose, that river being, it is said, the principal means of transporting freight to and from that region; and a complaint of the slowness in surveying the wood land lying on the north branch of the Saskatchewan opposite Prince Albert. The delay being said to involve considerable inconvenience to the settlers, and the depletion of a large portion of this wood land by unauthorized persons. These complaints having been made to me, I thought it my duty to move for this order and to make these statements, in order that the claims of these individuals might receive more attention in the future than they appear to have received up to this time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the granting of this motion; but my hon. friend must not take it for granted that all these complaints are well founded.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, no; I do not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know the hon. gentleman does not. Similar complaints are made in every new settlement by persons who are anxious to have the country opened to them and surveyed, and patents granted. No matter whether it is in an outlying district or in the vicinity of more settled parts, they are anxious to have all the advantages of an old, well organized, well settled, country. One reason of the delays at Prince Albert has been alluded to by my hon. friend, that is the nature of the surveys. The settlers are scattered along the North Saskatchewan for a great distance. Some of them have complained that they should have long narrow strips of land running back three or four miles into the country, such as we were obliged to grant to the settlers along the Red River and Assiniboine River for the purpose of settling all the disputes that existed in that country. It is not proposed in any way to carry out the same system in Prince Albert. The general system of survey in the North-West has been applied to the Prince Albert district, and, of course, the lines as run will not in every instance form the boundaries of the different sections or quarter-sections which the settlers have taken up without reference to any survey whatever. But no persons have been removed or ousted. There must be a system of give and take. The survey there has been going on, and the proper officer has been sent there for the purpose of confirming settlers who have bonâ fide claims according to law. Many cases must arise of settlers going in and taking up fancy spots, and some system must be arranged by which the system of survey shall be adhered to and the settlers substantially protected at the same time. We cannot help it if people act under the impression that colonization companies can keep them off their tracts. Land jobbers and land speculators may tell the people: "These lands belong to us," and some persons are frightened enough to buy off their claim, whether it is good or not. We cannot help that. All I can say with reference to these colonization companies is, that there is not anything to prevent any settler going in and settling on an even-numbered lot under the general regulations, making his entry and getting his patent at the end of three years. It has certainly been an inconvenience to those parties who wish to sell that they have not got their patents. The pressure in that direction is very great; but the system which has always existed in Canada, which we got from the Mother Country, with the various sanctions required before affixing the great seal and the signature of the sovereign or her representative, is followed in all these cases, and that has caused considerable delay. In the measure I have laid before the House, there is a provision by which that circumlocutory process will be very much abbreviated, and patents will be issued more speedily. The Department cannot pretend to survey at once, at the call of a body of settlers who go and settle wherever they please in the outlying districts of that vast country, whenever called upon, or where people want their farms marked out. The returns laid before Parliament during the past three years show how very active the Surveyor General's branch of the Department of the Interior has been in laying out townships. Some three or four hundred townships have been laid out during the past year. Every Dominion surveyor who has passed the examination and can be got, we are only to glad to employ and send up to the North-West. Of course, the first surveys were made in the vicinity of the Red River, and extended westward, and the main force of the surveyors has been employed on the line of the Pacific Railway westward. But surveys have been going on at the same time in other portions of the country—at Prince Albert, at Edmonton, and at other points, and along the boundary south of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government intend to ask Parliament to give them a large grant for surveying next season. With the increasing number of applications from surveyors, and increasing experience, we hope that the present year will show a very much larger reach of country surveyed than has been covered in any previous year. I hope that perhaps five or six hundred townships will be under survey during the year 1883. If we have a favorable season for the purpose, we expect to be able to cover that quantity of ground. Last year and the year before, the weather in the spring of the year was adverse, and in some portions of the country to be surveyed it was found impossible for the surveyors to get in until well on in the summer. We hope those were abnormal conditions. We have a large staff, and with a long summer we ought to be able this year to cover a great quantity of ground. There will be no objection to the granting of this motion. As regards the slowness of improving the Saskatchewan, I think my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Public Works can dispose of that complaint. The different obstructions will be removed as soon as it is ascertained by survey where the money will be best applied. It is understood there are boulders in particular portions of the Saskatchewan, the removal of which will greatly improve the navigation. Every exertion will be made to apply the money Parliament has voted for the removal of these obstructions in the manner best calculated to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. ROYAL. I suppose you are aware that delegates have been sent here by a certain portion of the population of the North-West Territory respecting the subject which is just now engaging the attention of this House, and is more especially under the notice of the Government. Those delegates have laid their grievances—if grievances they are—before some of the hon. Ministers. Their object is to have the title to the lands occupied, owned and improved by some of these people for over twenty years, recognized and confirmed by the Government. Their claims are nothing but just. These lands belong mostly to half-breed people and pioneers from Ontario, who went west from the Province of Manitoba some five, ten or fifteen years ago. These pioneers of Canadian civilization have formed groups throughout the territories, which will no doubt be the nucleus of a large population. There is a very important group at Duck Lake, at Prince Albert, another at Edmonton, another at St. Albert, and so on. Last year surveyors were sent out to carry on the surveys of the Dominion in that part of the country. These surveyors had no instructions to stop wherever they would meet any of the old settlements, and their continuing the lines aroused, of course, the suspicion of the old settlers who held a meeting and represented to the Government the justice of respecting their property in farms and improvements. Their claims have been fully recognized and orders have been sent to the surveyors to respect those settlements. The object of this delegation is to have the Government cause the lines of the Dominion surveys to front on the limits of their settlements. The delegates have already had an interview with some hon. members of the Government, and were assured that in every case the rights of ownership of those old settlers would be fully recognized. These settlers are not to be classed with squatters. The squatter is, generally speaking, a man who goes off the survey and squats on the piece of land he thinks best suited for farming. In some cases, unfortunately, he is sent there by somebody else, or goes on his own impulse, to select the best spot on which he will make a slight improvement in order that he may be able to sell it to some company or individual. The settlers to whom I refer went as far as St. Albert, some few miles west of Edmonton, and lived there on their farms for over thirty years. Of course it was quite natural they should suspect something was wrong when they saw the surveyors continuing their lines of survey, but there is no more reason for fear on that ground. The delegates have also another object in view, namely, to have the Government recognize and confirm the titles of these settlers. No doubt, to a certain extent, they have been squatters, but their rights are clear, and of course they are anxious the Government should confirm them and issue Crown patents to them, in order that their property should be classed the same as any other in the Dominion. In that respect also I am happy to state their wants have been fully met with and they have been assured the Government will fully recognize their titles, and issue in due time the letters patent. They have also demanded from the Government that a land agent should be appointed in their own district. The nearest land agent is about 300 or 400 miles distant from Prince Albert, and the hon. Minister has assured them that as soon as the plans of survey would be recognized and confirmed by the Government, a Dominion lands office would be opened there, and everything made ready for the interests of the new settlers. It is well known, I believe in Manitoba and in the rest of the Dominion, that that part of the North-West Territories which lies on the North Saskatchewan and extends from Prince Albert to Edmonton, will, certainly, before many years, contain a very large population. That district is composed of the most fertile lands in that part of the country where running waters, forests, and vast arable lands are to be found in large quantities. Already the pioneers have gone in in advance of the surveys and formed groups of population which are now among the most important groups of the North-West. On behalf of these delegates I must recognize the fact that the Government have dealt with them in a most open and liberal manner. We must remember that in 1870 nearly all the troubles which arose in the Red River settlement were due to the instructions or want of instructions given to surveyors who were sent out to survey the country, without taking into consideration that that country had been settled some five or six years before. Of course, the population then became naturally suspicious as to what was taking place, and about the transfer of their lands as well as the whole territory to the Dominion Government without their being consulted. They naturally became excited over this bargain and stopped the surveyors. It is but natural that those half-breeds of the same stock and sometimes of the same parentage in the North-West, may have been a little suspicious about what was taking place during last summer in the Dominion surveys. But history is always of great assistance to Governments, and in this case I am happy to say that the rights of those pioneers who have kept that country to Canada are being fully recognized by the Dominion Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I congratulate my hon. friend upon being able to give the House much more information as to the present condition of this question than the hon. First Minister, who was supposed to discharge the duties of Minister of Interior, was able to do. I regret, however, that my hon. friend's information, besides being fuller, should also materially differ from that which was conveyed to us by the hon. First Minister. He has quoted a line from Shakespeare, who speaks of somebody or other being King and having a Viceroy over him, and it appears from the statement of the hon. member for Provencher that while the hon. First Minister declares that the Government first declined altogether to recognize the applicability of the exceptional circumstances as to the river lots in Manitoba being fit for settlement, insists upon the adoption of a general system of survey and such adjustments between the settlers as will produce as little inconvenience as possible. The hon. member for Provencher declares that some other authority—I suppose the Viceroy over the hon. gentleman—has agreed emphatically and decidedly that whenever the surveys touch these ancient settlers they shall stop there, and that the ancient bounds shall be recognized. Well, I hope that this other Minister, who is the Viceroy over the hon. gentleman, is not the President of the Senate, for if he has set upon him no doubt he will be squeezed pretty flat. But it seems there is a discrepancy between the statements of the leader of the Government and the Minister, and the communication that the hon. member for Provencher gives as to the state of the matter. I was also glad to hear him say that the patents would be issued. From all I can see, and from all that has passed, I was not surprised to hear him declare that the country of which we are now speaking is the most fertile part of the North-West. I was satisfied as soon as I saw the papers brought down the other day, in which I found a block of some 39,000,000 of acres in the region have been, so far as the odd-numbered sections were concerned, reserved to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; so I was at once prepared to acquiesce in the view of the hon. gentleman, that it must be the pick of the country since they have got hold of it. I am glad that my hon. friend is so easily satisfied, and that he has nothing but compliments to pay to the Government for the generosity, liberality, earliness and promptness with which they have settled the claims of the settlers of Prince Albert.

DRILL SHED AT ST. THOMAS.

Mr. WILSON, in moving for copy of advertisement asking for tenders for the removal and rebuilding of the drill shed in the City of St. Thomas, Ontario; also, of tenders received, marking the one accepted, with statement of total cost of work done, said: In moving this resolution I desire to state to the House my object in doing so. It will be remembered that in 1881 a vote was taken by this House for the purpose of improving the drill shed in St. Thomas. That vote was a necessary one as the drill shed had been in a bad condition for a number of years, and the volunteers thought themselves entitled to a better place for drill services than had been provided for them. But at the same time a majority of the people of St. Thomas felt that not only should the drill shed be improved but that a more suitable place should be selected for it. They were not satisfied, therefore, when the vote for $400 was taken up for that purpose. The drill shed is located directly in the heart of the city, and certainly, in the condition in which it was, it was no very great ornament to the people of that locality. During the following summer the Government took no action, but in 1882 we found that greater energy was displayed on the part of the military authorities there, and we were told that the Government were about making some alterations. We found also that during the winter communication took place with various citizens of St. Thomas and with the member then representing that city here. It appears that a proposition had been made to one individual, not only for the removal and repair of the drill shed, but also that he should get as compensation therefor a portion of land that was not required, or if it was required was not required for drill shed purposes; but nothing was done. It went on until after the House adjourned; about the time that the writs were issued for the elections, and then it was found that this individual who had made the offer and was lead to understand his offer would be accepted, and that he would get the contract, unfortunately for him, being a Grit perhaps, was disappointed. It appears that at this time he belonged to those who were in opposition to the Administration of the day. He had made preparations expecting to get the contract, and had provided the greater portion of the material for making the improvements, when suddenly we saw it announced in an item in the local Conservative paper, that this individual was not to get the contract and that it was to go to another individual called Major Allison. It may be that the hon. Minister of Militia thought it was better to have this work done by one belonging to the staff, and therefore, he got the contract. Major Allison was a good Conservative and had always been so; he got the contract and went on to fill it. But what I was going to complain of was this, that although I believe it is customary to issue advertisements calling for tenders, and although we watched carefully from day to day to see whether there was any notice of the contract being let by tender, we found none appearing in our local papers. We have a daily Reform paper there, and a semi-weekly paper in the Conservative interest, and yet no appearance of any advertisement announcing that a contract would be let has ever been seen in either of those papers up to the present time. We are in total ignorance as to the amount of that contract, whether it was greater or whether it was less than the offer made by this individual in the first instance. Without detaining the House further, I, therefore, beg to move the resolution; and I hope I will be placed in possession of all the information, so that I may satisfy, not only our Reform friends in the city of St. Thomas, but also our Conservative friends. Not only the architect, but the late member for the constituency seemed to take a great interest in the work, and rumor said he was also an officer under the architect.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would have been ready to answer the hon. gentleman except for the fact that I was misled by the notice, thinking that the matter came within the Department of Militia. The papers will be brought down, and I will have another opportunity of making a statement.

CONVEYANCE OF PRISONERS FROM COUNTY JAILS TO PENITENTIARIES.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for copies of all correspondence with, and petitions from municipalities referring to the appointment of Dominion bailiffs to convey prisoners from the county jails to the penitentiaries, said: I am aware that the council of the county of Elgin, and I think other county councils also, have petitioned this House, and I believe have also petitioned the Governor in Council, asking that Dominion bailiffs be appointed to collect those prisoners from the county jails who have been sentenced to terms to the penitentiary, and transfer them to penitentiaries. The House is probably aware that a similar course has been pursued in the Province of Ontario for some years, in regard to prisoners destined for the Central Prison at Toronto. Provincial bailiffs have been appointed who take several county jails on their route, and convey a considerable number of prisoners at one time to the Central Prison. It is not necessary to argue that by collecting a large number of prisoners at a time from different jails, the work can be done more cheaply than by a system under which the sheriffs of the respective counties come down with one or two prisoners at a time, as the sheriffs have to make equal journeys and pay as much for assistance in bringing one or two as Provincial bailiffs have to do when bringing half a dozen or a dozen prisoners to the penitentiary. But this is not the only reason which has prompted the forwarding of these petitions. In Elgin, and I believe in other counties, there has been almost constant difficulty between counties and the sheriffs, in regard to the charges made. There appears to be great opportunity for overcharging the county in respect to those matters, and it has been alleged, though I do not go into that question, that in several counties overcharges have been made; and in Elgin in particular, where this allegation has been made, it has been said on the other side that the charges complained of as overcharges were made by all sheriffs. If this be the case, and I do not enquire into it at present, it only goes to show that increased expenses have been incurred, either legally or illegally, by the practice of sending the sheriff and an assistant with one or two prisoners at a time to the penitentiary. I think, therefore, these counties are justified in calling the attention of the House and of the Government to this matter, and I hope it will receive the particular attention of the Ministry. They could, by adopting this plan, save the different municipalities a very considerable amount of the expense involved in transferring prisoners, for I take it for granted that the cost of the transference, by means of one bailiff, would be paid by the same parties who pay the largest cost of transfer now, and by saving this amount to the municipalities they would undoubtedly earn and receive the gratitude of those bodies. I do not know how the system would work in other Provinces than Ontario, or what the present system is elsewhere; that is a matter for the Government to consider. I only ask and urge that they should give special attention to this matter which has been brought before them by several municipalities in the Province of Ontario at least.

DRILL SHED AT IONA.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for a copy of contract of the building of the drill shed at Iona, Ontario, with report of inspection of the same, and of all correspondence or reports in regard to the payment of the contractor, and statement of all sums paid to him on account of such contract, said: I have only to say in regard to this motion, that the drill shed was built a number of years ago; that the contractor has informed me that through some irregularity or blunder on the part, I think, of the local military officers at the time, he has never been paid; and that this arose from lack of information on the part of the Government, as to the actual facts of the case, the completion of the shed, &c. I make the motion simply to ascertain the facts, and enable the Government to consider the contractor's claim.

Mr. CARON. We have some correspondence in the Department relating to this matter. There has, however, never been any contract entered into between the Government and a contractor for the building of a drill shed at Iona. The correspondence in the Department will be laid on the Table.

Mr. CASEY. I think, in some cases, the contract was made by the municipal authorities, the Government contributing a certain amount towards the cost. This drill shed was built about 1866 or 1867, when a different system prevailed to that which now exists.

Mr. CARON. The whole correspondence will be brought down, and the hon. gentleman will find that no contract has been entered into between the Government or any municipality or contractor for the building of a drill shed at that place.

Motion agreed to.

COST OF CONVEYING PRISONERS TO PENITENTIARIES.

Mr. WILSON, in moving for a statement showing the cost, per capita, of conveying prisoners from the county jails to the penitentiaries in the years 1880-81 and 1881-82, said: In Ontario, where they have adopted a system of local or Provincial bailiffs, the cost, per capita, is much less than what it formerly was when prisoners were removed by the sheriffs or their officers. A reference to the Sessional Papers of the Ontario Legislature will establish that the present cost is much less than what it was under the former system. The cost of removing fifty-nine boys to the Penetanguishene Reformatory in 1876 was $3,012.84. In 1879 the cost of removing forty-six boys was $2,118.46. In 1880, 169 of these lunatics were removed, and this cost the country only $1,297.36; this included 60 per cent. of the cost incurred for the bailiffs, who performed the work. I might also say, that in 1878, 196 lunatics were removed, costing the Province $5,111.24, and in 1879, 236 lunatics, costing $6,008.56. In 1880, under the Provincial system of having Provincial bailiffs employed in this work, the removal of 214 patients only cost $3,290.53, showing that if we adopt the system, which prevails in the Province of Ontario, the cost, per capita, will be much less than it was under the old system, when it cost $54.06 per head in 1878, $21.16 in 1879, and only $11.76 in 1880; the expense of conveying the lunatics cost per head $26 in 1878, $25.46 in 1879, and only $15.37 in 1880. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government can see their way clear to the adoption of the Ontario system of using Provincial bailiffs, the cost to the municipalities, and the cost to the country, will be far less than it is at the present time. Very considerable feeling is now expressed on the subject, and I think that this feeling in many of the counties is perfectly justified, in view of the fact that the system followed is not in the best interests of these municipalities, which feel very keenly in the matter. I, therefore, move this resolution.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY CLAIMS.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move for a return showing the claims settled by the Commissioners appointed to settle disputed claims on the Intercolonial Railway since last report, with such other information as would show the progress made towards a final settlement with all contractors whose claims have been submitted for adjudication. I have simply to remark, with regard to this motion, Mr. Speaker, that the return called for might be very conveniently combined with the return moved for some days ago by the hon. member for West Durham.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I see some difficulty in complying with the latter part of the hon. gentleman's motion. To show all the progress made would simply be to detail all the evidence and proceedings of the Commission, which is now sitting. So far as I am aware no claims have been settled since the last report was presented to the House. The matter has been referred to this Commission for a report; and the correspondence in this relation will be brought down at an early day, in response to an order of the House; but the hon. gentleman can see that the latter part of the motion would involve the taking up and bringing here of all the evidence and of all the proceedings of the Commission that is in progress, before a final result has been reached.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has almost stated now what I wanted to get in the return, namely, the fact that no claims have been settled since the last report. I was not aware that such was the fact. I thought it probable that some were already settled.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking from memory, and this is my impression.

Mr. ROSS. Just so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If any claims are settled, the information will be brought down; and if the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to drop, I will bring down information as to whether any claims have been settled—although

Mr. WILSON.

I do not think any have—with the other report; and the hon. gentleman can then take such action as he may find necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think the hon. gentleman did not bring down full information, when the former return was asked for. A few trifling cases were presented as settled by Mr. Shanly; but a number were under consideration by Mr. Shanly, of which the House has had no intelligence whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think that this information ought to be brought down. The previous return ought to be completed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain. Any action taken, I think, should be brought down, but all the reports of Mr. Shanly who was appointed, not for the purpose of settling cases, not for the purpose of being empowered with any authority to settle any cases, for all the authority he had, and all the power he had, was to investigate and report to the Government—have been sent to the Railway Commission now sitting; and so far as my memory serves me, no action has been taken by the Government, upon any report of Mr. Shanly, or by the Commission, except on those which have already been brought before the House, and for which a vote has been asked. If any such cases have occurred, I will bring down as I have stated in connection with the other returns, a statement of them here; but my hon. friend will see, that if no action has been taken—and anything which Mr. Shanly has done, and any progress which he made, has been committed to this Commission—it would be very inconvenient to bring his reports, which are of a confidential character to the Government, before the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But, on the other hand the hon. gentleman may take and settle cases on Mr. Shanly's reports immediately after the House rises. My hon. friend (Mr. Blake) tells me that a pledge that this would not be done was given.

Mr. BLAKE. A pledge was given last Session by the hon. the First Minister, that no money would be paid except votes for them were placed in the Estimates, and asked for.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite certain that this pledge was kept; and on that ground I state that no action has been taken, and no case has been settled. That being the case, I think it well to allow this motion to stand until the return moved for is brought down and laid on the Table, giving full information as to the constitution of the Commission and the expenses connected with it.

Mr. ROSS. What I really wanted to get, Mr. Speaker, was information as to whether any cases had been settled since the report of last year was placed before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not.

Motion withdrawn.

SEMAPHORES AT RIVER DU LOUP AND BRANDY POTS.

MR. GRANDBOIS (Translation), in moving for copies of all correspondence in relation to the erection of Semaphores on the wharf at River du Loup, County of Temiscouata, and on the Brandy Pots, said: My object in making this motion is to draw attention to the fact that, although semaphores have been erected on the wharf at River du Loup and on the Brandy Pots nearly two years ago, they have not yet been put into operation. The object of semaphores as is well known, is to establish communication by means of signals, according to the international code, with the ships anchoring in Brandy Pots Harbor, either during stormy weather or owing to accidents or other causes. These semaphores being connected with the telegraph line on the wharf at River du Loup, ships are thus put in communication with their owners or consignees, enabling the latter to obtain information about the cargo and vessel, and to order tow-boats to bring them into port. Now, I also wish to remark that Brandy Pots is a complete and safe harbor against all winds; it is an eastern as well as a western and northern harbor. There are, of course, along the river, a large number of other harbors; but they are not so safe, in this sense, that they only offer protection against one sort of wind, and very little protection during stormy weather. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister who presides over the Department to this point, so that measures may be taken to remedy this state of things, and to put these semaphores in operation. I believe such a step would be of great advantage to the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, which is already so difficult, owing to the ships passing so near the shore.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). I have to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that my colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine, being absent, I am not in a position to state the reason why these semaphores have not been put in operation; but I will not fail to draw his attention to the remarks made by the hon. member, and I am convinced that he will do all in his power to remedy the inconveniences which is complained of.

INTER-PROVINCIAL TRADE.

Mr. PAINT moved that Messrs. Mitchell, White (Cardwell), Burpee (St. John), Laurier, McCallum, Desjardins, Gunn, Richy, Garrow, and the mover, do compose the Committee which the House agreed on the 5th instant, to appoint on the subject of inter-provincial trade.

THE CHARYBDIS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for copies of all correspondence and reports relating to the Charybdis, not already brought down; a detailed statement of all expenditure incurred in connection with said vessel; also, all correspondence relating to the sale by the Government of said vessel, or the transfer and delivery thereof to the Imperial Government, or to any one representing such Government; also, a detailed statement of the employment of said vessel since the acceptance thereof by the Dominion Government, and how now employed or where stationed, said: I find, Mr. Speaker, that on the 3rd of February, 1881, in reply to an address of Parliament, a voluminous correspondence was submitted to the House by the Government on the subject of this motion. That return does not contain, I think, the whole of the correspondence that passed between the Canadian and the Imperial Governments upon the subject of the transfer of this vessel from the Imperial to the Colonial authorities. I think, Sir, that no one can rise from a perusal of this very remarkable and interesting correspondence without feeling somewhat humiliated, without having the conviction firmly impressed upon his mind, that in the whole negotiations from the beginning to the end, the Department of Marine and Fisheries or the Government exhibited an utter want of carefulness and prudence, to use no stronger or more forcible language, in connection with this matter. The first correspondence that passed between the Imperial and Canadian Governments upon this subject, is dated the 4th of October 1880, and is embraced in a telegram from the First Lord of the Admiralty to the Governor General of Canada. The following is such telegram:—

"Your letter of 22nd of August received. Charybdis old type, finish deck, steam corvette, daily expected from China, might suit you. She could either be paid off all standing, and handed over at Devonport in the present condition, free of expense, if Treasury agree to Dominion Government to navigate to Halifax at their expense, or it would cost about three thousand pounds to remove the machinery and prepare her for your purpose as a sailing ship. We could do this for you at charge of Dominion Government."

You will observe that in this cablegram the First Lord of the Admiralty refers to a letter of the 22nd of August, 1880. That letter, however, was not brought down with the correspondence; but why it was not brought down I will not venture to say at present. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us why this, I suppose, important document, which initiated the correspondence between the two Governments with respect to the transfer of the vessel from the Imperial to the Colonial Governments, is not submitted to Parliament. It might give us some information as to where the idea originated as to the acquisition of this valuable vessel, and the purposes for which it was intended to be used. You will find that three or four days after this cablegram was received here, the Governor General was instructed to telegraph to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and his telegram is in the following words:—

"OTTAWA, 7th October, 1880.

"Thanks for support. Minister promises definite reply to-morrow.

"LORNE."

Within twenty-four hours after this telegram was sent to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and within four days after the First Lord of the Admiralty communicated to the Governor General that this magnificent vessel was at the disposal of the Canadian Government, the Canadian Government appear to have resolved to acquire her, and on the 8th of October the Governor General telegraphed to the First Lord of the Admiralty:

"Charybdis accepted with thanks, all standing. An officer will be sent to take charge."

That dispatch was sent, it should be remembered, on the 8th of October. Now the only thing on earth that hon. gentlemen opposite knew about this vessel on the 8th of October, when His Excellency was directed to telegraph to the First Lord of the Admiralty, was that she was standing—perhaps the hon. Minister of Marine will explain what that means—that she was called the Charybdis, and that she was an old corvette. And yet without a moment's hesitation, without any consideration, without the slightest plan as to how this vessel was to be utilized by the Canadian authorities, without any well defined or any scheme at all, the Government of this country undertook to direct the Governor General to telegraph to the First Lord of the Admiralty, that they would accept this vessel "with thanks, all standing." Well, Sir, as if to warn hon. gentlemen opposite of the folly of the course they were entering upon, we find that three days afterwards, the First Lord of the Admiralty communicates to the English Treasury Board, with respect to the condition of this vessel. The whole correspondence forms an interesting chapter in the history of this country, as showing the mode in which the business of the country is carried on. On the 11th of October, three days after our Government had telegraphed to the First Lord of the Admiralty that they would accept this vessel, the First Lord of the Admiralty writes the following letter—and I am going to trouble the House by reading the whole of it, in order that the House and the country may see that we obtained the ownership of this vessel with our eyes open. He says:

"I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, to acquaint you for the information of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, that the Governor General of Canada has been in communication with the First Lord, relative to the establishment of a training ship at Quebec or Halifax.

"My Lords have intimated that to fit out an old ship would entail considerable expense; but at the present time an opportunity presents itself of meeting the wishes of the Dominion Government without any actual expense being incurred by the navy.

"Her Majesty's ship Charybdis, old type of corvette, is daily expected to arrive in England from China, after seven and a-half years' absence. The ship is not of a type worth the heavy expenditure necessary to refit her for another commission. She would, however, be suitable for the purposes of the Dominion Government. Under these circumstances, my Lords request the sanction of their Lordships of the Treasury, to lending her to the Dominion Government, after being paid off at Devonport, exactly in her present condition as she stands complete, with all fittings, fixtures and unconsumable stores, similar to what was done in the case of the Nelson, lent to the colony of Victoria, in 1867.

"The ordnance and ordnance stores belonging to the War Department will be landed.

"All extra stores which may be required, as well as any repairs, if necessary, for the voyage, to be at the risk and expense of the Dominion Government.

"The Governor General has telegraphed that he is prepared to accept the ship under these conditions, and to send an officer to take charge of the ship.

"In order to hand over the ship as proposed, it is necessary to take steps, immediately on her arrival, before any expense is incurred in dismantling her. My Lords, therefore, will be glad to be favored with the decision of the Treasury as soon as possible.

"Copies of the Governor General's letter to the First Lord, and the telegrams which have passed, are transmitted in order that the aspect of the case may be clearly understood."

Now, Sir, you will observe that the vessel is spoken of as "an old type of corvette," which is not worth the heavy expense necessary to refit her, but is good enough for Canada; and under these circumstances the Imperial authorities are quite willing to hand her over to the Canadian Government. On the 11th of October, 1880, the vessel was on the high seas. She was known to be twenty years old, to be an old wooden structure, to have spent seven years of her service in the Chinese seas, and not to have been in an English port for nearly ten years. That much was known before this communication was sent to the Treasury from the Admiralty; but there were a great many things about her that were not known. One would have imagined that that was sufficient, however, to have warned hon. gentlemen opposite against the acquisition of this vessel. There was enough, at all events, to induce them to have a proper examination made of the vessel before they saddled the country with the expense of maintaining her. Did they act upon the warning? Not at all; they acted as if no such warning had been given. We find that on the 28th of October, as if to more fully warn the Canadian authorities, the Lords of the Admiralty communicated with the Colonial Department, knowing that a communication would be made known to the Canadian authorities. In that communication the Lords of the Admiralty gave a full description of the vessel so far as it was known to them; although it turned out that their description fell far short of the reality. That communication reads thus:

"With reference to your letter of the 26th inst., enclosing a copy of a despatch from the Governor General of Canada, on the subject of the loan of Her Majesty's ship Charybdis, to the Dominion Government, which His Excellency speaks of the vessel as a 'gift,' I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to request that you will state to the Earl of Kimberley that, in order that there may be no room for misunderstanding as to the terms on which the vessel can be lent, my Lords think it may be desirable to recapitulate them as follows:—

"The ship is lent in the precise condition in which she now is, after seven and one half years' absence from England, with all fittings, fixtures and unconsumable stores on board.

"All extra stores which may be required are to be paid for by the Canadian Government.

"Any repairs that may be necessary for the voyage, as well as the cost of docking (if necessary), are to be at the risk and expense of the Canadian Government.

"The ship is lent to be used as a training vessel, and will remain the property of the Imperial Government, to be returned when no longer required; any machinery or principal fittings which may not be of use to the Dominion Government are to be returned into store at Halifax Dock Yard.

"As regards the guns and other ordnance stores on board, my Lords suggest that communication be made to the War Office.

"I am to request that Captain Scott, who is to take charge of the vessel, may be desired, by telegraph, to come to England at once, and that the Agent General of the Dominion Government may be requested to prepare engineers and others to take charge of the vessel at Devonport, directly after she is paid off, which will be about the 9th proximo."

Now, Sir, you will observe that that letter also points out the condition the vessel was in. Now there is a second warning from the Imperial to the Canadian authorities as to the condition of this vessel. You will think, surely, a second warning would be enough to arouse the anxiety of hon. gentlemen opposite as to the kind of vessel they were getting as a loan or a gift. It is said you should never look a gift horse in the mouth, but when the gift is accompanied by so many warnings it is only right we should examine it for our own protection. But the hon. gentlemen appear to have paid no attention even to this second warning. On the contrary, what did they do? They sent for Captain Scott. As the hon. Minister of Marine, who has charge of this important Department with which, I suppose, this branch of the public service is connected, says:

"Captain Scott, of the British service, is employed. He will cross the ocean and take charge of this vessel."

And on the 2nd of November, 1880, Captain Scott is written to by the hon. the Minister of Marine, as follows:—

"The Government of the Dominion has become possessed of Her Majesty's corvette Charybdis, about 1,500 tons register, now lying at Devonport, England, and it is intended that she shall be brought out forthwith. The Government, having full confidence in your ability and experience, desires that you shall take charge, and bring her to St. John, N.B. You will, therefore, proceed by first steamer to England, and on your arrival in London report to the High Commissioner, to whom you herewith have a letter from the Minister of Militia, Sir Alexander Campbell."

Now you will observe that that communication was sent upon the 2nd day of November, instructing Captain Scott to proceed to England to take charge of this vessel. On the 8th of November, a few days afterward, the following cablegram was sent from Canada to Earl Kimberley:—

"I had the honor to send Your Lordship to-day a telegraphic message in the following words: 'Government accepts Charybdis with conditions mentioned in your despatch of 28th October. Captain Scott leaves Halifax by Nova Scotian to-day to take vessel over.'

(Signed) LORNE."

Here we have in the plainest possible language the description of this vessel given by the Imperial authorities, and we have our Canadian authorities acting on that very description, by sending Captain Scott over to take charge of her. I do not care to trouble the House by reading all this correspondence, but let me give you in the words of the correspondence, very briefly, what the condition of the vessel was then known to be. It turned out afterwards she was in a much worse condition than represented. I only bring the narrative down to the 8th of November. I wish to draw your attention particularly to this description as shown in this correspondence. It gives one a mass of information as to the condition and character of the vessel that is well worth the trouble of enquiring into. She is described first as "an old type of corvette;" second, as "an old ship that would entail considerable expense to refit her." She is said "to be twenty years old;" "to have served seven and a-half years in the Chinese seas;" "that she was not of a type worth the heavy expense necessary to rebuild her." It is said that all the ordnance and all the ordnance stores were taken out of her; that all the stores which might be required, as well as any repairs, would be at the expense of the Dominion Government; that all the risk of taking her over must be borne by the Dominion Government. Now this was all known to us at this time. This is not my description. It is taken from the very words made use of in the correspondence between the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Treasury Department in England, and the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Dominion Government. Surely with all this before our eyes, to take the vessel off the hands of the English Government was to act the part of madmen, even though she were given as a free gift. At that time, too, the Government had been advised by our Lord High Commissioner in England, or whatever he is called, who represents this country at the Court of St. James, that it would cost £2,000 sterling to put the vessel in a sufficient state of repair to warrant her making the trip across the Atlantic Ocean. One would imagine that that would have been enough to induce that hon. gentlemen to stay their hands or to cause our First Lord of the Admiralty to make further enquiries before we entered upon an undertaking such as that entered upon in connection with this vessel. Did they do so? Not at all. They went on in what I can only characterize as the mad folly of the Government in connection with the whole matter. That is not all. With all the information they had between the 4th of October and the 22nd of November, as to the condition of this vessel, did they pause? Did they hesitate? Did they stop to enquire? Not at all. These wise men, solemnly assembled in Council, passed the following Minute of Council:—

"The Committee of Council have had before them the telegram received by Your Excellency from the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies intimating that Her Majesty's Government had presented to the Canadian Government as a gift the steam corvette Charybdis."

The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whom the telegram has been referred, recommends that the thanks of the Government of Canada be conveyed to Her Majesty's Government for this valuable gift, and that they be informed that the Government of Canada have much pleasure in accepting it. The Committee gratefully concur in the foregoing recommendation, and respectfully request Your Excellency will be pleased to communicate the same to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies. Upon the following day the Governor General is made to telegraph in the following words:—

"MY LORD,—I have the honor of forwarding a copy of an approved report of the Committee of the Privy Council, formally accepting Her Majesty's steam corvette Charybdis, and expressing the thanks of this Government for the valuable gift.

"I have, &c., LORNE."

This was upon the 23rd November, 1880. That was the known condition of the vessel when she was at sea. It turned out that when she landed at Devonport, she was in a much worse condition. The estimated cost for repairs was £2,000 to be borne by the Dominion. The hon. gentlemen had all this information before them when they passed this Minute. For months afterwards they had not—nay, up to this very hour they have not formed any plan to utilize this vessel, nor given us any definite idea as to what purpose she was to serve in connection with our public service. Four months later, on the 15th of March, 1881, while we were discussing in Parliament the Estimates, and had reached the item in connection with this vessel, the hon. First Minister admitted practically that the Government had formed no scheme as to her disposal. When challenged on the subject he said:

"Of course, before we ask for a vote for the maintenance of this training school, we are bound to be prepared with a plan for the ratification of Parliament of the description of the work we expect to perform, and the nature and extent of the tuition."

This clearly shows that the hon. gentleman had then no plan in his mind as to how this vessel was to be utilized. Captain Scott brought her back from the other side. I do not know Captain Scott, but I should judge from his correspondence that he is a cautious, prudent man. Captain Scott had this correspondence before him as to the character of the vessel. He had some respect for his own life and for that of his sailors, and was bound not to risk either in the Charybdis before making a further examination of her condition. He was not satisfied. The captain appointed an expert who makes an examination of the condition of this vessel, and let us see what it is. On the 5th of January, Captain Scott secured the services of Mr. Barbour, an engineer capable of forming an opinion on the condition of the vessel, and that gentleman sends the following letter to Captain Scott:—

"Sir,—Having been present while the four boilers of the Charybdis were tested, and observing their general weakness, obliging the pressure to be lessened sixteen to ten pounds upon the safety valves; and noticing while the testing was going on that one stay bolt and seven stay tubes gave way, and having, upon close examination of the furnaces, found numerous cracks, which require to be patched, I am of opinion that they are unfit for winter voyage upon the Atlantic."

Then, Sir, what does Captain Scott do? He communicates at once with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, telling him the condition of this vessel up to this time, and then, bear in mind, the Government were in no way bound to take it from the Imperial authorities. Captain Scott then writes the following letter which mark and digest, for it is well worthy of consideration:—

"DEAR MR. SMITH,—Mr. Barbour has, as you will see, made a report condemning the boilers; but he thinks they are quite equal to what is required for a spring voyage. He says that in bad weather we might be caught upon a lee shore, and then to have poor boilers might cost us our lives. Such arguments are unanswerable. The ship is a handsome corvette, taut spars, and looks well, but these boilers are fearful. It has caused much disappointment, but we must hope for the best. It is true that we shall effect a saving by taking the northern route in the spring, and this is better in every way. The Atlantic has been in a fearful state for many months—strong westerly gales prevailing all the time. This would have necessitated our following the southern route, and thus it would have been a long voyage."

Now, that is what Captain Scott writes, that the vessel was in a dangerous condition, that her boilers were fearful, and that if caught upon a lee shore she would endanger the lives of the crew. Now, in face of all this hon. gentleman still saw fit to go on and acquire the vessel. But that is not all. With the letters and the correspondence of the Imperial authorities before me, and with the report of those who were entrusted with the management of this vessel, let me summarize, in a few words, the condition in which this vessel was found to be in after a careful examination upon the 5th of January last, and then let me ask you, Sir, or let me ask any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House if the Government, with these facts before them, were justified in acquiring this vessel? 1st, he says it was necessary to dry dock her; 2nd, that the boilers would only last for two years; 3rd, that it was necessary to put on more repairs; 4th, that it was necessary to buy a heavier anchor for safety; 5th, that the boilers would only stand pressure of ten pounds on the safety valves; 6th, that she could only make seven knots an hour; 7th, that it required 180 men to man her; 8th, that the boilers were in a weak state; 9th, that in testing her many of the stay bolts and stay tubes gave way; 10th, that the boilers were fearful; 11th, that she could not stand a winter voyage; 12th that she would take forty days to cross the Atlantic; 13th, that if she were caught on a lee shore it would cost the men their lives. And yet, Sir, with all this before the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he still goes on for the purpose of acquiring this vessel. Now I have shown you the condition of this vessel up to the 23rd of November; I have shown you her condition upon the 5th of January, 1881, and I have shown you that even up to that time, the Government could have withdrawn from the negotiation, and need not have taken this vessel. I have shown that up to that time the estimated expense, for repairs in England, amounted to the enormous sum of £2,000 sterling; yet with all these facts before the hon. gentlemen they still see fit to go on and acquire this vessel. The conduct of the Government in this respect marks the utmost recklessness, carelessness and indifference to the public interest? Why, as I have said, there was no plan and no scheme until the day that the Canadian authorities handed this vessel back to the Imperial authorities. Sir, I have tried over and over again to get from hon. gentlemen opposite a statement of expenses connected with this vessel. I moved a resolution last Session with a view of eliciting this information, yet that information has not been submitted to Parliament in the form it should have been. Now while we are discussing this very case, which has cost the people $30,000 or $40,000—discussing the propriety or impropriety of the Government taking over from the Imperial Government a vessel that had the dry rot before she left the other side of the water, a vessel that was utterly unfit for the purpose for which she was intended—the hon. First Minister and the hon. Minister of Finance, whose duty it is to look after the financial affairs of the country, are absent from the House, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is conveniently out of his place in Parliament, showing an utter disregard by the Government to the public interests. Sir, in February last, I moved a resolution asking a statement in detail, of the expenses connected with this vessel. The Government have not submitted that statement in detail, for some reason best known to themselves, and the whole thing is concealed from the people. A search of the public records does throw light on the subject, and we gather there certain information, not because the Government are willing to give it to us, but because the Government cannot help themselves. Now, Sir, so far as I have been able to gather from these public records, they show that on the 25th of November, 1880, an Order in Council was passed for the sum of $5,000, and the High Commissioner, Sir A. T. Galt, recommended a further sum of $5,000, and that sum was transmitted before the vessel left England. I find in the Estimates of 1881 a further sum of $5,000 in connection with this vessel. In the Supplementary Estimates of 1881, I find a sum of $12,000 in connection with this vessel, and I find in the Public Accounts up to the 30th June, 1881, the sum of $9,040.77, and I do not know how much money besides these enormous sums has been paid out on account of this vessel. And what have we got for it? We have got a rotten old tub, utterly useless for any purpose, an old tub that when she arrived on this side of the water at St. John, she was an object of danger and annoyance to the ship owners in that harbor. We have got a miserable old vessel that has cost the people enormous sums of money, and what has the Government made by it? Why, Sir, they are a by-word among sensible people, and a laughing stock to the people of this country. Sir, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I advised the Government, last Session, to hand the vessel back to the Imperial authorities as soon as possible. I am told that that advice has been taken, and that now she has been handed back. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if it is true it is the only wise thing the Government have done in connection with this vessel; and I advise the Government, when they are handing this vessel back to the Imperial authorities, to send over with her a statement of the amount she has cost us, and ask them to recoup it to the people of this country.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Motion for the following Return was agreed to:—

Copies of all reports, plans, correspondence and other documents in relation to the construction of a wharf or pier at Ste. Anne, on the River Saguenay, in the County of Chicoutimi.—(Mr. Gagné.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 38) to incorporate the Rainy River Improvement Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 40) to grant certain powers to the Acadia Powder Company.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 43) to amend an Act to incorporate the Missionary Society of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate The Grange Trust, Limited.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Bill (No. 47) to revive and amend certain Acts respecting the Union Assurance Company of Canada, and to change the name of the Company to The Crown Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Wood Mountain, Qu'Appelle and Prince Albert Railway Company.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5:35 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 8th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HALL moved that the petition of Charles P. Mattock's, and others, of the city of Portland, presented yesterday, praying for an Act of incorporation under the laws of the Dominion, under the name of the Winslow Packing Company, be now read and received.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose this motion is made because the time has elapsed within which such petitions may be regularly received; and as we have decided not to make any general extension of time, I think it is absolutely essential that when a proposition of this kind is made the mover should explain to the House why the particular petition should be read and received, and the rule thereby evaded. I think, too, that the petition seems to be open to another objection, which indicates the importance of paying some attention to these rules. There was a rule laid down by one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker, as to petitions from foreigners or aliens.

Mr. SPEAKER. I remember that Mr. Speaker Anglin, in ruling out a petition from American citizens, referred to the fact that it had been decided in England that a petition which came from some residents of France, at Boulogne-sur-mer, could not be received; but, subsequently, it has been the practice here—and Mr. Anglin suggested it as advisable—that petitions from foreigners, relating to matters affected by the legislation of the Parliament to which the petition is presented, may be received. Mr. Speaker Brand has decided that such petitions may be received, on the ground that their subject matter comes within the jurisdiction of the House. This being a petition apparently applying for incorporation under the laws of the Dominion, it would appear to come within that rule, and may, therefore, be received.

Mr. BLAKE. But apart from that question, can it be received without the consent of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. No; unless with the consent of the House that the rule shall be waived, it must lie on the Table two days before it can be received.

Mr. BLAKE. But the time having expired for the reception of these petitions, the hon. gentleman proposes that it should be read and received to day. The suggestion I have ventured to make is, that the hon. gentleman should state some reason for the course which he proposes should be taken. The hon. gentleman, however, has not told us why the petition came to be so late.

Mr. HALL. I do not think there are any special reasons for asking the House to grant what appears to be an unusual indulgence, beyond the fact that the parties are not residents of the country, and therefore not perhaps very familiar with our rules. They seek incorporation by an Act of the Dominion; they supposed that their petition would not be looked upon with disfavor, and no doubt their unfamiliarity with our rules led to the delay.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will accept the statement just made by the hon. member as sufficient reason for passing the motion, viz.: that being non-residents the petitioners were not so conversant with our rules as they would be expected to be if they had resided on this side of the line. I think we ought to try and induce as many of these gentlemen to settle among us as possible, and especially those desirable settlers who are possessed of funds.

Mr. BLAKE. The name of the proposed company is not quite unfamiliar to us, and I think it probable that the parties who seek the incorporation know as much about our rules as any one. I understood the general policy of the hon. gentleman to be based on protection to Canadians, and upon giving them at least as much favor as others; but now he is proposing something different. He proposes to give greater indulgence to foreigners—to open the doors wider to other people than to our own. I am quite content to let the matter drop with this exhibition of the hon. gentleman's consistency.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I really had not the slightest idea who the petitioners were, or what they petitioned for. I merely heard when I came into the House that here was a petition which it was desired to receive one day in advance; and I think, under the circumstances, that our rules will not suffer very much if we pass the motion.

Mr. IVES. As seconder of the motion, I beg leave to say that the right hon. leader of the House is quite right—quite in accord with his own policy. One effect which it was promised the National Policy would produce, was that it would bring foreigners into this country to manufacture. Here is a proof that that promise is being fulfilled, for these men propose to come into the country to manufacture. I think they are specially entitled to our indulgence, coming, as they do, in consequence of our own policy.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT, in moving that the petition of William Vandusen Lawrence and others, praying to be incorporated under the laws of the Dominion, under the name of the Davis and Lawrence Company, be now read and received, said: I may state that the reason for the delay in this case was partly on the account of the lamented absence of Mr. Gault, the hon. member for Montreal, to whom it was originally intended to be intrusted, and partly in consequence of the delay of obtaining signatures in New York. The object of the Bill is practically the same as the one for which a petition was presented by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall), and I think it should be received for the same reason.

Mr. BLAKE. Are these persons inhabitants of the country?

Mr. ABBOTT. Some of them are.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I do not see that the precedent applies.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in moving that the petition of the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway Company, presented yesterday, be now read and received, said: My reason for asking for this indulgence is that the petition, though received at the post office on the 9th of February, was unfortunately misdirected to the hon. member for West Hastings, owing to a mistake of the clerk to whom the letter was handed for the purpose of addressing it. That hon. member, I regret to say, has not been able to be in his place in the House, and yesterday I was asked by the solicitor of the company if I had received the petition. A search at the post office revealed the error, and as soon as I obtained the petition I presented it. I hope the House will consider this a sufficient reason why this indulgence should be granted in this case.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON INTER-PROVINCIAL TRADE.

Mr. PAINT moved that the Select Committee appointed by the House to consider the subject of Inter-Provincial trade, have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Mr. BLAKE. We have, I think, of late years observed the rule that some statement should be made as to the reason why persons, papers and things should be sent for by Committees—at least persons. Very large expenditures may be incurred by a Committee under this authority, and I think the general tenor of the evidence which the hon. gentleman proposes to summon should be stated before the House is asked to assent to this proposal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was just about to say, when the hon. gentleman rose, that we ought to have such an explanation. One great objection to Committees of this kind is the expense sometimes incurred without necessity, by the summoning of witnesses who come from great distances, do very little, and cost a great deal. If the hon. gentleman in his place can state that there are special witnesses whose evidence on this subject would be of very great importance, then it is for the House to grant permission to summon persons. In England, in cases in which it is feared that the expense in summoning persons will be large, the power of the Committee is limited to sending for papers and records, leaving the Committee to take the evidence of such persons as voluntarily present themselves, or can be induced to attend and give evidence without expense. Then, I am not at all sure that it is right to grant, without some explanation, the power to report from time to time. It appears to me, from the nature of the reference, that the final report must of necessity be the result of an enquiry. I do not see how, on a subject of this kind, there can be a series of reports from the same Committee. I would like my hon. friend to state whether he expects to bring here from a distance a number of witnesses, and what number, so that the House may judge as to the expense that may be incurred by the granting of this motion.

Mr. PAINT. The Committee intend to be very judicious in their expenditure, and the witnesses will not exceed three or four in number—from Nova Scotia and the Upper Provinces. I think we shall only require to make one report.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says he proposes to call three or four witnesses from the Maritime Provinces and the Upper Provinces. May I ask whether it would not do to obtain from these persons their views by correspondence, without incurring the expense of bringing them here. It occurs to me that if the Committee begins by calling three or four witnesses, they will not stop there; and while some persons may think a trip to Ottawa, while the House is in Session, may be a very agreeable amusement, I think some good reason should be given why their expenses should be charged to the country.

Mr. PAINT. This matter will be in the hands of the Committee. I shall not take any special liberties.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), from the Select Committee to whom were referred Bill (No. 6) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanor, shall be competent as witnesses; Bill (No. 2) to amend an Act respecting procedure in Criminal Cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law; Bill (No. 4) to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases; and Bill (No. 30) to amend the Criminal Law, and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed holes cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented water, reported that they had consolidated the four Bills into one, with several amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Niagara and Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 63) to amalgamate the Presbyterian Ministers' Widows' and Orphans' Fund in connection with the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, and the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Presbyterian Church of the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland, and to create a trust to administer the said funds.—(Mr. Richey.)

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Pacific and Peace River Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 65) to amend the Act incorporating the Ontario and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 66) to incorporate the Quinze Pier Boom and Improvement Company.—(Mr. Tassé.)

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Citizens Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 68) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Bridge and Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Atlantic, Pacific and Peace River Telegraph Company.

Mr. BLAKE. Would not my hon. friend be contented with embracing the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans without taking in the Peace River?

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). To make a telegraphic company effective, it should be very extensive in its operations.

Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT (1879) AMENDMENT.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew), in moving the first reading of Bill (No. 69) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: The object of this Bill is to amend the 16th section of the Act providing for the erection of fences by railway companies. It has been held in one case, under my notice, by a Judge of the County Court, that where a notice was not given by proprietors to erect fences, the company were not liable to any damages caused to cattle or horses. As many farmers do not know that it is necessary to give the railway companies notice to erect fences, the object of this Bill is to declare that railway companies shall be liable to damages to horses or cattle whether notice was given them to erect fences or not.

Bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOM HOUSE BUILDING IN SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.

Mr. YEO enquired, Whether the Government have yet obtained a site for the contemplated Post Office and Custom House building in Summerside, Prince Edward Island; and if so, where situated, from whom purchased, and at what price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have to inform the hon. gentleman that the lot in question is situated on the corner of Fitzroyal and Somerset streets, that it belonged to Mr. Richard Hunt, that the dimensions are 140 feet by 70 feet; but inasmuch as nine feet on each street belonged really to the street and we could not get a title for it, the quantity was reduced to 139 feet by 61 feet; that the price was to be $850, but the quantity being reduced, the price was reduced accordingly to $693.

KINGS COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to enquire of the Government whether they propose going on with the discussion on this subject to-day. The matter has been allowed to stand for some time, and I suppose it ought to be disposed of in some way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will fix to-morrow positively, I will be very glad to go on with it. It shall be the first Order of the Day.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS BILL.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 3) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: The Bill of which I have the honor to move the second reading has been already introduced on more than one occasion into this House, but not to the present Parliament. It is a Bill for the purpose of constituting a court for dealing with all matters relating to railways. It is now introduced in almost the same form in which it was reported by the Special Committee to whom it was referred last Session; and, therefore, I trust that the House will be prepared to deal with it, at all events so far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, on its second reading, and that an expression of opinion will be had as to whether this Bill is one that meets with the approval of the House. The Bill proposes, in part, first to constitute a court, that court is to consist of three Commissioners, so called, who will, however, under the Bill as amended, be Judges, and will hold their office by the same tenure that the Judges of the land hold theirs, subject only to removal upon an address from both Houses of Parliament. These Judges are to be appointed, two of them, at all events, from special classes. One is to be a lawyer, one is to be a railway expert, and the other it is hoped will be, so to speak, a man of common sense, although the Bill does not make that a necessary qualification.

An hon. MEMBER. Then the Bill is not workable.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am told the Bill is not workable. I hope, on the contrary, that the leaven this third commissioner will introduce will be sufficient for the whole mass, and that his common sense will be sufficient to enable the other two gentlemen to deal with matters in a reasonable and common sense way. So far for the constitution of the court. There are to be such officers appointed as may be necessary for the proper and effectual working of the court. Then as to their powers, they will be found detailed in the Bill. They are generally to have powers of enabling and compelling railway companies to do that which—by their charters and by the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879, and by the Railway Laws of the several Provinces—railway companies have agreed to do—that is, to afford equal facilities to all, and to carry on their business in such a way as, while not being disadvantageous to the companies themselves, will be more beneficial in a public point of view than is the case, I believe, in the way railways are now worked. I will not occupy the time of the House in detailing what those powers are. They are taken very largely from the law of England, where an Act of this kind has been in force since 1874. In that year a Railway Commission was appointed, temporarily at first, namely, for a period of five years; and the working of that Commission has been found so beneficial that it has been extended from time to time; and the last report I find upon the subject recommends to the House of Commons that the court should be made permanent. Now, the first question is very naturally, is such a court necessary? Is there any necessity for adding to the courts already in existence in this country another special tribunal to deal with matters of this kind? Because if I am not able to satisfy the House, or rather if this House is not already satisfied, as I believe most of the hon. members are, that such a tribunal is necessary, the Bill ought not to be read the second time. Now, I believe such a court is absolutely necessary. Although there are laws which enact that railway companies shall deal fairly by the public, fairly by localities, and fairly by other companies, I think I am stating what is known to almost every hon. member in the House, that these laws are practically a dead letter. There is no way of compelling railway companies to do that which by their charters they have agreed to do; there is no reason by which an individual is in a position, and no court constituted, to enforce the laws of the land with regard to these large corporations. Now, many instances might be cited—I suppose we all, from our several localities, could bring instances of that kind. I have received letters and seen letters from different persons who complain very much of the grievances under which they labor, as to the manner in which they are dealt with by railway companies. I do not need to give instances in detail; though in the debate which took place on the second reading of this measure last year, the hon. member for Huron gave many instances of the kind, in addition to those I mentioned in the observations I had the honor to make to the House. One instance occurs to me at this moment, where a large corporation carries a certain kind of goods from the city of Chicago to the interior of the Province of Ontario, at a less rate than it does from one part of Ontario to another—oil cake, I think it is; that this company charges more to carry by the car load from Baden to Belleville than to carry it all the way from Chicago. Instances of that kind are numerous. Before the Committee to which the question was referred last year, several statements were made from different localities, in which it was shown that it was the practice of railway companies to carry a longer distance at a less rate, simply because, either there was some feeling or animosity against particular localities, or there was some desire to cut rates as against some rival railway company; but whatever the reason or motive may have been, the injury was done all the same, and in many instances trade was very largely destroyed. In the same way it was with individuals. I do not think there is a shadow of doubt that large dealers with railway companies obtain terms much more favorable than small dealers; that men in a position to give the railway companies some additional compensation as it were, or additional consideration beyond the charge made, have their goods carried at less rates than those who are not in that position; and in many ways the railway companies deal as if they were, as they are practically, above the law. To trace the history of this subject in England is perhaps curious; and it is more curious still, that notwithstanding the enormous number of miles of railway we have now, and the enormous amount of money the people of this country have contributed to the building of these roads—I think not very far from 33 per cent. of the whole cost—the companies have been able to exercise such an influence upon the Legislature that, practically, they remain uncontrolled and untrammelled. In England it has been otherwise. Since 1844, they have been endeavoring to deal with this subject, and in that year Mr. Gladstone introduced a Bill which, although much mutilated through the influence of the railway companies, as it is said, finally became law. It was found, however, to be wholly ineffectual for the purpose intended. In 1846, a Railway Commission was appointed, not similar to the body appointed afterwards in 1874, but a Commission with power to deal with certain matters, special cases referred to them, and with power to consider private bills on railway matters intended to be brought into the House. That, however, proved inefficient. In 1853, upon the report of a Joint Committee of the House of Lords and House of Commons, of which Mr. Cardwell was chairman, it was recommended that the Courts should have special power to deal with railway matters; and ultimately, owing to an objection made by the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Chancery to undertaking the duty, it was cast on the Court of Common Pleas which had authority to employ a referee who should be an expert; but after several years experience, it was found that this court, even with the additional power conferred by the Act of 1853 or 1854, I forget which, was wholly incompetent to deal with this complex question. The result was that, in 1874, the Railway Commission, which is still in existence, was appointed. I will trouble the House with an extract from a final report to the House of Commons, submitted at the last Session of that House in England, with respect to this subject. I remember when I first had the honor to present this subject to Parliament, it was claimed that the law in England had proved to be a failure; it was triumphantly proclaimed by the railway companies that in several instances they had, by writs of prohibition, prevented the Railway Commission from so dealing with certain matters. And that is perfectly true. It is perfectly correct that in some instances the Railway Commission had over-stepped, in the opinion of these courts, the line of their duty, and the power conferred on them by the Act of 1873. But, nevertheless, here is the unanimous report of this great Committee on the subject; the recommendations will be found on page 16 of the report, and they are summarized as follows:—

"That the Railway Commission be made permanent and a court of record. That the powers and jurisdiction of the Railway Commission be extended to cover: (A) All questions arising under the special acts of the public statutes for regulating railway or canal traffic affecting passengers or goods. (B) The making of orders which may necessitate the co-operation of two or more railway or canal companies within the statutory obligations of the companies. (C) Power to order through rates on the application of traders, but no such order to impose on a railway company a rate lower than the lowest rate of such railway company for similar articles under similar circumstances. (D) The revision of traffic agreements, both of railways and canals, in as large a measure as the powers formerly exercised by the Board of Trade. (E) The granting of damages and redress for illegal charges and undue preferences. (F) The commissioners to have power, on the joint application of parties, to act as referees in rating appeals."

So that we find the Committee of the House sitting during two Sessions—because this Committee was reappointed last Session, having made an interim report—unanimously declaring that the power of the Commission should be extended, the court made permanent, and made a court of record. They do offer suggestions, and I dare say the suggestions are an improvement, that there should be an appeal, and they point out where the appeal is to lie; and that the right of interfering with the Court of Railway Commission should be taken away. These are suggestions in the proper direction, and might be embodied in the Bill, if the House approves of its principle, of which I have the honor to move the second reading. For these reasons there can be no doubt that a court of this kind is necessary in this country. The only argument, if argument it can be called, that I have heard urged against the constitution of this court is this: It is said we are differently situated here, our railways have to compete with railways in the United States, and if they are fettered in the management of their traffic by a court of this kind, they will consequently be dealing under disadvantageous circumstances with rival through roads on the other side of the line. Well, the answer that I think it is only necessary to give is, that it is assumed the Commissioners will deal reasonably. It is not my object, and certainly it is not the object of Parliament, to injure or destroy railway companies; it is our object to make the companies fulfil their obligations to the public, and make them carry out their franchises on the terms on which their franchises were granted. So it is enough to say that Railway Commissioners can easily deal with the question of through freight so as not to injure any road carrying that through freight; but so careful were some members of the Committee last year, that there was embodied in the Bill a provision preventing the Railway Commission from dealing with matters of through freight to the prejudice of the company where there was competition. I have heard it said, and indeed it has been stated in this House, that it would be impossible to obtain efficient and impartial men to discharge the duty of Commissioners. I utterly repudiate that assertion. It is a slander on this country to suppose that not three men could be found in Canada above the suspicion of being tampered with by railway companies, no matter how rich or powerful they might be. No person ever insinuated that the Judges throughout the different Provinces were ever open to an imputation of that kind, and where Commissioners were appointed to office under the same tenure as the Judges of the land, there would be no difficulty in securing men, although they were not members of the profession to which I have the honor to belong, whose honor would not be suspected, and who would discharge their duty honestly and faithfully, although dealing with corporations of vast wealth, and determining matters perhaps prejudicially in the eyes of the managers of those companies. There may be other objections, but I do not know what they are—except the one of expense. Some hon. members may say: We have courts enough, and the people of this country do not desire the constitution of another court.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I now hear that sentiment echoed by all gentlemen from all parts of this House. All I have to say to that is this: If the grievances that the people of this country labor under with regard to the management of railways, are not greater than the cost of a special tribunal of this kind, then certainly this Bill is wholly unnecessary. If $30,000 or $40,000—which would be the outside limit of the cost of such a court—would not be a very cheap thing for the traders and the people of this country, then, Sir, I will withdraw this Bill without a moment's hesitation. I believe that instead of that, hundreds of thousands of dollars are lost by the traders and the people of this country, who have to send their goods by these railways, owing to the way in which these roads are managed, and, therefore, it is a trifle to speak of the cost attending upon the constitution of such a court. But, Sir, if the cost in the view of those who take an economical view of the matter is one which ought to be considered, why perhaps it would not be unfair to make the railway companies, whose misconduct has caused the necessity of a tribunal of this kind, bear the cost and to place a mileage tax upon them, a small tax on all the companies would be quite sufficient, thus placing the burden on the proper shoulders in the constitution of this court. For these reasons, Sir, I venture to submit this measure to the House; and I think that there will be no more sending of it to Special Committees with the ordinary fate that attends a Bill going to a Special Committee; that no time will be left to deal with it if the Bill be in the hands of a private member. I trust that the House is now prepared to deal with this important question. Numerous petitions have been presented from a great number of the counties in the Province of Ontario asking for the constitution of this court, and I believe that the members at all events from that Province have their minds made up in one way or the other as to the propriety or the impropriety of the measure I now submit to their consideration. I would like, therefore, that the matter be at once dealt with, not that I mean to say that the Bill is perfect as it stands at present, but the principle of the Bill should either be assented to or the Bill should be rejected. The matter should be brought in point of fact to the test of a vote of the House, so that we may know exactly what the opinion of Parliament is on the Bill. With these observations, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill, seconded by Mr. Haggart

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the Bill, which my hon. friend who has just sat down, has moved with so much force; but simply to state that there are certain considerations, which, I think, are not unworthy of the attention of the House. The importance of such a question as this, only requires to be mentioned to at once show how great the interest is with which the Bill of my hon. friend proposes to deal. The hon. gentleman says that the country has contributed of all the amount—the vast amount, the millions which have been expended in the construction of railways in this country, in one shape or in another—something like one third.

Mr. McCARTHY. About 33½ per cent; yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not disposed, Sir, to dispute the statement of the hon. gentleman; and the very fact the country has contributed no less than one-third of the cost of these great enterprises is evidence of the immense importance that the people of this country and the Legislatures of the country have attached to the expenditure of capital in the prosecution of such works. Now, Sir, my hon. friend has rightly said that this measure when it was first proposed in England, when first submitted to the consideration of its Parliament, when introduced by so great an authority and so eminent a man as the present Prime Minister of England, was found fraught with such difficulty and attended with such inconvenience in its operation, that it practically failed in its purpose, and that it was only by slow degrees and by long and careful consideration, and the investigation of Parliament and the public, that the measure was ultimately devised, which has been attended with any satisfactory result. My hon. friend will at once see that if in England such difficulties have been encountered in dealing with a measure of this kind, how immeasurably greater these difficulties will be in a country like our own. England is an Island, and her railway is connected with no other such system. They are in competition with no other system. It is for the purpose of carrying on business confined to the British Islands alone that the railways there are under the operation of a Commission to deal with their interests. My hon. friend has just touched the marginal point, which would place the entire railway system of this country in an entirely different position from that with which the English Parliament had to deal, when it was forming a similar measure. He has correctly said that all our great lines of railway are in close and keen competition for through traffic with lines of railway capable, with more or less conveniences alongside of us across the border of another country, of competing for the same traffic. He has himself said that he rests upon the good sense, not of the lawyer, not of the railway expert, but of the one man of common sense to be on this Commission, for the protection which the railway companies and the interests of the country shall have; but by the interference, by the ill-judged though well meant interference of such a Commission we may find ourselves limited to doing the business of our own country without reference to that great volume of through traffic that this Parliament and this country have done so much to endeavor to attract to our country. There is no doubt, Sir, that it is of great importance to do the business of the country itself, to connect the various parts of our own country one with another, and to afford railway facilities; but, Sir, it may be found that all that would be gained by the adoption of such a policy as would give an undue advantage to the great railway corporations on the other side of the border, would be not to do the business of our own people at a cheaper rate or in a more efficient manner, but to reduce the business of our lines to the local business of the country, and to impair the power of these great corporations and of these great railway companies to do the business of this country as efficiently and as cheaply as they now do it. The hon. gentleman has drawn attention to the fact and he rests his entire case on that fact of the apparent injustice of carrying goods a long distance at a cheaper rate than they are carried for a shorter distance. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman will find that all railway tariffs are based upon the principle of making great reductions for carrying goods longer distances. The terminal charges are the same in the one case as in the other, while the amount received in the one case is entirely different from that received in the other. There is another very important fact, I think, Sir, which ought to be taken into consideration in this matter; and that is this: the hon. gentleman has drawn your attention to the fact of the enormous amount of capital brought into this country, and so invited by the various Legislatures of Canada and this Parliament, and put into operation for the purpose of carrying on the business of the people. Now, Sir, no person will venture to underrate the value it has been to the people of Canada to have this capital brought into this country and so expended. The very fact, Sir, to which the hon. gentleman has drawn attention, that the one-third of this entire capital has been contributed by the Legislatures of the country, is sufficient to attest the enormous, the great importance which the Parliament and the people believe is to be attached to the attraction of capital into our country for the purpose of these railway enterprises. Now, Sir, what has been the result to capitalists? The hon. gentleman says that the railway companies have been guilty of injustice to the people of this country in the mode in which they have carried on their business; but I want to ask the hon. gentleman to point to me any institution in this country in which so much money has been invested, and in which so much capital due to the private enterprise of other countries, and so much foreign capital has been expended in a way more beneficial to our people than the capital which has been invested in our railway enterprises. I have no hesitation in saying, Sir, that let a severe snow storm paralyze the operations of our railways for twenty-four hours, and the greatest inconvenience and loss will be occasioned to our people. If that be the case, it is only a measure, and a small measure of the immense importance to the country, and the immense advantage to the country, of having foreign capital brought into Canada and expended in these railway enterprises. And with what result to the people? Have these railway corporations—which the hon. gentleman charges with injustice to the public, with having fattened at the public expense, grown rich? The hon. gentleman knows the history of all these great railway corporations from their inception down to the present hour, and he knows that the business of the people of Canada was being done at the expense of foreign capitalists whose money was contributed to the construction of these railways, and who derived little or no return—in many cases no return—from the capital which they invested. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the hon. gentleman's measure, but of drawing the attention of Parliament to the fact that it is fraught with far reaching, wide, and important consequences to the people of this country, and that we should hesitate before adopting an ill-advised, or incautious measure which may be attended with results far different from those which the hon. gentlemen desires to attain by the Bill. But there is one difficulty to which the hon. gentleman has not alluded. There is a most important consideration which I waited to hear the hon. gentleman explain to the House, but so far as I observed he did not refer to it, and that was the fact that this Parliament does not control all the railways of Canada. We control only a certain number, and a Commission appointed by the Government under the authority of Parliament would not be able to reach many of the corporations. The hon. gentleman knows that while the power rests in the hands of the Local Legislatures to give incorporation to local companies he might have a through line controlled by this Parliament hampered, embarrassed, and obstructed, by the ill-advised and ill-judged, however well meant, action of a Commission which, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, is only to have one man of common sense upon it. I say that by the ill-advised action of such a Commission he may have a through line of railway under our control embarrassed, and the railway operated in competition with a road altogether beyond the power of this House. I think, Sir, the fact of the great difference in the position of the British Commission, dealing as it does with insular railways, and a Commission such as it is proposed to create by this Bill, is one which is entitled to the very greatest attention and consideration. But, Sir, speaking of the enormous amount of capital which has been brought into this country by people outside, the hon. gentleman need not be told that the credit of Canada has suffered, that the material progress and prosperity of this country have suffered greatly from the disappointment which these capitalists met with who invested money in building works for the purpose of promoting the progress of trade and commerce through Canada. The hon. gentleman knows the effects produced by the inability of the Grand Trunk Company to realize any of the expectations held out to the British public, who furnished many millions for the purpose of constructing that great line of railway—their inability to realize these expectations with all the returns they could possibly obtain by the ablest and most vigorous management they could procure for the road. The hon. gentleman knows that the unfortunate stockholders, the people whose money had furnished us with the means of carrying on the trade and business of the country, told year after year that there was nothing for were them; that the money was gone, and that while it benefitted Canada, it was a total loss to those who had contributed the money under the expectation that they were to receive a fair and adequate return for the capital invested. Now, Sir, I say, if these railway companies have done so much good for the country, if the capitalists abroad who have invested their money in this country have done so much for its advancement and progress, we should scan with great caution, we should weigh with great deliberation, any project which is likely to be held to be a breach of faith as between the capitalists who constructed the railways and the Parliament of this country. They have entered into these engagements with Canada on the faith of Acts of incorporation, under an obligation that their rates were not to be restricted further than they are restricted by the law upon our Statute-book—unless, indeed, they were able to realize 15 per cent. on the capital invested—and I think most of them would wait a long time before their rates would be interfered with by the operation of such a provision as that. I ask whether these parties who have expended their money, in constructing the great public works of this country, are not in a position to question how far it would be a breach of faith with them to change the basis of the terms upon which these railways carry on their business. I do not wish to be understood for a moment as decrying the importance of the Bill. I know its importance, and I know how deep an interest the hon. gentleman takes in the subject, and the single eye he has to the advancement of the public good. But fraught as this question is with consequences so important to the country, it requires the utmost care and the gravest deliberation and examination, before it forms the subject of legislation by the House. I trust the proposal I made a year ago, when the hon. gentleman introduced this measure, will be accepted now, and that the Bill will be remitted, not to a Select Committee by which nothing practical could come of it this Session, but remitted to the examination of the Committee of Railways and Canals; where the parties interested, the great interests involved in dealing with such a question as this, will have an opportunity, before a very large Committee of this House, of presenting fully and fairly the objections that, in their judgment, may lie against the adoption of any particular feature of the Bill, and where, after careful consideration, this House will feel that any decision arrived at by the Committee would be worthy of confidence and support.

Mr. ORTON. Though I do not desire to advocate this Bill in any spirit of opposition to our railway enterprises, I cannot allow the discussion upon this important question to pass by without making some remarks. The hon. Minister of Railways has advanced arguments that are very strong in favor of leaving matters in the position in which they are to-day. But there are such great grievances felt by the people of this country that I am convinced that the day is not far distant when the public will demand, in no unmistakable way, that legislation upon this question must not be postponed from Session to Session. I would like to see this question discussed in this House from every point of view. The hon. Minister of Railways took the position, that Canada occupies so singular a position, that it is impossible for us to have a Railway Commission the same as that which exists in Great Britain. I do not see, however, that these difficulties are insurmountable. I do not see why the regulation of rates and other matters affecting our railways cannot be adjudicated upon by some such Commission as is proposed in the Bill. I maintain that we have in Canada men of sufficient ability and honesty to compose such a Commission. There is another reason why such a Commission would advance the public interests, and it is this: if the Commission were appointed in the spirit which I understand is contemplated by the hon. gentleman, we all know that it would be subject yearly to the review of the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled. If it is found to be an evil instead of good it will soon be remedied, and I regret very much that the hon. the Minister of Railways should throw cold water upon this measure. Year after year I have had the honor of presenting petitions from my part of the country in favor of a Railway Commission, and I feel that I would not be doing my duty to my constituents if I did not rise in my place in this House and advocate the cause of this Bill. Now, Sir, there are great and grievous wrongs committed by railway companies in Canada. I can point to instances in which not only towns and villages have been ruined, but that some of the most enterprising men in this country have been ruined by the discrimination given by railway companies, in favor of the wealthy men in the large cities and towns over the small dealers in the towns and villages throughout the rural districts; and I maintain that such a state of affairs should not be allowed to exist. We know that railway companies prefer through freight to local freight; we know that there has been in the past frequent agitation in favor of the Local Legislatures making large grants to local railways; and yet these lines are all absorbed by the large railway companies, without any protest by the Local Legislatures or by this House; and the people of Canada are to-day virtually in subjection to two great railway corporations. It is of the highest importance to the people of this country that the Legislature of Canada should do everything it can to protect the public against such a growing tyranny. Sir, why did we hear that great cry in Manitoba and the North-West during the past summer about disallowance? It is very true that the people of Manitoba have shown themselves to be Conservative to the back bone. I have travelled through that country, and I know that three-fourths of the people there are Conservatives. I know also that, in consequence of the mismanagement—I do not say wanton or wilful—of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the people of the North-West were justly indignant at the treatment they were subjected to. There was not a merchant in the city of Winnipeg, or in any of the towns or villages of the North-West, but had the same complaint to make. It turned out, however, that these complaints were due to some of the officials of the line, and not to the manager; and I have great pleasure in stating that in the latter part of the year great improvements were manifest in the management of that road. I, myself, while travelling through that country, as well as many men whom I met, received gross wrongs at the hands of that corporation; and if it once goes abroad that the Government of this country are putting their foot upon the efforts of the people to obtain justice against great railway corporations, we do not know what will be the end. While I can compliment the Canadian Pacific Railway Company upon the wonderful enterprise they have shown in the construction of that road, and while I am proud as a Canadian of the Pacific Railway contract, and believe that it was the best thing that was ever done for the North-West and the older Provinces, yet I do believe that there is some necessity for some such body as that proposed to adjudicate upon disputes between railway companies and the public. I hope that this matter will be further discussed, and the opinions of the House more fully elicited upon so important a subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad the hon. member for Simcoe has seen fit to press his Bill so far, because the opinion seems to be obtaining throughout the country that this measure is only brought forward to be shoved off from year to year. I think the argument that we have enough courts in the country is not a valid one, because there are grievances among the people that cannot be reached by the ordinary courts; it is time for Parliament to step in and provide some remedy for them. It is well known, that it is found to be impossible for individuals to fight railway companies. The power of these companies is so great, and their resources so numerous, that it is almost impossible for individuals to get justice in any dispute with them. It is true as the hon. Minister of Railways says, that the circumstances of this country may be such as to be detrimental to the efficient working of this Commission; but the Commission will take into consideration these exceptional circumstances in the decisions they may arrive at. I think the fact that a large amount of money has been given by municipalities in aid of railways in the hope of securing competition, and that as soon as this is obtained a large corporation steps in and absorbs them, is a strong argument why some redress should be granted; because, if the people appeal to the courts, they cannot prevent this operation. The Local Legislatures appear to be unable to stop it; and if the subject is brought before the Dominion Parliament, the power brought against it by these great railway corporations is so great that it is almost impossible to obtain any redress. The people in my part of the country have granted a great deal of aid to local railways. The Toronto, Grey and Bruce received $300,000 of municipal aid; the Credit Valley was almost entirely built with money voted by municipalities, and the same can be said of other roads. Most of these roads have been built in the hope of obtaining competing lines, but almost as soon as they have begun to run, they have been absorbed by the very companies they were intended to compete with; and that competition for which the people paid so dearly, has been lost to them to this day. They have remonstrated and protested in vain. It is true, the people usually elect a trustee, or have one member on the Boards of these corporations, but one member is able to do nothing for them, and they are in the same position to-day as they were years ago, before they paid for the advantages which are now denied them. The United States has dealt with this question. There are great railway corporations in that country, and an extensive border as well as here; but the matter has been dealt with successfully, in a way, I believe, that the people are able to obtain justice. In the United States, when a dispute arises between an individual and a railway corporation, the courts appear to lean towards the weaker party; but in this country, the reverse appears to be the case. For that reason, I believe, it is the more important that some means should be taken to remedy this grievance. True, many hold we have courts enough. I believe that perhaps for purposes in other lines we have. Still, if there are grievances that cannot be reached by these courts, it is time we should establish another or devise some means of remedy. The general voice of the people is in favor of a remedy. When we find railway companies enter into arrangements with private individuals, with particular merchants in towns, to carry their goods at 25 or 50 cents a ton less than the rates charged other competing and hardworking merchants in the same place, and when we find some railways charging double the mileage that other roads charge, it is high time a remedy should be devised. With reference to the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway I travelled through Manitoba and the North-West during last year, and found that the Manitoba and South-Western Railway—the only other railway doing business in that country—was really doing much greater injustice than the Canadian Pacific Railway. The South-Western charged 6 cents per mile, whether for five miles or fifty, while the Canadian Pacific Railway only charged 3 cents, the usual rate of traffic in this country. When we find these discrepancies it is time we should do something to remove them. The evil does not exist alone in that country where the railway corporation has great power. We find it also in Ontario. There we have railways running along parallel lines, perhaps ten, twenty, or forty miles alongside of each other, and we have private railway companies which have been largely subsidized by municipalities for the purpose of securing competition. Where these roads come in contact the rates are reduced to such an extent that it does not pay to carry produce from those points. The consequence is they pay scarcely any dividends on the money invested. This is due partly to the unfair war sometimes waged to compel the smaller corporations to become subordinate to, or be amalgamated with, or be bought up by, the larger corporations. I have no doubt if this court be established, as I believe it will, the overwhelming voice of the people being in its favor, these wrongs will be rectified without unduly affecting the interests of the great corporations or preventing money coming into the country for the purpose of building those lines.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I see that the operation of this Bill will not affect Government railways. The hon. the Minister of Railways has said it does not affect those railways nor the Provincial railways. I do not think the Bill can be put into operation. There is another point to which I desire also to call the attention of the House. We have already in this Dominion a number of courts. I pointed out on one occasion in this House that I could count in the Province of Quebec, from the Commissioners' Court up to the Privy Council, no less than eighteen different courts of jurisdiction. Now we are going to be saddled with another jurisdiction. I do not speak from the point of view of expense. That would be a very feeble argument; but I say the administration of justice in general must be in the hands of law courts that have the respect of the people. If you appoint three or four men—however able men of business they may be—to form a court, that court will not be vested with the dignity to carry weight in its decisions. These men may be suspected of being tempted like all other men, because the influence of these vast corporations, which to-day command the United States, is difficult to resist. Take, for instance, Vanderbilt and others who do what they like with railways, who water the stock or speculate upon it as they choose. Will these three Commissioners be always above suspicion? Granted that they be good and honest men, still public opinion will be on the watch and in some cases they will be suspected. Of what? Of rendering sometimes partial judgments. Therefore, I say, it is not a sound principle to change the jurisdiction of a minor court and put it into other jurisdiction. Leave our courts as they stand. We have confidence in the administration of justice, and they are respected. There are some dangers, of course, but, generally speaking, their administration is satisfactory. We would not have the same confidence in a court composed of three Commissioners appointed by the Government, who are not, by their Commission, bound to be legal men. I am sorry the Government does not take this Bill, to use the expression, by the horns at once, instead of dealing so tenderly with my hon. friend opposite. I am sure if the Bill were proposed by an hon. member on this side it would be taken by the horns at once and thrown into the basket.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I hope the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill will not assent to the proposition of the hon. Minister of Railways to refer it to the Railway Committee. This is the fourth time my hon. friend has introduced this Bill. On two occasions he got as far as the first reading and no further. On one occasion it received a second reading and referred to a Select Committee. If it is to be referred to a Committee at all, I hope my hon. friend will take the course which was taken last year and refer it to a Select Committee, on which there will be some wise men who may be able to dispose of any amendments that may be suggested. To refer it to the Railway Committee is practically to put an end to my hon. friend's Bill for this year. That Committee is composed of half the members of Parliament. It will take a very long time to consider the provisions of the Bill, some of which are complicated and the majority requiring very careful consideration. My hon. friend should refer it to a Select Committee. I do not propose to enter now upon any discussion of the principles of the Bill or of its different sections. The Government, I understand, do not intend to oppose the second reading. The hon. Minister of Railways sounded the warning note in saying that it was dangerous for the Legislature to pass a Bill of this kind. The hon. gentleman referred to the experience of England on that subject, and stated that for a long series of years the experiments that were made there proved practically failures; but the hon. gentleman knows that we have now the advantage of the experience of England for a quarter of a century. There almost every experiment was entered upon for the purpose of controlling in some way these corporations. It was, I think, referred first, as the hon. member for Simcoe has said, to a Committee of the Board of Trade. That was found to be a failure. It was then referred to the Court of Common Pleas, and that was found to be a failure. As a last resort, in order that justice might be done between the public and these corporations, it was deemed desirable in the public interest that a Court of Railway Commissioners should be established. Now, the hon. gentleman will find, upon reference to that report, what the Committee appointed to report upon the best mode of dealing with this complicated question said upon the subject. They said the Board of Trade was not sufficiently judicial for the purpose of investigating cases of the kind that came before that tribunal. They said the Court of Common Pleas was not sufficiently informed with respect to railway questions, and that a Parliamentary Committee was not sufficiently permanent, and that the experiments of a quarter of a century showed that the only tribunal that could properly deal with questions of this kind, would be found to be one created especially for the purpose. Now, that is what the hon. gentleman proposes to do by this Bill, and I think that is a sufficient answer to the objections made against it. The hon. gentleman then stated that my hon. friend from Simcoe bases his Bill upon the wrong committed by the railways in carrying for a longer distance at the same rate they carry for a shorter distance. Now, the hon. gentleman knows, from the line of argument pursued last Session, when this question was before the House, that that is but one of the least grounds upon which we, who are in favor of this Court of Railway Commissioners, base our proposition in favor of this Bill. Why, Sir, if that were the only objection we have to the mode in which these railways deal with the public, I, for one, would not be disposed to pass this Bill: but there are scores of other grounds, all of which I think any person conversant with the trade of the country will at once admit to be correct, and upon which we think it would be proper for the Government to consent to establish this court. The hon. gentleman says nothing about carrying for a longer distance at a less rate than they carry for a shorter distance. It is true the terminal charges are the same, it is true the handling is the same, but when you find a railway company charging for 648 charge miles a less sum for the same item of freight than they for carrying it 158 miles, we naturally conclude that there must be something wrong that requires a remedy. There are scores of other grounds upon which these railway companies have it in their power either to ruin individuals or to destroy localities, by a system of rebates, by a system of preferences, by a system of drawbacks, and all that kind of thing, so well known to these railway corporations. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows—he must have seen in the press a year ago—the charges that were made against the Grand Trunk Railway, that they carried freight from one of our western towns to the city of Montreal at a less rate for one corporation, or for one company, than they did for another company. Now, if that is so—and I am not aware that it has ever been denied—it is a gross wrong to the person whose freight has been carried at a higher figure. No doubt the hon. gentleman recollects the case in the United States of the Standard Oil Company; he knows perfectly well of the report submitted by the Committee appointed by the New York Legislative Assembly, that that company, by a system of drawbacks, got from four of the principal railway companies in the United States, the sum of $10,000,000 in one year. The same thing that exists in the United States may exist in Canada, and we know does exist in Canada, but perhaps not to the same extent. Another objection which the hon. Minister of Railways makes to this Bill is that it undertakes to deal with railways that this Parliament has no jurisdiction over. Now, no one denies, I suppose, that the Local Legislatures have the power to incorporate railway companies to do business within the limits of their Province. But I contended last Session, and I think I ought to have convinced, and did convince, every man who carefully examined the matter, that although the Local Legislatures have the power of incorporating railway companies, this Parliament alone has the power of control over the trade of these railway companies, over the freight, and especially the freight going from one Province into another, coming from the United States, or going from the Province of Ontario down through the Province of Quebec to the sea board—I say that this Parliament alone has control over every pound of that freight. I referred to a case where that subject had been decided, and where the law on the subject passed beyond the region of discussion in the United States. I referred last Session to the case of the Pennsylvania State Tax, where the State of Pennsylvania undertook to impose a tax upon freight of so much per ton passing over the railways of that State. The railways that were incorporated by that State and whose termini were within the State were subjected to this tax, and yet upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States it was held that, although the State of Pennsylvania had the power of incorporating a railway company, the Federal Government alone had the power of dealing with the freight that passes over the lines of railway from one State to another—the inter-state traffic. The same principle applies here exactly. Although a Local Legislature may give a corporate existence to a railway company doing inter-provincial trade, this Parliament alone has the power to deal with freight passing from one Province into another over their roads. I submit that this objection of the hon. Minister is sufficiently answered. As to the Bill itself, I think there is a great necessity for it. These corporations are becoming powerful, they are becoming gigantic, and we know from every day experience and what we see in the public press, that wrongs are committed which ought to be redressed, and we know perfectly well that so far these wrongs have not been rectified. It may be said there are tribunals now in existence where questions of rebates, drawbacks, unjust preferences, and unequal rates may be disposed of. We know, however, that in the whole history of Canada there has not been a single case before the courts where these questions have been disposed of. We know there is what is called the Railway Committee of the Privy Council who deal with questions in connection with railways, but nobody wants to go before that Committee. If this Bill is open to objection upon the ground that these Commissioners might be influenced by railway corporations, surely the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is open to the same objection. With all the faith one might have in that Committee, in the honesty and integrity of its members, still, I cannot say that where large railway corporations are concerned I would select, as a matter of mere choice, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council as the best tribunal before which I would go to have my wrongs righted and my grievances redressed. I think, on the whole, that the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe ought to receive the favorable consideration of the House, as I am quite sure it receives the favorable consideration of the people. I think that the Government ought to sanction its reference to a Select Committee, who would deal with the whole question, and make such amendments as the experience of the last year has shown to be necessary for the purpose of perfecting this Bill, and I shall give it my cordial support.

Mr. TUPPER. I quite agree with some of the remarks that have been made, that this is not an opportune time to go fully into the discussion of a measure which seems to present many interesting points, and many points which invite, perhaps, a lengthy and prolonged discussion. But in listening to the very interesting arguments that have been offered on both sides of the question, there was one thing which particularly struck me. The hon. member who introduced this measure, attached great importance to the fact that a precedent had been established in a country, the precedents of which are always quoted in this Legislature with great respect, and the legislation of which country, to a great extent, influences the legislation of our own. The mover of the second reading of the Bill has laid great stress upon the fact that in 1874 the Parliament of Great Britain passed a measure similar to the one now before us. It strikes me that the history of that Bill in England affords an argument that has not evidently occurred to the hon. member, an argument against the principle of this Bill. Believing, as I do at this stage of the discussion, that we in this country need to encourage in every possible way the development of our railway system, believing, as I do, that the interest of this country lies in the direction of that encouragement to a very great degree, I consider this Bill eminently fraught with the danger of discouraging that description of enterprise; and I take this lesson from the history of that legislation, that the fact that the people of England for over twenty-three years agitated this question, and that, too, in a country which, during that time, was enjoying a network of railways, shows there was a disposition not to lay a strong hand upon such works or enterprises until the railway system had been fully established. Then, I think, will be the proper time in the history of this country to discuss the question; but coming, as I do, from a Province which does not possess too many railways, and from a county which desires, from the nature of its resources, the building of as many railways as possible, I believe we are not in a position as they are in England to adopt a measure of this kind at this period in the history of the Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE. I have just one suggestion to make, and it is this: I think it is clear this measure will not make substantial progress until the Committee, whatever the Committee may be to which it is referred, deals with it after a fashion different from that in which the former Select Committee dealt with it; and I do not blame their action, because they dealt with it in the ordinary way. If the House is disposed to deal seriously with the question, it ought to summon before it representatives of the great corporations, whose interest the hon. Minister of Railways has indicated may be so seriously affected, and call on them for their statement of objections and difficulties, and of the special circumstances which he says—and in some respects, no doubt, he truly says—create difficulties in the way of this legislation; and at the same time afford an opportunity to towns and individuals who have been aggrieved, as it is said, to state what their special grievances are; that it shall be understood we are opening a Parliamentary Court, so that we may get at the bottom of the matter, so as not to be confined to declarations as to the grievances of individuals and towns, and to vague statements as to the impossibility of legislating without causing ruin to the railway corporations; but to get down to the facts, so that we can ascertain precisely what the difficulties to be removed are, and so make some practical progress towards a conclusion. The Province from which I come is now, to a very large extent, under the control of one or two great railway corporations. We have had bonus after bonus, legislation after legislation, municipal bonus and Government bonus, with the view of creating competition. Competition has gone on very largely, and there remains three or four railway companies which it is now said are very soon to follow the fate of minor corporations. That may not be the condition of affairs in other Provinces. As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) has said, there may be some Provinces and localities desirous of having railway accommodation, and which may be afraid of frightening away railway enterprises; but just legislation, legislation which can be justified as proper in the interests of the public, will not frighten away any railway enterprise. I cannot understand how it could be otherwise if we are able to show by evidence to be taken that there exists a grievance, and that we are ready to call on the corporations publicly to make their statements, and, having heard both sides of the question, are prepared to frame a measure not to do injustice to the railway companies, but to do justice to the public. I am sorry to learn from the hon. member for Pictou, that he requires so many railways, as I thought he came here direct by the Oxford and New Glasgow line.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think no measure can be satisfactory which does not embrace the entire railway system of the country; and unless the Government are prepared to place the Government railways in charge of such Commissioners, they ought not to assent to the placing of other railways in that position. That is tolerably clear. I regret that the hon. Minister of Railways did not state distinctly what the Government proposes to do. For my own part I look upon it as altogether impracticable, and as ruinous to the railway interests that they should be controlled by a Commission which could not possibly know much of railway business; and my own experience with respect to the management of the Intercolonial Railway satisfies me that it is quite impossible to carry out in its integrity the so-called pro rata system of rates, and that is the great grievance. I know cases in which a company, in order to secure traffic, encouraged the building of a manufactory at a particular spot by providing special rates for a certain term of years for the products. That, no doubt, has an appearance of injustice. Freight was carried, under that agreement, for little over half what other people were charged, but other parties were not charged exorbitant rates notwithstanding. Such interests as these are certain to arise, and cannot possibly be removed by the scheme proposed. I entertain a different opinion to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as to the danger of frightening away capital. There is nothing so sensitive as the money market, and we know that the efforts of one gigantic corporation, namely, the Grand Trunk, almost prevented the construction of the North Shore Railroad by the influence they possessed on the London money market; and if once we frighten capitalists, while we have a large railway system yet to develop, I am afraid we will find ourselves greatly mistaken as to the influence such have in the money market of England, and to which we have to look for all our loans. Under all these circumstances, while I admit there are grievances to be remedied, while I think, probably, some additional power might be given to the Railroad Committee of the Privy Council, while I am ready to support any scheme to remove actual grievances, I feel bound to come to the conclusion that the present Bill does not afford a satisfactory remedy, and that it would be unjust to the great railway system of the country, unless the Government is prepared to place the Government railways under the same management.

Mr. HAGGART. The system which is proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is one which has received general consideration throughout nearly the whole of America. It is the system which is in force in Illinois and Massachusetts, and one of the most interesting works I ever read on this subject was by a member of the Railway Commission of Massachusetts, Mr. Adams. So far from stockholders or parties interested in railways through such Commissions being opposed, they are favorable to them in the United States. The publicity given by Commissions to the proceedings of the companies acts as a check on railway managers, and stockholders are largely interested in having that check. It is, moreover, the system which prevails in England. A general measure was introduced into the Congress of the United States similar to this, and there is an agitation over the whole Union in favor of such a measure. There can be no possible objection taken by railway companies to the present Bill. Its object is not to interfere with rates, but only to provide for a fair adjustment of rates between different points; and the objections which I have heard stated to the Bill, should not carry much weight, as the system seems to be very favorably viewed throughout the United States, and in every other country where it has been adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of attention to the discussion which has taken place on this measure. I certainly think that the public are very much indebted to the mover of this Bill for bringing a question of so much importance under the consideration of Parliament. Whether his Bill is one which would remedy the difficulties which are met with, and remove the obstacles the public suffer under, or not, is, however, a question I am in very grave doubt about; and I am not so clear, that if the Bill passed as it stands, it would meet even the views of the hon. gentleman himself, who is the mover of the Bill; but this I will say, that the public requires some measure to be taken to stop the wholesale slaughter now going on on the railways of this country, and the inefficient management under which they are running. Sir, we cannot take up a newspaper, no matter from what part of the country it may come, but we find cases of collision, cases of railways running off the track, and of people being killed. Why, in the last eight and forty hours a gentleman arrived in Ottawa who told me that the Pullman in which he rode was upset and thrown head over heels off the track of the Grand Trunk. Sir, this thing is occurring too frequently. I hold that the Government of the day are responsible, in some measure, for not looking after this matter; and if they do not look after it, then I think that the measure of the hon. gentleman who has submitted this Bill is one that may, by reference to a Special Committee to consider it, relieve the difficulties under which we are laboring. I was a little surprised that the hon. member for West Durham—who is so ready to make puns in this House, and to utter witticisms at other people's expense—did not state whether he was in favor of this Bill or not. He comes from a country constituency, but he only spoke of one grand railway system, which was swallowing up every other railway, and was likely to swallow up some others besides those already known; but he did not give an expression of opinion as to whether or not this swallowing up should be allowed. I took up the Canada Gazette to-day, and I find in it a notice of a meeting to be held in London, by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, asking authority for what? To pay off the £3,111,500 sterling, twenty years interest which they owe to this country? No, Sir; but to ask to be empowered by the stockholders to purchase the bonds of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, to purchase the stock of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company, to purchase the stock of the Northern Railway Company, and to purchase the stock of the Atlantic and Ottawa, and St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Companies—entering into these four speculative enterprises with the public money of Canada owed for twenty years, and which they ought to pay. These are subjects which should be dealt with; and though I may not be directly in order in so speaking with relation to this Bill, I think that the very necessity which calls for the submission by the hon. gentleman of this Bill to the House, also calls for the taking up of the whole question of the railway system of this country, and I for one am prepared to support any motion for the appointment of a Special Committee to do so; and if nobody else moves in the matter, I pledge my word that I will move in it, though I do not get a single seconder to the motion, to have the whole subject of the railway system of this country taken up and considered by a Special Committee of this House. The duty we owe to the country calls for it; the lives which have been sacrificed, the property which has been destroyed, and the public confidence which has been disturbed, all demand, that if the Government do not do it, at least the members of this House should do it, that they should take up, and have this whole subject dealt with by a Special Committee, which should be appointed with power to send for papers, persons and records, and also for the managers of these railways, who should be brought up and examined before the House under oath, as to whether any means can be adopted to stop the wholesale slaughter which is going on. Sir, I am not prepared to say that I will support this Bill; but I would support its reference to a Committee. Hon. gentlemen may laugh if they like.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say again, I am not prepared to say that I will support this Bill; but I will support the reference of it to a Committee, and I will approach that Committee with the view of endeavoring to make a Bill that will endeavor to afford security to the lives and the property of the travelling public, and the restoration of that confidence which is not now felt by those who enter the cars of the railways of this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this Bill. I merely rise to answer the allusions made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The hon. member for Northumberland makes a wholesale charge respecting the management of the railways of this country—a charge made here in this House and going to the country, which indicates that these railways are badly managed and ought to be made the subject of a Parliamentary investigation. I think, Sir, that so far from this being the case, we have great reason to be thankful that these roads are kept and managed as well as they have been during the great inclemency of this winter. I believe Sir, that the management of the great Canadian railway lines is as good as the management of any line on this continent; and I think that it is quite unworthy of the hon. gentleman to make the imputation with regard to their management, which he has here uttered. It is an imputation which requires an answer on the floor of the House, and I, for one, disclaim any belief in the correctness of the assertion made by the hon. gentleman, and believe that our railways are well managed; and that it is greatly to the credit of the management of these roads that they have been run with the degree of regularity with which they have been running during the past winter. I merely rose for the purpose, Sir, of calling attention to this unjust attack, in my opinion, on the management of Canadian railways.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let me ask the permission of the House to read a notice of another smash-up on the Grand Trunk Railway, an account of which has just come into my hands. If the House permits I will read it, as follows:—

"RAILWAY SMASH-UP.—The Grand Trunk knocks a Toronto, Grey & Bruce train into smithereens—"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, if you do not want to hear it, all right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I think that the general feeling of the House is that this Bill should be read the second time. It is, as has been already stated, a measure of the very greatest importance, affecting great interests and vested rights—affecting the rights of corporations, and also the whole trade and commerce of the country. This question has been before Parliament for a great many years. It was introduced year after year by an hon. member of the old Parliament, now no more, who pressed it on the consideration of the House. It may be that my hon. friend from Lambton, then at the head of the Government, then expressed the same sentiments as he has to-day: that such a system was unworkable. I am not at all sure, however, Sir, that it is unworkable. We have now a Railway Committee—a Committee of the Privy Council. We have a Commission working in England, and we have the same machinery working in the United States. At the same time, everybody must feel the great weight to be given to the warning note which has been uttered by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, who has given this subject full consideration. The Bill will be read a second time, and I hope—indeed, I believe, and I am sure, that this is the general opinion of the House. I would recommend my hon. friend, who has charge of the Bill, and who has pressed it with so much ability and perseverance on the consideration of Parliament, that after it is read the second time it should go to the Standing Committee on Railways, and I think that it is only by doing so that he has a reasonable prospect of getting the Bill through Parliament this year, in some shape or another. We in the Canadian Parliament have been for many years in advance of the Parliament of England. The British Legislature last year, however, adopted the system of Grand Committees and returned to the old Parliamentary system which has existed for years with us. England has found out the system of Grand Committees to be necessary; and I must say that if there is any steadiness in our railway legislation, it has been in consequence of the calm and deliberate discussion, which railway measures have met with at the hands of our Grand Committee—the General Committee on Railways. I quite agree with the hon. member, the leader of the Opposition, that all these great interests, who are apprehensive, perhaps needlessly apprehensive, that such a measure as this would injure their vested interests, should have every opportunity for placing their views respecting this legislation before that Committee. If this measure goes before the General Committee on Railways parties can be heard, their counsel can be heard, or their agents and evidence can be heard. In this Committee, composed of a large number of hon. gentlemen acquainted with railway matters and especially with railway legislation, the evidence can be heard and the statements and arguments against the Bill, and then hon. gentlemen will be able to approach it with a full understanding of all the arguments pro and con. This is the advantage which I think will be gained by sending the Bill to that Committee, that members of the Committee will have an opportunity of hearing this evidence, and if any hon. gentleman, who does not happen to be a member of the Committee, but is interested in the subject, he will no doubt be present to hear the evidence. To my mind it is infinitely more advantageous for the purpose of arriving at a clear understanding of the subject, to hear the evidence delivered, than to hear it as it may be reported from a Special Committee. It may be that after the general principles of the Bill are admitted, the Railway Committee, as is commonly the case, may decide that a sub-Committee should be appointed for the purpose of going into the measure clause by clause. If that course be adopted, so far as my influence goes, I can assure my hon. friend that he will have every opportunity, even on Government days, of laying the results of the report of the Committee before the House. One cannot disguise from one's self that there is a growing feeling in the country in favor of legislation on this subject. At first, when Mr. Oliver, the hon. member for North Oxford, pressed this matter upon the attention of Parliament, there was little response to his appeal, but by slow degrees, and through various agencies, public attention has been called to it, especially, I know, in the Province of Ontario. And there is a feeling that some legislation of some kind is required. Whether the system which is embodied in this Bill, is the best, I, not being an expert in railway matters, will not be presumptuous enough to say; but I have a perfect assurance in my own mind that there is an earnest desire on the part of the people of this country, or of certain large sections of this country, for some legislation on the subject. I shall certainly vote for the second reading; and I hope the hon. gentleman will accept my suggestion to refer the Bill to the Railway Committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield with very great reluctance to the suggestion of the hon. First Minister that the Bill should be referred to this large Committee—to the Railroad Committee. I believe it would be quite possible so to obstruct the business of that Committee by the Private Bill legislation which properly appertains to the Railway Committee, that if this Bill is referred to it, we will not be able to make any advance. It will not be at all impossible to talk out the Bill in the Committee, because there is in this House and outside the House, beyond all question, a strong opposition in railway interests to this measure; and I repeat that it will not be at all impossible to talk out morning after morning and waste the time of the Committee so that it will be impossible to consider this Bill. The principle of the Bill is admitted; I have heard no argument against it; have heard no person say that there are no grievances; I have heard no hon. gentleman say that grievances such as the country labors under with regard to railway matters, are properly adjustable in the courts of the land. If that be so the Bill should be accepted as it is and sent to a Select Committee, and the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham might be acted upon, that the Committee should have power to send for persons papers and records, and so be able to hear the amendments for and against the details of the measure. However, if the hon. First Minister thinks the course he has suggested, notwithstanding what I say, is the best one, I desire to tell the hon. gentleman that the responsibility should be his and not mine. The suggestion is made by the hon. member for North Grey that the country believes I am playing with this measure, that I am bringing it in in the interests of the railways rather than in the interests of the public; that I am taking this course rather for the purpose of obstructing legislation on the subject than anything else, and I admit if I were to agree to what is proposed to be done with the Bill some color would be given to that suggestion. I do not desire to lie under that imputation. I believe firmly and honestly in this measure, and I desire to press it so that it may become law. Great difficulties are always found by private members in carrying through measures of this kind. We know, but the public do not know, that in the latter part of the Session the days which belong to private members in the early part of the Session are taken by the Government, so that there is no possibility of carrying through a measure of this kind without the assistance of the Government. I leave the matter, however, to the leader of the House and to his responsibility. In answer to the Minister of Railways, and in corroboration of the views of the hon. member for Huron, I may say that I entertain no doubt that this House, and this House alone, has the power to deal with all matters with respect to railways—I mean matters of trade and commerce, the regulation of rates and so on—and that local railways are subject to the jurisdiction of the House in that regard, just as the insurance companies incorporated by this House are subject to laws passed by the Local Legislatures, so our local railways, or railways incorporated by Local Acts, are subject to the laws of this House dealing with rates, traffic arrangements, and so on. With regard to the suggestion that Government railways should be subject to the Commission, it is to be remembered that railways governed by the Railway Department are subject directly to the control of this House. I would prefer such railways being subject to the control of the Commission—and it is curious to notice how the fact of a man having been a railway manager even for a time affects him; even the hon. member for East York holds the view that these railways should not be controlled—I say I would prefer that Government railways should be under the control of the Commission, but there is this to be said, that if anything improper is done in the public interest, the Department of Railways, through the Minister of Railways, is responsible to the people's representatives in this House, so that there is a check upon him which does not exist with regard to ordinary corporations. Having said this, I leave the matter just as the hon. First Minister prefers to deal with it, and if he adheres to the notion that the Bill should be referred to the Railway Committee, I will endeavor to do all I can to help it through; but I expect, as I have said already, that it will only be with the greatest difficulty that the Bill will be dealt with by that Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. I think my hon. friend's observations as to the result of this reference will be found to be perfectly correct, unless a particular line is taken with the Bill. I believe the general principle of the Bill might be made the subject of one discussion in the Committee, and immediately after there might be a reference made to a sub-Committee, to take the evidence. I do not agree that evidence should be taken before the whole Committee, but at a place and under circumstances which will enable all members to attend who choose. We have an enormous number of railway Bills already before that Committee, and it is a very difficult thing to examine witnesses before a Committee with so many members. If, therefore, you are going to make practical progress with the measure in the way to which I have referred, namely, getting down to the evidence, I think there should be an early reference to the sub-Committee for that purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That, however, is for the Committee to settle.

Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5.50 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 9th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 70) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Western Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the "Montreal and Western Railway Company."—(Mr. Abbott.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Great North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund, of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, for Manitoba and the North-West.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 76) to amend the Act intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Northern, North-Western and Sault St. Marie Railway Company," and to change the name of the said Company to the "Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Company."—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 77) to fix the rate of interest in Canada.—(Mr. Catudal.)

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. WELDON, in introducing Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act passed in the forty-fifth year of the reign of Her Majesty, intituled: An Act to repeal the duty on promissory notes, drafts and bills of exchange, and to declare the law relating to stamps on promissory notes and bills of exchange, said: The object of the first section of this Bill is to allow a court or Judge to admit a promissory note as a valid instrument, even though it is not double-stamped, provided it can be shown that the circumstances were such that the note would be valid on the payment of the double charge. By the thirteenth section of the Stamp Act, the maker of an unstamped or insufficiently stamped note can make it valid by the payment of a double duty. There is a question whether this provision is in force. I understand that a decision has been given in an Ontario County Court that the double-stamping of a note has no effect. In addition, there is now a difficulty of obtaining stamps, and that difficulty is increasing every year. The second section is merely to remove a doubt that has been raised as to whether that provision of the Stamp Act relating to the exemption of cheques on chartered banks, post office orders, and municipal debentures with the coupons attached thereto, applies also to debentures issued by a company. I do not think it was the intention that they should be stamped, but considering the large number of such debentures which are issued that doubt should be removed. These are the two objects of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day being called, the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Huron) relating to the King's County (P.E.I.) Election, was resumed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of my hon. friend who moved this resolution, with a great deal of interest. He argued the case very well, and I am not prepared to gainsay altogether, or perhaps at all, the doctrine that, as a general rule, a returning officer is bound to return the person having the majority of votes; but I would simply state that it is a question involving a matter of law, which the majority of this House cannot be expected to enter into without considering that such questions require to be studied before there can be an intelligent action taken upon them. For the purpose of informing the House on important subjects of this kind, we have for many years appointed a Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, which Committee has always, in my experience, been selected from men of experience in parliamentary practice and constitutional law. I think that the Committee on Privileges and Elections which has been appointed this Session is a very good Committee. It is formed without reference to political proclivities, and embraces those hon. members who are most cognizant with the subject. This is not a political question at all. I think we can fairly agree on that. Under the circumstances in which the House is placed, it is not a political question at all, and it is desirable it should be considered fully by this Committee, and that on their report this House should lay down some rule. Whether the rule should be, as suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, that there can be no cases in which the returning officer has any discretionary power at all, is a question of very great importance, whether there can be supposed to be any case in which he has a right to exercise his judgment, or whether he must, in all cases, return the person who has a majority of votes, ought to be settled. The general rule is clear that the person having the majority of votes ought to be returned, but there may be exceptions to that rule. For instance, if a woman had the majority of votes, would the returning officer be obliged to return her as being the representative to sit in this House? In the present case the sheriff of the county was the returning officer. Supposing that in his custody at the time of the election there was a felon disqualified, and known by the returning officer to be disqualified, is he obliged to return that felon? So we can suppose the case of an alien who says to the returning officer: "I am an alien; I know I am disqualified, but I am going to test the question. I am going to show how popular I am and will be elected,"—is the returning officer obliged to return such a person? These are questions that arise in one's mind and I think ought to be settled, because, even of late days, the doctrine has been laid down in England, during the passage of the Ballot Act, that the returning officer has not forfeited altogether the judicial character he used to have. I have not compared the English Act with ours in regard to the duties of returning officers, and those who have studied the subject know that by degrees the judicial discretion which formerly was supposed to belong to the returning officer has been diminished, and he has become more and more an executive officer. Whether he shall be altogether an executive officer, under no circumstances to exercise his discretion or judgment, has not yet been finally settled. No wrong can happen by this matter being sent to our own Committee, selected especially for that purpose. I shall move that this be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I find it laid down in the English books on this subject, and will quote "Cunningham on Elections," who uses this language:

"Again, when a disqualified candidate obtains a majority of votes, it is thought to be the better and safer course to return such candidate, together with the candidate or candidates according to the number of vacancies who come next to him in the number of votes. And there is no question that where there is any doubt as to the fact of the disqualification, it would be much safer to follow this course, than either to return the candidate alleged to be disqualified to the exclusion of another, or, on the other hand, to return another candidate to the exclusion of him alleged to be disqualified; for though returning officers do not seem to have ever been censured where they returned a person subsequently unseated as being disqualified, still, as the 31 and 32 Vict., c. 125, s. 48, enacts that any sheriff or returning officer who shall wilfully delay, neglect or refuse duty to return any person who ought to be returned, shall be liable to double damages with full costs, at the suit of any person whose return has been wilfully delayed, &c., provided it is determined on the trial of a petition that such person was entitled to have been returned; a single return really exposes a returning officer to serious liability in case it should be held that the omitted candidate should have been returned. * * * On the other hand, however, when the disqualification is clear, as where the candidate is, beyond all doubt, a rumor, or is known to have been found guilty of a disqualifying offence within the time during which the disqualifying offence continues, and where, to the knowledge of the returning officer, the fact of such disqualification has been duly and sufficiently brought to the notice of the electors, and in time to cause a number of votes to be thrown away sufficient to give the qualified candidate a majority—in such a case there appears to be no doubt that the returning officer would be justified in returning the qualified candidate only; for in such circumstances the return would scarcely be complained of, and, if it were, would be supported by a Judge or by the House. But where there is a doubt either as to the sufficiency of the notice, the returning officer may either return the candidate who appears to him to have the majority of legal votes, or, for the reasons above stated, may make a double return of the candidate alleged to be disqualified, and of the candidate or candidates, as the case may be, who stand next at the poll."

This is the doctrine laid down by the latest writer on the subject in England. I do not at all mean to say, in any comparison with the English Act and our Act, that the cases are identical as to the duty of returning officers. But I say that, under the circumstances, we should refer this to the Committee officially selected by the House for the purpose of deciding such questions. No delay will be caused, for it is a simple question as to whether the returning officer has any discretion; and if he has, whether the question ought to be dealt with by the House summarily in this way or select some other mode. I beg to move in amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"the Return transmitted by Michael McCormack, Returning Officer for the Electoral District of King's County in the Island of Prince Edward, at the last Election for the said Electoral District, together with all papers attached thereto, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report thereon with all convenient speed."

Mr. DAVIES. I am sorry that the hon. leader of her Government has made up his mind to move to refer this matter to a Committee, because I think it is establishing a precedent which will be found to be in direct antagonism to those precedents which were cited by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). In eight or nine precedents which he quoted I think he showed that the practice of Parliament in this matter had been consistent almost from the beginning, and that with the exception of one case—the West Peterborough case which he distinguished from the others—that practice had always been for Parliament at the earliest opportunity to insist that the returning officer should discharge just simply the duty which Parliament had imposed upon him; that he should not arrogate to himself any duty which the Act did not give him, and not attempt in any way to alter or change the vote which the majority of people in the district had polled. Now, if the House had, in the first instance, yielded to the motion made by the hon. member for West Huron, and had corrected the return made by the returning officer of King's County, establishing that the returns should be consistent with the majority of votes polled by the people, and that the man who received such majority should take his place in this House; and then if that motion had been followed up by a supplementary one similar to the one made by the hon. leader of the Government, I do not know that there would have been much cause of complaint. But the great objection to the motion is this: that instead of proclaiming clearly and distinctly that which Parliament has already proclaimed in the Statute law, that the duty of the returning officer simply is to return to this House the candidate who has received the majority of votes, the motion of the right hon. gentleman would amount to a declaration that the House is not sure whether that is the duty of the returning officer or not; that we are not satisfied whether he is acting within the scope of his powers when, instead of returning the man with the majority of votes, he sends in a special return, or a return that the minority man was elected. Now, I ask what would be the effect of that resolution if carried? In the first place, it will be to induce returning officers to believe that they may deviate from the mandatory language of the Statute that they may act as political partisans, and may return from time to time, not the majority man but the minority man. The consequence would be that at any new Parliament we might find here, not the people's representatives as chosen by them, but perhaps ten or twenty instances of minority men who had taken their seats by virtue of the will of the returning officer. What would be the effect supposing the Government of the day and the Opposition were very evenly balanced? The effect would be simply this: that the Government might have a majority obtained, mark you, not by those who were elected by the people to represent them, but by those whom the people returned to stay at home, and they might hold on to the Government, not for a week or a month, but while the cases of these twenty gentlemen who were illegally sitting in the House were pending before an Election Committee. I am glad to hear the right hon. gentleman say that this matter is to be discussed entirely apart from political feeling because in the present condition of parties in this House it really amounts to very little whether Dr.

Robertson takes his seat or Mr. McDonald takes his seat, compared with the importance of the principle involved. This question affects not merely the rights of the electors of King's County, but it affects the seat of every hon. gentleman here, no matter on what side of the House he sits. What is Dr. Robertson's case to-day may be the case of another hon. gentleman to-morrow, and a partizan returning officer may return, as I stated before, the candidate he sees fit to return, irrespective of the vote which may have been cast by the electors of the district. Now, I submit that if there was a fair, honest and reasonable doubt as to the powers and duties of a returning officer, then this House might be justified in referring it to a Special Committee to report upon. But if, on examination of the Act, we find that it admits of but one construction, if on examination of the precedents we find that they all run one way, and that practice and authority both combine to point out what our course should be, and if that course is consistent with that natural justice which must be apparent to the mind of every reasonable man, then I say we ought not to hesitate. Now, what is that natural justice? It is that the man who has received a majority of the votes should be returned. What does the Act say? What do the precedents say? They all say that the House, at the earliest moment after an election, shall amend any illegal returns that may have been made by returning officers. But we have gone further than that. The House has not merely affirmed that they were to follow the Statute, but it has passed resolutions severely censuring returning officers who made a return other than that which the Act prescribed. The House has censured his conduct as illegal, censured it as being in defiance of law, censured it as being subversive of the rights of the people, and censured it as being in antagonism to the privileges of this House. In the South Oxford case to which my hon. friend referred, we find that, after the House had remedied the wrong committed by the returning officer and had placed in his seat the gentleman who had received the highest number of votes the House went further, and determined that the returning officer who had acted improperly should have put on record the opinion of the House against him, and that record reads as follows:—

Resolved, That the House having heard the evidence addressed on the part of John George Vansittart, Esq., in defence of his conduct as returning officer for the County of Oxford at the last General Election, adheres to its resolution of the 21st March last. That the said John George Vansittart, Esq., having taken upon himself to return Peter Carroll, as member for the said County, to serve in the present Parliament, contrary to the majority of votes received by him on the poll books in favor of the Hon. Francis Hincks, who ought therefore to have been returned, acted illegally, in defiance of law, in manifest violation of the rights of the freeholders of the said county, and in breach of the privileges of this House."

But they went further than that, as if to establish a precedent which should be a guide to all returning officers in future:

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to prevent the said John George Vansittart, Esq., from being Inspector of Licenses for the District of Brock, as a warning to others who shall hereafter fill the very responsible office of returning officer."

Not only was he censured for his illegal conduct, but a resolution was put upon the Journals as a warning to returning officers in the future; and it seems this particular officer has not seen fit to take warning by the censure formerly passed upon the returning officer in the South Oxford case. Now, if all the precedents point in that direction, and if, when we turn to the Statute, we find there can be no reasonable doubt as to what the Statute says, I would ask upon what principle should we refuse to allow Dr. Robertson to take his place? He has received a large majority of the votes, and we have nothing before this House, no evidence of any kind, to justify the House in believing that Dr. Robertson was disqualified. The returning officer had no power to take any evidence;

Mr. DAVIES.

he did not attempt to take any. He did not state to the House that he knew, of his own knowledge, that Dr. Robertson was disqualified; he merely reported to the House—and I call attention to the exact words of this return—"that it had been represented to him by seven electors of the county that Dr. Robertson was disqualified." I put it to any hon. member if he would think it fair or just, if, after he had been elected by a majority of sixty-two for his riding, the returning officer, acting on the simple assertion of seven electors, should refuse to return him to the House. It is a monstrous proposition, and I maintain that the conduct of the returning officer was illegal, and an infringement of the rights of the people who were commanded to choose a representative to send to this House, and was fraught with very evil consequences, and should be condemned, not by one political party, but by the unanimous voice of the House, at the first opportunity. Perhaps the right hon. leader of the Government may not have been able to give attention to the return, and to the facts laid before the House, which are to be found in Votes and Proceedings, (No. 12), but if he will refer to them he will find that not a scintilla of evidence of any kind has been given by the returning officer, as within his own knowledge, pointing to the disqualification of Dr. Robertson. Supposing twenty or thirty of these cases had occurred—and it is not impossible to suppose such an event, unless the returning officer's conduct be now condemned—let us see what the result would be. The Dominion Elections Act of 1874 gives a discretion to returning officers in the matter of receiving nomination papers, and it provides distinctly that, in certain cases, the nomination papers shall be illegal and may not be received by the returning officer; and it goes further, and provides that, if he rejects any nomination paper, he shall return the reasons why he rejected it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, so that the party aggrieved may have an opportunity of bringing the case before the proper Election Court. But when the Act comes to deal with the returning officer's duty, after the nominations have been received, after the people have been given an opportunity of voting for the candidates, then the Act is particularly careful to deprive him of any power whatever. He has not even the powers of a deputy returning officer. The latter has certain judicial functions, for he can reject a ballot paper as illegal; but the returning officer does not count the ballots, has nothing to say as to whether they are legal or illegal, but has simply to add together the number of votes given to each candidate, according to the statements contained in the ballot boxes returned by the deputies. He dare not, as every member knows, open any of the envelopes contained in the ballot boxes sealed by the deputies, but he has simply to add up the returns and declare the candidate, who has the highest number of votes, elected. No language can be plainer than that contained in the Act; still the House is asked, in the face of this plain, distinct language, to assume there is a grave doubt as to whether the returning officer should not exercise a judicial discretion. What are disqualifications? If the hon. First Minister's reasoning be acceded to, it comes to this: that every returning officer can say to a candidate: "It has been represented to me that you have entered into a contract with the Government." That is a disqualification. The returning officer may have no means of knowing the fact, he is not authorized to take evidence; in this case he did not; he cannot take an oath, and cannot constitute himself a court. He, however, simply says: "It has been represented to me that you have a contract, or are surety for a contractor, and therefore I will not return you." Is there any hon. gentleman who will accede that such a proposition is reasonable? It is in direct defiance of the express language of the Statute, which says that the returning officer, having added up the votes shall then declare the candidate having the highest number of votes, duly elected. The sixtieth section of the Act which was amended by the Act of 1878 goes on to declare that the candidate having the largest number of votes shall be duly elected; but it goes further, as if to provide that the returning officer shall return nothing further than the fact that the law directs him to return, namely, that a certain candidate has the largest number of votes, and prescribes a form, and says he shall return it in form "S" of the Act. This returning officer has thrown the Act, the form, and everything else at defiance, and declared in so many words that he would not return the candidate who had a majority, because he imagined, or at least he did not imagine, but seven other people told him they imagined, that Dr. Robertson might be disqualified, and he will not therefore return him to his place in Parliament. I submit there should not be, that there cannot be any reasonable doubt whatever as to the construction of the Statute, and if no reasonable doubt exists, the course of the House is clear; that in conformity with all precedents, we should adopt the resolution of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). He quoted the case of West Peterborough—the hon. leader of the Government did not refer to any precedents—but in that case, if the facts be examined, it will be seen there was some show of reason for referring it, because the argument of the right hon. gentleman, and I looked at his speech, was this: that there was at that time elected by ballot from amongst the members of the House a sworn Committee which could judge more fairly and impartially of the facts than the House itself could do. In this case there are no facts to refer to a Committee. What does the right hon. gentleman wish to refer? There is no contradictory evidence, such as there has been in some cases. There is no fact to go to the Committee, except the fact that Dr. Robertson had the higher number of votes of the two candidates in question; and if there is no contradictory evidence, and no fact in dispute, what did the right hon. gentleman want to refer? It is only on the assumption that great doubt exists as to the meaning of the Statute, that the return should be referred to a Committee, and I submit, under that Statute, there is no doubt whatever. The hon. gentleman has argued that there must be discretion vested in the returning officer in cases of an alien, woman or felon; but I repudiate that the returning officer has a discretion as to determining whether a candidate is a felon or not. How is he going to determine the point? No machinery is provided for his taking evidence; he cannot accept the statement as a fact. If he ever attempts to exercise judicial power it must be when the nomination paper is placed in his hands. If he does exercise it then, he has to return the papers with his reasons, but after he has received the papers and the candidates are before the people and the votes have been taken, then he has simply to return the candidate having the highest number of votes to Parliament. I desire to call attention to the fact that the extract read by the right hon. leader of the Government refers to the case of a double return; but that cannot have any application to Canada, because I submit that, under our Dominion Election Act, no such thing as a double return can be made. I repeat that no double return can be made, for our Act distinctly provides that if two candidates have an equal number of votes, the returning officer, not "may" but "must" give the casting vote in favor of one of the candidates, and must return him as elected. We need not, however, discuss theories, there is no double return here; there is simply a special return from which it appears that Dr. Robertson had the majority of votes, and therefore must be returned. I will just call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the law as it has been laid down by a very eminent authority in England, respecting cases of this kind. The Prime Minister of England, in a discussion on the Tipperary Election, laid down that it is not consistent with the dignity of Parliament to refer these matters to a Committee, in cases where the matter is free from fair and reasonable doubt; and I submit that if the hon. members of this House have come to the conclusion that the Statute does not admit of reasonable doubt, they must support the motion of my hon. friend from Huron. Mr. Gladstone on this matter said:

"If this were a case in which, after the best investigation we can make, we thought that any good, fair, or reasonable doubt attached to the facts or the arguments of the case, or as to the course which the House ought to pursue, then I admit it might be the subject of a reference to a Committee, especially if the question were one which involved the examination of a long and complicated series of precedents, such as it would be difficult to bring under the view of the House in debate. But, Sir, in our view, it is neither the one nor the other. The facts of the case are the fewest as possible, and the principles applicable as clear as can be brought to bear on any question of Parliamentary discussion, and I would submit that if that be the case, a proposal to enquire, instead of a proposal to act, would not be becoming the dignity of this House."

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this language is directly applicable to the case before us. We have the right to protect our own privileges; we have the right to say that the voice of the people, when proclaimed as it has been in this case distinctly and clearly, shall be given effect to. We have the right to protest against the illegal action of this returning officer, and to condemn him, not only for his illegal act, but also in order that it may serve as a warning to other returning officers in the future; and we have the right to declare—and I submit that it is our duty; and after consideration, I hope the House will find it to be its duty—to declare that Dr. Robertson having received the highest number of votes, is entitled to take his seat; and having taken his seat, it will then rest with the House to determine whether it should afterwards refer to the Committee the consideration of the fact, whether he is qualified or disqualified.

Mr. BRECKEN. Mr. Speaker, I admit, with my hon. colleague, that the sound constitutional rule is that the duties of the returning officer are ministerial, and not judicial. I further admit that it would be desirable for all tribunals, parliamentary or legal, as far as possible, to give decisions that would be the reflex of the voice of the people, but I cannot agree with all the remarks which have fallen from my hon. colleague; and indeed, I would say, that the situation he has just now made in quoting the opinion of one of the most eminent Parliamentarians—Mr. Gladstone—is rather in favor of the contention of the right hon. gentleman, than of the position which my hon. friend has taken. If I heard him read that quotation correctly, it was to the effect that if any doubt existed—any bond fide doubt—as to the merits of a case, it would become Parliament to refer that case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but if it was clear, if they were called upon to act and not to think, not to reflect on the matter, then it was the duty of Parliament to instruct the returning officer to amend the return, and return the man who had the majority of votes. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the case before you to-day? It does not become me to go into the merits of the case, because I may look upon it as a case sub judice, and if it is to go before the Committee on Privileges, it will come before hon. members who will discharge their duties as judges of constitutional law, and not as partisans or supporters of a particular party, and, therefore, I will refer very shortly to the facts—for I am not going to express any opinion on the case. I will only state the bare facts, and I think my hon. colleague will agree that I state them correctly. Dr. Robertson was a candidate in the Local Election in May last. The Provincial Elections were held in May. On the 27th of May he was returned, as member for one of the Electoral Districts of King's County. We have a provision in our Local Law, which provides that a candidate returned to the Local Legislature, cannot within twenty-one days after his return, resign his position or divest himself of the character of a member of the Local Legislature. We have a similar clause in the Dominion Law. You know, Mr. Speaker, why this is—to allow any opposing candidate, or any of the electors, if they think proper, to petition against that member's seat. The fact is, that on nomination day for the Dominion Elections, which fell on June 13th, Dr. Robertson sent in his resignation. But there was then no Speaker, no Session of the Provincial Parliament having been held; and the Provincial Act provides, that if a member resigns, he must send in his resignation under such circumstances to two members, who shall report to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province. On nomination day—and my hon. colleague in this will agree with me—the candidate must be qualified if he is qualified at all. On the 13th of June, Dr. Robertson had then, or a short time previously, sent in his resignation to two members. Now comes the question: Was Dr. Robertson eligible or otherwise? Well, I will admit perhaps that the returning officer would have discharged his duty more correctly had he returned Dr. Robertson, and not enquired into his eligibility, or otherwise, of his candidature. He might have done that. There is no doubt about it. Then my hon. colleague quoted the case of a returning officer, who had been censured by Parliament, and enlarged on an assumed case—the injustice that might follow, if returning officers were allowed to use judicial functions, using their discretion, they might return minority members, and if the contending parties were evenly balanced the policy of the Government might then be shaped by a majority composed of minority members. That would be a crying injustice, I admit, but my hon. friend has drawn on his imagination in this case. There is no such case here. What is the return? The sheriff, the returning officer, returns what? Dr. McIntyre who led the poll, Dr. Robertson, and Mr. McDonald next, who was some sixty-two votes behind; and he also states that it had been represented to him that Dr. Robertson had been elected to the Local Legislature, and was therefore disqualified. My hon. friend says that there is no evidence of this. Well, Mr. Speaker, these are the facts; and my hon. friend knows it as well as I do. McLeod McCormack has been Sheriff of King's County for many years; and I may say that for the last eight or ten years he has acted as returning officer for that county. He had returned Dr. Robertson as member to the Local Legislature, and, therefore, of this he had judicial knowledge. He knew it, and he might have made his return without deriving his information on this point from half a dozen of the electors, who came to him on the subject. No man knew better than he, and my hon. colleague is aware of this. Sheriff McCormack is an active man, and has discharged all the duties and functions of his office to the utmost. He issues all the necessary proclamations, and performs all the various requirements under the Election Law; and, therefore, no man had better evidence—not even Dr. Robertson himself—of his election to the Local House. My hon. friend says, there are no facts before the House. I agree with the remark of the right hon. gentleman that this is a very distinct case, and that there are many facts to consider: the right of Dr. Robertson to resign; whether his resignation was sent in; and whether his resignation was bonâ fide. There are a variety of facts: whether Dr. Robertson was a candidate for the Local Legislature; and whether he was returned or not. The proper documents will have to be produced before the Committee, and all this evidence. It is not my intention to say much on this matter, because I feel that one ought to be guarded and not go into the merits of the case, expressing an opinion, or encroaching on the judicial functions of the Select Committee. But, Mr. Speaker, I would say this: If I have stated this case correctly, if there is any reasonable and strong doubt existing in the minds of members as to whether Dr. Robertson was eligible or not, then why return him to this House to be unseated afterwards, when the case was fully heard. Now I admit frankly that if the returning officer had returned him in the first instance he would have acted more in accordance with his duty, but now we have the fact before us, and a fact with which we have to deal. My hon. colleague says there is no evidence; but we have the return which was brought down. There is documentary evidence that a very grave and serious doubt exists—I will express nothing more than a doubt now, because I shall have to give a vote, and, before doing so, would like to hear all the arguments—but there is a strong doubt whether Dr. Robertson is eligible or not. I deny that the reference of this case to the Committee would form a dangerous precedent. My hon. friend says, suppose a man accepted a contract, but here is a case referred to by the hon. leader of the Government which is perfectly analogous. Suppose a woman were to stand up on the hustings in our country where we have no women's rights; or suppose a felon had escaped who had been taken into custody by the sheriff of the county who was also the returning officer; suppose he received notice one or two days before the election that this felon had broken prison and was at large; suppose that on nomination day the escaped felon were to make his appearance on the hustings in, say, Georgetown as a candidate for the suffrages of the people—would you say that the returning officer had acted illegally or in a partisan spirit because he had refused to return the felon, though a majority had voted in his favor?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKEN. You might say that the sheriff had notice of it, but the sheriff had the same notice of the part that Dr. Robertson was returned as a member of the Local House on a certain day, and he knew that seven days had yet to elapse before it was competent for Dr. Robertson to divest himself of his character as a member of the Local Legislature and offer himself for the suffrages of the people as a member of this House. My hon. friend is wrong; there is nothing for which this returning officer should be censured. If he committed an error it was an error of the head and not of the heart. But here is a grave doubt as to the eligibility of Dr. Robertson, and can there be anything wrong—would it be a pernicious precedent if the case were referred to a competent tribunal, to leave it to the most competent men among the members of this House, men belonging to the legal profession, to say whether or not Dr. Robertson was in a position to receive the suffrages of the people? Every such case must be decided upon its merits. I read over with some care the able arguments of the hon. member for Huron; I looked at the precedents to which he referred, but they were not analogous cases; the analogy at all events is not complete. In some cases the ballots were destroyed; in others, where under the existing law a qualification was necessary, the candidate failed to file his qualification until three days after he was elected, and in another case a mistake about the ballots was rectified, and the candidate having a majority of votes was returned. But this case is not an error of that kind. If the contention of Mr. McDonald is correct, Dr. Robertson cannot take his seat under that election, and, therefore, if the matter is referred to the Committee, I cannot see that Parliament will be laying down a pernicious or dangerous precedent, or that it will be any encouragement to returning officers to forget the serious duties they have to perform, or to act in any spirit of unfairness or partisanship.

Mr. BLAKE. If anything were wanting—and I do not think after the speech of the hon. leader of the Government much was wanting—to convince this House of the inexpediency of the amendment, we have heard it in the speech which has just been delivered. The hon. gentleman who informs us that the Privileges and Elections Committee is a judicial tribunal, of which he is a component part—

Mr. BRECKEN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. No? The hon. gentleman came in too late. He was fortunate enough to have to appeal to a real judicial tribunal, else, perhaps he would not be here at all. The hon. gentleman who informed us that this Committee is a judicial tribunal, of which he is not a member, who says that as he will have to vote upon the question, he will not express an opinion—but I think some of us were able, during the course of his speech, to receive through some of the slips and starts he made, some slight idea of the opinion he entertains upon the question—tells us frankly that it would have been right and better to return the man who had the majority of votes. I was glad to hear that, and the hon. leader of the Government said almost as much; but the hon. gentleman says the returning officer has not done much—he has gone wrong a bit—he has not done what he ought to have done, and, as he has done wrong, there will be no harm in our doing wrong too. As he has gone wrong let us, says the hon. gentleman, refer to the Committee the question of whether he was right or not. No; not at all, says the hon. gentleman, but there are a number of facts to elicit; and he mentioned some of them. He says Dr. Robertson was elected to the Local Legislature upon such a day, that he wished to resign, that under the Local Law it was impossible for him to resign before nomination day, and that, as a matter of fact, he did send in his resignation—which we have not heard of in the papers. He says there is the question to try whether or not he could resign, whether he did resign, whether he resigned bonâ fide or not, and what happened upon his resignation. We have been told, if we are to go into hearsay, that the Local Government advised the Governor to accept the resignation, that they issued the writ upon it, that a new election was held, that they returned a supporter under that writ, that they held power in the Island by virtue of that vacancy in King's which the hon. gentleman says does not exist. If there was no legal resignation then there could be no new election, no writ, and the seat is still vacant. That shows you the inconvenience of connecting two wholly distinct questions; the first, what upon the papers before this House was the duty of the returning officer, and the second and supplementary question, after we have determined what his duty was, whether any hon. member of this House will propose a reference to any tribunal to ascertain whether an hon. gentleman who ought to have been returned, and whose name ought to be inserted as a member of this House, is or is not qualified to sit here. Upon such a reference as that, and upon that alone, would arise the question to which the hon. gentleman has referred—that is, the question of whether Dr. Robertson has resigned, or whether he had effectually resigned. All these questions would arise then, but not now, because the question now before us is that which was stated by the hon. First Minister. I did not understand him to say that these questions were to go before the Privileges and Elections Committee. He did not say the Committee should consider whether Dr. Robertson was qualified or not, but they should consider what the functions, duties, responsibilities, and powers of returning officers were in general cases. The hon. member for the County of Queen's has said, would it be possible that a sheriff, who is also a returning officer, who knows that a felon has escaped from jail, and has presented himself as a candidate for the county, to affix his hand and seal to the return of that man to Parliament. I say, yes; it is possible. Was O'Donovan Rossa a felon? Was John Mitchel a felon? Were they returned to the Imperial Parliament by the returning officers? Were the returning officers censured? No. They were returned in the one case on election petition, and in the other the House dealt with them; but the returning officers returned them. But that is not this case, and that affords some reason why we should consider what we are doing. What does the hon. Minister of the Interior propose to us? He says: "This is a question deserving of great consideration; I put to you the case of a woman who should be returned at the head of the poll; I put the case of an alien; I put the case of a felon; let us consider all these things; let us have a full and exhaustive report from the Privileges and Elections Committee as to what the state of the law is upon all possible and impossible contingencies, and decide by what process of enquiry the sex of the candidate is to be ascertained, and so forth;—let us, I say, enter upon this interesting, minute and delicate investigation"—and I suppose the hon. gentleman will lay a green bag on the table presently—"but in the meantime let us keep the choice of the electors of Queen's County out of the seat to which he is entitled." Sir, I am ready to enter with the hon. gentleman into an enquiry into all these questions; I am ready, as he says there is a difficulty and a doubt and proposes so many nice points of law, to agree that they should be considered; but I am not ready to agree that this plain, simple question of obvious justice should be complicated by all these questions with which the hon. gentleman has surrounded it, in order, if possible, to obscure it. The other day, when the motion was made, the hon. gentleman complained that my hon. friend had treated the House very unfairly, because he had not given notice of the motion and given him an opportunity of considering the question, and that my hon. friend had cited a lot of precedents which he had not the opportunity of looking into. He, therefore, proposed the adjournment of the debate, in order that he might consider the line of argument he would adopt and how he would support that argument. And now he comes down, after having had a full opportunity to examine these precedents, and we do not hear a word about them. He does not dispute them; he does not comment upon them; he does not give us a suggestion on those very points with regard to which he said he wanted time for research, for enquiry, for the formation of a proper opinion. Well, he says the question is whether the returning officer should have a judicial power. Is that the question raised in this return? Does this returning officer assume to exercise a judicial power? Has he adjudged? He has adjudged nothing. The law says that he shall simply state the number of votes obtained by both sides according to the law, and shall declare the candidate having the largest number to be the member. He has made a return, but he has not assumed to adjudge. Therefore the hon. gentleman has not got to refer to the Committee a judgment of the returning officer at all. It is not a question whether he had power to adjudge, because he has not exercised any such power, if any such power he had. He has simply abstained from doing that which the law says he shall and must do, namely, return as the member the man who has the majority of votes. But the hon. gentleman says: "I admit that, from time to time, from year to year, there has been a tendency to limit the old judicial powers of returning officers, and to make them more and more ministerial or executive officers; I will not trust the case to go to an ordinary Election Court; I will not aver that if it went before an Election Court, the returning officer would have a good case; but is it true that the returning officer can in no case adjudge?" I ask you how is the returning officer to exercise judicial functions? In the first place, who is he? He is the nominee of one party; how can he judge between both? The hon. gentleman has deliberately altered the law, in order that he might appoint the judge from one party; in order that in Lennox and Carleton, as well as in every other constituency in this Dominion, he might have the power of choosing his own friends; and having chosen them, no doubt often at the instance of the respective candidates in these constituencies, to hold office during his good pleasure and to perform his pleasure, he now proposes that we should seriously consider how far these officers should have judicial power. Beautiful judges, truly! Wonderful proposal!—first of all, that the Government shall take this absolute power of nominating returning officers, and second, that we should consider how far it is wise and prudent to set back the current, and to declare, in the face and teeth of the Statute which prescribes their duty as to the summing up of votes, how far they are to have power to adjudge. Well, is the returning officer to have a court, then? Is he to sit in solemn state between these two parties, call witnesses, and perhaps have counsel to argue the case before him and then decide which of the two shall prevail? No, Sir, he has not attempted that. If he had a judicial power, he has not exercised that power, and it would be a gross thing to suggest that he ought to have such a power as the law now stands. But he has not exercised a judicial power; if, having the power to judge, he abstains from judging, how is he defensible for not having performed the functions of the Statute? What could he do except do what the Statute prescribes: count the votes and return the man with the majority? My hon. friend has referred to the time at which the judgment took place. If there be any hour at which the returning officer may exercise a discretionary power, it is at the time the nomination papers are handed in. I do not now suggest what the limit of his discretionary power at that time is; but it would be subject to the grossest and most palpable abuses, if the returning officer, having received a nomination paper, as being a valid nomination paper of a qualified candidate, should allow him to go to the polls with that assumption; and after the votes have all been cast, should take out of his pocket—or, as the hon. member for Queen's suggested, out of his recording brain—the knowledge that this man was a member of a Local Legislature, and his election, therefore, a sham; that his nomination paper ought to have been discarded; and that, therefore, he should return somebody else, or make no return at all. Now, the returning officer not assuming to adjudge, as he did not in this case, the question is, what return ought he to make? Ought he to make the statutory return, or throw the whole thing at the head of the House as he has done? It is perfectly clear that the statutory return is what ought to have been made. The hon. gentleman said that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was struck entirely without regard to the political proclivities of hon. members. Well, that was news to me. I was on the striking Committee. I did not hear any such observations made when we were striking that Special Committee, and I suppose, after the statement of the hon. gentleman, it happens by chance or by coincidence—but still it will be found, by a curious accident and coincidence, that the political proclivities of the members of this Committee correspond to the political proclivities of the members of this House. The Committee was struck, the hon. gentleman says, entirely without regard to political proclivities, but the hon. gentleman took good care to have two votes to one on the Committee. The House is political and the Committee is political, and as both are political in the same number and proportion, my own impression is that we shall argue this question out and decide it in the face of day here altogether, rather than submit it to a small body of members, constituted politically in the same proportions and for no other purpose, I can conceive, after the speech of the hon. member for Queen's, than to complicate the two distinct questions—the question whether Dr. Robertson is or is not eligible for the seat, and the question as to what, upon these papers, it was the duty of the returning officer to do. I say the motion which the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has put before us is that latter question. It does concern the seat, the expectations of every candidate in the future, and concerns every constituency in this Dominion. It is a question involving the rights of all the electors or the country, and of every candidate in this country for all time, and that question, as upon the papers which appear before us annexed to this return, is: What, under the law and the practice of Parliament, was it the duty of the returning officer to do? If that were a doubtful question, one which required great research and upon which the authorities were seriously conflicting, when applied to the distinct language of our Statute, it might of course be a subject of enquiry and of reference. But being a plain question, a question which it is easy to answer from the Statute itself and upon which the current of authority, as my hon. friend has proved, is, with hardly an exception, the one way—I say being a question of this nature it concerns our dignity, it concerns the rights of the people that we should here at once dispose of it; that we should unequivocally declare that the returning officer's duty was to have returned the man who had the majority of votes. If any hon. member then chooses to raise the question as to the right to a seat here of the man who, the hon. member from Queen's admits, ought to have been returned, let us deal with that question when it arises entirely unprejudiced and uncomplicated by this discussion—a question, as the hon. member for Queen's has said, depending on facts not now before us which require to be elucidated, on papers not now before us, on the customs and laws of a Local Legislature which are not now before us, and a question, therefore, which will require probably some time for its consideration and determination, and which may require for that consideration and determination evidence to be brought from Prince Edward Island. But in the meantime what presses upon us now is to vindicate the electors of King's and their rights to the man of their choice—rights which have been violated by the action of the returning officer, whose violation of justice and right this House ought, at the earliest moment and in an unequivocal manner, to redress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the hon. gentleman acted quite fairly toward me in introducing a personal matter in his speech, when he said that I, or the Government of which I was a member, had taken care to make the returning officers servants of the Government, and quoted Lennox and Carleton as instances in point. The hon. gentleman ought to know before making that remark, that the returning officer for Lennox, has been the returning officer there for a quarter of a century, that the returning officer for Carleton is a Reformer, who was appointed sheriff and returning officer by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is very unfair, very unlike the hon. gentleman—no, not very unlike him, but I thought he had improved a little. It was very improper in him, to make that allusion to me. In both cases they were gentlemen, he would have desired should be returning officers. He rather misrepresented me. When I said the Committee on Privileges and Elections were appointed without regard to political proclivities, I did not in any way wish it to be understood they were chosen equally from both sides, nor, do I think the House understood that. These Committees are reflexes of the positions of parties and opinions in this House. They would be unfair Committees if they were not so. If the hon. gentleman's political friends are not more numerous in any one of these Committees, that is the fault of the people. Let him bring an indictment against the people of the Dominion who held that he and those who acted with him were in the wrong. But, I do say this, that the Committee was fairly chosen, and I will venture to say, although I was not here, that he did not object to that Committee. He, as an able Parliamentarian, was one of them. I have no doubt he saw on that Committee a fair proportion, according to the proportion of this House, of his followers and the best men among them. I do not see why the hon. gentleman is afraid of this Committee. I have seen him before afraid, when the case of Mr. Anglin was before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when he was away for a long, long time. It was said he was ill and could not come, but when he did come, he showed a great deal of vigor and strength. His friends said he did not show up there because Timothy was concerned; they said that because Timothy was concerned he had the hay fever. I have the right to talk in this way when the hon. gentleman chooses to bring in a personal remark altogether uncalled for with respect to myself.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the first time, for some years, in this House an hon. member has ventured to repeat what, up to this time, has found, to some extent, currency, I believe, in Tory newspapers, and perhaps may have been spoken in my absence. The hon. gentleman has ventured to assert that during the last Committee on Privileges and Elections in a former Parliament I was away, not because I was really ill, but because I did not want to come. That is a statement utterly and absolutely without any particle of foundation. I was confined to my bed by serious illness. I am amazed the hon. gentleman should have dared to make this statement at such a time of day. If there are any words I can use which will announce in a more positive and emphatic manner my denial of the hon. gentleman's statement I want to use them now. The hon. gentleman has said I was unfair in stating that he had chosen the Sheriffs of Lennox and Carleton as returning officers, who were servants of the Government. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that my complaint of his law is confined to the cases in which he chose other men than the sheriffs and registrars? No, Sir. What I complain of is that he should make a law by which he becomes the nominator and appointer of returning officers. If they happen to be sheriffs and registrars they are appointed not because they hold office permanently from which they can be withdrawn only for dereliction of duty or malfeasance, for they hold it at his bid and pleasure, but they hold it at his pleasure to do his bidding. That is the complaint, and the evil runs much deeper and goes much farther than the hon. gentleman has put it. It is not confined to an occasion in which he has departed from what would have been the law, and nominated others than sheriffs and registrars; but every sheriff and every registrar whom he appoints, he appoints not by virtue of their office, but by virtue of his pleasure and to do his will.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he never heard this before. I think I have heard it in the House before.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have heard it in the House before.

Mr. BLAKE. Never.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And the statement I made was made on the authority of his own friend—I can tell him that—of his own political friends, who were disgusted at his absence from the Committee, and who did not hesitate in saying so. But, Mr. Speaker, I say this further. The hon. gentleman objects very much to the appointment of returning officers under the nomination of the leader of the Dominion Government. No, Sir, he would like to have every returning officer in the Province of Ontario under the thumb, and all the officers of Ontario under the thumb, of the present leader of the Ontario Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. I propose to call the attention of the House to the facts of this case which the personal assault made by the leader of the Opposition on my right hon. friend the First Minister, has somewhat diverted us from. Now, Sir, the question is not whether we are to refuse to seat Dr. Robertson and to alter this return, as moved for by the hon. member for West Huron, by declaring that Dr.

Robertson's name should be inserted and that he should take the seat—the question is whether that is the proper course to take, or whether it is proper under all the circumstances of the case, to send this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A great deal, therefore, of the thunder from the other side is altogether wide of the mark. If we were here refusing to acknowledge the right of the electors, refusing to obey their choice, I could well understand this indignation which, to my mind, has been altogether uncalled for and is altogether out of place upon the simple proposition in amendment which is now before the Chair. We are asked to say whether under all the circumstances of this matter—not the hearsay statements, but the papers brought down by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and presented to the House—whether under these circumstances we ought now to carry out the motion made by the hon. member for West Huron, or whether we ought to send the papers to the Committee appointed for that purpose who are charged with the privileges of this House, and whose duty it is to guard and protect those privileges. Now, Sir, what are the facts, I am not speaking of hearsay—but what are the facts? The facts which appear before us are these: That Dr. Robertson was elected—I am reading now from a return presented to the House:

“That Dr. Robertson was elected a member of the Local Legislature of the Province of Prince Edward Island, and was returned by Sheriff McCormack upon the 8th of May, 1882; that on the 13th of June the same gentleman was nominated as a candidate for the same district, or for a district including the same, for this House; that upon the 26th of June the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island certified that he has not received from James E. Robertson, returned a member of the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island for the fourth electoral district of King's County, nor from any other person on his behalf, any resignation of the seat of the said James E. Robertson as a member of the House of Assembly; nor have I received any notice of said resignation from the said James E. Robertson, nor from any member or members of the said House of Assembly, nor from any other person whatsoever, on behalf of the said James E. Robertson.”

We have it perfectly clear that Dr. Robertson was elected to the Local House. We have it equally clear—not merely, as the hon. member for Queen's County stated, on the ipse dixit of seven electors—but we have the solemn certificate of the Assistant Provincial Secretary that Dr. Robertson was returned. We have the solemn statement made by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province that Dr. Robertson had not resigned. I think it is plain, therefore, that at that time Dr. Robertson was a member of the Local Legislature of the Province of Prince Edward Island. Now, what does the law, passed in 1873, say about cases like this:

“After the dissolution of the present Parliament of Canada, no person who is a member of any Legislative Council of any Legislative Assembly of any Province now included, or which may hereafter be included, within the Dominion of Canada, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall be capable of sitting or voting in the same; and if any one so declared ineligible is, nevertheless, elected and returned as a member of the House of Commons, his election shall be null and void.”

The third section of the same Act says:

“If any person is made by this Act ineligible as a member of the House of Commons, or incapable of sitting and voting therein, does, nevertheless, so sit or vote, he shall forfeit the sum of two thousand dollars for every day he sits or votes.”

Therefore it is not simply a question whether Dr. Robertson, who appears to have had the majority of the votes, ought to have been returned by the returning officer. Rightly or wrongly we are now seized of the facts of the case, facts which are indisputable.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can it be doubted that Dr. Robertson is a member of the Local House? Why, even the hon. members who have spoken on the other side do not pretend that he is not so.

Mr. CASGRAIN. He has resigned.

Mr. McCARTHY. Resigned! But when? He resigned since his nomination for this House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How do you know that.

Mr. McCARTHY. I say, upon the evidence here, that I have the right to assume that. I have a statement from the Lieutenant-Governor that on the 26th June he had not resigned. I will read it again:

"I hereby certify that I have not received Mr. James E. Robertson's resignation."

An hon. MEMBER. He had not resigned.

Mr. McCARTHY. He left his resignation in such a position that if he was elected to this House it was to stand good; but if he was not elected to this House the resignation was to be null. I have no doubt from what I hear—not from what I know—that the intention of Dr. Robertson was to put his resignation in such a position that he was to continue to be a member of the Local House if he failed in the present election, but if he succeeded in this contest then he would claim the right to sit in this House; and the law says he shall not do so. Now what are we to do with this motion? We are asked to declare that he has a right to take his seat in this House as a member. Who has a right to take his seat in the House?

Mr. MACKENZIE. The man who had the most votes.

Mr. McCARTHY. The man who, according to the law passed at the instance of the hon. gentleman opposite, who did not like dual representation and who desired to deprive the people of a free choice as to who they should send to both Houses, the man who, according to that law, has no right to sit and vote here, and whose election was declared by the Statute to be null and void. If he were sitting in the House to-day we would have to rise in our places to draw attention to it, and the matter would have to be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, just as in the days of the good Reform party—the Party of purity—when the House was full of contractors, and when we occupied a considerable portion of our time in dealing with their business: I therefore, say, that no matter what may have been the duty of the returning officer, we are now in this position that we have these facts before us that the person who was returned is disqualified and could not take his seat. But we are asked to day to say that he shall take his seat, though the very next moment any hon. member could rise in his place and draw attention to the fact that he was disqualified, and the matter would have to be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Surely the course suggested by the amendment is the proper one, that the matter should now be dealt with before we stultify ourselves by declaring that this gentleman is entitled to take his seat, when the law says he shall not sit in this House. A great deal has been said regarding the duty of the returning officer, and I desire to speak with caution upon that subject. I do not pretend to be as wise as the hon. gentleman opposite who ex cathedra can at once tell what the law is and what it should be. I mean to say that since the Statute of 1874 was passed, so far as I know, there has been no decision given with respect to the changes made by that Statute; and I hold that before the Act of 1874 was enacted it was perfectly plain that the returning officer was not merely a ministerial but a judicial officer; that he had certain ministerial duties to perform and certain judicial duties to perform. It may be—and I hesitate to express any opinion upon it—that the effect of the legislation of 1874 is to have made him simply an executive or ministerial officer. I am not prepared to say it may not be so; but what I am asking the House now to do, now when censure is talked of with respect to the returning officer, is to remember the position in which he is placed as the law stands and as the law appears to be according to the best authorities. As the hon. the First Minister has shown, there is in our Statute a declaration that if a returning officer refuses to return a man who afterwards is declared by the Election Court to be entitled to his seat, he shall be subject to a penalty of $500. Now, the returning officer is placed in this dilemma: it is brought to his notice, he knows himself as returning officer, and at all events it is ascertained by him by the highest possible species of evidence, that this gentleman is disqualified. Then the penal enactment of the Statute is pointed out to him. What is he to do? If he took on himself to decide, judicially, that Dr. Robertson ought not to be returned, he might, perhaps, be open to censure, but under the difficult circumstances he decides: "I will report the matter to the House. I will make a double return, and not say that a man whom the law says is disqualified is entitled to the seat: and at the same time I will not say that a man who has merely a minority of votes is entitled to the seat. That is a matter beyond me; but these facts, brought to my knowledge, I will report to the House, and the House will be prepared to deal with the case as the law of Parliament requires." That has been done. We have the double return; both gentlemen have taken the oath.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is no double return.

Mr. McCARTHY. Pardon me. Although I have great respect for the hon. gentleman's law, I must have a little respect for my own notions, and I venture to say it is a double return. The proof of it is that both gentlemen have signed the roll and both have taken the oath, and both can come into the House and sit. A special return is quite apart from that, and is that the returning officer could not say that one or the other candidate was entitled to the seat; the distinction is very plain between that case and this, which, according to my view of the law, is a double return. That being so, let us see what the best writers say. We have not all the superior wisdom of hon. gentlemen opposite but we may perhaps look ourselves and see what, according to the authorities, the duty of the returning officer was. Referring to the penalty clause—Mr. Rodgers' work on Elections, a very late edition, says this, at page 338:

"It would seem from the above cases, that the returning officer is not subject to any liability, as far as Parliament is concerned, if he returned a disqualified person; nor, on the other hand, could he well be censured for exercising his judgment as to the eligibility of a candidate, and returning the person whom the judges ultimately decides to be entitled to the seat; for in most of the cases in which a disqualified person has been returned, the form of the resolution of an Election Committee has been that the petitioner ought to be returned. Indeed the sole consideration with committees has been, whether the returning officer has shown any improper animus. (Ipswich, K. and O., 379.) And accordingly, if it were not for a Statute to be presently noticed, the conclusion would be that the returning officer is safe, so far as the House of Commons is concerned, whether he decided or refused to decide on the qualification of a candidate, provided he acted bonâ fide; but that it would be safer for him to return the candidate who has the majority of votes, and leave the question of qualification to be disposed of by the Judge."

He says according to the Statute. What does the Statute say? It says:

"If any returning officer wilfully delays, neglects or refuses duly to return any person who ought to be returned to serve in the House of Commons for an electoral district, such person may, in case it has been determined on the hearing of an electoral petition respecting the election for such electoral district, that such person was entitled to have been returned, sue the returning officer having so wilfully delayed, neglected or refused duly to make such return of his election, in any court of record in the Province in which such electoral district is situated, and shall receive a sum of $500, together with all damages he has sustained by reason thereof, and full costs of writ."

The writer, Mr. Rogers, further says:

"These words are very comprehensive and would seem to include the case of a sheriff returning a disqualified person, provided notice and proof of such disqualification had been previously given to him. And if this be the case, a returning officer would, if the unsuccessful candidate were held by the Judge entitled to have been returned, be subject to a very serious liability. The question, therefore arises, what is the returning officer's best course to pursue in such a case?"

We should look at this question judicially; we should not endeavor to raise popular cries, as is being done by hon. gentlemen opposite. The delay cannot be very great. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) brought the matter to the notice of the House on the 20th of last month, and he went away somewhere—I do not know where—and left this unfortunate county without its second representative in the House, and this great injustice has remained from that day until now. I am aware its consideration was postponed once at the request of the hon. the First Minister.

Mr. CAMERON. Three times.

Mr. McCARTHY. At all events the county would not suffer from a further delay of three or four days. What is the proper course to pursue? The writer from whom I am quoting says:

"In the Leominster case, under similar circumstances, the sheriff returned both the qualified and unqualified candidate, and this conduct does not seem to have been reflected upon; and this it is conceived is, on the whole, the safest course for the returning officer to pursue."

The able writer to whom I have referred lays down that the proper course for the returning officer, under those circumstances, is to return both candidates—to make a double return: I have said already that the effect of the legislation of 1874 may make a difference; but it has never yet been decided that it makes a difference. I heard an hon. member from New Brunswick intimate that it does make a difference. Is that so perfectly plain? The Act of 1874 is based on the law as it stood. That is not the only law we have to look to. We have to read the law of Parliament as amended by that law, and looking at the law of Parliament as altered by that do we find any enactment that the returning officer shall from this time forth cease to be anything more than a ministerial officer? That may be the effect, but there is no distinct enactment; and it is not so perfectly plain that we can assert it as a matter beyond all doubt. I give hon. gentlemen opposite another authority. In Bushby's Practice on Elections, 1880, speaking of double returns, the writer says the returning officer's duties are partly ministerial and partly judicial. Such are the opinions of the very latest English authorities, and we have no writer asserting the contrary, that the returning officer's duties are wholly ministerial. The Act, of course, read alone, without reference to the law of Parliament, is very plain; but we have to read the law of 1874 as a part merely of the law which regulates us and guides us in matters of this kind. In the case of a convicted felon would not the returning officer be quite warranted in refusing to return him; or in the case of a minor, a case which appears in the English books, would he not also in that case be authorized in refusing to make a return. But this is a matter which ought to be decided deliberately, and not by the violent harangues that we have heard at least from one hon. gentleman, who has spoken on the opposite side. I, therefore, submit with very great confidence, that this is a matter which cannot be dealt with, if at all dealt with in this House, in the manner suggested by the hon. member who moved the original resolution. Now, let me point to a pertinent incident. From this very same Island, in 1874, Mr. Perry, Mr. Stanislas François Perry, came to this House. He had been elected to the Local Legislature. He had been again elected by a large majority to this House; but, Sir, when he came here, he found this law on the Statute-books, and, of course, according to the notions of hon. gentlemen opposite, he at once should have taken his seat, being the representative of a free people who had sent him here in order to carry out their law and bidding, though in violation of the Statute, and taken his seat. He had done everything he could to resign; but it was a question whether his resignation was proper or not; and what did Mr. Perry do? He presented a petition to the House, and asked the House to consider the matter—whether he was entitled to sit and vote or not.

The House referred the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they said it was so doubtful whether he was entitled to sit and vote that an Act of Indemnity should be passed to entitle him to sit; and this was done. This was a case exactly parallel, so far as the right of a man to sit in the House, was concerned.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Now, I venture to say, notwithstanding the "hear, hear" of the hon. member for West Durham, that, if we choose to-day to say that Dr. Robertson was elected, he would not dare to take his seat, judging from all we know of the facts. It is not for us to stultify ourselves, and declare by a resolution to-day that Dr. Robertson is entitled to the seat; and by another resolution to-morrow, on the ground that he is disqualified under this Act, to say that he must be expelled. It is not for us to do so; and remember that this is not a simple question of regularity. It is a question of positive disqualification which entitles this House, irrespective of any Election Court or any appeal to any legal tribunal, to say at any time when attention is drawn to a member sitting in the House, whether according to law he is entitled to his seat. I, therefore, ask the House to recall all circumstances; and to say what should be done. We have the facts before us officially certified to by the returning officer; and if any doubt exists, and I venture to say that every hon. member must, if he be not an ultra partisan, must entertain such a doubt as to the duties of a returning officer, then taking the authority which I venture to quote to the House—the only course and the only proper course is to send all the papers before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and let that Committee deal with it. I observed that the hon. member for West Durham, in the manner of a special pleader, sought to fasten a narrow issue, and say that my hon. friend, the First Minister had not suggested that the Committee would so deal with it; but that the Committee was only to deal with one branch of it. The hon. member for West Durham felt the force of the observations which I am now making. He knew perfectly well that Dr. Robertson was not entitled—assuming the facts to be as represented—to a seat in this House; and knowing that he endeavored to make it appear that the only matter the Committee would deal with was that one question of whether the motion in amendment was so; but the papers are here before us, and this House is seized of the facts. We have the return made by the returning officer, showing that the matter should be sent to the Committee to consider the whole subject, and deal with it according to law and the usages of Parliament.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Simcoe, who has just spoken, has referred to my hon. friend from West Durham as being a special pleader; but I think, that my hon. friend has endeavored to draw away the attention of the House from this subject and the real question, which is fairly embodied in the resolution of my hon. friend from West Huron. My hon. friend says that since the law of 1874, there has been no case brought up before this House. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that this is the case, and that this is the first instance of gross dereliction of duty brought before Parliament in this relation; and it is for Parliament to deal with it. If the returning officer failed to perform his duty in this case, the House should rectify the omission, and if Dr. Robertson is entitled to the seat he should have it. Before proceeding to the discussion of the question of the Statute, I will for a moment refer to the case of Mr. Perry, in which this simple difference appears: Mr. Perry was returned by the returning officer as elected, while in this case the returning officer has not returned anybody. Then I call my hon. friend's attention to the Statute of 1873, in which it says that the election of a person, who is a member of the Local Legislature, if elected and returned, shall be null and void. I also call the attention of the House to the Independence of Parliament Act of 1878, which provides with regard to the return of any member of the House of Commons occupying office, &c., the seat of such member shall thereby be vacated and his election declared null and void. Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the only question which we have to consider, is exactly what is put forward by the hon. member for West Durham—not the extraneous facts put forward by my hon. friend from Queen's, but has the returning officer done his duty? My hon. friend from South Simcoe referred to various works on elections in England, but has not ventured, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the Act under which this Parliament is elected, the Act of 1874. I venture, Mr. Speaker, to say that if pleaded in any court of justice, it would be at once distinctly pointed out how utterly inapplicable English cases would be to the Statute before the courts here. The hon. gentleman spoke of a double return. Probably the last double return in England was made in 1878 for South Northumberland, where Mr. Ridley and Mr. Grey received an equal number of votes. Both were sworn, and Mr. Ridley took his seat. Still a petition was presented, and on Justice Field's return Mr. Grey withdrew his claim to the seat, which was awarded to Mr. Ridley. But in England the duties of returning officers are totally different in this relation, because I think, Mr. Speaker, it is plain; and when the Statute is so plain, that he who runs may read, it does not require the astuteness, acumen, and ability of the hon. member for South Simcoe to expound it. Any man can do so, and no necessity arises for saying that grave doubts exist, where no doubt exists at all. In England, the returning officer may, in case of equality of votes, give the casting vote. In the first place, this is permissive and not mandatory, as in our Act; and in the second place, it is qualified. He can only do it there if he be a registered voter; but under our Statute, in case of equality of votes, the returning officer shall give the casting vote, so as to comply with the Statute by returning the man who has the majority of votes. My hon. friend has referred to papers being before the House. If properly and fairly before the House, it were another matter, perhaps; but I say that these papers are irrelevant, and to use a legal phrase impertinent. They should be expunged and not read, the same as if in a Court of Justice, evidence improperly admitted should be rejected. We have to look and see what the duty of the returning officer was. My hon. friend on my right pointed out that his duty was simply to return the man who received the majority of votes. I quite agree with my hon. friend opposite from Queen's, and my hon. friend from South Simcoe, that the returning officer is a ministerial officer and not a judicial officer. If he has any judicial functions, Mr. Speaker, I say they cease when the nomination papers are accepted, and he notifies the electors who are the candidates at the election. Up to that time, Mr. Speaker, no doubt, to a certain extent, he has judicial functions. It has been so decided, I think, in the courts of Ontario, by Chief Justice Wilson. With regard to nominations, he exercises judicial functions; his attention may be called to the disqualification of a candidate, which, if he then rejects him, he is bound to return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, with the cause of rejection, in compliance with the Act. In that case the party whose nomination is rejected has the right of appeal to a tribunal, to which these cases are referred for redress, if at the nomination he were wrongly rejected. But I say that the instant he received the nomination, that instant his functions ceased; and in only one case does the law provide that a nomination can be withdrawn, and then only at the instance of the candidate himself. But the moment that the candidates are put before the electors by the returning officer, his duties cease, and after that moment he does not possess the judicial functions even of the deputy returning officers because he has simply to cast up the number of votes which have been returned by the deputy returning officers. He does not even see the ballots, but he has to take the statements of the deputies, and from them to return the man who has the majority of votes. We find that the Legislature has endeavored, time after time, to carry out that principle. In 1878, when a new mode of recounting the ballots was provided, I find that the recount is to be taken before the County Judge; and the Act, after pointing out the duties of the deputy returning officers, proceeds as follows:—

“The returning officer shall, immediately after the sixth day after such verification, unless before that time he receives notice that he is required to attend before a Judge for the purpose of a recount of the votes given at the election, transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected.”

In case a recount is demanded:

“The Judge shall proceed to recount the vote according to the rules set forth in Section 35 of ‘The Dominion Elections Act, 1874,’ as hereby amended, and shall verify or correct the ballot paper account and statement of the number of votes given for each candidate; and upon the completion of such recount, or as soon as he has thus ascertained the result of the poll, he shall seal up all the said ballot papers in separate packets, and shall forthwith certify the result to the returning officer, who shall then declare to be elected the candidate having the highest number of votes: and in case of an equality of votes the returning officer shall give the casting vote.”

He gives that casting vote whether he is entitled to vote or not, his duty being to return a member. That is the policy of our law, and I challenge my hon. friends opposite, or such of them as are lawyers, to take the law of 1874 and the law of 1878. Let the hon. gentlemen take the law of either England or Canada, and I am perfectly willing to leave it to him, able lawyer as he is, to say if any other construction can be put upon the law than that which has been put upon it by this side of the House. The clear duty of the returning officer, under the Act, was to return the man who had a majority of votes, and if he had a right to enter into the other question at all, he knew that Dr. Robertson was a candidate, and why did he not refuse to receive his nomination? But he received his nomination, thereby holding him to be qualified before the electors as a fit and proper candidate, and it did not lie in his mouth to take the ipse dixit of seven electors—for he does not say on his own knowledge of the facts that Dr. Robertson was disqualified—he simply gives the statement made to him by seven electors of the County of King's out of a body numbering some 5,000 electors in all. Because seven men come forward and say that the successful candidate is disqualified he chooses to disregard the law and refuses to return him.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman will excuse me, but surely he has not read the return. The returning officer expressly refers to papers E, F, G and H, which are with the return.

Mr. WELDON. Here is what he says:

“It having been represented to me at the summing up of the votes by certain of the electors of the said electoral district having a right to vote at such election, as appears by the several papers returned herewith and marked respectively with the letters E, F, G, and H.”

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON. But he puts it forward as upon the representations of these electors. I have a great respect for a person holding the position of returning officer, and for the office itself; but I think this certificate, given under these circumstances, shows that this officer was travelling out of his duty, and when you compare that certificate with the law on the subject, nothing more is needed to show the state of the case. Supposing that the County Court Judge of that county, on a recount being made, had returned Dr.

Robertson, would the returning officer in that case have intervened and say, I will ignore that return because six or seven men represented to me that the candidate was disqualified, and I will therefore disobey the law and refuse to perform my duty. All we have a right to look at, sitting here in the capacity of a judicial tribunal, is what the returning officer is bound to return. We find that by the Act of 1874, as pointed out by the hon. member for Huron, certain returns were to be made by the returning officer when the member was returned; and we find that by the Act of 1878, the returning officer, when he returned the candidate who has the highest number of votes, is to accompany his return, in addition to the papers required to be returned, under the Act of 1874, with a report of his proceedings; in which report he shall make any observation he may think proper, as to the state of the ballot boxes or ballot papers, as received by him. The whole tenor of the law shows that there was no intention to allow double returns to be made. The returning officer was compelled to give the casting vote, whether he had a vote or not, and his whole duties were simply of a Ministerial character, comprised in the act of returning the man who had the highest number of votes. I challenge any hon. member to take up the law and read it carefully, and whether he is a lawyer or not, he will discern that this is the plain duty of a returning officer; and he will come to no other conclusion than that the returning officer failed to perform that duty in the present case. That being the case, surely the House is bound to rectify the error. If other consequences are to ensue, let them follow in a legitimate manner, so that they may not be mixed up and confused with the clear issue which is now before the House. I need not refer at length to the precedents which were cited by the hon. member for Huron, but I may refer to the Essex case. In that case the question was one of fact; it was not a question of return, but of how a man voted, and the Speaker in giving his casting vote, said that the matter of fact was one to be referred to investigation. The present case, however, is one of law, and there is no question of fact involved. Then with regard to the West Peterborough election, it is true that the minority candidate was returned, and there was the return of the sheriff before the House. The hon. the First Minister of that day, the present Premier, in addressing the House in that case, pointed out what has already been pointed out, that the tribunal to which that was referred, was a judicial tribunal. He is reported to have said:

"For the express purpose of avoiding such delay in the public business and for the higher purpose of avoiding party and political votes or questions of this nature, the law had provided another and a special tribunal—a tribunal surrounded with all the authority of judges—a tribunal having all the duties to perform that the Judges of the land imposed on them. This tribunal, upon whom both in England and Canada, the duty of trying controverted elections had been thrown, this tribunal had the same obligation as our courts; they took as solemn oaths as our Judges did, and he hoped and believed they purged themselves as completely of all political or party feelings in the execution of their duty."

Then, when we come to the Muskoka election case, which was analogous to this, we find a similar resolution put forward. The hon. gentleman assented to that resolution, but contended that it was a different case from the West Peterborough case, and said that a law would probably be brought forward which would prevent such a thing in the future; and the law of 1874 was for that purpose. But this House does not altogether resign its privileges by that law; it may expel a felon, as was done in the cases of O'Donovan Rossa and John Mitchel. In all the discussions on these cases which took place in the English House of Commons, no one ventured to contend that, after Mitchel and Rossa had been put forward as candidates for the suffrages of the people, the returning officer had any right to set them aside. The hon. member for North Simcoe says that we have all the papers before the House. I say these papers are not regularly before the House, and we have no right to look at them. He says the evidence is not hearsay evidence. I say it is hearsay evidence of the worst kind. Is the sheriff to ascertain whether the parties who signed the nomination paper have a right to do so? Is he to see whether the signatures are genuine or not? He is not an officer to enquire. If he undertook to examine witnesses under oath, he might find himself prosecuted for violating an Act of Parliament by administering extra-judicial oaths. As to the validity of Dr. Robertson's resignation, that is a question of law, and as such was one which the presiding officer had no right to determine. No person could withdraw the nomination except Dr. Robertson himself. The simple duty of the sheriff was to appoint his deputy returning officers, and upon receiving their returns, to sum them up, and return the man with the majority of votes. If that was his duty, and he has failed to perform it, it is the duty of this House to rectify his error. If there is any question as to Dr. Robertson's qualification, let it go before a tribunal fitted to deal with such questions, a tribunal far beyond party spirit; where it will be calmly considered, and justice and right will be done.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 5.50 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 12th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BEATY moved that the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Monday, 19th March instant, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Davis and Lawrence Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 80) to amend the Act incorporating the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

Bill (No. 81) to amend the Criminal Law, and to make special provision for the punishment of persons convicted of wife beating.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 16) to incorporate the Central Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Small.)

CREDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. AUGER. I think that the Bill asks too much. The promoters ask, by this Bill, to repeal an Act passed in 1880.

It says: "The Act of the Parliament of Canada, forty-fourth Victoria, chapter 58, intituled: 'An Act to enlarge and extend the powers of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien,' is hereby repealed. The Bill now before us proposes to repeal that Bill. And what does it propose to put in place of it? It says:

"It shall be lawful for the said Corporation (Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien) at all times, in exercising the powers of lending and advancing money at any time given it by any Act of any one of the Legislatures of the Provinces composing the Dominion of Canada, to receive and take any such rate of interest whatever, for the money to be lent or advanced, as may be lawfully taken by individuals, or in the Province of Quebec by incorporated companies under like circumstances, not exceeding eight per cent. per annum."

All the Bill asks is the privilege of charging eight per cent., but in return for this privilege the company gives the House no security at all as to the manner it shall exercise the privilege, in fact we have no control on the company at all. The result will be that each Province will act separately with the subject and in its own manner. Moreover, it is in direct contradiction to the first part of the preamble, which says:

"Whereas the shareholders of the 'Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien' have renounced the privileges granted it by section 127 of the Act of the Province of Quebec, incorporating the said Company; and whereas it is expedient to assimilate the character and powers of the said Company to those of other companies of a similar character."

How will they be assimilated if the company is to be chartered by the different Provinces? The Province of Quebec may pass a law, in one sense, and the other Provinces may pass quite a different one. All the company wants to get assimilated is the rate of interest. This the company is not bound to make any report to Parliament. By the 44th Victoria, the company there mentioned could only enlarge its powers or change its rate of interest at the discretion of this House. The Anglo-Canadian Society, organized in 1874, bound themselves in their Act of incorporation to do certain things, to make a report to the hon. Finance Minister of their operations, but there is nothing of the kind in this Bill. For this reason I am opposed to the Bill, and when the proper time comes I shall propose an amendment.

Mr. ORTON moved to amend the Bill by providing that the interest should not exceed 7 per cent. per annum.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This Bill was reported to the House without amendment by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. The proposition just made by my hon. friend was, I think, considered there, but was not adopted. When the Bill was originally passed this company had exceptional advantages in the Province of Quebec; those advantages have been removed, and it was simply placing this company in precisely the same position as other incorporated companies who were not allowed to exceed 8 per cent.

Mr. METHOT. Ever since I have been in this House I have opposed this Bill on each occasion that it came up. I have been opposed to the principle of allowing people to lend their money at an unlimited rate per cent., and on two occasions I have proposed to reduce the interest to 8 per cent. As that provision has now been introduced in this Bill, I shall change my opposition into favor of the Bill, and shall support it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ives) declared the amendment of Mr. Orton out of order, having been made without previous notice.

Bill reported.

TEMPORALITIES FUND OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CANADA IN CONNECTION WITH THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 39) to amend the Act of the Dominion of Canada, 45th

Mr. AUGER.

Victoria, chapter 124, respecting the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in connection with the Church of Scotland, said: As some hon. members have spoken to me with respect to the provisions of this Bill, perhaps a few words of explanation may be appropriate at this stage. The Act of Union was passed by the Quebec Assembly in 1875; it was ratified by this House last Session, and so far as its principles are concerned, this Bill has nothing whatever to do with them. It is a Bill relating to the internal management of this fund; each minister of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland originally had an allowance of $600 per annum. In 1853, I think, each minister received a bulk sum in lieu of that allowance, the amounts varying from $8,000 to $10,000 each. In 1855, the ministers of the church, seventy-three in number, created what is known as the Temporalities Fund. They funded the sums allowed to them, and, in return, were each to receive $450 per annum; that was the sum for which they commuted their interest, and which created the Temporalities Fund. The Bill I have the honor to move to-day guards the rights of the original commutators, and provides that they shall continue to receive the $450 per annum. It is necessary, however, that the allowance to the other beneficiaries should be reduced. The original capital of the fund has been trencched upon in order to meet charges upon it, and while the commuting ministers are not to be disturbed in the receipt of the sums due them, $450 per annum each, the Bill provides for a reduction of the amounts paid to the other beneficiaries. After the creation of this fund, ministers, laymen and probationers of the church were added to the list of beneficiaries. Their rights were subsidiary to the rights of the original commuting ministers, and if any shrinkage of the fund occurred, their rights must first suffer. The fund originally amounted to £127,448 5s., or $519,793. By the statement of 1881, I see the fund has been reduced to $322,192.48. It is, perhaps, not necessary to enquire how this shrinkage in the fund occurred: it was by losses on securities, by drafts on the original fund; and these facts taken in connection with the circumstances, that the rate of interest is less now than formerly, the Temporalities Board find they have less funds to dispose of to meet the claims made upon them. By the last report the original commutators were twenty-nine, entitled to $450 per annum; the number of privileged ministers was returned at fourteen, the number had been reduced to eleven; and the number of beneficiaries receiving $200 per annum, was ninety-two. The Temporalities Board appointed a committee, and the beneficiaries also appointed a committee, and these two committees have mutually prepared and drafted the Bill which is now under the consideration of the House. This Bill has four principal features. It proposes to procure to the beneficiaries the payment of arrears. While the case was under adjustment before the Privy Council, payments were not made to the beneficiaries, and doubt still exists as to the power of the Temporalities Board to make those payments. It also empowers the Board to make a reduction of 25 per cent. from the payments to beneficiaries and privileged classes receiving $400 and $200 respectively; and it provided for an alteration in respect to payments made to ministers, and for a change in the mode of electing members to the Board. Under the law as it at present stands, vacancies on the Board occur only by death or by resignation. The Bill provides that four members shall vacate their offices each year, and their places shall be supplied, not as heretofore by the votes of the remaining members of the Board, but by the votes of the beneficiaries themselves, those votes being given either by mail or in person. These are the leading provisions of the Bill, the features of which have been approved, on the one hand by the beneficiaries, and, on the other, by the members of the Board.

I have the honor to move the second reading of the Bill, which will be fully considered in all its details, either by the Private Bills Committee or by a sub-Committee of that Committee, and the hon. First Minister assured me that the fact that an Opposition member has charge of the Bill will not be allowed to prejudice the interests involved.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand from the hon. gentleman, the beneficiaries have agreed to the Bill as well as the Temporalities Board?

Mr. CHARLTON. The committee of the beneficiaries.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Have the beneficiaries agreed to it unanimously, or are there any dissentients?

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe the committee appointed by the beneficiaries agreed to it unanimously. I am not aware there are any dissentients on the part of the beneficiaries; but I have mailed a copy of the Bill to every one of them, and it is proposed that the Bill should be allowed to stand a few days in order to allow them a further opportunity of further discussing and considering it.

Mr. HAGGART. I observed by the Bill that there is a class of beneficiaries to be affected, and another who are not. The class whose interests are to be affected may be deprived of those interests by the vote of those not affected by the Bill. That class of beneficiaries are opposed to it altogether, as the Bill enables the class not affected to take away from the others 25 per cent. of their amount, or wipe it out altogether if necessary. I hold that the true principle is, that those affected by the Bill should have the right of voting on it, and they alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE. As I understand it, the fund has diminished from various causes to such an extent that a reduction is imperative, as it cannot meet the charges on it. The original commutators only commuted upon the understanding the fund should not be interfered with, except by their own act, and if others were subsequently added as beneficiaries, those who originally commuted and established the fund should not be affected until those others were wiped out altogether. This may seem hard to the subsequent beneficiaries, but I think we are bound to maintain the rights of the original commutators intact.

Mr. BLANCHET. I do not think I should have approached the consideration of this subject relating to a religious community to which I do not belong, except from the fact that I have received a letter from a retired minister belonging to that denomination, in which he manifests anxiety as to the interests of the parties dealt with in the Bill. This is what he says:

"I would at the same time beg you to read over the Bill, and I feel satisfied that after its perusal you will feel much as I do. We have enjoyed our living for nearly thirty years without any doubt being cast upon the legality of our rights, and if any body of men can be now appointed to retain one-fourth of our living, I am inclined to believe that anything whatever may be done."

I hope the mover will see that the rights of parties are respected, and that due provision will be made to see that no suffering is brought about by the enactment of this Bill.

Mr. JAMIESON. I, too, have received from one of my constituents, who is a beneficiary, a letter in which he protests against the principle of the Bill. He says that he has received from this fund during some twenty-four years, that he is an old man, and if the principle of this Bill is adopted, he will be deprived of a considerable amount of his income, and he thinks that the principle of the Bill is wrong. He is entirely opposed to it; and unless the matter can be remedied in Committee, to which it will be referred after the second reading, I should be obliged, on the representation which he makes, to vote against the second reading, because I think that it is an improper piece of legislation to deprive the beneficiaries of money to which I believe they are justly entitled.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman mentioned by the hon. member for North Lanark is, no doubt, one of the original beneficiaries; he has been on the list for thirty-four years. I have received a letter from Dr. Jenkins with reference to this matter, and I will read a short extract from it. He says:

"The proposed rejection of 25 per cent. was agreed to by the beneficiaries: it is in their own interests, and in the interests of the fund, no doubt it is to conserve the fund. I do not suppose that every individual among them is satisfied, but at a meeting of beneficiaries called to consider this and other matters, bearing on the proposed change, to which every beneficiary was summoned, the reduction question was unanimously agreed to.

As I said before, the fund was created by the original commutators. It was their money; and this $450 is a first lien on the fund; they cannot be called upon to suffer any diminution. The measure asked for by the promoters of the Bill must be granted, or the fund will be diminished, and payments must be met every year by drawing on capital; and if this thing continues, there is danger that the original beneficiaries will have their rights impaired, and the managers of the fund will ultimately be unable to pay the $450, to which in law and equity, as they founded the fund, they are entitled. I presume, however, the discussion of the Bill at this stage is a little premature. The beneficiaries will be heard before the Committee, as well as the promoters of the Bill; and the matter will there be fully discussed. The information to be laid before the Committee I am not in a position to lay before the House; but I presume, perhaps, that the House will let the Bill go before the Committee, with the understanding that sufficient time and ample opportunity will be given to all parties to be heard before the Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that this Bill will suffer in the hands of the hon. gentleman who has introduced it, and I hope he will for a long time attend to Private Bills and press them before the House, which I have no doubt he will do with his usual ability. This is, however, a very serious matter affecting private rights, and the more serious, as when the last legislation in this relation took place, which was only a Session or two ago—was it not last Session—

Mr. HAGGART. Yes; last Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Parliament was led to believe that the question was finally adjusted, and that the vested rights of all these clergymen had been settled. I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman that he does not propose to affect the interests of those clergymen, who commuted their original annuities, which were thereby absorbed, and made a fund, by generously giving up their securities, which now exist. However, I was rather struck by a remark made by the hon. gentleman, who said that, unless this reduction were made with respect to the salaries or incomes of the other beneficiaries, the fund might be abolished altogether, and the commuted clergy made to suffer. Now, as I understand it, the trustees cannot do that, with a grave commission of money, which would be a breach of trust, and would, perhaps, involve them in proceedings, not only civil, but criminal. I do not suppose the clergymen, although, as a general rule they are not very good men of business, would so far mistake their duties, as to waste this fund and expend it in such a way as to reduce the security of the original commutators. Whether the gentleman mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Lévis is a commuting clergyman or not, I do not know—

Mr. BLANCHET. He is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But I fancy he is the same gentleman from whom I received a letter. From the style of it, I presume that he is the same person. He does not state in his letter to me, however, whether he is a commuting, or a subsequent, beneficiary; but he says he considers himself secured in a certain amount, and holds that he would be wronged if this amount were reduced in his old age. Still, if by misfortune the fund is reduced so that it will not pay him—why, it cannot be helped, the only question is this: Whether these gentlemen can be compelled to submit to a reduction of their annuities; and while the fund is low, should they be compelled by Statute to surrender any claim which they might have in the future, in case of the fund being hereafter in a more prosperous condition.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Bill provides against that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, I can then see no objection to this Bill going to the Committee on Private Bills, like any other Bill of this kind, as it involves the comfort and happiness, and perhaps livelihood, of some of these reverend gentlemen. I presume that the Committee will give their best attention to it, and see that all the parties concerned are heard upon it before it comes back to us here.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt, in the sense of the general proposition of the hon. gentleman, that it is the interest of the original commuters which ought to be primarily considered, and no doubt it was primarily considered. When they surrendered their money—their capital—it was guaranteed to them that, as far as the fund was concerned, their income would be paid out of it. Now, suppose that, from time to time, as deaths took place, the fund became more than adequate to bear the interest charge for those who survived of the original commuters; and there came on the surplus of the fund fresh men, who had no claim as original commuters; and the surplus interest money of the fund was used for the purpose of increasing the endowments of the church; the capital of the fund was sunk in financial operations, or large losses were made, rendering it not possible to carry on the operations which had been projected without impairing the capital still further—the hon. gentleman will perceive that, although the capital to-day may be more than sufficient to pay the original commuters, yet still, if they proceeded to impair the surplus capital and take away from it, and to pay the subsequent holders, this would eventually affect the position of the original commuters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is true.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the fund would not hold out, but be like the Irishman's blanket, unable to cover head and feet together. Consequently there must be a reduction, which should be made to fall on those who went in subsequently, protecting, as far as possible, the interest of those who created the fund.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite true.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.). It will be in the recollection of the House that when the Temporalities Bill was before Parliament last Session I opposed it very strongly. I opposed it because I considered it to be a piece of most improper legislation, and a shocking interference with vested rights, taking away from one set of men what belonged to them and giving it to another set of men. I think that this Bill, introduced by my hon. friend from North Norfolk, is adding robbery to robbery. At the time the Bill was passed last Session it was held out to members of the old Kirk that, if at any future time any more surplus accumulated, this surplus fund would be properly distributed; this was one of the inducements and salves applied to the consciences of members to induce them to vote for the Bill. Now, however, the trustees of the fund come before Parliament, and say: "We have been living on our principal, which we have been eating up as fast as we can; and we ask your sanction to the way in which we have administered this fund, and which we need admit will not in the future, under any possible circumstances, leave any surplus, which can possibly be applied to the benefit of the old Kirk." I would fail in my duty did I not enter the most strong and hearty protest possible against this legislation, as I did against the legislation of last Session. I feel it an outrage in one Session to repeat the wrong done then, with all respect to the action of Parliament, in passing the original Bill. Of course, knowing the sentiments of Parliament, as then expressed, it would be futile to attempt to oppose this Bill on the second reading; but when the details come to be considered, I must say I will feel it to be my duty then to offer to it the most strenuous opposition in my power.

Bill read the second time.

DOMINION RAILWAY TRUST AND CONSTRUCTION COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. SMALL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Dominion Railway Trust and Construction Company of Canada, Limited.

Mr. BLAKE. I think this Bill will require the special attention of the Government, or, at all events, of the hon. Minister of Railways. I am not quite sure if my hon. friend could find anything more than that the incorporators could do under the Bill, but I certainly cannot.

Mr. SMALL. The Bill will be referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. It should be referred to all the Standing Committees, I think. It certainly does deal not only with railways, but with canals and telegraph lines; but, then, it deals with everything else. There are many things in the Bill with which the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines could not deal. It should go at least to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Bill read the second time.

CREDIT VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 50) to amend an Act respecting the Credit Valley Railway Company, said: In the absence of the hon. member for East Bruce, who had charge of this Bill, my name having been put upon it by mistake, I move the second reading. Some years ago when the Bill which it is proposed to amend by this Bill was before the House, I opposed it; and I make this explanation, because to promote the present measure under the circumstances, would be inconsistent on my part. The mistake of putting my name to the Bill was made, by some means, in the law clerk's office.

Bill read the second time.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 51) to amend the Act to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it the intention in this Bill to give power to change the Government subsidy to this Company which has been authorized by an Act of Parliament?

Mr. CAMERON. I really cannot answer my hon. friend's question. I was asked to take charge of the Bill having had charge of the one last year, but I confess I have not read it.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I have read it, and I call the attention of the Government to it. The hon. gentleman will remember that the Company was incorporated and a separate Ministerial measure was passed authorizing the granting of an annual subsidy on certain conditions. Apparently power is given by this Bill to change that subsidy; and it might make serious confiscations if money was borrowed on the credit of the annual subsidy which has been authorized to be charged by a private Bill, and afterwards—the subsidy being really conditional only on the work being carried on for these years—that there should be a separate set of creditors to deal with, who, under the authority of an Act passed by the Parliament, could say that the subsidy was changed for advanced money, and now they wanted their money whether the enterprise succeeded or not.

Mr. CAMERON. I was informed that the Bill was in reference only to the internal economy of the company—the different issues of preference stock, bonds, &c.—that it was only to provide for some alterations which the financial arrangements that the company made in England rendered necessary. As I said before, I have not read the Bill, but I think the point the hon. gentleman has mentioned is a matter which might properly come up for consideration in the Railway Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill for granting a subsidy to aid the company, was predicated on a measure settled last Session, and I was not aware until this moment that there was a Bill for the purpose of altering the Railway Bill of last Session. Of course, we will have to look into the matter; but I hope the company do not expect, as a matter of course, that the Government subsidy is to go to the company with extended or altered powers.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Bill, however, is not in order; it deals with the public interests, and should not be introduced in its present form.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, if the Bill provides for changing the Government subsidy and handing it over, that cannot be done without the consent of the Government; but any clause in the way of amending the internal economy of the company we have very little to do with.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then the Bill had better stand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or we might strike out the clause if it is wrong.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me to involve a serious question. The clause to which I refer is the one substituted for the ninth clause of the former Bill. It provides for the issue of mortgage bonds, not exceeding £700,000 sterling, which shall constitute a first mortgage and privilege upon the railway, docks, and other works, and upon all subsidies, guarantees of money, or securities for money which the company may receive from any Government, and so on.

Mr. CAMERON. The Government can oppose any such provision in the Railway Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. But as the hon. member for East York has pointed out, the assent of the Crown is required for the preliminary step.

Motion allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Dominion Phosphate and Mining Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Brant County Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Quebec and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 71) to incorporate the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Western Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Montreal and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Abbott.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Great North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria, Ont.)

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada for Manitoba and the North-West.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

PILOTAGE ACTS AMENDMENT.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B.C.) enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to amend and consolidate the several Pilotage Acts of Canada during the present Session?

Mr. McLELAN. It is not the intention of the Government to do so.

MIDLAND HARBOR.

Mr. COOK enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates this Session for the improvement of Midland Harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have received deputations on this matter from the parties interested in the neighborhood, but the Government has come to no decision as yet.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY'S RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have regularly made the returns of all accidents or casualties, whether to life or property, the causes and nature of them, the points at which they occurred, the full extent and particulars thereof, and a copy of the by-laws, rules and regulations of the Company, as required by the fifty-fifth section of the Railway Act of 1879?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways, I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have made returns of accidents, resulting in loss of life and injuries to persons, giving particulars, but they have not furnished the by-laws and regulations, and there are no returns in cases of loss of property.

BRANDON PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make the town of Brandon, Manitoba, a Customs port of entry; if so, when?

Mr. BOWELL. It is the intention of the Government to establish an outport at the town of Brandon; and instructions have been given to open it at as early a day as possible.

BRANDON POST OFFICE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Selkirk) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a new post office building in the town of Brandon, Manitoba, as asked for; if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have received deputations on this matter, but have not been able as yet to make up my mind whether this should be recommended to Council or not.

GOOSE ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect, this year, a lighthouse on Goose Island, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia?

Mr. McLELAN. When the estimates of lighthouse grants will be laid on the Table, before the final passing of the Estimates, the information will be given to the hon. gentleman.

CUSTOMS OUT-PORT, PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE.

Mr. WATSON enquired, When does the Government intend to establish a Customs out-port in the town of Portage La Prairie, Manitoba, and why has the establishing of such port been delayed so long?

Mr. BOWELL. Instructions have been given to open this port as soon as the buildings promised for that purpose are ready. The reason it was not opened before, is because the buildings that were promised were not given to us.

KING'S COUNTY (P.E.I.) ELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day being called, the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Huron) relating to the King's County (P.E.I.) Election, was resumed.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.) If it be possible for every member of the House to approach the consideration of any question that comes before us for our deliberation in a judicial and unpartisan spirit, it is pre-eminently necessary that we should do so when we have to consider such a question as that before us at present. It is a question that involves not only public rights of a grave character, the most important that we have to deal with—the right of the people to representation in this House—but also private rights, what I term vested rights, the rights of two gentlemen, each of whom claims to be elected to this House. For that reason, I say we ought to approach it in an unpartisan spirit, if it be possible for us to do so. I grant we are all of us members of one party or the other. I think there is scarcely any hon. gentleman who describes himself as an Independent on the floor of Parliament at the present time, except my hon. friend who usually sits in front of me. But although we are all associated with one party or the other, still, we ought, on an occasion of this kind, to divest ourselves of our party prejudices, and to consider the question before us in a judicial spirit, free from partisan bias—if that be possible. I grant it is difficult, but, for my part, I have, during the consideration I have given to this matter, endeavored, as far as possible, to divest myself of any partisan feeling on the subject. I have tried to ignore the fact that of these two gentlemen, one, if declared entitled to the seat, would vote with the party to which I belong, while the other would vote against it. I have also endeavored, for another reason, to look at it in an unpartisan spirit, namely, from the fact that in all probability this question will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I have the honor to be a member. That Committee is looked upon as pre-eminently required to discharge its duties free from any party or political bias. For these reasons I have felt, in considering this question, that we ought to deal with it, apart from any spirit of party, as affecting the claims and opinions I have formed in reference to it. When I say conclusions, I do not mean for one moment to say that I have arrived at any definite conclusion as to the right of either of these two gentlemen who claim the seat, to obtain it as the result of the present enquiry—that I think is a matter that requires further consideration; but I have come to a conclusion as to whether the motion, which my hon. friend has made, or the amendment of the right hon. leader of the House, ought to be carried. I have come to the conclusion that the amendment of my right hon. friend indicates the proper course to deal with this matter, and I will proceed to state my reasons. The electors of every constituency, no doubt, have a right to have the person whom they choose duly to elect by a majority of votes, seated in this House; but it is not necessarily a fact that the man who has received the majority of votes is entitled to sit in the House, because there have been many cases in which gentlemen who have received that majority have turned out to be entirely disqualified, and either unworthy, as in the Irish cases referred to, or disqualified from some personal reason, some business association, the holding of some office, or some other reason. Although one of the gentlemen may have had a majority of the votes cast at the election, it does not necessarily follow that he has an unquestionable right to take his seat here, though that has been the basis of the arguments of my hon. friends opposite, so far as I have heard them. The question now, however, is: how are we to dispose of this matter. We have before us the motion of my hon. friend that this House should now summarily, and on the spot, declare one of these two gentlemen entitled to the seat; we have the amendments of the right hon. Premier that this matter is one involving such grave and difficult questions that it is only right and proper that it should be considered by that tribunal which the House annually, at every Session, selects for the consideration of such questions—it being selected from amongst those most skilled to deal with questions of that kind; which Committee is invested with the power of protecting and looking after the rights and privileges of Parliament, and more particularly of dealing with every matter concerning elections. Now, in support of the position that where the matter is perfectly clear, the House, without reference to any Committee, may dispose of it, my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), quoted a passage from the speech of the right hon. Mr. Gladstone, in which that gentleman very correctly and very properly lays down the true Parliamentary rule—as we should expect he would do—and with the permission of the House I will read it again, because, although my hon. friend quoted it as supporting his position, it seems to me entirely to support the position which the Ministerial side take on the present question. Mr. Gladstone says:

“If this were a case in which, after the best investigation we can make, we thought that any good, fair, or reasonable doubt attached to the facts or the arguments of the case, or as to the course which the House ought to pursue, then I admit it might be the subject of a reference to a Committee, especially if the question was one which involved the examination of a long and complicated series of precedents, such as it would be difficult to bring under the view of the House in debate. But, Sir, in our view, it is neither the one nor the other. The facts of the case are the fewest as possible, and the principles applicable as clear as can be brought to bear on any question of Parliamentary discussion, and I would submit that if that be the case, a proposal to enquire, instead of a proposal to act, would not be becoming the dignity of this House.”

Now, I entirely agree with every word contained in that quotation; and I think every word in it proves that the only proper way in which to deal with this question is to refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. All we have to prove is, that this is a question in which a well founded doubt exists as to the right of these parties, that it is not a case in which, to use Mr. Gladstone's words, “The principles applicable are as clear as can be brought to bear on any question of Parliamentary discussion.” Now, we have here the benefit of the long series of precedents quoted by my hon. friend from West Huron; but he says that here the members of this House, laymen as well as lawyers, are suddenly—on hearing him quote these precedents without having an opportunity of looking at them, without having an opportunity of considering the facts of the cases in which those points were decided—to jump to a conclusion as to the true rule to be deduced from those authorities. Mr. Gladstone's opinion is that where the question involves the examination of a long and complicated series of precedents it ought to be referred to a Committee. This one does involve a consideration of a long and complicated series of precedents. Did not my hon. friend from West Huron quote precedents for the last twenty, thirty, and forty years from Canadian Parliamentary History? And here he asks us now, without any examination of those precedents, to jump to the conclusion that his quotation of them is correct, that the way he reads them is the true way of understanding them, and that they prove the position which he says they do. I have myself looked at some of those precedents, some with which I was familiar, and I draw a totally different conclusion to that which he has drawn from them. We have the fact that the lawyers on the floor of this House who have spoken upon the question have exhibited very diverse opinions regarding it. We have had the hon. members for West Huron, West Durham, Queen's (P.E.I.), and St. John, on that side of the House enunciating with great force their opinions; while on this side, we have had the right hon. Premier, and my hon. friends from West Simcoe and Prince Edward Island. The latter of whom is familiar with the local laws affecting this question, and all asserting the opposite. The laymen in this House are asked summarily to decide this question upon such contradictory opinions as have already been developed, before the debate has proceeded further. I ask, if the laymen of this House are, under these circumstances, to be called upon to give a vote, by what possible rule are they to be governed if not by the rule of their party alliances? And is that the rule that ought to be applied to decide this question. If this question is suddenly decided in this House—decided upon the merits now before it, upon the arguments of hon. gentlemen upon one side and on the other, who have considered the special facts of this case, and who upon their professional training are conversant with such matters—upon what other principle will this House decide it than simply whether hon. members are in favor of the Government, or against the Government? And, if that be the case, is that the proper way in which what is really a judicial and legal question—one involving the gravest interests, both as regards public and private rights—should be decided? Is it not much more proper, under these circumstances, that it should be sent to the Committee specially charged with subjects of this kind, which Committee will thoroughly sift the whole matters involved and report their conclusions to the House—if not unanimously, at all events, the minority will have an opportunity, after fully investigating and discussing it, to state their views to the House, and then the House, with the matter fully discussed before it, will come to a conclusion, no doubt a proper conclusion, according to the opinion of the Committee, if they think proper to adopt it. My hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) spoke the other day of the Privileges and Elections Committee as being a partisan or political body—I, on behalf of that Committee, disclaim any such charge, and the hon. gentleman should have been one of the last to have brought such a charge against it. During my limited experience as a member of that Committee, I remember an instance in which the Committee showed it was superior to political and party considerations, and the fact that it did so was owing to the honest, candid and straightforward course which the hon. member for West Durham adopted on that occasion. When the Anglin case came before the Committee, and when we first met to consider it, after the evidence had been obtained, I, myself, was the instrument of having a resolution declaring the view and opinion of the then Opposition, that Mr. Anglin had forfeited his seat in part and had violated the Independence of Parliament Act by becoming a party to a contract under the Government. The members on that Committee, supporting the then Government of the day, opposed my resolution. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who has not now a seat in the House, moved an amendment declaring there had been no violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, that Mr. Anglin had done nothing wrong, and had not forfeited his seat. On the first day of the discussion every member supporting the Ministry, without exception, opposed my resolution. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), at that time a member of the Government, ventured to state his view of the law, and he enunciated a proposition, which we lawyers knew was absurd, namely, that there was no contract because there was nothing bringing it under the Statute of Fraud, it not being in writing. The hon. member for West Durham looked up—I recollect the occasion perfectly well—and said the hon. member for Bothwell must have forgotten (because he assumed that he must have known at some time) that the wording of the Statute of Fraud shows that there might be a good contract without any writing, and therefore his statement of the law was unfounded. The hon. member for West Durham did not subsequently favor the Committee with his presence for several days. Some little discussion, of a rather animated character, occurred the other day as to whether the illness, which was the unfortunate cause of his absence, was real or not; he seemed to think an imputation was cast on him, that he feigned illness in order to absent himself from the Committee. That statement is not correct. The hon. member for Bothwell came day after day, for three or five days, asking an adjournment in consequence of the illness of the hon. member for West Durham. But when at last the hon. gentleman did appear in the Committee, what did he say? He said that, with an unimportant verbal amendment, he would vote in support of my motion, and in opposition to Mr. Guthrie's amendment; and, therefore, Mr. Guthrie withdrew his amendment, Mr. Mills withdrew his opposition, and every Ministerial supporter in the Committee withdrew his opposition, and my resolution, having been amended in an unimportant particular, at the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham, was adopted. I say that this incident shows that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is a body which will render a dispassionate judgment, and will do what is right and just in matters coming before them. It shows that the Committee will rise above party spirit, and, even if the majority belong to the Ministerial party, the Committee will be prepared to say, if they believe it, that Dr. Robertson is entitled to his seat; and I am quite confident that the hon. member for West Durham, if he shows the candor and fairness which he showed in the Anglin case, when he examines this whole matter, and comes to the conclusion that Mr. McDonald is entitled to his seat, or that there should be a new election, the hon. gentleman, with his candor and fairness, will stand up and say so. The Committee will consider this matter as judges—almost all its members are lawyers, and are accustomed to deal with such questions; and they will consider it in a just spirit; they will look into the whole matter carefully, and not deal with it as a partisan and political body, as the hon. member for West Durham has stigmatized the Privileges and Elections Committee, but they will carefully consider the facts of the case, charged by the House with the responsible duty of acting as its legal adviser on this occasion, and advise the House what is the law and the righteousness of the case, according to precedents, authorities and facts; and when we have discharged our duty, impartially, and without political bias, as I believe we will, this House will be placed in a proper condition to consider the subject and determine it on its merits. That Committee is a proper tribunal to decide this question, and I was surprised that the hon. member for West Durham should have referred to the Committee in the way he did, impugning the correctness of the course proposed, which I am quite sure his own better judgment will lead him to admit to be the correct one, in disposing of matters of this kind. Is this question free and clear from doubt? If it is not, then it should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), made a similar statement the other day, but he took the ground that this case was so free and clear from doubt, that there should be no reference to a Committee, but that the House should decide it off-hand. Let us consider the facts of the case briefly, with a view to arriving at a conclusion. I confess that when I first cursorily considered the matter, I was inclined to the opinion that the returning officer had not acted properly and had not done his duty. I confess that was my first opinion; but when I heard the authority cited by the hon. the First Minister, and heard the clear argumentative and able speech of the hon. member for West Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), which would carry conviction to any man—and I am sure every member on both sides of the House must have admired the clearness and ability with which he dealt with the question—when I heard that speech, and the authorities which he cited, and when I subsequently referred to them, as I have done since, I confess my opinion was changed. I came to the conclusion that the returning officer had acted within his duty, and had done his duty in making the double return. I maintain this: that the matter is not clear and free from doubt as hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe. I thought at first the returning officer was wrong, but after further consideration, and after hearing the arguments and looking at the cases cited, I have been led to the opposite conclusion. Is it not then manifest, from this circumstance alone, that one possessing a somewhat extensive acquaintance with election matters, as I do from my professional experience, formed an opinion which second thoughts satisfied me was an erroneous one, that the matter is one capable of being argued, one on which both sides should be heard upon the evidence elicited and the authorities quoted? It shows, I say, conclusively, that a full examination of these authorities and precedents can only take place before the Privileges and Elections Committee, which, as Mr. Gladstone says, in the quotation which was made from his speech, is the proper place and the proper manner in which to discuss this question, and then to go on with the consideration of the facts. While I am not committed to any opinion as to the seat, and about the respective rights of these two gentlemen to the seat, or as to whether either of them is entitled to it, or as to whether there should be a new election—because I feel that it would not be right in the present position of the discussion of this question to come to any opinion on that subject, and more especially in the case of a member of the Committee of Privileges and Elections—still I have considered the matter, so far as to satisfy myself that a grave doubt exists on the subject, and I will proceed to state to the House the reasons why I think that this doubt exists. We find a return before the House, and my hon. friends have taken exception to this statement on the ground that parts of it have no business here; but still we cannot shut one eye to this return. It is made for the benefit of the House; it is before us officially and we are bound to read it and take cognizance of its nature. It is an idle argument to say that the returning officer should not give this information or send these papers, and to point to the fact that he cannot do so, because that information is there; and when we come to look at the documents we find them to be of that character that they cannot be lost sight of or set on one side. This return is before the House, and from it we find that Dr. Robertson and Mr. McDonald were candidates at the last election, the former obtaining a small majority of fifty or sixty over Mr. McDonald. On the day on which the votes were summed up the returning officer, the high sheriff of the county, was served with a formal document, signed by seven electors, in which they brought to his knowledge and notice, officially, that Mr. Robertson was disqualified, from the fact that he was at the time a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Island of Prince Edward, and they supported that notice to the returning officer by furnishing him with a certificate, under the hand of the Governor. First of all, however, they furnished him with a copy of a certificate of his own return—because the same sheriff had himself returned Dr. Robertson as a member for one of the electoral districts composing the County of King's. They presented him with a certificate of his own return. They presented him with a copy of the Official Gazette of the Island of Prince Edward, in which Dr. Robertson was gazetted as a member of the Legislative Assembly. They presented him also with a certificate under the signature of the Lieutenant-Governor to show it. Dr. Robertson had not, up to the 26th of June, sent in his resignation, and that no notice of such resignation, in compliance with the law, under the circumstances, of Dr. Robertson, have been received by two members of the said House of Assembly, or by any person whomsoever, on behalf of Dr. Robertson, and forwarded to the Lieutenant-Governor. When my hon. friend from St. John, on Friday last, referred to this certificate, I have no doubt he unintentionally made an improper reflection on the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, by stating that the Lieutenant-Governor assumed in his certificate that Dr. Robertson had not sent in his resignation; and that it was consistent with that certificate that two other members of the Local House should have given notice of the resignation. If my hon. friend will look at the Lieutenant-Governor's certificate he will see that it expressly covers the case—stating that no notice from the said Dr. Robertson, or from any member or members of the said House of Assembly, or from any person whomsoever, on behalf of the said James E. Robertson, had been received by the Lieutenant-Governor, as to his resignation. Then we find that Dr. Robertson was elected and returned on the 7th of May last as a member of the Legislative Assembly, and on the 26th of June he had not resigned. Now, I have looked at the law of the Island of Prince Edward with the view of seeing what it is on this subject. To begin with, we all know, because it is a matter within our own Parliamentary knowledge, that a member of a Legislative Assembly of any Province is ineligible as a member of this House. We start out with that proposition. If, then, Dr. Robertson on the day of nomination, or still further on the day of election, was a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Prince Edward Island, he was, ipso facto, disqualified from being elected or returned as a member of this House. That being the case, we find he was elected to the Legislative Assembly on the 27th of May last; and we find that the Act of Prince Edward Island, in the year 1876, in the 14th clause, provides this:

"But no member shall so tender his resignation while his election is lawfully contested, nor until after the expiration of the time during which it may by law be contested on other grounds than corruption or bribery."

So that on the day of nomination, or of polling, but certainly on the day of nomination, if Dr. Robertson was then a member of the Legislative Assembly at the time, within which a petition might have been presented against him had not expired, he clearly could not resign. The law of Prince Edward Island did not allow him to resign. It was impossible for him, try how he might, to resign, according to the law as it stood in the Island. The Controverted Election Act of the Island, passed in 1874, second sub-section of section 6, says: "The petition shall be presented within twenty-one days after the return has been received, at the office of the Colonial Secretary;" and then provides, in a subsequent clause, that Sundays shall be excluded from the computation. Excluding Sunday, the computation, twenty-one days from the 27th of May, would not expire until the 21st of June. That being the case, it is abundantly clear that Dr. Robertson could not divest himself, by any steps which he might take prior to the 21st of June, of the position of being a member of the Legislative Assembly of Prince Edward Island. He could not so divest himself, if he tried; and we will see presently that he did not try, within the proper time. Well, now, what position does he stand in? On the 13th of June, the day of nomination, and on the 20th of June, the day of polling, he was still a member of the Legislative Assembly of Prince Edward Island. Incapacitated from resigning he was bound to take his seat, because the law does not allow any man to resign his position, as a representative of the people, except in accordance with the provisions of the Statute; and he cannot resign in any other way. When elected a man is bound to take his seat; and he cannot divest himself of the character, or of the trust which the people have put upon him. Then, up to the 21st of June, Dr. Robertson, ipso facto by law, could not get rid of the position of a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Island; and, for that very reason, he was disqualified and ineligible as a candidate for election to the House of Commons. However, the law provides a mode by which, under certain circumstances, a man may get rid of his position as member; but subject, of course, to that provision which I have read—until twenty-one days after the return has been certified to the Colonial Secretary. Section 15 of the Act of 1876, provides that if any member of the House of Assembly wishes to resign his seat, in the interval between two Sessions of the General Assembly, and there is no Speaker, or if such member be himself the Speaker, he may address a letter, to be delivered to any two members of the House, declaring and mentioning his intention to resign and stating that the two members, having received such declaration, shall do—what? Shall forthwith notify the Lieutenant-Governor thereof, under their hands and seal, and who is thereby empowered and required, within seven days after such notification, to issue a writ—

Mr. DAVIES. Read on.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly. I will read to the end of the paragraph, or clause, if you like—"and shall issue a writ for the election of a new member in place of the member resigned, and the member so tendering his resignation, shall be held to have vacated his seat and to have ceased to be a member of the House." I do not suppose that my hon. friend will try to argue that it is sufficient merely to send the notification of resignation to two members of the House. I say that no lawyer will place any such construction on that clause. The true construction of it is, that a member who seeks to resign, must do all that is necessary to see that the men to whom he entrusts his resignation, do all that is necessary to divest himself of his position, and if his two agents—for they are his agents—have bottled his resignation up as I have heard from rumor they did in this case, intending to use or not to use the resignation as might suit them, and this is apparent from what was stated in the course of the debate the other day, this is insufficient to comply with the terms of the law. In fact the resignation was signed on the day of nomination, and these two gentlemen, to whom it was given, did not deliver it until the 25th of June, more than thirteen days after it was given to them, and they did not comply with the Act. They did not forthwith give it to the Lieutenant-Governor as they were bound to do; and Dr. Robertson did not give it to the Lieutenant-Governor. I therefore say that it does not lie in his mouth to say, as my agents, to whom I gave my notice of resignation, did not do their duty for although I signed it, they did not deliver it, I am not responsible for such neglect; and if it had turned out that Dr. Robertson was not elected, that is the last which we would have heard of his resignation. In fact I am informed from rumor that in Prince Edward Island, in the last election the self-same thing was done. That a member who is now sitting in the Legislative Assembly of the Island—before going through the form of resigning, before handing in his resignation—ran for the House of Commons and was defeated—that his resignation never was laid before His Honor, and the member is now sitting and voting in the Assembly. In fact, I am told that he is a member of the Executive Council of the Island.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. CAMERON. At any rate there is a member sitting in the House, as I am informed, under the circumstances I have described. It is quite clear that Dr. Robertson's resignation did not come into the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor by the 26th of June, because His Honor certifies to that fact, and, therefore, I say that if the form of resignation was gone through with, it was a pretence, a mockery, and a sham, probably intended to be used, or not used, as might be most convenient after the result of the elections. The very fact that these disputes have arisen, that these questions of fact have to be enquired into—facts which hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, are so anxious to contradict—shows that there are at least grave doubts on questions of law and questions of fact; and these are matters which it would be proper to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who are certainly a more competent and proper tribunal to decide such questions than hon. gentlemen whom I now address. I say this with no disrespect of your judgment, or of my own; but I say that a large body like this is not so capable of carefully weighing such questions, and arriving at a calm and dispassionate conclusion upon them, as the Committee specially charged with such duties. There is another point of view from which the Statute itself may be considered. On looking further into this fifteenth clause, I am inclined to think that it does not apply in this present case at all; or that there was any possibility of Dr. Robertson resigning in the interval after the elections, and before the Speaker was chosen. The eighteenth clause says:

"Any two members of the House of Assembly may notify the Lieutenant-Governor, under their hands and seals, of any vacancy arising subsequently to a General Election, and before the first meeting of the General Assembly thereafter, by reason of the death or acceptance of office of any member, and the Lieutenant-Governor is hereby empowered," &c.

So we have here a special provision for the issue of a new writ in case where two hon. members certify to a vacancy between a General Election and the first meeting of the Assembly. The fifteenth clause refers to the interval occurring between two Sessions—that is, two Sessions of the then Assembly when there is no Speaker—the whole terms of the clause evidently intending to refer to resignations between one Session and another, and after the Speaker has been elected. On the other hand, the eighteenth clause is manifestly intended to apply to the case of a vacancy occurring from one or other of two causes: the death or the acceptance of office by any hon. member, provided it happens between the election and the first meeting of the Assembly. If my interpretation be correct, it is quite clear that, until the first meeting of the Assembly, Dr. Robertson could not have resigned at all. I have shown that, under the fourteenth section of the Act, he could not have resigned until the 1st of June; I have shown that if the fifteenth section applies, he did not resign; and I have shown that, under the eighteenth section, he could not resign until the Speaker was elected.

Mr. BLAKE. But you have not prejudged the case a bit.

Mr. CAMERON. No; I have not. I have simply stated what strikes me as the true interpretation of these facts, and I shall be delighted to meet the hon. member for West Durham, or the hon. gentleman from Queen's County, Prince Edward Island, or the hon. member for West Huron, who are indulging in these sarcastic interruptions and remarks, before the Privileges and Elections Committee, and listen to their arguments and their logic—and I hope I am enough of a lawyer to appreciate these arguments—and if they are sound to be convinced by them, and to change the opinion which I am now expressing as my own. Surely I have said enough to show that at least it is a question of the gravest doubt whether Dr. Robertson resigned his seat in the Assembly or not—whether he was eligible for election to a seat in the House of Commons or not. I have shown, I think, that the amendment of the hon. Premier should be adopted by the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite quoted Mr. Gladstone's language; and they say "if there is the greatest doubt do not refer it to the Committee, but we say there is no doubt, and therefore we should dispose of it summarily." I have said enough to show that there is the greatest doubt, and one which at the present moment, so far as I have been able to consider the question, I have been obliged to solve in this way—that Dr. Robertson was not eligible on the day of his election. At the same time, if hon. gentlemen can show that I am mistaken in my facts, that my arguments are unfounded, that Dr. Robertson acted differently from what appears upon the returns, they will be afforded an ample opportunity of doing so, and I shall be perfectly willing to change my mind and come to the conclusion, if I can honestly do so, that Dr. Robertson is entitled to the seat. I freely admit that, in my opinion, he has the preference to it, and, if it is at all possibly consistent with the law and the facts to support him in his claim to the seat, he should be supported. I think the man who has received a majority of the votes should be entitled to the seat, and to every reasonable construction of the law in his favor. We should not force doubts, or make rulings, or arrive at decisions which would tend in the direction of putting the minority candidate in the seat, or of involving a new election. I have no prejudice against Dr. Robertson, and if I can be convinced, before the Privileges and Elections Committee, that the difficulties which I have mentioned can be overcome, I shall be happy to vote in that Committee that as a matter of right he is entitled to the seat. I believe every fair-minded man will act in that spirit, as I believe my hon. friend the member for West Durham did in the Anglin case, to which I have referred. I am prepared to give him full credit for candid and straightforward conduct. I am prepared to admit that he was not warped by party predilections or partisan spirit when he acted on that Committee; but I ask him to give us the same credit when we ask that the matter shall be referred to the Committee. Do not let him say that he and his friends have all the honesty, and the impartiality, and the fairness, and the virtue, on their side of the House, and that we have all the partiality, all the unfairness, and all the vice on our side. I know that that is the usual style in which some questions are discussed on that side of the House; but I hope when we come to a question like this, we can afford to discuss it in a calm and judicial spirit. I hope that we can consider it dispassionately, so that when we go to that Committee we will be prepared to act the part of judges or jurors, and prepared to give a verdict in accordance with the evidence and in accordance with our conscientious convictions. I have only had an opportunity to consider summarily and cursorily the question as to whether there will be the necessity for a new election or not. I have not formed an opinion on that subject, because the facts are not before us upon the return. I do not know whether notice was given to the electors of disqualification on nomination day or at or before the polling; I do not know the particulars as to the number of votes given; I do not know whether the district in which Dr. Robertson was elected gave such a number of votes for him which might be considered as thrown away, as would give a majority for Mr. McDonald. We know nothing of the facts; they are to be brought before us, and upon the consideration of them will, to my mind, rest the question as to whether there should be a new election, or whether, in case Dr. Robertson is found to be ineligible, the other candidate is entitled to the seat. All these facts it will be our duty to enquire into; and the very circumstance that there are these facts, and that they are material facts, the consideration of which is necessary to a definite conclusion, must convince us still more strongly that the Privileges and Elections Committee is the proper place to dispose of this matter. Now, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island told us very emphatically, the other day, that there could be no such thing as a double return. My reading of the Election Law has led me to a different conclusion. I think this is a case of a double return, not of a special return. I confess I have no doubt at all on that subject. A double return, as I find it described by the authorities on Parliamentary Law, is a return made by a returning officer containing the names of two men, in case of there being only two candidates, both of whom can come forward and take the oath and claim the seat. Now, in this case we have the knowledge that both of these gentlemen came forward and took the oath at that Table, and that both claimed the seat. I would like also to call the attention of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, because if there could be a double return then, there can be still. Section seven of that Act says:

"A petition complaining of an undue return, or undue election of a member, or of no return, or double return, or of any unlawful act, by any candidate not returned, by which he is alleged to have become disqualified to sit in the House of Commons, at any election held after the passing of this Act, may be presented to the Court," &c.

If a petition against a double return can be filed, how can it be said that there is no such thing as a double return? Surely that is proof conclusive that there may be a double return; and the fact is we have a double return in the present instance. Well, what might have happened? Either of these gentlemen might have petitioned upon that return. So far as the documents on the Table of the House go, I do not know whether either petitioned or not; but I know that there has been no judicial decision by a court, under the Controverted Elections Act, as to which, if either, was entitled to the seat. They both come here now, claiming the seat, the time for petitioning under the Controverted Elections Act having passed; and if we decide in favor of either of these gentlemen, what position will we leave the other in? We leave him without any remedy. Without fairly and calmly considering the facts of the case, after hearing both sides, and looking at it as a judicial tribunal, we would be deciding summarily in favor of one man, and leaving the other without redress. Would that be acting in a fair or judicial manner? I think the very fact that the time for filing a petition under the Controverted Elections Act is now past, shows that we ought to leave this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, before which both parties will be cited to produce their evidence and their arguments, and which, after hearing them, will report to the House the decision it arrives at. Then, again, that we have jurisdiction is beyond doubt. Although we have a Controverted Elections Act, and have established under it a tribunal to decide cases of this kind, it is hardly necessary to state, because it is clear to any person at all conversant with Parliamentary Law, that this House has not divested itself of its right of control over its own seats. In support of that position, I will read from almost the latest books on the subject, Bushby on the "Practice of Elections," which states:

"It may be here observed that, although it is enacted by Section 50 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (the English Controverted Act) that from and after the next dissolution of Parliament no election or return to Parliament shall be questioned, except in accordance with the provisions of this Act, this enactment does not take away the power of the House of Commons to enquire into or determine upon the eligibility of any person returned as a member."

We still have jurisdiction. We have told candidates and persons interested to go to the Election Court with their cases; but if they do not choose to go to that court on account of any peculiar circumstances, if the two candidates come and claim the seat, we have still power to dispose of the matter. But is it fitting for the whole House to try a question of this kind? We are trying the right of either of these hon. gentlemen to this seat; we are trying the rights of the electors of Queen's County; we are sitting in our judicial capacity, for that is the capacity in which we have to deal with this question; and we are asked to shut the mouths of these men, to say that we will not listen to them or look at their documents; but to summarily, by the force of our power, give one man the seat, and leave the other without right or remedy. I say it would be monstrous for the House to take that course. We must dispose of this case as we would dispose of it if there were no Controverted Elections tribunal in existence, and the only way we can do that is by referring it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A good deal has been said as to whether the duties of returning officers are judicial or ministerial. The hon. member for West Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) quoted a number of books on Parliamentary Law to show that in England it was laid down since the passing of the Act similar to ours, that the duties of returning officers may now be considered as partly judicial and partly ministerial. The very words used in this book are:

"His duties are still partly judicial and partly ministerial. As to his judicial duties, it seems clear that he is only liable to an action of willful misconduct. But for a mistake made by him in the exercise of any of his ministerial duties, he has been held to be liable, although he has acted without malice."

Now, it has been said, I think by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon), that these dicta do not apply, because the duties of returning officers, under the English Act and those under our Act, are essentially different. I have looked at the English Act, and I have failed to see any difference, certainly none in reference to making the return. In the English Act it is left to the discretion of the returning officer whether he will give a vote in the case of equality, while ours says that he must do so. I am not aware of any material difference in his duties, except that, certainly not as to the counting up of the number of votes and making his returns. I will read the clause from the Act, and you will be able to judge, from your own acquaintance with our Act, if, in any respect, it differs from it:

"Upon the completion of the counting, the returning officer will seal up in separate packets the counted and rejected ballot papers. He shall not open the sealed packet of tendered ballot papers or marked copy of the register of voters and counterfoils, but shall proceed, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, to verify the ballot paper account given by each presiding officer"—

That is what we call the deputy returning officers' statement of votes.

"by comparing it with the number of ballot papers recorded by him as aforesaid and the unused and spoiled ballot papers in his possession, and the tendered voters list, and shall reseal each packet after examination. The returning officer shall report to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the result of such verification, and shall, on request, allow any agents of the candidates, before such report is sent, to copy it."

Now, in what respect do the duties of the returning officer, under that clause, differ from his duties under our Act? He has, under our Act, to take the statements given by the deputy returning officers, sum them up, and make his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery—just what he has to do in England. Yet we are told his duties are so essentially different that these English authorities do not apply. I say the Acts are so much alike, they do apply. But even apart from English authorities, the duties of our returning officers are still partly judicial. I think I may appeal to the hon. member for West Huron as to whether they are not partly judicial. I think if the returning officer, who returned the hon. member for West Huron, had not exercised judicial functions, we would not have the pleasure of seeing my hon. friend seated in this House. If I am not misinformed, my hon. friend stood in this position. On the day of summing up the votes, it was found that in two or three polling districts in his riding, the deputy returning officers had not put into the ballot boxes any statement of the votes, and the result would have been, had those statements not been counted, that my hon. friend would have been left in a minority. If I am not misinformed—and these are facts I have from the friends of my hon. friend—the returning officer, appointed under that wicked and abominable law which my right hon. friend the Premier introduced last Session, was such a bitter partisan that, on the application of my hon. friend, he postponed his declaration for two or three days to see what could be done.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). What was there judicial in that?

Mr. CAMERON. It was adjourned by this austere returning officer appointed so corruptly. I fail to see in the Election Act any authority for a returning officer adjourning an election for any such cause. There is a power to adjourn the declaration under stated circumstances, but not for that cause; and I think if the returning officer had done his duty strictly and not exercised judicial functions, he would have summed up the votes, according to the statement found in the sealed ballot boxes, and have returned Mr. Porter instead of my hon. friend. My hon. friend, however, got the declaration adjourned—rightly or wrongly, legally or illegally—and he took the very best authority he could get on the case. He was not content with his own opinion, nor even with that of the hon. member for West Durham, nor with that of any of the leading lawyers of the Reform party, but he came to the hon. member for West Simcoe and got his opinion. My hon. friend from West Simcoe, taking legally the same view he expressed here in his Parliamentary capacity, said the returning officer's duty was still partly judicial; and, applying a liberal construction to the Statute, he had the right to allow the two or three deputy returning officers, who had not sent in statements, to supply the omission before making up his declaration. Those statements having been so made up, the hon. member for West Huron was returned, no doubt rightly and properly, because he had a majority of the votes, so far as the merits of the election went; but, in my opinion, wrongly according to the strict meaning of the Act. Yet my hon. friend says the duties of the returning officer are purely ministerial, though he himself is sitting in this House by virtue of the exercise by that officer of judicial duties. This inconsistency shows that we should not be too fast in coming to a conclusion; that the matter is one of so great importance that the reason given by the hon. Premier for its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections are well founded, and that the duties and functions of returning officers are still in such doubt, it is desirable we should have them fully investigated now when the question is brought before us. This is the proper time, and this Committee is the proper tribunal for deciding this matter—not only this particular case, but to give the whole question such a thorough investigation as will establish a precedent that will bind Parliament in all like cases hereafter. For those reasons it seems to me so free from doubt as scarcely to require argument that our proper course is to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which, I am sure, acting in the spirit in which it acted on a former occasion, will do justice between man and man in this important matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Although the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and the hon. member for West Simcoe, both expressed the opinion that laymen should not interfere in this argument, I venture to attack the position the hon. gentleman has taken, and to present, as well as I can, the views which, as an impartial observer and an impartial judge in the matter, I feel bound to express. The hon. gentleman affected a tone of great moderation, and assured the House of his anxiety to reach the truth in regard to the course to be taken in this serious case, and I have to express my extreme regret that he was so unsuccessful in his search. There was, Sir, some appearance of fairness in the remarks of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House in opening the case. There was a still greater appearance of fairness in the language of the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) when he frankly gave away the whole case by admitting that the returning officer would have done better had he returned the man who had the larger number of votes; but as the debate proceeded we found a degeneration in argument, until the hon. gentleman who has just spoken occupied actually an hour of our time without presenting one single point that affects the position. The hon. gentleman proceeded upon the assumption that what he calls Parliamentary Law has reference to English Statutes and English precedents in connection with those Statutes. The hon. member for Simcoe carefully avoided the slightest reference to our own Statute, under which alone Parliamentary Law can be created. What is Parliamentary Law but a reference to the cases which have been decided under the Statute Law of the country? Now, so far as our Parliamentary Law goes prior to 1874, the cases are wholly in favor of the contention of my hon. friend from West Huron. There has been no case since 1874, when the law was radically changed. We have, therefore, no Parliamentary Law to appeal to, if we strictly interpret the meaning of the present Statute. But we are willing to go beyond that, and appeal to the precedents under the Statute Law of the old Province of Canada up to the time of the change I have alluded to, in 1874; and in every one of those cases we find the one great principle taking precedence of everything else, namely, that the person receiving the larger number of votes should be elected. That is the Parliamentary Law; and I hope my hon. friend won't go out, for I intend to deal with some of his arguments shortly.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria, Ont.) I will return in a moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I dare say we can get on. Now, Sir, the right hon. gentleman in moving his amendment did not inform us what he proposed the court to enquire into. As I understood the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and the hon. gentleman for West Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), their enquiry is to be devoted altogether to matters entirely extraneous to the matter before the House. All that has been said about the Local Law and the proceedings taken by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Robertson), is matter that might possibly go to an Election Court, but they are not matters with which we have anything to do. They do not in the slightest degree affect the merits of the case, because the seat is claimed under the law of 1874, and we are not supposed to know anything concerning the details that may have taken place at the time of the election with regard to the resignation of the Local seat. I do not, therefore, intend to discuss that at all, further than this—and I regret that my hon. friend has gone out before I touched that point. In alluding to the claims made on this side of the House, that the certificate of the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, and the statement of the individuals who signed the paper and gave it to the returning officer, in reply to the assertion made on that side of the House, that these papers were improperly before us, the hon. gentleman said: "Well the papers are there, the documents are before us, and we cannot help"—I think he said, I took down his very words—"we cannot shut our eyes to these documents." Now, what I have to ask—and I ask it from the hon. member for Victoria with the greatest possible humility, seeing I am one of the laymen—I ask if it is a rule of law to receive evidence which would not be admissible upon trial? My impressions were that in a case conducted by the hon. gentleman himself he would ask for the judgment of the court to rule out such evidence as he here says we cannot shut our eyes to. Now, the hon. gentleman has shut his eyes to everything, apparently, except what leads to retaining the seat for a political friend of his own. Now, Sir, I take it to be the duty of the leader of the House, instead of sending this matter to a Committee to make vague and meaningless enquiries, to protect the rights and Parliamentary position of every man who has been elected to this House. I understand that his duty, as leader of the House, is to see that the Election Law is complied with, and that nothing is suffered to interfere with the return of a member according to that law and his taking his seat in this House. Now, what are the facts of this case? I will not discuss at any length whether a returning officer has or has not any ministerial duties; I will merely say that no member yet, from the Premier down, has shown a particle of authority, for the assertion that he had any other than ministerial or executive duties. The law is most explicit upon the question of the duties of a returning officer—and I refer to the law with all the more confidence that I had something to do with placing it on the Statute-book, and to that law we now appeal. The present Chief Justice of Quebec was chiefly concerned in drafting this Statute; and the principal object he had in view, and that I had in view, and that my Administration had in view, was to make it impossible for any one to deprive a candidate of his rights who had received a majority of votes. Now, let us read some of the clauses that relate to this. The 59th section declares:

"The returning officer at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them in the presence of the election clerk, the candidates or their representatives present, and of at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate, from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers."

This is most explicit as to the duty immediately after the polling. Then the sub-section declares that the candidate who shall, in the summing up of the votes, be found to have the majority of the votes, be then declared elected. There is no room for an assertion that any judicial duties are imposed upon him or exercised by him. Then the 60th section provides that:

"When on the final addition of votes by the returning officer, and equality of votes is found to exist between any of the candidates, and the addition of a vote would entitle any of such candidates to be declared elected, the returning officer shall give such additional or casting vote, but shall in no other case have the right to vote."

Could anything be more explicit than that? The hon. gentleman who has just sat down declared from the reading of the paragraph in the Controverted Elections Act, that because the words "double return" are used in order to cover every possible case that might arise, therefore the Statute regulating elections is to be interpreted by a clause in another Statute. I venture to say there is very little law in that, and very little justice if there is any law; and I am afraid he would hardly venture into a court of justice—though he may do it here—to lay down such a proposition as that a clause in a different Statute altogether is to take the place of one in another positive enactment. Then the 61st section provides:

"The returning officer, within four days after such verification, shall transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected, and shall forward to each of the respective candidates a duplicate or copy thereof, and such return shall be in the form Schedule S to this Act."

Now in this case there was no equality of votes, therefore the returning officer had no right to vote. There being no equality of votes it was impossible there could be a double return; and it is the exercise of the flimsiest sophistry to allege that because the words "double return" are mentioned in the Controverted Elections Act, there might be a double return where the officer is directed—where it is made mandatory upon him—to settle the case and vote in favor of one of the candidates. This is not directory, in the English Act it is directory. "He may give," here it is "He shall give." Now, with regard to the provisions of the 56th section, that the returning officer, within four days after such verification, shall transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, declaring who had the largest number of votes, that return was not made, and the returning officer violated his duty, and by a plain violation of his duty he has deprived an hon. member from his seat, who was elected to a seat in this House. And now the hon. leader of the House, disregarding the Statute Law that is before his face, disregarding right and justice in this matter, and backed up by two gentlemen who think that because they are lawyers they are peculiarly qualified to decide every case, no matter what its merits may be—they are all anxious to keep a man out of his seat whom they know has been duly elected to it by a considerable majority of the legal votes cast. This is the real position of the matter, and no amount of special pleading, however able it may be—and I admit the ingenuity of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) in making special pleadings—will do away with the simple and incontrovertible fact that the majority of votes was given to this candidate whom we desire to see in his proper place in this House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I was endeavoring to show, before recess, the position in which this matter stands, viewed as I view it from a common sense stand-point, as well as, for I pretend to know the law, from a legal stand-point; and I was endeavoring to point out the varied inconsistencies which characterized the speeches of hon. members on the other side of the House. It is true the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) appealed to the House most warmly and earnestly, apparently, to consider this question in a judicial spirit, and endeavored to do what was right; in short, to fulfil the law in a measure of justice as well as of technical obligations to that law. But if my hon. friend meant that speech which he made to-night as a judicial examination of the subject, I can only say that I should like to hear him when engaged in presenting a partisan view of a point. It did appear to me that his speech, and that of the hon. member for West Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), were strongly characteristic of the political partisan rather than of the judicial official. The right hon. gentleman who leads the House admitted, to use his own words, that the tendency in legislation of late years was to deprive returning officers of any judicial power to act, to make them mere executive or ministerial officers; but he did not make any attempt to show wherein the present law failed to accomplish what, according to the inference I drew from his words, he seemed to regard as a beneficial change. If the right hon. gentleman can point out any wording which is necessary in the Statute of 1874, which regulates elections, to make it more completely a ministerial duty on the part of returning officers, I should like to know it. I am not able myself, I confess, to imagine any words more complete in their meaning, by any and every possible interpretation, than Sections 58 to 62, which regulate the duties of returning officers; and if we are to assume to ourselves the duty of determining upon elections, we may at once revert to the position we occupied under the Grenville Act, where it was naturally the case that men were seated or unseated, to a very great extent, by a political prejudice or feeling. We deliberately, as a matter of choice, by the Act which was passed, and has since been amended, divested ourselves of all authority respecting the seating of members, except where we found that something might strike the House as being absolutely necessary to do; in other words, we retained the power, but with the understanding that all questions of the kind raised by this case shall be determined by a judicial body, namely, the Election Court. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) has explained that if we seated Dr. Robertson under a direct motion of the House, we at once deprive his opponent of the right of petitioning, as that opponent has allowed the time to lapse. This House is not responsible for the lapse of time. The gentleman who had a minority of votes, knew the Election Law, I presume. He must have known it was the duty of the returning officer to return the candidate who had received the majority of votes, and if he imagined he could unseat the person so chosen and elected, by an appeal to the Judges of the Election Court, then he had a right to do so; but he had no right to presume, nor had any one a right to presume, that this House would permit the occupation of one of its seats by a candidate who had a minority of votes, or that the House would reject an application for his seat by a member who was duly returned by a majority of votes. While I decline to discuss the question as to whether the resignation by Dr. Robertson of the seat in the Local House, was regular or not, or the question whether the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province was or was not acting under a strict sense of duty in giving his certificate, that he had not received any resignation, I hold there is but one view to be taken on the one vital issue, even from the point of view of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who assume that the returning officer had a certain right to act in a judicial manner; in other words, that he had the right to question and decide on the qualification of one of the candidates before him. The Act gives no such power; there is nothing in the Act which hon. gentlemen opposite can point out as implying that it gives that power. There is the simple declaration that the returning officer shall receive the nomination paper signed by a certain number of electors, accompanied by a deposit of a certain sum of money, and accompanied also by a letter of acceptance from the candidate himself. Beyond that he has no right to go; but if the returning officer assumed, as he did afterwards in this case, evidently under some inspiration of which we are not informed, the right to judge as to the qualification of the candidates, then he should have judged unfavorably of that candidate at the time the nominations were made. It was his duty to have said: "This person is disqualified by reason of his not having made his resignation at the proper time of the Local seat, and, therefore, I decline to place his name on the list of candidates to be voted for." While such a decision would be unaccountable to me, and extravagant in its presumption, yet I could understand, if the judicial power was to be assumed at all, that was the time to assume such authority. The returning officer would have been liable to the just censure of the House for such an exercise of power which he was not entrusted with; but, at the same time, it would have enabled the electors to nominate some one else, if the returning officer had refused to accept the nomination of Dr. Robertson. As it is, there was no choice, and the names having been regularly placed on the list, the returning officer declared, in the loudest tones and terms he could use, that Dr. Robertson was a candidate with Mr. McDonald for election for that county. Dr. Robertson received an absolute majority of the votes polled, and it was only after those votes were received and the summation of the votes made that the returning officer presumed to exercise the power which he did exercise, of refusing to declare elected the gentleman who had the majority of votes. Such a proceeding was altogether unjustifiable. The right hon. First Minister and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Brecken), in their speeches the other day, took the ground that there was a natural necessity for a returning officer exercising such discretion in placing the names of parties who were nominated upon the election list, and the right hon. gentleman suggested the case of a felon being nominated. The member for Queen's immediately followed, taking up the same idea; and that gentleman evidently forgot that there were precedents for returning officers being obliged, in the exercise of their duties, to receive the nominations of felons. Then the right hon. gentleman assumed that for fear a female might be nominated, which would be perfectly irregular, it would be necessary for the returning officer to order an inquisition to discover the sex of the candidate. Anything more weak, more absurd, more ridiculous, could scarcely be uttered by any one; and to have this gravely propounded by the leader of the House, was evidence to me of how little he had to say in justification of the extraordinary course pursued by this returning officer. Not, Sir, but what I partially expected that, because, during all my Parliamentary life, I am bound to say I have generally found the right hon. gentleman and his friends very willing to give their support in questionable cases to the members of their own party; while I am not aware of a single case where the Liberal party have endeavored to deprive and keep by any vote any member of and from his seat. Well, hon. gentlemen may laugh; but I would be glad to know where the precedents are. Nay, more, Sir, it will be admitted the gentlemen on this side of the House, when in power, lost no time in the very first Session in which they controlled a majority in Parliament, in taking pains to make the law as explicit as possible, and so explicit that during the elections run since, only this single case has arisen under that Act; and no one yet has pointed out on the Ministerial side of the House to-day, a single clause, or word or paragraph, by which the returning officer can, by any pretence, justify his action in refusing to return the member who had the majority of votes; and if there are any words, which can make the Statute more explicit, I would like to hear them repeated, and if there is anything more definite laid down in any other Election Law in the world, as to the duties of returning officers, I would like extremely to know where they can be found. Now, I have watched with the utmost anxiety and the greatest eagerness, the course which was to be pursued by gentlemen opposite, upon this question. It is true that the gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the House have avowed an intention to consider this matter impartially; but I was amused at the member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) who spoke of the view which the Ministerial side of the House took of the question, showing that it was a Ministerial question, and that, however anxious members opposite might be to do what is just and fair in this case, we know now that the Ministerial whip is cracked over them, and that every one of them is expected to do his duty by voting for the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman, no matter in what way should be interpreted the Election Law which governs this case. Now, some person is entitled to the seat. The law supposes that every election return has been complete; and it is complete in all cases except this one. No one has this seat, and certainly a number of the people are unrepresented, and until they be represented there is an absolute injustice done to some person, and also to the electors in question. Prima facie, the man who has the greatest number of votes is the man entitled to be elected, and there was due notice given of this, as a matter of course, in the Election Act to every one who is a candidate. The returning officer, according to law, has a copy of the Election Law placed in his hands by which to be guided in making his return. That return was not, however, made according to the direction of the law, and, therefore, the man who had the majority of votes is deprived of his seat. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored to argue a great deal—and wholly from the premises connected with Local Legislation—as to whether the resignation was regular or irregular, and whether it was in time or out of time; but that is a matter for the courts to determine—it is not a matter for us. We have a plain duty before us, and that duty is to seek the man who has received the greatest number of votes, as the one, and the only one, who could be by law duly elected. Any question of qualification might arise—and I have no doubt that they will arise—if this case goes in the way the hon. Ministers are apparently determined it shall go; but if the law remain as it is—or indeed whether the law remain as it is, or not—if the present Parliament in power retain their position, we are fairly warned by this case, that in the future it shall be optional with a returning officer to decide in his own mind, whether I or any other member on this side of this House, be, or is qualified to be, elected as a member of Parliament. Some five or six men will go to the returning officer and say: "We know that A.B. is a contractor with the Government, and that he is not qualified to be a member." The returning officer, acting on this precedent which is about to be set, will—if he is an extreme partisan, or a weak man subject to the influence of the partisans around him—as a matter of course follow this example, and will decide: “I will not return A.B. because he is said by some parties to be a contractor.” Now, the right hon. gentlemen in his change of the Election Law, last Session, took additional security for the performance of such antics as this by the election of returning officers, because he took the power to appoint such men as he pleased; and chose men who have conducted the elections, in many places, in a most extraordinary way, too much of what we anticipated at the time that this Act was amended last year, has taken place in the irregularities which have characterized many of the elections. Now, I appeal to every member of the House; I appeal to a higher law than even our Statute of 1874; I appeal to that Statute which provides that every just and honest man will endeavor to and ought to endeavor to do unto others as he would that others would do unto him. I ask, if there is a single member in this House, who looks at this case dispassionately, and who knows that this Dr. Robertson had a large majority of votes, who will say, if he was in his place, he would not take the seat; or if his friend and brother opposite him was in a similar position whether he would vote to deprive him of his seat in this House. We read in an ancient Statute-book, much more ancient than any of ours, of the case of certain people who habitually set aside the fundamental and moral laws, and we read that the Pharisees of Judea made the law of God of none effect by their traditions; and so, Sir, we find the due successors of those Pharisees to-day, instead of serving the law, setting aside the law of the land by these traditions, and this in a matter so deeply affecting the rights of the people as this question does affect them. Now, Sir, I think that I can appeal, with some degree of confidence, to the inner consciousness of the members of this House, the representatives of the people in it, as to who is right or wrong in this matter; as to whether the returning officer failed or did not fail in the discharge of his duty. Let them take the Statute of 1874 and read it carefully, and I am perfectly satisfied that no man will decide or can decide in any other way than that this officer violated the law, refused to perform his duty, and failed to accomplish what the law required him to do, placed in the position in which he was placed. I am only astonished, very much astonished—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Amazed!

Mr. MACKENZIE. Amazed. My hon. friend recalls a word which, I believe, I have used very frequently, and if he can imagine any word that can more strongly express the feeling, I am quite willing he should substitute it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Bewildered!

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am sure no one is better qualified to appreciate the position than the right hon. gentleman, or understands more thoroughly than he does, that he is not doing in the matter that justice to the candidate that he would like to be done to him if he were in a similar position; and that is after all the real test of what is right or wrong in this world. If the hon. gentleman can point out anything to me which justifies a different conclusion, I shall undoubtedly go with them in any motion which they may propose that is consistent with the law of the land. But the hon. gentleman makes a motion which is intended to deprive a member of his rights, which is intended to set an evil example to returning officers, which is intended as a public proclamation that—although the law is explicit and mandatory as well as directory as to certain things being done—if they do not do them their offence will be looked upon as a venial one; and that if the candidate deprived of his seat by such means only belongs to the minority for the time being, hon. gentlemen opposite will give him ample protection. That is the implied intention of hon. gentlemen opposite. Nothing else can be deduced from their arguments and statements than that this plan will be carried out in future. I, therefore, appeal most anxiously to the House to do what is right in this matter, to discard every consideration but what is required to ascertain what constitutes a precise observance of the law which we are required to recognize, and what is a violation of the law which we are required to condemn. On a former occasion, when a case of this sort was before the House, I moved an amendment to the amendment. I shall do so again to-night, if he orders, under almost precisely similar circumstances to bring back the division to the point of a strict and express approval or disapproval of the course of the returning officer. I am anxious to know if hon. gentlemen opposite will really set aside all justice, will violate all law, and say that they are resolved, in spite of every consideration which can be mentioned in connection with the law, to deprive a man of the right he has attained under the law; or whether, like hon. members on this side, they will act fairly, honestly and justly, in requiring returning officers to observe the law at they ought to observe it. I move in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word “That” be left out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:—“this House deems it proper in the matter of the return for the electoral district of King’s, in the Island of Prince Edward, to act upon the law of Parliament, as established in the precedents of the old Parliament of Canada, and the Parliament of the Dominion, in the Beauharnois, Kent, Oxford, Gaspé, Bagot, Essex, Lennox and Addington and Muskoka cases, and the law passed by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada in 1874, respecting Elections, which enacts that the returning officer shall, at the place and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, proceed to open them in the presence of the election clerk, the candidates or their representatives, if present; and of at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers, and that the candidate who shall on the summing up of the votes be found to have a majority of votes, shall be then declared elected, and that the returning officer shall transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been elected.

“Also in conformity with these precedents and this law, to assist its jurisdiction, to maintain its privileges, and forthwith to redress the violation of law and duty apparent on the papers which has been committed by the returning officer in not returning as elected the candidate having the greatest number of votes; and this House declares that James Edwin Robertson should have been returned as one of the members for the said County of King’s by the said returning officer, saving all rights of all persons to contest the election and return.”

With the permission of the House, there is just one word which I desire to say with reference to a matter mentioned by the hon. member for Victoria, recalling incidents connected with a meeting of the Privileges and Elections Committee in the Parliament before the last, in regard to Mr. Anglin’s case. I heard the right hon. gentleman opposite accuse my hon. friend for West Durham of shamming sickness on that occasion. From the position I held at that time in the House, and in the Committee, I had the best reasons to know that no charge could be more unfair or unjust, and I would feel that I was not discharging my duty, man to man, unless, after what passed, I bore my testimony to that undoubted fact.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot well follow the resolution, which is a very lengthy one, and which has not been communicated to me. It occurs to me, however, to be in substance the main motion. It seems to me it is out of order.

Mr. FLAKE. We have had this question up several times, and nothing is clearer than that when different statements are made, and additional observations introduced into an amendment, it is different from the original motion. This is very like the motion made in amendment to the amendment in the West Peteborough case. We have had this question raised time and again, and I think under your predecessors, Sir, you will find that motions bearing less on the original motion than this does have been held to be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. In a case which the amendment and the amendment to the amendment left out several recitals that were in the original motion, Mr. Speaker Cockburn ruled that the amendment to the amendment was in order. He says:

"It proposes to the House a resolution which is substantially the same as that involved in the original motion, but it omits considerable matter of recital both of fact and law, and in that respect I think the proposition is one which the hon. member may propose as an amendment. He may say very properly, as he does say, that he has no desire to commit the House to the recitals which form a part of the original motion. I think the motion is, therefore, in order."

That decision of Mr. Speaker Cockburn was given on the occasion of submitting the resolutions respecting the British North America Act, to which Sir George Cartier moved an amendment, and Mr. Dorion moved an amendment to the amendment, to which Mr. Harrison raised the objection. In the Peterborough case, the report of which has just been placed in my hands, I find that Mr. Blake moved, in effect, that John Bertram having received a majority of votes over William Claxton, ought to have been returned. The right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald moved, in amendment, to refer the question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Mr. Mackenzie moved, in amendment to the amendment:

"That the words: 'the return made by the returning officer of a member to represent the West Riding of the County of Peterborough in this House, and all the papers connected therewith, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to be appointed in pursuance of the Orders of this House, made on the 6th instant, with instructions to proceed without delay, and report to this House on the proper and legal course to be adopted with regard to the said return, in order that the rights of all parties concerned may be duly protected,' be left out, and the words 'this House deems it proper, in the matter of the return for West Peterborough, to act upon the precedents in the Parliament of the Province of Canada in the Oxford case, the Kent case, the Beauharnois case, the Bagot case, and the Lennox and Addington case, and in conformity with these precedents, to assert its jurisdiction, to maintain its privileges, and forthwith to redress the grievous and flagrant violation of law and duty apparent on the papers—which has been committed by returning the defeated as the successful candidate; and this House declares that John Bertram Esq., should have been returned as member for West Peterborough and has a right to take his seat saving all rights of all other persons to contest the election and returns,' inserted instead thereof."

The question of order does not appear to have been taken in this case. The amendment to the amendment, containing different recitals from what are contained in the original motion, although the concluding portion seems to be substantially the same, would, therefore, seem by these precedents to be in order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. There are two propositions before the House, Sir, or were a few moments ago, until the amendment of the hon. member for East York was proposed. These two propositions are submitted for the consideration of a House composed, Sir, with yourself, of 211 members, I think, nearly half of whom are new to this Parliament; and how it would be possible for those new members, I being one of them, to undertake in the short time we have had to go through the different cases, to read them, to study them, to understand them, so that we could give an intelligent vote on this subject, I am at a loss to know. The hon. member who made the first motion asked this House to seat a member from Prince Edward Island. The first asked that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery do attend with the necessary papers at the Table of the House, which was done. I do not think that the hon. member, at that moment, knew exactly what those papers contained, but the moment they were read, this House was seized of the facts contained in those papers; and I was rather surprised to find that the hon. member for West Huron—like a lawyer who has asked a question of a witness when he did not know exactly the answer that would be given, or was, as it is called, "fishing for evidence"—found that the papers were a little too much for him, that they stated more than he expected, and, therefore, he complained of their extent. In his first motion he asked for the papers. After the papers came down, he said: "There are other papers before Parliament now—I think improperly before Parliament." But he was the hon. member who asked for these papers. We turn back to the files of the 19th February, and find the following motion made by the hon. member for West Huron:—

"That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery do attend this House, to-morrow, with the returns of the last Election for the Electoral District of King's County, P.E.I., together with the statements of the several deputy returning officers, for the said Electoral District; and any documents used, or required at such election, or which may have been transmitted to said returning officer, by such deputies."

On that motion the papers were brought down. Then the hon. member said he thought they were improperly before the House. If they were, he was the means of bringing them here. I do not think that the House can possibly go back on the consideration of those papers. What do they state? They state, not that Mr. McDonald or Dr. Robertson is entitled to the seat here—they state that Dr. Robertson had more votes than Mr. McDonald, but that Mr. McDonald was a candidate against whom nothing had been said, while, on the contrary, evidence had been adduced before the returning officer of that county, showing that Dr. Robertson was not qualified to take his seat. Now that we are seized of these papers, how is it possible for us to give the seat to Dr. Robertson? If the returns had not shown what they have, the motion of the hon. member for West Huron, would possibly have prevailed, but the House is possessed of all these papers, and, in order to obtain an intelligent opinion on the case, it is necessary—especially for the new members, of whom I am one—that we should have some time to deliberate; and in taking this time I do not see that any wrong is done either to Dr. Robertson or to Mr. McDonald. It is a very serious thing to deal with the seat of any hon. member. There is no member more willing than I to give a vote in favor of any contention which, I think, is borne out by law and by fact. If we did what the hon. member for Huron asks us to do, we would place Dr. Robertson in such a position that he might well exclaim in the words of another eminent gentleman: "Save me from my friends." We would place him in this position under the Act of 1873, from which I quote:

"If any person who is made by this Act ineligible as a member of the House of Commons or incapable of sitting or voting therein, does, nevertheless, so sit or vote, he shall forfeit the sum of two thousand dollars for every day he sits or votes, and such sum may be recovered from him by any person who will sue for the same, by action in any form allowed by the law of procedure in the Province in which action is brought in any court having jurisdiction."

The preceding clause says:

"If any member of the House of Commons shall be elected and returned to any Legislative Assembly, or shall be elected or appointed a member of any Legislative Council, and accept the seat, his election as a member of the House of Commons"—

Now I will quote the Act of 1872. The first clause says:

"No person shall be eligible to, or be capable of being nominated to or voted for, or of being elected to or of sitting or voting in the House of Commons, who on the day of the nomination at any election to the House of Commons, is a member of the Legislative Council or Assembly of any Province in which, by law, members of the Senate or House of Commons are rendered incapable of being appointed to, or of sitting or voting in the Legislative Council or of being elected to, or of sitting or voting in the House of Assembly thereof."

The second clause is as follows:—

"If any such member of a Provincial Legislature shall, notwithstanding his disqualification as in the preceding section mentioned, receive a majority of votes at any such election, such majority of votes shall be thrown away, and it shall be the duty of the returning officer to return the person having the next greatest number of votes, provided he be otherwise eligible."

If that be law—

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. member for West Durham says "hear, hear," and so does his faithful friend behind him, who made a very able speech, as an election speech, but not a very legal speech—the hon. member who got his seat without any contestation whatever. I say if this be the law—and I am not as wise as many of the hon. members opposite—as has been said by the hon. member for West Simcoe, if this be the law, shall not we, half of whom are new members, have time given us to consider? If this be the law, the votes given for Dr. Robertson may be thrown away. It may turn out that Dr. Robertson is entitled to the seat. No one would be more pleased at this than I, for I sympathize with small numbers, and I would not take away the slightest degree of comfort from the hon. members opposite. If they can feel any happier than they look by getting another member, I would be the last man to vote to take away that member. The hon. member for Queen's, who is so happy in his seat, and has no trouble, and who, if report says truly, is the retained counsel of Dr. Robertson—

Mr. BLAKE. Order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I do not say this as a stigma on the hon. member. I only say it to show that the zeal he has evinced in the matter of his speech is the product of his being so intimately related with the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was not a brief speech at all.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The moment the hon. member for Simcoe had departed in the slightest degree from the legal argument he so clearly and ably adduced here, we heard the hon. member for West Huron make his ironical "hear, hear," and exclaim, "You are an honest judge." The moment the hon. member for Victoria made his statement of the case in his calm, lucid and most able manner, we heard the same remark again. We heard the remark that he was prejudging the case; and I could not help noticing the fact that an hon. member opposite, who made a very good speech, was retained as counsel.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not call the hon. gentleman to order because he should not mention it if it was true, but because it was not true, and the Rules of this House forbid, under the most severe penalties, any member of the long robe taking part in a discussion in which he has been retained as counsel.

Mr. WOODWORTH. It would have been better if, when I had been called to order and interrupted, the explanation had come from the hon. member himself. I think that when the hon. member for West Durham makes this bold statement that it is not true, he should have given some other proof than merely calling me to order. It would have been much more in keeping with the deliberations of this House and in accordance with the practice of Parliament for the hon. member affected by the statement to have made the explanation. I am glad to see that my hon. friend does not deny it. I stated it without the slightest ill-will, notwithstanding the provocation from the other side. My hon. friend from Queen's, who has got rid of all the troubles and trials of his election campaign, quoted in his eloquent speech, from some remarks made by Mr. Gladstone in 1870, I think on the O'Donovan Rossa case. As that has been so ably handled by the hon. member for North Victoria, I shall merely allude to it; but if he had quoted some other part of what Mr. Gladstone said he would have put himself out of court altogether. Mr. Gladstone said further:

"The law and precedents applicable to this case are, on every point of substance, perfectly clear."

That is the reason Parliament dealt with that matter, but, in every case in the Parliament of Great Britain where there is a doubt as to the law and the fact, is it sent to a Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections such as we have here? No, Sir, it is sent to a Select Committee, and the House goes to the trouble of appointing a Select Committee to which to send these matters. I will also quote from May's "Parliamentary Practice," page 548, to show the law on this point:

"Whenever any question is raised affecting the seat of a member, and involving matters of doubt, either in law or fact, it is customary to refer it to the consideration of a Committee."

The very words, almost of Mr. Gladstone. One hon. member quotes from the West Peterborough case. I do not know anything about that case, and I doubt if many members here do. Yet, they are called upon to vote immediately on the proposal of the hon. member for West Huron, to put Dr. Robertson in his seat here, and if we did so, he would be liable, possibly, to a penalty of $2,000 a day for sitting here. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), is merely a recapitulation, as I understood it, of statements made on that side of the House—perfectly true they may be for aught I know, but they do not lead us to any conclusion. The difficulty we have to solve is this: that we do not know at this moment—though the hon. the First Minister and the hon. member for West Durham may know—but the majority of the members here do not know at this moment what are the rights of this matter. They do not want to do an injury to Dr. Robertson or Mr. McDonald, and they want this matter fully investigated so that the right man may get the seat. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for East York state that he had nothing to do with the question of whether the time had expired for petition in this matter. He did not care anything about that, all he wanted was to get a man named Robertson into the House. I am quite sure that if Dr. Robertson got his seat unfairly, and if he was a fair man, he would not thank the hon. member for East York or any other member for placing him in a seat to which he was not entitled. This is the first question of the kind that has come to my cognizance during my Parliamentary experience, and I certainly would be very loth on the first vote I gave in the Dominion Parliament, to give one that might hereafter be found contrary to right and to justice and to law. The hon. gentleman quoted something in regard to the Pharisees when he sat down. Well, Sir, we have all been well brought up, and have all learned something about the Pharisees. There was a time when hon. members opposite sat on this side of the House, and they appeared as if they wanted a whitewashing, and they got it too. But how unkind it would be for any member to apply to them the remark that was made about the Pharisees, that though they appeared outwardly beautiful, inwardly they were full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. How unkind that would be, and yet they did appear outwardly beautiful, until at last the veil was removed, and the Committee ascertained that while sitting here they were violating the laws of Parliament every breath they drew. Of course I shall not go into these quotations, because time would fail me, and it would not be profitable to the House; but I reiterate again that this matter should be taken out of the region of partisanship, and when it comes before the Committee—if I am on the Committee, and I believe I am—I promise to give it my most earnest attention, and to vote for disposing of the matter in the direction indicated by the law and the facts, without regard to which side they may favor. In the meantime I shall vote that this matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as has been suggested by the hon. Premier on whom rests a great deal of responsibility, who is an old Parliamentarian and who has the law of Parliament almost at his finger's ends. In the case Mr. Gladstone referred to there was no doubt; but in this case the hon. Premier says there is a doubt. We all know there is; and I shall vote to send it to a Committee, where these doubts may be cleared up and the matter properly adjusted.

Mr. FLEMING. I desire to make a few observations on this important subject, and if I fail to maintain that proper judicial spirit in my remarks which characterized the opening of the address of the hon. member for North Victoria, and which he maintained so successfully throughout, it will be attributed to my want of the varied experience which he has had in Parliament and otherwise, and which he made so abundantly evident in the course of his address. But although there may be a suspicion that the hon. member for Victoria departed from a calm judicial consideration of the case—although I have heard laymen in the House assert that he had, to some extent, in stating the facts, and quoting so largely as he did from the Statutes of the Island, prejudged the case which hon. gentlemen opposite propose to send to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; yet I must say, in the absence of all judicial authority, for the course suggested by the supporters of the amendment, there is judicial authority for the position of the hon. member. I have read of a case, it is true it is the case of a foreign court, but with that respect which we ought to show for the judicial decisions of a friendly nation it is worthy of respect. This must have been operating upon the mind of the hon. gentleman, and his remarks seem to have been founded upon it. The case was one of a Dutch Justice in the Western States, who after having considered the matter before him, said: "I will take three days to consider this case, but ultimately I will decide for the plaintiff." I do not think it is necessary that I should allude to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. I do not think, with all due deference to his argument, that he added anything to what had been already said, and said better by those who had preceded him. The opening argument which he addressed was one that had been repeated by others before, namely, that this House was seized of the papers which the returning officer returned; and he quoted from the speech of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) and from the Votes and Proceedings, to show that those papers were here at his instance and upon his motion, in order to show that the hon. member for West Huron was responsible for the presence of the papers, and that they could not be ignored. But every lawyer knows, indeed I have found that laymen in this House know, that there may be papers returned in connection with a return here, as there may be in other courts, that cannot be read in connection with the returns. If the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House from the other side attempted, in the course of their legal practice at nisi prius, to attach a paper which had no connection with the record, and stating facts not within the record, it would be excluded as not pertinent to the case; just as, in regard to these papers, when the returning officer by the Statute is instructed to make a specific return, everything outside of that is outside of the record, and all such papers transmitted are extraneous, and not pertinent to the return, and in the proper sense are not before the House at all. But we have the hon. gentleman quoting from Mr. Gladstone again—the third time the quotation has been made in this House—and then pleading ignorance of the question because he has not had time to give it calm consideration, to look into precedents and examine cases. What, I should like to ask, has the hon. gentleman been doing during these busy days of the Session? I do not know that hon. members have been employed to any great extent since the 20th February, when the papers in this case were brought before the House. I am not aware that legislative duties have borne so heavily on hon. members as to render them unable to give that consideration to this important subject which it demands, and which they themselves say it demands. These papers, as I have already said, were laid before the House on 20th February. Their consideration has been adjourned three times at the instance of the hon. leader of the Government, in order that he and his supporters might have an opportunity of looking into them; and yet, after all this delay, they come and tell the House they are unable to find precedents contrary to those cited by the hon. member for West Huron, and in the amendment to the amendment. They have not been able to find them, because there are no other precedents to find. They have not been able to find on record that the Parliament of this country has ever decided questions of this kind in any other way than that proposed by the hon. member for West Huron. We are about to depart, for the first time, from the course which those precedents declare Parliament has invariably followed, and that, too, at a period in the history of the Dominion when a departure is of the very greatest importance—at a period when the law has been changed so that the nomination of the returning officers is in the hands of the Administration of the day—at a period when the law has been changed so that returning officers no longer hold their appointments by reason of the high positions they occupy in the public service, but as the nominees of the Administration of the day; and we are about to make that departure, if the amendment is adopted and the case transmitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, unless the House first declares clearly and specifically what it considers to be the duty of the returning officers; and there will then be established a precedent which will, I fear, when other elections be productive of fruits, the like of which we see come round, in several cases in the present House, and we will see many more of them. The object of hon. members supporting the motion and the amendment to the amendment is that the House should affirm, and affirm clearly, that this House shall consist of members elected by a majority of the people and no others; that no members shall occupy seats by virtue of any law or functions, whether judicial or otherwise, on the part of returning officers, except such as are contained in the Statute. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) has stated that the hon. member for West Huron occupies his seat by virtue of the judicial functions exercised by the returning officer in that county, because he deferred the declaration until he got all the returns in—because the returning officer manifestly performed his duty by waiting until all the deputies had furnished him with their ballot boxes, and the proper papers by which he could declare who was elected; because he did that the hon. member for Victoria with his judicial mind, which his speech so well exemplified, declared that the returning officer was exercising judicial functions! Why, to adjourn for dinner would then be exercising judicial functions! To adjourn for any other necessary purpose would have been exercising judicial functions! And there are, if rumor speaks correctly, hon. members in this House, who do occupy their seats by virtue of the judicial or other functions of returning officers—and there are in this House, if I am correctly informed, hon. members who, instead of being the representatives of the county that they purport here to represent, are functionaries of the functions of returning officers exercised in the last election. Now, Sir, to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things as this, this House owes to itself and to the members occupying seats here, to declare that when an hon. member has secured the confidence of the people, to whom he has appealed for confidence, that that hon. member shall be, by the officers appointed by this House for that purpose, duly returned according to the plain directions of the Statute. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, no precedents have arisen under the Election Act of 1874—that no question of this kind has arisen under it. I say that is a commentary upon the perfection of the Election Law of 1874 as it existed before it was changed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we find the effect of that change to be that at the very first election, after the change is made, we have this case coming up in this Parliament, and we have the other cases to which I have alluded, in which hon. members have either been refused their seats or have been improperly returned by the judicial or questionable functions of returning officers. But there is a precedent in point, a judicial decision by the highest court of the country. In the newspapers of the 28th of February, there was published the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the Queen's County election case, in which it was stated by one of the Judges that the functions of returning officers were ministerial and not judicial. Why, this House—although the official report has not been published—by the presence of the hon. member for that county—his corporal presence in this House—has judicial notice of that judgment; and that precedent is in accordance with the plain wording of the Statute and with the practice of Parliament in the past. All that is sought here by the hon. gentleman's motion, and by the amendment to the amendment is to affirm that principle, so as to prevent the recurrence of a case of this kind again. The hon. member for Simcoe in his very able argument—the ablest by all odds that we have heard from that side of the House—says, that the returning officer had grave doubts, and that there were great doubts in his mind, whether if he should return a gentleman to this House, who was not duly qualified, he was not liable to the penal clauses of the Statute; and the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the House, recited these penal clauses, to show that the returning officer had exercised a wise discretion in making the return he did in this case; and at the same time, these hon. gentlemen are telling us, that the returning officer would have done better, if he had returned Dr. Robertson as having the majority of votes. We heard them saying that, in order to save himself from the effect of the penal charges, he was obliged to make this return, while at the same time he could have made a better return, though in danger of suffering from the penal clauses, if he had done better than he has done. That is the effect of their argument upon the question of the penal clauses of the Statute. The hon. member for Simcoe puts, perhaps, the case in the strongest way in which it has come from that side of the House, when he says that Parliament would be acting improperly in declaring Dr. Robertson entitled to a seat to-day, when it might on the finding of the Committee be obliged to declare, that he was not entitled to the seat to-morrow. That is perhaps the strongest argument which has come from that side of the House, but it does not necessarily follow that Parliament would stultify itself if it acted in that way. On the contrary, I submit that Parliament would stultify itself, if it does not declare in the most clear and emphatic manner that the duty of the returning officer has not been performed in this case. The returning officer is an officer of this House. The returning officer has failed to return the member whom the people of the County of King's desired to sit here as their representative; and if the House fails to correct the return and do what the returning officer ought to have done, then this House is taking upon itself a responsibility and is assuming to perpetuate the wrong, and the responsibility of declaring that these people must go unrepresented or be represented by somebody not their choice. Now, Sir, there can be no danger, there can be no inconvenience, there can result no possible wrong, if the House adopts the motion as proposed to be amended by the amendment to the amendment, although the hon. member for Victoria has argued that if this House declares Dr. Robertson entitled to the seat, it leaves the other candidate without remedy, because the time has elapsed in which he could apply to the Election Court; but the hon. gentleman answered himself when he made that declaration in one breath, by citing from Bushby to show that Parliament, although it had passed a Statute providing an Election Court, had not divested itself of the right to declare whether or not a member has a right to a seat. The rights of the minority candidate are not taken away, although the time has elapsed. It is quite competent for any hon. member to rise in this House, even after the adoption of the motion of the hon. member for Huron, and move to refer the question of the qualification of Dr. Robertson to the Privileges and Elections Committee, so that the remedy is not taken away. All that is asked by the motion is that the fact should be emphasized that no returning officer shall take upon himself to elect members to this House—that no returning officer shall undertake the duty of declaring that the choice of the people shall not be returned to this House—that no returning officer shall dare to evade the clear declaration of Parliament and the country, or interfere in any way with the choice of electors. As a young member I have come to this House imbued with a deep sense of the dignity of Parliament. I have come here expecting that when hon. members were sitting in their places, exercising judicial functions as they are doing in this case, they would approach the consideration of a question of this kind in the same spirit, though perhaps not with the same wisdom, that the Judges of the other courts of the country would do. I was, therefore, disappointed when I heard the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the House, and I have been greatly disappointed at the manner in which this question has been discussed by hon. members on the other side. The question is one of such great importance that it is due to the security of every hon. member of this House that some clear declaration should be made that returning officers shall not interfere any further than the Statute gives them authority to do. Hon. members may be strong here to-day, but if returning officers are to be the electors in the future, as they have been during the last elections to some extent, hon. members may find that their own seats are not secure. They may be the choice of the people, but the returning officers exercising those judicial functions, which hon. members opposite say they have a right to exercise, may prevent them from occupying the positions to which the people have elected them.

Mr. AMYOT. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments which have been advanced on both sides of the House, for, being a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I was anxious to become acquainted with the facts of the case, and to hear how my colleagues understood the law. The hon. member for East York says very correctly that in the Act of 1874, section 59, are specifically stated the duties of returning officers, and he truly says that unless we find some other clause giving additional powers to those officers, they are bound to follow that clause. He is perfectly right in that. But if we find that there is a special clause in which the returning officer is bound to act in a certain way, if we find that the returning officer in this case has acted in that particular way, I hope the hon. member for East York will ask leave to withdraw his motion, and will say that the returning officer has acted properly. I admit with all the hon. members who have spoken on the other side of the House that generally speaking the returning officer has no judicial authority. A man may be a contractor or a Judge, he may be entirely disqualified, and the returning officer is bound to accept his nomination, he is bound to count the votes, and to declare elected the man who has a majority of votes. But there is one case in which he is bound to do the very reverse, and what is that case? When a man who is a member of the Local Legislature—who has been returned as such, and whose return has been published in the Official Gazette—becomes a candidate at a Federal Election, the returning officer is bound to accept the ballots; but if upon opening the ballot boxes this candidate is found to have a majority of votes, it becomes the duty of the returning officer to return the person having the next highest number of votes. The clause of the Statute is as follows:—

What is the position in this case? We had a returning officer who knew the candidate—who knew that he was the Local member, for he himself declared him returned for the Local House. Some say: Where is the proof that he is the same man? We have the oath of the returning officer himself. Let us take the common sense of the matter. We know that a house is a house, and that a river is a river, and the returning officer knew that Mr. Robertson was the member for the Local House and he declared so. Furthermore he gives us written evidence; we have authentic certificates; and if the returning officer of that constituency had not made the return he has made—in fact he has not gone far enough, inasmuch as he did not declare that the candidate having the next number of votes was duly elected—I say that if he had not made the return he has made he would have failed in his duty, and he might have been brought before this honorable House for contempt of Parliament. I admit that there would be the greatest possible danger in giving judicial authority, generally speaking, to the returning officers. Governments may change; our enemies either on this side or on the other may come in power, and then hon. gentlemen know what might happen. But the Legislature, in 1872, thought fit to except such cases as the present. Did the Legislature of that day foresee this election? I am told that very near me sits an hon. member in this House who had to fight another Local member of that same Province; and what became of his bogus resignation when that Local member was defeated? The resignation was thrown away, and the Local member went on sitting in the Local House. I do not care to enter into the merits of the case itself, but I am speaking on the amendment, and I think it was an election in which the returning officer was bound to accept the nomination papers and to open the ballot boxes, but upon being satisfied that the man having the majority of votes came under section 2, chapter 15, of 35 Victoria, he was equally bound to declare that that man was not eligible, and to return the person having the next highest number of votes. Now, what does the motion ask? It asks us to declare Dr. Robertson elected, that the law of the land is not to be observed, and that in spite of the contempt of the law exhibited by Dr. Robertson, the Statute shall not be vindicated in his particular case. That is, it is asked to declare by a mere resolution of this House that the Statute is not in force, but that we should act under the old laws of Canada and according to precedents. The old laws of Canada are no longer in force, when contrary to the Federal Statutes. As to precedents, they are sometimes the science of ignorance; very often precedents are cited when they only mean that the law has not been properly decided. I say, when we have a law so clear as the one I have quoted, we are bound to put aside the law of England and the precedents, and act according to our law. The motion, again, speaks of reserving rights. What rights? The law in force says that thirty days after the return is published in the Official Gazette, no petition can be brought before the courts; and does the hon. member for East York believe that by a mere resolution of the House he can change the law? Suppose that to-morrow, if that motion was carried, a petition came before a Judge—what would he say? He would say that the Gazette, on the 29th of June last, contained a double return, and that there was no petition against it within the lawful time—So Dr. Robertson would keep his seat in this House; we would have sitting in this House a member who had despised the law of the country, and who, according to the law of the country, had not been elected. It seems to me to be very clear that when such a question as this comes before the House, it is the duty of the House to declare that the law must be followed, or to send the case to the Committee to be enquired into. I am surprised that any members of this House should throw suspicion upon the integrity and intelligence on the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I find that the Committee includes six of the leaders and the best members of the Opposition, and I think that they ought to wait until that Committee brought in its report before casting any doubt or suspicion upon the other members of it. The Opposition may rest assured that we shall go there as judges anxious to do our duty, and not as partisans or attorneys of parties. If they are able to establish that the law is not as I stated, they will carry their point; if not I suppose the members of this honorable House will agree that the law should be followed.

Mr. AUGER. One of the arguments offered by those hon. members who oppose the motion of the hon. member for Huron is that the new members, especially the laymen, do not know enough of the law, or have not got enough judgment to decide this case, and therefore it must be sent to a committee of lawyers. That seems to be the idea that was stated by the hon. leader of the Government, and more plainly stated by the hon. member for Victoria. I repel the accusation that laymen do not understand the Election Law; and I maintain that, as a general rule, laymen know more about the Election Law than lawyers themselves. The reason is this: Most lawyers who have had contests, trusting their knowledge of the law, very often had agents; but most laymen, like myself, who had hardly a lawyer on my side, had to take the law in their hands and interpret it for themselves. And, Sir, I found that law so plain that, when I first looked at it, I thought somebody besides lawyers had something to do in making it. I am not a lawyer, nor the son of a lawyer, but I believe I can claim to belong to that class of men from whom the hon. member for West Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will choose his third Commissioner. As a man of common sense, I will just state what I think of the case; and I feel quite prepared to give my judgment here, without waiting till the case has been before the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, or the hon. member for Victoria. Sir, the case is very plain to me. The discussion reminds me of how a child, when reproved by his mother for wrongdoing, will sometimes point away with his finger, and say: “Ah, mother, look at that birdie!” That is what the hon. gentlemen opposite have done. When we speak of the law of 1874, they say: “Look at that birdie; look at England; look at the law of 1872, but do not look at our present law.” I think, Sir, it would be a dangerous precedent to pass the motion of the right hon. leader of the Government. When a law is so plain as our Election Law, and when we find men in the highest stations here encouraging different views of its meaning, what is the effect upon the people? They will say that if the leaders of those who are expected to put the law in force are found helping those who refuse to obey the law, they are tempted to do the same. Sir, if this honorable House hesitates to do its duty, hesitates to rebuke this returning officer, what will be the consequence? By-and-bye another returning officer will be induced to go a little further. I understand that at the last General Election the hon. leader of the Government was elected for two counties—Carleton and Lennox. Suppose that two days after the election the returning officer for Lennox, having seen that the hon. gentleman was elected for Carleton, had decided that he ought not to declare him elected, because he would be a member for another county, suppose the returning officer for Carleton had done the same thing, the Government would have been almost beheaded. Mr. Speaker, I have read that law, I had to read it, I had no one to read it for me. I had to study it; and what did I find? I found that there were some preliminary steps to be attended to. I found that after I was a candidate, no one could take the election away from me except the electors of my county; and as soon as I got the majority of the electors I was the member for Shefford. The law is plain, it cannot be plainer. The question is: Was Dr. Robertson a candidate? If he was a candidate, then the law says he was to be declared elected. Was he elected? No; the returning officer makes his report, and says he has the majority of votes. Well, I think the duty of this House is to do just what the returning officer ought to have done, declared Dr. Robertson elected. Some hon. members opposite say: "But you are going to put that man to the expense of $2,000 for every day he sits here." They take a good deal of interest in that man all at once. That is why I am prepared to vote now. Although I am not a lawyer I think I understand the question well enough to vote just as well now as after the case has been in the hands of the last hon. gentleman who spoke, or of the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The discussion has been confined to the lawyers of the House, with the exception of the two hon. gentlemen opposite who have contributed that peculiar quality to the debate, which, on high authority, is the special attribute of non-professional gentlemen. I am emboldened, from the fact that they have discussed this question, to offer a few remarks in relation to it. I am whether not going to discuss at any length the question a returning officer possesses judicial as well as ministerial functions under the Act of 1874. I am bound to say, however, it is rather a remarkable fact, that, in one case at any rate, that of the election of the hon. member who brought this matter before the House, the returning officer did exercise a judicial as well as a ministerial function, and that, had it not been for the exercise of the former quality, the hon. member in question would not have been here to bring forward his motion. The hon. member for East York insists on the literal reading of the Act of 1874. He points to the 59th clause, which says:

"The returning officer at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them, in the presence of the election clerk, the candidates or their representatives, if present, and of at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present to add together the number of votes given for each candidate, from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers."

According to the literal reading of that clause, the returning officer has to do solely with the "statements" of the deputy returning officers. If the returning officer, in the case of the election of the hon. member for Huron, had followed that rule, that hon. gentleman would not have been here to bring this matter before us. It is quite true, that the returning officer may, under certain circumstances, take means to ascertain what has been the result of the voting, but the 63rd clause declares the only cases in which he can take those means, and those are:

"In case the ballot boxes or any of them have been destroyed, lost, or for any other reason are not forthcoming within the delay so fixed" —

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Read on.

Mr. WHITE. In the case referred to, the ballot boxes were all there and the only things wanting were these particular statements of the deputy returning officers, from which alone, according to the exact reading of the Statute, the returning officer had the power to make his return. I am glad to know the hon. member for West Simcoe gave advice in precise accordance with the opinion he has expressed on the floor of this House. It is a matter of sincere congratulation to hon. members on this side and ought to be also to hon. members opposite that, in the magnificent speech which the hon. gentleman delivered here, he took precisely the same ground that—although he might be accused of partisan feeling here—he took in advising an hon. gentleman who is a political opponent and in a case when the result of his advice was to seat a political opponent in this House. That is not the only case. It happens we have a judicial decision on this very Act of 1874. I refer to the South Renfrew election case which came up before the Hon. Chief Justice Wilson in 1874. What the Hon. Chief Justice said is worth reading. The facts of the case, from reading the judgment, were that the returning officer refused to receive a nomination paper because, although there were twenty-five names upon it, the paper being apparently quite regular, it turned out, according to representations made to him, and into which he exercised the judicial function of enquiring, that one of the names was not on the voters list, and therefore the returning officer assumed that the person in question had not the right to sign the nomination paper. He consequently threw it aside and the matter was brought before the courts under the protest. What were the statements made by the Hon. Chief Justice Wilson at that time. He said:

"The petitioners complain of the rejection of Mr. Bannerman's nomination papers. It is not said that Tierney's name was then upon the list, nor is it contended so now: and it appears he was not on the assessment roll of 1873 in respect of real property, but it is said there were the names of twenty-five persons on the nomination papers as, and purporting to be, the names of actual bond fide electors of the South Riding, and twenty-four of them are so in fact, and the twenty-fifth was honestly believed to be so too. That it was a genuine paper, and not a sham document, and being so, although as a fact, Wm. Tierney was not an elector, yet the paper being duly sworn to according to the Statute, the returning officer was bound to accept it and to act upon it as a genuine truthful document. It is said he and the election clerk raised and took objection, which was not apparent on the face of the document, and that they discovered it by an examination of the voters' list, and that such a proceeding was in effect a judicial investigation and inquisition held without authority, and determined contrary to law. For the respondent it is said that the returning officer is not wholly and only a ministerial officer."

Recollect this decision is on the Act of 1874, which hon. gentleman opposite cited as establishing the fact that the returning officer is simply a ministerial officer.

"That he is necessarily, and in fact has certain judicial functions to perform; that he is by section 11 of the Act to decide on the number of polling places to be appointed; that he has to grant a poll by section 24 if more candidates than can be returned are nominated in the manner required by the Act; and he is by section 23 to report any nomination proposed or rejected for non-compliance with the requirements of the Act; and that in all cases when the objection to the candidate or voter, or to the nomination paper is patent or notorious he may act judicially; and that he cannot receive a nomination paper with only twenty-four names to it, for that would be the same as if he received it with less than the number of twenty-five electors in fact upon it."

"I am of opinion the returning officer is both a ministerial and judicial officer. He has not now, as formerly, to hold an inquisition into the capacity or qualification of a candidate or voter; but I feel assured if a person appeared and was nominated, and such candidate were a woman or a mere child" —

It is rather remarkable that the statements made by the right hon. First Minister and sneered at by the hon. member for East York, were almost precisely the words used by the learned Chief Justice on that occasion:

"If such a candidate were a woman or a mere child, the returning officer could decline to receive such a nomination, and in like manner he can decline to receive the nomination of a Chief Justice or the Speaker of the Senate."

Now the disqualification of a Chief Justice or a Speaker of the Senate is precisely the same as the disqualification of a member of a Local Legislature. It must be admitted that the returning officer could have rejected the nomination of Dr. Robertson when that was presented to him, upon this statement of the law as laid down by the learned Chief Justice, that the duties of the returning officer are judicial as well as ministerial, notwithstanding the apparently plain words of the Statute of 1874. But it is said in this particular case that the returning officer did not reject the nomination of Dr. Robertson, that he allowed that nomination to be made, that he permitted the electors to vote upon it, and that it was only after the votes had been cast that the returning officer assumed the judicial functions, which he might, according to the decision of the Chief Justice, have assumed eight or ten days before. Now, so far as the facts affect the interest of the electors—and that is the important question with which we have to deal—I take it that it makes very little difference so far as they are concerned, whether within the two hours between twelve and two o'clock it is discovered by the returning officer that the candidate who is nominated in good faith, it may be by twenty-five electors, is not qualified and at five minutes to two o'clock he declares that candidate has no right whatever to the nomination, and is perforce compelled to declare the other gentleman elected. Yet that is the argument which hon. gentlemen opposite would use if they accept the decision of the Chief Justice. But what are the facts in the case? It seems to me that if the returning officer can exercise judicial functions in determining upon the regularity of the nomination of a candidate, that he must be permitted to exercise those same judicial functions if facts are brought to his knowledge afterwards which affect the qualification of the candidate who goes to the polls. In this particular case what do we find? There is no doubt whatever that Dr. Robertson was a member of the Local Legislature, and the returning officer may or may not have known whether he had resigned. It is true that under the law of Prince Edward Island, as we have had it read to us here, he could not resign within twenty-one days of the time of the official announcement of his election in the Official Gazette. Although, the returning officer may have had personal and judicial knowledge of the fact of the election—because it appears he was himself the returning officer at that election—it does not appear, nor is it certain, that he could have known anything whatever of the precise date upon which that particular official declaration was made. He may have known it or he may not have known it. If he had not known it, and if he assumed that Dr. Robertson had resigned, then in that case it is quite clear he could have gone on permitting the nomination, and having afterwards discovered, from facts submitted to him, the true state of the case, he declared that Dr. Robertson was not qualified because he could not in fact resign his position, within the time required, as a member of the Local Legislature. We know from the statements made here that Dr. Robertson was not the only gentleman in Prince Edward Island who, having been elected for the Local Legislature, undertook to find a seat in this House. We know that in the case of Mr. Perry, who ran for Prince County as the colleague of the hon. gentleman who sits behind hon. gentlemen here, we know that in his case he ran for that county, and it is fairly to be assumed that he sent in his resignation in the same way to two friends with the understanding that if he was successful in his contest for the House of Commons they should send it to the Lieutenant-Governor. We know as a matter of fact that Mr. Perry was defeated, that his resignation was not sent to the Lieutenant-Governor, and that he is sitting still in the Local Legislature. I think we may fairly infer, so far as any special sympathy is due to Dr. Robertson, that his intention was precisely the same as that of Mr. Perry, as illustrated by his subsequent conduct. But what is the position in which we find ourselves to-day? Suppose that we pass the amendment of the hon. member for East York, and that this gentleman is permitted to take his seat in this House, or to have authority to take his seat—what then? The time has passed for lodging an election petition before the courts. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) tells us that, notwithstanding that Mr. McDonald will still have his rights, because he can go before an Election Committee of this House—that is to say, because he can go before the precise Election Committee to whom it is proposed to submit this case now. Well, suppose we admit him to the floor of this House, and the moment he comes here some hon. member gets up and calls attention to the fact—as has been done already in a number of cases—that there is a gentleman sitting in the House who is disqualified to sit here, what is the course to be taken? A motion is immediately moved to refer his case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then we should have exactly the same course to pursue, the same enquiry to make, that it is now proposed to make by the amendment of the hon. leader of the Government. But, Sir, there is another view. Supposing Dr. Robertson, realizing the fact that he is disqualified—and upon the statements that have been made that is not an unfair presumption—or believing, at any rate, that he is disqualified, declines to take his seat in this House; suppose he prefers to remain in the lobby, that he proposes to do what an hon. gentleman did in this House in the last Session of the Parliament, of 1874-78, that is to say, that he comes here to his desk in the morning and writes his letters, and the moment you take the Chair he leaves and goes into the lobby knowing that he is disqualified, just as the hon. member for Montreal West did, who was disqualified because he had a contract, and when the people of Montreal West were left unrepresented for the whole Session by the connivance of hon. gentlemen opposite—suppose he did that, then where are the rights of Mr. McDonald? The attention of this House cannot be called to the fact that any one is sitting here improperly because he is not sitting here. He chooses simply to remain in the lobbies. He keeps the county closed and the people unrepresented; he prevents the possibility even of any member calling attention to the fact that he is in the House, and, therefore, the case could not go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As I have said, we have one remarkable case in point. At the close of the Session of 1877, a number of gentlemen in this House were found to have had contracts with the Government. I dare say many of them had them unwittingly. I am not going to raise a question at all as to the propriety of their conduct; I am dealing simply with the facts. I am quite certain that with some of them the contracts were taken unwittingly on their part; but it was found they had those contracts. Many of them resigned their seats, went back to the electors, and most of them were returned again. But the member for Montreal West avoided all that, defied Parliament, defied his constituents and remained out of the House altogether during that time, and we had as a result of that proceeding that constituency unrepresented during an entire Session. Now, in this particular case, that must necessarily be the result, if Dr. Robertson, having been given the right to sit here, should take it into his head that he had better not run the risk of a penalty of $2,000 a day for sitting here, because that is the result if disqualified. The hon. gentlemen opposite speak as if there was a disposition in this House to decide this question in the interests of one party or another. That is not the motion before the House at this moment. The motion before the House is simply this, that we shall refer this question now, in order that Dr. Robertson may have his rights, to the Committee established by Parliament to enquire into every question affecting its dignity and privileges, and the right of its members to sit here. That is the only question before us. It is not whether we shall seat Dr. Robertson or Mr. McDonald, or whether we shall decide to have a new election or what result may follow; it is simply that we shall take now in advance that proceeding which hon. gentlemen themselves have said we must take afterwards in order that all the parties to this controversy may have their rights. It may be convenient or it may not, to have another election in King's for one political party or another, I am not saying whether it will be or not. It may not be convenient for hon. gentlemen opposite, for we know that shortly afterwards, at the local elections, Dr. Robertson and his friends were unsuccessful, and, therefore, it may not be in accordance with their views that there should be an election at this moment. If that is the case, the object, and the only object of the resolution proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, is simply to keep that seat closed, and to disfranchise the constituency. It seems to me that the fair and honest course to all parties in this case, to the constituency seeking to be represented on the floor of this House, to the hon. gentleman who says that being the only qualified candidate he ought to be here, to the gentleman who, although declared by some parties to be disqualified, had the majority of votes, is to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where it may be thoroughly and fully discussed and a decision arrived at. When the report comes from that Committee, then it will be time for hon. gentlemen to say whether injustice has been done to any of the parties; but until this has taken place the motion of the hon. gentleman opposite is simply an attempt to drag a herring across the trail, to excite the people's feelings without justification, by representing the House as endeavoring to refuse a seat to a gentleman who is entitled to it. As to the amendment to the amendment, I do not think hon. gentlemen will gain much by it. It may be that they may think they have gained something by inducing a number of members to vote or appear to vote against the plain proposition embodied from the Statute; but after all, the sting is in the tail, the declaration that Dr. Robertson should be seated; strike that part out and there is nothing left except a recital from the Statute, and, therefore, hon. members are not called on to vote that what is said in the Statute is said in the Statute, any more than they are called on to declare that the earth revolves on its axis every twenty-four hours. The point we are asked to vote for in the amendment to the amendment is that Dr. Robertson should be seated, and by seating Dr. Robertson now we will have to do one or two things, either immediately refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and have it discussed and decided as to his qualifications, or give him the power to keep his constituency without a representative at all and do gross injustice to all parties connected with the case. For one, I, as a layman, have no hesitation, looking at the matter apart from legal technicalities and simply from a common sense point of view, in voting for the amendment of the right hon. the First Minister.

Mr. DAVIES. As my name has been mentioned in connection with the dispute between Dr. Robertson and Mr. McDonald, I may perhaps claim the indulgence of the House to say a word or two; and I will not repeat the arguments I have attempted to lay before the House when I first addressed it, inasmuch as they have been more ably stated by the hon. member for East York and the hon. leader of the Opposition. Before referring to the personal matter, I desire to say a word in reply to the case which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has just quoted from the Ontario reports. He has quoted a decision by Chief Justice Wilson, to the effect that a returning officer's duties are judicial as well as ministerial. I think you, Mr. Speaker, will bear me out in saying that when the hon. member for West Huron presented the case, and was followed by several hon. members on this side, we acknowledged the correctness of the law as laid down by Judge Wilson; but the hon. member for Cardwell has failed to understand or lay before the House the plain and clear distinction which Judge Wilson laid down in that decision. And that distinction is this: that while the returning officers' duties are ministerial and judicial, they are judicial quoad the reception and rejection of the nomination papers; but after he has exercised his judicial discretion and received the nomination papers and placed the candidates before the people to receive their votes, then his judicial duties end and his ministerial duties begin. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the 23rd section of the Election Act, he will see it is expressly laid down that when a returning officer exercises the judicial function with which the law clothes him, in respect to the reception or rejection of nomination papers, and this is the only judicial function he has, that in the event of rejecting a nomination paper he must return it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with his reasons; but when he accepts the nomination paper he admits that the candidate is a fit and proper person to receive the people's suffrages, and the candidate has the right to assume that those votes will have a proper and legal effect; and that when the returning officer comes to sum up the votes, he will do what the Act affirms he must do, declare the man with the majority of votes duly elected. But the hon. member for Cardwell goes further and says, that if Dr. Robertson is allowed to take his seat, he might refrain from doing so, and prevent the House from taking action in the matter. Surely the hon. member is not serious in that proposition, he should know, and no doubt the legal gentlemen on his side of the House can inform him, that the House has as much jurisdiction over members who have taken the oath before taking their seats as it has afterwards. If Dr. Robertson was declared by the House to have been properly returned, and if he had taken the oath he was just as amenable to its jurisdiction as if he had taken his seat, and it never was disputed that the House had jurisdiction and could exercise it if it chose. But the great principle really at stake is that the returning officer has no other duties to perform than those which the Acts point out; and that the House must assert the rights of the electors and its own privileges, by seating the candidate elected before it refers the question of his eligibility or disqualification to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There are two questions involved in this debate, and we on this side of the House have a right to complain that the greater question has not been touched by hon. gentlemen opposite, who have confined themselves to the minor question as to whether Dr. Robertson or Mr. McDonald is the proper person to represent King's County in this House. I submit that it is a small question whether Dr. Robertson or Mr. McDonald is the member, but I submit it is a vital question affecting not only them and the electors of King's County, but every electoral district in the Dominion, whether the voices of the electors must be given effect to, or whether they can be reversed at the mere whim of a returning officer. That is the question before the House; and I submit, with all deference and humility to hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have directly evaded it. Now, I will put this to hon. gentlemen who may entertain a doubt as to the proper course to be taken. I had the honor to quote from a speech delivered by the hon. the Prime Minister of England, as to the rule to be adopted in these cases, and I have noticed that every hon. gentleman—every legal gentleman, at least, who has followed on the other side—has endorsed the rule laid down by Mr. Gladstone, as fair and reasonable, and that is this: that where there is no fair, reasonable, or honest doubt as to the course to be taken, the House, Sir, should decide immediately, in deference to its own dignity, without referring it to a Committee of Privileges at all. Now I ask, has any legal gentleman on the other side of the House in his place, taken the Statute in his hand and read the words of it, and said that there was a reasonable or fair doubt as to their meaning. I submit that they have not. I submit that even the right hon. gentleman himself has not done so. If the speeches delivered on the other side of the House are read, it will be shown that not in one of them have the speakers expressed a doubt as to what the Statute means; not one of them has ventured to express a doubt as to what the real duty of the returning officer is, although some of them have endeavored to gloss over his conduct, in this particular instance. What does the right hon. gentleman himself say: that the general rule is clear, the person having the majority of votes ought to be returned, but there may be exceptions. Very well, what are they? The exceptions are the cases of a felon and of a woman. But is Dr. Robertson within either of these exceptions? No other exception is given, and the general rule is plain. And as to the instance which the right hon. gentleman gave of a felon, I think that the member for South Durham effectually answered it by quoting the cases of John Mitchel and O'Donovan Rossa, who although felons, were both returned to Parliament, and I venture to assert that if the returning officers in either case had dared to refuse to return a duly elected member although a felon, he would have received the censure of the House of Commons who are very jealous of their privileges. If I turn from the right hon. gentleman to the gentleman who followed him, I find that this gentleman, my hon. colleague, opened by admitting that the returning officer would have discharged his duty more correctly if he had returned Dr. Robertson, and not enquired into his eligibility or otherwise. And we find the hon. member for South Simcoe, whose speech has been so much lauded in this House, stating I am not prepared to state that it may not be so; namely that the returning officer is simply a ministerial officer. There is not an hon. gentleman on that side of the House—of the legal profession at least—who has ventured to say that there is the slightest doubt as to the meaning of that Statute; and this being so, I contend under the authority of Mr. Gladstone's speech, which has been read here, that this House has a plain and distinct duty to perform, and that is, to call the returning officer to account, and to insist on the votes of the people having effect, by amending the return so as to declare that Dr. Robertson should be the representative, and to put him in his place in this House. Then if the question of eligibility, or of disqualification is raised, that matter and all the papers pertaining to it should be referred to the Committee on Privileges, to calmly and coolly enquire into the whole circumstances of the case. The hon. member for South Simcoe instanced a case as in point, and I believe that this was the only precedent cited by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; and a most unfortunate precedent it was. What was it? He held in his hand the Journals of this House for the year 1873, and he stated he had found a case analogous to this, which happened in connection with the representation of Prince Edward Island. Mr. Perry, at that time, sat for Prince County in this House, and was disqualified—or it was alleged he was—but the distinction between Mr. Perry's case and this, was this: the returning officer in that case knew his duty, and discharged it, by returning Mr. Perry to this House. Mr. Perry took his seat as a member of this House; and after he had done so, as the member duly qualified, having taken the oath, he was prosecuted for the penalties under the Statute, and then he came in and petitioned the House to relieve him from the penalties and to affirm that his resignation as a member of the Local Legislature was within the tenor of the Statute, and the House so affirmed; so that the precedent quoted, instead of being in favor of a returning officer daring to exercise a discretion, which the law did not give him, is directly against the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, showing that he must discharge his duty by returning as elected the man who has the majority of votes. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to weary the House, and I will only touch upon another point. The hon. gentleman who represents King's, I think, in Nova Scotia, made a speech this evening, in which he referred to me—I do not think it was necessary, however, to drag in this matter at all—as now being the counsel of Dr. Robertson. Well, whether the hon. gentleman was in order or not I am not a sufficient Parliamentarian to say; but I can assure the House that I am not now the counsel for Dr. Robertson; and as many facts have been referred to which are not strictly within the record, I will recall to the House certain facts within my own knowledge. When Dr. Robertson was deprived of his seat, did he sit quietly by and attempt to secure it by a majority, or partisan vote in this House. No; but he went to the courts, and deposited $1,000 there and filed a petition, and he did all that man could do, to endeavor to serve his opponent with a copy of the petition. But the latter evaded service, and when an application was made to the court to extend the time to serve Mr. McDonald, in order to leave to a tribunal not animated by passion or prejudice, whether Dr. Robertson was disqualified or not, Mr. McDonald employed counsel vigorously to oppose any extension of the time, and thus succeeded in evading service of the petition. I was the counsel of Dr. Robertson in that matter. It was disposed of by the court; and I am not his counsel now. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh and sneer. They may possibly think that I am not as dispassionate, and as impartial, and as judicial as some of the hon. gentlemen who have made speeches on the other side of the House, but I claim, Mr. Speaker, that in this matter, at any rate, I have not shown any unfair prejudice—at least I do not think I have. At any rate, I have done nothing that could justify hon. gentlemen opposite in imputing to me any unfair partiality. My opinion may be wrong. I do not claim infallibility; but I am honest in the expression of my views, at all events. "But," says the hon. member, and I believe he is a member of the legal profession, too, "it is true that the returning officer may not have the power to place these papers before the House; but inasmuch as they are here, we are bound to treat them as if they were properly and legally here." I would like to know whether my hon. friend would stand up in any court of Christendom and adduce that argument before a Judge. It is preposterous. The question before the House is this: Had the returning officer the right to send these papers here at all? In sending an ex parte statement which may, or may not be true, he has entirely gone beyond his Province; but the learned gentleman quietly assumes that it is within his right, and assumes the correctness of all the alleged facts. He says that they are before us and we must discuss them. There is the petition and there are the papers, and we must consider them, whether they are here legally and properly or not. Such a petitio principii, I never heard before in my life. But the hon. gentleman goes further, and discovers an argument which was supported by the hon. gentleman on my left—I do not know his electoral district, but I believe it is Bellechasse—namely, that the Act of 1872 was applicable to this case; and he endeavored to place it before hon. members, as if this Act was binding on the sheriff, and could be enforced in this country at the present time. Surely the hon. member could not have looked into that Statute or known that it was long since repealed. The Act of 1872 was passed for the purpose of preventing in this Parliament dual representation in those Provinces where dual representation was prohibited. It provided that if in these particular Provinces, legislation prohibited a member of this House from occupying a seat in the Local Legislature, the converse position should be taken here; and then local members should not be allowed to sit here. It went on to provide that if a Local member attempted to run, the sheriff should treat his votes as a nullity. In 1873, however, an Act was brought in which totally altered that, providing that no member of any Local Assembly should be eligible to sit in this House at all, effectually annulling and repealing the Act of 1872—and let me remind the House that when that Act was passed, in 1872, Prince Edward Island was not a part of the Dominion at all. In that part of the Dominion the Act of 1872 never was in force. After the passing of the Act of 1874, there was not a shadow of doubt as to whether the Act remained in force. The Act of 1874 entirely remodels the law; it makes a new law—a new guide for the returning officer. That is a fact which must be plain to everybody. I will not say any more.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. I am glad I have succeeded by one sentence, at least, in pleasing hon. gentlemen opposite. I beg to remind them, however, that while this great constitutional question is being so ingeniously shirked, the resolution of the leader of the Government is going upon the records of the House as a precedent, which may in the future operate against some of those who are now cheering it so loudly. I beg to remind hon. gentlemen who come from the outlying districts of the Dominion, that while public opinion, and the power and fear of the press may prevent returning officers in the more central parts of the Dominion from exceeding their proper functions, and acting illegally, there is no such power or fear likely to be exercised in these outlying Provinces; and if you now establish the precedent that the votes and the voice of the people may be set aside by the whim or partisanship of a returning officer you will reap in the future a rich harvest of similar cases. It will not then be a question whether a majority of the voters voted for one candidate or the other but whether the voice of such majority is pleasing to the returning officer. If it is, the return will be made accordingly. If not, it will be reversed or nullified.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 82) to amend the Act to incorporate the North-Western Bank.—(Mr. Beaty.)

THE QUEDDY RIVER DRIVING AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL, in moving that the petition of the Quddy River Driving and Boom Company be now received and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, said: The reason I make this motion is, that the Local Governments of the different Provinces, more particularly the Province of New Brunswick, in which this company exists, have, ever since Confederation, and prior thereto, exercised the right of granting charters for the booming of navigable rivers. It was believed they had that right; they had granted these charters before Confederation, and there are fifty or sixty of these booming companies throughout the Province in that position. The first occasion on which the right of the Local Legislatures to grant these charters has ever been questioned, recently occurred, and the matter is now before the Supreme Court. It was discovered, from the intimation given by the Judges during the argument, that there is little doubt the decision of the court will be adverse to the right of the Local Legislature to grant these charters. The result will be that hundreds of millions of feet of lumber, which will in a few weeks be floated down the rivers, will be at the mercy of any one who chooses, from malicious or other motives, to go and cut those booms away. It is for this reason that, late as it is, and although it is beyond the limit set for the reception of these petitions, it has become necessary for these gentlemen to come to this House and ask it to consider the emergency that has arisen. I hope the House will have no hesitation in receiving the petition on which a Private Bill may be founded.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I know there will be a strong objection to this Bill. The very case on which the hon. gentleman bases his request was before the courts only last month, and no decision has yet been given upon it. This is only one of a number of cases in New Brunswick that will be affected by the decision of the court. The members from New Brunswick who are most interested in this case, together waited upon the Government, and asked them to take into consideration the condition of the boom companies in New Brunswick, in case the decision of the court was against the legality of their charters. This is the only case that has been argued before the courts. Parties were here at the time who were largely interested in this boom company, and they expected that if the decisions of the court were adverse to the right of the Local Legislature to grant the charter, that this Government would legalize the companies. I think that this Bill is very objectionable in itself, besides its being brought at a very late hour; and that, under the circumstances, and the matter having been brought to the notice of the Government, I think it is a little premature, and a little unfair to bring a Bill of this kind before the House, leaving the parties who are deeply interested in it no chance to protect themselves.

Mr. MITCHELL. What the hon. gentleman states is quite true. Persons representing this boom interest did come to Ottawa, and all the members of New Brunswick were consulted about it. The unanimous opinion of the members from New Brunswick who met in caucus on the subject was, that a committee should wait on the Government to suggest that some general measure should be introduced in order to relieve public claims which were likely to suffer by the charters being declared illegal. We know that Governments are proverbially slow. We are not at all sure the Government will take this matter up, although they have it en délibéré. But these gentlemen have their boom erected on a stream that opens very early, as it runs into the Bay of Fundy—these southern streams open several weeks before other streams—and unless some immediate steps are taken to enable this company to protect the property which is floating down into the river it will be lost. The hon. gentleman says it is late in the Session; it is late according to the Rules of the House, but the Rules are made for the purpose of getting the business early before the House. We know they are not cast-iron Rules, and we know that the universal practice of this House has been that whenever a case of injustice or hardship can be shown to exist, by no fault of the parties interested, this House has never refused to consider that case on its merits. What are the facts here? These gentlemen say that before a public Bill is likely to be prepared and can be presented, or in case the Government decides not to go on with a general measure, their property will probably be drifted away to sea, from the fact that parties are in a position to go and cut away their booms with impunity. There is no danger that private rights will be interfered with, as ample opportunity will be allowed to protect those rights; and besides the power of this House will be called into operation to prevent any injustice being done them. It is true, as my hon. friend has stated that this legislation is going on. But we do not ask that this Bill shall interfere with any pending cases. We propose to put in the Bill that will be submitted to the House a saving clause which will reserve all the rights of interested parties. What we say, and what we have a right to ask this House, is, that as a crisis has arisen, and as this company's property is threatened, this House should take the matter into consideration, especially as it is probable that the decision of the court will be adverse to the legality of their character. It would, therefore be the greatest folly to wait any longer, in the hope that the decision of the court will be in their favor. They come here asking this House to prevent a great loss, and it will be quite open to my hon. friend and the hon. gentleman who raised this question against the right of the Local Legislatures, to come to the House and show in what way the Bill which we propose is going to injure them, or to affect them unjustly, and they will have ample opportunity of protecting themselves. But we think, in view of the emergency, that the matter should be considered before the Committee, irrespective of the fact as to whether the Government will take up the question or not. This is a matter for which no one could be blame!. Dozens of charters have been renewed since Confederation. Not one has raised this question before, and the whole public have been taken by surprise. These parties should be dealt with by the House in a generous and liberal spirit, at all events as regards placing their case before the Committee, with a view to having their property, and not only their property, but also public property, protected, because hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property will, in all probability, be lost, if some action be not taken in this regard.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not suppose there are hundreds of millions of dollars worth of boom property coming down the river, in which the company is interested; and the hon. gentleman will find that the whole lumber exports in the Dominion do not quite pan out the figures he has talked of. But the position of the question requires much consideration. If I rightly understand the matter, it is true that, since Confederation, a very large number of charters for boom companies of navigable rivers have been granted by Local Legislatures, not merely in New Brunswick, but also in Nova Scotia. I remember to have passed under review, a very considerable number of such charters, during the time it was my duty to consider them—and, I believe also, a considerable number in Ontario. The question, whether the charters were within or without the power of the Local Legislatures, seems not to have been raised in court until the case of which the hon. gentleman speaks was brought forward; but, if I am rightly informed, the decision at which the court in New Brunswick arrived at last December, was adverse to the validity of the charters. There was a decision of the court at that time, in favor of the view that the Local Legislature had not the power to issue such charters. The companies said they would not come to this House for a Private Bill, but prefer to appeal to the Supreme Court in order to obtain a reversal of that judgment. The hon. gentleman tells the House that the case was argued the other day, and that the Judges in the course of the argument indicated opinions which led him to adopt the view that their judgment would, perhaps, affirm the judgment of the New Brunswick Court. The hon. gentleman does not, of course, know what will be the result; the ways of Judges are past finding out, and probably their judgment may be different from their dicta given in the course of the discussion. The supposition that the judgment of the court below will be affirmed, is not sufficient ground for the House to allow, at this late hour of the Session, the petition to be presented. The hundreds of millions of property of which the hon. gentleman speaks will not be relieved by this Private Bill, but only if Private Bills are passed in all cases, or a general measure introduced. We had not, therefore better enlarge the question, but deal with the present petition, which is one for a Private Bill to incorporate this particular company; and dealing with it in that way, I feel that the circumstance that, in December last, a judgment was obtained from the court in New Brunswick adverse to the charters, and that the company did not care to come to Parliament earlier, because they hoped to reverse it, does not furnish a sufficient reason for the House granting leave to present this petition at this stage of the Session.

Mr. MITCHELL. I meant hundreds of millions of feet when I inadvertently stated hundreds of millions of dollars? I am not sure that there are not hundreds of millions of dollars worth of such property throughout the Dominion; but, in regard to New Brunswick, I am sure I am right in saying there are many hundreds of millions of feet coming down the rivers there. I fail to see the force of the hon. gentleman's objection; I think these people have a right to come here—it is not very late in the Session yet—and ask to have their claims considered.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Rules of the House were, no doubt, enacted for the purpose of protecting the rights of individuals from being interfered with by legislation, without sufficient notice having been given; and there can be no doubt the hon. gentleman, in moving the motion, wishes, for the time being, to dispense with the Rules of the House so as to enable him to introduce a petition and Bill. I would suggest that he should not press the matter, because a deputation of gentlemen from New Brunswick has waited on the hon. Minister of Justice, and presented very fully and clearly the circumstances under which the parties in whose interest the hon. gentleman is moving, are placed; and I may say to him that, while the Government would feel it a very serious matter to undertake to legislate upon questions of this kind without giving an opportunity to parties whose interest might be affected, they are prepared to consider the question of bringing in some legislation this Session to relieve them for the present, in this particular case, until legislation can be had, and due notice given to all parties. The Government have about arrived at that conclusion; this case involves a very considerable amount of property, and the hon. the Minister of Justice and the Government are considering the matter with the view of obviating the difficulties which my hon. friend is seeking to meet by legislation. I think, therefore, from what has recently taken place, if the hon. gentleman will allow the matter to stand, he will find, as regards this case, that it will be met by legislation this Session.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under these circumstances, and after the explanation of the hon. the Minister of Finance, I will ask the permission of the House to withdraw the motion, feeling assured that the necessary steps will be taken by the Government to meet the case.

Motion withdrawn.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Sicotte, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections' Act, 1874, his final judgment in the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of Rouville, and also for the Electoral District of St. Hyacinthe, declaring the sitting members in each case to have been duly elected.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS LEGISLATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I told my hon. friend opposite, last night, that I would go on to-day with the following resolution:—

That the following paragraph of His Excellency's Speech of the opening of this Session, be read at the Table, that is to say:

"I am advised that the Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered last June, on the appeal of Russell versus The Queen, goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary. Your earnest consideration of this important subject is desired."

And that on the said paragraph being read, it be referred to a Select Committee of seventeen members, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report by Bill or otherwise, and that the said Committee be composed of Messrs. Blake, Ross (Middlesex), McCarthy, Cameron (North Victoria), Blanchet, Laurier, Desjardins, Casgrain, Hall, Foster (King's County, New Brunswick), Burpee (St. John), Riehey, Robertson (Shelburne), Brecken, Royal, Baker (Victoria, B.C.), and the mover, and that the Rule as to limitation and selection of members be suspended.

But I find, that owing to some inadvertence, the judgment, which was to be printed and distributed, has not yet been distributed. It will, however, be distributed to-morrow morning, and I will, therefore, postpone this matter until it is in the hands of hon. gentlemen.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 46) further to amend an Act intituled: An Act relating to Banks and Banking, and the several Acts amending the same.

Mr. FAIRBANK. Mr. Speaker, on rising to address the House for the first time, I beg to ask its kind indulgence while I make a few remarks on the important question before us. I would have preferred, Mr. Speaker, had necessity not required me to break my silence, to defer my few remarks till I had become more familiar with the political atmosphere of this higher latitude; but this measure is of that importance to a large number of very worthy citizens of Canada, that I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without expressing my views on the subject before us; and in doing so I must, of necessity, briefly allude to our banking system. This system consists of large central banks with numerous agencies acting under charters which allow them, under certain restrictions, to issue notes payable on demand. Through their agencies they accumulate the surplus money of the country, and collect the capital forming our great financial revenues; which are as important to the business life of the country, as are reservoirs of water to great cities. To the chartered banks we must add a large number of institutions known as "private banks." A work performed by banks, which does not usually attract much attention, is the settlement of debts by the use of instruments of credit. This is done to a very great extent; and probably not less than 95 per cent. of our entire commercial transactions are carried on through credits without the use of coin or bank notes. Mr. John Thompson, one of the oldest American bankers, says:

"I feel confident that 95 per cent. of our business and the business of Europe is done on paper tokens, cheques, drafts and letters of credit which so long as confidence is good are a perfect substitute for money."

Comptroller Knox, of the United States Currency Department, states that the transactions of the banks on June 30th amounts to $284,000,000, while the actual money employed in gold, silver and paper currency amounts to only $14,000,000; thus the business transactions of the banks were $270 in those tokens of credit to $14 in cash. The experience in England in this respect is very similar. Sir J. Lubbock gives an account of a days transaction amounting to £23,000,000 sterling, of which 94 per cent. and over was performed by tokens on credit, and 5 per cent. in coin or bank of England notes. My object in alluding to these facts, Mr. Speaker, will be more obvious further on. I do not require to allude to the effect of currency on the prices of our products. We all know the effect which is instantly felt in this connection when money is scarce. Now, what is done by the chartered banks in the cities, is performed, in the country and in the villages, by private bankers; and into this great number of private banks, scattered throughout the country, in every village, and in many towns as well, deposits find their way. These banks form the small reservoirs, and take the place of the chartered banks, in the larger places. Small deposits are placed in these smaller institutions, and those who do not care to expose themselves to danger from pickpockets by carrying money on their persons, or from burglars by keeping it on their premises, place it on deposit in these banks, which perform a very important duty throughout the country. It is very rare indeed, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers find their way into the back parlor of the chartered banks, and the necessities of these people, and the necessities of the country merchant for accommodation are just as important to the extent in which they exist, as are the necessities of the larger importers and dealers in the cities. These banks have become a necessity, and they are much more numerous, perhaps, than is generally supposed. In my own county, I know there are twelve which are performing good work in their respective localities while within the whole county there are only three branches of chartered banks. In Ontario, I know there are over 150, and I think there are nearly 200 of these private banking institutions; and I presume that throughout the whole Dominion they are equally common. The clause to which I wish particularly to refer, is section 8 of the Bill, by which it is proposed to amend clause 10 of the old Act. If that clause be amended, as is now proposed, it will read as follows:—

“After the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty, any person, firm, or company, assuming or using the title of Bank, Banking Company, Banking House, Banking Association, Banking Institution, Banking Agency, or using any words in any designation by him or them assumed, tending to imply that such person, firm, or company is carrying on business or acting as a chartered bank, or is an agent of any such bank without being authorized so to do by this Act, or by the Act relating to banks and banking, or by some other Act in force in that behalf, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.”

Now this clause, as amended, carries the restrictions which have been imposed upon private banks for the purpose of restraining them from the use of the simple term bank to an extent which leaves the banker in great doubt as to what designation he can assume. The reason assigned for making this amendment is that depositors do not know these are private institutions, that they may have been deceived and induced to deposit money in them, supposing them to have all the protection of the chartered banks. I shall allude to that matter of protection further on; but I may say that we have heard of no complaints having been brought before the Government that the people have been deceived in this matter. It will not, I think, be alleged that these deposits have been an injury to the banks, nor has it been claimed that they have been an injury to the depositors; and it occurs to me that these are the two classes who are chiefly interested in the question. It is stated in this connection that the depositors have received from them a higher interest than from other banks; but I do not think it will be pretended that this has been a disadvantage to the depositors, if it be the case. For these reasons it appears that the private banks of the country are to be deprived of the name which has been handed down to them for two hundred years—the name which only properly designates their business, for I know of none by which their business can be correctly designated, except by one or other of those which are prohibited by this Act or might be interpreted to be forbidden by this Act. In depriving them of the use of these designations, I consider that we would be depriving them of actual property. Many of these firms have, under these names, acquired what to them is of value; and if these names are worth money, I think they may be called property, as they certainly partake of the qualities of property. We are all very well aware that very considerable discussion has recently been carried on, particularly in Ontario, in consequence of the disallowance by this Government twice of an Act passed by the Local Legislature—such disallowance being based as alleged upon the taking away property without giving, not a consideration, but without giving an adequate consideration for it. In this case it is proposed to take away property from a class of people without giving them any consideration whatever—not to take it from one class of people and give it to another, but to take it away and destroy it. I believe, although I am a layman, that I am quoting perhaps pretty good law in this case; at all events, to my mind it is common sense, and I believe common sense is the ultimate basis of law. I know of my own knowledge that there are persons who would not part with the name their banking business bears without a consideration of many thousands of dollars; but this Bill proposes to take away the name from them, and produce this very great injury. I do not know that it is consistent with Parliamentary rules to read letters in the House; but I may state that I have received a number of communications upon this subject, from bankers, in which they clearly point out that they look upon the measure in the light I have described. Indeed, it cannot be otherwise considered by bankers, than as casting a slur upon them and their business; and if the basis upon which the Bill is presumably founded is correct, they are open to the charge of obtaining money under false pretences, by assuming a name to which they have no right. It would almost seem that some have supposed that we have a class of persons engaged in this business, who are ashamed of it, that they wish to sail under false colors; that they wish to appear, not as themselves, but as others. I believe this is a mistake. I believe that, as a class, they are satisfied with their business, and would sooner be considered as the captains and owners of their own yachts than as second mates of another man's schooner. I know that attention has been called to the recent failure of a business institution of this kind; but it has not been claimed that its name had anything to do with the failure, or that the depositors were deceived. If reports are correct, the principal loser by that failure is a chartered bank, and surely it is not claimed that that bank did not know that it was dealing with a private institution. Certainly the bank was not deceived. It has been stated that parties make deposits in these institutions, supposing that they have all the protection enjoyed by the chartered banks. These chartered banks are sufficiently strong not to require to rest upon any false pretension; they are strong because they are large, wealthy and well managed institutions; and it will not be claimed that the Government bonds held by these chartered banks afford any special security to the depositors. The deposits in these banks are about $108,000,000, and they hold about $1,000,000 of Government bonds. Surely it will not be claimed that the security of the depositors rests upon that basis? It is true that they hold a certain amount of Government notes—something like $10,000,000. They also hold about $6,000,000 of specie as a special cash security for their circulation. The chartered banks require no defence from me, nor from any member of this House; their position is well known; and it is not necessary that the law should give the Canadian depositor any special security beyond what they now possess. I am not aware, Sir, in what manner these private institutions have recently lost their character. On the other side of the water there are some private banking institutions pretty well known in Canada. There is one known by the name of Glen, Mills, Currie & Co., another by the name of Baring Bros. & Co., and another by the name of Morton, Rose & Co. I believe that, on the 30th of June last, the hon. Finance Minister had deposited in these institutions Canadian funds to the amount of over $1,000,000—deposited with a class of men who, in Canada, would be subject to the penalties of misdemeanor if they put the sign, “banking house,” over their door. A misdemeanor, I believe, is punishable, at the discretion of a Judge, by fine or imprisonment. We are holding out great inducements to immigration. It is possible that some of these large banking institutions may come to this country. Let us fancy Baring Bros. being citizens of Canada, and using some designation not strictly forbidden in this Bill, but which, under the sweeping clause it contains, would render them subject to the penalty for misdemeanor. Would it not be possible for them, as our law is no respecter of persons, and properly so, to find themselves in the back yard of a common gaol breaking stones? But I submit that it is possible for them, or any private Canadian banker, under the sweeping clause of this Act, to be subjected to punishment of that kind. I do not require to remind this House of the sensitiveness of money. I do not require to remind it, either, that the present is a somewhat sensitive time in Canada in money matters. We have purchased more than we have sold. We have passed through a somewhat exciting time during the past year. The older Provinces have been affected somewhat seriously by the emigration to the new. Many, during the process of being transplanted from the old to the new, have ceased to be producers and have become consumers in the meantime. Under any circumstances, it would be unwise to unnecessarily attack the reputation of any important business in the country; but for us to do so at the present time would, I think, be specially unwise. I sincerely trust, in view of the part in our business system performed by this class of individuals, that the hon. Minister of Finance will entertain such amendments as will relieve the private bankers from the embarrassment which would follow the passing of the Bill as it now stands, and will leave them the right to use a name which will designate their business, but deceive no one, and will not subject them to the imputation which, as a class, I believe they by no means merit, and which it is not to the interest of any one that they should receive.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government can have but one object in view in the introduction of a Bill of this kind, that is: the promotion of the public interests. The tenth section of the Banking Act of 1872, to which the hon. member has referred, provides that a certain term shall not be used which imply that an individual, or two individuals styling themselves a banking company carry on a bank. The hon. member says there are 150 or 200 private banking companies or bankers in Ontario alone. That statement has been made to me from other quarters, and I think it is very likely the case. Now, there can be no objection—on the contrary it is an advantage—that individuals who have capital should be willing to lend it; but what the Government desire is, that no such individuals or associations should adopt a name by which the public would be led to suppose that they possessed corporate rights to transact a banking business. I find, in a list of parties who are transacting business as banking companies or banking houses, which I hold in my hand, that there are in Ontario only some thirty, including the branches of some of these, that would come within the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What book is that?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is Rand, McNally & Co.'s Banker's Directory and list of Bank Attorneys. I find in it the following firms, who come under the provisions of the Bill: Aeton Banking Company; Fawcett's Banking Office, Alvinston; Johnston Banking Company, Amherstburg; Fawcett's Banking Office, Arkona; Buck's Banking House, Caledonia; Dresden Banking Company, Dresden; Duart Banking Company, Duart; Elmira Banking Company; Beattie's Banking House, Fergus; Johnston's Bank, Goderich; Scott's Banking House, Gorrie; N. Hayes' Loan and Exchange Bank, Ingersoll; Maher Banking Company, London; Porteous Banking House, Mildmay; Millbrook Banking Company, Millbrook; Mitchell Banking Company, Mitchell; Scott's Banking House, Oakville; Orono Banking Company, Orono; Porteous Bank of Canada, Paisley; Elliott-Baker Banking Company, Ridgetown; Farmer's Banking House, Seaforth; Claris' Banking House, St. Thomas; Fawcett's Banking House, Stratford; Pew's Banking House, Welland; Essex County Banking House, Windsor; Scott's Banking House, Wingham; Fawcett's Banking House, Wyoming. For instance, there can be no objection to a company or an individual doing business; but none of these companies, calling themselves companies are incorporated companies. In many cases, they assume the name of banking company. If they assume the name of bankers, there can be no objection, for every person can understand what a private banker means; but the moment they assume the name of company or banking house, say Smith's or Jones' banking house, the public are likely to be misled, and the Government deem it their duty to require that a private banker shall be known by sign as a private banker. And as 170 of those doing business in Ontario, have adopted terms that would not bring themselves under the application of the existing Act—for instance, two persons establish themselves a banking company, the one president, the other cashier. It may be said people are perfectly cognizant of the fact, that, when they deposit money with such a company, they are not depositing it with an incorporated or chartered company; but if there is no benefit or advantage in the adoption of the name of a banking company, why do those who have adopted that name object to its being taken from them? As the hon. member says, it is a valuable property, and if you take it away without giving consideration, you deprive them of their just right. If, however, they have adopted a name or a title, from which it is to be inferred they are an incorporated company—because when they say company, it is supposed they are incorporated under some authority of a Local Legislature or of this Parliament—the name is misleading in the character. I do not say that a large portion of those induced to deposit money with those companies, do not know perfectly well they are private bankers. Still, it has come to the knowledge of the Government that there are individuals who have deposited money with these bankers, who imagine, from their having adopted the name of banking company, that they are dealing with a company chartered by the Dominion Parliament, and therefore have the security given to any person depositing with a chartered company. This being the case, I think Parliament and the Government would be responsible if they would allow a state of things to exist, under which individuals can come to us and say: you allow parties to assume titles and names that lead us to believe we are dealing with an incorporated company, having all the protection given to us under the charter of the Dominion Parliament. If such companies, not chartered, assume the name of private bankers, to which there is no objection, individuals will understand they are not incorporated; that they are not a bank receiving authority from Parliament, and giving to depositors the protection they have with an incorporated company. A case has come to our knowledge in which parties represent that a bank has been in existence since 1871, whereas the terms of the agreement show it has only been in operation for a few years. One of the parties is president; the other, cashier; and they deal and give their obligations in the form of a bank. Under these circumstances, while there can be no objection to private bankers doing business as such, the Government are of opinion that they should not be permitted to assume the name of a "bank," or "banking house." It is not very pleasant to go into particular cases, but one or two have transpired lately to confirm this opinion. The hon. gentleman has given no remonstrances to the Government on this question. There have been remonstrances, and Parliament should deal with the evil in time—before it reaches such a point that might, perhaps, cause most serious consequences. If the hon. member considers there is a value in the name of banking company, there must be some reason for it. If he or any other gentleman has assumed the name of banking company, and by this Act should be deprived of it, and objects to be deprived of it, then there must be some value in the name over and above that of private banker. What is that value? It must be that people imagine that in dealing with such banking company they are dealing with men in a different position from men calling themselves private bankers, otherwise there is no value in the name. The declaration of the hon. gentleman shows there must be some value in it, since he charges the Government with seeking to take away that value; therefore that value can only be in the assumption of a name misleading in its charter. The Government have no desire to interfere with private bankers when they do not assume the name of banking company, implying that they are incorporated under an Act of Parliament. The propositions now before the House do not change in any way the character of banking institutions. At present the violation by a bank of its Act leaves the Government no resource but to repeal the charter. That would be a serious matter. Therefore it was considered desirable, in cases where there is violation of the powers given the banks, there should be a money penalty imposed rather than a forfeiture of the charter. This will be more effective, because while a bank would say: "Parliament will not take away our charter, we can go on violating it," a money penalty will have the desired effect of preventing violations of the Act which sometimes take place without and sometimes with consideration or premeditation. It is considered desirable that parties should no longer continue the name of banking companies, or banking house or take a local name—for instance the Bank of Sarnia. I do not say such a name has been taken, but merely quote it for the sake of illustration. In one case a local name has been taken and it could be impossible for any person, not cognizant with the particulars, to know it was not an incorporated bank. Under these circumstances the Government thought it desirable that some provision should be introduced to prevent the adoption of names by private bankers calculated to mislead individuals depositing money with them; perhaps because they receive one per cent. more than they could get from the incorporated banks and believing they were dealing with an institution regularly incorporated, instead of with private individuals.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How will this affect foreign bankers like Baring Bros. and others, whose bills of exchange come to this country? If foreign banks do business in this country, though they may have no regular offices here, will they also come under the operation of the law?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; if they establish a branch here under the name of a banking company.

Mr CASGRAIN. But if they do not establish any particular branch of business and still do an immense business in this country, then they would not fall under the operation of the law?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; then they are private bankers.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman should have failed to apprehend the argument of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Fairbank) so entirely as he did. The hon. gentleman said that my hon. friend admitted, by saying that various persons had acquired a valuable property in this name; that they had acquired a property they were not entitled to, because it was valuable only by reason of the presumed deceit upon the public involved in the name. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. He knows very, very little of what a Finance Minister ought to know with reference to the value in trade of names. He knows very little of the ordinary course of mercantile concerns in these matters, if he supposes that any name that is not much used and under which a great business is done for a long time, does not become of value. The name is of value, whatever it is. "High cock a' lorum," if you please, "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," "Radway's Ready Relief," "Perry Davis' Painkiller," are all of value. An hon. gentleman suggests "N. P." What would the hon. gentleman not think that name is worth? It is a deceitful name, it does not represent the true case, it is by no means what it says, but he uses the name and he deceives the public with it. Now these are instances, and I hope he will introduce a clause into his Bill making it a misdemeanor for any person improperly to use the name

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

"National Policy." But I say this, that these persons who have conducted business under the name of banking company instead of banking house, or any other name which it is hereafter to be criminal to use in this country—I say those who have conducted business under these names have spread their reputation and made their connections under these names, have made a property by that use which is of tangible, appreciable value, of which they are to be deprived if the Bill becomes law. The ordinary experience of mankind tells us that, and the country from which we draw much of our law on this subject, England, tells it to us also. It is a property so valuable that its value is recognized in courts of justice which declare it an infringement to use that name by others. It is a property so valuable that it is salable, it is a subject of sale and transfer in connection with the business. Therefore, my hon. friend was perfectly correct in saying that property had been acquired by means of the name under which business had been conducted without, in the slightest degree, exposing himself to the imputation which the hon. Minister flung at him that he was proving that it was a value dishonestly acquired. Dishonestly acquired? Why, Sir, I presume there were banks, banking institutions and banking houses before ever there was an incorporated bank in the world at all. This name which the hon. gentleman is about to appropriate, all connection with this name, all the adjectives, all the collocations of words which approach to the name of bank, were used by persons not incorporated before ever there was an incorporated bank at all. The name company, he says, indicates to you—what? He says it indicates an incorporated company—it indicates a joint stock company. Nothing of the kind. There is Jones & Co., Smith & Co., Everybody & Co.; and when we deal with companies, and are incorporating them, we speak of joint stock companies in our Acts, and we speak of incorporated companies; but it would be a monstrous thing for us to assert, as a body of intelligent men supposed to be competent to legislate, that the word company was, in the common parlance of this Act, understood to be an incorporated company. It is not so. Now, when we come to make new crimes, Mr. Speaker, we ought to think about it a little. We ought to understand what moral law is being invaded, what great public reason there is why there should be a new restriction on the liberties of the people of this country, and enforced by telling them that they would expose themselves to a fine and imprisonment as for a misdemeanor, if they do to-morrow what it is perfectly lawful for them to do today. The hon. gentleman says that representations have been made to him. Now, there are three sets of persons concerned in this matter: first, the private bankers, with whom the hon. gentleman interferes; second, the depositors of these private bankers; third, their rivals in trade, the incorporated banks. I wonder has he had any representations from the latter? Has there been any suggestion from the incorporated banks, that the public interest requires that nobody but incorporated banks shall use the names "banking house," "banking institution," "banking association," or anything of that description? If representations have come from that quarter we can weigh them and value them. They are not to be received with disrespect. They are to be received with due attention, and they are to receive that measure of consideration which is consistent with a recollection of the fact that they are rivals in trade for deposits; that they would naturally like to prevent the private bankers from using any name which would induce the public to have confidence in them. Is there any complaint from the depositors? I believe, there is no failure that has become public or notorious of one of these banking companies. At least we have had no general and unanimous complaint on the part of depositors, that has come to the public at any rate, though the hon. gentleman says there have been some complaints received by the Government. A public grievance must be the foundation of the proposal to create a new crime, and I think we ought to get more information before this Bill goes to a Committee, or is reported, as to the nature and extent of the proved grievances to which the hon. gentleman alludes. Criminal laws of all laws ought to be precise and clear in their character, they ought to be of that character that those who run may read, so that it may not be difficult to know what is lawful and what exposes to penalties. But the hon. gentleman has asserted to be criminal the use of all the words he could think of, all the words hereafter to be criminal that he could think of, or using "any words in any designation tending to imply that such person is carrying on business as a chartered bank." And the issue to be tried before a jury upon a criminal proceeding is whether the man used words tending to imply that he was carrying on business as a chartered bank. Why, what a vagueness is here. How impossible it is to know to what conclusion a Judge and jury may come as to whether these words tend to imply that. It would be better, if we are going to restrict the liberty of the subject by making it criminal to use certain collocation of words, to put them all down, set them down in black and white. The hon. gentleman does not tell us what they are. When he first moved his resolution he said there was no objection to using the word banker, but to-day he says that if a man uses the words "private banker" that will be all right.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. "Banker," without "private."

Mr. BLAKE. Now we have the hon. gentleman's judicial decision, that wherever it does tend to imply that you are acting as a chartered bank, if you say "banking company," "banking house," or "banking institution," it does not intend to imply that you are acting as a chartered bank if you say "bankers." But I am not at all certain that the other Judges, the real Judges and the real jury who will try this case, would adopt the hon. gentleman's view. I think he had better put in the saving clause providing that notwithstanding his large statement at the end here, it shall be lawful for them still to call themselves "bankers." For my part, I think it is a great pity that we should not allow people to call themselves what they are. As he well knows, the legitimate old-fashioned name for this business is the banking business, as the business of banking was conducted by private individuals before ever there were incorporated companies; and they carried on the business to an enormous extent without incorporation. I think it is a great pity that unless upon a case of proved necessity, of proved mischief, we should make it criminal for men to use names which aptly express the lawful business they are carrying on under the laws of their country.

Mr. CASEY. It does seem, indeed, strange that the hon. the Minister of Finance should not comprehend why that class of men known as private bankers should wish to call themselves by the name of "bankers." Would he be able to understand why men who deal in groceries should like to be designated grocers; men dealing in iron, hardware merchants; and those dealing in dry goods, dry goods merchant? If the hon. Minister can conceive why those dealers wish to be allowed to use the name describing the business, he surely can understand why men possessing capital and dealing in bills of exchange and doing banking business, should be allowed to use the only word which describes their business. Surely it would be an outrage on men engaged in every branch of trade if they were not allowed to use the only name by which the general public know that business. Of course it may be that the hon. Minister intends to change the nature of the English language, and to say that a word which has hitherto meant banks of all kinds, whether incorporated or private, shall hereafter be known as applying only to incorporated banks; but it will take some time to get the public accustomed to such a change in the English language, by which this word "banks," which has hitherto had a general signification, should, for the future, be used in only a narrow sense. To any one who knows anything of the business of private banks and the class of people who deposit money in them, and deal with them, it is absurd to say that the depositors and their customers imagine they are chartered banks, simply because they call themselves bankers. Private bankers have probably not great wealth but some capital, and establish themselves in their native town, and are known personally to all the country round. Every one knows that John Jones or William Robertson, as the case may be, is himself the banker, and is not the agent of a chartered bank, and it is because he is thus personally known, respected, and trusted by the people of the immediate neighborhood, that he is able to obtain deposits and do business with his customers. It is simply absurd to imagine that any ordinary farmer, or man of intelligence, doing business with such a banker in a country town, imagines he is the agent of the Montreal, Imperial, or Molson's Bank, for he is known as John Smith; and it is because they think he is an honest man, and responsible for the money deposited, they do business with him. I agree with the two hon. members who have preceded me that this Bill must do marked injustice to private bankers, more especially as the hon. leader of the Opposition has pointed out that clause 8 is so extremely vague that a man cannot know what term he may use to describe himself. If the use of the words therein enumerated is thought to be sacrilegious, it might, perhaps, cover the whole ground if it provided that the word "private" should be prefixed to all terms used in describing private banking institutions. But apart from the injury to private banks this Bill will work, and I think is intended to work, it will also work injury to depositors and those who deal with private banks. There is practically no object to be served by this Bill, unless it is intended to restrict the business of private banks. It is evidently intended to restrict their usefulness, and it is only by lessening their business that the special risk to depositors is to be decreased; in other words it is to lessen the amount of banking accommodation available to the people of the country, for the hon. Minister must remember that to the vast mass of the rural population the ordinary banking accommodation is not available, and if they are not allowed private banks they will be without banking facilities, as they cannot go to large towns to do their banking business. If the name of the occupation is taken away with a view to making the occupation discreditable, it will surely deter many persons willing to enter into that class of business, and it will thereby lessen the amount of accommodation, especially to the rural part of the population. How great that accommodation is, thousands of farmers and small dealers scattered through the country know better, perhaps, than the hon. the Finance Minister, who doubtless has never been compelled to deal with such institutions. The representations made to the hon. gentleman in all probability, were made by rivals of these men in business. This clause bears on its face the appearance of having been suggested by the chartered banks themselves, jealous of the amount of business drawn away from them by private bankers, and anxious to discredit that business and increase their own by rendering the business of private bankers discreditable in name. If the hon. Finance Minister had shown himself, during his term of office, consistently opposed to the creation of monopolies of any kind, there would not be much ground for insinuations of this kind; but since he has not shown himself a determined foe to monopolies, either manufacturing or otherwise, it is possible that his judgment has been misled by representations made on behalf of chartered banks which wish to become, what at present they are not, the full controllers of the monopoly of banking in all parts of the Dominion. Whether that be the case or not, it is clear to the common sense of members of the House that the Bill tends to have that effect, that whether it is intended to create a monopoly or not, it will have that effect; a monopoly, not only unjust to the parties who have transacted this business heretofore, but those who dealt with them. For these reasons I hope the hon. Minister will see his way either to strike out the clause, or modify it so as to make it clear what designations they must assume.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in endeavoring to establish his point said that there is something in a name that is of value and that no doubt the Minister of Finance values the National Policy, sham as it is, and deceitful as it is to the public. We do not value the National Policy simply because it is called the National Policy, except as it represents a policy that is not a sham, but which the people of the country have endorsed. I do not think the hon. gentleman was very happy in his illustration. We might retort and say that the men who are advocating a one-sided Free Trade, and call themselves free-traders, are shams, and we might say that, I think, with some truth. But, I think this is apart from the question. The hon. member who has just taken his seat, would endeavor to make the House believe that we desired to prevent private banking. We do nothing of the kind, nothing of the kind whatsoever. There is no desire whatever on the part of the Government by this law, or by any Act we might introduce, to prevent private banking; but we simply wish, that those who are engaged in private banking, shall accept the name of bankers, and not assume to act as banking houses and banking companies. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, there is no doubt, was making a very strong point when he said that we should be careful when we are creating new offences; but this is not a new offence. I will now read a section of the Banking Act, which provides that after the 1st day of July, 1880, any person, firm or company assuming or using the title of bank, without being authorized so to do by this Act, or by any Act relating to banks and banking, or by some other Act in force in that behalf, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." That is the Act at present.

Mr. BLAKE. But we are creating a new offence.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. We simply provide that persons shall only assume the title of banker, because certain parties have attached to it banking company, or banking association. Out of all the private banks, perhaps, only one company comes exactly within the provisions of this section; and because it has been evaded by bankers—through terms misleading in their character, and calculated to lead the public to suppose that they are dealing with chartered banks—we make these provisions in order to bring these offenders within the original intention of the section I have read. We are not making any new offence.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; but the offence already existed.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, at the time that section was proposed it contained similar words, or some of them, to those now proposed, but they were struck out, because the House was not disposed to so limit the Act.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think that the hon. gentleman is mistaken on that point.

Mr. BLAKE. I remember it very well.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no desire, whatever, to prevent any person engaging in private banking; but we wish that the public shall know exactly the character of the bank, or banker, with whom they are doing business. With reference to communications made to the Government

Mr. CASEY.

I only recollect—and that indirectly—receiving one from banking companies. It has been insinuated that the banking institutions of the country have been communicating with the Government, because they are competitors of the private banks; but I only recollect one case, and it was merely indirectly, and casually referred to, owing to the fact of certain parties having violated certain conditions of the Banking Act. Under these circumstances, I can see no reason why—as the spirit of the Act as contained in the section which I have read has been evaded by the use of other terms—we should not say it should not be evaded by the addition of banking company or banking house, as was originally intended; but if there is any question about the term employed being indefinite, or there be any objection of that kind, I am prepared to make it as definite as possible. There may be something in the remark of the hon. member as to the words added here, making it indefinite, with respect to parties guilty of such violation of the provisions of the Act. I have no objection to look into this matter and see, because my object is to make the Act definite, and in this respect should not be open to any doubt or question. In every other provision, I think that the Bill is warranted, and I think that it should be sustained by the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman lay on the Table the documents in which representations were made to him on this subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do so. I would be very sorry to do it. These are private communications, and the parties who sent them would not like to have their names and the names of the parties referred to, brought before the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It seems to me that this is extraordinary legislation, avowedly based on representations made to the House by petition; but no petition has been presented to the House asking for this arbitrary and tyrannical legislation. If the hon. gentleman has had, as a member of the Government, communications made him which lead him to make this new provision in the banking law, I am prepared, for my part, to give due weight to those considerations, if they are placed before me; but I am asked to vote in the dark, and am told that representations exist, but I must not see them. As a member of Parliament, I am asked to legislate on a subject, in the absence of the information upon which the Bill is avowedly based. Now, I am not willing to be placed in that position, for one. I think that the hon. gentleman should not enforce his law, except by making it criminal to have no right to prevent any one taking any appellation he chooses; but by making it a misdemeanor to assume a particular name the hon. gentleman obtains his object, which could not be secured by any civil procedure.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the law at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Even if it is the law at present, this is an extension of wrong law; and I do not think we should be told, when we object to anything, that something of the kind has been done hitherto. We have been, hitherto, in this House, of late years, compelled to review past legislation, and prevent further legislation being based on the same grounds. That will occur constantly. Now, I know something of the operations of these private banks. I am bound to say that, so far as I know, they are conducted with very great regularity. Very few of them have given the public any cause for offence; and if there is any general ground—as I have said already—upon which this clause is based for an extension of the system, I do think that we ought to have it in some shape before us. The hon. gentleman—if he finds it impolitic to present the names of the individuals—might let us have the representation without the names. That can be done at all events; but to ask us to legislate on this subject, avowedly on representations made, and not to allow us to see those representations, is certainly not paying any very great respect to the members of this House.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that the hon. member is warranted in making that statement, because, no matter what the correspondence is, or whether there is any correspondence or not, or however voluminous it may be—as far as that is concerned—we simply point out that the declaration or assumption of certain names, brings parties offending within the provisions of this section; and this and the grounds for doing so, have been distinctly stated. As to laying these communications before the House, I would be very sorry to do so, for these are private communications, which have been sent to the Government, or to myself as the Minister of Finance, and we are not called upon to lay them before the House.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I cannot allow this Bill to go through the second reading without entering, at least, a mild protest against the meddlesome character of the legislation proposed regarding private banks. We have, as has been already stated, about 200 private banks in the Province of Ontario. They do a very large business; they employ a very large amount of capital; they contribute to the convenience and the business facilities of a great many people; and yet, without any evidence in possession of the House that these men are unworthy of the position which they occupy, they are going to be deprived of their identity—of their business identity, or of their individuality as business men in the community—and are to be subject to fines and penalties if they do thus, and so—the direction of a large amount of capital being thus necessarily interfered with. Now, I think that when there are no remonstrances in the possession of the House, that when the information held by the Minister is of such a confidential character, that it cannot be disclosed, and when we do not find in the public prints, or anywhere else, that has reached me, any evidence that these men are unworthy of the names which they bear, of their standing and the titles by which they have been designated, when we have no information of that kind, I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance should, at this stage, interfere with them or with their business identity. It is, to say the least of it, a species of meddlesomeness on his part, which I think the country could very well afford to dispense with at present. This Bill should also be opposed, because, as it appears to me, it makes a reflection on the standing of these men. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that all these private bankers—some of them having several hundreds of thousands of dollars perhaps of capital invested in their operations—are carrying on their business fraudulently and have established a business reputation under the cover at least, or under the pretence, of doing business as chartered banks, which they could not have made simply as private bankers? It is the insinuation that the hon. gentleman throws out! I leave that insinuation to be considered by the private bankers, and by many of the capitalists of this country. I leave them to consider the high estimation in which they are held by the hon. Minister of Finance. We throw our ægis over the chartered banks, we give them standing and position in the country, from the mere fact that they have a charter; but these men, these private bankers, have to build up reputations for themselves. Many of them have accumulated wealth; many of them are men of extensive fortunes; and although they accumulated their means by the honest, industrious, and legitimate use of a small amount of capital, and have built up for themselves reputations for industry, honesty, and fair dealing, they are to be told by the hon. Minister of Finance that they are doing business under the guise of chartered banks; that they receive deposits under that guise; that they loan money and make profits under that guise. They are to be told that the trade mark—the distinct identity which they bear as private bankers, as members of the community, as great traders, is to be demolished by one stroke of this great legislator's Banking Bill, and these men are to be relegated—we can hardly say where, but as far into obscurity as this clause in the Banking Bill can relegate them. I do not think that this is dealing charitably, or kindly, or—shall I say—fairly with these banks. They have the right to retain the positions they have built up for themselves, and their standing and positions are associated with the trade mark or name which they bear. Take for instance the Guelph Banking Company—a company known by that name throughout the County of Wellington—their bills of exchange and other paper is known by that name in every part of that district; but if you deprive them of that name, and they have to choose another, they have to establish their identity, and build up their business standing and reputation under a new designation, which it will require the public some time to become familiar with. This hon. gentleman who so sacredly guards all the public interests, who has pretended to be so vigilant a guardian of the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country for the last three or four years, is about to attack this large and important business, this industry which we cannot well spare in many rural towns and villages, and he is going to interfere with those who are engaged in it. We know that, in some of the back places, if we had not these banks, business could be carried on only with very great difficulty. Are we going to throw all this business into the hands of the chartered banks? Are we going to give them a monopoly of the banking business of the country, by interfering with these smaller institutions that serve so useful a purpose in the commerce of the country? Are we, by means of this meddlesome Bill, going to interfere with the standing and the reputation of the private banking business of Ontario, and, I may say, of the whole Dominion of Canada, and thus take another step in the direction of placing the business of this country in the hands of monopolists? We know that these great commercial and banking institutions are a power in this country, as they are in England; we know that many persons deposit their money in the private banks instead of the chartered banks, because they get one per cent. more interest upon it. If they do so, it is their own look-out; they take the risk themselves, if there be any risk, and if you interfere as you propose with the private banks, you will deprive them of these deposits and crush out one industry while you are attempting to build up another. I think the hon. gentleman's legislation is tending in the wrong direction. Instead of attempting to centralize wealth, we should attempt to diffuse it. We should attempt to give the towns and villages all over the Dominion, as far as we can, the same privileges and advantages with those who dwell in the larger cities, or in the neighborhood of the chartered banks. We should endeavor to develop and increase the wealth of the country by affording the same facilities for those who live in the rural districts, as those which are enjoyed by the dwellers in cities. I must object and protest against this clause of the Bill. I remember that, in 1880, when the old Bill was before the House, we proposed to refuse those carrying on private banking business the use of the term banker. I think you, Mr. Speaker, remonstrated with the hon. gentleman, and I know I did, and he conceded the use of the term banker; and I think that, having heard the course of this discussion, and feeling as he must feel that the sentiment of the House is against the useless and injurious restrictions of this Bill, he should amend it by striking out those terms which are as useful, as legitimate, and as necessary for the use of a banker as are the terms which any other business man uses to describe his business.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is all very well for the hon. member for West Middlesex to express the sentiment of this House, but does he suppose that the Government and all the members of this House will accept his views of the case as those of a majority of the House? Of course, if I thought he was expressing the opinion of the majority of hon. members of this House, I would withdraw the Bill at once; but as I do not recognize the representations of the hon. gentleman upon this, or upon almost any other question, as the opinions of the House, he must excuse me if I do not accept his view. Judging by the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Opposition to-day, we might suppose that he believed that there should be no restrictions imposed upon banking operations at all; but every hon. member of this House who is upon the Banking and Commerce Committee is aware that no one is more particular than he is with reference to giving powers to loan companies and other associations of that kind, to receive deposits and transact other business of that description. It is known by every member of the Committee that that is the course of the hon. gentleman—that he is a perfect watch dog there with reference to such matters. Now, he and the hon. member for Middlesex would throw the whole thing open—

Mr. BLAKE. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. ROSS. Not at all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is practically what these hon. gentlemen are contending for. You would imagine from what has been said by the hon. member for West Middlesex that there should be no restriction with reference to the lending of money, and the transaction of financial business. The Government and the House have deemed it necessary, from time to time, to impose certain restrictions in the public interest with reference to banking corporations—with reference first to their capital, then with reference to the amount of issue, and other things. The public interests are guarded and protected in every particular, and in the Act of 1880, for example, the holders of notes are given the first claim upon the assets of the company.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Do you mean to say that there is no difference in that respect between chartered banks and private banking companies?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I know that, of course, there is a difference between a bank of issue and a private bank; but in the same way it has been laid down, in the Banking Committee, that no company shall be incorporated unless it has a capital of half a million. Cases sometimes come up in which small banks desire to be chartered, but so tenacious is Parliament with reference to giving power to banks to establish themselves upon small capital, that, as I have said, a fixed rule has been laid down, that half a million must be subscribed, that a certain portion must be paid up, and a certain portion paid within a stated time before they are allowed to go on.

Mr. ROSS. But private banks do not issue notes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But they receive deposits, and that is the very point with respect to which the hon. leader of the Opposition is so careful to guard every Act with reference to loan companies, and so on, that comes before us. But with reference to this question, there is no desire whatever, as I have already stated time and again—the hon. gentleman is trying to draw a herring across the trail; trying to draw our attention from the question—there is no desire to prevent private bankers from doing business. They can go on and do business under the name of bankers, but they are not to assume the name of a banking company as was provided by the terms of the clause to which I have referred. Now, the hon. member for West Middlesex, who perhaps has a banking company in his own constituency, for whom he would like to say a word—

Mr. ROSS. I have half a dozen of them, and I am always bound to protect the interests of my constituents.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. And especially the bankers in that locality.

Mr. ROSS. They are opposed to me in politics.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then, perhaps, there is no reason why we should interfere with the gentlemen whom the hon. member is so anxious to serve on this occasion. He would endeavor to make it appear that the object of the Government is to reflect upon the honesty or integrity of the bankers. That is not the case; but we say that depositors—men who do not know the difference between an incorporated bank and a private bank—should know, when they are depositing money, whether or not a bank has been incorporated under authority of Parliament, or whether they are depositing their money with private individuals or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question. If the people are so ignorant as not to know which banks are private and which are chartered, how are they to be so well informed as to know that the hon. gentleman has passed an Act prohibiting these things?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That has nothing to do with the matter; and, besides, if there was an Act prohibiting it, they would know the difference between individuals engaged in banking and an incorporated company. The object of this Bill is, that the people should understand exactly what kind of an institution they are depositing their hard earnings in. The hon. gentleman has attempted to ridicule us because we have endeavored to take every interest under our care. We do; and we wish to take under our care men and women who deposit their earnings with private individuals, by enabling them to know that they are doing so. That is the sole object of this Bill, and if it is necessary to change any terms, or to otherwise amend the Bill, in order to make it more clear, I am willing that that should be done when we go into Committee. The Bill is no reflection upon those who are engaged in this avocation at all. It might just as well be urged that the oaths required from merchants by the Customs Act are a reflection upon them. We have to deal with honest men sometimes, and every honest man takes the oath cheerfully, because he knows that it is in his interest. The object of this Bill is simply to protect those who are not able to distinguish between an individual and a chartered bank, and I am satisfied it will commend itself to the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. Minister of Finance should bear in mind that in many places, which are remote from chartered banks, the private banks are found to be a great convenience to the people. I know a large portion of country, the entire banking business of which is conducted with a great deal of efficiency by private banks; and if this Bill strikes a blow at the respectability or standing of these private banks, it should not be allowed to pass this House. In many places where private banks have been brought into competition with chartered banks, they have succeeded in obtaining a large amount of business. Chartered banks will not discount paper for a less sum than $100, while private banks will do so, and are thus found to be a great convenience. I do not think it is in the interest of this country that this useful industry, which is managed by men of integrity, intelligence and perseverance, should have a blow struck at it by this House. It would be a great misfortune if gentlemen who have invested a large amount of capital in these institutions, should be forced to withdraw it. If this Bill has that effect, the hon. Minister of Finance will have to consider another question—the establishment of chartered banks at points where the banking business is now done by private individuals. If private banks do not act fairly and squarely with the people, they will do very little business, because the people will soon discover whether they are dealing with men of standing and character or not. As a rule, they give higher interest than chartered banks, and who will say that they should not do so if they wish? I think that, instead of passing a measure which must have the effect of injuring this large class of the community, who are pursuing their own course, and are not issuing notes or money which has not been paid up, this House, and this Government especially, who are pledged to look after the interests of every class, should see that this Bill is withdrawn or changed, and that these people are protected in their rights.

Bill read the second time.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 7) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting Offences against the Person, be now received and concurred in.

Mr. IVES moved, in amendment, that the said Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to add the following clause:—

Clause 5.—All trials under this Act shall be private, and no person shall be admitted to be present thereat, except such persons as have duties to perform in connection with the trial, or the defence of the prisoner.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not know what particular object the hon. member for Richmond has in making this motion, nor what purpose he expects to serve by it. There is no reason that I know of why an amendment of this kind should be added to this Bill, any more than that it should be added to other Bills of a similar character, and we know that no such restrictions are contained in other such Bills. We know that the law makes persons who commit other offences against morality, perhaps not as outrageous as this, for instance rape, liable to be tried, but they are to be tried in the light of day, before a jury and a judge of their country—I can see no reason why the same rule should not apply in this case. These criminals do not escape punishment; they cannot be tried in a hole-and-corner manner. Whatever disgrace and criminality is attached to the act committed, the criminals are tried openly and are bound to appear before their peers and stand their trial. If that be so with the class of cases to which I have referred, there is no earthly reason why the same rule should not prevail in this case. So in another class of cases—perhaps the most abominable known to either the Common or the Statute Law of the country—I refer to the case of sodomy, they are tried in open court before a Judge and jury. There is no reason why the class of cases provided for in this Bill, should be made triable in secret, and the others triable in public. Since the Bill was submitted to the Committee of the Whole, I have received many letters on the subject, urging me to press it, even to a vote of the House if necessary. One clergyman—not of the Province of Ontario—writes that in the neighborhood in which he lives a case occurred, not long ago, which was brought before the courts, but, unfortunately, the courts had no power to deal with it, it being a criminal offence. I have had another letter from a police magistrate in the West, and another from the mayor of a city there—pointing out the importance, the necessity, of a Bill of this kind. I am entirely opposed to this kind of exceptional legislation. There is no reason why this should be made an exceptional case. If the hon. gentleman proposes that all cases of a similar kind be dealt with in this way, he may introduce a Bill to deal with all on the same principle and I shall support it; but that one case should be specially selected for exceptional legislation is wholly opposed to the spirit of our Legislature.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman desires to know why I should desire that this amendment should be passed, and what particular reason there is why the trial, in a case of this kind, should be secret that does not exist in reference to other crimes of a similar character. I can only say that I think it would be better if trials, in all cases which approximate to the degree of scandal that always attaches to a trial of this kind, were secret. I have heard the presiding Judge on more than one occasion, in my experience as a criminal lawyer, express regret that he was not able to proceed with the trial with closed doors; and I know that on such occasions, as a rule, the audience is much larger than ordinary trials in nisi prius cases. I have seen a good many of those clergymen present who seem to take great interest in this Bill and correspond with the hon. gentleman in reference to it. With regard to this matter, we are not dealing with all such cases here; we are dealing with one particular case. The question is whether it would be advisable to add this clause to the Bill. The House have this matter in hand now, and it is entirely beside the question to say they should not deal with it in the sense they desire, because they have it not in their power at present to deal with all other similar cases. There is a reason in this which does not exist in any other case, however repugnant it may be; and that is, that trials of this nature must necessarily be very rare, inasmuch as the offence itself must necessarily, let us hope, be very rarely committed; and if it is necessary—I do not believe it is—to place this blot on our Statute-book, let us not place it there in illuminated letters. Let us put it in small type in some secluded place, and when a trial must take place it should be with as little scandal and notoriety as possible. There will be more harm done in the scandal which attaches to a trial of this character on the community generally, than all the good that possibly can be done by bringing the guilty parties to punishment. Therefore as in other cases—in the case, for instance, of executions of criminals where the law has recognized the advisability of avoiding scandal and public harm—it should be the express and positive law, and should appear in the Act itself, that whenever a trial takes place under this Act, it should take place with as little publicity as possible. The hon. gentleman says, let it take place in the light of day. I do not see anything to be gained by this. The trial can take place before a judge and jury under my proposed amendment, and all persons who have any business in the case will be present, but the court will have to exclude those who go merely out of prurient curiosity.

Mr. BLAKE. Every hon. member must sympathize with a great deal of what the hon. gentleman has said; but the question he has raised is of a very serious character, and deserving of the attention of the Government, and particularly that of the hon. member of the Government who represents the hon. Minister of Justice in this House. I believe that public trials of this description often produce great evils, and that the minute and detailed accounts that appear in the public papers, of preliminary investigations in trials which do not involve the revolting features particular to this class of cases—particulars of brutal murders and other crimes—are of great danger to the public. I believe if greater restraint could be placed by this House on the conductors of the public press with reference to the publishing of these details, much good would be done to the community. The publication of the details is an infinitely greater evil than the open trial, because it is so widely spread. Where you have fifty or a hundred who attend the trials, you have tens of thousands reading the next morning all the appalling disclosures. What we are face to face with—unless you exclude the reporters—is the knowledge of the great public, of the particulars of the trial, rather than with that portion of the public who attend the trial. You are face to face with two conflicting questions, and these are things which, without at all dogmatizing as to which should prevail, it is important the House should consider for a moment. On the one hand is the question to which the hon. gentleman has referred. It is a degrading thing to our humanity that, as he says, this class of trial should be the class of trial that attracts large audiences and crowds the court rooms, like trials of seduction, adultery and rape, or anything of that description. But, on the other hand, you have the question whether the great principle of the trial of criminals in public, of the public administration of justice, is to be interfered with, and to what extent. Now, it seems to me that there are many cases where it is quite as injurious to have the public present at trials under the Statute Law, as this class of cases. It seems to me the question is one which we might fairly discuss, if the hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to introduce some general measure applying to all cognate cases, giving some discretion to the Judge to remove the public, or a certain portion of the public, from the trial. I am not now advocating any such measure. I think we would have to consider very carefully before we decided that upon the whole the principle of the public administration of justice should be infringed on. But I express nothing unfavorable to such a measure, for I feel as strongly as the hon. gentleman can the inconveniences which do attend the publicity of these trials. But I do say that we are laying down practically the general principle, if we adopt this clause; and I submit to the hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment, and to the Administration, whether it would not be better that the amendment should not be inserted, that we should not test the sense of the House upon this particular amendment, and whether we should not take into consideration the desirability of some modification in the law as to criminal trials of this character. If it be their determination that the principle of publicity is of such vast consequence and value—and, no doubt, it is of vast consequence and value—that it is not to be infringed on at all, then it ought to be infringed on now; but if it ought to be infringed on in this case, then I think we ought to go much further than this particular clause, and, therefore, that the whole question would be more fitly dealt with by some general measure than by a clause inserted at this stage in this Bill with reference to the trial of these particular offences.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The fact that an hon. member thinks it necessary to depart from the rule of publicity in criminal trials, and to try certain cases out of the presence of the public, justifies, to a certain degree, the position I assumed the other day, when the Bill of the hon. member for West Huron was read the second time. The hon. gentleman says that since that time he has received several letters, urging him to go on with it. Well, I have received letters, too, and from men whose position entitles their opinion to respect, deprecating the passing of a Bill of this kind. I have here a letter written by a gentleman who belonged to the Liberal party, and who now occupies a high magisterial position in the city of Montreal. This is what he says:

"The legislation proposed against incest, adultery, and seduction, had already attracted our attention. In our experience we have never heard any serious complaints of that kind, in any case they have been very few. We see no urgent reasons for the passing of such legislation. There have been here a few cases of criminal assaults upon young girls by their parents. Almost invariably we found at bottom that it arose from a desire of vengeance, especially on the part of the woman who often seemed to use her child as an instrument of gratifying her anger. What would be the consequence if both parties, apparently, were agreed in the commission of the offence, and would be consequently both equally guilty, and if afterwards difficulties should arise between them, and the most shameless of the two should denounce the other to the tribunals?"

Mr. BLAKE.

It would be dangerous, it would be immoral!—and what would be the benefit to society? A little more scandal, and that is all. If this can be said of incest, much more can it be said of adultery and seduction. I observe that it is the man who would most frequently be the victim of such a state of things. A fallen woman sticks at nothing, especially when her shame has been revealed. And how skilful she is in the use of blackmail! And what a fine chance such a law would give her for blackmailing! We find the bill upon adultery and seduction dangerous to the last degree. If we must have legislation in regard to incest, we think that the law ought to be limited to the father and mother with their own children. As magistrates we would be satisfied with the existing law, and we think that sections 49, 50, 51, and 52, as respectively amended, are sufficient for the repression of all the worst cases of the kind which deserve the attention of the legislator. The true principle of criminal law is not so much to punish the guilty as to deter others by example. Some of those offences are the result rather of accident than habit, and it would be better to ignore such cases as long as they do not become dangerous to society. I do not know that incest can be placed in this category. It is a question with me whether the horror this crime inspires, and the paucity of cases of the kind, may not be a better remedy than a stringent law, which would have the effect of accustoming the public mind to look upon it as one of those offences to which humanity is addicted. That, at least, is my opinion."

That is the opinion of a gentleman whose position enables him to speak as to the necessity of such legislation with more authority than some of those gentlemen who support this Bill. I believe, as I have said, that such legislation will be a dead letter, and if it is put into operation the remedy will be worse than the disease.

Mr. BOSSÉ. I will vote for the amendment, but I think it should go further. Such an Act as is proposed, which is not necessary and is not warranted by the present condition of our people, will be conducive of no good, but, on the other hand, will create very great evils. The Bill as it stands makes no distinction between two classes of offences which may come up—where the crime is notorious and is generally known in the community, and where, as will happen in most cases, it is secret, and only accidentally discovered. Speaking merely of the latter class, I say that the convictions under this law will be exceedingly rare. It will be found almost impossible to obtain proof, witnesses will not be had, and it cannot be said that we will be obliged to take the evidence of the accomplice, of one of the perpetrators of the crime. Therefore, in most cases proof will be exceedingly difficult to secure, and, indeed, it will be found almost impossible to obtain it. Out of the very rare cases which will come under the notice of the Attorney-General, suppose there are some cases where that proof is possible, what will be the result? Exceedingly rare as they are, they will have to be dealt with. Why should we pass laws and enact the penalties? Let us bear in mind that laws are not passed merely for the purpose of passing them; let us bear in mind that we do not enact penalties for the mere pleasure of enacting them. Laws have other and higher objects. We pass laws and enact penalties in order to deter others from the commission of crime. They are also enacted in a broader view—for the good of society. Let us see to what results we would come to with this law. There is no offence against the person. The crime has been committed voluntarily by the two parties. There is no damage to property, and in the class of cases of which I have spoken, that is the class where the crime is not notorious, society itself is not in question, and has nothing to gain by an indictment. Let the House bear in mind that I am referring here, not to the notorious, but to the other class of cases. What are we, therefore, going to do? We see there is no offence against the person, against property, or against society, and still, under the pretext of protecting society, we will drag this crime from the secrecy where it was committed—for it is the crime of secrecy, of darkness, and of shame—we will drag it into open daylight, and present its revolting details to the public; and all that for the sake of what? For the sake of exposure. People will come to the courts by hundreds, who before coming there had no idea that such a crime could ever be committed. Their first notions of the crime will be obtained there, and they will have temptations suggested. We will thereby turn our courts justice into scandal-mongers, into disturbers of public of morality, and into aiders and abettors to those crimes. Still worse, such a law would open the door to the very worst kind of blackmailing. Where is the honest woman whose honor is threatened by an indictment of this nature, who would not give away her last cent and sell her last rag in order to save herself from the ignominy of such trial, and the disgrace which would result from it, for she would never again be able to show herself in the streets of her town. She would be lost for ever. It would be the same for every man charged with the offence. This would open the door for the very worst kind of blackmailing; there is, therefore, nothing to be gained by such an Act as is proposed. But I take it that we ought to leave the public good sense and indignation to punish such crimes. One case which came under my notice was in the district of Montmagny. I was then prosecutor for the Crown. It was my lot to be advised, under very peculiar circumstances, to lay an indictment for a crime of this nature. It was laid, of course, in another name. The proof failed, as was expected—the man was set at large; and the day afterwards, under the pressure of public opinion, under the indignation of every honest man, under the shame and contumely he felt, he was obliged to leave with his accomplice—who was known after the trial to be his accomplice—for a country where there is a law to punish this crime. I know another case which occurred, where the parties were obliged to go in consequence of the indignation of their neighbors. In those cases the crime was notorious, and there was no revelation in the court of justice of facts which the people did not know. But we have not been alone in this country, where the morality of our people has generally been held to be good, in being without such a law. In other countries where the law did exist it has been abolished. In Spain, Italy, France, as far back as 1793, and in England, the common sense of the people—the common law of the English people, to use another term—did not find it necessary to make this an indictable offence, and if that is the experience of other people there must be something in it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BOSSE. Before the adjournment took place, Mr. Speaker, I had stated the uselessness of trials which might take place under this Bill, if it ever became law; the uselessness of the public scandals which would inevitably result from those trials, and the danger of blackmail to which it would open the greatest and widest field. I had stated, also, that society was not interested, for the reasons which I had the honor to lay before this House, and that the perpetrators of these crimes were the only ones who were affected by it, and who were degraded and debased by it; all this is applicable more especially to that class of crimes which are not notorious or of public notoriety. As to these last ones, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the objections are not so strong; but still I believe, still I am convinced, that this Bill ought not to be adopted. I have given to this honorable House two cases which had come before me, in which the knowledge of the crime had been notorious and public. The scorn and indignation of the neighbors and the sentiment of public morality, which had been aroused, was amply and more than amply sufficient to do full justice in the matter. I believe, and I trust, that in most, if not in all these cases, such would be the result, when these crimes would come to the knowledge of the neighbors, or of the public, they will do to them the most ample, the most direct and the most substantial justice. But, Sir, if this should not be the case, if it should happen, that in very rare cases indeed, these crimes could be committed with that apparent impunity, then the only thing

I can say is, I pity the community in which they could be so committed; and what I can say and assert, Sir, is, that no law, whatever it may be, can come to the help or rescue of those people, if the sense of public morals, if the sense of self-respect is not sufficient amongst them to enable them to do that justice. No legislation would help them, no testimony coming from that quarter would be available for the ends of justice; and no good would result from any law which we may pass. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in our Dominion of Canada, self-respect and public morals are equal to the self-respect and public morals in other countries. In other countries, in all the countries of Europe, laws of this nature were to be found as relics of barbarism. But in several, I believe in most of these countries, one after another, those laws have been abolished. Let us profit by the experience of others. Men are men everywhere; and the condition of society has led to the abolition of those laws, and to the abolition of those old customs; and surely we cannot say that this does not also exist in Canada. Let us see, Sir, what were the reasons which induced the legislators in France—and those reasons were the same in other countries—to abolish those old customs. I find them given in the theory of the penal code of France by Chauveau Adolphe and Faustin Hélie, two of the best authors who have ever written on the subject; and every one who is familiar with French authors knows with what degree of respect the opinion of these two men is to be received. What do they say, Sir. The author refers, Sir, to the particular crime mentioned in the Bill now under the consideration of the House, and to others of the same nature:

In all these cases, the laws actually in force protect society in the most ample way:

“ C'est à ces actes, en effet, que son action doit se restreindre: ceux-là seuls portent à autrui un dommage visible et appréciable; seuls ils se manifestent aussi avec un fait matériel que la justice peut saisir. Les autres, accomplis dans le secret, couverts la plupart d'un voile épais, ne troublent point ouvertement la société qui les ignore, et ne portent dommage qu'à leurs auteurs qu'ils dégradent. La justice, d'ailleurs, pourrait-elle les poursuivre sans péril? Quels scandales ne jailliraient pas de ces poursuites? Où serait le bien de dévoiler tant de turpitudes cachées, tant de honteux mystères? La morale est-elle intéressée à ces infâmes révélations? Le silence de la loi devrait être approuvé, quand il ne serait dicté que par un sentiment de respect pour la pudeur publique; c'est assez que la justice soit forcée de proclamer le délit, en le punissant, quand le scandale a été public, ou quand la liberté des personnes a été atteinte. Et puis, quelles seraient les conséquences de cette intervention de l'action publique? Ne seraient-ce pas consacrer l'inquisition du magistrat dans la vie privée des citoyens, soumettre à ses investigations leurs actions intimes, ouvrir, en un mot, le sanctuaire du foyer domestique? La loi a donc procédé avec sagesse en distinguant, parmi les actes immoraux, ceux qui, tout en révélant des habitudes licencieuses ne produisent pas une offense directe sur autrui, et ceux qui tendent à produire ou qui produisent en effet sur les auteurs un préjudice appréciable. Les premiers ont dû être laissés à la seule réprobation de la conscience et de l'honnêteté publique, et la loi n'a sévi que contre les actes que la société avait un véritable intérêt à punir.”

No words more eloquent can be found to express the ideas which I have the honor to lay before this House. I only wish I could translate them, and render them as Chauveau Adolphe has rendered them. They will, I am sure, convey to every one who hears me the conviction that this Bill ought not to be adopted. We then see, Mr. Speaker, that these questions are far from being new, that, before this day, they have attracted the attention of other legislators, who, confident in the good sense, confident in the self-respect, confident in the force of the public morals of the people whom they represent, have confided in the good sense, and the public morals, and the self-respect of the people, for the punishment of these crimes. In that they have not failed, Mr.

Speaker; in that they ought not to fail; and we ought not to put upon our Statute-book, a law which would declare that our sense of public morality is insufficient to secure the punishment of these crimes; and that our sense of public morality is not such that it can drive them out of our Dominion. Again, Mr. Speaker, such a law would be useless, or next to useless, for another reason: who is the man of experience, who is the man having any knowledge of what criminal trials are, who is the man, acting as Attorney General, with the experience and knowledge of the laws, and the knowledge of human nature, which an Attorney General must possess, or which he is deemed to possess, who would take upon himself the responsibility of making the courts of justice, where he sits now, the vindicators of public morality, but, as I said a moment ago, scandal-mongers and the distributors of immorality. He would think twice before he laid an indictment; and that indictment, if ever prepared, would remain in his desk, and the law would remain useless law. At last, Mr. Speaker, I have finished with this disagreeable subject, other things ought perhaps to be said, but I regret that I have been obliged to say so much. I regret that it has been thought necessary even that a discussion should be raised in this House on a subject of this nature. But I will go no further, and if the worst comes to the worst, if after all the reasons which have been given contra, the majority of this House and of this Parliament should adopt this Bill, then, at any rate, let us take the worst of the sting out of it and adopt the amendment, which has been proposed, by which the horrible and revolting details, necessarily the accompaniment of these trials, will be removed from the public view. And if this is done, one of the main objections to the Bill will have been removed. I will support the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been a silent but not an uninterested listener since this matter has come up before this Parliament. I have been looking for the reasons of what I saw was quite prominent in this House—I have distinctly noticed the feeling which was evident in this House—namely, the objections to this Bill becoming law; and it has been more easy for me to see that a feeling existed against the Bill, than to get at the reasons why it should exist. I am, however, indebted to my hon. friend for Quebec Centre, who I must say has made a most vigorous, a most pleasing, and most eloquent speech, for his maiden effort in this House—for he has adduced about all the reasons I have heard adduced as to why this Bill should not become law. Let me try, Mr. Speaker, for a moment or two, to gather together the chief objections to the Bill. One of the first is, I think, this: danger will arise from the publicity which will be given to something which otherwise might have remained secret. That was the objection raised the other day when the subject was discussed here to some extent, and it is an objection which has been repeated again to-day. The hon. member for Bellechasse was very much concerned as to the evil effects which would take place if such a law as this should be bound up in the Statute-book—he thought it would have a very bad effect. I do not consider that that argument should have much weight in this House, from this consideration: that that little Bill bound up in the Statute-books of the country would not come before the gaze of any considerable number of our people, and if it did come before the eyes of any it would be our lawyers; and I need not stop long to discuss the question as to the demoralizing effect that such a Statute would have upon the members of that robust and virtuous profession. Then, again, it was stated that the publicity which would be given by means of trials, would be prejudicial to the morals of the country. I am thoroughly in sympathy with that idea. I believe in the Bill, but I believe in the amendment to it; and if that amendment does not go so far as to exclude all reporters of newspapers from those trials, then I hope when it comes before the Committee, such will be done. I do believe that the difficulty in these cases arises, not from the fact that there is a known evil existing, and that that evil is punished, but that it arises from the fact that the details of these trials, which never should go to the public, are spread upon the pages of the newspapers and scattered broadcast through the country. I do believe, and am in thorough sympathy with the idea, that these details should be secret—that they should not be made public in that way. We will leave that part of the Bill, that is, the danger of publicity, which, I think, is reduced to a minimum if we take the Bill with the addition proposed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. The next argument is that there are other countries which have not these laws. Just here—for I am not able to speak by the book—I want to enquire as to whether or not, at least in some of these countries where these laws do not exist, they do not exist simply because they have been allowed to lapse as parts of old ecclesiastical laws which dealt with this matter. I think that is the case in England; but I think that in Scotland laws are strictly enforced yet with reference to this evil. I quite admit that precedent from other countries should have a certain amount of weight with us; I do not acknowledge that they should dominate our legislation, and it would have to be proved to me that Italy, Spain and France had a better state of morality, and that they had a clearer record in this respect than countries where such laws do exist, before I should feel that that argument should have great weight with us. I think we can cite countries where these laws do exist on the Statute-book, and where they are fairly well executed with proportionately good results. The next argument used has only been brought out to-night, and it is that this matter is different from all other matters, and, therefore, we should not make laws with reference to it. It has been stated that this is not an offence against property. Well, we may have different kinds of property, and different ideas of property; but I think there are many crimes that are punished by our laws with regard to property that can not begin to be so heinous or to deserve so great punishment as those committed against what is popularly assumed to be property. I go further, and I say that the manhood and the womanhood of the country is the highest and best species of property that belongs to it, and I consider that this is a crime which offends against what is, in the highest and best sense, the property of the country. It is said that this is not an offence against the person. I take issue on that question. I say that it is an offence against the person. It is an offence against the moral sense—against the very highest, best, and most sensitive conscience of the individual; and when you touch the person in that part you touch it in a very vital part indeed. I say it is an offence against the physical life of the country. We know that science has been bringing this out more and more clearly, until it is read all through our country, that generations are wiser, and healthier, and better in proportion as the degrees of consanguinity become further and further removed from persons contracting marriages. I say that this is a matter which, touching the moral life and the physical life of generations, may fairly be classed as an offence against the person. It has been stated that this is not an offence against society. Again I beg leave to take the opposite side of that statement. I think it is an offence, and a great offence against society. If I read and think correctly, I believe that society is built up upon these two bulwarks especially—the purity of its members and the intelligence of its members; and I believe that this is an offence which obtains among the people in proportion to their ignorance and their impurity. So I think it may properly be classed as an offence against society. It is said that this is a secret matter, and should be left secret. I cannot subscribe to that doctrine. Suppose a man stands among us, having some disease upon him, and knows it not, is not warned of it, so that he does not avail himself of the appliances which are close by him, and which might give him relief, and does not exercise that watchfulness and care which might prevent the disease from spreading, until it becomes fatal to him. I think there is a complete analogy between the man and society in that respect. It is those vices which are allowed to remain hidden, that grow and eat deeper and deeper into the very vitals and essence of society, that prove its greatest danger. It is said, again, that we should leave this matter to the good sense of the people. To the good sense of what people? To the good sense of the people who are criminals in the matter? They have not that good sense to appeal to, from the very fact that they are the criminals. Shall we leave it to the good sense of the rest of the people? Yes; how can we better deal with this question than by registering the people's condemnation of this vice by the instrumentality of the law, and putting a penalty against it, and thus enabling the good sense of the people to meet and grapple with the evil, and minimize it to the very greatest possible extent? Let me, in closing these few remarks, call your attention to what was very well explained as the double object of the law, by the hon. member for Quebec Centre. Law is for two—I think we may say for three—purposes. It is to punish the person who offends. Will any one say that the person who offends in this respect ought not to be punished? Law is also to deter others, who have not committed an offence, from committing it. The frequent occurrence of an offence which obtains largely in the lower grades of society, can be better prevented by the existence of a penalty against it than by any other possible means. But there is another object of law, and I think it is one of the very highest purposes and uses of law, and that is, to crystallize the sentiment of the people, and to place it as a teaching power on the Statute-book. We have instances of this in history. The time was, in our own fatherland, when slavery was allowed, when it was condoned, when it was upheld; but the sentiment against it began to spread from mind to mind, from heart to heart, until by-and-bye it was registered in the form of a Statute; and the highest concrete sentiment of the people remains there to-day for the world to read, and learn from it the lesson of liberty and equality. So, I think, a high office of the law is to register the best aggregate or concrete sentiment of the people; and I should be sorry indeed, Mr. Speaker, if, after this matter has been brought to the attention of this Parliament and the country, we should fail to rise to the height of this demand, and register our condemnation of such crimes before the people of this country, and before the people of the world in the Statute-book of our Dominion.

Mr. CURRAN (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I undertake to discuss in French the question now before the House, out of sympathy for the large number of persons, speaking that beautiful language, who have in such a striking manner shown me their confidence on the 20th of June last. I do not think it necessary for me to reply at any length to the speech made by the hon. member who has just sat down. The hon. gentleman has altogether misunderstood the arguments adduced by my hon. friend for Quebec Centre (Mr. Bossé), and all the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject. The question now before this House, Mr. Speaker, is not the enormity of the offence, nor the desire which exists in the heart of every citizen and legislator to prevent such offences. That is not the question. What we have to discuss, and do discuss at present, is to ascertain what would be the best means to preserve public morality. I exceedingly regret that on this occasion I have to employ the language of gallantry, the language of the old chivalry in the discussion of a subject having such unhealthy odor as this. But, Mr. Speaker, I think a few slight reflections will suffice to carry the conviction that such a law is not necessary. For my part, I do not pretend to have an extensive experience, but I have now been practising in Her Majesty's Courts in the Province of Quebec as a lawyer for twenty years; I have pleaded not only before the civil courts, but also before criminal tribunals both as Crown prosecutor and on behalf of the accused, and during those twenty years no case such as this has ever come to my knowledge. Can the necessity for such a law be proved by articles quoted from the newspapers of the Dominion, whether English or French? Can it be shown that the order of things is such that a law of that nature has become necessary? Have any petitions been presented to Parliament on the subject? No, Sir. Let us examine the charges made by the honorable judges presiding in the Criminal Courts to the Grand Jury from one end of the Dominion to the other; shall we find in them a single instance where any of those honorable judges has alluded to the existence of such a plague in our community? Nothing of the kind has ever taken place. We have been told, Mr. Speaker—and the assertion was just now repeated in terms almost formal—that many persons have very little regard for the high authority quoted by the hon. member. We are told—what has frequently been stated elsewhere: When it shall have been proved that the morals of Italy, that the morals of France, and the morals of Spain are superior to the morals of other countries, then they will agree with them that we do not require such legislation. The hon. member stated that there are countries where morals are pure, where civilization flourishes, where scandal is never heard of, and wherein, nevertheless, laws of that character exist. I am not aware what country that statement may have reference to. Is it in any of the neighboring States where morals are so prominent? As proved by statistics, morals in some of those States are such that their people are disappearing and their place is filled by strangers. These, Mr. Speaker, are the reflections, which present themselves to my mind when I hear allusions made to the morals of Italy, the morals of France and the morals of Spain. I do not think it necessary to dilate further on the subject. I do not think it would be possible to put into our Statute-book a law more prejudicial to the interests of morality. But, Mr. Speaker, there are in all countries, in our own as well as elsewhere, men who have extravagant ideas, who are afflicted with a kind of mania for such legislation as this. Fortunately, they are not numerous. Until now those odious crimes have not prevailed in families; the population has been free from their baneful influence, and families increase and grow in good morals. We do not want such a law, not only because of the scandal resulting from those trials—for the trials are not the only thing made public—but there is moreover the arrest of the accused, which is also a source of scandal. You know that we have in this country as elsewhere sensational papers making capital out of such scandals, and the character of citizens is at their mercy; and even with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), will the morality of our youth—of our boys and girls—be in less danger from reading in the newspapers of the arrest of certain parties for crimes of this nature? If parties who can commit such crimes exist, which I really do not believe, there are none in our Province, none in the district of Montreal. Such crimes have never come to my knowledge, and I do not believe that they are ever committed in any part of our Dominion. The few isolated instances mentioned by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), are not sufficient to induce us to imprint this stain on our Statute-books, to blight our criminal law by the introduction of such a measure as this. I will vote in favor of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, because I consider it as a means of putting an end to our present embarrassment, and such as will facilitate the disappearance of this Bill which is no credit to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think we ought to have some declaration from the Government as to what course they propose to pursue upon this question. This is a criminal Bill and ought to be in the hands of the Government or receive their sanction. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to the amendment; but I would like to see it extended to all crimes of the same character. Of course, if the Government see no objection to it, I see none, except as already indicated.

Amendment (Mr. Ives) agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. IVES moved that the amendment be inserted in the Bill as clause five.

Mr. RYKERT moved that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Let me explain the effect of that motion. It is to defeat the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. If hon. gentlemen are prepared to defeat the Bill, on their own head rests the responsibility. I care nothing personally, but I think this is a crime that ought to be punishable. I move that the Committee rise and report the Bill as amended.

Mr. AMYOT. I rise to a question of order. This is an amendment to the amendment, and is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. IVES. My motion was that the Committee should adopt a certain amendment. As I understand, the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) is an amendment to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that Mr. Rykert's motion is not an amendment, but is something of the character of a motion for adjournment.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend for Huron says that he wants the responsibility to be on the heads of the hon. members who want to defeat the Bill. My hon. friend says they want to defeat the Bill without taking the responsibility, because they do not choose to have their names recorded in the Journals and brought before the public as hostile to it.

Mr. RYKERT. I would like to know why the hon. member did not take a vote on the original motion to go into Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. To go into Committee for the purpose of considering a particular amendment. Many hon. gentlemen who are friends of this Bill—take the hon. member from New Brunswick who spoke, for instance—are friends also of the amendment. It would be very good policy to divide the friends of the Bill on the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to know just how this thing is—what we are voting and what the effect will be. I took it upon myself to call out "lost." I do not know if I was right or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the Committee rose without making a report, that would end the Bill. That is the intention.

Mr. IVES. Are you putting the amendment to the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. I am putting the amendment of the hon. member for Huron.

An hon. MEMBER. We are entitled to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. member had better put his motion in writing.

Mr. CURRAN.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be very glad to have an answer to my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion will be put in writing. I will read it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Do I understand that the amendment of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, put as an addition to the Bill that the trial be secret, is carried.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand that was carried.

Mr. IVES. If that amendment has not been carried, surely the amendment of the hon. member for Huron is an amendment to the amendment. I made a motion that the amendment should be added to the Bill. The next motion was a motion made by the hon. member for Lincoln that the Committee rise, and the third was the motion of the hon. member for Huron that the Committee do now rise and report the Bill with amendment. Surely the amendment of the hon. member for Huron is an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lincoln, and is out of order.

Mr. BLAKE. I think you were correct in saying that the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln is a motion which is not an amendment at all. It is in order at any stage of the question in Committee, that the Committee do rise. I do not know what the motion of the hon. member for Huron in amendment to that is, nor am I prepared to say whether any amendment can be made to a motion to rise. But I think it quite clear that the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln is not an amendment to that of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, but is a different motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must say, in corroboration of the opinion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, that when a motion is made that the Committee do rise, I have never known, during the twenty-five years I have been in Parliament, an amendment to have been made to such motion. It is always considered a motion which must be voted upon at once. It is the same as a motion to adjourn the debate.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The motion of the hon. member for Lincoln that the Committee do rise, is, in this case, a motion for adjournment.

The CHAIRMAN. I was first under the impression that this motion, being regarded as a substantive motion and not an amendment, an amendment to it might be received; but on hearing the remarks from much older Parliamentarians than myself, and on giving the matter a second consideration, I am of opinion no amendment can properly be moved to the motion made by the hon. member for Lincoln. The motion before the House is that made by the hon. member for Lincoln, that the Committee do now rise.

On the members being counted, a tie was declared, and the Chairman gave his casting vote in the negative.

Motion negatived.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Translation). I opposed the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), because it would, if adopted, deprive the accused of a great means of defense; for, even if he be acquitted, a certain stigma will always remain upon him, and if he is not allowed to bring to the knowledge of the public the evidence which will clear him of the charges brought against him, he has no other means left to wash off the stain which will forever blight him in the eyes of his fellow citizens. Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said when the amendment was moved, the fact that we are obliged to depart from the rules of criminal procedure, observed in our courts of justice, is of itself proof that such legislation ought not to appear in our Statute-books. Were this amendment carried, a person wishing to have revenge against any one could with impunity attach to his name the brand of infamy, and the victim of such an infamous charge would not even have an opportunity to defend himself as publicly as he was accused. This is unjust, Mr. Speaker, and such a clause ought not to be inserted in the law. Should this House declare that we must vote on such a law, which I consider as a stain on our Statute-book, I trust it will be made public; that the defence which the accused will be bound to make against such accusation will be as public as the charge itself. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would request hon. members to vote against the amendment, so that the Bill remain unchanged and be voted on upon its merits.

Mr. BOSSÉ moved that the Committee do now rise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have grave doubts, under the circumstances, whether a motion for the Committee to rise, be in order. This Bill was in Committee of the Whole before, and the Committee rose and reported progress. The House then sent it back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to do one thing—to adopt the amendment of my hon. friend for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). That was all they were charged with, and that is all they had power to do. It is not mandatory. Formerly the instruction was supposed to be absolute, but latterly it has been held that the Committee is not deprived of discretion to reject the amendment. The instruction that was given, and the only power given to go back to the Committee of the Whole, is for the purpose of considering whether that shall be adopted or not. All the other portions of the Bill were considered in Committee, were reported in Committee, and belong to the House. It seems to me very much like an anomaly that we have already passed upon this Bill in Committee of the Whole, we have risen and reported the Bill, and it was sent back to the Committee of the Whole; and the only thing they were enabled to do was to consider whether they would adopt the resolution of my hon. friend. It seems to me like an absurdity that, having previously reported the Bill and having got liberty only to consider the amendment, we should be at liberty here, of our own accord, to disobey the order of the House and destroy the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I might say further that whatever latitude we may have had at an earlier stage, we have already obeyed the instruction of the House as a Committee. We have considered the amendment which we had power to consider, and we have adopted the amendment that we were instructed to consider, and there is nothing more for this Committee to do except to get the Bill back to the House.

Mr. IVES. Of course I would not put my opinion against that of the leader of the House and the leader of the Opposition, but I had supposed that when the House is in Committee, the Committee could do what they liked with the Bill. If the Committee has not power to rise without reporting, whence the necessity of the Committee reporting at all? Will the House take the Bill and read it the third time without report from the Committee? If the House is competent to receive the Bill back from the Committee as a report, then surely we have jurisdiction; and if we have jurisdiction we can do what we like with it. Moreover, the motion that the Committee rise, like the motion for the adjournment of the House, can be made at any time, and is always in order.

Amendment (Mr. Ives) agreed to; and Bill reported.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the Bill, as amended, be now taken into consideration.

Mr. BOSSÉ moved in amendment that the Bill, as amended, be taken into consideration this day six months.

Amendment (Mr. Bossé) negatived on the following division:—

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the Bill, as amended, be now taken into consideration.

Mr. ROYAL moved that the following be added to the amendment, as reported from the Committee of the Whole:—

That no reporter, journalist, newspaper correspondent, or member of the press, not being a practising barrister, shall be admitted to the court-room during trials of all the offences mentioned in this Act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is upon the consideration of the Bill as amended. This motion will properly come in, therefore, when the Bill is being read the third time.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that the motion of my hon. friend for West Huron was that the amendment be now considered. The motion of the hon. member for Quebec Centre was, in amendment, that it be not now considered but that it be considered this day six months. That amendment has been lost and we are now on the main motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest to my hon. friend who moved this, that the amendment be considered now and stand for its third reading; and then that there should be a vote taken to-morrow, or whenever the Bill is finally disposed of. There is no use having half a dozen divisions on it.

Motion agreed to on a division.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 14) respecting Carriers by Land.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Mr. MACKENZIE. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman intends to send this Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I can imagine no Bill more requiring the attention of that Committee than a Bill relating to carriers' duties.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not propose to move such a motion. I am opposed to sending Bills of this kind to such Committees, which are struck for the purpose of dealing with Private Bill legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think the hon. gentleman will find that similar Bills have been sent there.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not mean to say that such has not been done, but I do not intend to move such a motion.

Mr. McCALLUM. I think this Bill should go to the Committee. Some very important changes are proposed which will effect the interests of all shippers.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not shippers.

Mr. McCALLUM. Yes, shippers, and railway companies as well, because it relieves them from being responsible for damage they may do to any man's property.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the object of the Bill.

Mr. McCALLUM. It will have this result: that on every bill of lading there will be a contract, and unless that contract is signed, goods will not be shipped. In regard to carriers by water the case is different, because there is competition in that case; but in a village the shipper of goods or cattle must sign a contract on every bill of lading, or he cannot ship at all, therefore the companies will get rid of their liability. Under these circumstances I hope the Bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend is wrong in his view of the Bill. The object is in a contrary direction, to make railway companies and other carriers responsible, unless the contract they enter into with shippers is decided by the courts to be just and reasonable. As the law stands now carriers can and do insist upon any regulations and any conditions which they please, whether these are just or unjust; and they are able to set them up as a defence against the consignor or consignee, whose goods are lost or destroyed. The object of the Bill is to provide that these conditions are not to be binding or tenable, unless signed by the consignor, or shipper, and not then unless they are just and reasonable, and if it is so decided by the court or Judge. The object, therefore, of the legislation I propose, is to impose additional liability on carriers, or rather to take away some of the provisions on which they now insist to protect themselves against all possible liability in any event.

Mr. McCALLUM. This House, I think, should say what is just and right, and it should not be left to any court at all, as far as the responsibility of the carrier is concerned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the views of the hon. member for Simcoe, as to the duties of the courts, are rather anomalous. Courts of justice are not created to make contracts for parties, but only to construe contracts as the parties intended to make them. I do not think our courts would be greatly delighted in having to interpret contracts, as to whether they are reasonable or not. When a contract is made it is binding on both parties. I think that the object of the Bill might be better attained, if these regulations were made by Statute and not left to the discretion of the courts; and that the suggestion of the hon. member for Monck ought to be adopted. The Bill could be sifted in the Committee of Banking and Commerce. For instance, take the meaning my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) gives to the word, "common carrier." He applies it only to carriers by land. Now, I will ask my hon. friend whether carriers could not get rid of these provisions, in case they sent goods by ferry during a part of the trip, as between Detroit and Sandwich. Their liability would then cease, according to the letter of this Bill, which ought to be referred to a Committee, especially as it affects the rights of so many persons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand from my hon. friend, this Bill is an exact transcription of the English Carrier's Act, which was there fully considered in Committee, and there, as my hon. friend Mr. Casgrain must know, all the vested rights of railway companies and of all kinds are fully protected and discussed in Committee; therefore, I think we have prima facie evidence that this is a good Bill. On looking over the Bill itself, I am of that opinion. Still, if it be the general sense of the House that it ought to be referred either to the Committee on Railways or to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, I have no doubt that my hon. friend will yield, and will consent to this step. From its clauses it might either go to the one or to the other Committee, but Banking and Commerce is perhaps the one most appropriate, inasmuch as this Bill refers to other carriers by land than railway companies. The hon. gentleman will see that the Bill is limited to carriers by land and does not affect the common law or the statutory obligations of shippers.

Mr. McCARTHY. This is already provided for by the Statutes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not think that it can interfere with carriers by land.

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The moment they cease, de facto, to be carriers by land, and become carriers by water, the contract under this Bill is not binding, but lapses. This would break the contract in toto, exactly as in the case of the deviation of a ship from its course. The point I make is very simple.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the twelfth section is in the English Act, which allows Judges to decide whether a contract is reasonable or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; and that is really the best section of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the old section which we had years ago.

Mr. McCARTHY. This is really the important part of the Bill; and what we have been trying to get here for some time. At present there is no check on carriers—no limitation at all. If any person reads a shipping bill, and all the conditions imposed on carriers, and which they are compelled to sign, or their goods will not be shipped, he will find the necessity which exists for such a Bill as this. The objection to it, I understand, is that it ought to go further, and say, that no limitation and no conditions imposed on carriers, shall be held just, and legal, and binding; but whether the House is prepared to go to that length, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the Bill is a step in the right direction; and any person who is engaged in trade, will recognise that fact. The conditions now imposed on carriers are almost impossible of fulfilment; and if any loss be sustained, damages can scarcely at all be recovered. I think that the Bill should, however, include all classes of articles—such as animals and cattle.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does do so.

Mr. SPROULE. For instance, last summer in the case of shipping cattle and horses to the North-West, an agreement was entered into by shippers, who had to sign it. The cars, containing cattle and horses were shunted off on a siding. No provision was made for feeding them and a number died. An attempt was made to get redress through the courts, but it was impossible to obtain it. The conditions seemed to be binding all on one side, and not on the other at all. I think it is necessary that this Bill should go before a Committee and sifted a little further, in order that it may be carried a good deal further and be made to include all classes of articles shipped.

Mr. WELDON. I think it is well to follow the English Act, which will be a great guide to us and to the public. I must say I agree with the last speaker, some interference is required, for the conditions imposed by the railways carrying goods practically throw the whole of the responsibility on the sender; and as my hon. friend from Simcoe says, this is a step in the right direction, and it does not place undue responsibility upon the carriers.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I see it is provided in the third clause, that carriers are not required to take certain articles, over and above a certain value, unless an increased rate is paid; and the fourth clause provides that they are bound to take these articles, if an increased charge is paid. It would be well to consider what this charge should be; for the railway companies might raise the rate, until they made it prohibitory. The promoter of the Bill might well consider whether the rate should not be fixed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, who has announced his approval of the Bill in general terms, whether this Bill will apply to Government railways. If we are to continue in the business of common carriers, as a nation, I presume that we must necessarily be brought under the provisions of that part of the Act which regulates carriers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that the Government can be considered to be a common carrier.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, then, an uncommon carrier.

On the fourth clause,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) whether he considers that this clause giving the right to put an increased rate on valuable goods, is subject to the general control of railways, and of railway carriage, and of rates, under the Railway Acts. It may conflict in that regard; and if there be any question on this point, the Bill should go to the Committee on Railways.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think, Mr. Chairman, that there should be some limitation at all events, as to the increased rate to be charged by carriers on these articles.

Mr. WELDON. I think that if a carrier should make an excessive charge the party injured would have remedy without this Act, and could recover back the over-charge. Still, it might be well to guard this section, in order that railway companies might not have the power to impose exorbitant rates. The difficulty is that in a great many cases, where exorbitant charges were collected the parties concerned would pay them, and not seek to recover. This is an objection that undoubtedly, if a carrier charges unreasonably, the excess can be recovered back. I have done so myself.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see why the tariff of express rates should not be in the same position, that is, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The plan followed by the railway companies is that when an article is brought to them which they do not care to carry, weighing say eighty or 100 pounds, they will not take it except at the rate of 1,000 or 1,500 pounds.

Mr. McCARTHY. The point made by the hon. First Minister is that this power might enlarge the right of the railway companies to change such tariff as they please, and get rid of the necessity they are now under of having the tariff approved by the Governor in Council. But this is a general law which enacts that all carriers shall have these rights in connection with such goods; and I do not think it will give the railway companies power to charge anything except by law, which must be approved by the Governor in Council, before it becomes operative. My hon. friend for Renfrew (Mr. White) suggests to me that a certain maximum might be fixed, say 20 or 30 per cent., beyond which they should not go.

Mr. WELDON. If you fix 30 per cent. they will always charge that rate.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is danger of that, of course.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he knows how this law will affect the Province of Quebec, where we have our particular French law on this subject. It seems to me, speaking at the moment, that these provisions will make what I consider a great modification upon our laws.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it would be well for the Committee to rise and report progress. The attention of hon. members has only been called to this Bill to-day, and they have not yet had time to fully consider its provisions. I, therefore, move that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DAVIES. I did not understand whether the hon. mover of this Bill, in his answer to the hon. member for East York, said that the Bill was intended to apply to the Government railways. I think he intimated that the Government were not common carriers. I think he will find that in the Consolidated Railway Act of 1881, they are made common carriers, both with respect to passengers and goods. In fact, so far as the eastern part of the Dominion is concerned, they do almost all the carrying trade. In Prince Edward Island, it is known the railway is entirely owned by the Government. If the Committee agrees that the Bill is good, I see no reason why it should not apply to the Government railways.

Progress reported, Committee to sit again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:10 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 14th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 83) to amend the Acts respecting procedure in Criminal Cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law.—(Mr. Weldon.)

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have regularly made the returns required of them by Sections 30 and 31 of the Railway Act of 1879?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The company made their returns under Section 30, but they did not sign them and, in that respect, the requirement of the law has not been complied with. They have promptly complied with the 31st section, by making their weekly returns of traffic duly signed.

INSURING GOODS IN BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. COURSOL enquired, Have the Collectors of Customs at the Ports of Montreal and Quebec, received instructions from the hon. the Minister of Customs to direct persons to insure all goods placed in a bonded warehouse, at a price sufficient, not only to cover the cost of freight of the articles, but also the amount of duty as well?

Mr. BOWELL. No such instructions have been sent from the Department.

SUPERANNUATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND JUDGES.

Mr. DAVIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to apply to the Judges of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island the Statutes respecting the superannuation and retiring allowances of Judges of the Superior Courts of the Dominion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government to submit a measure to Parliament directly.

VACANT COMMISSIONS IN THE ARTILLERY.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to fill up the vacant Commissions in "A" and "B" Batteries of Artillery with graduates of the Royal Military College?

Mr. CARON. The matter is now under consideration of the Government.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved, that the first report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates of this House, during the present Session, be concurred in.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It appears there are some facts that it is desirable the Committee should have an opportunity to consider in relation to the subject mentioned in the report; and if that opportunity was afforded, the Committee would very likely modify the conclusion at which they had arrived, or offer some suggestions as to what mode should be adopted for the translation of the Debates hereafter. In view of these facts, I beg to move that the report be referred back to the Committee for reconsideration.

Motion agreed to.

MURRAY CANAL.

Mr. PLATT, in moving for copies of all reports not already brought down by Government engineers, relative to the several proposed routes for the Murray Canal, with estimated cost of construction by adopted route and other proposed routes; also, Orders in Council, correspondence, petitions from mariners, vessel owners and others, and recommendations of master-sailors and others, relative to the selection of a route, the construction of the canal, or the character of the harbors afforded by Presqu'Isle and Weller's Bay; also, a list of tenders, with names and amounts, received in response to Government advertisement, and all offers made by tender or otherwise to construct the canal by any other than the adopted route, together with such reports as to progress made in work of construction as may be in possession of the Government, said: These reports are asked for in order that the people may be furnished with the reasons which induced the Government to select the route chosen for the Murray Canal. So far the people in that section have not been made aware of the reasons, and there is an almost unanimous expression of opinion that a preferable route was discovered and should have been selected, and, in the opinion of vessel owners, what is known as No. 4 route, or the route opening into Weller's Bay would be more advantageous, especially to the marine interests of the country. It is simply for the sake of satisfying the public that this information is asked. I presume the Government have acted upon the reports of their engineers, but those reports have not been officially published. I find, in the report of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, the engineer refers to a special report, but I cannot find it in the hon. Minister's report. I trust the reasons which induced the Government to select the adopted route, and the other information asked for in the motion, will be brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to bringing down the information which the hon. gentleman has asked for, but a similar motion has already been made in the other branch of Parliament, and the return has been granted and will be brought down and go to the Printing Committee; and I presume it will not be necessary to duplicate it here, as all that the hon. gentleman wishes will be attained by the information asked for being submitted to Parliament. If the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to drop, the information required will all be furnished under the Orders of the Senate, and when sent to the Printing Committee it will be available to the members of this House as well as to the other branch of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman compared the motions?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have—yes; at least when I say that, I may add I sent a copy of this motion to the hon. Minister of Justice, who stated that it was similar to one moved for in the Senate; but if I find anything in this motion which is not embraced in the other, the whole will be sent down.

Mr. BLAKE. All right.

Motion withdrawn.

RICHMOND FIELD BATTERY.

Mr. IVES, in moving for a return of all petitions for, and correspondence with respect to new guns for the Richmond Field Battery, said: Shortly after the termination of the Crimean war, a number of great guns were brought to this country; and our Government, with a degree of liberality which was somewhat unusual, presented these guns to different cities and towns throughout the Dominion, for the purpose of ornamenting parks and public places. There were, however, a few that were so ponderous that the different cities and towns did not like to take the responsibility of receiving them; and out of this residuum, afterwards, a field battery was organized. These guns, I think, have been mostly fortification or siege guns, captured from the Russians. I think it was the custom of the predecessors of the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Militia and Defence to pass this ponderous battery around to all the junior batteries as fast as they were gazetted. As a rule, when a new battery was gazetted they got those great guns; but unfortunately for them the Richmond Field Battery, although it was gazetted several years ago, it is still the baby battery or the last battery organized; and, for that reason, they have had to undertake to drill with these guns for an inordinately long period of time. We have waited with very great patience, hoping that the hon. Minister would either give us new guns of a suitable character or gazette another battery, when we would expect that the same practice, which has hitherto been followed, would be continued. Now, I have only to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the report of his own officer, the Deputy Adjutant General, upon this subject. He says upon page 25 of the Militia Report of this year, speaking of Field Batteries:

"The Richmond Field Battery, Major Aylmer, in camp at Richmond, did excellent work, and worked their heavy and obsolete weapons (which I trust the Department will soon be able to change), with a desire to excel, though they turned out weak, and in consequence, the work was heavy."

I can only say, that if they had turned out strong the work would have been very heavy. Although the Eastern Townships, I think, are famed for their muscular men and horses, I must say that this battery has been a severe trial both to horses and men. I can quite understand that, during last summer, the hon. Ministers were engaged in the duty or task of spiking great guns, in different parts of the country; but as that time has passed, they can now give their attention to this subject. I must ask the hon. Minister to give this matter his earnest attention, and, if possible, either to gazette a new battery, or to pass these guns along, or to place this year in the Estimates a sum sufficient to purchase suitable guns for these men; and considering the pay which the volunteers receive at the present time, it is enough to ask them to perform their duties with suitable equipment. Now, this battery, when they turn out, cannot fairly be asked to enter into competition with other batteries which are properly served. It is impossible for them to go through their evolutions with that degree of credit to themselves, which would be possible if they had suitable guns, and were put on fair terms of competition with other batteries. I have asked, for one or two years, that this matter should be looked into; and I am quite sure that the Minister, this year, with his usual liberality, will do what we consider to be justice to the Richmond Field Battery.

Mr. CARON. Mr. Speaker, the battery to which the hon. gentleman has just called the attention of the Government and the House, has already had my attention on several occasions. The hon. gentleman and the gallant officer commanding the Richmond Battery, have applied to me to provide the battery with guns. I know perfectly well what is contained in the report of the Deputy Adjutant General in reference to this battery, but it also applies to several other batteries, which are not armed with proper guns, to make them as efficient as they should be. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the change would involve the expenditure of £1,699 sterling per battery; and, however anxious I have been, and am at present, to give to these different batteries improved and lighter guns, which would be more useful and which would contribute so much towards their efficiency, I must say that the great expenditure which would be involved in the purchase of guns to arm them, has, so far, prevented me making the change which I would like to have made. I hope, but I cannot say when—but before very long—that it may be possible to carry out the changes which would make such a very great improvement in these different batteries. For the present I have found it impossible to order the guns which have been required; and I may add, that the Richmond Battery would only obtain such equipment after three others—who would be entitled, from their seniority, to get the first improved guns at the disposal of the Department for the purpose of arming these batteries—had secured the benefit of such change.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to bring the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the condition of the officers commanding these field batteries; and I hope that, when the Militia Estimates come down, he will make some change in regard to them. I think it is a very great injustice that these officers in the active force, commanding batteries and under very great responsibility, not only in caring for valuable stores, but in having to learn much more in the shape of drill, should only hold the position of captains of infantry companies, with the same pay and rank. I would ask, whether either in the Bill about to be brought down, or in some measure with reference to the Militia, placed before the House this Session, or through the Estimates, officers commanding field batteries should be given the same position that majors of infantry regiments hold. This would be only fair, for it is exceedingly unfair that an officer commanding a field battery, with seventy or eighty men, and in charge of valuable property, and of duties requiring a much larger amount of technical knowledge than infantry officers possess, should only have the position held by an officer commanding forty-two men, and receive a captain's pay. It is simply a matter of fairness that the change should be made. As an officer who has attended a great many inspections and reviews, I may say, I think it a very great credit to our force, that it is not only relatively, but absolutely, so thoroughly efficient and deserving of every encouragement, as is the case in connection with the field batteries of the Dominion of Canada.

PILOTAGE AUTHORITY, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for copies of all correspondence and papers between the Government and the pilotage authorities of British Columbia, or any other parties on the subject of pilots and pilotage, said: I might state that I have several reasons for calling for this correspondence. The first is that I may ascertain the names of the persons with whom this correspondence has been had, and the reasons given by them for having been the means of altering what was at one time a very good system of pilotage in British Columbia—the system which was embodied in the Pilotage Act of 1873, and made applicable to the Province of British Columbia on the 5th of May, 1875. I wish also, if possible, to show what has been the effect of that change upon the trade and commerce of the Province; and last, but by no means least, I wish to show the injustice which has been inflicted upon the pilots of British Columbia. By the Act of 1873 it was provided that the Governor General in Council should have power to appoint a certain number of persons—not less than three or more than five—who should constitute the pilotage authority in any particular portion of the Dominion which they might see fit to provide for. On the 5th of May, 1875, a board of five Commissioners was appointed, under an Order in Council, to whom jurisdiction was given over the whole of the waters of British Columbia, from the shores of Washington Territory to the northern boundaries of the Province. Subsequently—I think on the 15th of April, 1879—an Order in Council was passed splitting up that board, so to speak, and substituting therefor three separate and distinct pilotage authorities. There is in British Columbia an interim port called the Royal Roads, which all vessels from foreign parts, and even coasters, make for. The reason of their doing so is obvious, because at that particular point they are in a position to negotiate charters with the coal loading port of Nanaimo and Departure Bay, the lumber loading ports of Port Moody and Hastings at Burrard Inlet, the lumbering mills of Puget Sound, and the wheat market of Portland in Oregon, while they can also, at very slight expense, run down to San Francisco, where they can easily secure charters. I believe I would be justified in saying that nine-tenths of the vessels arriving in British Columbia anchor in the Royal Roads previous to going to the loading ports of British Columbia, or effecting charters in any of the neighboring ports which I have mentioned. In a recent visit made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to British Columbia, this matter was brought very forcibly to his notice by an address which was presented by the Board of Trade of British Columbia, which Board consists of many of the most prominent merchants, not merely in Victoria, but in all parts of the Province. I shall read to the House some extracts from that address:

"The present system of pilotage districts leads to a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of masters of vessels, owing to the conflict of authorities which at present exists in having special pilots for each district. Vessels, as a rule, call at this port on their way down to Burrard Inlet and Nanaimo, and the pilots of these ports are put to much unnecessary expense in consequence of their having to maintain an additional number of pilot vessels. We recommend that some arrangement be made by which pilot licenses shall extend over the three districts, reserving to the different boards their local authority. We have already endeavored to arrange such a scheme, but without success."

Later on, when His Excellency the Governor General visited British Columbia, this matter was again brought forward in the following words:—

"The subject of pilots and pilotage is another matter which urgently requires reorganization, from the fact that vessels as a rule call at Royal Roads (i.e. port of Victoria) on their way to Nanaimo, Burrard Inlet, and New Westminster, and naturally expect to find pilots at or below Race Rocks, ready and competent to take them to any port in the Province, instead of being met with a conflict of authorities and rates for three separate and distinct districts, the same as though they represented an equal number of foreign ports. This existing system of electoral pilotage districts is at variance with the requirements of trade and commerce, is unnecessarily expensive to a small number of pilots, enhances very materially the port charges of merchant vessels and has a tendency to influence them to prefer Puget Sound to British Columbia. We would respectfully submit, therefore, that some steps should be taken not only to amalgamate the three British Columbia districts, but also to make the licenses held by all pilots effective for the whole of the navigable waters of British Columbia, and a maximum rate established that may be fairly chargeable to vessels loading at the several ports, irrespective of the number that may happen to call at during their stay in British Columbia waters."

I do not find any part of the world where the pilotage arrangements are so peculiar as in British Columbia. If we go to Great Britain we find that the pilotage authority consists of the Trinity House, having jurisdiction from the River Thames to longitude 11° west, or several leagues to the west of the Scilly Islands, although there are several classes of pilots, each having specific certificates, namely, from the Thames to Gravesend, from Gravesend to South Foreland, and from Foreland through the English channel, including Spithead, Portsmouth, Plymouth, &c. Coming a little nearer home let us take the St. Lawrence River, and we find that though it forms the boundary of no less than twelve or fourteen electoral districts, there are only two pilotage authorities, namely, the Montreal Harbor Commissioners and Trinity House, Quebec.

Mr. BAKER.

The pilotage district of Quebec, as defined by the Act, comprises "the River St. Lawrence, from the basin of Portneuf, inclusively, to an imaginary line drawn from the eastern anchorage ground, off Barnaby Island, to the eastern anchorage ground, under Cape Columbia, on the north shore, together with all rivers, waters, creeks, bays and coves, within the said limits, where the tide ebbs and flows." The pilotage district of Montreal comprises the river from Portneuf to the Province line. Now, if it is not necessary that the pilotage districts in the St. Lawrence and other rivers should be assimilated to the electoral districts, why should that be the case in a new Province like British Columbia, where there are very few persons conversant enough with nautical matters to be competent to sit on so many boards. If we could obtain a sufficient number there to compose one board, I think that is all we could reasonably expect. I am aware of one case in which a Commissioner, who was conducting an examination, knew so little of nautical matters as to ask a pilot, whom he was examining, what he meant by a binnacle and where it was situated. I mention this case to show that, however competent men may be as merchants to transact ordinary business relating to shipping, it by no means follows that they are fitted to deal with all matters connected with pilotage and navigation. Instead of having three separate pilotage boards, I think it would be better to establish one general pilotage board for the Province, composed of one Commissioner each from Nanaimo, Esquimaux, Victoria, Departure Bay, Port Moody, Port Hastings, and New Westminster, making seven in all. But that is a minor matter compared with the injustice which the present system inflicts upon pilots who have certain vested rights under licenses issued them by the British Columbia pilotage authority, constituted by the Pilotage Act of 1873, which licenses gave to those pilots the right to pilot in any port of British Columbia, and all the navigable waters leading thereto. In a case which was taken before the Supreme Court of the Province to test the validity of these licenses, the judgment given says that nothing but clear and express words will give a retrospective and retroactive effect to the Statute, and however much the present tense may be used in it, it must be construed as applying only to future matters. The pilots who received licenses in British Columbia were given to understand, not only verbally by the Commissioners, but by the Act under which the licenses were issued, that they were to be pilots during good behaviour, until the age of sixty-five. Now, I maintain that the change in the jurisdiction of the pilotage authority issuing said licenses, does not and should not in any way interfere with the validity of the licences held by these pilots. The effect of the Order in Council of the 15th of April, 1879, was absolutely to destroy the whole pilotage system of British Columbia then in existence, which was working admirably, and to create in lieu thereof three distinct but imperfect systems, at great loss to the pilots of the Province. They had to give up their vessels at a loss of $4,000 or $5,000, they had to abandon their pilot stations, and in many other ways they were deprived of the rights they possessed under the old British Columbia license. My main object in addressing the House on this subject is to induce the Government, if possible, to pass such legislation as will restore to these pilots the rights which they have been unjustly deprived of. If it is thought desirable that there should be one board to each port, I would suggest that there should be one general board to which appeals might be made from the decisions of the local board. I will conclude by asking that some departmental or legislative action be taken, so that if there cannot be one board for the whole of the Province, a sort of reciprocity may be established among the several local boards, so that they would act as one board, and by which the rates of pilotage might be lessened, and the rights of the pilots preserved and the charges on vessels lessened.

Mr. McLELAN. I think the hon. member should amend the motion by restricting the return to correspondence in British Columbia; otherwise it would call for all the correspondence which the Department has had respecting pilots and pilotage.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall have much pleasure in amending it in that way.

Mr. HOMER. After the time and labor spent in establishing different pilotage districts in British Columbia, I think we should be very cautious about changing it; and I wish to say that, so far as the district of New Westminster is concerned, which I have the honor to represent, I believe the system is satisfactory—so much so that, previous to my leaving, the city of New Westminster expressed a very strong opinion in opposition to any change being made at the present time. At present each pilotage district has its own board, which makes its own laws and regulations; and any attempt to take away that power and concentrate it in one body will always meet with strong opposition. Any attempt to concentrate that power at one common point would always meet with very strong opposition on their part.

Mr. GORDON. With reference to Nanaimo, I am here to ask for the continuation of the system that is now in force. While I should have no objection to the correspondence asked for, I am sure this Government can have none. I cannot agree with the contention of my hon. friend, that any considerable amount of shipping wait in the Royal Roads seeking charters. Nearly all the shipping that frequent the port of Nanaimo, which this last year took away some 240,000 tons of coal, were contract ships. Therefore, any attempt to interfere with the pilotage authorities at this time, even at the solicitation of what is termed the British Columbia Board of Trade, would be disapproved of by the people of Nanaimo, above all by those companies who contend that nothing should happen that would interfere with the freedom of their shipping. The proposition to have a board of Pilot Commissioners for the whole of British Columbia, comprised of one commissioner at New Westminster, and one at every other port, would be a failure. It would only result in the detention of shipping, on any dispute arising between the pilots and captains. The present system is approved of, and I am here to state that the district I have the honor to represent will disapprove of any attempt to interfere with it.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I have simply to endorse what the hon. member for Victoria has so well said, and I sincerely trust the suggestions he has made will be carried out.

Mr. BAKER. I did not notice, in the remarks of either of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, whether they advocated the cause of the old pilots having justice done to them, or not, or whether their original rights under their old licenses, up to sixty-five years of age, were to be reserved.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS.

Mr. MASSUE, in moving for a Select Committee to enquire as to the necessity of passing a law to prevent fraud in the manufacture of agricultural fertilizers, the said Committee to consist of Messrs. White (Renfrew), Williams, Bourbeau, Farrow, Guilbault, Scriver, Béchard, Trow, and the mover, said: The object in presenting this motion is to protect the farmers in helping them to buy a genuine article instead of the spurious ones offered everywhere for sale. In many instances, perhaps more so near large cities, farmers have been selling hay without keeping stock to improve their lands; in some other instances, they have kept the necessary stock to keep their farms in good condition. But even in this last case they still want something more to increase their crops, and they find it impossible, if they have no law, to prevent frauds in the manufacture of agricultural fertilizers. It is a notorious fact that, both in Europe and the United States, until a similar law was introduced, the greatest fraud was practised which had the effect of checking for some time the introduction of mineral and other prepared fertilizers. While this proposed law is to protect the farmer from being imposed upon by the sale of spurious articles which he has no means of detecting, it will also be a protection to the honest manufacturer, who will be obliged to put a label on every bag, pack, or barrel, stating the quality and percentage of fertilizing principles contained in the article he offers for sale. It is the only way to induce farmers to buy and use fertilizers, so that they may improve their lands. Another important consideration is the impetus it will give to the development of our phosphate mines by making a market for the apatite, the exportation of which has been almost abandoned on account of the low prices in the European market. No inspection or other Government machinery is necessary to put this law in operation.

Mr. BOURBEAU (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. gentleman has done well in moving, as he did, in this matter. I think I am in a position to prove to this House how necessary it is that inspectors should be appointed by Government to inspect the various kinds of fertilizers that are now offered on the market. It is, to my knowledge, that, in the electoral division which I have the honor to represent here, experiments have been made towards the cultivation of beet roots. Artificial fertilizers had to be bought for that purpose, most of which were imported; I do not mean those fertilizers imported by the Local Government of Quebec, but such other fertilizers as were imported from elsewhere. Those fertilizers were fully tried, without, however, producing such results as were anticipated; they were not even worth as much as the common ashes taken from our stoves and spread over the ground to fertilize it. I may mention, as an instance in point, the case of a farmer of my county who, not having the means to purchase all the phosphate he required to fertilize his farm for beet-root culture, determined on using phosphate on one half of his land, and run the risk of spreading ashes on the other half as a fertilizer. Well, Mr. Speaker, beet roots grew splendidly on the part whereon the ashes had been deposited, whereas the other part on which phosphates had been used barely produced anything. Therefore the hon. gentleman deserves to be congratulated for this motion, and I hope the Special Committee which will be appointed will give the subject its most careful attention.

EXPORT DUTY ON SPRUCE LOGS.

Mr. IVES, in moving that, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to consider the question of an increase of the export duty on spruce logs of all lengths and sizes exported from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, said: I presume that the hon. Finance Minister will agree with me in several of the propositions which I have to state. In the first place, I presume he will agree with me that the settled policy of his Government is Canada for the Canadians, and that that policy has already led Parliament, as a protection to Canadian manufactures, to levy Customs duties on manufactured goods imported into Canada; and, in order still further to protect the Canadian manufacturer, his Government has, in some cases, admitted free of duty the raw material which goes into the construction of those articles here. He has gone farther than that, and, in the article of spruce saw logs, in order to encourage the manufacture of lumber on our own side of the border, he has placed an export duty of $1 per 1,000 feet upon spruce logs. His Government have gone even further than that, because in some cases they have actually given bounties to assist and promote Canadian manufactures. Now, Sir, the motion before the Chair proposes that this duty already existing, so far as it refers to spruce saw logs, should be increased. There is nothing new in principle in it, it is only part of our settled policy, and the only question possible arising is, whether it is expedient that that duty should be increased. If I were to-day, for the first time, rising to propose to the hon. Minister of Finance to levy an export duty upon spruce saw logs, there might be a division as to the principle, but as there is already a duty of $1 per thousand, I claim that there is no occasion for discussing principles, and that the question solely is as to the expediency of increasing the duty in the interests of our own manufacturers. Now, we have hitherto, in discussing questions similar to this, considered the relative positions of Canadians and Americans upon the matter in question. We have hitherto been in the habit of asking how the Americans treat the articles in question when imported from Canada into the United States. Now, the Americans charge $2 per 1,000 feet upon the roughest sawn lumber. If it is dressed, or if the process of manufacture has gone further, the duty is very much increased, as in the case of clap-boards, shingles and tongued and grooved boards. The roughest lumber is obliged to pay $2 per 1,000 feet, and as our market for such lumber is largely the United States, our manufacturers have to pay $2 per 1,000 feet in order to get their lumber into the American market. Now, the House can easily see the result of that duty as applied to us when our own export duty is $1 per 1,000. As a matter of fact, as it now works, there is a bounty of $1 a 1,000 in favor of taking logs across the line and manufacturing them there. It may be said that the transport of the slabs would more than make up for this dollar; but it has been found, by actual experience, that such is not the case. The American brings over this lumber in large quantities in logs to mills built just across the line, to escape the duty, and they manufacture it there. They loose nothing in transporting the slabs, because they work them up into staves, lathing, box timber, and even sawdust for fuel for the purpose of getting power with which to manufacture the rest of the lumber; so that as an actual fact, as the law now stands, there is a bounty of $1 a 1,000 feet in favor of carrying our lumber across the lines and sawing it in the United States. There is, at least, one case where Canadians have gone to the other side of the line, have built mills there, and taken lumber over from this side for the purpose of obtaining the advantage which the difference in duty gives them. Now, if it is our policy to protect our people, and if it be true that they have not protection here, but that there is a discrimination against us, what possible objection can there be to increasing the duty upon this particular article? To my certain knowledge, at the present moment, thousands of logs are being carried from our country across the line and manufactured in the United States, simply because it is cheaper to do it there and pay one dollar export duty, than to manufacture them on our side and pay $2 a 1,000 import duty. I have talked with a large number of members of the House, and I find an almost unanimous opinion that the Government should give this matter their attention. I have found a great number of members who believe that it should be extended farther than spruce logs; that it should also be extended to pulp wood of all kinds. In the case of pulp wood there is a peculiar hardship, because the Canadian product has to pay 20 per cent., and every pound that is carried over in the log is available for the purpose of manufacturing pulp, except the bark itself, so that actually there is a discrimination against our pulp manufacturers of 20 per cent., as the law now stands, because there is no export duty at all upon pulp wood. In order to escape the dollar per thousand, the Americans have been in the habit of sawing the logs into short lengths, so that they might pass them over the line as pulp wood, when they were really intended for board and box wood. I think, therefore, it is time that the hon. Minister of Finance, who has always been so ready to protect Canadian interests, and who has gone so far in that direction, should enquire as to whether there is not a claim on the part of manufacturers of lumber in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to a greater degree of protection against their American competitors.

Mr. BOLDUC (Translation). I am happy to be able to give my support to the motion just made by my hon. friend the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). I hope the Government will grant this request, by imposing on logs an export duty equivalent to the duty imposed on sawn lumber exported to the United States. We have already a large number of our people engaged in the industry of the forest. They have a large capital invested in this industry, and have built saw mills on the frontier which divides Canada from the United States; and if the Government does not impose an export duty of at least $2 per 1,000 feet on logs brought here by the Americans, I am convinced that, before many years, the proprietors of those mills will be forced to close them up, and will be completely ruined. In order that those engaged in the lumbering business on the frontier shall be placed on an equal footing with the Americans, an export duty of at least $2 should be imposed on logs brought by our American cousins on this side of the line. Whenever a Canadian wants to sell lumber in the United States, he is made to pay a duty of $2 per 1,000 feet on sawn lumber of whatever quality, whereas logs are admitted free by the Americans. Our neighbors have, like practical men, constructed saw mills quite close to the line, and thus enter into competition with those of our people who deal in lumber. They can pay a higher price for the logs, because the duty on such is only $1 per 1,000 feet. I hope that the Government will increase to $2 the export duty already existing on spruce logs; and I believe it would be a wise course to pursue to impose that duty, not merely on spruce logs, but also on all logs exported to the United States; for apart from those who deal in lumber and own mills near the frontier, there are also others who are engaged in the manufacture of pulp. During the last few years costly manufactories have been erected, and if we allow Americans thus to come and ruin our industry, the consequence will be that we will soon have to close up those manufactories. All along the Quebec Central and the International Railways, Americans are seen buying logs which they send home; now, if we impose upon those logs the same duty as our sawn lumber, these gentlemen will construct mills in Canada, thus giving employment to our agricultural classes; and this business which is now ruinous to the Dominion, will become a bountiful source of revenue. For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. Minister of Finance, who has already shown his desire to encourage the new industries of the Dominion, will accede to the wishes of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), and impose an export duty of at least $2 per 1,000 feet, not only on spruce logs, but also on all logs of whatever description exported to the United States.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, has brought forward his resolution, and I should wish that it were made even more comprehensive, so as to include logs of all sorts, bolts and cedars, for the land along our lakes and the St. Lawrence is fast becoming stripped of all its timber; and very soon our manufacturers of barrel-staves, heading, shingles, laths, hoops and lumber will be compelled to give up the business, and all the money at present spent in their manufacture will be entirely lost to the Province.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I take it for granted that the object which the mover has in view is to bring the matter under the notice of the Government in the most formidable way it is possible for him to do, namely, by resolution. If that is his intention, I would suggest that he allow the motion to stand, or withdraw it, as he has succeeded in accomplishing his object by the speeches already delivered, as well as by the notice given. I would simply say, however, that the Government will give the matter their most serious consideration, and they are now considering it. It has been brought formally under the notice of the Government by the mover of this resolution, who has made his efforts more emphatic by eliciting expressions of opinion from those who followed him on this subject. I may point out to him that there is one difficulty. Suppose we were entirely in accord with his proposition, it must be remembered that parties have made contracts under which they have cut logs during the winter for delivery in the spring, and if a duty were imposed, to go into immediate effect, a loss would accrue to them, and it is therefore worthy of consideration, as to how far such a proposition could be made applicable to the operations of the present season. This matter was pressed on the consideration of the Government last Session, with respect to stave bolts and everything of that kind from the Dominion to the other side, which are practically shut out by the high duty imposed there. But the Government will give the matter their most serious consideration, and see how far they would be justified in coming to the House and asking their support to a proposition of this kind. There is a great deal in what has been said by the hon. mover, but there is still the difficulty, which I take the liberty of pointing out, with respect to contracts which may have been made for logs cut during the present season.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not wish the present discussion to close without offering some remarks with respect to the proposition to increase the duty on spruce logs. The present duty is most unjust, and a higher rate of duty would be a greater injustice perpetrated by the Government. My hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) started out in his speech, by saying that he believed Canada should be for the Canadians. The hon. gentleman believes that a duty should be imposed on the great bulk of Canadians for the benefit of a few. Saw-mill men desire a tax to be imposed for their special benefit, although it would detract from the value of the product held by a great many individuals. The hon. gentleman proceeded to tell the House that the Americans imposed a duty of $2 per 1,000 feet on the roughest lumber; they impose that duty on all grades of lumber, rough or smooth, culls or clear. We impose a duty of 20 per cent., this being a higher duty than that of the United States. We impose an export duty, and the American Government does not. Suppose they took the notion at Washington to levy an export duty on timber going from Maine into New Brunswick to be manufactured at St. John, would my hon. friend the Finance Minister see anything unjust in that proposition? Yet, this kind of legislation is of a nature to provoke retaliation by the American Government. The export duty is calculated simply to reduce the value of saw-logs to the extent of that duty for the benefit of the saw-mill men who wish to buy those logs, and to the loss of the farmers who have them to sell. There may be a hundred farmers where there is one saw-mill man; and such a duty as my hon. friend suggests would operate to the detriment of a hundred, while it would benefit only one. There is no duty which can be more unjust than this, and so unjust in its character is an export duty considered, that, in the United States, it is prohibited by a provision of the Constitution. I have had some experience of the operation of an export duty. I know in my own county the imposition of this duty has been productive of the very greatest mischief. It obliged several firms with large capitals to abandon their business in Canada and remove to Michigan. The imposition of a tax of $1 per 1,000 feet on lumber, without conferring the slightest benefit to the saw-mill interest, lowered the price of logs to the extent of the duty. The operation of that duty compelled farmers to burn much of their wood, suitable for shingle bolts and stave bolts, because the duty was equal to its value. The operation of the law, so far as that county was concerned, was most obnoxious and most unjust, and it only required the law to be extended over a broader field to have created a great deal of trouble. The House is told by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, that an enormous business is done in the exportation of spruce logs, and that already many millions of feet are exported; and he asks for an increased duty so that the business of exporting logs may be brought to an end. If many millions are exported they must evade payment of the duty, because the amount collected for export duty on spruce logs, pine logs and stave bolts, last year, was only $8,000. $8,000 from saw logs at $1 per 1,000 feet would be a tax on 8,000,000 feet, of logs, or about one-half a season's stock for a good sized saw-mill. That is the total amount of business in Canada last year from the exportation of such logs. The operation of the duty at the present moment is to afford to the Michigan long timber interest a protection by the Canadian Government of $1 per 1,000 feet. That interest ranges from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000-feet per annum. Under the operation of the export duty persons desirous of entering into the long timber trade on the shores of Georgian Bay and other parts of the Dominion, are prevented from doing so by reason of that duty, which is so levied as to afford a direct protection to an important American industry. If that duty were removed, many firms would commence the business of transporting timber in rafts down the lakes to the markets at Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and other ports. As it is now, the entire business is monopolized by Michigan lumbermen. I would ask the hon. the Minister of Finance, and I would request his attention to this proposal, what he would think of a proposition to impose an export duty of 20 cents per bushel on wheat, in order to cheapen the article to that extent, the reason being that the Americans imposed a duty on flour, and in order to enable our millers to compete with the Americans, it was necessary to levy such a duty on wheat, in order to cheapen the raw material to the miller. Does he suppose—and the 20 cents would stand in about the same proportion as $1 per 1,000 feet does in the case of this lumber—that such a proposal would be received with favor by the farmers, or rather that it would not result in very serious difficulty to the Government; and yet that proposal would not be one which is more unjust in principle than the proposal to reduce the value of spruce logs by increasing the export duty. I say we should allow every man to sell his raw material of any character where he can obtain the best market for it, and export it, without hampering and restricting his business by an export duty. If a man has saw-logs to sell, he has the right to seek the best market for them; and to impose a duty on them simply to benefit some saw-mill man, and to enable them to make a profit out of the reduction in price, do is highly unjust. I hope the hon. Finance Minister will consider this matter very carefully before he increases the injustice already perpetrated by the imposition of a higher duty. And I can tell the hon. Finance Minister another thing: We had hopes not long ago, that the duty on Canadian lumber would be removed by the action of the American Congress; and I would ask that hon. gentleman if he supposes that when knowledge is brought to that Congress of the fact of an export duty being imposed by the Canadian Government to reduce the price of new material to Canadians, and to increase it to Americans, that it would have any beneficial effect in securing the abrogation of that duty. I tell him that this may be done; and this paltry, insignificant item of $8,000, derived from this scandalous imposition, on a certain class of the people of this country, may mean the deprivation of this country, of the removal of the duties on lumber, and it would be poetic justice if it did. I have stood up in my place in this House, time and again, to protest against this robbery, for it is an act of robbery, and a worse imposition than any other duty which this Government imposes. It is a duty levied on an article admittedly for the bare purpose of reducing the price of a staple furnished by the poor man, in order that the rich man and manufacturer may get it cheaper. I hope, that the hon. gentleman will consider this matter fully, and will see, as I see clearly, that he will make a great mistake if he takes the step which he proposes to take, judging from the tenor of his remarks, and will, perhaps, greatly prejudice our interests in the next agitation, which may take place at Washington, to obtain a reduction, or the abrogation of the duties on Canadian lumber.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, I was quite prepared to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk give us his speech on Free Trade and Protection. I believe that this is the first opportunity during the present Session he has had of giving us his speech and his views on this subject; and I think I am to be awarded a certain amount of credit for having furnished him with that opportunity. I think we have heard the words "robbery" and "robbery of the farmer" very frequently from this hon. gentleman, but all I want to say to that is that the farmer is not robbed in this case at all. In the first place, very little lumber is now in the hands of farmers, who, as a rule, have no saw-logs to sell. Lumber is now chiefly in the hands of limit owners and speculators, and of men who stand very much in the position in which the hon. gentleman wishes to put manufacturers and saw-mill owners. Even as to the lumber which is in the hands of farmers, I say that the imposition or the increase of this export duty on saw-logs would not decrease the price one iota. The only difference would be, that the lumber would be manufactured on this side of the line, by our own people here, instead of on the other side of the line, by our own people, who go there for the purpose of manufacturing it. I am quite prepared for this argument of the hon. gentleman, as to taking so much out of the pockets of the farmer. Even if this were so, I appeal to the members of the House, who belong to the Conservative party, whether we have not adopted the policy of Protection, under which we have been told by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that, for a time at least, the price of manufactured articles as a rule would be increased. We have adopted protective duties, even when we had reason to believe that they would increase prices; and why? For the purpose of furnishing work to our own people; of creating a labor market here, and increasing the home consumption of the products of the farmer, with the idea that the matter would very soon regulate itself; and that in a very short time, indeed, if prices were a little increased at first, they would, in the long run, be decreased. In fact, hon. gentlemen tell us they will soon be decreased; and that an unhealthy competition among manufacturers will very soon make articles protected cheaper than they have ever been before. But with regard to this item of lumber, I undertake to say that the effect would not be to decrease the value of the logs to the seller, the effect would be simply this: that the manufacturer on this side could afford to pay $1 a 1,000 feet more for saw logs than he pays at present. As the law now stands, a discrimination of $1 a 1,000 feet exists, against the Canadian manufacturer; and the American manufacturer is able, if willing, to pay $1 more per 1,000 feet for lumber than the Canadian does; but he does not do it. He comes in here and simply offers, in some cases, to raise the price a little on the Canadian manufacturer, because he has a margin of $1 a 1,000 feet to enable him to do so; and the Canadian log seller does not get any more than he would if the export duty were increased $1 a 1,000 feet. The result would be the same, and our people could afford to pay more for logs than they do at the present moment; but that is not all. What else would be the result? Whereas now, these logs are being taken to the United States, and our people are going there to work in their mills, and in many cases new mills are being built just across the line, and within a stone's throw of it, our people would remain at home, and American capitalists would come here with machinery to manufacture lumber here. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that the American Government will retaliate. What more can they do than they have done. The hon. gentleman tells us it is possible that they may reduce the duty of $2, or 20 per cent. now charged on imported lumber. But when they do so, it will be time enough for us to take off our export duty. when they come to us and say: "We are disposed to adopt Free Trade in lumber, and take off our import duty, if you take off this export duty. Then the hon. the Finance Minister would be neglecting his duty, if he did not consult this House with regard to what was best to be done under such circumstances; but not before. The furthest the United States Government have gone in this relation, was this: One branch of the Legislature proposed that the duty on lumber should be taken off; and what was the result? The Michigan lumbermen, and timber limit owners, went to Washington, and, in Congress, defeated the measure, and it is not likely to be adopted until the consumers of lumber in the United States raise a still louder voice than they have yet raised, in favor of allowing our lumber to be imported free. When that time comes, we shall have the opportunity of sending our lumber in there free, no matter what our action on this question of an export duty may be. I ask for this export duty, not because I am afraid that the United States will retaliate—because they cannot do anything worse than they have done in this respect—but because it would put our own people and our own manufacturers simply in a position of equality with the American manufacturer. In answer to the hon. the Finance Minister, who does not ask for—but very strongly hints—that he would like me to withdraw this motion, I may say, I do not desire to press it further. I will be satisfied, if he will allow it to stand and on another occasion, he would hear from a large number of his supporters, both behind and in front of him, an expression of opinion, similar to my own, in regard to this question; the only point of difference being that many desire it should be extended still further than I have requested in this resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. With regard to the operation of this motion on my constituents, I do not think it would be to them very important; but to some extent, it would interfere with a branch of business carried on there now to a moderate extent. I sent for the motion to see the exact wording of it; and I find that the proposition is to impose a duty on spruce logs of different lengths.

Mr. IVES. In Ontario and Quebec only, however.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not notice the motion, but if its application is to have the effect of stopping a branch of business—I mean the export of spruce spars—which is carried on to a considerable extent in the ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, it would certainly be detrimental, and would be looked upon with disfavor by the lumbermen of this country. With regard to the policy of this country in connection with the Tariff which has been adopted by the Government, I must say that I differ with the hon. gentleman entirely with reference to the export of raw material. What would the hon. gentleman say if we were to put an export duty on coal, which is in its natural condition in our country, and reserve that coal for the purpose of encouraging our manufactures? I rather think that hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia would not like that arrangement. This proposition of my hon. friend, I take it, mainly affects the border line between the Eastern Townships and the United States and the great lakes. My hon. friend says the farmers along the western lakes have little lumber on their farms, and that the speculators own the timber limits. Now there are hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in the pineries of the lumbering country extending from Georgian Bay up to and beyond the head of Lake Superior. Does my hon. friend call the men simply speculators, who have invested these hundreds of thousands of dollars, who have established mills and who may choose to bring out their lumber in its natural state? Is it fair to these men to force them to find a market within the boundaries of Canada when they can get it outside? I am a National Policy man, not because I am a believer in Protection, but because it has been forced upon this country and is necessary for the existence and prosperity of Canada. But I am not a National Policy man who would limit the market when we can get it without any infringement of that policy; and I hold that it would be unfair to the people of this country who have invested their money in this business, unfair to the lumbermen of the west who have hundreds of thousands of dollars in the great pineries of our country, that for the sake of the little business which is transacted across the line from the Eastern Townships—for that is, I believe, the source from which the pressure comes—I say, it would be unfair that we should limit the great trade which should be carried on between the 50,000,000 of people on the one side who want our lumber, and the great source of supply we have on this side. We should place our lumbermen, so far as we can, in as favorable a position to find a market as that which is held by the lumbermen of Michigan. We should not say to these men: "We are going to impose an additional duty on the lumber you export to the United States, and we will force you to give up your Canadian business and take your capital and your teams to the lumber woods of Michigan to carry on your operations there." I differ entirely from the hon. gentleman. I consider it is no part of our National Policy—when I come to look on the burdens which have been placed on our lumbermen already by the National Policy—which I have assented to.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say I have assented to it as a public man with a full knowledge of its effects and with my eyes open, because I find it is necessary in a country like this, with varied interests involved, and extending across a continent for thousands of miles. I say it is impossible in such a country that all its interests can be affected the same by any public measure that can be adopted by this Parliament. I assented to that policy knowing that it was going to affect me injuriously as a public man, and it lost me my election. But I faced the difficulty, and I assented to it then, because it was a necessity, in order that the different interests might be affected, and that we might see what effect the operation of that policy would have. But I may take this opportunity of saying to the hon. Minister of Finance what I said upon the hustings, that I trusted when the opportunity was afforded them, I would find that hon. gentleman and his colleagues in the Government able to meet the difficulties with which the lumbermen of the Maritime Provinces had to contend with in supporting the National Policy—which they have so nobly sustained and supported—and that where he can grant a relief without any infringement of the policy, without any violation of principle, without any loss of revenue, he should grant that relief out of consideration for these people. I do think my hon. friend is taking a very opportune time to propose that an additional tax should be imposed on lumber, when we should rather have him asking that the duty should be taken off corn meal, taken off pork, taken off those articles which enter into the production of our natural industries, but which we cannot produce ourselves. I shall not enter into the subject at present, because, owing to cold, I cannot speak as freely as I would like, but I will take an opportunity during the Session of endeavoring to press those views upon the hon. the Finance Minister, who is looking so smilingly at me at this moment. I know from the interest which he has always shown in those constituencies which have stood by him so well for thirty years, that he will not refuse to give the subject that consideration which I think the importance of it commands and deserves. He will not pretend to believe that if this duty is imposed, as my hon. friend desires it to be imposed, it will help the lumbering interests of the country. I do not believe that it will help the farming interests, and I think that whenever we can do so without interfering with that National Policy which has done so much good to the country, which I am prepared to sustain, we should endeavor not to limit the market for our products which the producers of lumber find on the other side of the line. I want that policy let up upon wherever it can be done without sacrifice of principle or interest, with justice to every section of the country, and when business interests call for a free intercourse with our neighbors.

Mr. COOK. By the proposition which has been made it has been attempted to strike at one of the fundamental interests of this country, for not only will the lumbermen suffer by it, but those who have timbered lands and are not engaged in the lumbering trade. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman speak of the limit holders as speculators, for I was not aware that those who held limits and were engaged bona fide in the manufacture of lumber were speculators. On reflection, however, my surprise is not so great, for the whole North-West Territory has been put under license by hon. gentlemen opposite. The speculators in that country embrace all classes, lawyers, doctors, and even clergymen, and these licenses have been disposed of for a trifling sum and without public competition. I would like to ask the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Benson) what he would think if the American Government were to put a duty on corn which he manufactures to a large extent. I trow he would not be found rising in his place and applauding the Government of the United States for putting a duty which, though it goes into the consumption of the country, benefits him individually. I would like to refer to a motion which was made a few days ago by one of the members from the Province of Manitoba, when he asked for the reduction of duties on lumber going into Manitoba from the United States. What did the hon. Minister of Customs say on that occasion? He said there were large quantities brought from the other side of the line into Manitoba and manufactured there. What would be the result in that case if the American Government retaliated by imposing an export duty not of $2, but of $5 a 1,000? Why, Sir, it would be a case of the tail wagging the dog, which has been the effect of this National Policy in other respects. What would the hon. Minister of Customs say if the Government imposed an export duty upon iron ore, such large quantities of which are taken out of the earth in his constituency and sent to the United States? I am sure, that in the interests of his constituents, he would not tolerate that for a single moment. I do not think, Sir, that the common sense of this House, I do not believe that the common sense of the Government, would permit an increase of this duty.

I do not believe that the hon. Minister of Finance, who represents a Province that imports a large quantity of lumber from the State of Maine, not alone for consumption in that Province but also for export, would permit such an act of injustice to be done to his Province. The remarks made by my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), are true in every sense. I know firms in the Georgian Bay section who have large quantities of coarse lumber that is fit only for export to the United States. I wish it to be distinctly understood that the exportation of wood in the log is not any part or parcel of my business. I manufacture everything into square timber or sawn lumber; the square timber goes to Great Britain, and the lumber to the United States. I have not shipped a single board to Manitoba country, nor do I expect to do so. In my circumstances, the American market is much better suited to me than the Manitoba market. I hope the Government, instead of increasing the export duty upon saw logs, will entirely remove that obnoxious tax.

Mr. VALIN. Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased at the motion of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. A good deal has been said about protection; but I say that the country which does not protect itself cannot succeed very well. When we impose an export duty on timber, we are imposing it on the Americans themselves. It is said that the Americans have bought timber extensively in this country, and that they have large establishments for its manufacture. These people take this timber to their own country because the market there is better. A very common quality of spruce boards, what we call the fourth quality, are sold to-day at New York for $22 or $23 a 1,000. What is the effect of this exportation? It is to destroy the export trade by the St. Lawrence. The Americans export the timber again to the Phillipian Islands, the West Indies, Buenos Ayres, and San Juan, where we sent large cargoes ourselves a few years ago. There are American companies engaged, too, in getting out our lumber. There is in Montreal a lumber company composed entirely of Americans. It may be said that they spend their money here. Yes; but they also raise the price, and thus prevent our own people from trading direct with those places. I say we ought not only to put an export duty on lumber, but impose a license on these people, who come here and take the trade from the Canadian people. They destroy not only the woods, but the bark, which is not protected by an export duty, and is becoming a very scarce article. The consequence is, that our tanners are unable to compete with Americans, who manufacture cheaper than we do. I think the Government should put an export duty on both the woods and the bark.

Mr. SPROULE. However much the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) may be entitled to speak on behalf of the East, when he arrogates to himself the authority to speak on behalf of the West, he is unacquainted with the circumstances that exist there. I am pretty well acquainted around the Georgian Bay, and I have scarcely ever known any spruce logs to have been sent out of that part of the country. It is generally pine, oak, and elm that we send away, and it is usually manufactured either into lumber or square timber. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) takes exception to the export duty, because he says it is a direct blow to the timber interest, and yet he acknowledges in the next breath that he does not send any of that kind of timber out of the country. Whatever he has said in reference to speculation in timber limits, he sought to apply to the operations of the present Government. I think such remarks come with very bad grace from one who is generally supposed, in our county, to be connected with one of the most extensive speculators in that line. It is known that of late years it is almost impossible to get any pine timber around Georgian Bay, because it is held by a few speculators. I know an instance of a contractor who had a contract to build some wharves and a bridge in pine timber, and who, after enquiry at the twenty-seven mills around Georgian Bay, found that not one was in a free position to sell him a board. The answer was that they were controlled in their operations by a man named Dymond, formerly a member of this House, a very extensive speculator, or a firm named Cook Brothers. Those who say a great injustice will be done to the farmers in that country, do not understand the position of things there. With regard to reducing the price of timber, that would be in the interest of the farmers who are paying much higher prices on account of the competition of the American market for our timber. Few farmers have any to sell. These men, to whom I referred, have control of all the timber, and the farmers are restricted from cutting and selling even any on the land they are clearing. Where the timber is most extensive is around Georgian Bay. Further west there is but little timber; it is brought in instead of being sent out. If this proposed law affects lumbermen, it can affect them but little in our part of the country, since it applies only to spruce logs, and those logs are very scarce there. It cannot affect the farmers, and if it affects lumbermen, it will only affect a class of speculators who have become very extensive in the past few years in our part of the country, and who, under a very strange rumor about the late Government, have obtained the control of almost all the timber around the Georgian Bay. Some years ago timber limits were put up by the Ontario Government for sale. It was decided, in some way or other, that these limits should be bought in by Government supporters at a price at which the fair honest competitor could not pay; the understanding being that, after a time, an appeal would be made for a reduction of price on account of the decline of trade. The limits nearly all fell into the hands of these men, and in a few years representations were made to the Government that they could not carry on operations successfully owing to the high prices of the limits, and the Government reduced the price to what they considered a paying figure. In consequence of this, the farmers or others who desire to get this timber, cannot get it, because it is controlled by these speculators. The timber is principally pine, with hardly any spruce at all.

Mr. BOURBEAU (Translation). Mr. Speaker, after having heard the arguments of several hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question, and who, to a certain extent, have thought fit to connect the National Policy with this proposition, I feel bound to support the motion of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). I believe that if we wish to have a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States, we should impose as heavy duties as possible. Now, I believe that the imposition of a duty on logs will not be detrimental either to farmers or lumber dealers in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario; for it must be remarked that it is an inducement to the lumber manufacturer, who builds his mill on the other side of the line, gets his logs free of duty in this country, manufactures it, and sells it in the States much cheaper than the Canadian dealer, who has to pay a heavy duty when importing lumber from American markets, can sell it. The hon. Minister of Finance is afraid less the imposing of such a duty might be detrimental to the interests of those who already have a stock of logs on hand, and who did not expect that a duty would be imposed on them. Now, could not some kind of arrangement be made which would exempt all logs already cut from duty, with the understanding that all those buying logs for export to the United States would have to pay the duty? If we desire to protect the interests of those who have a stock ready for export, I believe the thing could easily be managed. The hon. member from Montmorency (Mr. Valin) has also alluded to the quantity of hemlock bark which is being ruined to the detriment of tanners in this country. I believe proposals have been made to the hon. the Finance Minister for the imposition of an export duty on such bark; and, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important that this question should be settled. The time has come for us to think on the matter and see whether the interests of leather manufacturers in this country do not demand the imposing of a duty on hemlock bark exported to the United States. However, I believe it would be unjust to impose a duty on bark ready for export, for those who manufactured the bark being ignorant that such a duty would be imposed, would not likely be prepared to accept such a proposal, although they would not object to the imposition of the duty for the future. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) stated that the hon. Minister of Finance having such interests to protect as those of his constituents in New Brunswick, would not be prepared to carry out the policy of imposing an export duty on logs. He says that although the Government impose duties that are ruinous to private interests, they are not prepared to endorse the motion of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. Now, I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, in what way the prosperity of this country has been ruined by the National Policy; I would like to be shown how the interests of farmers, manufacturers, tradesmen, &c., have been ruined by the National Policy; I would like the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) to point out what interests have been jeopardized branch by that policy. For I look in vain for any particular of trade which has not been benefitted by the National Policy adopted by the Government. Have farmers any reason to complain to-day? They sell their products dearer than ever. This is an undisputed fact, Mr. Speaker. Since an export duty was imposed on corn, the price of oats has considerably increased in this country. This is the kind of protection given to farmers; the prices of all the products of the farm—pork, lard, cattle of every description, horses, &c. are 25 and even 50 per cent. higher than before the adoption of the National Policy. Manufacturers in this country are fully employed, and up to the present there has not been any overstocking of the different articles manufactured. Therefore, the conclusion I have arrived at from these facts is, that the motion of my hon. friend, the member for Richmond and Wolfe is one which deserves the consideration of this House, and especially of the hon. the Minister of Finance, who, I hope, will before long, modify his views on the subject and acknowledge that the hon. member has moved justly in this matter.

Mr. SCRIVER. Before this discussion is brought to a close, I desire to make a few remarks. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe has said that the policy indicated by his motion, if adopted, would not affect, to any considerable extent, the agricultural classes. That, I think, is hardly true. It is not true at all events, to the extent that it would be true if his motion had referred to fuel. I know that in that part of the frontier near the boundary line where I live, the spruce timber generally is held by farmers, who are in the habit of drawing the greater portion of what they cut across the frontier. This they are compelled to do owing to the want of water power on the Canadian side, and consequently the very small number of mills there for the manufacture of lumber. Any such taxation, therefore, as that indicated by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, would be a great hardship to those people; and it would be idle to tell them, after the experience they have had, in paying the $1 per 1,000 feet duty which they have been compelled to pay for some time, that this proposed taxation would not come out of their pockets, but out of the pockets of the American mill owners. They know too well the contrary, and that this proposed increase of export duty would come out of their pockets and go into those of a few mill owners. As far as I can judge, this motion is made in the interest of a few mill owners in the Eastern Townships; and if the policy indicated by it should be adopted by the Government, the effect would be to benefit those mill owners at the expense of the large class of agriculturists. I do not propose now to enter into any discussion of the policy of export duties. I think the impolicy of any such system has been clearly shown by the hon. member for North Norfolk; and I mistake very much the sentiment of this House, if, whatever be the view of hon. members with regard to the National Policy, they should be led to enlarge to any extent the measure of export duties which exists now. I sincerely trust the result of the deliberations of the Government will not be to increase the export duty on any class of our national products.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Do I understand the hon. member to press his resolution?

Mr. IVES. No; I ask leave to withdraw the motion.
Motion withdrawn.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN THE PROVINCE OF QUÉBEC.

Mr. GIGAULT, in moving for copies of any petitions from the Province of Quebec on the subject of proposed legislation as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, said: In asking for these papers, I desire to make a few remarks about the liquor traffic in the Province of Quebec. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction with the License Law at present in force there, and I have received letters from some clergymen who make strong complaints against the working of that law. In regulating the sale of liquors we all desire to promote temperance, but we do not agree upon the measures to be adopted for that purpose. Some persons favor prohibition, but I am not ready to accept such a measure. I am not ready to prohibit the sale of all kinds of liquors. This measure has not always produced the good effect which its advocates claim for it. Last summer I happened to be in the State of Maine on a Sunday, and I saw there more drunken people than I ever saw on any Sunday in Canada—which shows that to enact a law, is one thing, and to enforce it, is another. I was told that in the city of Portland there were hundreds of places where one could get a glass of brandy or whiskey by simply asking for a cup of tea or coffee. To evade such a law almost all kinds of devices are successfully resorted to. I confess that a good deal may be said in favor of prohibition, but I think it is too radical a measure. The opponents of prohibition contend that a good License Law would advance the interests of sobriety more than a prohibitory measure. But until to-day have we had a good License Act. Our License Law in the Province of Quebec, I am sorry to say has not worked in a satisfactory manner to the friends of temperance. Under the operation of that law we have too many taverns and too many liquor shops. In other trades it is the demand which creates the traffic; but I believe that in the liquor trade it is the supply which creates the demand, so that the more facilities we give to procure liquors by increasing the number of licensed shops and taverns, the more liability there will be to excess on the part of many persons. If we have too many licenses for the sale of liquor in the Province of Quebec, I think it is due to the licensing authority we have there, and I hope that the licensing authority shall be transferred from the local councils to persons freer and more independent of the influence of liquor sellers. We know that in municipal elections the liquor sellers are most active canvassers, and always try to elect as councillors men who are favorable to their views. I think we ought to adopt that clause of the Ontario License Act which limits the number of licenses according to the population. We should place some limitation, not only upon the number of taverns and hotels, as is the case in Ontario, but also with respect to liquor shops. Another defect in our License Act is the sale of liquor in stores where other goods are sold; and I hope that, in the measure that is to be proposed to this House, some provision will be inserted prohibiting the sale of liquor in such shops. I know, from experience, that when a trader gets a license his brothers in trade want to get one too, because they think it is necessary, in order to keep a certain class of customers whom they would otherwise lose. A great number of these liquor shops are opened, not because they are required for the public interest, but because the private interest of individuals demand them. Every tradesman has an interest in extending his business and increasing the number of his customers, and thus every public house has a direct interest in promoting intemperance, and tends to do so. If we have too large a number of liquor sellers, as is the case in the Province of Quebec in many places, a keen competition springs up and the liquor seller, in order to earn his living, will incite people to drink to excess. For this reason, it is very important to limit the number of licensed taverns and shops to the legitimate wants of the population. I may add that I would like to retain in the hands of the Councils the right of prohibiting the sale of liquors, and the right of limiting the number of licenses to a point below the number which might be fixed by the proposed Licensing Bill in this House. I will go further, and say that in my opinion hotel keepers should be allowed only to sell beer and wine. As for alcohol, it is far from being necessary. It was discovered only in the eleventh century, and for three or four centuries afterwards it was used only for medicinal purposes. It was only in the fifteenth century that it began to be sold in hotels and liquor shops, and that people began to use in excess that poison called alcohol. Only one person in every rural place should be licensed to sell alcoholic liquors, and with respect to distilled alcoholic liquors, we might adopt one clause of the Scott Act, which says, that such liquors shall be sold only for medical or mechanical purposes. It is not necessary for me to speak of the harm alcohol has done to society. Every hon. member of the House is convinced of the great evils which have been so inflicted. But I may cite the opinion of an able authority as to the use of alcohol. My authority says:

"Une substance aussi dangereuse n'aurait jamais dû sortir des officines des pharmaciens; mais l'homme est avide de jouissance et n'a reculé ni devant la nicotine, ni devant le trois-six. L'alcool cessa, vers la fin du xve siècle, d'être une substance uniquement réservée à la médecine; les peuples trempèrent leurs lèvres dans l'eau de feu, et, à la fin du xviiè siècle, l'usage de l'eau-de-vie, comme boisson, s'était répandu dans la plupart des contrées de l'Europe. On en fait de nos jours une consommation véritablement effrayante, au grand préjudice de la santé, de la moralité et du bien-être des populations. L'alcool peuple tous les hôpitaux de l'Europe, il amène avec lui la plus affligeante de toutes les maladies, l'aliénation mentale, il porte au suicide, il enfante la misère. Mais, l'alcool, comme le tabac, est pour les gouvernements une source de revenus considérables, et l'Etat favorise les distilleries à l'égal des industries les plus indispensables à la prospérité publique.

"L'excès du mal a provoqué, heureusement, une réaction énergique et généreuse. Des hommes, animés d'un saint amour de l'humanité, ont entrepris d'éteindre au milieu des peuples la flamme qui les dévore, et de là, les Sociétés de tempérance, qui déjà ont rendu tant de services à l'Amérique et à la Grande-Bretagne."

We cannot place too many restrictions on the sale of alcoholic liquors, and why should we favor and sanction that trade? Is it conducive to the well-being of society? Does it add to the welfare, the prosperity, and the happiness of the community? Does it advance the interests of morality? Is it a legitimate source of national revenue? No; it is the very reverse in each case. I hold that a Government which tries to derive its revenue from duties on alcoholic liquors is speculating upon the vices of the people. To use the words of Mr. Gladstone, "it is the duty of every Government to make it easy for every man to do right, and difficult for him to do wrong." If we open everywhere taverns and hotels where men may become drunkards, I say we are making it easy for every man to do wrong, and difficult for him to do right; we are establishing a means to lead sober men from the paths of sobriety to those of intemperance and vice. We would be guilty of moral assassination if we contributed, by a bad License Act, to increase intemperance and drunkenness in our country, because an increase in drunkenness means an increase in pauperism, vice, crime, and degradations of all kinds. I am glad to observe that a Committee will be appointed to study this social question, which we will have to settle. I hope the result of the investigation of that Committee will be the introduction of a good License Law, which will tend to bring about a reduction in the number of licenses, and great diminution in the consumption of alcoholic liquors. The Government have done a good deal for the material progress of this country; but there is a progress which is far more important than material progress—it is the moral progress of the population; and I hope the Government will use all its weight to give us a good law, a law which will satisfy the friends of temperance, and which will help to check the vice of intemperance.

Mr. CASEY. It is highly gratifying to many hon. members to hear, from a French Conservative, such a hearty, well considered, and evidently intelligent approval of the license system at present in vogue in the Province of Ontario. We have heard many an attack on that system of late, but the hon. gentleman's remarks on the subject show deep study and careful consideration of the question, and an intelligent conviction that that license system is the best at present in vogue any where in the Dominion of Canada; and I commend the remarks to the careful consideration of hon. Ministers and their supporters, who, a few weeks ago, were endeavoring to persuade the electors of Ontario to give up the present licensing system and return to one which the hon. gentleman thoroughly condemns, as against the interests of sobriety and morality.

Mr. LAURIER. I agree almost entirely with what has been said by the mover of this resolution. I differ only on one point. I think that we, in the Province of Quebec, have all the legislation we require to deal with, and grapple with this question. We have a Prohibition Law which has been in force since 1866. The hon. gentleman knows that the municipal and local councils have power to pass a Prohibition Law within the limits of their municipalities, and that this power is largely used in the Province. In the county where I live, out of eighteen municipalities there have been for the last ten years, at least, sixteen prohibitory by-laws. In the present year liquor is sold in only two of those municipalities. In the neighboring county of Megantic, composed of fourteen municipalities, there are prohibitory by-laws in twelve of them, and I remember a time, not far distant, when in all the fourteen municipalities, prohibitory by-laws prevailed. With such legislation we do not require to go further, nor is it advisable to go further. The only thing we have to do towards checking the evil of intemperance, which I know exists to an alarming degree, is not in the direction of legislation, but is simply in the way of the moral education of the people. Let us educate the people; let us educate them to take advantage of the weapons already in their hands, and we have already all the weapons to grapple with this evil. We cannot require more than the power already vested in the municipal councils to deal with the question. They have that power to-day, and I hope any legislation introduced into this Parliament will not deprive them of it.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman forgets that the courts of Quebec have declared that the by-laws are illegal. I quote the case of the parish of Beauport.

Mr. LAURIER. I will quote the case of Sulte vs. the Corporation of the city of Three Rivers, where the Court of Appeal, the highest court in the Province, decided that such by-laws are valid.

Mr. BLAKE. Have any petitions been received from the Province of Quebec on the subject of the License Laws? If there has been no such petitions received, it is useless to pass the motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know, but they will be brought down.

Mr. BLAKE. If any.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; of course, if any, Motion agreed to.

SUMMERSIDE HARBOR.

Mr. HACKETT, in moving for a copy of the Engineer's report of survey made at Summerside Harbor, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, during the past summer, with a view to improving the navigation of said harbor, said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, in moving for these papers, that for some years past the people of Summerside have been endeavoring to secure the improvement of their harbor. About one year ago, a large and influential meeting of the residents of this town was held for the purpose of suggesting some means whereby the improvements required might be carried out; and as the result of it, a petition was sent to the Department of Public Works, asking for certain improvements. I may say that, in this connection, the difficulty which exists is, that the depth of water is not sufficient; and the entrance to it being very wide in the fall of the year, during the prevalence of permanent heavy north-west winds, shipping lying at the wharves in this harbor is very much exposed. It is the belief of practical gentlemen, down there, that if a breakwater were built inside of the outside bar, from Indian Point almost to the channel, it would present a sufficient barrier to the waves and afford sufficient protection. The exposed condition of the harbor, has been very detrimental, not only to Summerside, but also to all the Dominion of Canada. About two years since, a large vessel, which was about to cross the Atlantic with a valuable cargo, was totally wrecked in this harbor, entailing great loss on the owners and underwriters. About one year ago, a vessel owned in New Brunswick was also totally wrecked by being dashed against the railway wharf at Summerside; and not only was the vessel lost, but also Government property was very much damaged—owing to the fact that the vessel lay alongside of the wharf—a very valuable coal shed filled with coal being destroyed. It, therefore, becomes necessary to afford the protection demanded, not only in the interest of the shipping, but also of the Government works on the wharf itself. Moreover, this is a very important harbor. It is the place where connection is made in summer with the mainland, the mails and passengers being daily landed; and, consequently, it is of great importance, not only to the people in that section of the Island, but to the whole Dominion as well, that this breakwater should be built. For some years past the exports from this quarter of the country have been largely increased. I say this, however, with considerable diffidence, for fear lest it may irritate the hon. members of the Opposition, who declare in this House that the National Policy is ruining Prince Edward Island. In 1879, the exports from Summerside, amounted, in value, to $454,731; and, in 1882, to $815,370, showing an increase of almost 100 per cent. Now, it will be plain to hon. gentlemen that, in view of the fact that these exports have so largely increased during the last three years, it becomes necessary to afford some protection and accommodation to the shipping which frequents this very important harbor; and I trust that, when this report is laid before the House, I will find a suggestion made as to the manner in which this harbor may be improved; and that the hon. gentleman who now administers the affairs of the Department of Public Works with so much ability, will see his way clear to placing in the Estimates a sum sufficient to carry the recommendations into effect.

Mr. YEO moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Motion for the following return was agreed to:—

Copies of all reports made up to this date, respecting the movements of the ice at the wharf at River du Loup and the wharf at River Ouelle.—(Mr. Grandbois.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CRÉDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved the third reading of Bill (No. 22) respecting the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.

Mr. AUGER. I have the honor to move that this Bill be read the third time this day six months. As I remarked the other day in Committee, this Bill is not what it appears to be on its face. The pretension of its promoters is that they wish this company to be placed on the same footing with other companies of the same nature; and they desire to obtain authority to charge interest up to the figure of 8 per cent. In the present condition of affairs I do not think that the company should request this change, money is plentiful and cheap; from everything I can hear and read, it appears that prosperity is general in this country at the present time, and prosperity means abundance of money. The banks are well supplied with funds; our farmers have lots of money, and consequently money must be cheap; and if so, I do not see why Parliament should be asked at the present time to amend the Act of incorporation of this company in the manner desired. But the change in the interest rate is not all; it is true it is all that appears in the Bill, but I wish the hon. members of the House to note this sentence:

"The Act of the Parliament of Canada, 44 Victoria, chapter 58, intitled: 'An Act to enlarge and extend the powers of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien,' is hereby repealed."

I will refer to a few of the provisions of the Act. They give this company certain rights, which are accompanied by certain obligations and restrictions: one relates to the rate of interest, which can only be 6 per cent., and another states that debtors of the corporation shall have the right to discharge debts coming due, whether in whole or in part, on the payment of not more than three months' interest, at the rate charged in the loan. If this Act, however, is repealed, as is intended by this Bill, what will be the consequence? And what is the law in Quebec about this matter? It is as follows:—

"Les débiteurs ont le droit de se libérer par anticipation, en tout ou en partie.

"Les remboursements anticipés donnent lieu, au profit de la société, à une indemnité qui ne peut dépasser trois pour cent du capital remboursé par anticipation."

Then if we repeal this law by the present measure, we will have the right only to charge three months' interest on money which is paid before it is due. If we repeal it, the Act of the Quebec Legislature comes into effect, and by it we have a right to charge 3 per cent. If a man owes $1,000 and wishes to pay it, at 3 per cent he will have to pay $30, while, under this Act, he would have to pay $5, which is $15 difference. If he lent it at 8 per cent. he would have to pay back $30, while, under the present law, he would only have to pay $20, or, in other words, he would be paying 8 per cent. in the one case, and 9 per cent.

in the other. I think hon. members have rather been taken by surprise, for I do not think the Bill has been distributed. so that hon. members could scrutinize it and ascertain what would be the result of repealing this Act.

"The corporation shall transmit, on or before the first day of March in each year, to the Minister of Finance, a statement in duplicate to the thirty-first day of December inclusive of the previous year, verified by the oath of the President, Vice-President or Managing director, setting out the capital stock of the corporation and the proportion thereof paid up, the number of shares to order and the number to bearer, the assets and liabilities of the corporation, the amount and nature of the investments and the average rate of interest derived therefrom. The extent and value of the real estate held, the amount and nature of the obligations, &c."

If the present Bill passes, that provision will be repealed. I have nothing to say against these parties privately; they may all be gentlemen, but we know that corporations have no souls, and I do not wish them to be allowed to go without restraint, as is now proposed. Then the Quebec Act might be changed so that we would have no control over them at all. For these reasons I think I have good ground for moving that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months. It may be said that, of course you speak about having the rights in Quebec to charge 10 per cent., they may say there is a general law passed which will stop that. Well, the law passed here may stop it, for any money that is lent for over five years, but it will not have that effect in regard to money which is lent for a shorter period. By 43 Vic., chap. 42, there is a provision that if the money is lent for over five years—after the five years elapse after the money is to be paid—all they have to pay is three months interest; but if the period is less than five years they would have to fall back on the Quebec Statute, and they would have a right to charge 3 per cent. I think that at present, when money is so plentiful and so cheap, there is no need to pass such a law, and especially in its present shape.

Mr. CASGRAIN. A charter has been granted to this company by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec on one special condition, and that condition is this—that they should not lend money at a rate above 6 per cent. interest; and whatever legislation we may pass in this House cannot affect the charter under which they operate in the Province of Quebec, or elsewhere. I look upon the Bill, as it is at present, as a perfect nullity, and I do not say this because I desire to oppose the Bill, but on account of the interest I have in good legislation. The question will come up before the courts of justice, because parties will take advantage of the Quebec charter to diminish the rate of interest from 8 per cent. to 6; and we may anticipate that the courts of justice will be bound to decide that the only charter under which they can operate is the one granted by the Province of Quebec.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I wish to make a few remarks in reply to the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, and I will first refer to the hon. member for L'Islet. The hon. gentleman has probably overlooked the fact that by the charter the company obtained from the Legislature of Quebec, the limit of 6 per cent. was fixed, on account of the monopoly they obtained for fifty years. They have abandoned that monopoly, and last year the Quebec Legislature amended their charter so as to extend their rights and remove that limit; and the proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor has been published so that the public might be informed of the fact. The objections of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Auger) I think are answered by himself. He asks, why give the Credit Foncier the right of lending at as high a rate as 8 per cent. when money is so cheap and plenty? Well, if money is so cheaply plenty, it would be very easy for borrowers to go to any other company and get money at a lower rate than they can from the Credit Foncier; and if the Credit Foncier want to keep to the maximum rate, they will not do any more business than they do now. The main question is this: Are we interested in bringing capital here to compete with the other loan companies, and to give us what the hon. member for Shefford and many others want, namely, cheap money? The more capital you induce to come here, the better for the borrower. It is well known that if the company do not obtain that amendment to their charter, they will be obliged to give up their business; and I am informed that so anxious are other loan companies to get them out of the market, that they have offered to indemnify the company for any expense they have incurred to obtain their charter and to assume their loans. I think that is the best proof that the competition of the Credit Foncier with the other loan companies is giving us what we all desire—cheap money. Under these circumstances, and seeing that the charters they have obtained from the Legislatures of at least four or five of the Provinces, amply protect the public, I do not see why we should hesitate to give them fair play, and place them on the same footing as the other loan companies. If the company should at any time be obliged to increase their rate of interest to 7 or 8 per cent., and money afterwards gets cheaper, the borrower has the power, under every one of the company's charters, to force them, under a smaller indemnity, to reimburse him.

Mr. WELDON. Why do they want the Dominion Act repealed.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Because they are in doubt about the Provincial Legislatures having power to grant charters of that kind. It has been decided by high authorities that the Local Legislatures are the proper authorities to apply to for the incorporation of such companies, but that it is for the Parliament of Canada to decide as to the rate of interest. It is for that reason, and no other, that the company are before this Parliament, and I think it is only fair that they should obtain what they are asking for by this Bill.

Mr. WELDON. I was on the sub-Committee upon the Bill passed for this company two years ago, and the reason the 6 per cent. limit was fixed at that time was that they possessed a monopoly for fifty years. That being now withdrawn, I think it is quite right that we should relieve them from the obligation then imposed. At the same time, I think that, having given them power to extend their business over the whole Dominion, this Parliament should retain control over their affairs.

Mr. ABBOTT. As I understand the question, the company desire to escape from the abnormal and inconvenient position they occupy, and to be placed in the position of other ordinary loan companies. I have no doubt, from what I have seen of their legislation, that they proceeded from the first upon an erroneous idea. They obtained their Act of incorporation in the Province of Quebec, and in this Act they obtained a privilege which is so far from the policy of this House in such matters, that last year they were refused the legislation that would have placed them in the position of other companies. They obtained from the Legislature of Quebec a monopoly of the capital, as it were, of the Republic of France for fifty years. No other company, under that Act, could do business in Quebec during that time, being first organized in France. That was a mistake, I think, they made, and it was a very important one. Then they came to this House, after having obtained a charter in Quebec, and, instead of merely getting their powers extended under that charter, they got a new charter from this House, so that there were two charters, in most respects similar. In the respect of which my hon. friend from Shefford speaks, they are exactly similar. By repealing this Act, the protection which the Dominion Act afforded to the customers of this company will not be repealed, because it will exist under the Quebec charter. That was the second mistake they made—that of getting another Act of incorporation. It was, therefore, impossible for any man to say whether this was a local or a federal corporation, under which law it was governed, or how it conducted its business. Since then the legislation was still further complicated by local Acts through the Provinces extending the powers of this company, which it had acquired under the Quebec Act—that is the other Provinces, except Manitoba. What the company really wanted, in order to place itself on the same footing as other loan companies, was simply to be permitted to charge the rate of interest that others charged and be deprived of this obnoxious monopoly. That is the position in which, I understand, my hon. friend wishes to put the company now by this legislation. The second Act of incorporation gave no new privileges. With the sole exception of the ordinary privilege of accounting to the Finance Minister, which is imposed on all federal corporations, all the protective clauses which were in the Federal Act remain, because they are in the charter of this company under the Quebec Act. Still it would seem to me improper for us to impose on a local company the obligation of accounting to the Finance Minister of Confederation. It would not, perhaps, be improper in principle, but the obligation does not exist with regard to other local companies, and I do not see why it should be imposed on this one. With regard to the rate of interest, all I understand my hon. friend opposite asks for is that this company be permitted to charge the same rates as others. I do not see why this should be refused. We may be wrong to allow it to others, but we allow it to all, and I do not see why this company should be made an exception. The only distinction I can see between this company and the hundreds of others doing business throughout the country, with the privilege of charging interest over 6 per cent, is, this company is French, and its capital comes from France, and I do not recognize the advantage of excluding from our markets the capital of France, where there is an abundance of money to be had at cheap rates of late years, a portion of which we have some prospect of obtaining. That can be the only ground. As to the policy of allowing these corporations to charge over 6 per cent., I am in favor of allowing them to charge what they please. What they charge will be what they can persuade people to pay them, and if money is cheap no one will be so foolish as to pay this or any other company 8 per cent., if the money can be had at a lower rate elsewhere.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). As far as this company is concerned, it deserves some credit for the business it has done here. Under their Act of incorporation they have lent money at 6 per cent. to the amount, it was stated here last Session, of $1,000,000. That is, if I mistake not, in the hands of farmers. If we allow them now to charge a higher rate, those farmers will have to borrow at 8 per cent., so that the increased rate will actually be an increased charge on the $1,000,000 they have borrowed. If we refuse this privilege to the company, that money will remain in the hands of the farmers at 6 per cent., for the company will not take it back to France, where they can only get 4 or 4½ per cent. It is very well to advocate bringing in capital to this country and placing all companies on an equal footing, but we must not forget that if we allow these parties to draw in the capital they have loaned we will do a great injustice to those who borrowed it, believing implicitly that 6 per cent. was all they would have to pay, and that they would obtain renewals at that rate. So far as this company is concerned they can borrow money at 4 and 4½ per cent. If this Bill is not given the six months' hoist I hope my hon. friend from Centre Wellington will introduce his motion, in order that, at any rate, we may keep the rate at 7 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to point out that my hon. friend from Argenteuil has, I think, forgotten exactly what the nature of the Federal Act, which it is proposed to repeal, is. My hon. friend spoke as if it was a double incorporation. It is not so. The Federal Act, rightly or wrongly, is simply the conferring of certain powers and the making of certain prescriptions, coincidental with the conferring of those powers on the corporation incorporated by the Quebec Legislature. It recites the incorporation of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien by the Statute of the Province of Quebec. It recites that the company has applied for the extension and enjoyment of its powers so as to allow it to transact business throughout the Dominion, and then declares it shall be lawful for that particular corporation to transact business and prescribe certain rules. Therefore, it is not a double incorporation at all, any more than the granting to this company by various Provincial Legislatures of express powers to do business in other Provinces would be treated as special Acts of incorporation in those Provinces. Whatever be the power this Legislature may have to deal with these questions, in the mode in which it is assumed to deal with them in this Act, there can be no doubt we had the power to give authority to loan in the North-West Territories, and it is effective so far. That is the first observation I have to make. The hon. gentleman stated that all the securities and restrictions which were imposed by this Act, with the exception of the single one limiting the rate of interest—whereas the new Bill will give the company power to loan at 8 per cent.—were secured by the Provincial Act. That is not strictly true.

Mr. ABBOTT. I said that the restrictions in the interest of borrowers, for the protection of borrowers, were copied from the Quebec Act.

Mr. BLAKE. That is where my hon. friend was under a misapprehension, because the Quebec Act proscribes, as my hon. friend from Shefford stated a while ago, that borrowers who are paying money back by anticipation should pay 3 per cent., not at the rate of 3 per cent. for any particular time, but a sum not exceeding 3 per cent.; whereas, this Federal Act, dealing with this subject, which is properly within our powers as relating to the question of interest, provides that debtors to the corporation shall have the right of discharging their debts as they become due; and the anticipated payment shall give rise to an indemnity in favor of the corporation, which shall not exceed three months' interest on the capital paid before becoming due at the rate stipulated in the loan. Now, the rate stipulated in the loan could not exceed 6 per cent. per annum, the maximum charge upon anticipated payments would, therefore, not be more than 1½ per cent. under the Federal Law; but if you repeal the Federal Law in its totality, you throw the corporation back on the Provincial Law, and they will then have power to charge 3 instead of 1½ per cent. as the maximum in the case of anticipated payments. I am not at all clear how far, under this complicated state of things which is now produced, what would be the application of our General Act which we passed a couple of years ago on the subject of interest in this country. I rather think, also, that it would be prudent in any case in which we are granting privileges to any company, to exact returns from that company. It seems to me not unreasonable that when a company comes here for any privilege at all from us we should exact such returns as we exact in the case of many companies who do not come for privileges. In the case of building societies, about whom, in my mind, at any rate, there has always been great doubt whether they come within our jurisdiction at all, we exact these returns. I think the returns are useful, if there is nothing else that will do good, and we ought to have them.

Mr. DESJARDINS. That is very good in words, but the Bill repeals the Act which orders these returns. My hon. friend says: "I don't object to you having returns," but he appeals the law by which the returns are ordered.

Mr. HOUDE moved, in amendment to the amendment:

That the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to replace the words, "eight per cent." by the words "seven per cent." in the second clause.

Mr. AMYOT. I am at a loss to know why we should make a difference between that company and other companies. I remember that when that company commenced its operations in this country, the rate of interest went down considerably, and farmers, instead of paying 12, 14 and 15 per cent., began to pay 6 per cent. and less. That Company has loaned nearly $1,500,000 at 6 per cent. or 5½. Now, if you look at the Statutes you will see that we have treated other companies much more generously than you propose to treat this one, as will be seen by the following statement showing the powers granted to loan companies in Canada since 1876 as to rate of interest:

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter fifty-seven.—'The British Canadian Loan and Investment Company,'—eight per cent, amended by forty Victoria, chapter seventy-six to any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals in the Province of Ontario or by incorporated companies in other Provinces.

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter fifty-eight.—'The England and Canada Mortgage Security Company.'—Any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals.

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter fifty-nine.—'The Scottish Canadian Loan Company.'—Eight per cent.

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter sixty-one.—'The National Investment Company of Canada.'—Eight per cent.—Amended by forty Victoria, chapter seventy-seven, to any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals in the Province of Ontario, by incorporated companies in the other Provinces.

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter sixty-two.—'The London and Ontario Investment Company.'—Eight per cent.—Amended by forty Victoria, chapter seventy-eight, to any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals in the Province of Ontario, or by incorporated companies in the other Provinces.

Thirty-nine Victoria, Chapter sixty-six.—'The Maritime Savings and Loan Company.'—Eight per cent.

Forty Victoria, Chapter forty-three.—'Joint Stock Companies Act, 1877.'—Any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals.

Forty Victoria, Chapter fifty.—'An Act respecting the Building Societies in the Province of Quebec.'—Any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals.

Forty Victoria, Chapter seventy-four.—'The Manitoba and North-West Loan Company.'—Any rate that may be lawfully taken by individuals.

Forty-one Victoria, Chapter forty-two.—'The Montreal Investment and Building Company.'—Eight per cent.

Forty-two Victoria, Chapter seventy-four.—'The Manitoba and North-West Loan Company.'—Any rate that may be lawfully taken by incorporated companies in the Province of Quebec, or by private individuals in the other Provinces.

Forty-five Victoria, Chapter one hundred and ten.—'The Canada Landed Credit Company.'—Eight per cent.

Forty-five Victoria, Chapter one hundred and eleven.—'The Canada Trust and Loan Company of Canada.'—Any rate of interest as may be lawfully taken by individuals, or in the Province of Quebec by incorporated companies, under like circumstances not exceeding eight per cent."

Now these are some of the companies we have already incorporated. We have given them the right to loan at 8 per cent.—or, at the rate that individuals may loan their money. I would like the mover of the amendment to the amendment to say why the money of the Credit Foncier is so bad, so rotten, so distasteful to him when the company has charged less interest than other companies that he must prohibit it from coming into the country. I would like him to explain to this House wherein consists the difference between the money loaned by the Credit Foncier and that loaned by other companies. If they have any good reasons why that company should pay a special tax for doing business, all right. If it is because it is a French company, all right. But I say that money has no color and belongs to no party. It is in the interest of everybody that we should have as much money in the country as we can get. When money becomes plentiful, then we may be sure the interest will go down. I say that amendment is contrary to our general legislation, contrary to the Acts of incorporation granted to all other companies, contrary to the liberty of commerce, and contrary to the ordinary hospitality which we show other companies when they bring their money here. If it is because that money came from a special source, let us be bold enough to say so, and bear the consequences. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of keeping the clause which relates to the present engagements of the company as it is. I understand the mover does not object to that and I am glad to be able to agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition in this regard, as it is not very often I occupy that agreeable position. The legislation which this House is surely going to pass will not disregard vested rights. Those who have borrowed by virtue of the old law will remain under the old conditions; the company will not be in a position to change the rates nor diminish the obligations of borrowers, nor increase them. Those who transacted business with that company will stand, for the future, in the same position under the new as under the old law. It is an elementary principle that laws have no retroactive effect; but if there be any apprehension in that respect, the mover of the Bill will have no objection to add a clause making that clearer. Therefore, those who borrowed at 5½ per cent. for thirty years, will pay only that rate, and the loan will extend over that period, their rights and obligations remaining unaltered; but for future loans the terms and conditions will be different. Men who want money will go where they can obtain it cheapest, and it is the duty of Parliament to provide that we shall get money at cheap rates; and in order to do so we must open our doors and say to the capitalists and bankers of the world: "Come to Canada and you will be welcome. You will find there a general protection, and the same law for everyone; we make no discrimination; we do not limit the French capitalists to seven per cent. and allow others to charge eight." We say to the capitalists that we extend the same rights to all. That is the position which I am satisfied Parliament intends to take. Besides, I understand that the incorporation granted by this Parliament to that company was, and is, illegal, it being beyond our jurisdiction. Some hon. members will be surprised when I thus speak of the jurisdiction of this Parliament. Sooner or later this question will come before the tribunals. And I submit that when an incorporation is for local purposes, the power to incorporate is vested in the Local Legislatures. The regulation of trade and commerce belongs to this Parliament. There is no doubt as to that point, but the incorporation of private companies, of those companies which act like individuals, belongs to the Local Legislatures. Sub-section 11 of section 92 of the British North America Act, gives to Local Legislatures exclusively the power to incorporate companies, for local purposes. We understand very well when a farmer goes to borrow money from one of these companies, he does something that is local, not something that is federal in any sense. Besides, when a company is incorporated in any Province, and seeks to loan money, the rate of interest is regulated by this Parliament. So this company is right in asking only for a clause fixing the rate of interest under these circumstances. I regret that an hon. member has thought fit to propose that a discriminating rate of interest shall be established. I hope we shall grant to this company, which has already done good service, the necessary power to go on with its operations. There can be no objection to the company loaning millions of dollars during coming years. The rate of interest will be fixed, not by law, but by the condition of the money market and the wants of the people, and if the company is able to offer money at low rates it will do so so as to do more business. The interests of the company and of borrowers are the same, and every one is interested in these corporations obtaining equal liberties.

Mr. BLAKE. This is an important amendment, and our rules provide that no important amendment shall be considered, except on two days' notice. I, therefore, submit that this amendment cannot be proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Maskinongé has not given notice of this amendment. I think it is an important amendment, and therefore the motion of the hon. member is not in order. But the hon. member for Centre Wellington has given notice of an amendment of this kind, and if he chooses to move that amendment, it is competent for him to do so.

Mr. ORTON moved, in amendment to the amendment:

That the Bill be amended by striking out the word "eight" and inserting in place thereof the word "seven" in the last line of the Bill.

Mr. HOUDE. The objection raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition seems to be useless, as my amendment is substantially the same as the amendment just read; and as the hon. member was not in the House at the time, I submit I had a perfect right to take his amendment and propose it.

Mr. DAVIES. I have a difficulty in dealing with this question, which I should like to have removed. I am opposed in principle to usury, to an attempt to limit the rates at which money shall be loaned, and I believe in lending money without restriction, as I do in freedom of trade. This company applied to the Legislature of the Province of the Dominion and obtained power to loan money at 6 per cent. In Prince Edward Island it loaned a comparatively large sum, and the mortgages it took are filled with conditions, the violation of any one of which by the borrower would enable the company to foreclose. While limited to 6 per cent. there was no great inducement to foreclose. A large number of persons borrowed money with all the stringent conditions attached, because they got it at 6 per cent. instead of paying 8. If we relieve the company from maintaining the rate at 6 per cent. and allow them to charge 8, the consequence will be that those who borrowed at 6 will have to pay 8 per cent. I do not object to borrowers paying 8 per cent., but it will have a prejudicial effect in respect to those parties who borrowed money at 6 per cent. within the last year or two. And the slightest slip on the part of the borrower, would result in his being compelled to pay 8 per cent., whereas he only imagined he was to pay 6 per cent. If the promoters of the Bill can see their way clear to the removal of this objection, I am sure that my colleagues from the Island will see the force of it at once; and I will be then very glad to support the Bill, but otherwise not.

Mr. BLAKE. From the remarks made in another part of the Chamber, I think by the hon. member for Bellechasse, I understand that the promoters of the Bill are willing to accept some of the suggestions which came from this part of the Chamber—with reference, for example, to the limitation of the amount to be taken on anticipated payments, and the restriction of this in the Act which it is proposed to repeal, which was somewhat lower than that given by the local charter, and if we go into Committee subject to the second day rule, an hon. gentleman or any hon. gentleman can propose an amendment to keep in these parts of the Bill. For my part, I am prepared to vote to go again into Committee with that view, and in the Committee we can make every alteration, it seems to me, which may be made before the measure comes finally before the House for decision.

Mr. ORTON. When the company was incorporated by a former Government, it was stated that they did not intend to charge more than 6 per cent., and if I recollect aright the feeling among the members of the House then, and more especially among those from the Province of Quebec, was strongly that they were not favorable to the incorporation of the company, without a restriction in the rate of interest. It was thought that this company would have a very beneficial effect throughout the other Provinces on other companies. I had the honor, on a former occasion, to introduce a Bill limiting the rate of interest to 7 per cent., and the principle of this Bill was voted upon in this House, receiving the support of a large portion of the representatives from the Province of Quebec. I trust that they will now vote for the amendment, and I am sure that it will have a very beneficial effect, if carried, throughout the country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. leader of the Opposition has remarked, he would be disposed to vote for the amendment to the amendment with the view of having the Bill amended in Committee in other respects, would it not be better, then, that this motion should be withdrawn, and that we go back into Committee with the view of amending the Bill generally? If we do so, then the suggestions made would be agreed to; but if this cannot be done, I would ask the hon. gentleman to vote against the amendment to the amendment with the view of going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with that view.

Mr. McCALLUM. Was notice given?

Mr. BLAKE. Notice was given. The hon. member from Wellington gave adequate notice, and when the Bill is in Committee, or out of Committee, amendments may be proposed.

Mr. McCALLUM. Should not the object aimed at be stated in the notice?

Mr. BLAKE. That depends on the importance of the amendment.

Mr. BOWELL. It seems to me that the amendments proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite are very important in their character. They are amendments which were never contemplated when the Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Hochelaga, and they change the complexion of the Bill altogether. If these are not important amendments I am at a loss to know what are important.

Mr. DESJARDINS. If the promoters of the Bill agree to the changes, I do not know what the public has to say in the matter. These are restrictions which are supposed to give greater security to the public.

Mr. BOWELL. I must confess I do not take the same view of the matter as my hon. friend. It may be the promoters of the Bill are prepared to accept suggestions from members not particularly interested in the Bill; but still that makes it none the less an important amendment, and I take it for granted that, in the discussion and disposition of a question of this character, each member of the House has as much to do with it in the interest of his constituents, and of the country, as the gentlemen who are more particularly interested in it. I wish it distinctly understood that I am not opposed to the suggestions thrown out; but as the objection was taken, and, to my mind, a very frivolous one, by the hon. leader of the Opposition, to the course pursued by the hon. member for Montmagny, I do not see why, if the rules of the House are to be strictly adhered to, they should not be adhered to in this particular.

Amendment (Mr. Auger). six months hoist, negatived on a division.

On motion for third reading,

Mr. ABBOTT moved, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommended to Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of amending the same.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

Bill reported, Committee to sit again.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 9:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 15th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ARBITRATORS' AWARD IN FAVOR OF LUCIEN MORIN.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Have the Government been notified of an award made by the Official Arbitrators of the Dominion, in favor of Lucien Morin, and if so, when? Has the amount awarded been paid, and if not, why not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Official Arbitrators reported an award to the Department on the 18th of August, 1882, for $366.70. The amount has not been paid and there is no appropriation from which payment could be made. It will, I expect, be provided for in the Estimates.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY AND SEDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 13) to provide for the punishment of adultery, seduction, &c., said: I may be permitted, Sir, to make a few remarks in support of its provisions. I am aware, Sir, that the subjects with which this Bill deals are of a delicate nature; nevertheless, Sir, only prudery and a false sense of modesty would forbid their discussion in a proper manner, here or elsewhere; and believing, that the provisions of the Bill which I have submitted, are in the interest of morality and in the public interest, I invoke the considerate judgment of the House upon it. The hon. leader of the Government the other evening, in some remarks upon this question, at the time the second reading was taken, said that he feared I did not draw the line clearly and distinctly between a sin and a crime. Well, Sir, the line of demarcation between what might be properly called a sin, and what might be properly called a crime, may not be very clearly defined in all cases; but I think, Sir, that any offence named in this Bill may be justly characterised as a crime. It is surely a crime, Sir, to blight a home, to ruin a life; to make an innocent person an outcast of society, and to drive her to prostitution, when this is done by the exercise of wiles and false promises. These, Sir, are the crimes provided for in this Bill, and for the punishment of which provision is made. Now, there are, Sir, as we are all aware, cases which have occasionally arisen, where the fact that no penalty is involved is a disgrace to civilization, where the victims are driven out of society, in some cases even driven to suicide, and it is to provide for cases of this kind that this Bill is introduced. The hon. First Minister also, in adverting in his remarks, upon the operation of such a law in the State of New York—to which I had referred—said that the existing law in that State had not prevented licentiousness, and had not prevented the condition of society which existed in other places where this law did not exist. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman might, with equal truth, have said that the law placed on the Statute-book in that State against murder did not prevent the commission of murder; that the law against theft, and robbery, and burglary, and all crimes known to the calendar, were not so efficient as to prevent the commission of these crimes. The fact that the existence of this law on the Statute book of that State does not prevent licentiousness is surely no argument against the propriety of placing the law there. The law was designed in that State for the punishment of seduction under promise of marriage, and the law has been enforced in that respect, and the penalties inflicted in many instances there and elsewhere. The objection was also raised that under a law of this kind the adventuress would have opportunities which she would not possess if no law of this character existed on the Statute-book. Well, Sir, the Committee that dealt with this Bill have been fully alive to this objection; and every precaution that they could possibly take—to provide against the possibility of the operations of the adventuress being facilitated by it—have been taken in drafting the Bill; and I think that the Bill, in the form in which it is presented to the House, very fully provides against any contingency of this kind. I may say in this connection, that, so far as I know, very few instances have occurred where the attempt of the adventuress has been successful in seeking to extort blackmail from an intended victim. This law, as I said the other day, Sir,—and as I propose more fully to show now—has been upon the Statute-book of various commonwealths upon this side of the Atlantic for many years. And, as I said the other day, it has been on the Statute-book of New York since 1848. And the fact, Sir, that there has never been any objection made to the operation of the law—the fact that there has never been any attempt to have it repealed, by any respectable number of persons, may surely be taken, Sir, as an argument in favor of the law. When the law has been in practical operation, when it has been on the Statute book for nearly a quarter of a century, and has evidently met with universal approval—if we may judge from the fact that no hostile criticism has been offered—we may fairly infer that its practical operation in that instance has been satisfactory. I propose, with the permission of the House, to give a brief outline of the law as it exists in many of the United States; and I shall show that the provisions of the present Bill are less stringent, and the safeguards against blackmailing are more complete than in any of the Statutes in the American States. In Massachusetts the crime of seduction is a felony. In Ohio, a male over eighteen years of age, who seduces a female under eighteen years of age, under promise of marriage, is guilty of felony, and is liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for three years, or in the county jail for six months. In Ohio, there is an additional provision with reference to tutors and teachers. It provides that any such teacher or tutor of any public or private school, who is over twenty-one years of age, who has sexual connection with any female under his instruction, shall be liable to imprisonment for a maximum period of ten years, or a minimum period of one year. In that State, corroborative evidence is required to the same extent as is required for the principal witness in the case of perjury. In Rhode Island, seduction under promise of marriage renders the person guilty of the crime liable to a maximum imprisonment of five years, or a fine of $5,000. In this State, corroborative evidence is also required, and any person guilty of enticing a female to a house of ill-fame for the purpose of prostitution, or aiding and abetting in the same, is liable to imprisonment for five years, or a fine of $5,000. In New York, seduction under promise of marriage, is punishable by imprisonment for not more than five years, and a fine of not more than $5,000, at the discretion of the court. In New Jersey, seduction by a married man, representing himself single, under promise of marriage, is punishable by imprisonment for five years, or a fine of $5,000, or by both imprisonment and fine. In the case of a single man the same punishment may be imposed with the provision, however, that the subsequent marriage of the parties is a bar to conviction. In this State, also, the evidence of the female has to be corroborated. In Arkansas, two years in the penitentiary is the maximum imprisonment, and $5,000 the maximum fine, and corroborative evidence is required to the extent required of the principal witness in a case of perjury. In Nebraska, the punishment is $3,000 fine, or imprisonment for five years, and corroborative evidence is required. In Michigan, seduction is punishable by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years. In Minnesota, the punishment may be five years in the State prison, or one year in the county jail. Corroborative evidence is required, and subsequent marriage is a bar to conviction; and, in that State, the indictment must be made within two years of the commission of the alleged offence. In Indiana, the female may prosecute in a civil action on her own behalf, or her parents or guardians may take proceedings, and damages may be awarded as assessed. The same law prevails in Illinois, and, in Iowa, seduction is punishable by imprisonment for five years, or a fine of $1,000, and subsequent marriage is a bar to conviction. In Kansas, seduction, under promise of marriage, is punishable by a fine of $3,000, or imprisonment for two years, or both. In South Carolina, the female may take civil action on her own behalf. In Alabama, seduction, under promise of marriage, or by temptation, or deception, or by the use of arts or flattery, is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one year or more than ten years; corroborative evidence is required. In Wisconsin, seduction, under promise of marriage, is punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of five years in the State prison, or one year in the county jail. No conviction can be secured on the unsupported testimony of the female, and subsequent marriage bars conviction. In Oregon, seduction, under promise of marriage, is punishable by imprisonment in a penitentiary for a period of from one to five years, or in the county jail from three months to one year, or a fine of from $500 to $1,000; subsequent marriage is a bar to conviction. In Connecticut, the first offence may be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and a fine of not more than $1,000; the second offence, imprisonment not more than three years, and fine not more than $2,000. In Pennsylvania, the seduction of a female under twenty-one years of age, under promise of marriage, is punishable by a maximum fine of $5,000, or a maximum imprisonment of three years, or either, or both, at the discretion of the court. The testimony of the female requires to be corroborated by other evidence, circumstantial or positive. In Virginia, Georgia and North Carolina seduction, under promise of marriage, is made a felony. These are the provisions of the law in the States I have named; but there is scarcely a State in the American Union that does not place seduction on the category of felony. The present Bill, as introduced in the first instance, was more stringent in its provisions than the one now submitted. That Bill was referred to a Special Committee last Session, by which it was essentially modified in its provisions; it was again introduced this Session, and again referred to a Special Committee, who struck out the first clause, providing for the punishment of adultery. As the Bill now stands, there are three offences, and as hon. members may not be familiar with it in its present shape, I take the liberty of reading the clauses. The first section provides that:

“Any man who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned: Provided, in the case of an unmarried man, that subsequent marriage of the parties or a bonâ fide offer of marriage on the part of the defendant, may be pleaded in bar of a conviction.”

The second clause is as follows:—

“Any person who is a superintendent, tutor, or teacher in a private or public school, or other public institution of learning attended by females, or who is instructor of any female in music, or any branch of learning of art, who has illicit intercourse at any time or place with any female under his instruction, or attending such school or institution during the term of his engagement as superintendent, tutor, instructor, or teacher, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter provided.”

The third clause provides that:

“Any person who shall inveigle or entice any female of virtuous and chaste character, to a house of ill-fame, or assignation, for the purpose of illicit intercourse, or prostitution, or shall knowingly conceal, or inveigle, or aid or abet in concealing any such female so inveigled or enticed for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter provided.”

Then follows a provision with regard to the testimony. The two following clauses being for the purpose of guarding against blackmailing, and protecting those who may be exposed to attempts on the part of unscrupulous females, to fasten false charges. These clauses are as follows:—

“In any case arising under section one, two or three of this Act, the testimony of the female in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain a conviction unless the same is corroborated by other material evidence. In every case arising under this Act the defendant shall be a competent witness in his own behalf.”

The sixth clause provides that no prosecution shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the time of committing the offence. The seventh clause is as follows:—

“Any person who shall be convicted of an offence declared to be a misdemeanor under this Act, shall be imprisoned for two years in a penitentiary, or for a less term in any other prison or place of confinement.”

It will be seen that almost unlimited discretion, as to the punishment to be imposed is left with the court, the terms mentioned being the maximum periods, and the court having the discretion to impose a smaller punishment. The original Bill provided for the imposition of a fine, but that provision has been struck out, as it was felt by the Committee that a civil action might be taken under our Statutes in that behalf, and it would be unjust to incorporate such a clause in this Bill. The eighth clause provided that:

“No bill of indictment for any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned shall be presented to or found by any grand jury, unless the prosecutor or other person presenting such indictment has been bound by recognizance to prosecute or give evidence against the person accused of such offence, or unless the person accused has been committed to or detained in custody, or has been bound by recognizance to appear to answer to an indictment to be preferred against him for such offence, or unless the indictment for such offence is preferred by the direction of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General for the Province in which the offence was committed or of a Judge of a court having jurisdiction to give such direction or to try the offence.”

The ninth clause is as follows:—

“Wherever there is reason to believe that any female has been inveigled or enticed to a house of ill-fame or assignation as aforesaid, then upon complaint thereof being made under oath by the parent, master or guardian of such female, or in the event of such female having neither parent, master or guardian in the Province in which the offence was committed, then by any other person, to any justice of the peace, or to a judge of any court authorized to issue warrants in case of alleged offences against the Criminal Law, such justice of the peace or court may issue a warrant to enter, by day or night, such house or houses of ill-fame, or house of assignation, and to search for such female, and bring her, and the person or persons in whose keeping and possession she may be, before such justice or court, who may, on examination, order her to be delivered to her parent, master or guardian, or to be discharged, as law and justice may require.”

These are the provisions of this Bill, which I believe to be in the interests of public morality; and having therefore taken the somewhat unenviable position of its promoter, I move that you do now leave the Chair, and that the House go into Committee to consider the Bill.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not oppose the reference of this Bill to the Committee of the Whole, because there are some clauses in it which I think deserve the consideration of the House. But I really feel, notwithstanding the able argument of the hon. gentleman who presses the Bill, that the first clause is highly objectionable. I think, notwithstanding all the safeguards with which it is surrounded, that it may be held to be a clause enforcing compulsory marriage. It is framed apparently for the purpose of enabling any woman who likes, to force any unmarried man she chooses to marry her. It is all very well to say that there must be corroborative evidence; it is all very well to say that the defendant may come forward and place his oath against the oath of the woman; but there is the scandal, the publicity, which the man is afraid of. We all know—I have had occasion in my practice to know—the agonies that young men have been subjected to by unjust charges of this kind. They have sometimes fled the country to avoid the charge, although knowing themselves to be innocent. Their whole prospects in life have been destroyed because of the horror of being dragged before a jury, and paraded before the public as a seducer of female innocence. A woman comes forward and swears that a certain man has seduced her under promise of marriage; and, as the poet says:

“Hell has no fury like a woman’s scorn.”

A man who has broken his promise of marriage to a woman is liable to a civil action at law. Under this Bill, that woman would have a special temptation to swear, perhaps falsely, that the man had seduced her; and the temptation to force him to marry her would be infinitely great. Now, we know that it is an offence against the law to compound a felon. The Bill calls the offence a misdemeanor, but a party guilty of it is liable to all the pains and penalties usually inflicted on felons, and this clause condones the offence, condones immorality by the offer of marriage. It offers an inducement to the woman to come forward and swear, not only that the man had broken his word to her, but that he went further, although he did not go further. What corroborative evidence could there be in that case, unless there are living proofs, or unless there is that kind of detective proof which is so much scorned and abhorred and despised in the older countries of Europe, where there is a preventive detective police—the key-hole business? In the absence of such evidence, what shall we see? We shall see the woman coming into the box and swearing, in the first place, that there has been a promise of marriage. Well, suppose there is corroborative evidence of the promise of marriage; is that the kind of corroborative evidence that the hon. gentleman means? The court would hold, I take it, that this corroborative evidence was one of the main links in the prosecution. The indictment must include two charges—first, that there was a promise of marriage; and, second, that under that promise seduction took place. There may be corroborative evidence of one charge, and not of the other; there is no distinction made in the Bill. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, what corroborative evidence can there be of the charge that seduction actually took place? The modest woman who has been really seduced, will never go into court under this Bill. She will submit rather than publish her shame. No; it is the brazen hussy, the disappointed, vindictive woman, who does not mind having her shame blazoned in every newspaper in the country, who will take advantage of this Bill to prosecute a man who has perhaps very good cause for refusing to marry her. The offence of illicit connection is a sin, as well as a crime, and is the woman to be rewarded for it, while the man is to be punished? I have no doubt the hon. gentleman, who is a literary man, has read Hawthorne’s beautiful story of the “Scarlet Letter,” which represents the Puritans to have protected their people from impurity of morals, by making a woman who had lost her virtue, wear for the whole of her life the scarlet letter A, thus proclaiming herself to be an adulteress. Under this Bill you are to promote morality, forsooth, by rewarding the woman who comes forward and confesses that she did commit this sin, while the man is to be punished for years, and to have all his prospects ruined; and the effort is to be made to induce him to say: “I will take this woman to my bed and board, and make her the wife of my bosom under compulsion.” And see the consequences—the misery, the consequent crime, the horror and disgust of the man forced to marry the woman. I am opposed altogether to this clause. The subsequent clauses we can speak of when we reach them, but this clause is a distinct inducement to immorality from the lowest and most sordid of reasons. To advance her prospects in life, to get a good husband, establishment and comfort in life, is to be the reward of a woman for not guarding her own chastity. The reward of giving it away is to force a man to take her to his bosom, and to pledge himself to love, honor, and cherish her for the rest of his life. I give every credit to my hon. friend for the best of motives in introducing this clause. It is a new principle, not known to the English law. It is a confusion, I think, of right and wrong. It will induce a system of blackmail, and I am sure those hon. gentlemen, who are of the same impression as myself, have known of very many cases in which young men have been forced to marry women under the threat of being dragged before a court in an ordinary civil action for seduction. If this should pass, we will drive a great many young men out of this country. Instead of women being the guardians of their own honor and their own character, it will be made a matter of barter and sale. I move that the first clause be struck out.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I entirely agree with nearly all the remarks of my right hon. friend. I think that this clause, if passed, instead of remedying the evil it is intended to remedy, will have directly the opposite effect. I have, in the course of my professional experience, had occasion to be engaged as counsel in, I suppose, hundreds of actions of seduction. As you are aware, in Ontario a civil action can always be brought by any one for the seduction of an unmarried female. Unfortunately, too many of these cases are brought. We never have an assizes or a court, before which several of these actions are not brought. It has been my disagreeable duty to be engaged as counsel on both sides, and I think I am within the mark when I say hundreds of such actions have been brought. The deliberate conviction I have arrived at in reference to the civil action of seduction, is that it tends far more to increase immorality in the country than to remove it. I do not believe there is one per cent. of the actions for seduction ever brought before the courts, meritorious. By meritorious I mean cases in which the female was not as much to blame as the man. In nine-tenths of the cases, they are more to blame. If it was within our jurisdiction—which it is not—to abolish the Act relating to seduction, we would benefit more the cause of morality and virtue among the females of this Dominion by abolishing it, than by passing any such clause as this. I am quite confident the result of passing this clause, as my right hon. friend the Premier has said, would be to hold out, to the hardened, unscrupulous woman, the means of coercing a man, frequently without any just foundation, by threats of exposure, and the disagreeable consequences of a criminal proceeding. I am quite sure many marriages are forced now by means of the civil action of seduction, and far more would be forced—which it were better for all concerned if it were never entered upon—by the passage of this Act. I, therefore, feel bound to support the amendment of my right hon. friend, that this clause be struck out.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this clause is struck out, as I suppose it will be, the express desire of the hon. the First Minister being the will of the House, I must express my regret that he does not look on this matter in a different light. The right hon. Premier argues that this Bill is calculated to enable a woman to force a man to marry her under the baring clause. I suggest, therefore, that the bar be dispensed with, and the clause stand with the penalty above. That would remove the right hon. gentleman's objection. The right hon. gentleman also says the Bill does not distinguish between seduction, and seduction under a promise of marriage. It was intended to distinguish between the two. The language is: "any man who shall by virtue of a promise of marriage." The language is intended to convey the idea that an inducement held out was a promise of marriage, and that under that inducement the individual accomplished his purpose. With regard to the fact of the poor man who is made the victim of a woman, I would have more sympathy with him if the same penalties were visited on the man that are visited on the unfortunate wretch who happens to be the victim of his lust. If the man were driven from society, condemned to hang his head in shame, obliged to take refuge in a house of prostitution, unable to hold up his head afterward among his fellowmen—if the same measure of justice were meted out to him as to the female, I would see the force of the right hon. gentleman's objection. But no such fate befalls him. In the majority of instances, he congratulates himself upon having been able to do what many of his fellows think a very creditable thing. He is rather likely to hold up his head among a certain class of men and boast of his conquest, than otherwise. The fatal result that follows a woman, does not follow in his case. As far as I can see if the clause providing that marriage be a bar to conviction is struck out, the most serious objection of my right hon. friend would be obviated. I suggest, therefore, that the portion providing a bar to conviction be struck out, the penalty to be inflicted remains without any such bar.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That was one of my objections, but the other objection still remains that unless there be living proof of a marriage, the evil consequences to the woman, the loss of character, will follow when she chooses by coming forward, and being a witness to her own shame, to publish her own shame. The hon. gentleman knows that there exists the Acts to secure compensation for loss of service in consequence of a woman not being able to attend to her duties to her master. The hon. gentleman must see that when it rests upon the woman's own testimony that there has been such a thing, and no one else knows of her sin, it lies between herself and her God, and she will get her punishment for her sin. If the crime is not known there is no shame. There is no evil consequence to her, and she will not publish her shame to the world. If a modest woman has fallen, and she still remains modest, she will repent of her sin and will continue before the world an honest and changed woman. It is only the brazen-faced woman, the woman who is regardless of her character, that will, for the sake of the advantage of getting a husband, or of forcing him to marry her, or perhaps for the purpose of avenging herself for neglect, that would take advantage of this Bill. I do not see any merits in the clause, I must say.

Mr. CHARLTON. From the reports I have looked up of trials under charges of this nature, it is noticeable that charges are never brought, or at least rarely brought, except when the woman's shame cannot be concealed. Then the woman, being placed in that position by the base deception of man, has a remedy that is adequate, and it is only in cases of that kind that she is likely to appeal to the courts. Under the circumstances—and the objection the hon. gentleman raises, aside from cases of that kind, is not likely to apply to any other circumstances—I certainly think that we are sacrificing the essential principle of this Bill, and that we are denying to a class of people who are utterly wronged any redress. That is the opinion I have in this matter. I do not believe we are likely ever to have a trial under these circumstances except in case where visible results follow the commission of the offence.

Mr. IVES. As one of the Committee to which this Bill was referred, I would like to say a word or two before this clause is struck out. I do not think it is betraying any confidence to say that I was opposed to the first clause of the original Bill, for the reason that I considered that where both parties were equally guilty, they should be left to their own punishment, and to such punishment as the community should visit upon them. But it seems to me, with reference to the first clause of the amended Bill as reported by the Committee, that a very different principle should be applied to it. Here there is an offence on the part of one greater than on the part of the other—in other words, there is a deceit, there is a promise; the whole offence consists in the promise, and in something having been done in consequence of that promise. There is no offence unless the promise actually exists, and the Committee took pains, or they intended to take pains, so to hedge about the case with safeguards as that the offence should not exist at all unless the fact of the promise in virtue of which the connection took place, was clearly proved, and proved not only by the evidence of the prosecutor, but by other corroborative evidence which should satisfy a court and jury. Now it does not seem to me to be any answer to say that it would be difficult to make out the proof; if the proof cannot be made, why, then, of course, there will be no conviction, and no one will suffer from it. The only question we have to discuss is this: does this House desire to enact that it shall hereafter be an offence for a man to seduce a woman under promise of marriage? That is the whole case in a nut shell. If it does not desire to make that an offence, then I can understand the argument that this clause should be struck out; but if the House desires to make it an offence for a man, under the advantage which a promise of marriage believed in and entertained, may give him, then I do not see any reason why this clause should be struck out simply because it may be difficult to prove it. If it cannot be proved the man will not suffer, he will not be condemned, he will not be found guilty by a judge and jury. And if the safe-guard is not sufficient, if it is desirable to require a written promise of marriage, or evidence equivalent to a written promise of marriage, then let us put it in. But I do not think we should strike out this clause on the ground that it is going to be difficult to prove it, when the real reason I presume is that we do not desire to enact that it should hereafter be an offence. If the sense of this House is in the direction that it is an offence by fraud and by deceit, to seduce an unmarried woman, then I say the fact that it is going to be difficult to make out a case is no reason why we should not pass this clause. All the clauses of that Bill, such as the clause with reference to adultery, were struck out by this Special Committee. We believed that where the offence is as much the offence of one as of the other, the law should not make it a crime; but where there is deception, where an advantage is taken, where a teacher takes advantage of his position of influence, or where a man, in virtue of having engaged to marry, or where, as in the third clause of the Bill, there is an inveigling into a house of prostitution—in all these cases we believed the offence should be made a crime. I, for one, should like to stand up in Committee in favor of the clause as it is; of course it is not my Bill, I have no interest in it; and I took pretty strong ground the other day in another Bill against our making it a crime where both parties were consenting. But where they do not, where the offence is committed through deception and fraud, I think there is an offence and that it should be punished.

Mr. CASEY. I think the last speaker has put the case as clearly as it need be put. I understood the objection of the right hon. the First Minister to be that it might be possible to force a man to marry under this clause. Now, I do not see that there can be any objection to that—it would be merely forcing him to carry out what he had promised to do, supposing the promise is clearly proved. Of course care should be taken that the promise is as clearly and positively proven as any contract for the payment of money, or any other contract. I do not think there is any hardship to a man in compelling him to carry out the promise he has bonâ fide made—a promise that he has made for the purpose of obtaining what he has obtained. There might, of course, be a hardship to the woman in this case if she were compelled to marry a man who had treated her in this way: that would be in her own hands. I must object very strongly to the proposal of the promoter of this Bill to strike out that part of the clause. I think we must, in justice, allow the fulfilment of the contract under which the consideration was obtained to be a bar to any criminal proceedings on account of it.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Mr. Ivens,

On the eighth clause,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My hon. friend enables the defendant to give evidence in his behalf, at the trial, and I do not see why he should not be a competent witness, when the complaint or information is laid before the magistrate. It is only fair that he should be allowed then to tell his own story, as well as upon the occasion of the trial. I know that in the Bill reported by the Select Committee, this provision was made; and I would suggest to my hon. friend the insertion of such a proviso. The hon. First Minister will see that it can most properly come in under section 5.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is not that rather introducing a new principle and making the magistrate, in reality, try the case. The ordinary rule, of course, as my hon. friend knows, is that if a primâ facie case is made out by the magistrate, while the defendant is there allowed to state his case, committal is ordered; and the defendant can reserve his defence, which he generally does. But if the defendant is to be sworn as well as the complainant, the case is in fact tried before the magistrate.

Mr. CAMERON. It is not a new rule, as it prevails now in cases of assault and battery, where the magistrate may investigate and send a party for trial; and I apprehend that the defendant could be examined before the magistrate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The magistrate is not bound to decide against the defendant; of course not.

Mr. CAMERON. Besides, the whole clause is an innovation on the present law. The defendant can give his evidence on the trial in his own behalf in cases arising under this Bill. The Bill makes the offence a misdemeanor of a very grave kind. The whole thing is an innovation of the law, as it now stands; and I really cannot very well see, if my hon. friend's object is to protect as far as possible the defendant from improper prosecution, why he should not allow the defendant to tell his own story before the magistrate.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I agree with my hon. friend from Huron. I think that, in such cases, the person accused should be given the earliest opportunity to purge himself, by his own oath, of the offence; and it is possible, in that event, that the magistrate might not think fit to commit for trial. On the other hand, although the prosecutrix and the defendant might swear the opposite to each other, the magistrate would be quite at liberty to commit on the evidence; but when an offence of this kind is brought before a magistrate, I think it only fair that the defendant, at the earliest opportunity afforded in the case, should be allowed to state in public, under oath, that he was not guilty of the offence charged.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would suggest that, at the end of the fifth section, be inserted the following words:—

Upon any charge or complaint against him, and upon his trial for such offence; and may, upon such complaint, insist upon his evidence being taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the wish of the Committee to go back to the fifth clause?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall the motion in amendment be carried?

Amendment (Mr. Cameron, Huron) agreed to.

On the preamble,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. the First Minister, whether the trials of cases of this kind should not be secret. I think that the right hon. gentleman and his hon. friends voted the other night that, in cases of a disagreeable character, such as this is, it is not desirable to allow the public to be present, to gratify a sort of prurient curiosity, as we know is the case on such occasions. My own opinion is very strongly in favor of such trials being disposed of in secret, if the Judge presiding at the trial thinks that this ought to be so. Now, of course, what I consider one of the most important clauses of the Bill, has been eliminated; still enough is left to make the Bill one of considerable importance. No trial can possibly take place under the Bill, without an amount of exposure and scandal of a certain kind, which it is not desirable to have left open to the public and the press. Unfortunately, great publicity now takes place in trials of this kind; and I think that the principle of secrecy ought to be introduced into every Bill of this nature which is passed through the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that I am so strongly opposed to the principle of secret trials, which is so un-English, that when the third reading of the Bill comes up I will ask the House to reconsider it in that regard. I think my hon. friend had better allow this Bill to go as it is.

Bill reported.

SUMMERSIDE HARBOR, (P.E.I.)

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Hackett (March 14th) for an Order of the House for a copy of the engineer's report of survey made at Summerside Harbor, Prince County, (P.E.I.), during the past summer, with a view to improving the navigation of said harbor.

Mr. YEO. I agree with what my colleague has said respecting the necessity of erecting a breakwater at the entrance of Summerside Harbor. Shoals run out from each side, which make navigation difficult, and which cause the harbor to freeze up early in the fall. If breakwaters were constructed on both sides of the harbor, the channel would be narrowed; the water would run more swiftly, and the depth would be greater. Narrowing the channel in this way would both keep the entrance clear of sand, and prevent the drift ice coming in in the early winter. Two very desirable objects would be served by this improvement of the harbor. Navigation would be kept open much later in the fall, and the harbor would be made better and safer for ships lying at the wharves. When a heavy north-west wind blows, vessels at anchor in the harbor and at the wharves are exposed to all its force, and are liable to be driven ashore or to be much damaged by beating against the wharves. Cases of this kind have frequently happened. Property has been lost and the channel obstructed by wrecked vessels. About three years ago a vessel sank alongside the railroad wharf, and it cost the Government a good deal to remove her. Those who have had experience in improving harbors, where sand banks are the chief obstruction, will see at once the benefit of having breakwaters on both side of the channel, so as to keep it secure. In Summerside there would be no difficulty and little additional expense in running breakwaters out from both sides of the harbor, as the bottom is hard, the water shoal, and material is to be had in abundance on the spot. The harbor of Summerside is the second in importance in Prince Edward Island, and it is the principal point of communication in summer between the Island and the mainland. Steamers run daily between it and Point du Chêne, and the greater portion of the travel and traffic by steamer is done on this route. The Government will therefore see the necessity of making the harbor of Summerside as good and as safe as its nature and situation will permit, and I hope they will see their way clear to placing in the Estimates a sum sufficient to make the improvements which I now advocate and which are so urgently required.

Motion agreed to.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. RICHEY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 25) to amend the Acts respecting Cruelty to Animals, said: It will doubtless be expected that, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I should explain the reasons which have induced the preparation of this measure, for which, I may say, I take no credit to myself, placed in my hands as it has been, by gentlemen who take a deep interest in matters of this kind, who have drafted the Bill, and at whose desire it is presented to this House. The main object of the Bill is to render somewhat more distinct the different offences which are brought under view in connection with the prevention of cruelty to animals, and to extend them by the use of the generic term "animals," instead of those which are now employed in the Act by which we are governed, so that magistrates in the discharge of their duty, may not experience the difficulties which they seem now to feel, in the administration of the law. I think that every facility should be afforded to those who, under the law, are endeavoring to carry out and promote the object which the Legislature, in originally passing it, had in view. It is one of the characteristics of our present civilization that, instead of finding enjoyment in the cruel contests of animals, we are endeavoring to counteract everything of that kind, and are extending our benevolent care over the lower orders of the brute creation. It is for this reason that I have taken upon myself, at the instance of those gentlemen who are interested in this measure, to bring it before the House, and endeavor, as clearly and succinctly as possible, to set forth its provisions and the necessity that exists for this amendment. I have said that it is intended to cover, by the introduction of the general term "animal," a large number of phrases contained in the present Act. The Act of 32 and 33 Vic., chap. 27, is amended by 43 Vic., chap. 38, as follows:—

"Whosoever wantonly, cruelly or unnecessarily beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives, or tortures any horse, mare, gelding, bull, ox, cow, heifer, steer, calf, mule, ass, sheep, lamb, pig, or other cattle, or any poultry, or any dog or domestic animal, or bird, or whosoever, driving any cattle or other animal is, by negligence or ill-usage in the driving thereof, the means whereby any mischief, damage or injury is done by any such cattle or other animal, and any person who in any manner encourages, aids or assists at the fighting or baiting of any bull, bear, badger, dog, cock, or other kind of animal, whether of domestic or wild nature, shall, upon being convicted, on summary conviction of any or either of the said offences, before a stipendiary magistrate or police magistrate, or any two justices having jurisdiction in the district, county, or place in which the offence has been committed, for every such offence be punished by imprisonment in any gaol or place of confinement other than a penitentiary, for a term not exceeding three months, and with or without hard labor, or by a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, or by both—such fine and imprisonment being in the discretion of the convicting magistrate or justices."

In place of the names of all these different species of animals we propose to introduce the word "animal," which is the word at present in use in the laws for the prevention of cruelty to animals, both in Great Britain and the United States, and is defined to embrace every living creature, except the human race. But what it is most desirable to call the attention of the House to is the introduction of the terms by which the different offences are enumerated, and by which the scope of the Act seems to be very largely extended, though it is really not so. The English Act, 12 and 13 Vic., chap. 92, uses the word "animal" as it is used in this Bill, and convictions have been had under that Act for every one of the offences named in the amendments proposed in the Bill now submitted. In taking up the report of the Royal Society of England for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for the year 1880, I find that, in describing the offences for which there were convictions in that year, every one of the phrases that occur in this Bill is mentioned. There were 1,905 convictions for working in an unfit state; 764 for beating, kicking, stabbing, &c.; 108 for over-driving and over-loading; fifty-three for starving by withholding food; fifty-one for travelling when lame; thirty-three for setting dogs to worry; fourteen for killing improperly; thirty-seven for over-stocking—which, I understand, is the distension of the udder of a cow in order to make her more profitable to sell, which is the double offence of being a fraud upon the purchaser and an injury to the animal itself; seventeen for marking and wounding to identify; five for gingering and inserting other foreign substances, gingering being, I believe, placing ginger under the tail of a horse in order to make it more spry. I also find convictions for spurring unnecessarily, wounding the mouth with an improper bit, starving by exposure to cold, hobbling improperly, twisting the tail severely. I understand that, not far from where we are now assembled, a very heinous case of that kind occurred not very long ago, in which, by twisting its tail severely in order to impel it forward, because it did not move as desired by its owner, or the person in charge driving it, the tail of the animal was twisted off. This act of cruelty is no doubt one that comes within the purview of the original Act; and the object, I understand, my benevolent friends have in view, is to define these acts so plainly and distinctly, in the Statute-book, that no magistrate can have an excuse for not knowing what is his duty. The first clause provides that:

“Whosoever wantonly, cruelly, or unnecessarily neglects, abandons, binds, abuses, or twists or cuts off the tail of, hobbles, overstocks, marks, brands, wounds or cuts the ears for identification, overdrives, overloads, drives when overloaded, travels when lame, works in an unfit state, torments, tortures, beats, kicks, stabs, gingers, spurs unnecessarily, gags the mouth, wounds with improper bit the mouth of, incites dogs to worry, tail-pipes, incites to fight, stones, burns, scalds, deprives of necessary sustenance, plucks alive, mutilates, kills by bleeding slowly, starves by withholding food, buries alive, or cruelly kills or otherwise treats with cruelty any animal, or causes to be procured any of the acts aforesaid.”

I will now pass to the second sub-section which applies to maliciously wounding, poisoning or killing any animal. An hon. gentleman tells me that will not permit the poisoning of rats. I may say that whatever may be the application of the terms in this section, they are effectually controlled by the first words of the section, which provides that the act must be wantonly, cruelly, or unnecessarily done. There are many of these acts which might very well be made punishable without being qualified by those words, but as they stand in this section they are effectually controlled. With reference to the objection taken that the poisoning of noxious animals would not be permitted, I think no one will seriously pretend that any reasonable construction of the clause will prevent the necessary destruction of those noxious animals. The second sub-section reads:

“2. Whosoever unlawfully or maliciously kills, maims, wounds or injures, or attempts to kill, maim, wound or injure, any animal, or whosoever unlawfully or maliciously administers any poison to any animal, or maliciously exposes any poisonous substance, with intent that the same shall be taken or swallowed by any animal.”

That is for the most part in the Act already amended, with the exception that the word “cattle” is there used, and here we have substituted the word “animal.” For that we have the authority of the Revised Statutes of the State of New York, which, perhaps, I will be allowed to quote. I quote from the seventh edition, 1832:

“Any person who unjustifiably administers any poisonous or noxious drug or substance to an animal, or unjustifiably exposes any such drug or substance, with intent that the same shall be taken by an animal, whether such animal shall be the property of himself or another, is guilty of misdemeanor.”

That word “animal” is defined not to include the human race, but to include every other living creature. Therefore, in the preparation of this Act, whatever may be the objection taken to it on any ground, we have the example of the Legislative Acts of one of the chief Legislatures in the United States. The word there used is “unjustifiably,” instead of the words here used “unlawfully and maliciously.” If the House attached importance to that distinction, there would be no difficulty in altering the phraseology so as to make it accord entirely with the precedent. The third clause refers to the failure to provide proper food, drink and shelter from the weather, by those having the charge or custody of any animal. This is to be found in the laws of the State of New York, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and others, and must, I think, without any argument whatever, commend itself to the judgment and good sense of the House. The fourth clause provides that:

“Whosoever, being the owner, driver, or person having the charge or custody of any animal, leaves disabled, or abandons such animal.”

This is, also, a clause found in the original Statutes. The fifth clause reads:

“Whosoever carries, or causes to be carried, in or upon any vehicle, or otherwise, any animal in a cruel or inhuman manner.”

To this the same remark applies. The sixth section reads:

“Whosoever driving any animal is, by negligence or ill-usage in the driving thereof, the means whereby any mischief, damage or injury is done to any such animal.”

In this the preposition is changed from “by” to “to.” In the original Acts it is “by.” In all the Acts from 1847, these provisions are made, and, therefore, there can be no question as regards them. I must confess to the responsibility for that change. It appears to me that in an Act of this kind the word “to” was the proper word. Of course, the former legislation had another object in view, to punish where injury was done by the animal; and as it would be proper to retain that which is sanctioned by previous legislation, I would like to see both retained. The seventh section is:

“Whosoever in any manner encourages, aids or assists at the fighting or baiting of any animal, whether of domestic, tame, or wild nature.”

The same observations will apply to that clause, namely, that it is substantially a re-enactment of what is already in the section amended. Then I come to the eighth clause, to which I would invite special attention:

“Whosoever keeps or uses any live animal for the purpose of being a target or to be shot at, either for amusement or as a test of skill in marksmanship, and whosoever shoots at such animal, or is present as a party, umpire or judge at any such shooting of any animal, or whosoever keeps or rents any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises, or knowingly suffers or permits the use of any building, shed, room, yard, field or premises for the purpose of shooting any animal as aforesaid.”

The most flagrant cases of the inhumanity and cruelty which it is intended to check by this clause, have been found in that practice which, I regret to say, has prevailed to so large an extent in some countries, and which, I am happy to know the general sentiment of enlightened communities is now subduing—I mean the practice of pigeon shooting. Whatever arguments may be used with reference to the cruelty in connection with pigeon shooting, of course may be used in connection with the same practices regarding other like animals. For this the United States are in advance of us in legislation, as they have been in many cases where the same principle was involved. If the House will permit me, I will read a clause from the Statute of Massachusetts of 1879, with reference to the shooting of pigeons and similar birds:

“Any person who shall keep or use any live pigeon, fowl or other bird for the purpose of a target, or to be shot at either for amusement or for a test of skill in marksmanship; and any person who shall shoot at any bird as aforesaid, or be a party thereto” is liable to be punished by a fine not exceeding $50, or by imprisonment in jail for a time not exceeding thirty days, or by both, with the proviso that nothing therein contained shall apply to the shooting of wild game. I am glad to find as I do by recent telegrams from England published in our papers, that a similar Bill has passed its second reading in the British Parliament; so that, in asking the House to enact this as law, we are not calling upon them to do that which we have evolved from our own inner consciousness, but that for which we have the precedents of two of the most enlightened countries of the world. The ninth clause is one to which, perhaps, I might with most reason expect some opposition :

"Whosoever, in either of the Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, uses any dog or dogs for the purpose of carrying or drawing or helping to draw any cart, carriage, truck, barrow, sleigh, sled or other vehicle shall, upon being convicted on summary conviction of any of the offences aforesaid, be liable to punishment."

Now, that clause is also inserted upon precedent. In England, by the 2nd and 3rd Vic., chap. 47, every person who, within the metropolitan districts, shall use any dogs for the purposes above named is rendered liable to a penalty of 40s. for the first offence, and £5 for the second offence. By the 17th and 18th Vic. passed in 1854, this enactment was extended to the whole of Great Britain, so that throughout the United Kingdom a similar clause has been law since 1854. If it be said that this clause may be applicable in a country like Great Britain, but that it is not applicable in our own country, then I have to refer to the adjoining States where I find similar Acts in force. Without delaying the House by the several references which I might make, I would ask its indulgence to read, from the Revised Statutes of New Jersey, one sweeping clause as indicating the prevalent feeling there, and which clause covers in itself all that is asked for in the present Act :

"That any person or persons who shall overdrive, overload, or drive when overloaded, overwork, torture, torment, deprive of necessary sustenance, or cruelly beat or otherwise abuse or needlessly mutilate or kill, or who shall, by their agents, servants, employes, or otherwise, cause, or procure to be overdriven, overloaded, drive when overloaded, overworked, tortured, tormented, deprived of necessary sustenance, or to be unnecessarily or cruelly beaten, or otherwise abused or needlessly mutilated and killed, any living animal: or any person who shall hereafter use any dog or dogs for the purpose of drawing or helping to draw any cart, carriage, truck, barrow or other vehicle, for business or other purposes, and any person who shall impound or confine in any pound or other place, any living animal or creature, and shall fail or neglect to supply the same during such confinement, a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome food and water, shall forfeit and pay such sum not to exceed one hundred dollars as the court shall determine, &c."

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, reviewed the clauses of this Act, and have shown that they are law in other countries. Those benevolent persons who have organized societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, believe that their object can be better secured by rendering these offences somewhat more specific. We are not increasing the penalties, we are only rendering the provisions more definite that are already on the Statute-book. But notwithstanding that I have thus endeavored to place the House in possession of the arguments which, I think, may be fairly addressed to it in support of this Bill, I feel that there may be, in some quarters, an impression that we may be going somewhat in advance of public sentiment in some of the particulars embraced in this Bill. As I, myself, believe that it is essential to the success and due administration of the law, and for the objects these gentlemen themselves have in view, that they should be well supported and sustained by public sentiment, I am desirous not to push this Bill forward without due consideration. I have allowed it, after being printed, to remain for some considerable time before bringing it before the House. Should the House, as I cannot for a moment doubt they will, permit this to pass to a second reading, I shall ask that it be referred to a Select Committee, composed of some of the most experienced lawyers in this House, together with a number of other gentlemen, whose knowledge of what may be generally acceptable in their own communities, may enable them so to modify it as to secure the general public approbation of the law. I am desirous that every precaution should be taken in order that the Bill may be thoroughly and fully discussed. I believe there are other desirable clauses which may be added to the law and render it more easy of execution. I now move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill, moved its second reading, and asked the sanction of Parliament to its becoming law, is actuated by the most humane motives. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman desires to protect, as far as possible from cruelty, all animals created. The Bill, however, is a curious Bill, it has some very curious features; it is a peculiar Bill, it is an extraordinary Bill. I hope, however, that before the hon. the First Minister lends the sanction of his weight and authority to its second reading, he and the other hon. members of the Government will carefully consider it. It may prove a boomerang to some hon. gentlemen opposite if this Bill is allowed to become law. I hope the hon. gentleman does not intend to sanction the second reading unless he is prepared to meet all the consequences which will naturally flow from the enactment of the various clauses. I have said it is a curious Bill, an extraordinary Bill, with some peculiar and extraordinary clauses. Let us see for a moment the kind of Bill that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to sanction by allowing it to be read a second time, for I saw no indications—and you, Mr. Speaker, were about to declare the motion carried—of any opposition to the Bill from the other side of the House. Let us briefly consider its provisions and see what we are called upon to sanction. The first clause says: "Whosoever wantonly, cruelly, or unnecessarily." If a person commits the acts mentioned in the Bill, wantonly, cruelly, or unnecessarily, he is liable to fine and imprisonment. All three are not necessary for the purpose of securing conviction, but if a man commits any of the acts "unnecessarily," he will be liable, on conviction, to fine and imprisonment. Let us see the things which if a man does unnecessarily he shall be liable to conviction. If he unnecessarily abuses any animal, he is liable to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for three months. If he has running round the yard a miserable cur of a dog, and does not pet it, feed it, and take care of it, but abandons it, and allows it to get its living in the street, he is liable to imprisonment for three months and a fine of $50. How would the hon. the Minister of Militia, who is fond of these animals, like that punishment? If you have a cat round your premises which you do not like, and do not take care of, you are liable to fine and imprisonment. It is an animal, and if it is "unnecessarily" abandoned, you are liable to the pains and penalties of this Bill. Another clause makes it a crime to ride a horse when lame. Let me ask the hon. Minister of War what he thinks of this proposition: he is out at a review, riding on his steed and bestriding it jauntily, and on the way home the animal suddenly becomes lame. There is no necessity for the hon. gentleman to ride the animal home; he can get off its back and walk, or leave it at a neighbor's house; but if he rides the animal home lame, he is liable to a fine of $50 and three months' imprisonment. Does the hon. gentleman like that, and is he prepared to lend his weight, authority and sanction to a clause of that kind, to which he will very likely fall the first victim? Then, if he should unnecessarily spur the horse, he will be liable to fine and imprisonment. There is no necessity for spurring a horse at all, especially for spurring such a gallant steed as the hon. Minister of Militia is doubtless in the habit of bestriding; but perhaps riding homeward and desiring to appear to advantage, as the hon. gentleman always does, desiring that his steed's neck should be a little more curved or its tail a little more twisted, he spurs his horse, and the result is that he is liable to be brought before a police magistrate, sent to prison for three months, and ordered to pay a fine of $50. He does the spurring "unnecessarily," but the thing is done, and the hon. gentleman would be a victim to the Bill. I am giving a few specimen bricks of the kind of legislation which the House is asked to sanction. If an animal is "unnecessarily" stoned, the offender is liable to like pains and penalties. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has a fine garden, and, rising in the morning, he goes out to find a pig there eating his cabbages and potatoes. What does he do? It is said of an Indian official that he telegraphed: "a tiger is on the platform; telegraph instructions." The hon. Minister cannot get the pig out, because if he drives it one way it is sure to go another; so he sends down for the chief constable, and while absent the pig eats the cabbages and potatoes. Human nature is very likely to pursue a very different course, and if stones were available, he would be likely to stone the pig; but if he did so, he would be liable to a fine of $50, and three months' imprisonment. Is the hon. Minister prepared to sanction that law? Then there is the offence of tail-piping. If a man tail-pipes a dog—I did not know what this was until the hon. gentleman explained it—he is liable to pains and penalties. If a miserable cur comes round your premises you cannot shoot it, because you might become liable for a criminal offence, and yet you cannot get rid of it. You tail-pipe the dog and he will never come back, and yet for doing that you will be liable to a fine of $50, and three months' imprisonment. Then there is cutting the ears for identification. We know that most men who are fond of dogs do this. I do not know whether it is necessary, I do not see that it is necessary, but it is done by those who are lovers of animals of that kind, without objection being raised. I do not see why it should be made a criminal offence. The ears of sheep are constantly cut by our farmers for purposes of identification, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture surely does not propose to make all our farmers liable to punishment under this Bill. Marks and brands are unnecessary. Stock-raisers brand their animals for identification. There is, however, no necessity to do so, because they can keep a man in charge all the time. It is not necessary to do it. There are other ways of identifying besides branding, but if branded, the person offending is liable to a fine of $50, and to go to gaol for three months. Now, dogs are employed for the purpose of drawing sleighs. I would like to know how the Postmaster General expects to get the mails carried on the North Shore after this Bill passes. Perhaps he may use balloons. There is no necessity for using dogs. Indians, half-breeds or white men can carry the mails; but for the convenience and advantage of the public service, dogs are used; and yet, if the Postmaster General, under this Bill, sees fit to employ dogs in carrying the mails, he will be liable to a fine, and to be sent to jail. Well, all I can say is, that if the Government allow this Bill to pass, I hope that the Postmaster General will be the first victim. Now, there is another extraordinary provision in it; and I want the hon. Minister of Finance to read this Bill carefully. It is worthy of his consideration, as there are in it some extraordinary provisions. I can imagine the hon. gentleman going home weary and overburdened with the cares of State. He retires to a peaceable, quiet and comfortable home; and the first thing after he puts on his slippers and takes his seat in his arm chair, a beautiful Maltese cat jumps on his lap. There is no necessity for the hon. gentleman, or anybody else, to twist that cat's tail; yet if he twists it, though in the most innocent and harmless manner, he is liable to a fine of $50, and to three months' imprisonment. Whoever twists an animal's tail will have to go to gaol, is the provision. Now, these are some of the provisions of a Bill that we are solemnly asked to sanction in Parliament; and hon. gentlemen opposite are quite willing that the principle of the Bill should be recognized, by allowing it to receive the second reading. I will go as far as any man in favor of any proposition against cruelty to animals; but we have now stringent laws on that subject. We know that humane men—theorists in everything—in the Old Country and everywhere else, carry this thing to the extreme; and if ever there was an example of it, this Bill is one. The law as it stands, is sufficient for all practical purposes; but to say that a man is guilty of a criminal offence if he unnecessarily spurs a horse, or twists a dog's or cat's tail, and is subject to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for three months, appears to me to be a travesty of the administration of justice; and it would be a perfect piece of folly for us to sanction. I have read the Bill, and I see nothing in it which can commend it to the attention of the House. Every provision in it worthy of consideration is provided for in other shapes and forms by our present legislation. As far as I am concerned, I am entirely opposed to this Bill, and for many reasons besides the reasons which I have already given to you.

Mr. McNEIL. I had been inclined to make one or two observations with regard to this Bill; but I was not aware that it would come up this evening, and I am not inclined to intrude very crude remarks upon the House when addressing it for the first time. A great deal, however, that I was desirous of saying has been presented in so much better form by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that I will not refer to the Bill at any length; but there is one observation which I would like to make in regard to the details of this measure; that, as a farmer, it seems to me, it would be quite impossible and quite incompatible with my duty, if I consented to this Bill passing in its present form. This Bill, Sir, is for the protection of every noxious weed that grows; and I do not think, as an agriculturist, that this is a proposition which ought to commend itself to this House. I find the interpretation clause explains the word "animal," as including every living creature. Now, Sir, there is no question at all that a weed is a creature. The Canadian thistle is certainly a created thing; and we farmers, Sir, know to our cost that they have a great deal of vitality, and, therefore, it certainly comes within the meaning of this clause—which includes every living thing. Now, Sir, with regard to section six of this Bill, I should just like to draw the attention of the House to it for one moment, if, in doing so, I do not trespass too long on the indulgence of hon. members. Sir, this clause enacts that whosoever, in driving any animal is by negligence, or by any means, guilty of anything, whereby any mischief, damage or injury is done to that animal, he shall be subject to imprisonment for three months, and to a fine of $50; so that if I, or any other hon. gentleman present, were, in driving our horse, or horses, for one moment to slacken our hand, and the horse or horses, in going down a hill should fall and break his or their knees, we would, under the provisions of this clause, and under this Bill, be so liable. There is no question about that whatsoever. It seems to me that this is very likely a covert attempt to put down the use of tobacco in this country. I am not a smoker myself, but I think that if I were I would not be much less inclined to find fault with this Bill; but I can very well understand that a gentleman while driving might, during the moment of lighting his cigar or pipe, be liable to all the penalties accumulated in this clause, were anything to go wrong with his horse while he was so engaged; and remember, that not only imprisonment, but fine and imprisonment are the penalties. Well, Sir, I think that enough has been said already to show that this Bill is, as said by the hon. gentleman opposite, one of the most extraordinary Bills ever presented to any Legislature for acceptance, and I think it would be quite useless to take up the time of the House any longer with regard to its provisions. I sincerely hope that it will not be adopted in its present shape.

Mr. DALY. I would like to say a few words in support of this Bill, having had the pleasure of moving its second reading, in reply to my very facetious and my very hon. friend on the other side of the House, who has endeavored to turn into ridicule a great many matters which some people consider to be, not only inhuman and cruel, but things which are actually degrading to our common humanity. The hon. gentleman seemed to me to gloat over the idea of practices of such cruelty, as twisting the tail of an animal off its body. Well, if that is his idea of what is right or proper, it certainly is not my own; and if the hon. gentleman himself had such a caudal appendage as is attached to other animals of creation, I do not know how far he would like to have such an operation—which he seems to consider should not be subject to any fine or imprisonment, or to be any wrongdoing whatsoever when committed upon the brute creation—performed upon himself. Mr. Speaker, in entering upon a more serious discussion of the points at issue in this Bill, I would also say that my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, seems to mistake the meaning of the word "creature." Well, now, that an obnoxious weed is an animated creature, I doubt; but a noxious weed may be considered to be a vegetable. It may, however, certainly be considered, Sir, that that is not an animated being in the sense in which this clause is intended to apply; and if he read the clause through he will certainly see that the possibility of inflicting physical pain upon a noxious weed, is rather an act which I do not think he, as an agriculturist, skillful as he may be, would be able to perform. Now, how physical pain is going to be inflicted on a noxious weed I do not know. I think that the objections taken by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken against the Bill do not apply to the extent which they would have us believe; and as so much cruelty is habitually and constantly practiced upon the brute creation, I think we should have further legislation in the direction, not of increasing the penalties, for we are not asking to do that—not in the direction of making the law extend to a greater number of objects than before, but simply to make the law, as it stands, more clear and plain, and more satisfactory to those who have to administer it. This Bill is introduced for that purpose. I believe there are some amendments which should be made in the Bill. I believe, for example, that the clause which prohibits the use of dogs for the purpose of draught is a clause which might very well be modified. I do not think we should pass an Act absolutely prohibiting the harnessing or using dogs for the purpose of draught. I believe some dogs actually take pleasure in drawing toy carts for the amusement of children, and that dogs of a certain kind may even be made use of in drawing heavier loads without cruelty. I think the House should give the Bill a second reading, and allow it to go to a Committee, who can eliminate such clauses as may be objectionable to my facetious friend on the other side, and the other objections which may be made against it.

Mr. WATSON. There is one provision of the Bill to which I wish to refer, and that is the one with regard to the hobbling of horses. Hon. gentlemen should be very careful before passing a law which would prevent that practice, if they ever intend to take a trip out to the North-West, or else they would be almost certain to find themselves in one of the jails of that country. It is the custom of almost everyone who travels there to hobble their horses or oxen, and, if they are not allowed to do so, it will be necessary for the traveller to sit up all night and watch them.

Mr. McNEIL. Might I be allowed, as a young member, to explain what I said in my former remarks. In the interpretation clause of the Bill, it is said that the word "animal" shall be held to include "every living creature," and then it is said that the words "torture," "torment," or "cruelty," shall be held to include every act, omission, or neglect whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering, or death is caused or permitted. But clause two says that "whosoever unlawfully or maliciously kills, maims, wounds, or injures any animal" shall be punished by certain means. Now, according to the interpretation clause, therefore, when I maliciously—as I confess I do—wound or injure a Canadian thistle, or other noxious weed, I fall under the penalties of the Bill.

Bill read the second time; and referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Ablott, Beaty, Casgrain, Davies, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Guillet, Mackinintosh, Shakespeare, Thompson, Weldon, and the mover.

TIMBER LICENSES.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Blake (February 21st), for an Order of the House for a return showing the total number of timber licenses applied for, and granted or refused, up to first February, 1883, &c.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The motion was moved in my absence by the hon. member for West Durham, and I wish to renew it with a view of having the return brought down to which the motion refers. I understand, from the discussion which took place, that there was some slight objection to bringing down the return. Of course, I am aware that a return of this kind cannot be prepared without considerable expense; still I must ask the Government to assent to the passage of the motion, and bring down the return notwithstanding the expense. I do not propose to discuss, at present, the question to which the motion refers, as that can be more conveniently done after the production of the papers, especially as the policy of the Government is to some extent involved. I would like to ask the Government to allow me to amend the motion by adding the word "permits" after the word "licenses," as I was not aware that permission to take timber was granted by means of permits. I should like, also, to get copies of the maps, plans, &c., showing the area and location of each of the licenses granted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a very large order, and it will take a long time to prepare the return; but if the hon. gentleman takes the responsibility in moving for it, I have no objections.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I know it is a large order; but the hon. gentleman must recollect that it is a large question involving important issues. The whole policy of the Government depends upon it—the policy with which we entirely dissented many years ago—but whether right or wrong we can only ascertain after the papers have come down. I know the return will be an expensive one; but I am prepared to take the responsibility of moving for it notwithstanding the expense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman need not have made that remark, as I stated that the return would be brought down.

Mr. COOK. I expect the return will be voluminous, as a great many have been granted these licenses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A great many.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to include those which have been cancelled.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all petitions, correspondence and telegrams, Orders in Council and other papers upon the subject of the assumption by the Government of the payment of the amount granted by the town of Pembroke in aid of the Canada Central Railway, said: It has been stated in the press that application was made by the corporation of the town of Pembroke as long ago as the year 1879, I believe, to the Government, asking them to undertake the payment of a sum of money which the town of Pembroke had voted as a bonus to the Canada Central Railway, in aid of its construction to that town; that no action was taken upon that application during the two or three Sessions of Parliament succeeding its presentation; that after the close of the last Session of the last Parliament, and after the dissolution, in fact, the Government suddenly came to the conclusion that it was an expedient time to take action, and that they passed an Order in Council to submit, in the Estimates brought down to Parliament this Session, a vote for the relief of the town of Pembroke. So interesting had that topic become at that time to the Government and their supporters that a telegram was sent, by the hon. Minister of Railways, to a gentleman who was actively engaged canvassing the riding, communicating this decision of the Government; which telegram was communicated to the town and county of Pembroke as an instance of their, perhaps a little late, but yet fatherly and assiduous attentions of the Government towards them. It is also said that at campaign meetings in the county, particularly in this town, Mr. Deacon, a prominent supporter of the Conservative candidate, and lately a candidate himself for the riding, announced there was yet one condition essential to be fulfilled, namely, that in order that the good things which were to be reaped by the town of Pembroke might be realized, they should return a supporter of the Government. The hon. gentleman stated that the town of Pembroke, on that occasion, gave an unprecedented majority to the Conservative candidate—forty-three, I think—which has just been reversed on a late occasion. These are interesting circumstances taken altogether. They are not the adding of two and two, but of a number of sums together, from which we may draw the obvious conclusion, I think, that I have said enough to justify me in asking for these papers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know what rumors have really reached the hon. gentleman, who seems to keep a watchful eye or ear for rumors; but all I can say in the matter is, that, as far as I know, some of the rumors he mentioned are altogether erroneous. They come from a wrong source; but, of course, the hon. gentleman has heard them, and has a right to move for the papers. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways I may say they will be brought down, and no doubt the whole matter will then be ventilated.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). As some of the hon. gentleman's remarks appear to have been directed to myself, I may be permitted to say a word or two. So far as my information goes, no announcement was made to the electors, either in the town of Pembroke, or in any other part of the county, that the action of the Government would depend upon the election of its supporter in that riding. No such announcement was made by any other person, as far as I am informed, and was certainly never made by me. Nor do I believe any such announcement was made on behalf of my candidature by any person in the course of the canvass. The statement has been made by the hon. gentleman that the majority which I received in the town of Pembroke during the election in June last, was unprecedented, and has just been reversed. Had the hon. gentleman taken the trouble to analyse the votes taken throughout the different portions of the county during the last elections for the Local Legislature, he would find that the case of Pembroke was not a singular case; that is, that the majority given in the other municipalities, where this action of the Government could have no effect, was reversed in the case of the gentleman who ran in the interest of the Conservative party for the Local Legislature. Were I disposed to retort, I might point out that the cause which brought about this state of things in my riding during the local election, was the lavish expenditure of public moneys—not upon the roads in the county—at the instance and at the will of the gentleman who supports the Local Government in the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman himself, just at the particular moment when the election was going on, in June last, was not averse to considering this question of granting relief to the town of Pembroke. On the very eve of the election, a telegram purporting to come from Mr. Blake, and addressed to a prominent gentleman in the Reform party, in the town of Pembroke, was scattered over the town and riding. This is the telegram. It is addressed to the electors of the county in general, the town of Pembroke in particular. It states that as the leaders of the Reform party were alleged to be opposed to giving the claims of Pembroke to a bonus any consideration, Mr. Blake had been interviewed and the following was his reply:—

“TORONTO, 19th June, 1882.

“To WM. MOFFAT.

“SIR,—Not having seen the Order in Council about Pembroke bonus, I cannot judge of details; but rest assured I will always be ready to give every fair consideration and do full justice to the claims of Pembroke. All reports to the contrary are false.

“(Signed) EDWARD BLAKE.”

Mr. Moffat, to whom the telegram is addressed, was a leading member of the Reform party. I ask the hon. gentleman if the telegram was authentic?

Mr. BLAKE. I sent a telegram which, as far as I can remember, was in those words.

Mr. WHITE. I can only say that all the people of the town of Pembroke claim of the leader of the Opposition and of the Government is, that the question shall receive fair consideration at their hands, and we will be perfectly satisfied that after fair consideration has been given to this question, the House should pronounce on its merits.

Mr. BLAKE. I sent the telegram which I believe was in the words quoted. I am quite prepared to abide by them. It was stated to me in the letter which produced this telegram that reports had been circulated by the hon. gentleman's friends which that telegram was intended to contradict, namely, that we had pledged ourselves against giving any assistance to the town of Pembroke. I was not aware, as I said in this telegram, what this Order in Council was, and I made no pledges except that I would give that fair consideration which I am always ready to give to the claims of Pembroke or any other place. What I complain of is not this Order in Council, because, now as then, I am ignorant of the facts; but what I did and do complain of is that the Order in Council should have been passed just at that critical moment accompanied by that telegraphic communication to the hon. gentleman or his friends obviously for electoral use in the contest; accompanied also, as I have reason to believe, though not to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman, by this declaration to which I have referred, on the part of his supporters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman objects to an Order in Council being passed at a critical moment. My hon. friend objects to telegrams being sent at still more critical times.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA BLANKETS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all tenders, advertisements, contracts, letters, accounts, vouchers, warrants, reports and other papers in connection with the purchase of blankets for the Militia during the Recess, said: It is stated that the hon. Minister of Militia found that the interests of those under his particular charge demand an immediate supply of the articles in question, at a certain period during last Recess. The exigency was pressing and it was impossible for the hon. gentleman to adopt a more proper course, impossible that the exigencies would at all admit of advertising for and procuring tenders in the ordinary way; so pressing was it that the hon. gentleman could not procure any tenders at all, but was obliged to proceed in a direct and summary fashion to buy his blankets. But it is stated, also, that proceeding in that direct and summary fashion, and with that expedition which the emergency required, it did not occur to the hon. gentleman to go to the dry goods houses, and that he went to a land agent in this city and gave the contract to him who effected the purchase through a dry goods house, receiving of course his commission—which looks to me very much like contract broking. I am told that the order for blankets was divided into two parts, one being given to a house in another city, and the other to a person in this city. I think it well that we should have all the papers connected with this transaction.

Mr. CARON. There can be no objection at all to the papers being brought down, and I am perfectly certain that a perusal of these papers will convince the hon. gentleman that his information is not at all correct.

Motion agreed to.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. HOMER, in moving the resolution of which I have given notice, declaring it desirable that the Government take such measures as may seem to them most advisable to bring about reciprocity in trade between the Dominion of Canada and the Hawaiian Islands, said: It is hardly necessary for me to state for the information of the hon. members of this House that a reciprocity treaty has been in operation for several years between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands, which treaty has been the means of giving the United States almost the entire control of the trade of those Islands, a trade which at present amounts to several million dollars annually, and with every prospect of its being increased. Some eight years ago, previous to this treaty going into operation, a comparatively large trade was carried on between British Columbia and those Islands; but since their treaty with the United States, that trade between British Columbia and the Hawaiian Islands has dwindled away to a mere nothing. If we can now succeed in negotiating a reciprocity treaty between the Dominion of Canada and the Hawaiian Islands, we will be placed in a similar position to the United States, and we shall see our trade revived as in former days, of fish, lumber and other produce. When the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed, the North-West will be able to supply their products and the Eastern Provinces will supply them with nearly every description of manufactured goods, including machinery of all kinds, large quantities of which are required in the Hawaiian Islands. In return we will receive their sugar, coffee and other tropical products, which products are of such a nature that they cannot possibly come into competition with the productions of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, it is extremely necessary that we should, at as early a date as possible, negotiate this treaty, so that on the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, this country may be able to reap the benefits of a valuable and important trade, which must necessarily grow up under reciprocity. To bring this matter a little nearer home to some hon. members, I will say that before this American treaty went into operation the trade between British Columbia and those Islands was precisely the same as that which now exists between the Maritime Provinces of Canada and the West India Islands; their imports were the same and their exports were the same. Now, I would ask, in case a treaty similar to that should deprive the Maritime Provinces of their trade with the West Indies, would those Provinces remain idle and see that trade taken away from them? I think not. I think they would use every means in their power to regain that trade; they would bring such a pressure to bear upon the Government that it would use every means to satisfy the wishes of those Provinces. Taking this view of the question, I believe there is not an hon. member in this House who would not support this resolution, seeing that in the event of a reciprocity treaty being negotiated not only British Columbia but the whole Dominion must be benefited thereby. Upon the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there will be lines of steamers plying between British Columbia and the different countries on the Pacific coast, as well as the Australian Colonies, and on the route between British Columbia and those Colonies lie those important Islands which must be the most important place of call in the whole Pacific, and the great connecting link between the Dominion of Canada and the Britain of the South Pacific. Therefore, it is highly necessary to cultivate the most intimate trade relations with those Islands. As I understand the National Policy it is framed for the purpose of promoting and protecting the interests of all classes in all parts of the Dominion—the manufacturing, the fishing, the mining, the agricultural, the commercial, and more particularly to suit those special cases where foreign innovation of our trade has taken place. That policy has been carried out to its fullest extent in the Eastern Provinces, and I contend that British Columbia is quite entitled to ask that that policy should be applied to secure us a return of this trade, which we have lost through our carelessness and which has passed into foreign hands. If the Government could have seen their way clear some twelve years ago to take action in this matter when this question was introduced into this House by an hon. gentleman who is now a member of the Senate (Senator Nelson), we should not now have to deplore the loss of that trade, but we would in all probability have retained it until now, when it would have grown four fold. In conclusion, I would ask the Government that, while they are endeavoring to secure reciprocity in trade with the different countries on the Atlantic, they should also devote a little time to securing the same benefits to the Pacific Province, more particularly in establishing trade relations with the Hawaiian Islands. More particularly is this the case with respect to the Hawaiian Islands, because, when the great highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific is completed, the people of the Dominion will find it necessary to extend their trade in every possible way to meet the requirements of this young and vigorous country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The subject which my hon. friend has brought up in his motion so clearly, is one of the very greatest importance to British Columbia even now, and therefore of importance to the Dominion as a whole. By-and-bye, in a few years, when the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed, it will be still more important, and it will be a matter of extreme advantage to have intimate commercial relations between the Hawaiian Islands and Canada. The subject has not escaped the attention of the Government. I might say that when I was in England, I had communication on the question with, I was going to say, the highest authority in those Islands. I had the pleasure of discussing the whole subject with an illustrious individual connected with the Islands, and it was quite evident that that sovereignty is alive to the question. The hon. gentleman cannot well press the resolution at this time, because, being a matter connected with trade, it must originate in Committee of the Whole; but I hope he will be satisfied, because, after this explanation the Government will, in the language of the resolution, if they think it desirable, "take such measures as may seem to them most advisable to bring about reciprocity of trade between the Dominion of Canada and the Hawaiian Islands."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think last Session a member from British Columbia brought up the matter, and I agree with the hon. First Minister that it is a matter of some importance. On that occasion it was stated that the subject would receive the consideration of the Government during Recess; and when a question was asked the other day by a member from that Province, whether any steps in that direction had been taken during Recess, he received an emphatic reply in the negative, from the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, I think. So the Government must not blame the hon. member if he is anxious to bring the matter in a very pointed manner before the House, judging from the success it met with during the past Session.

Mr. HOMER. In reply to the hon. leader of the Government I must say that we received the same answer last Session, but I suppose, owing to the General Elections coming on and the great pressure of business, the Government had not time to give it that attention which it deserves; and I hope when we meet again I may have an opportunity of bringing the matter forward, and will be able to obtain a reply a little more satisfactory than that which we have received to-night. This trade is not only passing out of our hands but there is only the tail end left.

Mr. BLAKE. I am pretty sure the hon. gentleman will have another opportunity next Session.

Mr. HOMER. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall be most happy to reply to the hon. member for West Durham. I am glad to observe that he takes so much interest in the affairs of British Columbia. We have labored under the impression that the hon. gentleman held opinions directly at variance with the interests of that Province. We formed that impression from various speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman and published from time to time. It may be that I have placed a wrong interpretation upon those speeches, or perhaps they were reported incorrectly, or it is possible the hon. gentleman has seen the error of his ways, and intends, for the future, to render assistance to that much abused Province, designated by him a sea of mountains; and who knows but that the hon. gentleman may yet, after eight or ten more years of indefatigable labor as leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House, make up his mind to retire from public life and spend his remaining years in the balmy atmosphere of the Western Province, on the shores of the Pacific. In the meantime we will be prepared to accept the valuable services of the hon. member for West Durham in promoting the true interests of British Columbia and of the Dominion generally.

Motion withdrawn.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg to make the following motion, and for the same reasons I defer any remarks which I may have to make upon it, until the papers come down, which will enable me, perhaps, to more intelligently place the matter under the consideration of the House. I move for a copy of all correspondence between the Government of Canada or any Department thereof, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, or any of its officers, in relation to the subjects stated in the advertisement published in the Canada Gazette of 3rd March, inst., of H. W. Tyler, president, and J. B. Benton, secretary of said Company, dated at Dashwood House, 9 New Broad street, London, 28th February last, calling a meeting of the said Company at London, on the 29th March inst., for the consideration amongst other things of the purchasing of bonds and shares of the Wellington, Grey and Bruce Railway; also, the purchase on behalf of the Company of certain stocks and shares of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company, and of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company; also all copies of the traffic arrangement or correspondence in relation thereto, or if correspondence in relation to the purchase or sale of the North Shore Railway Company by or between the said last named Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, or with the Government of Canada, together with a statement in detail of any liability or obligation which has been created by the said Grand Trunk Railway Company or on their behalf in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the permission of the House, I will make another motion under the same circumstances, and in the same connection, and for the same reasons which I have already stated. I will make no speech, or remark, or explanation about it, unless the House so desire, in order that we may discuss the whole thing when we have the papers before us. I beg to move for a copy of all correspondence between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, or any of its officers and the Government of Canada, or any of the Departments or members of the Government, in reference to the purchase or sale of the Rivière du Loup branch of the said railway, now owned by the Government of Canada; also, any correspondence showing the manner in which the said Company have expended or proposed to expend the money so received for the said Rivière du Loup branch; and also, all correspondence in reference to their expending the said money or any portion thereof either in purchasing or constructing a railway or railways in the United States, either in their own name or by an associated company, or in any other way, and how much money received for the Rivière du Loup Railway purchase has been so expended; and also, any and all correspondence showing whether the Government lien for the debt of £3,111,500 and accrued interest owing by the said railway attaches upon the said railway or railways so purchased or built in the said United States, with the length and cost of the same.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

All correspondence, reports, Orders in Council, and all other documents relating to any claim made by the Provincial Government of Prince Edward Island, for a refund of their expenditure upon public wharves and piers, and also in connection with the maintenance of short term prisoners in that Province since its admission to the Union.—(Mr. Robertson, Shelburne.)

Copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council and papers not already brought down, relating to the grant of permission to cut timber or to mine on lands within the territory now in dispute with Ontario; with a statement of the grants made and the names of the persons to whom they have been made, and the amounts received from the same up to the present time.—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copies of all correspondence, reports, plans, speculations, &c., in connection with the surveys made in 1882, for the construction of a canal between Lake Shushwac and Lake Okanagan, British Columbia.—(Mr. Barnard.)

Copies of all correspondence, memorials, petitions and papers in the hands of the Government on the subject of duties on salt.—(Mr. Wheler.)

Return of all accidents and casualties which have occurred on the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and any of its branch railways, or railways associated with it, or under its control, involving either loss of life or injury to person or property; with a statement showing the full extent and particulars of such casualties, the points at which they occurred, and the causes and nature thereof; with a copy of the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the said railway company, branch railways, associated railways, and railways under its control, as required by the 55th section of the Railway Act of 1879.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 16th March, 1883.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

The following Report was laid on the Table:—

Report of the Minister of Justice as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the year ended, 30th June, 1882.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. BEATY. A Committee of the Senate has been appointed for the purpose of revising the Rules of the Standing Orders Committee; and it is suggested that a Committee of this House be named to meet the Senate Committee in this relation, especially as it is proposed to form a Joint Committee of both Houses to do the duties of the two Standing Committees of the Senate and House of Commons in this particular. Already an informal meeting, I may say, has been held by hon. gentlemen representing the Senate, and by the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee and myself, in reference to this matter. When certain points were raised and suggestions made with the view of having them discussed and considered by the Committee in connection with the revision of the Rules, one point was whether the present notice requiring two months was not too long, causing unnecessary and great expense to parties seeking legislation, and whether the time could not be limited, say to one month. Some went even further, and questioned whether only one publication should not be made in the Official Gazette with regard to Private Bills, as this ought to be only a matter of record, not being generally read—the literature of the Gazette is not of that attractive character which commands perusal generally throughout the country—while more strictness should be required with reference to publication in the local papers. It was also urged that the time within which petitions for Private Bills should be presented to the House should be limited to twenty days, and the presentation of Bills to thirty days; and that these times should be fixed periods, not to be departed from unless with the sanction, or under the direction, of the House, and not by the Committee. The appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses was thought to be very important, for the purpose of passing on these preliminary notices, and the Bills in the first instance, as the double work of the two Committees was quite unnecessary. These matters were not merely informally discussed or talked of, but suggested. The idea was, that we should appoint a Committee to meet a Committee of the Senate on the subject, with the view of revising the Rules, as, with the present facilities for sending communications readily all over the country, the time might be diminished, and the expense of passing Private Bills might be reduced. I accordingly move:

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting their Honors to unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee for the purpose of revising the Rules relating to the duties of the Committee of Standing Orders in each House, and specially whether one Joint Committee of both Houses should not be named to do the work of the said Committee for both Houses; and also, informing their Honors that Messrs. Daly, Casgrain, Gunn, Dawson and the mover, will act as members of such Committee on the part of this House.

These gentlemen were named by the Standing Orders Committee to represent this House in this connection.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, this motion raises some very important questions. My own opinion is, that this Committee might find their deliberations very much assisted, if some discussion on the part of hon. members, conversant with the defects which interfere with the practical working of the present system, took place on the motion for the appointment of the Committee. I think that there is no such pressing necessity for passing the motion to-day as should overcome these considerations, and that it would be better for the hon. gentleman to give notice. For my own part, unless he convinces me by some other argument, I am of opinion that it would be a retrograde step to enlarge the period for the reception of petitions for Private Bills, or for the introduction of these Bills. I do not say that it might not be a good thing to shorten the time of the notice; but I think it is becoming more and more obvious that it is extremely important to get Bills into the House as soon after the Session opens as possible. One report was made to consolidate what might be the joint business of the two Houses, by a recommendation some Sessions ago from a high authority, to consider the appointment of a joint law clerk department. That report failed after consideration—I do not know whether both parties did not agree, but I know that one of the parties agreed that things were better as they were. That advance having been repelled, it seems to me that we should consider a little whether we should send this Message without being certain that the public interests would be served. My object in rising, however, was to point out the reasons why notice should appear on the paper.

Motion allowed to stand as a notice of motion.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 84) to amend the Law relating to Bills of Lading.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT OF 1874

Mr. BOLDUC, in introducing Bill (No. 85) to amend the Dominion Elections Act of 1874, said: The only object of this Bill is to amend section No. 109 of the Dominion Elections Act of 1874. By this clause any person can sue for the recovery of the penalties or fines mentioned in the Act. In many cases the persons who sue are irresponsible parties, who are unable to pay one cent of cost when they fail in establishing their case. The object of the present Bill is to oblige any person suing for the recovery of these fines to give security for the costs.

Bill read the first time.

SPEEDY TRIALS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), in introducing Bill (No. 86) to consolidate and amend the Acts for the more speedy trial of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanors in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, said: In introducing this Bill, I should explain that, early in the Session, I introduced a Bill to amend the Speedy Trials Act, and that Bill has been referred to a Special Committee. Since that time, I have had numerous letters from different County Judges throughout Ontario, giving me data and facts connected with the speedy trial of criminals. The consequence is, that I have made up my mind to introduce this Bill for the consolidation of all the Acts now in force, with reference to speedy trials. In 1869, a short time after the Speedy Trials Act became law, the Judges of the County Courts in Ontario passed rules, regulations, and forms of procedure, with reference to these trials. Some of the Judges adopted them, and others did not. I have had the advantage of having these rules before me, and I have prepared a Bill which embraces the whole of them. I propose that this Bill be allowed to be read the second time—to which I hope there will be no objection—and that it shall be referred, when printed, to the Committee to whom my other Bill was referred. That Committee will take into consideration as well, the question of whether the speedy trials should be encouraged and extended, and this will give us an opportunity of considering the question more satisfactorily than if the Bill was in manuscript.

Bill read the first time.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved, that the following paragraph of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of this Session, be read at the Table, that is to say:

"I am advised that the judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered last June, on the appeal of Russell vs. The Queen, goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary. Your earnest consideration of this important subject is desired."

Motion agreed to.

The Clerk having read the paragraph,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the consideration of the subject mentioned in the said paragraph, be referred to a Special Committee of seventeen members, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to report by Bill or otherwise.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to raise a question of order. It may appear presumptuous on my part to venture to attack the proceedings of the right hon. leader of the Government, knowing the perfect knowledge that he has of the Rules of this House; but I object to the motion as being out of order, on two grounds: first, that we have already had the consideration of this paragraph before the House; and, second, that the motion of the right hon. gentleman evades one of the fundamental Rules of the House. One of the Rules of this House provides that, after any question or Bill has been considered by the House, it cannot again be brought up in the same shape. Now, Sir, at the opening of the present Session this very paragraph was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in exactly the same language; the House afterwards proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech, and, amongst other things, this paragraph was acceded to with thanks to His Excellency for the information contained. Therefore, the House has already pronounced its opinion upon the advisability of adopting this paragraph. I know that in some instances the House can rescind a previous decision; but I do not think this is one of those cases. I do not go so far as to say that that part of the Speech from the Throne cannot be considered; but I mean to say that it cannot be considered in the form in which it is brought forward. Suppose we came to a different conclusion; suppose the Select Committee to which this paragraph is referred, instead of thanking His Excellency for it, do the reverse, shall we accept the report of that Committee? Shall we delegate to that Committee our powers to examine, de novo, that particular clause? But this is a small point in comparison with the second which I have to submit. One of the Rules of the House, one which lies at the very basis of the privileges of this House and the rights of the people, says:

"No Bill relating to trade, or the alteration of the laws concerning trade, is to be brought into the House, until the proposition shall have been first considered in a Committee of the Whole House and agreed upon by the House."

Now, it may be said, in the first place, that there is no Bill yet before the House. But the object of the motion is purposely to bring in a Bill, and by substituting a Select Committee for the Committee of the Whole House. What is a Committee of the Whole House? It is, in fact, the House of Commons sitting with its larger powers and privileges; where every hon. member has the right to speak as often as he pleases; where every opinion can be expressed and reiterated without restraint. It has always been held, that the moment you propose to tax the people or alter the laws of trade, you have got to come before the Committee of the Whole. This motion tends to defeat that Rule, by the substitution of a Special Committee appointed, not by the House in the larger sense of the word, but by the members of the day for the larger Committee. We ought to be very jealous in guarding our rights and privileges, as they exist under this Rule. I recollect how particular the late and lamented Mr. Holton, when he stood in the place I have the honor to occupy in this House, was, that the fundamental principle should remain undisturbed. Well, if I demonstrate to you in a clear manner that the purpose of this resolution is to affect the laws of trade, I think I shall have gained my point. The resolution purports to restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors. The hon. leader of the Government, in saying that the sale of intoxicating liquor is, at present, completely unrestrained, showed that the intent of the Government in this motion was to bring in some Bill or resolution to restrain that trade. I intend to demonstrate to you what has been the rule followed in England, and what the rule is here that should guide us to-day. I must admit there are some precedents of Bills of this nature, having been introduced unnoticed by the Speaker and the members of the House. I can give you Bills of that category: A Bill in 1860, 23 Vic., chap. 53, to diminish the number of licenses; in 1863, to amend the laws, 27 and 28 Vic., chap. 18; another one to amend the Act respecting taverns, 27 and 28 Vic., chap. 48, 1864. But we must not do, through inadvertence, what has already happened in England. I shall give some precedents in which, it was only at the third reading, objection was taken and sustained. Therefore, the House of Commons in England also omitted sometimes to take immediate cognizance of one of the fundamental rules that govern its deliberations and those of our House, because our Rule, with the exception of two words, is copied from theirs. In referring to the Journals of the 2nd March, 1870, I find that a Bill, dealing with the sale of liquor, was allowed to pass unnoticed. On the 21st March, 1874, on a permissive liquor resolution, it was resolved that the House should go into Committee of the Whole to grant leave to introduce a Bill. It is that privilege of the Committee of the Whole House which I desire to see maintained—the granting of the leave by it to bring forward a measure. That is the very point upon which the whole of this discussion turns. In 1874, a Bill was to be introduced to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor in Scotland—affecting only a particular portion of the Kingdom—and the resolution was proposed that the House should go at once into Committee of the Whole. The Chairman was then instructed to move that leave be given to bring in the Bill. This has been not only the practice in England, but also in this country. In referring to Speakers' decisions, one appears in our Journals of the 30th April, 1875. As an example of how those things sometimes pass unnoticed, I will quote the case: On the Order of the Day for the third reading being called, the question of order was raised, and the Speaker ruled that in all cases the Rules of the Parliament of Great Britain would be followed here; and, as in 1772, the Standing Orders of that House declared that Bills relating to trade should not be brought into the House, until the proposition be first considered in a Committee of the Whole House. Therefore, the Speaker ruled, in the case I have mentioned, that the Bill was one relating to trade, and came within the meaning of the Standing Order. He further stated that the practice of the House of Commons had not been uniform, but that when the objection had been taken, the rule had always been enforced. What says May on the point? He says:

“The Standing Order regarding trade, was, for many years, construed as extending to such Bills only as related to foreign commerce, and the import and export of commodities, and was not applied to Bills affecting particular trades, or the internal trade of the country; but of late years the House has reverted to what appears to have been the original intention of the Standing Order, which was probably designed to embrace the same classes of Bills as had formerly been within the province of the Grand Committee for trade.”

Now, Sir, it may be said there is no Bill before the House. It is true the Bill is not before the House; but the resolution says, in so many words, that the Committee to which this paragraph is to be submitted shall report by a Bill or otherwise. Now, I desire to call your attention to this point: Will it not prejudice in advance the question to be brought before the House, when we have a report of this Committee coming before us? I say, in the nature of things, it will. It is the practice of this House, when a report of a Select Committee comes before it, to accept that report, except under very extraordinary circumstances, because this House is always very reluctant to disregard the report of a Special Committee. Now, if this motion is carried it will be an evasion of the Rule which guides us to-day; it will be taking an unusual mode of arriving at the same point. Why not bring forward an ordinary motion at once? Why break the usages and the privileges of this House? I maintain that we are bound to follow the Rule in this case, and I think my right hon. friend the leader of the Government knows enough of the Rules of this House not to violate them. I must say that I do think he is forced by circumstances to take this course, and when I say so I say it in sincerity. The Committee of the Whole House is the organ through which the people speak; it holds the key of the public Treasury. When you want to tax the people you open the Treasury by its leave, and the Ways and Means Committee, in order to replenish it. If you affect the laws of trade by which you deprive the people of the power of replenishing the Treasury, you affect their rights. For my part I view with the greatest concern the violation of this fundamental rule. I would sacrifice anything—I would sacrifice my right hand—in order to preserve this fundamental rule; and if you break it to-day no one knows when or where you may stop. The greatest difficulty, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, that you will find in deciding this point is that the Bill is not yet before the House. But I would desire your most careful and impartial attention to the point—not that we may not refer any question to a Select Committee—but that this is an evasion of the Rule. The point upon which I dwell most emphatically is this: that we have a particular mode prescribed to us by the Rules of the House, and that particular mode ought to be followed in this instance; for this reason the motion, in my humble opinion, is out of order, and ought not to be received.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has very ably, and quite unnecessarily, I think, elaborated the point upon which there can be no discussion, namely: that no Bill relating to trade can be introduced into this House without having been agreed to by Committee of the Whole. But this is not a Bill relating to trade; this a paragraph of the Speech delivered by His Excellency at the opening of Parliament. It is quite in order that that should be referred to a Select Committee. We do not know that they will report any measure at all. That must be brought up by resolution; but perhaps they will report no action whatever, and therefore no injury to trade can result by the adoption of this mode. I think the resolution is quite in order.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the right hon. gentleman not going to make any explanation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that the reasons for the motion are shown in the paragraph which has been read. In the answer to the Speech from the Throne, this House gave His Excellency the following assurance:

“His Excellency may rest assured that our earnest consideration will be given to this important subject.”

We have pledged ourselves to consider this subject; and, after considering the whole matter, we have thought that the best means of giving to the subject the consideration which we have promised, is to refer the matter to a Special Committee elected from representatives of the different Provinces. It might seem, perhaps, at first sight, that we should come down with a measure; and if the proposed legislation were to affect equally, and alter equally, the laws of all the different Provinces, perhaps that would be the proper course. But every one of the Provinces composing the Dominion have different laws on this subject, and, therefore, it has been thought best that a Committee composed of representatives from all the Provinces should consider the situation of each Province, the diversity of laws, the diversity of circumstances, and of the population and habits of each Province; and that, after having thus studied the varying conditions of the several Provinces, a system should be evolved, perhaps not identical in all the Provinces, because, perhaps, a system which would operate beneficially in one Province might not operate so beneficially in another. Therefore, we have thought that all the different laws on the subject should be examined, that the different conditions of the population should be examined, and that a report should be made pointing out the circumstances of the different Provinces and how some wholesome restraint and regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors could best be devised to meet the varying circumstances of the several Provinces. The Government thought that was the best mode of carrying out the assurance we gave to His Excellency, that we would give full consideration to this important subject. We thought best to submit the matter to a Committee, and, after getting the report from that Committee, the House could deal with the subject more satisfactorily, after having obtained more full information than they possibly could get just now. I listened with great pleasure to the able and clear arguments on the point of order made by my hon. friend opposite, who stated his case with all the acumen and ability which distinguish him. I did not intend in any way to offend against the Rule. This report will be laid before the House. Then it will be for the Government, if they think proper, to move certain resolutions; and if they think, after obtaining this report, and the House is placed in possession of all the information, that a measure for the regulation and restraint of the undue sale of intoxicating liquors is required, of course the Government will be obliged to carry out all the Rules of the House, and as it is a matter of trade, we must commence by resolution. The House may have a report and draft Bill before it, or if the Committee do not choose to submit a draft Bill, the House will have before it the results at which the Committee have arrived, and out of those results the Government, if sanctioned by the House in resolution, can come down with a Bill to Parliament. These are the reasons why I have taken this course. The House is pledged to consider the subject, and I think the best mode of considering it is, as I have suggested, by means of a Special Committee, formed in the manner I have mentioned.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sure the hon. gentleman's own supporters must have been disappointed that, in introducing a proposal of this description—unprecedented so far as I know in our own legislation, and almost without precedent in the legislative and Parliamentary conduct of the affairs of the country from which we draw our practice—the hon. gentleman should have proposed, first of all, that the House should decide upon the appointment of a Select Committee without any word of explanation whatever. That he should have actually asked the House to vote the appointment of a Select Committee without offering any word of explanation whatever, must have astonished the members; but our surprise was diminished when we found, upon the challenge being extended to him for his explanation, that there was so little explanation to be given. We understand now why the hon. gentleman proposed that the motion should be adopted sub silentio. For his reason, when forced to give a reason, is a reason which I think is of no force or validity whatever, even in considering its positive proposals, if we do not consider for a moment the inconveniences which are to result from the adoption of the proposition. The hon. gentleman tells us that the laws of the Provinces vary upon this subject. Well, we knew that, and he knew it. Not merely does he know that they vary, but he knows what they are, and the Government know what they are. This is a Government formed from most of the Provinces at all events. It has machinery ample for acquiring the knowledge which it may not itself possess. The Statute-books of the Provinces are to be found in the Library and in the Departments. There are several lawyers in the Administration. There is the Minister of Justice in the Senate, there is the right hon. gentleman himself, there is also the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Militia, and one or two others, I think, who belong to the same profession, so legal advice is not altogether absent from the Cabinet itself. Nor are there absent other means of obtaining information. This is a Government of Commissions. They wanted information about the factories, and they sent Mr. Blackeby and Mr. Lukes to inspect the domestic factories last year; and during the Recess one was despatched into Massachusetts, and the other to Europe, to find out all about the factories there. They wanted information about the Pacific Railway, and they issued a Commission for which, I observe by the Returns, we are paying sweetly to-day. They wanted information about the Intercolonial Railway, and they issued a Commission appointing an officer, and when that officer died they issued a fresh Commission, and it is sitting yet. They wanted a Consolidation of the Statutes, and they appointed Mr. Cockburn a Commissioner to execute the work of consolidation. This is a Government which acts freely and liberally, without thought or hesitation in using the machinery for enquiry in the way of Commission. So that if it were necessary, as the paragraph from the Speech intimates it is, that there should be legislation in this Dominion, in the Session of this Parliament, upon this subject, there was within the Cabinet, composed, as I say it is, of members from most of the Provinces, men with legal knowledge, able to acquire information of what the Statute Laws of the other Provinces are; and by having the machinery at its disposal, if indeed it required a Commissioner to codify the Liquor Laws of the different Provinces, I say to suggest this course, at this stage of this Session, necessary to be adopted in order to carry out the intimation made in the Speech from the Throne, is to state a proposition which requires very much more than the hon. gentleman has said in support of it, by an intelligent House of Commons. Now, the paragraph of the Speech declares that His Excellency has been advised—and, of course, that is by hon. gentlemen opposite:

“That the Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered last June, on the appeal of Russell vs. The Queen, goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary.”

The attention of the hon. the First Minister was early directed to this unfortunate state of circumstances, as some concede it to be, and to this happy result, as others concede it to be. It is a long while, he says, since he held that opinion; and the particular decision referred to in the Speech from the Throne took place as long ago as last June. From that period, at least, the attention of the Government was directed to the subject of legislation. They were absorbed in other matters just then, and I do not call on them to state why they were not engaged in culling the laws of the different Provinces, as the cause is well known to themselves. But after the 20th of June, hon. gentlemen were at their ease. It was competent for them then to address themselves to the business—to those duties necessary to provide for the legislation which, by the decision in Russell vs. The Queen, and by the verdict of the people—it had devolved upon them to prepare for the consideration of Parliament. But it seems they have not done so. It seems that the hon. gentleman, now in the sixth week of the Session, does not know what the Liquor Laws of the Provinces are. It seems that although the hon. gentleman decided legislation was necessary in order to prevent the evil of absolutely unrestricted sale of liquor all over the Dominion, although that was the inevitable conclusion of the decision in Russell vs. The Queen arrived at last June, the first step has not been taken by the Government responsible for the legislation consequent on that decision, as they say, to inform themselves of what are the fundamental propositions on which the measure is to be based. The hon. gentleman says the first thing to be done is to find out what the laws of the other Provinces are; and he admits that the Government have not been able to find out. They say, our present resources, our own sources of knowledge, our facilities for acquiring information, have failed us. We have not thought fit to obtain information from outside. We have not called on the Local Governments, on Commissioners, or on our officers; and although we stand pledged to introduce a License Law, we have waited until Parliament has been six weeks in Session before we propose that—on what is to be the heart of the business of the Session—a Select Committee drawn from all the Provinces, shall be appointed to enter on an enquiry. If legislation is to be perfected this Session, the enquiry must be conducted with great rapidity, in order to inform us as to that question on which during six or nine months the Government were utterly unable to take the first step in acquiring information. If the Government believed, as of course they believed, that legislation was rendered necessary, absolutely inevitable; if they believed, as of course they believed, that the duty of initiating legislation in that regard devolved upon them, I say they condemn themselves of flagrant neglect of duty in not having taken those precautions to inform themselves of what the laws and customs of the Provinces are, which they say it is necessary to know in order to form the basis of this legislation which hon. gentlemen say is so necessary and important. They tell us that legislation is necessary; and yet here we have been more than five weeks waiting for this legislation; and we learn to-day that the first step has yet to be taken, the very first items of information, on law and of fact, have yet to be obtained—that we are to be called upon to assist the Administration in informing them as to what are the laws of the different Provinces upon which they say, to some extent, at all events, that measure is to be based. For these reasons, he proposes as his course to refer this question to a Select Committee to report by Bill, or otherwise—to report upon necessary legislation. A Committee is therefore to be created upon the theory that legislation by this Parliament is necessary; and if created upon that theory, it is necessary to discharge the duty of framing that legislation; therefore, according to that point of view, a Committee is thought proper, by the hon. gentleman, to be authorized to report a Bill, or resolutions on which a Bill may be founded, for the regulation of a question of trade, or to make a report, which should be the basis of legislation in the opinion of the Committee. I say the hon. gentleman now says: "Let us remit this question to this Committee so chosen." He has also said, in the Speech from the Throne, and in the debate on the Address, that this matter was forced on the attention of the Government; that they have not undertaken it voluntarily; that they reluctantly took up this question only of necessity; that they did not wish to interfere in the Provincial Laws; but were forced to take up the duty of proposing legislation on this subject. Such, however, was not always the language of the hon. gentleman on this topic; such was not the language which he used in a speech delivered in Ontario on the subject of the License Law; and this, before a decision was reached in the case of Russell vs. The Queen, and before the necessity—in so far as a necessity was created by that decision—had arisen. In a speech delivered before the judgment was announced, in the case of Russell vs. The Queen, the hon. gentleman used these words, speaking in a place which, I believe, was in the neighborhood of Toronto, and which is now a part of Toronto itself—Yorkville:

"If he carried the country, as he would do (cheers), he would tell Mr. Mowat—that little tyrant, who had attempted to control public opinion by taking hold of every little office, from that of a Division Court bailiff to a tavern-keeper—that he would get a Bill passed at Ottawa returning to the municipalities the power taken away from them by the License Act (cheers)."

Remember that at that time, Sir, the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Russell vs. The Queen had not been pronounced, and this was previous to the Federal Elections; and his declaration on that occasion formed one of the planks of the platform on which he appealed for popular favor, and for the support of the licensed victuallers. He then declared that, if he were returned to power, he would have a Bill passed on this subject, which Bill would have a particular complexion—it would restore to the municipalities the power which had been taken away from them by the License Acts of the Local Government. And when the hon. gentleman so spoke, he said distinctly that he would pass a Bill which would restore to the municipalities the powers that had been taken away from them by the Local License Acts; but now he proposes the appointment of a Committee to examine into the question, and to advise the Government as to what legislation is advisable under the circumstances. Later on, the hon. gentleman called a Conservative Convention, in the city of Toronto, in connection with Local affairs, and he attended at the proceedings and closed them. Being chairman, he made the opening speech, and also pronounced the final words.

An hon. MEMBER. The benediction.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say benediction; but I might term these words, with truth, the malediction, rather than the benediction. At this Convention the policy of the Conservative party on this question was announced; and the leader of the Local Opposition, in the presence of the hon. gentleman, and presumably under his guidance and direction, said:

"He was prepared to say that the present Opposition, if it took office, would be prepared to wipe away the partisan Boards of Commissioners. (Loud cheers.) It was proposed to restore to the people of the Province the rights they formerly exercised. (Cheers.) It proposed to give back to the municipal bodies the rights they formerly enjoyed. (Continued cheering.) He was not afraid that the people would not, or could not, use their powers properly. He was not like the alleged Liberals, who were afraid to entrust the people with the powers belonging to them. (Cheers.) Nor did he suppose in making the announcement, that he would alienate one temperance vote."

These were patriotic words, and they were received with that approbation and enthusiasm which some hon. gentlemen seem disposed to endorse, by repetition, at this hour. The policy of the convention was properly heralded in a resolution, which explained the views of the Conservative party, with the hon. gentleman's assent, for we are told that all the resolutions were unanimously passed, as I believe, on these occasions, resolutions always are. We read the next day what the policy of the Conservative party was on this question. It was as follows:—

"Resolved, that the present system of issuing tavern and shop licenses through Government officials having been instituted and systematically used for the purpose of rendering those engaged in the liquor traffic subservient to the Administration of the day, it is the opinion of this Convention that, without interfering with the laws regulating the liquor traffic and limiting the number of licenses that may be issued, the power of issuing licenses and the fees derived therefrom should be restored to the municipalities."

Once again, Sir, the hon. gentleman was successful, as so often before, in impressing upon the minds, conscience and will of his party, the exact view which he took of public offering. As he put it on the 3rd of June last, he said that his intentions were to restore to the municipalities the power of issuing licenses. On the 14th September last, the Conservative party of Ontario, under his guidance, declared that their policy was to restore to the municipalities the power of issuing licenses; but, as I have said, there was no word at that time of Dominion interference for that purpose. It would not do then; it would not have been right to have pointed it out at that time. Russell vs. The Queen had been decided. That decision was known here. The hon. gentleman was possessed of it. He thought then—unless he has changed his opinion since, for he thinks now—he did then, at any rate—that it had been made obvious that the Local Legislature had no power to deal with the matter at all. He thought then—or, at any rate, he thinks now—that under that decision, here, and here only, legislation was to be had. He thought—as is shown by the Speech from the Throne, and by his own utterances early in June—that he was prepared to legislate here, but he did not say so. It would not do; and Mr. Meredith was put to the forefront of the battle to declare what the Conservative party of Ontario would do in this regard, and they agreed to do just what the hon. gentleman designed—restore the power of issuing licenses to the municipalities. But they affirmed impliedly, if not expressly—aye, expressly in Mr. Meredith's speech—that that was to be done at Toronto for the Province of Ontario, and not in Ottawa for the whole Dominion. Now, if, as the hon. gentleman on the 14th of September thought that the Local Legislature had nothing to do with this, could not deal with it, that their License Law which transferred the power to Boards of Commissioners was pro tanto void, why did not he say so?—why did not he tell the people of Ontario, gathering his forces together, as he was for the impending conflict, that he was about to remove the question from their jurisdiction? Why did not he tell the Conservative convention that he was going to do this thing? Why did he allow his deputy to announce that he would do this, and that, and the other thing, if he succeeded at the Elections, when he thought he could do nothing at all? Why, Sir, the Conservative party of Ontario was called upon to undergo sufficient humiliation without that. They were called upon at that Convention to abandon the territorial rights of their Province; they were called upon to abandon the legislative rights of their Province; they were called upon to give up the Boundary Award; they were called upon to give up the question of disallowance; and the hon. gentleman did not choose to ask them at the same time to swallow another abnegation of Provincial rights. He allowed this matter to dangle before the people of Ontario as a toy, which he was about to remove from them at the proper season—this power of dealing with the license question—this great bar to Provincial rights. He allowed his party to say that their leader in the Local Legislature would legislate in a particular direction, because it did not do at the same moment to say: "I have given up the Boundary Award—good; I have given up the question of disallowance—good; but I have yet another sacrifice to ask of your patriotism and your party allegiance, and that is, that you should give up the power of your Province to interfere with the regulation of licenses for taverns, shops and saloons." So the hon. gentleman's friends were allowed to make these statements. Proceeding chronologically, we arrive next at the hon. gentleman himself, in his capacity, not as leader of the party marshalling his forces at Toronto for a Provincial contest, but in his capacity as First Minister of the Dominion. He had excited, by these statements of his in June, the hopes of the licensed victuallers, and they sent a deputation down here to interview him. I moved early in the Session for the papers, but they have not been laid on the Table, so far as I have been able to learn. We do not know all that passed on that occasion, and perhaps we shall not know all that passed even when the papers come down; but we have some account of what passed in a statement made by the deputation in a letter published in the newspapers, which was signed by Messrs. Cosgrave, Hodge, O'Keefe, Mitchell, and O'Shaunnessy:

"The objects of the deputation were to ascertain from Sir John Macdonald whether it was the intention of the Dominion Government to take into its hands the regulation of the License Laws, and if in so doing it was the intention to do away with the marked political character of the existing Crook's Act. In answer to the above, Sir John stated that it was the intention of the Government to take the matter into its hands, as such a course was forced upon it by the late decision of the Privy Council in regard to the Scott Act; and that in the framing of the measure it was the intention to make it strictly non-political."

Well, Sir, they called upon him; they enquired of him—he had announced he was going to do it in June—whether he was going to do it? They did not apparently entirely trust that statement of the hon. gentleman—I am sure I do not know why—but perhaps they recollected that it was made before the elections, and that everything said before the elections might not perhaps be realized exactly to the letter, and circumstances change of course; but whatever the reason, they felt it necessary to reinforce themselves with reference to his statement of June, so they called upon him in October and asked him whether he was going to take the matter into his own hands? He said: "We are going to take this into our hands, and we are going to frame a measure." Well, where is the measure? We have no measure; we have not got the basis of a measure; we have not even got the materials which the hon. gentleman says are necessary even to form a judgment of what the measure should be; he has not got them himself. Yet he tells these gentlemen that the Government have decided to take the matter into their own hands and frame a measure, and he tells them something about the character of the measure. It seems further, from the correspondence which has appeared on the subject, that the victuallers were requested to put on paper their views as to what the measure should be, and that these views were to be laid before the Privy Council. Have we got their views? Perhaps we shall have them presented; but there again it is obvious that the hon. gentleman was taking steps to frame his measure, for he was obtaining information from one sect of persons deeply interested in it, and he asks them if they will lay before the Privy Council what their views are. They promise to do so, and I presume they did so accordingly. That was not all. Naturally enough the Temperance Alliance were a little aroused, and they also approached the hon. gentleman. He answered them on the 14th November, saying:

"Nor does the Dominion Government intend to make any attempt to relax the present restrictions on the sale of liquors in any Province in the Dominion."

We thus get a step further. The hon. gentleman knew by this time that the regulations differ in the different Provinces, and he had decided that he would not make any attempt to relax any of the restrictions in force in any one Province—not as he says, to-day, that we should make a measure which, giving a little here and taking a little there, accommodating itself one way and accommodating itself the other way, and will be pretty nearly right all over—but he says he has no intention of relaxing any of the restrictions which are in force in any of the Provinces. So we see that he was attempting to frame his measure, and he had a portion of the basis laid down in his mind at any rate. He was able to tell the victuallers that he was going to frame it, and that it would be non-political, and he was able to tell the temperance men that he was going to frame it, and that he would not widen any of the restrictions existing in any of the Provinces. Then came the turn of the Local Conservative party, and they brought forward a resolution on this subject in the Local Legislature; and they proposed, on the 24th of January, this resolution, as expressive of their policy under the hon. gentleman's old guidance, if not his then present guidance:

"This House, while recognizing the necessity of maintaining the other provisions of the existing liquor license laws and strictly enforcing them, is of opinion that it is not in the public interests, or calculated to promote the cause of temperance, to continue the mode of appointing boards of license commissioners and license inspectors now in force, and is further of opinion that these boards should in order to remove them as far as possible from the influences of political partisanship, be appointed in counties by the county councils, and in cities and towns separated from counties by the councils thereof, and that the power of appointing one or more license inspectors in each license district should be vested in these boards, and this House regrets that legislation providing for this change in the law, and for handing over to the municipalities the whole of the license fees except a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of the license branch of the Department of the Provincial Secretary, has not been proposed for its consideration by the advisers of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor."

Time, Sir, had brought a little wisdom to these gentlemen. They had found that their proposal to hand back to the municipalities the powers with which they had been formerly invested, did not take. They found that neither the municipalities themselves nor the people at large were favorable to that change, and they proposed a modification of the hon. gentleman's scheme of June and of September in the Convention—a modification giving a larger power only to the councils of counties, cities and incorporated towns, a very different thing from what they had up to that time proposed. They had also found, I have no doubt, considerable trouble about the hon. gentleman's own pretensions. They found it necessary to say that they were sincere, at any rate, on the third, if not on the first and second subjects of contention upon the question of Provincial rights, and, therefore, the Local Conservative leader felt it necessary, and I suppose he was permitted, to announce a difference of opinion from the hon. gentleman; so, in supporting the resolution to which I have referred, he made a speech, in which he used this language:

"If it was thought that greater powers should be conferred upon the Legislature in the settlement of this question, there was still a remedy to apply for in an amendment to the Constitution. A great deal had been said about the observations made by the leader of the Dominion Government in reference to this subject. He could only understand his position from the reports published of his speeches, and that was that the result of the determination of the highest court in the land, when the question of granting licenses accidentally arose, was that the laws passed by the Provincial Legislatures were null and void so far as they assumed to deal with the granting of tavern and shop licenses. The leader of the Dominion Government seemed to take the view that there must be legislation passed by the Dominion for the purpose of dealing with the question in the interests of temperance. It was clear that if this House had no power of jurisdiction, everybody was at present free to embark in the liquor traffic. He confessed that his views were that the jurisdiction rested in the Local Legislature, and that the Dominion had no power to deal with the question. He thought that under the power given the Legislature of dealing with municipal institutions, this right was included. It was the duty of the Legislature to assume the exercise of the power, at all events, until the highest court decided the issue, and in this the Government would have the support of the Opposition. Should the decision be that the power rested with the Dominion authorities they must all court that judgment."

There you see, Sir, the hon. gentleman declares himself of opinion that this power rests, not with the Dominion but with the Local Legislature, and he suggests that that position should be maintained at any rate until the highest court of the country should decide to the contrary; and he furthermore suggests that even then there would be a remedy in an amendment to the Constitution, leaving to or giving to the Local Legislature that which it was up to a late period supposed they had the right to deal with this question. Well, there again you see a divergence of view. The hon. gentleman at Ottawa is announcing: "I alone have a right to deal with this question," while Mr. Meredith in Ontario is claiming that they alone have a right to deal with it. The hon. gentleman asks his supporters down here to say that the Local Legislature has no jurisdiction; he asks his supporters up there to say that the Local Legislature has jurisdiction; and between these two wings of his supporters I leave him to settle the difficulty. But next, we come to the Speech from the Throne, and there we find a considerable harking back. I have shown that the hon. gentleman's policy upon the subject of interfering with the traffic in intoxicating liquors was antecedent to the decision in Russell vs. The Queen—was announced, in fact, antecedently to that time. I have shown that he declared, several weeks before that decision was pronounced, that he would proceed to Ottawa to legislate in this direction, if he were given the power by the people. Well, he comes down to us with the Speech which he advises His Excellency to make, and puts in His Excellency's mouth words signifying that it is this decision in Russell vs. The Queen which forces the Government to initiate legislation in Parliament on this question. But that is not what forces it upon the hon. gentleman. What forces it upon him is the anti-election pledge which he made before the decision in Russell vs. The Queen took place at all—the pledge that he would do this thing in order to subvert and defeat the policy of "that little tyrant" Mr. Mowat. Then we find him occupying, in the debate on the Address, still milder ground. He roars now, not as he did in June, when he talked about his power and his intention; he roars like a sucking dove. You find him saying:

"That subject (that is, legislation with regard to liquor licenses) was not willingly undertaken by the present Government. They were quite satisfied that the law as it obtains in the different Provinces should be continued."

Was he satisfied in June, when he declared that he would, if returned, pass a law here to subvert the power of the Local Legislatures, and to restore to the municipalities the power of which they were deprived? These were not expressions of satisfaction, but of dissatisfaction and discontent, and he determined to remove that dissatisfaction by altering the law. Then he says:

"They were quite satisfied that each Province should, so far as the law would allow it to enact such Statutes, deal with the subject on shop, tavern and saloon licenses. Neither the Government nor the Parliament of Canada, I take it, wished to interfere; and it was only when the decision which was given in June last on the Scott Act, a Dominion Act, forced the subject upon them that they thought it their duty to bring it before Parliament. I never had any doubt that when the question was brought before the courts, it would be decided that the different Provincial Legislatures had no right whatever to deal with that subject except for revenue purposes—for the purpose of imposing taxation for Provincial or municipal purposes. I expressed the opinion in Parliament years ago, and last year I expressed it at a public meeting in Toronto or its vicinity. But while that opinion was strongly impressed upon my mind I took no steps, nor did the Government of which I was a member, take any steps for the purpose of interfering with the legislation of the different Provinces, or forcing Dominion legislation on the country, or trying to centralize such powers in this Parliament. On the contrary, the only centralization on that subject—the only time in which that question was in any way dealt with by the Dominion Parliament—was when the late Government was in power, and when they introduced the Scott Act."

Then the hon. gentleman proceeds to say in reference to the case of Russell vs. The Queen:

"It is quite clear to every lawyer, and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, will see that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided that this Parliament had the right to deal with the Scott Act, are the reasons showing that the Provincial Legislature of Ontario had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks' Act, except as a matter of revenue for municipal or Provincial purposes. The hon. gentleman says that we should have allowed the matter to stand over until it was finally decided. Sir, if there be any value in that decision, and there is every value in it, because it is the law of the land, there is no check at this moment in the Province of Ontario against the unlimited, unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors. This is not a matter we can play with. It is not a matter of policy; it is a matter of necessity. If we wish to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors we must legislate immediately; for I take it that any man in this city or in any other part of Ontario can open his saloon and sell liquors, and there is not a court in the world can prevent his doing so."

Now you will observe that a very different line is taken at this early stage of the Session, from what the hon. gentleman took in June last. He was going to do it because he disapproved of the Local legislation, because he thought it should be amended and made better. Then he was clear as to how he should act. Then he was clear that he should restore to the municipalities the powers of which they had been deprived. Now he says it was not a matter of policy at all, but a matter of necessity arising out of the decision in the case of Russell vs. The Queen in the Privy Council. The first question is whether that decision does decide that there is no power to restrict the number of licenses issued by the Local Legislatures at all. To that subject the hon. gentleman has not addressed himself to-day at all. In the debate on the Address he disposed of it very summarily. He said that any lawyer, or any other man who is not a lawyer, who chose to read that judgment must see plainly from it that the unavoidable result was no power was left with the Local Legislatures to restrict the number of licenses. Now I do not draw that conclusion from the decision in Russell vs. The Queen. In the first place, that judgment does not deal in the slightest degree with, does not touch in any way upon, that very large part of Provincial rights which is comprised in the subject of municipal institutions. The decision is expressly stated to be upon the consideration of whether the power to pass the particular law which was before the Privy Council, viz., the Scott Act was vested in a Local Legislature in either of the then headings: the heading of property and civil rights, the heading of shop, tavern and saloon licenses, or the heading of local and private matters. The Judges expressly say that these were the points which were raised before them, and upon which they judged. They do not say a word about municipal institutions having been suggested or argued. Now, Sir, if hon. gentlemen sitting in this Parliament, if Ministers of the Crown, chosen from all the different Provinces, do not know what are the local laws touching the sale of liquor, what powers have been given to the different municipal bodies in that regard; if we require to-day to take the first step in order to inform our minds upon the mixed question of law and fact as to what are the laws and what mean the laws; can we suppose that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was inspired to know all about those municipal institutions and local laws which were not even alluded to in the argument and the judgment? Can it be seriously argued before a Canadian Parliament, that the single decision of four or five men—when the great question of municipal institutions was never even raised or discussed—has so finally concluded this question that it is not further arguable? It is absurd to say so. I maintain that, in the absence of a decision in which the whole question of municipal institutions shall have been brought up expressly, in which that mass of statutory learning which is required in order to know what the position of the municipal institutions of each Province was at the time of Confederation was not called for, in which the true construction of this phrase "municipal institutions" was not fully debated and decided—no man, in the absence of such a decision, can say that this question which, in the largest of the Provinces, in the next largest of the Provinces, and in two or three more of them, was dealt with before Confederation, and for years after as a subject of municipal institutions, is not to be found in the Confederation Act. I am not now discussing the meaning of the term "municipal institutions." I am merely pointing out that we have to decide that before we agree that it has been argued finally, and finally decided that the Local legislatures have no power to deal with the question of restricting or regulating the different licenses. It does not at all follow in the reading of our complicated and somewhat obscure Constitution that because this Legislature may do a particular thing, therefore, in the absence—aye, noticeable in some cases in the presence even—of Local Legislation, the Local Legislature shall have no power to legislate at all. The proposition that that will be a non sequitur is established in many decisions, and is adverted to in this very decision of Russell vs. The Queen, which speaks of the possibility that might arise in absence of Federal legislation. It does not at all follow, because the powers may overlap. We know that many of the powers do overlap, and that, coming under a different heading and having a different object, it is possible there may be an impinging on some of the subjects in one legislature on the action of the other. But it is not a legislating upon the subject; it is an impinging upon the subject. The great question we have to consider is the passage in the Speech from the Throne, and not the question whether the Local Legislatures cannot legislate. The hon. gentleman proposes we should legislate upon the question, not of policy, but of necessity. He says this is a necessity, because the Local Legislature cannot legislate in this direction, and gives as authority Russell vs. The Queen, though not a word has been said in that about municipal institutions, or the powers exercised by them, or that have been exercised through their medium in many of the Provinces, many long years before the Confederation Act was passed. I maintain that, however you may construe those words, to whatever powers you may consider them to extend, no man will venture to say that the most important ingredient in determining their true construction, and the extent of their powers, is not this very subject to which I have referred. What was done under it before? What was the status quo? What was the municipal legislation of the Provinces? What is the meaning of that term as used in the Confederation Act? It was that which, in the opinion and following the views of the people of the country, at whose instance this Act was passed, was embraced in the term municipal institutions, at the time that Act was passed. Lawyers have said so; jurists have said so; judges have said so, legislators have said so; and I maintain that no man can dispute that proposition. Yet we have not argued it. Yet we have not discussed it. In Russell vs. The Queen it has not been discussed. The hon. gentleman does not discuss it, and he proposes to us this day to assume that there is no such power in the Local Legislatures, without discussion and without decision from any authority on the subject. Now, Sir, reflect for a moment upon what was done under municipal institutions in only one Province. In the old Province of Upper Canada, under municipal institutions before the Confederation Act, these institutions had power to grant tavern licenses, certificates and shop licenses. There was a provision that no tavern license should issue, save on a petition of thirty resident ratepayers, and a report of the inspector as to accommodation; there was a provision that no licenses whatever should issue on agricultural exhibition days, near the ground on which exhibitions were held. There was a power to declare the conditions of tavern licenses; there was a prescription of the minimum accommodation; there was a provision for security; there was a power to limit the number of tavern licenses; there was a maximum number not to exceed one to 250 souls. There was power to regulate licensed places; power to prohibit retail sales in certain places, and to prohibit wholly sales in shops. There was a provision that such a by-law as that should be approved by the legal electors; a provision that all licensed houses should have signs; that shops licensed should not sell for consumption on the premises; a provision restricting the sale and disposal between 7 o'clock on Saturday night and 8 o'clock on Monday morning, or at any other time when any local by-law should prescribe the closing of the house. There was a power to license, regulate and govern keepers of billiard tables and to fix the license fees; there was power to limit the number and to regulate victualing houses, ordinaries, houses where fruit, oysters, clams and victuals were sold to be eaten therein, and all other places for reception or entertainment of the public. There was power to license and to fix a fine therefor; power to prevent, regulate and license exhibitions of wax work, menageries, circus riding and other like shows usually exhibited by showmen, and to fix a license fee not exceeding $100. There was a provision that no such licenses should issue on days of agricultural exhibitions near the grounds. There was a power to license, regulate and govern auctioneers and fix their fees. There was power to license, regulate and govern hawkers or petty chapman and others carrying on petty trades, not residents of the municipality, but who go travelling and to fix their license fees. There was a power to establish markets, to regulate markets, to prevent or regulate the sale by retail in streets of meat, vegetables, fruits or beverages; power to prevent or regulate the buying or selling of articles or animals exposed for sale or marketed; to regulate the place and manner of selling and weighing butcher's meat, fish, hay, straw, fodder, wood and lumber. There was power to prevent forestalling and regulating a monopoly of market grains, meats, fish, fruits, roots, vegetables, poultry and dairy products; to prevent and regulate the purchase of such things by hucksters and runners living in or near the municipality; power to regulate the weighing and measuring of cord wood, coal or other fuel. There was a provision regulating penalties for short weight, count or measurement. There was a provision regulating victuals and other things exposed for sale or market; and for regulating the assize of bread, and preventing the use of deleterious materials. There was a provision preventing and regulating the erection of or contamination from slaughter houses, gas works, tanneries, distilleries or other manufactories or trades which may prove to be miasmous; for preventing persons in streets from importuning travellers and regulating persons so employed; for regulating and licensing owners of livery stables, horses, cabs, &c.; for regulating the keeping and exposing of gun powder and other combustible or dangerous materials; for regulating all magazines for powder, &c., for licensing keepers of intelligence offices, regulating the same, prohibiting the same, and fixing certain license fees. Now I have given you a list, some of them, perhaps, now beyond the jurisdiction of the municipalities, some of which are undoubtedly still within their jurisdiction, and as to some of which it may be questionable whether they are within or without their jurisdiction. But I say these things have to be considered by this Parliament before it assumes to arrogate to itself the power of interfering with the recorded view of what was embraced in municipal institutions and conceded by courts, before they give consideration to that clause of our Constitution. I might go to the other Provinces—to Quebec and some of the other Provinces—and point out other like powers, giving other like indications as to what municipal institutions may be construed to mean. Now it may be ultimately decided, as the hon. gentleman suggests. We cannot tell. I deny his construction of the decision in Russell vs. The Queen, and the argument in Russell vs. The Queen. I have read the stenographer's notes of the whole argument, and it seems to be unfortunate that in a constitutional case of this high consequence, the senior counsel, a man whose knowledge and power and eminence, everybody knows and respects—Mr. Benjamin—should have been absent, and that the brunt of the argument should have been borne by the junior counsel. Mr. Benjamin appears only at the close in delivering a short and concise argument. I say the argument is not satisfactory; and the judgment is not satisfactory, even as far as it goes. But the question is, how far it goes. We are not to take it as far as the hon. gentleman says it is to be taken. The hon. gentleman says no lawyer reading that judgment will come to any other conclusion; he says no layman would come to any other conclusion. But lawyers have come to a different conclusion. Judges have come to a different conclusion, courts have come to a different conclusion; and what the hon. gentleman declares no lawyer would say, some of the highest and most respectable and esteemed Judges of this land have already said. I refer to the case of Three Rivers against Sulte, which was heard before the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec. Present: Dorion, Chief Justice; Monk, Ramsay, Tessier and Baby, Justices. The question was raised in this case, a case in which the learned Judges held over their judgment for a time in order that they might get the full text of the judgment in Russell vs. The Queen, and to see how far it concluded the point which was before them; and with that judgment before them these statements are made. Sub-section 8 to which they refer is that relating to municipal institutions, and this is what they say:

“But we have still to determine another question, whether sub-section 8 does not cover the exercise of the power assumed by the Legislature of Quebec. It may be at once conceded that the prohibitory liquor law is not essential to the existence of municipal institutions, and that consequently, in a very restricted reading of sub-section 8, it would not justify the Local Legislature in passing a prohibitory liquor law. But it may fairly be asked, whether it was the intention of the Imperial Parliament, in an enumeration of this sort, to confine ‘municipal institutions’ to those matters only which are of the essence of municipal institutions? If such was the intention of Parliament, a wide field for speculation was left open, or it was contemplated to restrict municipal institutions within very narrow limits. It would seem, however, we have not to determine what institutions are essential to municipal existence in the abstract, but the meaning of the term at the time of Confederation. In so far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, municipal institutions were the creation of special Statutes. The General Act was passed no longer back than 1855. It was introduced under the title of the Municipal and Road Act. Roads and their maintenance, bridges, ferries, fords, prevention of abuses prejudicial to agriculture, police regulations, and many other matters were subjected to municipal control. Among other things, county councils were given the power to make by-laws for prohibiting and preventing the sale of all spirituous, vinous, alcoholic and intoxicating liquors, or to permit such sale subject to such limitations as they consider expedient. ‘For determining under what restrictions and conditions, and in what manner the Revenue Inspector of the district shall grant licenses to shop-keepers, tavern-keepers, or others, to sell such liquors;’ (see C. S. L. C., cap. 24, sect. 26, s. 11 and 12). In 1857, the city of Three Rivers was incorporated, and as the Municipal and Road Act was repealed, as far as it affected or might affect Three Rivers, the two sub-sections, 11 and 12, above quoted, were reenacted in precisely the same words for the new incorporation. (See 20 Vic., cap. 129, sect. 37, foot of page 493 and 494). These Statutes were in force at the time of Confederation.

“In 1858, an Act was passed styled An Act respecting the Municipal Institutions of Upper Canada; and in that Act powers similar to those just enumerated as being accorded to municipalities in Lower Canada, and to Three Rivers particularly, were given to municipalities in Upper Canada. And this legislation was also in force up to the time of Confederation.

“By the municipal system in force in Nova Scotia, prohibitory powers were possessed by the municipal authorities. As to New Brunswick we have not found any Statute conferring such powers; but at any rate we have the two great Provinces of Confederation and one of the smaller ones persistently including among municipal institutions the right to prohibit the sale of strong drink. We cannot help thinking that this was sufficient to bring prohibitory liquor laws within the powers of local legislation, as forming part of ‘municipal institutions’ within the meaning of the British North America Act. With Chief Justice Richards we think that we ought to look ‘at the state of things existing in the Provinces at the time of passing the British North America Act, and the legislation then in force in the different Provinces on the subject, and the general scope of Confederation then about to take place,’ when determining the value of indefinite terms in the Act. But in the case of the City of Fredericton vs. The Queen, it was decided by the Supreme Court that the Dominion Parliament has alone the power to pass a prohibitory liquor law. It is true this decision goes somewhat beyond the real issue, which is as to the right of the Dominion Parliament to pass a prohibitory liquor law, which is quite a different thing. Still we presume the point was fully argued before the court.”

Then he goes on to say:

“We hold then that under a proper interpretation of sub-section eight, the right to pass a prohibitory liquor law for the purpose of municipal institutions has been reserved to the Local Legislatures by the British North America Act.

“We have suspended our judgment in this case for an unusual length of time, awaiting the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Russell vs. The Queen, in the hope that we might find some rule authoritatively laid down, which might help us in adjudicating on this case, and in that of Hamilton vs. The Township of Kingsey. In this we have been to some extent disappointed. Their lordships have remained strictly within the issue submitted to them, and have held that the Canada Temperance Act of 1878 does not interfere with sub-sections 9, 13 and 16, of section 92, British North America Act; that it is an Act dealing with public wrongs rather than with civil rights, that it is a matter of general and not merely of a local or a private nature in the Province, and that if it affects the revenues of a Province it is only incidentally. We need hardly say that this is only a very brief summary of their lordships' argument, but their reasoning will command general assent, not only owing to the source from which it comes, but also from its cogency. The Judicial Committee then lays down that the Dominion can pass a general prohibitory liquor law; it has specially declined to lay down any rule as to the other sub-sections, than those submitted, and the one alluded to by Chief Justice Ritchie; and therefore it has not either expressly, or by implication, maintained that the Dominion Parliament can alone pass a prohibitory liquor law, or rather a liquor law which is prohibitory, except under certain conditions, as for instance, subject to a license for the purpose of revenue.”

There you find a declaration which goes far beyond this case, because this is a declaration dealing with the judgment of this court as to whether the decision in Russell vs. The Queen had settled the question, whether a Local Legislature might pass a law allowing municipalities absolutely to prohibit the sale of liquor; while what we have to deal with is, not as to whether the case of Russell vs. The Queen had decided that, but whether it had decided, what was not before it, that a Local Legislature cannot pass a law empowering municipal institutions to regulate and restrict, though not to prohibit, the sale of alcoholic liquors, and to issue licenses for that purpose. Yet you find a unanimous judgment by the highest court of the neighboring Province, against the proposition of the hon. gentleman, affirmed after an extended deliberation and postponement of the decision, for the express purpose that Russell vs. The Queen had decided the larger and a fortiori the smaller and narrower point on which this particular controversy turns. Once again, take the highest court of Ontario. I find a decision was reached on 30th June last, after the decision in Russell vs. The Queen—though I do not place any stress on that point, for I do not find that the decision of the Privy Council in Russell vs. The Queen is alluded to in the judgment, and therefore, I assume the Judges had not the decision before them; but it was given after the decision given in the Supreme Court, which dealt with the whole question—that in a judgment given in a case analogous to this, the Chief Justice of Ontario makes statements which are of the highest consequence in determining whether the hon. leader of the Government is right in the proposition on which he bases this paragraph in the Speech, or rather the right which is asserted in that paragraph, that it is established by Russell vs. The Queen that no right in any sense exists on the part of Local Legislatures to make laws restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors and regulating the issue of licenses. Chief Justice Spragge says :

"Looking at the classes of subjects, legislation upon which is committed exclusively to the Provinces, it is very apparent that it was intended that their Legislatures should possess very large and ample powers in relation to all subjects of a local and domestic nature. They had possessed plenary powers upon these subjects before Confederation, and the general scheme of Confederation seems to have been to leave to them the plenary control of these subjects. They were, under the Act, legislative in regard to these subjects in the true and full sense of the term. This is the more apparent from the use of the words 'exclusive' and 'exclusively' (and they are used repeatedly) in the Imperial Act. Other legislation upon these classes of subjects is excluded. No alteration, no amendment, no perfecting of any measure falling within these classes of subjects can be made by any authority outside of the Provincial Legislature.

"We have the high authority of Vattel upon the same point. He says, Book 2, Chapter 17, Section 285, 6: 'The most important rule in cases of this nature is, that a constitution of Government does not, and cannot, from its nature, depend in any great degree upon verbal criticism, or upon the import of single words. Such criticism may not be wholly without use; it may sometimes illustrate or unfold the appropriate sense; but unless it stand well with the context and subject matters, it must yield to the latter. While then we may well resort to the meaning of single words to assist our enquiries, we should never forget that it is an instrument of Government we are to construe; and as has already been stated, that must be the truest exposition which best harmonizes with the design, its objects, and its general structure.'

"One other consideration presents itself, which is to my mind conclusive. This matter of licensing, and of the regulation of places, and persons licensed, pertains to municipal institutions, and is moreover of a local nature. Now, the making of laws in relation to both these objects being committed exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures and legislation by any other power being thereby excluded, it follows that the British North America Act operates to withdraw from legislative control by any power or body whatever, the licensing and the regulation of places and persons licensed; powers in regard to which they have therefore unquestionably exercised. The effect in that case would be more and other than a distribution of legislative power, it would be an extinction of legislative power in regard to subjects which up to Confederation had been subjects of Provincial legislation."

Once again he says :

"It is important to bear in mind that the Imperial Parliament in committing to the Provincial Legislatures the making of laws in relation to municipal institutions committed to them as a subject of legislation that which was, as it then stood, and had stood for a number of years, wholly a subject of delegated power from the general Legislature. The power was conferred in as broad and comprehensive terms as possible, 'To make terms in relation to.' That necessarily imported ex vi termini power to change the laws in relation to that subject; and as long as the changes made were changes only in municipal institutions they were within the power. In the then Province of Upper Canada at the date of Confederation, township councils, county councils, city councils, and boards of police commissioners, were all parts of the machinery which, to take as an instance the county of York, constituted a municipal institution. Great changes might be made in all these pieces of machinery; their powers and duties might be changed; some parts might be left out e.g. township councils, or county councils, or boards of commissioners, as making the machinery too cumbrous or too complicated, or for any other reason; and the powers and duties exercised by those left out might be committed to those remaining, or to some new boards or other pieces of machinery substituted for them. I cannot see how it would be ultra vires the Provincial Legislature to make all these changes, provided they were changes only in relation to municipal institutions."

Then, in the other case which was decided at the same time, the same learned Judge says :

"The conviction in this case is for the keeping by the defendant of manufactured liquors at his house in the town of Chatham, for the purpose of bartering, selling or trading therein, in that license; and it appearing that the defendant had been previously convicted of the like offence, the defendant was adjudged for his second offence to be imprisoned at hard labor for three months.

"The Statute under which the defendant was convicted, warrants the conviction and the sentence. This is not disputed, but it is objected that it was ultra vires the Legislature of Ontario to pass the Act, under which the defendant was convicted, it being, as is alleged, an Act which deals with trade and commerce, and, further, that assuming the Act not to be objectionable on that ground, it is ultra vires in so far as it imposes hard labor in the imprisonment, as the punishment for the offence committed.

"In the court appealed from, the case was argued wholly on the point as to the power of the Legislature to impose hard labor, and in the argument on appeal, the other point was so faintly touched upon by Dr. McMichael that I took him to be rather suggesting whether the provision for breach of which defendant was convicted might not be ultra vires, than contending that it was so. I think it quite clearly a matter intra vires the Provincial Legislature. It is, I think, clearly so as a matter of police regulation, and being so, falls within one of the enumerated classes, viz., 'municipal institutions.'

"With regard to the point made in argument that Clause 9 authorizes legislation in relation to shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses, only in order to the raising of a revenue, I observe that, in several of the reported cases, it has been assumed that the power to legislate in regard to licenses is limited by the purpose indicated in Clause 9. It does not appear to me that that was the purpose of Clause 9. The power of licensing shops, saloons, taverns and auctioneers, and granting some other licenses, existed in municipal bodies at the date of Confederation, and that power passed to the Provincial Legislatures under Clause 8. If Clause 9 is to be read, as it is assumed that it should be read, it abridges the power conferred by Clause 8 and would limit the power to legislate in relation to these licenses to cases in which they were necessary in order to the raising of revenue, however necessary such legislation might be, in the cases of houses of public entertainment, to the prevention of intemperance and the preservation of order.

"My interpretation of Clause 9 is that it is cumulative to Clause 8, and that it was intended to authorize Provincial legislation (or at least to settle any doubts that might exist upon the point) in relation to the licenses enumerated, for the purpose of raising revenue, as well as for the regulation of matters of police. I have hesitated in placing this construction upon Clause 9, because, so far as I am aware, the more limited construction placed upon it in the earlier cases after Confederation has been generally accepted as the correct interpretation of the clause; but I am unable myself to concur in that construction."

And here, Sir, Mr. Justice Burton, the only other Judge who has delivered judgment in this case, concurring, points out :

"The powers claimed to be exercised by the Provincial Legislature in the present case, must depend upon the construction to be placed on sub-sections 8, 13, and 16, of section 92, for I agree with the learned Chief Justice, that a right to license an employment does not imply a right to charge a license fee therefor, with a view to revenue, unless such seems to be the manifest purpose of the power. The right to restrict parties by requiring a license must be sought for under the sections I have referred to, and not under sub-section 9, which was passed, not for the purpose of conferring the power to issue licenses, but to enable the Provinces by that means to raise a revenue for provincial, local or municipal purposes. The only power of taxation given by that section is that of direct taxation, which section was intended to allow them in this particular, made to raise a revenue by indirect taxation. The other sections vest in them the power to make laws in relation to municipal institutions, property and civil rights, the imposition of punishment in the manner specified for enforcing any law of the Province, made in reference to any of the classes of subjects under section 92, and the general power as to all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province.

"At the time of Confederation, the Municipal Institutions Act of 1866, was in force, and under it the municipal councils were empowered to pass by-laws and to fix the punishment within certain defined limits for their infraction. To the Police Commissioners had been transferred a power formerly vested in the council to pass by-laws regulating taverns, and to prohibit the sale of liquors without licenses; but no power was given at that time to the commissioners to enforce the performance of these by-laws by fine or otherwise, and by section 129 of the British North America Act, this law was continued in force until repealed or altered by the appropriate legislation.

"It was at that time dealt with by the Parliament of the Province of Canada, as coming within what were known as municipal institutions, the power of dealing with which is now within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provinces; and it would certainly come within the general clause, which confers exclusive powers on the Provincial Legislature to deal with matters of a merely local or private nature, and does not fall within any of the subjects with which the Dominion Parliament has power to deal, unless perhaps by a general measure affecting the whole Dominion, which has not been done.

"We accordingly find the Local Legislature dealing with it in 1867, and giving power to the commissioners to attach penalties for the infraction of their by-laws in the manner and to the extent that by-laws of the City Council might be enforced under the Municipal Act of 1866, and the same powers and duties as the learned Chief Justice has pointed out have been transferred to the Board of License Commissioners."

And once again, the same learned Judge says :

"I was somewhat surprised that we were again pressed with the argument that the Liquor License Act was ultra vires as dealing with trade and commerce, an argument which, if pressed to its logical conclusion, would effectually preclude the Local Legislatures from dealing with any particular trade or business within the Province; and the Privy Council have decided that the words are not to be regarded in any such contracted sense, but to refer to political arrangements in regard to trade, requiring the sanction of Parliament regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and possibly general regulations of trade affecting the whole Dominion."

Now, Sir, I have read the language, the latest language, which is given in the two courts of the highest authority in the Provinces; and we learn that while sitting here—while we are deliberating upon the passage in the Speech from the Throne, which declares the interpretation of His

Excellency's advisers as to the true meaning, effect, and extent of the decision in Russell vs. The Queen—we learn that close to this Chamber the body composing the judicial department of this Government, that the body authorized finally within this country, at any rate, to decide on this subject, has had the same question before it; and that the expressions of the Judges in the course of the argument have been altogether opposed to the view that the decision in Russell vs. The Queen bears any such construction as has been placed upon it by the Government. We have, of course, no decision in that case, and we know not what it may be. As I said the other day, what a Judge says in the course of an argument does not give an inevitable clue to his ultimate judgment; but so far in reading the detached utterances of the Judges, I am told that their utterances the other day were wholly opposed to the view taken by the Government on the question of the judgment in Russell vs. the Queen. As I have said, Sir, it may be decided as the hon. gentleman suggests. The hon. gentleman comes not to Parliament upon his own interpretation of the law, but he comes to Parliament basing his whole defence for laying his hand upon this subject of legislation upon the proposition that it has already been decided finally, conclusively, and irrevocably, upon full argument, and after full consideration of all the points, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Russell vs. The Queen. Are we to take the hon. gentleman's word, or the word of the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec? Are we to take the hon. gentleman's word for that, without a word of argument, without a statement, without his reasons? Are we to take his ipse dixit against the regular and deliberate judgment of the Judges of the law—of those to whom is specially designed the interpretation of legal documents? Their function in interpreting the Constitution, is one which I do not regard myself with quite as high respect as their discharge of their other functions, just because a written Constitution is an instrument which is to be construed in a peculiar manner and with peculiar considerations; but if you come and ask me, where shall I point you to the fittest source of information as to the effect and meaning of judgments of the court, and what they had decided by a judgment, then I would say, go to the courts and Judges and obtain what you want to find through them—what they meant by their judgment. In these countries in which the law is based on decisions reached in the past, and by comparing former decisions, we go to the authorized exponents of judgments if we want to know what their judgments were, and what they decide; and it is by going to the authorized exponents of judgments that we find out the reasons on which their decisions are based. But the hon. First Minister, in reference to this matter of policy, when asked by what authority he has seized upon this question, and brought it here, tells us: "No; I was not willing—I was unwilling to do this; but I am forced to take this step; it is the force of necessity which has compelled me to do so; I am driven to it by the judgment in Russell vs. The Queen." But he does not argue, he does not tell, he does not prove to you how the decision in Russell vs. The Queen says this. Which way will an intelligent and candid member of Parliament, who is going to give his vote on the merits of the question, decide? Will he decide as the Judges of the courts have decided in these cases, or will he say: "Well, I give great weight and credit to the statement of the hon. First Minister, unsupported by argument—I am prepared to vote with him—though he does not give a word to show why I should support his view of the case." But as it has not been actually decided, will he not rather hold his judgment in suspense until we have a decision in which this great vital question—this question of vast consequence and magnitude—this question of the true interpretation of the clause of the Constitution with reference to our municipal institutions—has been decided in the court of last resort. For myself, I never will consent that one of the greatest powers given to the Provinces shall be swept away by a court before whom this question of our municipal institutions was not argued or considered, before whom it was not contended that our powers in that respect were in question, and of which they knew no more than the messengers at the Table—

 —I will not consent that the Parliament of this country shall, without my protest, arrogate to itself the power to take away from the Provinces that great right until we find, on full argument and consideration, that such is the meaning of our Constitution. When I do find that such a power no longer remains to us—if that evil day should come—it will not be the first case in which it has been found that this Constitution—and perhaps in this very instance by virtue of the alteration made in the Quebec resolutions at Westminster—is not answering the expectations and beliefs of the people. It may be found, at the end of fifteen or sixteen years that the Provinces have less power under their municipal institutions than they have been supposed to have up to this time; and a great question will then arise—the question of what are we to do? Is the Constitution unalterable, though it disappoints the expectations of those who framed it—though its interpretation differs from the practices we have been pursuing under it for the past sixteen years? Are we to arrogate this power, or should we now rather propose that the Constitution shall be amended and made conformable to the original understanding with which it was adopted, and according to which we have been practising under it since it was first passed in the different Legislatures? Now, Sir, it is very clear to me that this great question of what is the true interpretation of our Constitution, and the great political question upon which we are to decide during this Session in a very important branch, has not been settled for us. It is very clear to me that we have to decide it for ourselves now, upon argument, if we are going to decide it this Session at all. It is clear to me that we must debate and discuss the hon. gentleman's fundamental proposition—that we cannot give him his axiom—that we cannot allow him his postulate—that we cannot allow that the decision in Russell vs. The Queen decides that it is beyond the power of the Local Legislatures to give the municipalities power to regulate the sale of liquor. I say nothing about prohibition, because that is not in question; but I think it is clear that we have to settle the question, if we are going to legislate. The hon. gentleman says, I would not legislate at all unless it was demonstrated by the courts of last resort that it was necessary for us to legislate; and if I have shown you that it was not necessary, then the necessity ends, the case for legislation ends. But if, on the other hand, the hon. gentleman proposes as a matter of policy to bring forward a matter of this kind for the good of the country, then, I say, we have to ascertain what the meaning of our Constitution is—whether we have the power to act legislatively in this matter, or whether that power is with the Local Legislatures. Shall we remit to a Select Committee struck by this House the decision of the question as to what the meaning and true interpretation of our Constitution is? Shall we send up stairs to a Committee for a decision of that great question, and the decision of that other great political question which is involved, namely, if the Constitution means so-and-so, will you act upon the interpretation, or propose an amendment to it? Will you propose a change in accordance with the general understanding of that Constitution and the practices which have been followed many years under it, or will you assume to continue the power, which, according to your view of the Constitution, is vested in you now? These are grave and serious questions—questions eminently fitted for discussion, and deliberation, and argument here, in the full Parliament, where every member of Parliament can attend to it, and form his own judgment as to the meaning of the Constitution, and as to what should be the policy of Parliament with reference to that Constitution. What are you to go to a Committee for? Have we not got members in the Cabinet competent to deal with all sides of this question? Have we not a Minister of Finance able to present to the Privy Council the temperance view of the question? Have we not in him one who has identified himself zealously and ardently with that question for many years, to point out in the Privy Council what the interests of morality and temperance require? Have we not a Postmaster General, a member of a benevolent association, a member of the Licensed Victuallers Association, to see fair play between the conflicting interests, from his side of the question? Cannot he point out to the right hon. gentleman who sits above him all the arguments that go to support his side of the case, so that he may see every side of it; and have we not got others in the Cabinet able to take a large and impartial view of the question? Some of them no doubt would be apt to say of these two great interests:

“How happy would I be with either,
Were t’other dear charmer away;”

while others, taking a more philosophic view of the question, would say to the licensed victuallars: “Well there is a great deal of good in spirits, but would not water—a little water, improve them;” and to the temperance men, water is an excellent thing, but would not you improve it by adding a little, just a little spirits, and so make a mixture on which the moderate temperance member might go forward. We have every shade of opinion in the Cabinet; we have all sorts of law of wisdom, of constitutional resources, and we have the power to declare dogmatically and emphatically what the meaning of Russell vs. The Queen is, and yet they can do nothing. What are we to go to a Committee for? I say that a Select Committee appointed to enquire into the facts in a matter which was not in this shape at all, might sometimes be admissible.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the University of Saskatchewan, and to authorize the establishment of colleges within the limits of the Diocese of Saskatchewan.

Motion, agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the second clause,

Mr. BLAKE. A very serious question arises upon this clause, and I have given notice of a motion to amend it on the third reading; but it may be just as well—as the hon. gentleman who promotes the Bill is moving to amend it in the contrary direction—that I should state the position I take. I think it is not at all unreasonable that corporations of this description should have every facility for obtaining, by gifts from the benevolent and otherwise, endowments in the shape of land. Land may be said to be in a certain sense the currency of that country, and when we give these corporations power in the older Provinces to take land endowments, I see no reason why we should not permit the same thing in the North-West; but I want to see the currency of the country continue currency. The proposal in this Bill, that the corporation may hold lands equally, at its own calculation, to a value of $1,250,000, seems to me to be highly objectionable. The limitation is that the revenue from the moveable property of the corporation shall not exceed $50,000 a year, calculated at 4 per cent. per annum upon the value of that property, which is equal to $1,250,000. Under that, there is no restriction. But what I regard as serious is, not the amount, but the time during which the corporation is allowed to lock up the lands. I maintain that a period should be fixed within which it should be incumbent upon the corporation to part with all its lands that are not required by it for its own purposes. I have no objection to its holding lands for the college, professors' residences, play-grounds, or other necessary purposes; but I object to the principle of holding land in mortmain being applied extensively in the North-West. In the Province of Ontario, twelve or fourteen years ago, we laid down for ourselves a rule by which I think we have since been guided—certainly for four or five years. We made no limit as to the amount that a corporation might hold for its own purposes, nor any limit to the amount it might acquire as an endowment; but we provided that all lands not required for its own purposes should be parted with within seven years so that it could not be held any longer than seven years. At the suggestion of some hon. gentlemen—though I myself do not much favor the motion—I have proposed the amendment of which I have given notice, a term of ten years, or three more than the seven which has been the rule in Ontario since the time to which I refer. What I want to submit is, we have now got to lay down the principle that whatever is done with this must be done with all other corporations. Are we going to adopt the principle of allowing landed estates to be indefinitely held in mortmain in the North-West, or establish a reasonable period of time within which such landed endowment shall be converted into money or good securities, and that stagnation which results from holding a quantity of land in mortmain be at least mitigated, if not entirely prevented?

Bill reported.

INCORPORATION OF THE OBLATS FATHERS.

Mr. ROYAL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 19) to incorporate “Les Révérends Pères Oblats de Marie Immaculée des Territoires du Nord-Ouest.”

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I make the same observations in reference to this Bill that I did in reference to the other. I intend to move a similar amendment in reference to this.

Bill reported.

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 51) to amend the Act to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (limited), said: The hon. member for West Durham, the other evening, when this Bill was up for the second reading, made some objections in reference to it. I have since looked into the matter, and I learn that the alterations proposed by this Bill are necessary to carry out the work, and do not in any way interfere with the Government subsidy which is conditional on the completion of the work; and the hon. Minister of Railways has, I understand, no objections to the Bill.

Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 53) to declare the meaning and effect of certain provisions of the Act to incorporate the London and Ontario Investment Company (limited.)—(Mr. Hay.)

Bill (No. 76) to amend the Act intituled: An Act to incorporate the Northern, North-Western and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company, and to change the name of the said Company to the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Davis and Lawrence Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 80) to amend the Act incorporating the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. BLAKE. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was saying that the Select Committee now proposed was not warranted, as I judged, by precedent in several respects. The hon. gentleman pointed out the necessity of a Select Committee of members, because, he said, the laws of the different Provinces in this particular respect differ somewhat, and it was well to collate them. The hon. gentleman himself has had to deal on former occasions with the varying laws of the Provinces when he thought Dominion legislation was necessary—not the laws as to one particular matter, not the laws as to one small subject heretofore supposed to be of Local legislation, not the laws as to one isolated question upon which there had been legislation in the various Provinces—but to take the whole body of the Criminal Law as it stood in the four Provinces of which Confederation was formed—or three Provinces, because, of course, the old Province of Canada had its own Criminal Law. The hon. gentleman did not propose to us a Select Committee to discharge the duty of investigating into the various Provincial laws upon crimes, seeing what their customs were, seeing what the mode was in which they had dealt with various crimes, and so avoiding the necessary preliminary steps to Parliamentary action through the medium of a Select Committee of members of Parliament. He took other steps. He took steps analogous to those which I referred to in the earlier part of this discussion. He secured the attention of his deputies, and, I believe, another learned person—I think the Law Clerk—and they looked into the Criminal Laws of the various Provinces, and brought down an amended Statute upon the Criminal Law, assimilating them and making them such as the hon. gentleman thought they ought to be, and as he proposed on behalf of the Government that Parliament should agree they should be. But now, Sir, having dealt with that subject without a Select Committee, having been able to inform his mind and the minds of his colleagues as to what all the Criminal Laws of all the Provinces are, some sudden paralysis has seized the Government, which prevents them from enquiring and ascertaining for themselves what the Provincial Laws are upon this single isolated question the License Laws. But, Sir, it is not to find the facts, it is to legislate. The paragraph which has been read, and which is referred to us, declares that legislation is necessary; and that the Government is committed; and it sends that declared necessity to a Committee with instructions to do what is necessary, and to report—by Bill or otherwise—in some way what that necessary legislation is to be. It is, therefore, a Select Committee to decide what the legislation upon this subject ought to be. There is, then, to my mind, another breach of our well understood constitutional principles in avoiding the proper share of Ministerial responsibility in the proposal to send the subject to a Select Committee to be chosen in this House, to submit to them the duty of framing a measure which ought to be brought in here by the Government on its own responsibility, and dealt with as a Government Bill. There is another point on which a Committee is wrong, and it is one to which I have already alluded. I have pointed out that they must necessarily enquire into the meaning of our Constitution, and the proper course to be taken with reference to our Constitution. It is contrary to precedent—unconstitutional in the sense in which we sometimes use that term—to send an enquiry as to the basis and meaning of our Constitution, and the policy we ought to adopt on a constitutional question, to be disposed of by a Select Committee, instead of upon the floor of this House. Nor is the excuse of an open question a valid one. The Government does not treat this as an open question. They declare that they are agreed that legislation is necessary; they declare that they alone have the power. I have shown that they have given different indications at different times that they are framing a measure, and have given some indications as to what the leading features of that measure shall be, therefore, there is no excuse of that kind possible, nor even advanced. Now, Sir, this question is one of a character not new to this House. We know very well that while my hon. friend from East York was in power, the hon. gentlemen now in power, and then in Opposition, were extremely anxious that the temperance question should be dealt with. Time after time they called for the temperance question to be dealt with. Did they propose a Select Committee to be struck to lay out the bases of a measure—to decide which were the different laws in the different Provinces affecting liquor legislation, and to frame a Bill for a resolution? Did they then think what was the true relation of this House to the Executive, and of the Executive to this House, on a subject like this? Not so, Sir. I have here the record of what their views were. I have here the recorded motion, which, in the year 1877, was moved by them from this side of the House, by the present Senator Schultz, and it was this:

"That in the opinion of this House a prohibitory liquor law is the only effective remedy for the evil of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure at the earliest moment practicable."

Then they came forward boldly—even when in Opposition—not having any Ministerial responsibility. They had no doubt at all of where the responsibility for legislation rested; they had no proposal to refer it to a Select Committee, struck from both sides of the House, to point out what all the Provincial Laws were and what the Dominion legislation should be. Oh, no! Their motions were clear, and precise, and positive, and they laid it down as axiomatic, that it was the duty of the Government, at the earliest possible moment, to bring in a measure; and when an amendment was moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex, who pointed out that the time was not ripe, and that the true interest of the cause would not be advanced by legislation at that time, they pooh-pooed the amendment, they said it was a sham, that he was playing into the hands of the Government to relieve them from a difficulty, and they voted it down like men, determined, as they were, to insist that this question should be dealt with then and not later, and dealt with by the Government upon the responsibility of the Government by themselves introducing a measure. Well, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) thought the time was not ripe for the introduction of a measure, but in the following year he thought the time was ripe. Did he then, as the head of the Government, propose that a Select Committee should be struck from both sides to find out what the Provincial Laws were on the subject, and evolve from their collective wisdom a measure which might be submitted to Parliament, made up of hodge-podge, of notions taken some from one man, some from another, and for which no member and no Government was responsible? Not so. He introduced into the Speech from the Throne the statement that a measure was necessary; and the right hon. gentleman in replying during the debate on the Address, spoke thus, with respect to the clauses:

"Another clause states that it is very desirable there should be uniform legislation in all the Provinces respecting the traffic in spirituous liquors. I am very glad the Government is going to bring the subject up before the House. It is a subject of the utmost importance, and should be treated with due consideration of all the difficulties which surround the question. I hope the hon. the Premier will overcome all these difficulties, and I hope that he will not be deterred from carrying out any views on the subject at which he may arrive, by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I hope that the hon. the Premier will have the opportunity now, and will embrace the opportunity now—he has embraced the opportunity, but I hope he will see it carried out, and that he will not allow the hon. member for West Middlesex, as he has been doing for the last two Sessions whenever any attempt has been made to deal with the question, to set it aside by a motion. I hope the hon. the Premier has taken this opportunity to free himself from the trammels of his followers, and will press for a total abolition, which was always his first love, and to which he recently told the people he was strongly attached himself."

My hon. friend did not propose that this House should relegate the subject to a Select Committee, but he caused a Bill to be brought in in the other branch of the Legislature on the responsibility of the Government. It was carried through that House, and through this House, and it was thus that it became the law of the land. Amendments have been required to that Act since. As in most great Statutes, difficulties unforeseen by the House and the draughtsmen have arisen, and the necessary amendments have not been obtained. Why? Because the hon. gentleman, the First Minister, has not dealt with the question on the same principle as did my hon. friend, because the Government have not insisted on taking control of the amendment, and doing what was necessary to perfect the law, and with the force and strength of the Government controlling their followers to such an extent as to render possible the adoption of amendments to those parts of the measure which were defective. And even to-day I observe the temperance organizations are calling upon the Government to introduce amendatory legislation to the Scott Act, that they have presented the case to the hon. gentleman, and he has it now, where the Government have so many things "under consideration." The temperance organizations know—and I would impress it on all true friends of temperance in this House, on whichever side they sit—that the only effective way in which the necessary amendments will be made to the Act is by the course they have pursued, to call on the Government to undertake, on their own responsibility, to bring in the necessary legislation and press it with all the force, power and influence at their command. They have invited the Government to take that course and assume that responsibility; but in that respect the hon. gentleman has not yet decided to assume any responsibility, and on this—respecting which he rose to a position of assuming responsibility, and arrogated to himself and the Government power some time ago—he now proposes to evade, so far as to shirk Ministerial responsibility and try to have a measure cooked up by a Select Committee in a small room in the building; and if it should prove good, it would be claimed as the hon. gentleman's measure, and if objectionable, as a measure which the Opposition had much more to do with than the Government. I condemn that course of procedure as wholly unconstitutional. That term in our Parliamentary practice has two meanings. I have been using it in one of them already. We have a Constitution partly written and partly unwritten. When speaking of our written Constitution we use the term "unconstitutional," as expressly suggesting that the subject is beyond our legislative power, outside our constitutional right as written down in the bond, as named in the instrument, and as something which we cannot do if we would. But there is a part, and a large part of the Constitution which is unwritten, that part which regulates the responsibilities and relations of Parliament to the Executive, of Parliament to the Ministers, and of the Ministers to the Crown; and it is the few words which refer us to the principles of the British Constitution, or the practice based upon them, which govern and control us with respect to that very large and important part of our Constitution. When we deal with the word "unconstitutional" in this sense, it is, of course, doubly important to look at the practice and the precedents. It is said by a high legal authority that custom is the very best interpreter of the law, even of the written law; but in a law like this, to which we are now appealing, our unwritten constitution, precedent is of double consequence, because it is not merely the interpreter of the law, it is the law itself. The law is made up of custom and precedent. I have no doubt there is convenience and inconvenience attributable to such a Constitution: The convenience of elasticity and development, the inconvenience of vagueness and uncertainty, and of your being obliged to grope sometimes in order to find what the true principle is; and you find it, not from an authoritative assertion based on a Statute or written paper, but from the mine of precedent and wisdom in which you dig in order to ascertain the truth. Now custom is, as I have said, the best interpreter of the law, and if you find that we have been carrying on business here for some fifteen or sixteen years, we have been holding our annual Sessions of Parliament during that time, that it was our annual business to legislate upon subjects of all description, and that we have a custom, practice and rules of our own, I say that is very good light as to what our constitutional rule is. What inference do I draw from our practice? The inference I draw—from the fact that what is now proposed has not hitherto been perpetrated during the fifteen or sixteen Sessions of the Canadian Parliament—is that it is unprecedented; it is certainly new, and requires explanation, defence and vindication, before we should be called upon to adopt it. A Ministerial measure, declared by the hon. Ministers themselves to be necessary, has up to this time been brought forward by hon. Ministers on their responsibility, either by resolution or Bill, as the nature of the subject required; but it has not been customary to refer to a Select Committee, struck from both sides of the House, a Ministerial measure. If, Sir, desuetude in constitutional practice abrogates—as unquestionably it does—that which at an earlier period of our Parliamentary history was a living and vital principle, and freely exercised, surely still greater weight should be attached to the utter absence of precedent or authority for the step proposed. We know what happened in reference to the veto power in England, where, no law has been passed in that country by the three estates of the realm, depriving the Crown of the power to negative Acts of Parliament, the utter absence of the use of this power has for a long time prevented the assertion of that right; and high constitutional authorities hold that it has fallen into such desuetude in the practice of the Constitution, that not only in an ordinary case, nothing could warrant the revival of the pretension, but that if an Act was passed to cut off the Queen's head, she would be bound to sign it. If such be the case then, what shall be said of this step for which there is an utter absence of precedent? And if we turn to that Assembly, from which we derive our inspiration upon these subjects, and where we observe the growth and development of constitutional principles and practice, in modern as well as in ancient days, you will find it, on the authority of eminent men, I think, conclusively proved, that to proceed by resolution in such a case as this, is adverse to the principles of the Constitution, and wholly without precedent. I will refer to an attempt made in the Imperial Parliament in connection with the Reform Bill resolution in 1867, which was proposed by the Government of Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli leading at the time the House of Commons. That proposition was, however, one which was not so objectionable as this, because it was proposed that the House should go into Committee to consider certain vague and abstract resolutions purposely so drawn that the Government could not be committed to any particular proposition; and with the avowed object of the Government ascertaining from the Committee of the Whole what sort of a measure the House would approve of. There was no proposition to refer the question to a Select Committee, but it was proposed to refer it to the whole body of the House. Now, Mr. Disraeli, when he made that proposal, felt that it was a proposal that required a special justification. He felt that it was a proposal which, upon the face of it, abnegated Ministerial responsibility, contrary to all constitutional custom, and was not defensive unless peculiar circumstances should be shown which would warrant it, and he endeavored to show that such circumstances existed. I appeal to that high constitutional authority therefore, although in this particular case he was proposing what I believe to be a violation of the Constitution. Mr. Disraeli referred to the language of the Speech in which, in somewhat unusual terms, Her Majesty was advised to express the hope that the deliberations of Parliament would be conducted in a spirit of moderation and of mutual forbearance, which might lead to the adoption of a certain measure. Mr. Disraeli proceeds:

"Sir, the meaning that they attribute to those words is that, under the circumstances in which the House finds itself, it was in our opinion expedient that Parliamentary reform should no longer be a question which should decide the fate of Ministries. Sir, we have arrived at that conclusion with the conviction that it is one consistent with our duty and our honor as public men, and we hope that the House of Commons, notwithstanding that expression of opinion from a very limited quarter, after due consideration, will also be of opinion that such a course is compatible on their part with all those principles and all those sentiments that ought to influence public men. And, Sir, we have arrived at that conclusion, that it is not for the advantage of the country that Parliamentary reform should be a question that should decide the fate of a Ministry, that it should not be what is commonly called a party question, for this simple but to us irresistible reason, that all parties in the State have attempted to deal with it, and all parties in the State have failed. In 1852 there was a pure Whig Government, headed by Lord John Russell, which dealt with this subject and failed. In the year 1854 there was a Coalition Government, headed by the Earl of Aberdeen, which attempted to deal with this question and failed. In the year 1859 there was a Conservative Government, headed by the Earl of Derby, which attempted to deal with this question and failed. In the year 1860 there was a moderate Liberal Government, headed by Lord Palmerston, which attempted to deal with this question and failed. In the year 1866 there was a Government which I will not, notwithstanding the present rage for analysis, describe as an immoderate Liberal Government—headed again by Earl Russell—which attempted to deal with this question and failed."

One other reason which Mr. Disraeli gave for adopting the proposal—for he was unsuccessful in procuring the adoption of this exceptional course—was this:

"The origin of Parliamentary reform as a question in the House of Commons must be found in the conduct of individuals—of independent members of this House. This, therefore, is a House of Commons question: it is not a party question. And it is remarkable that the House of Commons, having been the originators of the disturbance of the settlement of 1832, have defeated every attempt that has been made by organized parties, by responsible bodies of men, and by leaders of political connections, to effect a settlement of a question which was then unsettled."

Once again, he says:

"It does seem to us that this is, from the causes that I have recapitulated, one of those cases—of great difficulty, no doubt, and surrounded by circumstances of exigency which cannot be denied—which have been contemplated by the wisdom of our Parliamentary practice; and that we are pursuing only a constitutional course when we presume to recommend to the House that before we introduce a Bill we may be permitted, upon its main principles, and upon other points of great and paramount importance, to ask the opinion of the House, and see whether they will sanction the course which we recommend. That, Sir, is a course which we believe to be, under the circumstances, strictly constitutional. It is a course which we believe ought not to be resorted to, unless the circumstances are circumstances of exigency."

Once again, speaking of this same constitutional objection, the same eminent man says:

"Sir, I will not notice the first and sovereign objection which may be urged, under ordinary circumstances, to a proposition of proceeding by way of resolution in this House; because, if the circumstances to which I have now fully adverted, if the relations of the House to this subject of Parliamentary reform, if the necessity of bringing this question to a settlement, are not sufficient, I have no arguments to urge. But there are other objections to that course which have been offered, and on which for a moment I will dwell."

Sovereign objections he calls them. Then he goes on to say:

"It is said that there are disadvantages in proceeding by way of resolution, independent of the great constitutional objection which nothing but exigency could override.

Now, Sir, I think I have established very plainly, by these citations, that Mr. Disraeli—when he thought it his duty to propose on behalf of the Ministry that the House of Commons should deal with resolutions, to which the Government did not commit itself, and should evolve from its own operation a measure, which they might assent to, but for which they would have no Ministerial responsibility. Mr. Disraeli conceded that that was a proposition to which there were sovereign objections, which he was obliged to defend by providing some special and peculiar circumstances which warranted, in his opinion, a departure from the ordinary constitutional course. How was he met, Sir? He was met by observations which it seems to me place this matter in a proper point of view—observations so cogent that they were irresistible—observations so cogent that the Government found itself obliged to abandon its plan and proceed in the ordinary way by the introduction of a Bill. Mr. Lowe, the present Lord Sherbrook, said:

"Surely if Governments with majorities, and Governments with minorities, have alike tried and have alike failed, the House ought not therefore to relax the Parliamentary safeguard it possesses—the power of holding the Ministry responsible for failure, the proper check on rash and ill-considered undertakings. If men undertake such a task, who have not the strength or the union to carry it through, I think we should not unduly endeavor to discourage them; but I can imagine nothing more unreasonable, in a matter of such grave importance, than to relax those safeguards which are of the highest possible value to us and to our posterity, relating to a question which ought to be entered on with the greatest deliberation, and with all the calmness, wisdom, experience, and moderation that can be given to it."

He goes on to say, in another passage:

"Look at the constitutional relation existing between the House and the Executive Government. It was only the happy obstinacy of William III, which prevented the Executive Government from being altogether excluded from the House; but on the terms upon which it has remained its presence has been most beneficial: it has received support from us, and we from it. What was the condition upon which the Executive remained? On the condition in which alone he could remain consistently with its duty. It was that the Members of the Government should be as responsible for its acts as if they had not seats in the House; that their duties should not be absorbed in their duties as Members of Parliament; that they should owe one duty to Parliament as Members of the House, and another duty to it as Members of the Executive Government; that while the Parliament on the one hand has the power directly or indirectly to make or unmake the Government, on the other hand it should not use its power in order to coerce its liberty. If the Government is to continue responsible, it must continue free. What is it that the right hon. gentleman now proposes? With 'candied courtesy' he addressed the House in language which, as the 658th part of it, I was a little ashamed to hear, and he said—'If the House will only take us into its counsels and co-operate with us in this measure, we shall receive with cordiality, with deference, nay, with gratitude, any suggestions you like. In other words, the right hon. gentleman said: 'Say what you like, do what you like, but for God's sake leave us our places.' I think that, pathetic as may be the tones of the entreaty, the supplication addressed to the House by the right hon. gentleman ought not to be granted. I think we ought to hold the Government to that responsibility which all Governments undertake who bring in great measures of organic change in the Constitution. The right hon. gentleman proposes that we should go into Committee with the distinct understanding that the Government should not be responsible for anything which is to be proposed; but that every man should be left to move any amendment without the hand of his party leader upon him to restrain him, and that we should put the Constitution into a kind of alembic, and take the chance of what comes out of it. I say, Sir, that that is a wild, dangerous and unconstitutional course. It puts me in mind of what happened to the children of Israel when they were desired to throw all their gold, jewellery and ornaments into the fire. Then came out what? A calf."

Then, Sir, Mr. John Bright in the same discussion used these words:

"I say, therefore, with the right hon. gentleman below me, to go into a discussion on the resolutions is merely a waste of time. But to go into a discussion of them with a view of treating them as we were invited to treat them a fortnight ago would be much more than a waste of time, for it would be to throw this question of reform, which, after all, is a question of some seriousness, into a Parliamentary chaos, and at the same time it would depreciate, to an immeasurable degree, the character and the power in future time of the Executive Government in this House. The right hon. gentlemen a fortnight ago flattered us by telling us how superior we are to certain legislative assemblies in other countries, and he referred, amongst others, to the one which sits at Washington. Now, I undertake to say that there has been no proposal made to this House, during the four-and-twenty years I have been here, which has tended so much to Americanise the House of Commons—the chief legislative assembly of this country—as the proposal which the Government has made to-night. What takes place at Washington? Mr. Seward, Mr. Stanton and other eminent men, heads of departments under the President, do not make their appearance in the House of Representatives, or even in the Senate. These two assemblies discuss any measures they like; they pass any measures they like, and it is not necessary that they should consult the President or his Ministers. So here. Ministers are to sit on that Bench, and, as a newspaper which has lately been doing its best to lash the colleagues of the right hon. gentleman into some obedience to his views, says, the right hon. gentleman is to stand at the counter in a decorous garb, as if he were in Swan and Edgar's, and ask whether there is 'anything more, gentlemen, you would like?' I say, then, that the advice of the right hon. gentleman the Member for Calne ought to be taken. The Government should withdraw these resolutions, which will serve only to waste our time and to embarrass the question; and then they ought to bring in a distinct and definite Bill this day week, and submit it, manfully, to discussion and the decision of Parliament, as was done, by the right hon. gentleman who sits on these Benches, last year.

Then, Sir, there is a case in which there was a Committee moved—a case in 1869—in which the Crown recommended that the House of Commons should enquire into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and municipal elections, and should consider "whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquility, purity and freedom." The House of Commons assented to that proposition, and it was proposed to be carried out by striking a Committee. It is obvious from a perusal of the debate that there was a vast mass of facts to be enquired into, obtainable only by the calling of witnesses and the ascertaining of how the Election Laws, Parliamentary and Municipal, practically worked. There were the great questions of intimidation, of the freedom of the vote, and numerous other questions; and underlying all, as was made evident, there was the question of whether the ballot was, or was not, to be the proper remedy. In the course of the debate, Mr. Gladstone, the First Minister, spoke and declared that that was the general question, and that upon that question all the Liberal Ministries, with which he had been connected, and the then Ministry, were divided, that it was an open question, and that the Ministry did not propose to take Ministerial responsibility with reference to that matter. This was a Committee, whose main function was to enquire; and ultimately the Bill which was introduced, was introduced in a subsequent year upon the responsibility of the Government as a Government measure, and in accordance with many of the views which had previously been promulgated. I call particular attention to an instructive debate which took place in the following year under the rule of the same Ministry, upon a motion of a Select Committee with reference to the condition of the County of Westmeath, and parts of two counties in Ireland. Lord Hartington, who was then, I think, Irish Secretary, moved:

"That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the state of Westmeath and certain parts adjoining, of Meath and King's county, the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and confederacy existing therein, and the best means of suppressing the same."

I ask the House to note these last few words—not merely to enquire into the confederacy and the condition of the country, but also the best means of suppressing that unlawful confederacy. It is perfectly obvious, from Lord Hartington's speech, that before he was able to make the motion of which he had given notice, exception must have been taken in some quarters to these final words; for, in his opening speech, he says:

"I repeat that, in asking the House for a Committee to enquire into the facts, we have no desire to ask the Committee to suggest a remedy."

MR. BLAKE.

Upon the facts so established, as I believe they would be before a Committee, the Government will be prepared, as I said before, to legislate."

Again he says:

"I do not think it the least desirable that the witnesses should be precluded from giving their opinion on this subject. But I am quite aware that those words have been misunderstood and misapprehended. I am quite aware they have been misunderstood as meaning that we have asked the Committee not only to enter into an examination of the facts, but to provide a remedy. I am glad to state that that is not the meaning of the Government, and rather than that any false impression of the sort should exist, I will willingly consent either to alter the words referred to, or to omit them altogether, providing always it be understood that the witnesses shall not thereby be precluded from expressing an opinion as to the remedy they would suggest."

Now, Sir, you will notice that—in so far as this was an enquiry into facts, which Lord Hartington proved conclusively they could not obtain except by Parliamentary powers, and which other Ministers showed they wanted to prosecute under Parliamentary sanction, and with the Irish members representing the popular party in Ireland upon the Committee—the Ministry coupled with the motion for that enquiry a proposal to relegate it to that Committee to suggest a remedy. I have shown that Lord Hartington at once disclaimed that intention, and pointed out that it was the duty of the Executive to propose the remedy upon its own responsibility. Mr. Disraeli spoke, and he thought there was no need for a Committee. He did not foresee, of course, that in this country, some years later, it would be necessary for a Select Committee to be appointed to pick up half a dozen Statutes and put them together, and he did not see that there was any reason for a Select Committee to enquire into this secret confederacy, because he said the Ministry themselves were the Committee; and then he went on to say:

"I would impress on the House the inexpediency of assenting to a Committee which is to relieve the Government from their responsibility as an Executive * * * The evil is intolerable and ought to be put down, and we are prepared to support Her Majesty's Government if, in the exercise of their constitutional functions, they come forward and propose a measure, instead of asking the House of Commons to enter upon an enquiry into the matter. The matter is urgent, and the business of a Committee is necessarily always long. A Committee—to do what—to examine officers of the Government, to examine magistrates, to call for information from a miscellaneous multitude of witnesses? Why, a Committee of enquiry for such purposes is always in existence. It is the Cabinet of the Queen. They have the best information, and they are selected men, who are supposed to be most competent to decide on that information; and on the results of their deliberations and on their convictions they ought to introduce a measure, and not move for a Committee, when the state of an Irish county is intolerable. The right hon. gentleman, after all his heroic exploits, and at the head of his great majority, is making Government ridiculous. If he persists in this absurd suggestion I shall leave it to fortune to decide what may be its results. If he will bring forward a measure—an adequate measure—a measure which will meet the evil, he will be supported."

Well, Sir, many eminent men took part in that debate. I do not propose to trouble the House with reading from several other speeches which deserve to be read, but I hope they will be read before this debate closes. Mr. Gladstone's speech, however, is worth reading. He says:

"The right hon. gentleman opposite has asked—What is the Committee to do? If the words in which we have framed our motion are justly open to censure or criticism, I admit that we might have indicated more clearly and distinctly the purposes to which the attention of the Committee would be directed. As to the question—What is the Committee to do? I will answer that question in two words—because I want to draw a broad distinction between the collection and elucidation of facts, and the responsible duty of making recommendations founded on those facts. In the collection and elucidation of facts we have exhausted the means properly in our hands as an Executive Government; and we believe we might obtain valuable aid from the House of Commons; and we think that the House of Commons, through the Irish representatives, will prove a salutary check on our proceedings. We think that the powers which this House possesses can be exercised in a perfectly salutary way as a check on our proceedings, by testing and scrutinizing our facts, and it is for this reason that we ask for the assistance of a Committee."

Well, Mr. Speaker, the previous question was proposed, which prevented any amendment to the motion such as the Government had indicated their readiness to accept; and before the previous question was put, Mr. Disraeli said:

"If we vote for the motion of the noble Lord, we shall, in fact, come to a vote which transfers the duties of the Executive to the House of Commons. Therefore, I must say, I cannot support the motion."

Well, the previous question met its fate, and the motion was carried by a large majority in its original words. But Mr. Gladstone was determined that the precedent should not stand in that shape, and a few days afterwards he used this language:

"I beg to give notice of my intention to do what I think will be agreeable to the House—that is, to fulfil an implied obligation which Her Majesty's Government undertook in the course of the debate upon the appointment of a Committee to enquire into the state of Westmeath. My noble friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland intimated—and I supported him in the intimation—that it would be perfectly agreeable to us to alter the terms of the motion by omitting the closing words, which were considered to bear the interpretation that we desired to diminish the responsibility of the Government in regard to the enquiry—an interpretation we never intended them to bear."

And he proceeded to move the discharge of the order, and it was discharged; and he forthwith moved a new order for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire, merely omitting the words with reference to the suggestion of a remedy; and the restricted order was carried. Now, I say it is impossible to conceive a Parliamentary precedent which more clearly proves, from the concurrence of authority from the great constitutional leaders on both sides of the House, where the great line of demarcation is. A Select Committee, under certain circumstances—although Mr. Disraeli would not admit that those were appropriate circumstances—may be useful to get at facts which the Cabinet or the Queen cannot obtain; but the responsibility of providing a remedy is to be devolved, not on any Select Committee, but on the Government; and you find a powerful Government, as Mr. Gladstone's was, with a majority exceeding one hundred at that time, yielding to that assault, and formally receding from the position it assumed, discharging the order, and substituting a correct order—nobly doing so, and placing the relations of the House and the Executive upon a correct footing. There was a subsequent case, in which observations valuable and important are to be found with reference to the diplomatic relations with Persia; but I hope some other hon. gentleman will present them to the House. I desire to allude to another case, the case of the proposed Select Committee on the Irish Parliament as late as 1877, in which Mr. Shaw made his well known motion, and in which you find two leading members of the House—Mr. Forster, then in Opposition, but a leading member of the Liberal party, and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, a member of the Conservative Government—both speaking and declining the reference to a Select Committee of a question of that description upon two grounds; first, that it was not a fit question to be referred to a Select Committee, the proper place to debate it being in full Parliament, and secondly that the Government was not prepared to yield to the recommendations of any Committee, but would act on its own responsibility. Mr. Forster says:

"It was always a plausible mode of proceeding to ask for a Committee of enquiry, especially on a matter of deep interest; but it must be recollected that there was a great difference between subjects that were fit to be discussed in that House and those which were fit to be sent upstairs. In that House they could best discuss great principles, and when it was resolved to adopt any of those principles, then the matter was sent upstairs in order that the details of the scheme for carrying them into effect might be settled. The hon. member for Cork had himself stated that one of his reasons for bringing this question before the House year after year was, that it was as well that the House should have an opportunity from time to time of reconsidering the great principles that lay at the foundation of our Government. The hon. member might be fully justified in taking that course; but these great principles which he wished to have reconsidered ought to be discussed in full debate in that House, and not sent upstairs before a Committee. Questions were not sent upstairs before a Committee unless they were open, and he maintained that at present—and he doubted if it would ever be different—Home Rule was not an open question."

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach said:

"The Government were not prepared to abide by the decision in this question, if it should chance to be in favor of the honorable and learned member who has just sat down; and they could not admit the propriety of an enquiry by a Committee of the House into the Constitution of the United Kingdom."

I think these precedents show what our own uniform practice has established, that there is a proper mode for the Government of presenting to this House its views upon those great and important subjects upon which it deems legislative Acts to be necessary. The Government has declared that legislative action is necessary in this matter, and if the Speech from the Throne be true there can be no doubt of that necessity, for they have declared that if we could avoid the unrestricted and unregulated sale of intoxicating liquors all over this Dominion, we must legislate. They have come to that conclusion. Their responsibility then begins—the responsibility of proposing to this House the legislation which they deem to be best fitted to grapple with that evil, to meet that difficulty, to avert that injury to the public. And they may find difficulty in the case, they may find difficulties within their own ranks owing to those dissensions to which I have referred, as to where the jurisdiction is; they may find difficulty owing to the well known views of many of their followers on this subject, owing to the declarations made by the First Minister in June, and subsequently in December, and the others to which I have referred. These are difficulties of their own making. They have turned this into a more difficult question than it was. But there remain these questions for consideration, to which I have imperfectly alluded—the question: what in truth and in fact is the meaning of our Constitution? the question: what our policy should be with regard to the Constitution after we have interpreted its meaning? If we determine that the Constitution is such that we are exclusively vested with the power of checking the sale of intoxicating drinks, and if we determine, as a matter of policy, that we will not proceed to procure the devolution of that power on these minor authorities, which have heretofore exercised it—and the Government has come to this conclusion—the persons who must decide what is the measure this House should adopt, who must frame that measure and introduce it and lay down the lines upon which it shall be passed, are the Government of the day. They have the power. They have the means of procuring the best information and advice, and they are paid to prepare these measures and bring them down. We are here in the sixth week of the Session, and they are not ready to tell us about it; they have no idea what sort of a measure is to be brought down; they cannot frame a measure—it passes their capacity. But they will take men out of the Chamber, who, in the intervals of their Parliamentary duties, which will be onerous enough we know during the remainder of the Session, from the idle time we have had for the past few weeks—to do their business for them, to do that which they had left undone, and relieve them from the responsibility of doing it. I do not believe that is the constitutional or a convenient view. I believe the ordinary constitutional course should be adopted by the Government of the day, which has asserted the necessity of legislation long ago. I believe the Government should bring down a measure carrying out their views on their own responsibility. For my part I do not consent that a question of this description shall be dealt with in this unprecedented fashion. I denounce it as an infringement, unknown here and practically unknown elsewhere, upon our constitutional mode of procedure—an infringement calculated to confuse the action of Parliament, calculated to be inconvenient and embarrassing calculated to relieve the Government of the day of a responsibility which it ought not to shuffle away from, and to impose upon others, independent members of Parliament, a responsibility which should not properly devolve upon them; and I am opposed to this motion from the beginning to the end.

Mr. RYKERT. I have not had the advantage of hearing the earlier part of what the hon. gentleman said, but I have heard quite sufficient during the past few hours to satisfy myself that the House ought to vote in favor of the resolution of the right hon. the Premier. The hon. gentlemen on the other side seemed to think that the speech of the hon. member for West Durham is quite unanswerable. It is certainly rather refreshing to my mind to hear the hon. gentleman charge the Government with shirking a duty or a responsibility. He evidently has forgotten his own record during the last ten or twelve years, for no hon. gentleman in this House is more open to that charge than he. I have listened with a great deal of attention to discover whether or not the hon. gentleman had formed an opinion on this important question, since the time he first spoke upon it, in the debate on the Address. At that time the hon. gentleman claimed he was not in possession of the facts regarding the trial of the case of Russell vs. The Queen. He complained then that he had not an opportunity of seeing that judgment, and was, therefore, in doubt as regards the responsibility of this House to deal with this question. After the lapse of six weeks, after he has elaborately discussed the question with most of his followers, after searching the records of Parliament, and looking up his authorities on constitutional practice, the hon. gentleman is still in doubt and not prepared to express his opinion whether this House has the right or not to legislate upon this question. Sir, this House has no right to expect the hon. gentleman to express an opinion on a constitutional question. Upon no occasion has he dared in this Parliament or elsewhere to give his opinion on great constitutional questions, and we were right in expecting that upon a question like this he would shirk the point at issue as he has always done before. Now, what is the question before the House? His Excellency the Governor General was advised to insert in his Address the following paragraph:—

"I am advised that the judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, delivered last June, on the appeal of Russell vs. The Queen, goes to show, that in order to prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and for that purpose to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses, legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary. Your earnest consideration of this important subject is desired."

During the debate on the Address the right hon. leader of the Government gave his reasons for advising His Excellency to insert that paragraph in his Address. The hon. gentleman referred to that decision in Russell vs. The Queen, and said:

"It is quite clear to every lawyer and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, will see that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided that this Parliament had the right to deal with the Scott Act, are the reasons showing that the Provincial Legislature of Ontario had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks' Act, except as a matter of revenue for municipal or provincial purposes. The hon. gentleman says that he should have allowed the matter to stand over until it was finally decided. Sir, if there be any value in the decision, and there is every value in it, because it is the law of the land, there is no check at this moment in the Province of Ontario against the unlimited, unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors."

Sir, that was a justification for the Government introducing that paragraph into the Address, and it justifies the Government in asking this House to approach the consideration of one of the greatest questions ever brought before this Legislature. The Government position is this: we are forced to this legislation; we are forced by the decision of the Privy Council, which declares that the Legislature of Ontario has no right to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors, that, under section 92 of the British North America Act, they had no power whatever to pass any law. Therefore, the question remains, was it right or was it wrong to allow the general public to sell liquor just as they pleased? The Government has not approached this question with the desire to monopolize, or control, or centralize power, as these hon. gentlemen insinuate. That is the charge they have made against this Government, the charge they made during the late campaign, because they felt they had great power in their own hands and they knew right well that if this Government took that power to itself it would be turned against them on another occasion; and no doubt they were loath to see any Government of Conservative tendency having that power in its hands. Now this Government say: We do not want you to discuss the constitutional question, we do not ask you to decide that question at all; we simply ask you as a Committee to assimilate the several laws of the Provinces, and submit to this House some suggestion upon which a uniform law may be framed affecting all the Provinces. The hon. gentleman has quoted precedents against this. He says this is the first time in Canadian Parliamentary history where a Government has ignored its responsibility and thrown it upon the House. He has quoted English precedents to show that it is not right so to do, but the hon. gentleman has given himself and his cause entirely away. The greatest constitutional lawyers in England have declared, as read by the hon. gentleman himself, that there are occasions when great questions should be submitted to Parliamentary Committees.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. I know the hon. gentleman is uneasy, he always gets uneasy. But although I may be subjecting myself to the hon. gentleman's ill-pleasure, I shall nevertheless endeavor to meet some of his arguments as briefly as I can. The hon. gentleman has said that this is a novel mode of disposing of this question. But as I have already pointed out, the English cases he cited do not sustain his view. Mr. Disraeli gave his opinion decidedly that a Parliamentary Committee was the proper place to discuss a certain great constitutional question, and although he was compelled in the end to withdraw that from the consideration of a Committee, it was done upon the ground that it was not a question of detail, but was a question of constitutional reform. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman cites a case where Mr. Gladstone himself declares that there are occasions when the House shall place in the hands of a Committee the power of dealing with these questions. Now, all this Government has asked this House to do is to agree to a Committee, which shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, and report by Bill or otherwise. They do not ask this House to appoint a Committee to investigate the question of constitutional law. They do not ask this House to consider whether the license question may be dealt with by the Local Legislatures or by the Dominion Parliament. That is a foregone conclusion, and His Excellency says he is advised upon that question that the Provinces have no right to deal with the question; and therefore, this House being seized with the case, and being satisfied that the opinion of the hon. the First Minister is the true one, is asked only to assimilate the laws of the several Provinces and to see that an Act is placed on the Statute-book, which shall satisfy the several Provinces. Now, what is the answer to this? The hon. leader of the Opposition says that the case of Russell vs. The Queen decides nothing; he says that is still in doubt. I say, once more, that the hon. gentleman gives himself away by saying that the time may yet come when that decision may be adverse to the several Provinces holding that power, and confirmatory of the present decision, when all the facts are fully investigated. But the hon. gentleman, in order to avoid what appears to every sensible and right thinking man as the meaning of that judgment, says that they were not seized of the whole question—that the whole question was not discussed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Hence he concludes that there is a doubt as to the jurisdiction of this House to legislate upon this question. I say, if there be a doubt as regards the right of either Legislature to pass that law, then let us remove that doubt. His argument amounts to this, that there is concurrent jurisdiction over this question by this Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures. Then, I say, why should this Legislature leave that doubt in existence, ignore its right and function, and refuse to discharge its duty to the general public by preventing the unrestricted sale of liquors? The hon. gentleman argues that the jurisdiction is still vested in the Local Legislature; but, as a constitutional lawyer, he dare not say that the case of Russell vs. The Queen is not law, that it does not decide the question as regards jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman entirely ignores that view of the matter, and shirks the responsibility of giving a constitutional opinion upon it. He says again, that the only excuse the Government has for introducing this measure is that the right hon. leader of the Government, some time ago, in a speech which he made in Yorkville, declared that he would legislate upon this question. Well, what better evidence does this country want of the great constitutional knowledge of the right hon. gentleman than the fact that he predicted, three weeks before the decision was given, that the jurisdiction lay alone in this Legislature; that the Local Legislatures had no control over that question. That shows his great constitutional knowledge and his opinion of what the law really was, because, a few weeks afterwards, we find the Privy Council endorsing his view. The question now is, has this Legislature jurisdiction or has it not? If it has, let us deal with the question and settle it for ever, and so prevent the unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors. The hon. gentleman goes on to quote certain authorities in our own courts, to show that the case of Russell vs. The Queen is not the law of the land. The cases cited in Lower Canada have no bearing upon this question. The hon. gentleman admits himself that the constitutional question was not involved in these cases, therefore, the question at issue here was not decided by them. It is rather refreshing now to hear the hon. gentleman appeal to the courts. A few months ago the hon. gentlemen opposite did not care for the decision of the courts. A few weeks ago, in parading themselves before the country, they thought the opinion of the Judges was of no consequence. What cared they for the opinions of the Supreme Court, although it was constituted by themselves, and although the Judges were appointed by themselves? Although they were the highest judicial authorities, and their judgment was unanimous in the case of McLaren vs. Caldwell, yet hon. gentlemen opposite entirely ignored the right of the court to decide the question. We remember on another occasion the hon. gentleman would not appeal to the courts of the land on the question of the disallowance of the Streams Bill, but he would appeal to the high court of the people. He appealed to that court, and a verdict was rendered against hon. gentlemen opposite. But, says the hon. gentleman, we should not decide whether the Dominion is authorized to pass such legislation as is proposed, but we should refer the whole question to a judicial tribunal. Has the hon. gentleman elucidated the question at all, or thrown any light on it? He admits there is doubt, and that it may yet be decided that the view taken by the Government is the correct one. If that be so, let us settle the question and have no doubt respecting it. The hon. gentleman says they are not willing to take the ipse dixit of the leader of the Government. On this side of the House we are prepared to take the ipse dixit as he calls it. We are prepared on looking over the history of the leader of the Government on the constitutional questions raised during the last twenty-five years, and the opinions he expressed on them, and the manner in which he had been upheld on every occasion, and looking at the opinions given by the leader of the Opposition, which had not been sustained by the court, but, on the contrary, had been disapproved by the highest authorities, we have a right to accept the opinion of the First Minister and take action in this matter. The hon. member for West Durham dare not give an opinion on this question. If the hon. gentleman had desired to approach the consideration of the question with honesty and sincerity, and with a desire to satisfy the people of the country, instead of delivering a partisan speech, instead of throwing what I may call dirt in the face of Ministers, and speaking about their incapacity in dealing with the question, instead of throwing out taunts regarding the position of the Conservative party—why did he not, as an honest man and a legislator, desirous of promoting the best interests of the country, give his opinion on this question? But we cannot expect such a statement from the hon. gentleman. Have we not on record the fact that the hon. gentleman, when in power in the Legislature of Ontario, led his majority to vote certain resolutions respecting the Nova Scotia subsidy. I am glad to say I was one of the twelve who voted against him. For his action on that occasion the hon. gentleman received a snub from the highest authorities of the land. The authorities in England told him to mind his own business, and this indeed has been the outcome of every constitutional opinion expressed by him. While the hon. gentleman opposes the appointment of the Committee proposed, he will not commit himself to the statement that the Government is wrong in the view it takes of the matter. He says there is doubt about it. He assumes the same rôle as he did when the Letellier question was discussed before the House. He sat dumb then, he would not say anything about it. Where was he last Session when the great question of the Boundary Award was discussed, when the greatest of all living questions in Ontario, as he calls it, that of territorial rights, was before Parliament? He sat there with his hat over his eyes and remained dumb; because he dare not express the opinion that the award was a legal award, in the face of his own speeches; and during the last campaign in Ontario he did not dare to take the stump, because he would have been met with his own speeches delivered in Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. We do not hear from the hon. member when we want to do so. On questions of constitutional law we cannot obtain from him an opinion if it is opposed to his partisan view of the case. The hon. gentleman is not a safe guide to follow on questions of constitutional law, for he has shirked the responsibility of doing what he should have done as leader of a great party. The hon. gentleman, while admitting that the decision may ultimately be in favor of the view taken by the leader of the Government, proposes to the House to let the matter remain in this present unsettled state, until the whole subject can be brought before the Privy Council. I am glad to find the hon. gentleman is now willing to go to the courts, because he may instruct the Lilliputian Premier of Ontario to go to the courts for a settlement of the Boundary Award. The hon. gentleman has been pleased to talk about an attempt of the Government to seize power for partisan purposes. No person knows better than he does, the great benefit his party derived from the partisan conduct of the Ontario Government in connection with the licensing question. Look at the last Ontario Elections, and consider how many license inspectors were found running riot through the Province, and how many were candidates at those elections. In every direction the Local Government had increased its power, not in the interests of the public but in order to keep itself in power. Some of those officers I have mentioned were appointed returning officers. The hon. gentleman refers to what he calls the humiliation of the Conservative party, in abandoning its territorial rights, in ignoring the Boundary Award, and in its conduct on the Streams Bill. On the majority of the questions the hon. gentleman was not ready to express an opinion. Upon the Streams Bill he held a fee and gave an opinion; but when the subject was discussed in Parliament, and the constitutional question was debated he entirely evaded the question and shirked it, as he does to-night this important question. I have already pointed out that in the discussion of the Boundary Award, the hon. gentleman would not venture to give the House his opinion but remained silent. The issue, in my opinion, is a very simple one. The Government declared that the decision referred to in the speech from the Throne is a plain and distinct one. In Russell vs. The Queen the question arose upon the construction of the 91st and 92nd sections of the British North American Act. The 91st section enacts:

"It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in the Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated."

Then after the enumeration of twenty-nine classes of subjects, the section contains the following words:—

"And any matters coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section, shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature, comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislature of the Province."

It goes on to show that there were three classes of subjects in section twenty-nine, to which special reference was had in the argument, viz.:

"9. Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer and other licenses, in order to the raising of a revenue for Provincial, or municipal purposes.

"13. Property and civil rights in the Province.

"16. Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province."

Now, Sir, what does the court also say:

"With regard to the first of these classes, No. 9, it is to be observed that the power of granting licenses is not assigned to the Provincial Legislature for the purpose of regulating trade, but 'in order to the raising of a revenue for Provincial, local or municipal purposes.'"

Sir, I do not know where you could find clearer language than this, which is as clear as language can make it—that for purposes of raising revenue, they have power, but as to regulating trade they have no power:

"The Act in question is not a fiscal law; it is not a law for raising revenue; on the contrary, the effect of it may be to destroy or diminish revenue; indeed it was a main objection to the Act that in the city of Fredericton it did in point of fact diminish the sources of municipal revenue. It is evident, therefore, that the matter of the Act is not within the class of subject No. 9, and consequently that it could not have been passed by the Provincial Legislature by virtue of any authority conferred by it upon that sub-section.

"It appears that by Statutes of the Province of New Brunswick authority has been conferred upon the municipality of Fredericton to raise money for municipal purposes by granting licenses of the nature of those described in No. 9 of section 92, and that licenses granted to taverns for the sale of intoxicating liquors were a profitable source of revenue to the municipality. It was contended by the appellant's counsel, and it was their main argument on this part of the case, that the Temperance Act interfered prejudicially with the traffic from which this revenue was derived, and thus invaded a subject assigned exclusively to the Provincial Legislature. But, supposing the effect of the Act to be prejudicial to the revenue derived by the municipality from licenses, it does not follow that the Dominion Parliament might not pass it by virtue of its general authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada."

Then at the bottom of page five we also find this:

"Next, their Lordships cannot think that the Temperance Act in question probably belongs to the class of subjects, 'Property and Civil Rights.' It has in its legal aspect an obvious and close similarity to laws which place restrictions on the sale or custody of poisonous drugs, or of dangerously explosive substances. These things, as well as intoxicating liquors, can of course, be held as property, but a law placing restriction on their sale, custody or removal, on the ground that the free sale or use of them is dangerous to public safety, and make it a criminal offence punishable by fine or imprisonment to violate these restrictions, cannot properly be deemed a law in relation to property in the sense in which those words are used in the 92nd section."

Sir, that language is plain; and the hon. gentleman cannot point out any portion of that decision, which is ambiguous. He refers to no part of the decision; but he arrogates to himself the right to say, that there is no doubt about it, there can be no doubt whatever about it. Now, Sir, what is the case to-day? The Government finds itself in this dilemma, and is bound to relieve itself of the responsibility and difficulty which exists, in some way, and with the view of promoting temperance, and a desire to see that the sale of intoxicating liquors is not left unrestricted, proposes this course. The Conservative party has always taken that view of the question, and during the last twenty years has favored the imposing of such restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors, as will prevent the deplorable state of things that has so often occurred in this country. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman says: "What did the right hon. gentleman do some years ago with regard to this question when before Parliament?" But we, Sir, know this much—that for year after year the stock-in-trade of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, was the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, upon every platform in the Province of Ontario, and in the Dominion, these gentlemen paraded their ideas as to the passage of a prohibitory liquor law, before the people, and said: "Place us in power and see what we will do; we will give you a prohibitory liquor law, if we get into power." And what was the result? Why, the member for East York said, when they attained power: "The time has not yet arrived. You must educate the people on that question. We must not force it summarily on them." They did have a law passed—the Scott Act—and what was the result? An enormous amount of litigation and law, with which the temperance men are not satisfied. It is neither the one thing or the other. If they had given the people what they wanted we would not have the Scott Act on the Statute-book. These hon. gentleman did not want to impose restrictions at all on the traffic; but the Government do not propose to do that. Sir, the hon. gentleman went on in a sort of badinage manner, to speak about the Conservative Convention which was held in the city of Toronto, and said it was simply the reflex of the opinion of the Government. We have heard a good deal about the abuse of the Grit Convention by the leading organ of the Conservative party; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman might have admitted what was the fact, that that Convention was simply called for the purpose of passing resolutions for Mr. Mowat; and I want no better authority, as to this fact, than the one which I have before me. There was at that Convention a certain delegate, who also is proprietor of, or writer for a very prominent paper in Winnipeg; and Sir, if these hon. gentlemen want an antidote to the poison, which they said the Mail had disseminated, we have it here in the copy of the Daily Sun of January 6th, 1883:

"The Liberal Convention has been held in Toronto, and is now a thing of the past. It has done what it was predicted to do, having simply passed a number of cut-and-dried resolutions, and paid its homage to Premier Mowat. But we see little use of these one-sided demonstrations; a Convention of thinking men, holding diverse opinions, called to compare notes and cross arguments, would have some sense in it, but a crowd of jumping-jacks moved by a string, does not impress one with the dignity and independence of human nature."

This is the character which we have of that Convention from one of themselves: that the members of it were a set of jumping jacks. However, that is a mere matter of taste. They know best themselves the character of the men who were there; although I am not disposed to underrate the integrity, ability or honesty of the men who attended that Convention, I merely point this out to show that while those hon. gentlemen try to make light of the resolutions passed at the instance of the hon. gentleman, his own friends were of the opinion that the Convention consisted of a lot of jumping jacks. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in supporting the resolution of the right hon. gentleman. I support it because we find ourselves in an unfortunate dilemma. The law declares beyond all question, to any unprejudiced mind, that the jurisdiction as to the sale of intoxicating liquors is not in the hands of the Local Legislatures. Knowing this to be the case, as a man desirous of promoting temperance principles throughout the country, and of seeing these properly encouraged and developed throughout the land, I desire to see some legislation adopted, by means of which all doubt on this subject may be removed; and I believe that, whether the Bill is introduced by the Government itself, or by this Committee, we will obtain what we so much desire—a law placed on the Statute-book, which will prevent the wholesale sale of intoxicating liquors. This Committee, as I understand it, cannot be clothed with constitutional powers, but is simply intended to assimilate the laws of the different Provinces; if they accomplish that object, I think it will be a move in the right direction, and one which will be acceptable to the whole country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That the said paragraph be referred to a Select Committee of seventeen members, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report by Bill or otherwise, and that the said Committee be composed of Messrs. Blake, Ross (Middlesex), McCarthy, Cameron (North Victoria), Blanchet, Laurier, Desjardins, Casgrain, Hall, Foster (King's County, New Brunswick), Burpee (St. John), Richey, Robertson (Shelburne), Brecken, Royal, Baker (Victoria, B. C.), and the mover, and that the Rule as to limitation and selection of members be suspended.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to the motion as submitted by the mover, for the suspension of the 78th Rule of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion can be divided.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think our Rules can be suspended by a bare majority of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes they can.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that as notice has been given it is within the power of the House to suspend or change the rule. If notice had not been given the Rule could not have been suspended.

Mr. BLAKE. Then you rule that a bare majority of the House can suspend the Rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. I know of no Rule by which more than a majority is required for the suspension of a Rule.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to serving on this Committee, on the Rule that no member can be nominated on a Committee who has declared himself against it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think that an hon. member can object to any particular part of a resolution and not to the whole of it.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to it all from top to toe.

Mr. SPEAKER. One part of the resolution is with regard to preventing the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and the other is as to whether legislation by the Dominion Parliament will be necessary. That is for the Committee to determine. I think there is nothing which will prevent the House which made the Rule from suspending it by a majority.

Mr. BLAKE. I never heard before that a Standing Rule could be set aside except by consent. They can be altered only by the alteration of the Standing Rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not in case notice is given.

Mr. BLAKE. It must be a notice to alter the Standing Rule, and the Standing Rule must be altered.

Mr. SPEAKER. Notice may be given to suspend or alter a Rule for a particular occasion.
